PRISCILLA, or PRISCA; generally called Priscilla; but called Prisca, 2 Tim. iv. 19. a Christian woman, well known in the Acts, and in St. Paul's epistles: sometimes placed before her husband Aquila. Vide AQUILA. Their house was so thoroughly christianized, that St. Paul calls it a church. From Ephesus they went to Rome, where they were, when St. Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans, A. D. 58. In Rom. xvi. 5. he salutes them first of all, with great commendations. They returned into Asia sometime afterwards, and St. Paul writing to Timothy, desires him to salute them on his account. 2 Tim. iv. 19. A. D. 65. It is thought they died here. The Latin martyrologies commemorate them July 8. The Greeks celebrate Aquila July 14.

PROCHORUS, Πρόχορος, he that presides over the choir; from πρό, and χόρος.

PROCHORUS, or PROCORUS, one of the seven deacons. Acts vi. 5. A. D. 33 or 34.—The Greeks think he was the first bishop of Nicomedia. Ado says he suffered martyrdom at Antioch, August 9. after having made himself very famous by his miracles. We have a history of St. John the Evangelist, under the name of Prochorus; but it is modern.

PROCULA, or PROSCULA, or CLAUDIA PROCULA: this is said to be the name of Pilate's wife. Vincent of Beauvais, lib. vii. cap. 41. Speculi Historic. quotes the Apocryphal gospel of Nicodemus, as giving her the name of Procula; but the copy of this gospel, printed by Fabricius, has not this name: it has only Matrona ipsius Pilati procul prosita: yet Malehas, in his Chronicon, Nicephorus, lib. i. cap. 30. the false Lucius Dexter, call her Procula.—Some of the fathers seem to think, that she feared God, and was saved. Origen, Chrysost. in Matth. Hilary, Can. 33. Others conclude, that she embraced the faith of Christ, and was of the number of his saints. (Menolog. Græc. apud Cornel. a Lapide.) As to her dream on account of our Saviour, some think it was suggested to her by the devil, who was in suspense about something, and was in fear of the subversion of his empire. (Evang. Nicod. Cyprian. seu alius Serm. de Passione. Athanas. tract. ad Maxim. lib. i. p. 163. Beda. Anselm, Hist. Scholast.) Others impute it to a good spirit. (Ambros. lib. x. Origen, Chrysost. Hieron. in Matth. Leo. Magn. Serm. xi. de Passione. Mald. Grot. Brug. in Matth.) See PILATE. [It is more likely that neither devil nor angel had any thing to do with the dream of Pilate's wife: the anxiety and agitation of her mind, in consequence of the disturbed state of her husband's government sufficiently account for her sufferings, and painful dreams.]

PROFANE. This is said of the contempt and abuse of holy things: a man who is defiled, and touches any sacred thing, pollutes, or profanes it. Profane persons are not to meddle with, to speak or write on sacred matters. A profane man, or laic, is not to touch the holy vessels, or to be employed in divine mysteries. He who makes a jest of sacred things, who profanes them by abuse, who defiles himself by impure or shameful actions, is a profane person.—

The

The Scripture calls Esau profane, because he sold his birth-right, which was esteemed a holy thing. Heb. xii. 16. The Egyptians would not admit the Hebrews to their tables, because they held them as profane. Gen. xliii. 32. The priests of the race of Aaron were enjoined to distinguish between sacred and profane, between pure and defiled; Lev. x. 10. and for this reason the use of wine was forbid them in the temple, during their time of waiting. It was forbid them to keep the flesh of the peace-offerings above two days. If they ate of it on the third day, they were punished as profaners of holy things. Lev. xix. 7.

Animals that were unclean by the law, rendered those who touched them, or ate of them unclean, profane, and polluted. Isaiah, lxxv. 4. calls those profane, who eat of the flesh of the swine, or who have profane broth in their pots. When Jerusalem is compared to the temple, the soil of this city is called profane; Ezek. xlvi. 15. i. e. appointed to common uses, and for a habitation of laics. In 2 Macc. xii. 23. the heathen that composed the army of Timotheus, are called profane. St. Paul marks as profane, such novel words and expressions as are needlessly introduced into religion. 1 Tim. vi. 20.

To profane the temple, to profane the sabbath, to profane the altar, are common expressions, to denote the violation of the repose of the sabbath; the entering of foreigners into the temple; irreverences committed there; impious sacrifices offered on the altar of the Lord, &c.

To profane the statutes, or the commandments of God, is to transgress and violate them. Psalm lxxxix. 31.

To profane the covenant, or promises sworn to by an oath, is to frustrate them, or not perform them. Psalm lxxxix. 34.

To profane his race, to blemish the glory of it. Ecclesiasticus, xlvii. 22. says, that Solomon profaned his race, because by his sins he became the occasion, that God withheld his spirit of wisdom from his son Rehoboam, who by his imprudence alienated the minds of Israel, and caused the revolt of the ten tribes.

To profane a vine, or a tree, is to use them freely. Deut. xx. 6. "What man is he that hath planted a vineyard, and hath not yet eaten of it?" Heb. hath not profaned it. In Leviticus xix. 23, where Moses enacts a law concerning the fruit of trees newly planted, he expresses the impurity of the first-fruits by the name of circumcision. "Ye shall count the fruit thereof as uncircumcised." For the first three years, these fruits were cut off as impure. The fourth year they offered what was produced, in the temple. Lastly, in the fifth year the owner had the liberty of using the fruit as his own, which then became profane or common. Jeremiah promises the Israelites, that they should return again into their own country, that they should plant vineyards on the mountains of Samaria, and should profane them; that is, should eat of the fruit thereof. The Vulgate says, plantabunt plantantes, et donec tempus veniat, non vindemiabunt.—They should not touch thereof till the fifth year. Hebrew וַיִּטְעוּ וַיִּשְׁכְּלוּ וַיִּשְׁכְּלוּ וַיִּשְׁכְּלוּ, plantabunt plantantes et profanabunt. Jer. xxxi. 5.

PROMISES. The word promise, in the New Testament, is usually taken for promises formerly made by God to Abraham and the patriarchs, to send them the Messiah. In this sense St. Paul commonly uses the word promise. Gal. iii. 16. Rom. iv. 13, 14, 15, et passim. In Acts vii. 17. the time of the promise, is the time of the coming of the Messiah. The children of the promise are, first, the Israelites descended from Isaac, in opposition to the Ishmaelites descended from Ishmael and Hagar; Rom. ix. 8 Gal. iv. 28. secondly, the Jews converted to Christianity, in opposition to the unbelieving Jews. Christians enjoy the promises made to the patriarchs, from which the unbelieving Jews have fallen. The holy spirit of promise, which Christians have received, Eph. i. 13. is the Holy Ghost, which God has promised to those who believe, and which is the pledge of their everlasting happiness. The first commandment with promise, Eph. vi. 2. is that, "Honour thy father and thy mother;" to which God has subjoined this promise, their days shall be multiplied on the earth.

The promises in general, denote eternal life, which is the object of a Christian's hope. Heb. xi. 16. The ancient patriarchs were heirs of the promises by their faith and their patience. Heb. vi. 12. All the promises of God are accomplished and fulfilled in Jesus Christ. 2 Cor. i. 20.

The word promise is often put for a vow. If a woman makes a vow, and her husband refuse his consent to it, her promise is void. Numb. xxx. 13. And Ecclesiasticus, v. 5. it is much better not to vow at all, than to vow, and not keep one's promise.

[Promise is sometimes taken in Eng. Tr. for the thing promised, as well as for the terms in which the engagement to confer a favour is made. So we read, Heb. xi. 13, that the patriarchs died in faith, not having received the promises;" whereas they certainly had received the promises, but not the things promised; and this is the more unfortunate, in this place, as we read immediately afterwards, that Abraham had received the promises," i. e. the birth of his his son and heir, Isaac. Promises always refer to future good; and in this they differ from threatenings, which always refer to evil: they differ also, inasmuch as threatenings may be alleviated; but promises must be fulfilled. No man would claim the execution of threatenings; but a promise gives a right of claim to the party to be benefitted. The fulfilment of promises may be delayed, as that which assured Abraham of posterity: they may be executed by means not apparent at the time. Man should be extremely cautious in making promises, lest he may fail in power to accomplish them: not so God; who has all power, at all times, and cannot be taken unprepared.]

PROOF, Trial, Temptation. God intended to prove you, to see if you would walk in his ways. Exod. xx. 20. After he had proved you and afflicted you, he had pity on you. Deut. viii. 16. God commands Gideon to bring his troops to a brook, that he might prove them there. Judg. vii. 4. As gold and silver are tried in the furnace, so God proves the heart. Prov. xvii. 3. The verb probo, is also put for to know, to examine: Omnia probate, quod bonum est tenete. 1 Thess. v. 21. Be renewed in spirit, that you may know what is the will of God, Rom. xii. 2. ut probetis quæ sit voluntas Dei bona, &c. Probare tirones; 2 Kings xxv. 10. רב מבחֵם. He that exercises them, or that proves the young soldiers. The Hebrew says, "He that is the master of the butchers, or of the cooks, or of the king's guard." [Captain of the guard Eng. Tr.]

PROPHET, Προφητης, that foretels events; from the Greek πρό and φημι.

PROPHET. The Hebrews originally called them seers. 1 Sam. ix. 9. נביא videns: but afterwards nabi, נביא, propheta, from the root nibba, to foretel, to divine. Scripture often gives to prophets the name of men of God, or of angels, (i. e. messengers) of the Lord. The verb nibba, to prophecy, in the Hebrew is of very great extent. Sometimes it signifies to foretel what is to come; at other times, to be inspired, to speak from God. God says to Moses, Exod. vii. 1. "Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet;" he shall explain thy sentiments to the people. St. Paul, Titus i. 12, quoting a heathen poet, calls him a prophet. Scripture does not withhold the name of prophet from impostors, although they falsely boasted of inspiration.

As true prophets, when transported by the energy of God's spirit, were sometimes agitated violently; similar motions were called prophecy when exhibited by persons who were filled with a good or evil spirit. 1 Sam. xviii. 10. Saul being moved by an evil spirit, propheesied in his house. To prophecy, is also put for to sing, to dance, to play on instruments. "Thou shalt meet a company of prophets, (says Samuel to Saul,) coming down from the high place, with a psaltery, and a tabret, and a pipe, and a harp before them, and they shall prophecy. And the spirit of the Lord shall come upon thee, and thou shalt prophecy with them, and shalt be turned into another man." 1 Sam. x. 5, 6. We read, 1 Chron. xxv. 1. that the sons of Asaph were appointed to prophecy upon harps.

This term is also used by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xi. 4, 5. xiv. 1, 3, 4, &c. for "explaining Scripture, speaking to the church in public; probably, because they who exercised these functions were regarded as under direction of the Holy Ghost. In Ecclus. xlviii. 13. this term is used in an extraordinary sense, instead of saying, "to work a miracle, to raise the dead." Thus it is said of the bones of Elisha, "after his death his body propheesied," because they restored a dead person to life, as if they had still been actuated by the soul of the prophet. Ecclus. xlix. 15. It is said that the bones of the patriarch Joseph propheesied also after his death; because they were a pledge of the promise made to the Israelites, that they should one day be delivered from their servitude in Egypt, and should possess the land of Canaan.

The usual way by which God communicated his will to the prophets was inspiration, which consisted in illuminating the mind of the prophet, and exciting him to proclaim what the Lord had dictated. In this sense we acknowledge as prophets, all the authors of the canonical books of Scripture, both of the Old and New Testament. God also communicated information to the prophets by dreams and visions. Joel, ii. 28, promises to the people of the Lord, that their young men should see visions, and their old men should have prophetic dreams. St. Peter, Acts x. 11, 12. fell into an ecstasy at noon-day, and had a revelation importing the call of the Gentiles. The Lord appeared to Abraham, to Job, to Moses in a cloud, and discovered his will to them. His voice was sometimes heard articulately. Thus he spoke to Moses in the burning bush, and on Mount Sinai, and to Samuel in the night. St. Austin, Præfat. in lib. xix. contra Faust. acknowledges three sorts of prophets; those of the Jews, those of the Gentiles, and those of the Christians. Those of the Jews are known: those of the Gentiles are their poets and sages; and those of the Christians are the apostolic men, of whom Jesus Christ has said; wherefore behold, I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes. Matt. xxiii. 34. See also Acts xiii. 1. Erant Antiochiæ Prophetæ et Doctores, &c.

We

We have in the Old Testament the writings of sixteen prophets; i. e. of four greater prophets, and twelve lesser prophets. The four greater prophets are ISAIAH, JEREMIAH, EZEKIEL, and DANIEL. The Jews do not properly place Daniel among the prophets, because (they say) he lived in the splendour of temporal dignities, and a kind of life different from other prophets. The twelve lesser prophets are, HOSEA, JOEL, AMOS, OBADIAH, MICAH, JONAH, NAHUM, HABAKKUK, ZEPHANIAH, HAGGAI, ZECHARIAH, and MALACHI.

CHRONOLOGICAL ORDER OF THE PROPHETS.

1. HOSEA, under Uzziah, king of Judah, who began to reign A. M. 3194; and under Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and under Jeroboam II. king of Israel, and his successors, to the destruction of Samaria, A. M. 3283.
2. AMOS, under Uzziah, A. M. 3219, and about six years before the death of Jeroboam II. king of Israel, A. M. 3220.
3. ISAIAH, at the death of Uzziah, and at the beginning of the reign of Jotham, king of Judah, A. M. 3246; to the reign of Manasseh, A. M. 3306.
4. JONAH, under the kings Joash and Jeroboam II. in the kingdom of Israel; about the same time as Hosea, Isaiah, and Amos. Jeroboam II. died A. M. 3220.
5. MICAH, under Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah. Jotham began to reign A. M. 3235, and Hezekiah died A. M. 3306. Micah was contemporary with Isaiah, but began later to prophesy.
6. NAHUM, under Hezekiah, and after the expedition of Sennacherib, i. e. after A. M. 3291.
7. JEREMIAH, in the thirteenth year of Josiah, king of Judah, A. M. 3375. Jeremiah continued to prophecy under Shallum, Jehoiakim, Jeconiah, and Zedekiah, to the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, A. M. 3416. It is thought he died two years afterwards in Egypt.
8. ZEPHANIAH at the beginning of the reign of Josiah, and before the twenty-eighth year of that prince, A. M. 3381; and even before the taking of Nineveh, A. M. 3378.
9. JOEL, under Josiah, about the same time as Jeremiah and Zephaniah.
10. DANIEL was taken into Chaldea, A. M. 3398, the fourth year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah. He prophesied at Babylon to the end of the captivity, A. M. 3468, and perhaps longer.
11. EZEKIEL was carried captive to Babylon with Jeconiah, king of Judah, A. M. 3405. He began to prophesy in A. M. 3409. He continued till toward the end of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, who died A. M. 3442.
12. HABAKKUK in Judea, at the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim, about A. M. 3394, and before the coming of Nebuchadnezzar in 3398.
13. OBADIAH in Judea, after the taking of Jerusalem, A. M. 3414, and before the desolation of Idumea, (as we believe) in 3410.
14. HAGGAI was brought to Jerusalem, A. M. 3414; he returned from the captivity in 3468, and prophesied the second year of Darius, son of Hystaspes, A. M. 3484.
15. ZECHARIAH, prophesied in Judea at the same time as Haggai, and seems to have continued after him.
16. MALACHI has no date to his prophecies.— If he were the same as Esdras, which is very probable, he may have prophesied under Nehemiah, who returned into Judea, A. M. 3550. Vide the Articles of these Prophets.

Beside these, there are many whose names appear in Scripture, but of whom we have no writings remaining.

The Prophetesses are, 1. MIRIAM, sister of Moses. 2. DEBORAH. 3. HANNAH, the mother of Samuel. 4. ABIGAIL. 5. HULDAH. 6. ESTHER. 7. The midwives of Egypt, who preserved the first-born of the Hebrews.

After Malachi no prophets were in Israel, as before; so that in the time of the Maccabees, 1 Macc. iv. 46. A. M. 3840, ante A. D. 164. when the altar of burnt-sacrifices was demolished, which had been prophaned by the Gentiles, the stones thereof were set aside, till a prophet should arise to declare what should be done with them.

The prophets, according to St. Austin, lib. xviii. de Civit. cap. 41. were the divines, the philosophers, the instructors, and the guides of the Hebrews in piety and virtue. They generally lived retired, in some country retreat, or in a sort of community, where they and their disciples were employed in study, prayer, and labour. Their habitations were plain and simple; these they themselves built, and cut down the wood. Yet they exercised no trade for gain, nor did they undertake any work that was too laborious, or inconsistent with the repose their employment required. Elisha quitted his plough, when Elijah called him to the prophetic office, 1 Kings xix. 20. Zechariah, xiii. 5. speaks of one who is no prophet, but a husbandman. Amos says, vii. 14.

vii. 14. he is no prophet, but a herdman, and a gatherer of sycamore-fruit.

Elijah was clothed with skins, and girded with a girdle of leather, 2 Kings i. 8. Isaiah wore sack-cloth, i. e. a coarse rough habit, of a dark brown colour, which was the ordinary clothing of the prophets. Zechariah says, xiii. 4. speaking of the false prophets who imitated externally the true prophets of the Lord, that "they should not wear a rough garment to deceive." In Rev. xi. 3. the two witnesses are clothed in sackcloth. Their poverty was conspicuous in their actions. They received presents of bread, fruits, and honey; or the first fruits of the earth; as being persons who possessed nothing themselves. The woman of Shunem, who entertained Elisha, put into the prophet's chamber no furniture but what was plain and necessary. 2 Kings iv. 10. The same prophet refuses the rich presents of Naaman, and drives away from his presence Gehazi who had received them. 2 Kings v. 26. Their frugality appears throughout their history. It is well known what is related of the wild gourds, (coliquintida) that one of the prophets caused to be boiled for the refreshment of his brethren, 2 Kings iv. 38, 40. The angel gave to Elijah only bread and water for a long journey. 1 Kings xix. 6. Obadiah, governor of Ahab's household, gave bread and water to the prophets whom he fed in the caves. 1 Kings xviii. 7.

The prophets were not observers of continency; Samuel had children, and Isaiah had [wives] a wife, called the prophetess, chap. viii. 3. Hosea, i. 2, &c. received orders to marry a concubine. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. XLI. But there were no women, or wives, in the societies of the prophets. Neither Elijah nor Elisha, had any that we hear of; and we see with what reserve the woman who entertained Elisha, spoke to him; and that by the interposition of Gehazi, 2 Kings iv. 27. The prophets were exposed to the railleries, the insults, the persecutions, the ill treatment both of kings and people, whose vices and irregularities they undertook to reprove. St. Paul acquaints us, that many of them died violent deaths, Heb. xi. 35, &c.

ADDITION.

[The term Prophet was of such general acceptance among the ancients, that we find much difficulty in extending our conceptions of it, and admitting an equally general application of it, in English. Instruction, explanation, correction, may be given in so many ways, and under so many circumstances, that merely to enumerate them would be tedious.

The prophet was an officer of the temple among the Greeks, whose business it was to interpret and put into writing the answer of the oracle. Comp. Valck. in Herod. p. 555. also Chishull, Mil. Ins. in An. As. In this sense he was the same as the Θεόπρονος, the vates, the predictor; he expounded the oracle; but he was not the oracle, himself, nor did he himself deliver it. Comp. ORACLE.

Among Walpole's Greek inscriptions, Travels in East, Vol. II. No. 44, commemorates "Quirinius Flavianus Phileas, who had received from his country, by lot, the office of Propheta and Critarcha, at the age of twenty-seven." It is evident, that an office conferred by lot is inconsistent with, not to say contrary to, Divine inspiration; since that, certainly, could never be supposed to follow the course of chances. It is thought that Phileas was not only Propheta, but by being Critarcha, was head of the Oneirocritics, or interpreters of dreams. No. 45, honours "Malia Rufeina, water-bearer of the Pythian Diana; her father Lucius Malius Saturninus, was expounder of the oracle, Προφήτης," but, at the time of this inscription, "Metrodorus was Propheta, and Eirenæus was crown-bearer."

From which we learn, that the office of prophet was sometimes borne singly, sometimes in conjunction with other offices of a religious nature. No. 46, refers to "Claudius Damas, who undertook the office of prophet a second time,"—consequently, it was in the first instance temporary, borne for a while, only, and perhaps, only for a certain occasion, or incident. No. 48, informs us, that "Moschio, the expounder of the oracle, Προφήτης, with the water-bearer Tryphosa, and all belonging to the oracle, also those who inhabit the sacred precincts, and those of the neighbouring territory, have honoured"—from which it appears, that the prophet being placed first in rank, was an officer of the first consideration: he takes the lead in conferring this honour.

We see now in what sense St. Paul might with great propriety employ the term prophet, when speaking of a heathen poet, especially if he had held any sacerdotal office; as some have thought Epimenides, whom the apostle quotes as a prophet of the Cretans, had done. Tit. i. 12. But if this be uncertain, the explanations of the will of the gods, the instructions given by that poet, will justify the use of the term. We know that poets assume the character without being called to the office of poet; and it should seem that sometimes the office of prophet was assumed, without regular appointment; so we read of "that woman Jezabel who calleth herself a prophetess," Rev. ii. 20. and the charge against her is, that she taught false doctrines ; she gave instructions, and interpretations of the Divine oracles and precepts, which interpretations were wholly illusory and false. She did not profess inspiration, but explanation.

A prophecy, then, is an instruction,—sometimes relating to time past, sometimes to time present, and sometimes to time future. When we read of king Lemuel, Prov. xxx. 1. the prophecy that his mother taught him," we can only take it in the sense of instruction. And when we read of a prophecy being fulfilled, it often imports no more than that an instruction given on a former occasion may with propriety be applied to a later incident. Sometimes, even, it seems to import no more than general expectation. So the apostle excites his son Timothy to justify the prophecies—anticipations, general expectations, which went before on him." 1 Tim. i. 18. Comp. Acts xvi. 2. May we say the same of Matt. ii. 15, 17, 23?—et al.?

If this idea of giving instruction in religious matters, sometimes distinct from Divine inspiration, though at other times combined with it, be taken for the import of the word prophet, we are prepared to admit the extensive application of it in S. S. especially in the New Testament. When we read Matt. vii. 12. "Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name,"—it seems extremely harsh to suppose that those who had been in any sense, or in any degree, under Divine inspiration, should receive the condemnatory answer, "I never knew you:" whereas, it may too truly be said of many who have given instruction in the name of Christ, that he never knew them. When the Jews of Jerusalem are described, Acts iii. 25. as "children of the prophets," the phrase may imply having been in the way for receiving correct instruction; as the nation of the Jews certainly was, "to whom were committed the oracles of truth."

We must take this idea with us into the regular offices of the Christian church. "There were in the church at Antioch, certain prophets and teachers," i. e. official instructors, Acts xiii. 1. "Judas and Silas being prophets, (official instructors,) exhorted the brethren," xv. 32. "Every man praying or prophesying having his head covered"—i. e. instructing in public, 1 Cor. xi. 4. And it is worthy of note, that this office of public instructor, or prophet, is usually placed immediately after that of apostle:—and greater dignity cannot be. "God hath set in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets,"—1 Cor. xii. 28. "Ye are built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets," i. e. the N. T. prophets. Eph. ii. 20. "Rejoice over her, ye holy apostes and prophets," i. e. the N. T. prophets, Rev. xviii. 20.

PROPHETS, prophecies, predictions, the effect of inspiration, need no additional illustration.

PROPHETESSES can now give us no trouble: The aged widow Anna, was a prophetess, Luke ii. 36. i. e. she passed her days in giving instruction; principally, no doubt, to females. "Every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered"—giving instruction to those of her own sex. (Comp. FRAGS. No. CLX.) Philip had four virgin daughters who did prophecy, Acts xx. 9. they taught young women the principles of religion; and this was part of the office of deaconesses for many ages, as appears, inter alia, from the following monumental inscription. PROSELYTE, Προσηλυτος, a stranger, a foreigner; Heb. גֵּר, a traveller, a stranger. One who comes from abroad, or from another place. In the language of the Jews those are called by this name, who come to dwell in their country, or who embrace their religion, being not Jews by birth. In the New Testament they are called sometimes proselytes, and sometimes Gentiles fearing God, or godly. Acts ii. 5. x. 2, 22. xiii. 16, 50.

The Hebrews distinguish two kinds of proselytes. The first, proselytes of the gate; the others, proselytes of justice. The first dwelt in the land of Israel, or even out of that country, and without obliging themselves to circumcision, or to any other ceremony of the law, feared and worshipped the true God, observing the Noachical rules. Of this number was Naaman the Syrian, Nebuzardan, general of Nebuchadnezzar's army, Cornelius the centurion, the eunuch of queen Candace, and some others mentioned in the Acts.

The Rabbins teach, that a proselyte of habitation, or of the gate, must promise under an oath, in the presence of three witnesses, to keep the seven precepts of the Noachidæ; i. e. according to them, that law of nature to which all the nations of the world are obliged; the observation of which might secure them salvation.—[See NOACHIDÆ.] The Jews say, that proselytes of the gate have ceased in Israel, ever since the observation of the jubilee has been left off, and the the tribes of Gad, of Reuben, and of Manasseh, on the other side Jordan, were led captive by Tiglath-pileaser. But these observations are not accurate; since we see many proselytes in the time of Jesus Christ, who reproaches the Pharisees with compassing sea and land to make a proselyte; and after this, making him a greater sinner than he was before. Matt. xxiii. 15. And St. Luke, Acts ii. 11. speaks of a great number of proselytes, and of those who feared God, at Jerusalem, when the Holy Ghost descended upon the apostles. I am apt to believe, that the greater part of these were proselytes of justice; but it cannot be denied that some of them might be proselytes of the gate.

The privileges of proselytes of the gate were, first, that by the observation of the rules of natural justice, and by avoiding idolatry, blasphemy, incest, adultery, and murder, they might through grace and piety, hope for eternal life. Secondly, they might dwell in the land of Israel, and share in the outward prosperities of it. It is said they did not dwell in the cities, but only in the suburbs and the villages. But it is certain, that the Jews often admitted into their cities, not only proselytes of habitation, but also Gentiles and idolaters, as appears by the reproaches on this account, throughout the Scriptures. In the time of Solomon there were in Israel 153,600 of these proselytes, whom that prince compelled to hew wood, to draw water, to cut stones, and to carry burthens for the building of the temple, 2 Chron. ii. 17, 18. These proselytes were Canaanites, who had continued in the country ever since Joshua's time. Moses forbade the Israelites to eat any animals that died of themselves, or were strangled, so that the blood remained in them; but allowed them to sell or give such animals to the strangers and proselytes. Dent. xiv. 21.

Proselytes of justice, are those converted to Judaism, who had engaged to receive circumcision, and to observe the whole law of Moses. Thus were they admitted to all the prerogatives of the people of the Lord, as well in this life as the other. The Rabbins inform us, that before circumcision was administered to them, and before they were admitted into the religion of the Hebrews, they were examined about the motives of their conversion; whether the change were voluntary, or whether it proceeded from interest, fear, ambition, &c. Maimonides assures us, that under the happy reigns of David and Solomon, they received no proselytes of justice, because there was reason to fear, that rather the prosperity of these princes, than any love to religion, made them converts to Judaism. The Talmudists say, that proselytes are, as it were, the canker and rust of Israel, and that very great caution must be taken not to admit them too easily. Vide Seld. de Syned. lib. ii. cap. 2. art. 5.

When the proselyte was well proved and instructed, they gave him circumcision; and when the wound of his circumcision was healed, they gave him baptism, by plunging his whole body into a cistern of water, by one immersion. Vide Seld. de Jure Nat. et Gent. lib. ii. cap. 2, 3.—This ceremony being a judicial act, was to be performed in the presence of three judges, and could not be done on a festival day. The proselyte also caused circumcision and baptism to be administered to his slaves, under thirteen years of age:—those of that age, or older, could not be compelled; but he must sell them, if they were obstinate in not embracing Judaism.—Female slaves, were only baptized, if they would become converts; if not, they were to be sold.—Baptism was never repeated, neither in the person of the proselyte, though he should afterwards apostatize, nor in that of his children, born to him after baptism, unless they were born from a pagan woman; in which case they were to be baptized as pagans, because they followed the condition of their mother.

Boys under twelve years of age, and girls under thirteen, could not become proselytes, till they had obtained the consent of their parents, or in case of refusal, it was in the concurrence of the officers of justice. For a while, only, and of girls, had the same effect occasion, or incident, respect of boys. Each of “Moschio, & of this, received (as it were) a new ἡγεῖα, so that those who were their parents before, were no longer regarded as such after this ceremony; and those who before were slaves, now became free. Children born before the conversion of their father had no right to inherit. If a proselyte died without having had children after his conversion, his estate belonged to the first occupier, and not to the public treasury. When proselytes became Jews, they received from heaven a new soul, and a new substantial form. This the rabbins teach concerning their proselytes of justice.

They require three things in a complete proselyte, baptism, circumcision, and sacrifice; but for women only baptism and sacrifice. Gemar. Babylon. ad tit. Jabimoth, cap. 4. Maimon. Halac-Isuribiah, cap. 13, 14. It is thought our Saviour alluded to the baptizing of proselytes, when he told Nicodemus, John iii. 5, 10. that for those who would obey his law, it was necessary they should be born again. “Except a man be born of water, . . . he cannot enter the kingdom kingdom of God." And when Nicodemus appeared surprised at this, our Saviour replies, "Art thou a master of Israel, and knowest not these things?" as though he would infer, that his language had nothing extraordinary in it, since the baptism of proselytes was practised every day in Israel. Moses, Deut. xxiii. excludes certain persons from the privileges of the people of Israel, or, as he there speaks, "from the congregation of the Lord;" some for ever, others only for a certain time. All eunuchs, in whatever manner they became so, are excluded for ever. Bastards, or illegitimate children, were not to be admitted till after the tenth generation: so also, Moabites and Ammonites; but Egyptians and Idumeans after the second generation. It was allowed these persons to be converted to the Lord, and to become proselytes, when they pleased. John Hircanus, prince of the Jews, compelled the Idumeans to be circumcised, and to embrace the law of Moses; and from this time, says Josephus, they were looked on as Jews. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 17.—In A. M. 3875, ante A. D. 129. Achior, prince of the Ammonites, Judith xiv. 6. became also a Jew, without any other preparation than that of being instructed in the belief and observances of this religion: therefore, the power of being converted was not taken away from these nations; but they were not admitted to offices, or employments, to dignities and other external prerogatives of the people of God, till after a certain time, and till they had given sufficient proofs of their perseverance in the true religion.

The Hebrews believe, that the populace of Egypt, which followed the Israelites, when they left that country. Exod. xii. 38. were all converts and proselytes of justice; also, that Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, had embraced Judaism. Exod. xviii. 10. The sons of Jacob admitted the Shechemites for proselytes, only requiring that they should receive circumcision. Gen xxxiv. 14, 15. Some Rabbins inform us, that in the time of Solomon they received the Gentiles to Judaism, by baptism only, because of the great number that then became converts. But others insist, as before observed, that then they would admit no proselytes in Israel. If he that presented himself to be admitted as a convert had already been circumcised, they contented themselves with just opening the scar left after circumcision, to draw a few drops of blood. As to the sacrifices that proselytes were to offer, I observe, that Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, offered burnt offerings to the Lord. Exod. xviii. 12. It is said, that anciently the proselyte offered for a burnt-offering a sacrifice of large cattle, or two turtles, or two young pigeons: but now, as for a long time, the Jews have neither temple nor altar, they do not oblige their proselytes to offer sacrifices.—Consult Selden, de Jure Naturali et Gentium, lib. ii. cap. 2, 6. and de Synedriis, lib. i. cap. 3, 4. and de Successione in Bona, cap. 26. also Basnage's History of the Jews, tom. v. lib. vii. cap. 8. and Leo of Modena, Ceremonies of the Jews, P. 5. c. 3. [PROPHECY. The following thoughts have appeared in another work; but as we presume to think the principle of them is just, we adduce them, as an instance of argument which may be useful on other occasions also: Comp. FRAGMENTS, Nos. CXLVII. CLI.

"—Certainly there is a Power which governs the world; which raises one family to the throne, and one nation to the supremacy; then, when this has answered the purposes for which it was exalted, transfers the sceptre of rule to a stranger, and produces from obscurity into reputation and splendour, another person, or another people; maintains THIS also, during its appointed time, and when that time is expired, suffers it gradually to decay; or directs a new ambition to wrest from its enfeebled hand, and its palsied head, the ensigns of royalty, and the tokens of dignity."

"Is it said, Kingdoms rise and fall by accident:—if no superior power interfered, would not their changes be just the same?" It is sufficient for us, without adverting to what might be, to answer, by what is; and this subject deserves attention. We have lately seen infidel writers criticise books they had not read—(or had read years ago,—and so criticise by memory;—or had read them so superficially, as scarcely amounts to a reading)—and then, retail unfounded observations and dogmatical remarks, on what they should (by way of answer) be intreated first to understand.

Now, we conclude, that if we find certain events predicted, long before they happened,—if they be so clearly described, that when completed, the description determinately applies to the subject;—if they be related by persons intirely unconcerned in the events, and expecting to be removed from the stage of life long before they take place, then we demonstrate that some Power superior to humanity has been pleased to impart so much of its designs, and counsels, as are referred to in such predictions. And where is the unfitness of this? May not a king, if he please, acquaint a person with his intention, that after such an one has been governor of a province for so many years, he designs to send such another, to be governor after him? Or, that after A has held such an office during his appointed time, B shall succeed him? If this be nothing startling, or uncommon, in human concerns, let us see how this simple idea applies to the Divine government of the world. One clear instance may justify this statement:

INSTANCE OF PROPHECY, COMPARED WITH HISTORY:

the chief incidents only being selected, and numbered.

Prophecy of Four Kingdoms represented by Four Beasts.

THE FIRST BEAST.

1. A lion,
2. having eagle's wings;
3. the wings were plucked,
4. it was raised from the ground,
5. and made to stand on the feet as a man,
6. And a man's heart was given to it.

DAN. chap. vii. 4.

THE SECOND BEAST.

1. A ram,
2. which had two horns,
3. both high,
4. but one higher than the other,
5. the highest came up last;
6. the ram pushed north, west, south.
7. did as he pleased, and became great.

THE THIRD BEAST.

1. A he goat
2. came from the west,
3. gliding swiftly over the earth;
4. ran unto the ram in the fury of his power,
5. smote him,
6. brake his two horns,
7. cast him on the ground,
8. stamped on him, and
9. waxed very great.
10. When he was strong his great horn was broken, and
11. instead of it came up four notable ones,
12. towards the four winds of heaven;
13. out of one of them a little horn waxed great
14. toward the south and east;
15. which took away the daily sacrifice, and cast down the sanctuary, &c.

DAN. chap. viii. 3—12.

These events are prefigured by different emblems, though to the same purpose, in other parts of this prophet; and it is probable they refer to the heraldic insignia of the nations and this instance we select from the prophet Daniel, because its coincidence with history is unquestionable; but, other subjects are capable of the same enumerative demonstration: I say demonstration;—for who by the power of mere human faculties, could foresee such contingencies?

Corresponding Events, in their Historical Order.

ASSYRIAN EMPIRE.

1. The Babylonian empire:
2. Nineveh, &c. added to it—but
3. Nineveh was almost destroyed at the fall of Sardanapalus,
4. yet this empire was again elevated to power,
5. and seemed to acquire stability under Nebuchadnezzar,
6. who laid the foundation of its subsequent policy and authority.

PERSIAN EMPIRE.

1. Darius or the Persian power,
2. composed of Media and Persia,
3. both considerable provinces,
4. Media the most powerful: yet this most powerful
5. Median empire under Dejoces, rose after the other;
6. and extended its conquests under Cyrus over Lydia, &c. west, over Asia north; over Babylon, &c. south; and
7. ruling over such extent of country, was a great empire.

GRECIAN EMPIRE.

1. Alexander, or the Greek power
2. came from Europe, (west of Asia.)
3. with unexampled rapidity of success
4. attacked Darius furiously, and
5. beat him—at the Granicus, Issus, &c.
6. conquered Persia, and Media, &c.
7. ruined the power of Darius:
8. insomuch that Darius was murdered, &c.
9. Alexander over-ran Bactriana, to India;
10. but died at Babylon, in the zenith of his fame and power;
11. his dominions were parcelled among Seleucus, Antigonus, Ptolemy, Cassander, (who had been his officers.)
12. in Babylon, Asia Minor, Egypt, Greece.
13. Antiochus the Great succeeded by Antiochus Epiphanes,
14. conquered Egypt, &c.
15. and endeavoured utterly to subvert the Jewish polity: polluting their temple, worship, and sacrifices, to the utmost of his power.

PROSEUCHE.

PROSEUCHE. Προσευχή, Oratio. prayer.
In Juvenal, Sat. 3. v. 296.

In quâ te quæro Proseucha,

it is taken for the place of prayer of the Jews, and pretty near the same as their synagogues.—But synagogues were generally in cities, and were covered places; whereas, for the most part, the Proseuches were out of the cities, on the banks of rivers, having no covering, except, perhaps, the shade of some trees, or covered galleries. In Acts xvi. 12, mention is made of the Proseuche of Philippi in Macedonia, which was out of the city. Maimonides says, that the Proseuches ought to be built in such manner, that those who enter them, may turn their faces toward the temple of Jerusalem; respect being had to the situation of the place and of the city where they are. Maccabees, lib. iii. cap. ult. says, that the Jews of Egypt, being delivered from danger, built a Proseuche near the city of Alexandria. Epiphanius says, Hæres. 80. that at two miles from Shechem was a Proseuche of the Samaritans, situate in a plain, built in form of a theatre, and without a roof; in which, (says Epiphanius) as well as in every thing else, they copy the Jews. However, we must allow, that often Josephus and Philo confound the Proseuches with the synagogues, and that they place them in the cities. See SYNAGOGUE.

PROVERBS. מִשְׁלֵי, Mishle. Gr. Παραβολαί, Parabolæ. The Hebrews give the name of proverbs, parables, or similitudes, to moral sentences, maxims, comparisons, or enigmas, expressed in a poetical, figurative, close, and sententious style. Solomon says, that in his time, maxims of this sort, were the chief study of the learned: "A wise man will endeavour (says he) to understand a proverb, and the interpretation; the words of the wise, and their dark sayings," Prov. i. 6. And Jesus, son of Sirach says, Eccles. xxxix. 1, 2, 3. "He will keep the sayings of the renowned men, and where subtil parables are, he will be there also: he will seek out the secrets of grave sentences, and be conversant in dark parables." The queen of Sheba came to see Solomon, to prove him, and to propose dark riddles to him; 1 Kings xi. 1. Hiram, king of Tyre (they say) kept a correspondence, by letters, with Solomon, and also proposed enigmatical questions to him, and explained those that were proposed to him by Solomon. Menander, et Dius, apud Joseph. Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 2. The ancient sages of Greece greatly esteemed this kind of exercise. Cleobulus, composed no less than three thousand songs and mysterious sayings; and Cleobulina his daughter wrote enigmatical verses. Diogen. Laert. in Cleobul.

The PROVERBS of Solomon, are, without doubt, the most valuable part of his works: he says they were fruits of his most profound meditations, and of his most excellent wisdom: Eccles. xii. 9. In this book we find rules for the conduct of all conditions of life; for kings, courtiers, men of the world; for masters, servants, fathers, mothers, children. Some have doubted whether Solomon alone were the author of this book: Grotius thinks this prince had a compilation made, for his own use, of whatever was extant, excellent in point of morality, from all the ancient writers of his own nation; that under Hezekiah this collection was enlarged, by adding what of this nature had been written since Solomon; Eliakim, Shebna, and Joah (says he) completed this collection, 2 Kings xviii. 18. But these conjectures are not supported by proof. The fathers and interpreters ascribe this whole book to Solomon.

True it is, we may herein observe some differences of style and method: the first nine chapters, entitled The Proverbs of Solomon, are written as a continued discourse, and may be considered as a preface. In chap. x. where we see the same title again, the style changes to short sentences, which have little connection with each other, and which, generally, contain a kind of antithesis. In chap. xxii. verse 17, we find a new style, approaching nearer to that of the first nine chapters, to chap. xxiv. verse 23. where is a new title, מִשְׁלֵי חֲכָמִים, To the wise; or, Farther sayings of the wise. Their style is short and sententious. Chap. xxv. we read, "These are also Proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah, king of Judah copied out." And, doubtless, it was on this authority Grotius advanced, that this collection was made by Eliakim, Shebna, and Joah, famous men under the reign of Hezekiah. Chap. xxx. 1. we read, "The words of Agur, the son of Jakeh." Lastly, the title of chap. xxxi. is, "The words of king Lemuel."

From all which, it seems certain, that the book of Proverbs, is a collection of Proverbs of Solomon, compiled by several hands: but, we cannot conclude from thence, that it is not the work of Solomon, who being inspired by Divine Wisdom, composed no less than three thousand proverbs, 1 Kings iv. 32. Several persons might make collections of them; Hezekiah among others, as mentioned chap. xxv. Agur, Isaiah, Esdras might do the same. From these collections was composed the work which we now have. Nothing is more reasonable than this supposition. It is no-where said, that Solomon himself had made a collection of proverbs and sentences. The title, Solomon's Proverbs, rather shews the author, than the compiler.—The Rabbins generally maintain, that king Hezekiah, observing the abuse the people made of several works of Solomon, chiefly those which contained the virtues of plants, and secrets of natural philosophy, he suppressed several of these works, and only preserved those that are handed down to us. Vid. Zemach David, et Seder Olam Rabba, cap 15. [Vide SYBIL.]

No doubt is made of the canonicalness of The Book of Proverbs. The Greek version of this book is often very different from the Hebrew, and adds many verses not in the original. The Roman edition of the Greek transposes whole chapters. After chap. xxiv. ver. 22, it inserts the first fourteen verses of chap. xxx.—then it returns to ver. 23. and the rest of chap. xxiv.—after which it puts ver. 15, and the rest of chap. xxx.—then chap. xxxi. and, lastly, chap. xxv. and those that follow, as far as chap. xxix. After which, is chap. xxxi. ver. 10. and the rest, which conclude the book. Lesser transpositions may be seen in the body of the book. It is not known from whence these irregularities have proceeded. In the ancient Latin editions we find several verses added, which have been left out from the time of Jerom: yet there still remain some.

PROVIDENCE. It is a tenet of the Christian and Jewish religion, that God disposes and governs all things by his Providence; that this Providence is eternal and infinite; that it extends over every thing, to the hairs of our heads, to the most minute animals, to herbs of the field. The atheists, whose sentiments are combated by Solomon, in his book of Ecclesiastes; and the Sadducees, who arose afterwards, denied this Providence; they maintained, that men are the only causes of their own happiness or misfortune, according to their good or ill use of their liberty.

But these notions are rejected by the generality of the Jews; though they do not agree among themselves, in explaining the effects of Providence. Maimonides seems to think, that Providence does not act in the moving of a leaf, or in the production of a worm; but that whatever relates to the production of animals, or things of less importance, is by chance.

Moreover, the generality of the Jews hold, that mankind enjoy a perfect liberty as to good or evil; and that whatever happens to a man, is in recompence for his good actions, or punishment for his bad ones.

“Say not before the angel, There is no

Providence; lest God should be provoked against you, and destroy all the works of your hands.” Thus speaks the book of Ecclesiastes, v. 6. Take care how you deny in secret the being of Providence; your angel will be a witness of your most secret thoughts, and God will punish you. The Hebrew expresses this; “Say not, before the angel, it is a fault of ignorance;” why should you expose yourself to the anger of the Lord by your words, and lose all the labour of your hands? Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CLIII.

PROVIDEO. This word, which commonly signifies to provide,—Deus providebit sibi vic-timam, Gen. xxii. 8. is also used for, to foresee, to seek, to prepare; Gen. xli. 33. Provideat Rex virum sapientem. Elsewhere it is taken for, to be attentive, to consider; Psalm xvi. 8. Providebam Dominum in conspectu meo semper; I had God always before my eyes. Elsewhere it is put for, to take care, to labour. Rom. xii. 17. We endeavour to do good, not only before God, but also before men; 2 Cor. viii. 21. Providemus bona, non solum coram Deo, sed etiam coram hominibus. Lastly, Provideo is sometimes put for, to foresee, and to foretell; Gal. iii. 8. Providens autem spiritus sanctus: and Acts ii. 31. David providens locutus est de resurrectione Christi.

PSALMS, in Hebrew סֵפֶר תְּהִלִּים, Sepher Tehillim, The Book of Hymns; Ψάλλμοι, hymns, Divine songs; from Ψάλλω. Βίβλος Ψαλμων, Luke xx. 42.

In the Gospel it is named, The Book of Psalms, The Prophet, or David, from the name of its principal author. This book is justly esteemed as a kind of abridgment of the whole Scripture, says St. Austin. It is a general library, wherein we may meet with whatever is requisite for salvation, says Cassiodorus. The sacred history instructs us, says St. Ambrose, the prophecies declare future events, the reproofs restrain the wicked, the precepts persuade them, but the Psalms produce all these effects. Agreeableness and usefulness are herein so happily blended, that it is not easy to decide which is most prevalent. Hence proceeds that great veneration always paid to the Psalms. It was almost become a general rule, that bishops, priests, and all religious persons, were to have the Psalter by heart: the church has made it a principal part of her service, and has obliged her ministers to rehearse some portion of it every day.

The Hebrews commonly divide the Psalter into five books; and several of the fathers admit of this division, and think it very ancient.—

Nymen,

Nyssen, tract. 1. in Psal. c. 5. Epiphanius, lib. de Mensur. cap. 5. Euseb. in Psal. Ambros. et Author. Comment. in Psalm. sub nomine Hier. Eusebius says, it may be observed in the Hebrew original, and in the best editions of the Septuagint. St. Ambrose expressly refutes those who rejected this division, and who thought it contrary to the New Testament, which quotes the psalter as a single book. This last reason induced Hilary, Jerom, and Austin, to give up this division of the psalter into five books, as contrary to Scripture. Modern commentators are not more unanimous than the ancients: some think the psalter was distributed into five books by the authors who collected the Psalms; others will have this to be much more modern; and even since the time of the apostles. This dispute is of no great consequence.

But what persuades us that this distribution is very ancient, and even from the time of the first collecting the Psalms, is, that at the end of each book we read the same conclusion, which seems to have been put there by Esdras, or by those who had the care of collecting the sacred books after the captivity of Babylon. Vid. Muis, ad Psal. xl. This is certain, that both Jews and Christians have reckoned the collection of Psalms as one book, in their enumeration of the books of Holy Scripture. The first book of the psalter, according to the Hebrews, ends at our fortieth Psalms. The second at the seventy-first. The third at the eighty-eighth. The fourth at the hundred and fifth. The fifth at the hundred and fiftieth. The first four books conclude with these words, Amen, Amen. The fifth with Hallelujah.

The number of canonical Psalms has always been fixed at one hundred and fifty; for the hundred and fifty-first, (in the Greek) has never been received as canonical. But though the number of the whole has been agreed on, yet there is a variety in their distribution. The Jews make two of the ninth, and begin their tenth, at these words of Psalms ix. 22. "Why standest thou afar off, O Lord?" so that from this place to Psalms cxiii. their citations and numbers are different from the Latin and Greek. The protestant churches, and the English version, following this division of the Hebrews, quote the Psalms in like manner.

At Psalms cxiii. "When Israel went out of Egypt," they recede still farther from the Latin, dividing this Psalms into two, and beginning the cxiv. at these words, "Not unto us O Lord." So that Psalms cxiv. according to the Greeks and Latins, is their cxvi. But afterwards they come nearer again, by uniting Psalms cxiv. and cxv. so that they differ but one as far as the cxlvi. And then uniting again Psalms cxlvi. and cxlvii. they coincide, and continue to reckon with the Vulgate to the end of the Psalter.

There is also some difference among the ancient Greek and Latin copies, about the division of the first and second Psalms; some making but one of both, others dividing them into two; as we do, at this day. It is true in general, that the division of the Psalter is not of that antiquity as might be imagined, and that sometimes a reader is obliged, in order to pursue the sense of a Psalms, to connect one with another, or to separate them, as the matter requires. St. Hilary, Prolog. in Psalm vi. et in Psalm ii. affirms, that in his time the distribution of the Psalms was not settled among the Hebrews; —that some divided them in one manner, and some in another. Origen makes the same observation, in Psalms ii. Edit. Hexapl. t. i. p. 475. He says, that in the Hebrew the Psalms are marked by 1, 2, 3, &c. and in the time of Kimchi, i. e. in the twelfth century, the matter was yet undetermined. Vide Genebrard, in Psalm ix. 23. seu Psal. x. in Hebr. et Kimchi, ibidem. —Often several Psalms have been made of what ought to have been but one, by the intention of the author.

It is a tradition among the Hebrews and Christians, that Esdras is, if not the only, yet the principal collector of the book of Psalms. Eusebius, St. Hilary, Theodoret, the author of the Synopsis printed under the name of St. Athanasius, venerable Bede, and several others impute this honour to him. Philaster says, Hæres. 77. that wise men of the Jewish nation having collected them together, ranged them in the order they had received from their ancestors, who had preserved them from the hands of their enemies. Even before the captivity there was a collection of the Psalms of David, since Hezekiah, when he restored the worship of the Lord in the temple, caused the Psalms of David to be sung there, 2 Chron. xxix. 25, 26, &c. In the library that Nehemiah erected at Jerusalem, he caused the Psalms of David to be deposited, 2 Macc. ii. 13.

Speculative men have exercised themselves very much on the order and disposition of the Psalms. They have discovered mystery and design, some in one manner and some in another. Some have thought they could observe a succession of the events of the life of David. Hilary, Prolog. in Psalm, Ambrose, Apolog. David. cap. 8. Origen, in Epist. ad Rom. lib. iii. cap. 3. Others the order of the solemnities celebrated in the temple, Euthym. Prolog. in Psalm. St. Chrysostom observes on Psalms li. that generally speaking, the first Psalms are on subjects subjects of sorrow, and the latter on more joyful and comfortable subjects. St. Austin, on Psalms cl. acknowledges, that he could not discover the mystery of the disposition of the Psalms; but that it seems to him, that every fiftieth has relation to the vocation, the justification, and the glorification of the saints; since the fiftieth relates to repentance, the hundredth to mercy, and the hundred and fiftieth to the praise of God in his saints. But Jerom, on Jer. xxv. initio. observes, that it is impertinent to expect in the Psalter a chronological series of Canticles, which have relation to certain events of history, since it is not the custom of authors of lyrics to observe such order; and indeed, a very little examination of the text and spirit of the Psalms may convince us, that those who undertook this collection had simply in view to preserve these holy Canticles as they found them, with a religious and exact scrupulosity, without either retrenching what had been already repeated, or supplying what might seem deficient, or connecting what had been separated, or separating what had been improperly joined.

The authority and canonicalness of the book of Psalms have always been acknowledged by both Jews and Christians. Philastrius says, that the Nicolaites, the Gnostics, and the Manichees denied that David was a prophet, or that his works were effects of inspiration. But the sentiment of the Christian church has always been, that all the hundred and fifty Psalms contained in the Psalter were productions written under the influence of the Holy Ghost.

One thing, however, creates a difficulty with many persons of piety; that in the Psalms we sometimes find imprecations against the wicked, and the enemies of the prophet. But the fathers and interpreters commonly explain these passages, as predictions of their calamities; as if it were said, that they should certainly perish, if they continued in their disorderly courses; or let them perish, if they will not be converted. St. Chrysostom, on Psalms cxxxvi. 11. says, that in these passages the Psalmist does not so much deliver his own sentiments, as those of others. St. Athanasius, argumento ad Psalm. lxxii. maintains, that he makes these curses and imprecations, not against his visible enemies, but against his invisible enemies.

Nothing can be a greater argument of the obscurity of the book of Psalms, than the vast number of commentaries intended to explain them. Bocchius and Draudius have reckoned up above five hundred. Father le Long, Bibliotheca Sacra, tom. 2. has enumerated six hundred and thirty, without reckoning those on Scripture in general, or those on a part of the Psalms only; so that if we would comprehend all, it may be affirmed, that above a thousand writers have undertaken to illustrate the Psalms.

The difficulty of succeeding in the explication of these divine Canticles proceeds from several sources. (1) The obscurity of the Hebrew text. (2) The nature of the style; which is very sublime, and at the same time very different from our manner. (3) The abstruseness of the matter. The Hebrew of the Psalms is more obscure than that of most other books of Scripture, as generally the style of poetry is more difficult than that of prose. Besides, transcribers having understood it less, with the frequent transcripts of this book, have occasioned many faults herein.

Having admitted the authority of the book of Psalms, and acknowledged the inspiration of their authors, all are not agreed whether we owe them to one author or to many, or who he was (or they were) who composed them. Some assert they all belong to David; which others deny. St. Chrysostom, in Psal. l. St. Ambrose, præfat. in Psalm. i. St. Austin, lib. xvii. cap. 14. de Civit. Theodoret, præf. in Psalm. Cassiodorus, prolog. in Psalm. Euthymius, præf. in Psalm. Philastrius, Hæres. 79. and many moderns maintain, that David was the author of them all. St. Hilary, prolog. in Psalm. the author of the Synopsis ascribed to Athanasius, and several others, conclude the contrary.

Those who think David to have written the whole Psalter, rely on these reasons.

1. In Scripture this holy king is described by his character of Psalmist of Israel. 2 Sam. xxiii. 1, 2. "The sweet Psalmist of Israel said, The Spirit of the Lord spake by me," &c.

2. In all the ceremonies wherein mention is made of singers, or of Psalms, generally the Psalms of David are intended. Thus at the dedication of the temple of Solomon, the Levites rehearsed the Canticles that David had composed. 1 Chron. xxiii. 5. When Hezekiah was about to restore the temple worship, he commanded the Levites to praise the Lord "with the words of David and of Asaph the seer." 2 Chron. xxix. 30. Asaph was principal musician in David's time, to whom that prince sent his Canticles, to be set to music, and to be sung by the choir over which he presided. At the dedication of the second temple, after the return from the captivity, they sung the praises of the Lord in the Canticles that David had composed. Ezra iii. 10. Nehemiah placed the Psalms of David in the library he founded at Jerusalem. Nehem. xii. 35, 39. 2 Macc. ii. 13. Jesus, son of Sirach, commends the zeal of of David, for having composed hymns to be sung before the Lord. Ecclus. xlvii. 10. In the New Testament, our Saviour and his apostles always quote the Psalms by the name of David; and use them as his; the Jews never contradicted them in this, though in every thing else they were ready enough to oppose them, and very glad to find objections. Nor do they only quote under his name such as bear the title of David, but they cite others also under his name, which have no particular title; as the second Psalms quoted by Peter, Acts iv. 25.

3. The ancient, uniform, and constant use of the church, which gives to the Psalter the name of the Psalms of David, is another proof of the persuasion propagated from the very beginning, that this holy king and prophet was the author of these divine Canticles. Usus Ecclesiæ catholicæ spiritus sancti inspiratione, generaliter et immobiliter tenet, ut quicumque eorum Psalmorum cantandus fuerit, Lector aliud prædicare non audeat, nisi Psalmos David, says Cassiodorus. Philastrius has carried this matter so far, that he places those among heretics, who denied that David was the author of all the Psalms.—Perez in his commentary on the Psalms asserts, that Josephus the historian, Jonathan the paraphrast, and all the ancient Jews were persuaded, that David composed the whole Psalter; but that the Rabbins relinquished this opinion, when they found themselves pressed hard by Origen, by passages quoted from this very book. But what could the Rabbins gain by denying David to have been the author of the Psalms, since they acknowledged them all to be inspired, and the work of prophets? In what remains of Origen, we cannot distinctly see his opinion on this question; but Genebrard assures us, that the Talmudists and Rabbins commonly teach, that all the Psalms are not to be ascribed to David.

The contrary opinion has been supported with good arguments, and the number of those who contend, that David had associates in this honour, is not inferior to those of the former opinion. St. Hilary says expressly, that the Psalms have for their authors the persons whose names they bear in their titles. Absurdum est Psalmos David dicere vel nominare, cum ibi Auctores eorum ipsis inscriptionum titulis commendantur, says Hilary, Præfat. in Psalmos, et Comment. Psal. cxxxi. Jerom in his letter to Sophronius, which is a preface to the Psalter, says the same; and elsewhere he thinks it an error to affirm, that all are Psalms of David. We read in a note on the title of the first Psalms, in the commentary of St. Austin on the Psalter, that all the Psalms are not David's. But the learned think, this annotation does not belong to him, and that his true sentiments are to be found in The city of God, (lib. xvii. cap. 14.) where he evidently declares himself on the side of David, saying; Mihi credibilis videntur existimare, qui omnes illos centum et quinquaginta Psalmos ejus operi tribuunt.

The Greek fathers are not less inclined to the opinion, that several authors were concerned in composing the Psalms. Athanasius disapproves the contrary notion. He reckons up but seventy-two Psalms that belong to David; and thinks those without titles should be ascribed to the author of the Psalms foregoing. In his Synopsis (if it be his) he says there are Psalms of Jeduthum, of Asaph, of the sons of Korah, of Haggai, of Zechariah, and of Heman; that some belong to all these authors in conjunction, as those that have in the title Hallelujah: that the name of the Psalms of David was given to the Psalter, because he was the first author of this kind of works, he regulated the order, the seasons, and the functions of other writers, whose names are at the head of some of the Psalms.—Eusebius of Cæsarea ascribes to David only seventy-two Psalms; he thinks the others belong to those whose names they bear: Præfat. in Psalmos, p. 7, 8. et in Inscript. Psal. p. 2. et in Psal. xli. lx. lxii. The sons of Korah composed eleven, Asaph twelve, Solomon two, Moses one, Ethan the Ezrahite one. He describes David as in the midst of a band of inspired musicians, singing alternately as the Holy Ghost inspired them, while all the rest, and even David himself, continued in silence, contenting themselves to answer in the chorus, Hallelujah.

To these authorities may be added an infinite number of modern authors, as the Rabbins, and many Christian commentators of all communions, the greater part of which acknowledge, that the Psalter contains many Canticles written since David's time, and bearing internal marks of their later origin; as when they speak of the captivity of Babylon, which happened long after David. True it is, that the titles of the Psalms are ancient; but many of them have other names beside that of David. We may conclude from hence, at least, that at that time they were thought not to belong to David. And this argument will have its weight with them who contend, that the titles of the Psalms are inspired.

The TITLES of the Psalms, are a matter about which interpreters have much exercised their sagacity, and in which we have very little light or certainty. Some have a profound respect for these titles, and accept them as part of these divine Canticles. Others think they were added afterwards, and are of small consideration. Some imagine these titles to be, as it were, a key to to the Psalm, and that whoever understands them well, might easily penetrate the intention of the author. Others believe them of little importance for understanding the text, as having been added in after-times, and often without sufficient authority. It is said again by others, that even allowing these inscriptions might have been useful for the right understanding of the Psalms, yet we can derive but little use from them now; the greater part being so obscure, that the most learned interpreters dare not flatter themselves with a complete knowledge of them. Parum est damni in hujus vocis (haggittith) ignoratione, cum illa, ut et alia similes, quae passim occurrunt in titulis Psalmorum, ad argumentum et materiam carminis, nihil prorsus pertinent, says De Muis, in Psalm viii. 1. one of the most learned commentators on the Psalms.

The Fathers are generally agreed as to the obscurity of these titles, but they have a different opinion of their usefulness. Origen delivers a notion that he had received from a Jew, about the obscurity of the Scriptures in general, which is very apposite to the book of Psalms. Scripture, said he, is like a vast and magnificent building, wherein are many apartments and chambers, each of which has its proper key: but the key that is found at every door is not that which belongs to it. Often it is misplaced, and the business is to find it, and to distinguish it from many others. St. Austin says, in Psalm 139, the title declares the subject of the Psalm. The title of the Psalm and the Psalm itself, are two things that ought not to be separated, says St. Hilary; they mutually support and assist each other, in Psalm cxix. Prolog. The title is the key of the Psalm, says the author of the commentary on the Psalms, printed under the name of St. Jerom. As one cannot enter into the house without the key, so the Canticle cannot be understood except the title be explained.

St. Austin in Psalm lxiv. goes farther, for he considers these titles as inspired. On Psalm lxiv. whose title is A Song of Jeremiah and of Ezekiel, &c. he says, we are here to acknowledge the voice of holy inspiration. And speaking of the title of the fifty-first Psalm, which is, A Psalm of David, when Nathan the prophet came unto him, after he had gone in unto Bathsheba, he says, "This is not to be found in the body of the Psalm, but it is read at length in the books of the Kings: But both of these are divine Scripture." Theodoret is still more express, for he says, that these titles were added by Ezra, under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost; and that they were read and preserved by the Seventy, who themselves had received inspiration, and would not be ~~forwards~~ mingle the notions of men with the words of the Holy Ghost. The Jews, in their synagogues, chant the titles of the Psalms, as well as the rest of Scripture, and the Rabbins expound them in their commentaries. The LXX. and Jerom have preserved them in their translations, and in the sacred texts. The greater part both of ancients and moderns have considered them as a key to the Psalms. Without them how should we distinguish the authors of each Psalm?—Bossuet says positively, that they were placed at the head of the Psalms by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, to denote the author and subject of each; and that we ought not to separate the inscriptions of the Psalms from the body of the Scripture, since they are read in a continued order, and without distinction, not only in the Hebrew text, but in all the versions. For the same opinion, Vide Du Pin's Preface to the Psalms.

But I think it is carrying the matter too far, to maintain that all the titles of the Psalms are canonical and inspired. Many Catholic divines have positively asserted, that the greater part are of no use in explaining the Psalm. The fathers, and among others, Austin, Hilary, Theodoret, Cassiodorus, have acknowledged, that many of these titles have no relation to the body of the Psalm, and contribute nothing to the sense. The Catholic church has never made any injunction that they should be sung in her offices nor determined them to be canonical.—The Septuagint, and other late Greek translators, have added titles to certain Psalms which have none in the Hebrew. If the titles of the Psalms had been esteemed canonical, would it have been permitted to meddle with them, to alter them, to suppress them, or add to them? Which of the commentators, Jew, catholic, or protestant, thinks it incumbent on him to follow the title of the Psalm in his commentary? And yet both Jews and Christians receive the Psalms as Holy Writ.

Therefore, in this question we should observe a due medium. 1. To treat the titles of the Psalms with much respect, because, doubtless, a great number of them are authentic. 2. To acknowledge such as are derived from the first authors, from the ancient prophets, or from Ezra, as canonical. 3. Those added, either before or after Ezra, by Jews not inspired, or by the Greeks: also, those that are apparently contrary to history, or to the spirit of the Psalm, deserve no particular consideration. 4. The fathers themselves, who seem to have thought them canonical and inspired, must be understood to speak of those in the original text, authorized by Ezra, or by the ancient prophets; for for as to the rest, they make no difficulty to give them up; as appears in Theodoret, on several occasions.

According to the titles of the Psalms, in our Bibles, seventy-two bear the name of David; fifty are without the name of their author; but the Rabbins hold, that they are to be referred to that author, whose name is immediately before: And this tradition of the Jews is related and received by Origen, Jerom, Eusebius, Hilary, and Athanasius.

Psalms inscribed to the sons of Korah, are xlii, xliii, xliv, xlv, xlvi, xlvii, xlviii, xlix; also lxxxiv, lxxxv, lxxxvi, lxxxvii, lxxxviii.

Inscribed to Solomon, the lxxii, and cxxvii.

Imputed to Ethan, the lxxxix.

To Jeduthun, the lxxvii.

To Moses, the xc.

To Asaph, the l, lxxiii, lxxiv, lxxv, lxxvi, lxxvii, lxxviii, lxxix, lxxx, lxxxi, lxxxii, lxxxiii.

Ascribed to Adam, the xci.

To Melchisedec, the cix.

To Jeremiah and Ezekiel, the lxiv.

To Jeremiah, the cxxxvi. Which is also ascribed to David.

To Haggai and Zechariah, the cxi, and cxlv.

Besides the hundred and fifty Psalms received as canonical, there is one which is not in the canon, neither in the Hebrew, the Chaldee, nor the Vulgate; but is read in the Syriac, in most of the Greek copies, in the Arabic, in the Anglo-Saxon version, in the books of prayers of the Greeks. Athanasius, Euthymius, Vigilius of Thapsus, the author that interpolated the epistles of Ignatius, mention it, and quote it. Athan. Serm. ad Marcel. tom. 1. in Synopsi, tom. 2. Euthym. in Psalm. Vigil. Thaps. lib. 1. Ep. Ignat. ad Mariam. Castobel. cap. 4. Chrysostom alludes to it, in his seventeenth homily to the people of Antioch. Its title is, A Psalm of Thanksgiving of David, when he had overcome Goliath. It begins thus: "I was the least of my brethren, and the youngest of the house of my father, and I fed my father's sheep," &c. [It seems to be made up of patches from various others, and different places of Scripture.]

PSALMS OF SOLOMON; or Psalter of Solomon. See SOLOMON.

PSALMS OF DEGREES. This name is given to fifteen Psalms, from the cxx. to the cxxxiv. Hebr. שִׁיר הַמַּעֲלוֹת, A song of Ascents: The Chaldee, A song that was sung upon the steps of the abyss. This explication relies on a tradition of the Hebrews, which relates, That when they were laying the foundations of the temple, at the return from the Babylonish captivity, there came out of the earth a prodigious quantity of water, to the height of fifteen cubits; and would have drowned the whole world, if Achitophel, the famous Achitophel who hanged himself in the time of David, about five hundred years before, had not stopt its progress, by writing the ineffable name of Jehovah on the fifteen steps of the temple!! To the same event they refer Psalm cxxx. which is one of the Psalms of Degrees. Junius and Tremellius translate, A song of Excellencies; or, An excellent song: which translation is not disapproved by De Muis, and other skilful interpreters. But the common translation, Psalms of Degrees, has more generally obtained.

But whence have they this denomination? Interpreters think, because they were sung on the fifteen steps of the temple; yet, they are not agreed where these steps were. Some think they were without this holy place; others, at its entry. Others think them to be the fifteen steps mentioned by Josephus, de Bello, lib. i. cap. 14. in Græco, p. 197. to ascend from the inclosure of the women, in the great court. Lastly; others think they were the steps which ascended from the court of the priests, to the porch before the holy place. But it cannot be proved, from Josephus, or from Scripture, that the steps of the porch, or of the gates of the temple, or those without the temple, were just fifteen in number. We see by Ezekiel xl. 22, 26, 31, 37, 49, that one had eight, and the other had seven steps. [eight and seven make fifteen.] Besides, we do not find, by any passage of Scripture, that the Levites sung upon the steps of the temple; their place was around the altar of burnt offerings, in the court of the priests.

Some have thought, that these were called Psalms of Degrees, because they were sung in a gallery, which was in the court of Israel, where, sometimes, the Levites read the law. Neh. ix. 4. But we do not find, by any passage of Scripture, that singers were placed there, or that they sang these Psalms in particular. The author of the commentary on the Psalms, printed under the name of Jerom, says, in Psal. cxx. that in the temple there were several degrees of dignity among the priests and the Levites. This is true: But it is not said, that these degrees were fifteen. There were assuredly four and twenty sacerdotal families, and as many of the Levites. But what reference has this to the fifteen Psalms of Degrees? Some Rabbins, and a good number of commentators, translate the Hebrew by Psalms of Elevation; because (they say) they were sung with an exalted voice, or because at every Psalm the voice was raised.

I shall now produce my own hypothesis: I translate A Song of Ascent, i. e. of Israel from the captivity of Babylon. Scripture commonly applies the phrase, to ascend, to express this return. Cyrus, in his proclamation, Ezra i. 3, 5. ii. 2. vii. 5, 6. says, "Who is among you, of all his people? His God be with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem." And a good number of persons presented themselves to go up, says Ezra i. 11. ii. 1. And Shesh-bazzar brought up with them of the captivity, that were brought up from Babylon to Jerusalem.—Now these are the children of the province, that went up out of the captivity." Ezra vii. 6, 7, 9. "This Ezra went up from Babylon. And there went up some of the children of Israel. For on the first day of the first month was the beginning of the going up from Babylon." In Psalm cxxii. which is one of the Psalms of Degrees, it is said, "whither the tribes go up (to Jerusalem). Lastly; Jeremiah, xxvii. 22. foretelling the return from the captivity, says, "Then will I bring them up, and restore them to this place." Ezekiel xxxix. 2. expresses himself in the same manner.

These expressions shew, that the Hebrews used the term to go up, when they spoke of their journeying from Babylon to Jerusalem; therefore, it is very natural to call those Psalms of Ascent, which were composed on occasion of their deliverance from the captivity of Babylon; whether to implore this deliverance from God, or to return thanks for it after it had taken place; and this is what is really observed in these Psalms. They have all some relation to this great event. They mention it in several places; and the greater part of them cannot be otherwise explained. [Is it unlikely that the tribes which came up, in companies, to Jerusalem to worship, several times in a year, should repeat these Psalms (or others) at their resting stations, in the way thither?]

ACROSTIC PSALMS. These in the Hebrew, begin each verse, or half verse, with a letter of the alphabet, ranged in alphabetical order.—Psalms xxv, xxxiv, xxxvii, cxi, cxii, cxix, cxlv.

PTOLEMAIS, Πτολεμαῖς, warlike; from πτόλεμος, war. Acts xxi. 7.

I. PTOLEMAIS, a city of Phœnicia, on the Mediterranean sea, having mount Carmel south; being a considerable port. Its ancient Hebrew name is Accho. Judges i. 31. The river Belus or Beles, falls into the Mediterranean near Ptolemais. See BELUS. I have not found who the Ptolemy was, that gave name to this city. It was a Roman colony in the reign of Claudius; as is proved by several ancient medals. The Christians in the holy war, gave it the name of Akre, or of St. John of Acre. Reland. Palest. lib. iii. The Arabians call it Acca. This city was assigned by Joshua to the tribe of Ashur, who did not drive out the inhabitants. Judg. i. 31. Ummah, an unknown city, mentioned Joshua xix. 30. might be Accho, by transcribers changed to Ummah.

The Crusaders gave the name of St. John of Acre to this city, because of a magnificent church, which was built there, dedicated to St. John. This city was of a triangular form, being washed by the sea on the west and south, surrounded by two strong walls towards the land, at about fifty paces from each other, and fortified by towers at equal distances. On the first wall eastward, was a tower larger and stronger than the rest, called the King's Tower; at the middle was such another tower, always called the cursed Tower. And it proved its right to this name; for by this the Saracens entered the city, and took it, as was observed at that time. This was the last city the Christians possessed in Syria.—The Sultan of Egypt, Elpy, surnamed Melle-messor, having besieged it in 1291, with 60,000 horse, and 100,000 foot, the knights of St. John of Jerusalem defended it bravely; but at last it was taken and almost destroyed.

Aco called also Ptolemais, is situated in a plain, but with hills around it. Two miles off is the small river Beles (which flows from Carmel); near it is the sepulchre of Memnon; about it is a space of a hundred cubits, well worthy of admiration; for it is in the form of a round valley, and yielding glassy sand, which, after many ship loads have been taken away, seems not to be diminished. Aco was reckoned heathen land; and all beyond it, northwards.—There was a bath of Venus in Aco: it was of considerable antiquity; and, as the Rabbins thought, prior to the reference of it to the goddess: it might, therefore, be a natural convenience. [See ACCHO, and comp. PLATES, MEDALS of PTOLEMAIS.]

VOLNEY thus describes this city, Trav. vol. ii. p. 225. "Nine leagues to the south of Sour, is the city of Acre. It is situated at the northern cape of a bay, which extends in a semi-circle circle of three leagues, as far as the point of Carmel. After the expulsion of the crusaders it remained almost deserted; but in our time was again revived by the industry of Daher; and the works erected by Djezzar, within the last ten years, have rendered it one of the most considerable towns on the coast."

It was this Djezzar whom Sir Sidney Smith assisted in defending this town against Buonaparte: who here terminated his Syrian expedition in 1799.]

II. PTOLEMAIS, or Rosetta, a city of Egypt, sixty miles east of Alexandria. The Jews of Egypt being delivered from the persecution of Philopator, assembled here, and built a Proseucha, 3 Macc. vii.

PTOLEMY, Πτολεμαῖος, warrior, warlike.

PTOLEMY. All the kings of Egypt, from Ptolemy son of Lagus, to the conquest of Egypt by the Romans, bore the name of Ptolemy.—That is, from A. M. 3631 to 3974; or from the death of Alexander to the death of Cleopatra spouse of Mark Anthony. Vide EGYPT.—Those mentioned in Scripture, are,

I. PTOLEMY, son of Lagus, surnamed Soter, or Saviour. After the death of Alexander the Great, he brought the body of that prince into Egypt, to be interred at Alexandria. In the distribution of Alexander's conquests among his generals, Egypt fell to Ptolemy. He at first contented himself with the title of governor; nor took the title of king, till after the death of all of Alexander's race. Just. lib. xv. cap. 2. Yet he managed the minds of the people of Egypt, and of the neighbouring princes, with a view of laying a solid foundation for his future power. Some years after he was settled in Egypt, he thought of reducing Phenicia and Coele-Syria. At first he endeavoured to corrupt Laomedon, who governed those provinces under Antipater and Perdiccas. But not succeeding, he sent Nicanor one of his generals, into this province, who took Laomedon, and in a little time made himself master of Coele-Syria and Phenicia.

Ptolemy himself marching into Judea, entered Jerusalem, while the Jews were under no other concern but to observe the sabbath. Ap- pian, in Syriac. says, That having brought the city into subjection, he demolished its walls; and Josephus from Aristæas adds, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 2. that this prince carried 100,000 Jews into Egypt, of which he incorporated about 30,000, into his armies and garrisons, knowing that the Jews were religious observers of their fidelity.—He gave the rest to his soldiers, as slaves. Hence proceeded that great number of Jews, afterwards found in Egypt, Libya, and the Cyreniaca.

Two years before his death, at the beginning of the thirty-ninth year of his reign, Ptolemy Lagus, associated with him in the kingdom Ptolemy Philadelphus, his son by Berenice.—Ptolemy son of Lagus, died A. M. 3721, ante A. D. 283.

II. PTOLEMY PHILADELPHUS, son of Ptolemy Soter, was associated A. M. 3719. Justin even affirms, lib. xvi. cap. 2. that his father Ptolemy entirely quitted the royal dignity to his son, and esteemed it a sufficient honour to be one of his life-guards. But other historians think, he continued to reign with Philadelphus to A. M. 3721, which was the first of the sole reign of Philadelphus. This prince was surnamed Philadelphus, i. e. lover of his brethren, probably ironically; for on several pretences, he caused two of his brothers to be put to death. The younger, Argeus, was son of Berenice as well as himself; the other was son of Eurydice. Pausan. in Atticis, p. 6. He was one of the most powerful princes that ever reigned in Egypt. Vid. Jerom. in Dan. xi. But nothing gave a greater lustre to his reign than his love for learning, the library founded at Alexandria, and the version of the Septuagint, which it is said he procured to be made. Vide SEVENTY INTERPRETERS.

The ancients are unanimous in their testimonies, concerning the affection of Ptolemy for the sciences, and his care to collect books, and to erect a copious library; but only the false Aristæus, and such as have followed him, have affirmed that Demetrius Phalareus was his librarian. Vitruvius mentions Aristophanes, and Suidas speaks of Zenodotus, who were library-keepers to Philadelphus, at the Alexandrian library. Diogen. Laert. in Demet. lib. v. seg. 78, 79. Cicero, pro Rab. &c. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 2. allows Philadelphus thirty-nine years of reign, Clemens Alexandrinus thirty-seven, and Ptolemy, Porphyry, and Eusebius thirty-eight. Usher thinks he reigned in all thirty-eight years, and about eight months. He fixes his death A. M. 3758, ante A. D. 246. He was succeeded by his son Ptolemy surnamed Euergetes, or the benefactor, son of Arsinoë, daughter of Lysimachus. Philadelphus had also a daughter called Berenice, who married Antiochus Theos, king of Syria.

III. PTOLEMY EUERGETES, or the benefactor, son of Ptolemy Philadelphus, ascended the throne A. M. 3758. His father Ptolemy Philadelphus, having a long war with Antiochus Theos, at last made peace with him, and gave him his daughter Berenice in marriage, while his wife Laodice was alive, by whom he had had two children. This marriage was celebrated with extraordinary magnificence, and Philadel- phus gave his daughter so much gold and silver to her portion, that she was thence called Pher-nophora, or the dowry-bringer. See Jerom on Daniel xi. But this alliance did not prove happy. Antiochus was poisoned by his wife Laodice, who likewise ordered that Berenice and her young son by Antiochus, should be killed. Appian, Syriac. p. 130. Jerom, in Dan. xi. In the mean time Philadelphus died, and Euergetes being informed of the danger of his sister, who had taken refuge in the asylum of Daphne, hastened into Syria with an army to relieve her: but was too late, for Berenice and her son were assassinated. But such a number of Syrian cities submitted to Euergetes, that he found himself the most powerful king of the east. Josephus says, that when this prince came to Jerusalem, he offered sacrifices to the Lord, as a thanksgiving for his many successes. Comp. Dan. x. 5, 6, &c.

Euergetes did not less distinguish himself by his love of books and learned men, than his father had done. Galen, Comment. 2. in Hipp. lib. iii. Epid. assures us, that this prince caused exact copies to be taken of all books which deserved consideration, that came to his knowledge. No sooner did a ship arrive at Alexandria, but he caused the books therein to be brought to him, of which he took copies, and returned them to the owners, placing the originals in his library. Having borrowed of the Athenians the works of Euripides, Sophocles, and Eschylus, with a promise of returning them, after copies should be taken of them, and for security of this, having given them a pledge of fifteen talents, (about £2,500), he kept the originals, and sent them back the copies, very neatly and faithfully transcribed, with permission also of keeping the fifteen talents, which he had pledged.

Under the reign of Euergetes, Onias II. was high-priest of the Jews, a man of no integrity, and who thought of nothing but heaping riches together. Vide ONIAS II.

Ptolemy Euergetes died after reigning twenty-five years. Tacitus says, Annal. lib. vi. that under his reign was seen in Egypt, the bird called Phoenix, which appeared in the country, accompanied by many other birds, which flocked to it, because of the novelty of the sight. Polybius, lib. ii. p. 155. says, that Euergetes died by disease; but Justin, lib. xxix. cap. 1. affirms he was put to death by his son and successor Ptolemy Philopator.

IV. PTOLEMY PHILOPATOR, son of Ptolemy Euergetes, began to reign A. M. 3783, ante A. D. 221. He received the name of Philopator, or lover of his father, by irony, or antiphrasis, because he had put his father to death, says Justin, lib. xxix. cap. 1. He had also the name of Tryphon, or the glutton; also of Gal-lus, because he carried the ensigns and the crown of ivy, like the Galli, or priests of the great goddess; and because he affected to appear crowned with ivy in the ceremonies of Bacchus. Vide Usher, ad Ann. Mun. 3763.—This prince spent his time in luxury, drunkenness, and debauchery; as if he had been a king for the sole end of following his pleasures.

Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, made war against him, and took several places in Coele-Syria and Palestine, before he would attempt to oppose him, leaving this matter to his generals. But the year following, Antiochus having advanced to Raphia, Ptolemy met him with a powerful army, and gave him battle. At first the advantage was on the side of Antiochus, who, beside being a great commander, had also an army of excellent soldiers. But Arsinoe, sister and wife of king Philopator, having her hair dishevelled, and her eyes full of tears, passed through the ranks of his soldiers, and so raised their courage and resolution, that at last they obtained an entire victory. Antiochus therefore retiring with the remains of his army, all the cities of Syria and Palestine, which had been obliged to submit to him, returned of themselves to the obedience of Philopator, omitting nothing that might shew their zeal and fidelity to his government. 3 Macc. cap. 1. Polyb. lib. v.

The chief of the Jews also having sent their deputies to him, to congratulate him, and offer him presents, they found him inclined to come in person to Jerusalem. When he came thither, he entered into the temple, admiring its beauty, magnificence, and oeconomy. He desired also to enter the sanctuary, into which no one was to enter but the high-priest alone; and he only once in a year. This attempt of the king, filled the whole temple with tears and lamentations, the noise of which spread into the city, and occasioned the utmost consternation. The high-priest Simon betaking himself to prayer, between the temple and the altar of burnt-sacrifices, when he had finished his prayer, Philopator found himself struck with so great a terror, that he began to tremble, and could hardly stand on his legs; and his attendants were forced to carry him out of the temple half dead. 3 Macc. i. 11. This he afterwards revenged on the Jews in Egypt. Vide Third Book of MACCABEES.

Philopator died after he had reigned seventeen years: his successor was Ptolemy Epiphanes. Ptolem. Canon. Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. i. Euseb. Porphy. A. M. 3800, ante A. D. 204.

V. PTOLEMY EPIPHANES, succeeded his father father Ptolemy Philopator, being four years old, according to Jerom, in Dan. xi. or five, according to Justin, lib. xxx. cap. 1. When Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, and Philip king of Macedon, saw Egypt in the hands of a child, they concerted secret measures to divide his territories. Antiochus attacked Coele-Syria and Judea, and soon became master of them.—But after some time Ptolemy Epiphanes sent his general Scopas thither with a good army, who retook the cities and provinces Antiochus had conquered. Scarcely a year had passed, but Antiochus subdued them again. Then the Jews surrendered to Antiochus, and adhered firmly to his interests afterwards. For this reason on several occasions Antiochus gave them marks of his confidence and friendship, by those letters of which copies are preserved in Josephus. Diod. Sicul. lib. xv. Tit. Liv. lib. xxxi. Polyb. lib. iii. 16. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xii. 3.

A. M. 3812, Antiochus gave his daughter Cleopatra in marriage to Ptolemy Epiphanes king of Egypt, in hopes by her means of becoming master of the dominions of that young prince. But the governors of young Epiphanes penetrating his design, and Cleopatra espousing her husband's interests rather than her father's, defeated his intentions. At last, Epiphanes undertaking a war against Seleucus king of Syria, and one of his generals having asked him, what assistance he depended on, in accomplishing his designs? Epiphanes answered, on no other assistance than the purses of his friends." When this answer was spread among the people, the generals of Epiphanes began to be in pain for their wealth, thinking they were to be plundered to support this war. Wherefore they prevented him by poison, after he had reigned twenty-four years, according to Eusebius, Clemens Alexandrinus, Porphyry, and Jerom, in Dan. xi. He left two sons; Ptolemy Philometor, who succeeded him, and Ptolemy Physcon, his younger son.

VI. PTOLEMY PHILOMETOR, son of Ptolemy Epiphanes and Cleopatra, reigned thirty-five years; from A. M. 3824 to 3859, ante A. D. 145. Judea being then not in subjection to the kings of Egypt, the general affairs of the Jews had but little relation to those of this prince. Under the government of Philometor the temple Onion was built in Egypt. See ONION and ONIAS IV.

Josephus, lib. ii. cont. App. informs us, that Ptolemy Philometor and his queen Cleopatra placed such confidence in the Jews of Egypt, that Dositheus and Onias, both Jews, were generals of their armies; and that when the city of Alexandria rose in arms, in favour of Ptolemy Physcon against Cleopatra, the Jews supported her, and kept the city to its duty. But this happened after the death of Philometor, as we shall see in the following article. Under the reign of Philometor arose in Egypt the peripatetic philosopher Aristobulus, also, a Jew, mentioned by Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. lib. i. and Eusebius, Præp. lib. iii. cap. 7. lib. viii. cap. 3. who have preserved some fragments of him.

• About A. M. 3854, ante A. D. 150, arose at Alexandria, a great dispute between the Jews and the Samaritans. The Jews maintained, that the temple of Jerusalem was the only place where God had appointed to be worshipped, according to the law of Moses; the Samaritans on the contrary insisted it was the temple on mount Gerizim. This controversy was pleaded with great earnestness before king Philometor and his counsellors; and each party bound themselves by oath, to produce proofs out of their own law, and besought the king to put to death the advocates of either party, who should act contrary to this oath. The king and his council having heard both sides, decided in favour of the Jews, and condemned to death Sabas and Theodosius, the advocates of the Samaritans. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 6.

Jonathan Maccabeus, who flourished at this time, espoused the party of Alexander Balas king of Syria, son-in-law to Philometor, against Demetrius, 1 Macc. x. 67, 69. A. M. 3858, Philometor went into Syria, on pretence of assisting his son-in-law Alexander Balas against Demetrius, but really to make himself master of his dominions; and passed through Palestine. The heathen of Azoth shewed him their city and temple destroyed, with heaps of bones of the dead, piled up by the way-side; they enlarged also on the calamities Jonathan had made them suffer. But the king did not seem to notice it, and Jonathan joining him at Joppa, with a magnificent attendance, the king gave him a very favourable reception.

Philometor being received as a friend into all the cities of the dominions of Balas, he made his entry into Antioch, where being acknowledged king, he placed two diadems on his head. 1 Macc. xi. 13. Just. lib. xxxv. cap. 2. He died the year following in the hands of his physicians, who thought to have effected upon him the operation of the trepan, in order to cure a mortal wound he had received in his head, in a battle against Alexander Balas king of Syria.

VII. PTOLEMY PHYSCON, or Fat-guts, otherwise Euergetes, or the Benefactor, son of Ptolemy Epiphanes, and brother to Ptolemy Philopator, reigned in the whole fifty-three years, partly with his brother, and partly alone; from from A. M. 3859. He had great contests with his brother, which lasted until the death of Philometor. Cleopatra, wife of that prince, was desirous to preserve the crown for her son, against Physcon, who attempted to seize it. Onias the Jew, founder of the temple Onion, defended the queen and the young prince. Joseph. cont. App. lib. ii. Physcon at Alexandria prepared to march against him, and resolved to expose all the Jews of Alexandria to be trod to pieces under the feet of elephants. But God delivered the Jews. Josephus says, that the elephants having been made drunk on purpose, turned their fury against their managers. He adds, that even to his time, the Jews of Alexandria yearly celebrated the day of this deliverance; but it is very probable that he has not distinguished Physcon from Philopator.—For we have under Philopator a history very like this. Vide MACCABEES, Book iii.

Physcon being desirous to terminate his differences with his sister Cleopatra, the sister and wife of his brother Philometor, proposed marriage to her; which being concluded on, Physcon was received into Alexandria, and acknowledged king. Desirous to secure the kingdom, he put the young prince, his nephew, to death, in the arms of his mother, the very day of their marriage. Justin. lib. xxxviii. cap. 8. Diodor. Sicul, in Excerpt. Vales. lib. lix. cap. 2. This action rendered him extremely odious to the Egyptians, whom he farther provoked by all sorts of cruelties. He divorced Cleopatra, took the daughter of this princess to wife after he had deflowered her, killed his own eldest son, lest the people of Alexandria should make him king in his place, put to death another of his sons by Cleopatra, and to complete his cruelties, he cut off his head, feet, and hands, and sent them in a covered basket to the queen, the mother of the young prince, as a present from him on her birth-day. See Justin. Diodor. Excerpt. Vales. loc. cit. Valer. Max. lib. ix. cap. 2. After all these inhumanities Physcon died in peace, when he had reigned twenty-nine years from the death of his brother. He left three sons living. He bequeathed the government to Cleopatra his sister and wife, with power to choose for king either of his three sons. She first chose Alexander, the youngest, hoping to find him the most tractable; but the Alexandrians obliged her to take the eldest, Ptolemy Lathurus, who reigned with her ten years.

VIII. PTOLEMY LATHURUS, son of Ptolemy Physcon and Cleopatra, began to reign A. M. 3888. He sent about 6,000 men to Antiochus Cyzicenus, who assisted the Samaritans, when they were besieged by John Hircanus, prince and high-priest of the Jews. But Antiochus was obliged to retire, and the Egyptian troops were defeated or dispersed; so that Hircanus became master of the city, after a year's siege. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 17.

Lathurus did not long enjoy the kingdom of Egypt. Cleopatra, his mother, weary of a partner in the government, animated the people of Alexandria against him, and compelled him to withdraw to Cyprus. While there, the inhabitants of Ptolemais desired his assistance against Alexander Jannæus, king of the Jews, who kept them, as it were, besieged. Lathurus put to sea with his army; but the people of Ptolemais altering their minds, sent to thank him, and to prevent his coming. Yet Lathurus continued his course, and disembarking his men at Sycaminum, near Ptolemais, Alexander Jannæus drew off his troops, and sent secretly to Cleopatra, to desire assistance against Lathurus. In the mean time, he pretended to accommodate matters with him, and offered him very advantageous proposals.

But Lathurus perceiving that Alexander Jannæus held secret correspondence with his mother Cleopatra, broke with him, and did him all the mischief he could. Entering Judea with part of his troops, while the rest of his army lay before Ptolemais, Alexander Jannæus marched against him with a powerful army, and gave him battle near Azoph on Jordan. The victory, for some time, was in suspense; but at last Lathurus put to flight the Jewish army, and pursued it while his troops had strength to follow and kill the fugitives. It is said, 30,000 Jews fell; others say, 50,000.

Cleopatra, Lathurus's mother, alarmed with the progress of his arms in Palestine, sent an army by land, and a fleet by sea, to stop his career. She gave the command of her army to two Jews, Chelcias, and Ananias, sons of Onias, who founded the temple Onion in Egypt. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 18, 21. She sent her son Alexander with her fleet into Phenicia, where several cities surrendered to him: but Ptolemais shut her gates against him. Chelcias, one of her generals, died in Cœle-Syria. Lathurus hasted into Egypt, thinking to find it unprovided with troops; but he found more resistance than he expected, and the queen his mother sending forces against him, he was obliged to withdraw, and returned to Gaza, where he passed the winter. See CLEOPATRA IV. Ptolemy Lathurus died in A. M. 3923, ante A. D. 81, having reigned thirty-six years from the death of Philometor.

Other Ptolemies, kings of Egypt, having no relation to the history of the Bible, are omitted.

IX. PTOLEMY

IX. PTOLEMY MACRON, son of Dorymenes, was made governor of the island of Cyprus by Ptolemy Philometor, king of Egypt. During the minority of this prince, he retained the whole revenues of the island. But when the king came to age, he gave in his accounts, and sent the whole sum to him. Polyb. lib. xxvii. in Excerpt. Vales. Some time after, discontented with some proceedings of the king of Egypt, he withdrew his fidelity, and delivered Cyprus to Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria; who received him among his friends, and gave him the command of troops in Phenicia and Coele-Syria. We are told, 2 Macc. iv. 45, &c. that Menelaus, usurper of the high-priesthood, being accused before Antiochus Epiphanes, A. M. 3834, and expecting to be condemned, he bribed Ptolemy Macron to stand his friend.—This he did, while the king was at Tyre, and was the chief instrument that Menelaus, guilty as he was, was acquitted, and his accusers condemned to death.

After Judas Maccabeus had routed Apollonius, governor of Samaria, and Seron, governor of Coele-Syria; Philip, then at Jerusalem in behalf of king Antiochus Epiphanes, sent to demand assistance from Ptolemy Macron, who sent Nicanor and Gorgias, two experienced commanders. But Judas defeated them, 1 Macc. iii. 33. After the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, Ptolemy was no longer in favour.—His enemies represented to the young Eupator, that a man who had once failed in fidelity to his prince, was never afterwards to be trusted. 2 Macc. x. 12. He had also rendered himself suspected by the courtiers, because on several occasions he had shewn his dislike of their proceedings against the Jews. At last, being no longer able to bear these reproaches, he poisoned himself. The Latin version of 2 Macc. x. 12. calls him Ptolemeus Macer; but his true name was Ptolemeus Macron. Macer in Latin signifies lean; but Macron in Greek signifies tall.

X. PTOLEMY, son of Abubi, or Abobi, son-in-law of Simon Maccabeus, and governor of the castle of Docus or Dagon, and of the plain of Jericho. Being puffed up with pride, he pretended to the government of all Judea, and with this view formed a design against the life of Simon Maccabeus his father-in-law. 1 Macc. xvi. 11. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xxiii. cap. 14, 15. de Bello, lib. i. cap. 2. 4 Macc. i. Simon was then visiting the cities of Judea; and arriving at Jericho with his two sons, Matthias and Judas, he went to lodge with his son-in-law, at the castle of Docus or Dagon. Ptolemy made a great entertainment for them, but in the midst of supper, certain men provided for that purpose, entering the room, killed Simon with his two sons, and some of their people. At the same time he sent messengers to Gazara, to kill John Hircanus, the eldest son of Simon; and others of his people he sent to Jerusalem, to seize the city.

But John Hircanus was quickly advertised of this villany; he caused those to be slain whom Ptolemy had sent to kill him, and hasting away, came soon enough to Jerusalem, to frustrate the designs of Ptolemy, against whom the gates were shut. This is related by Josephus. The first book of the Maccabees does not inform us the event of this murder of Simon. But the book we quote under the name of the fourth of the Maccabees relates the history differently. Vide Docus.

PUA, פה, פה, here, an adverb of place; from פה peh, or פה pi: or, the mouth; from פה peh: otherwise, handsome; from פה japhah.

PUA, פה, or פה, son of Issachar, head of a family. Gen. xlii. 13. Numb. xxvi. 23. [In Chaldee ruby-coloured: perhaps, stained with red marks, as Miltiades from μίλτος, rubentem a matre. Juv.]

PUA, פה, corner, or hair; from פה peah. Of Issachar, father of Tola. Judg. x. 1.

PUAH, פה, that groans, that cries; from פה pahah: otherwise, that appears; from פה japhah: [perhaps, from פה, splendor.]

PUAH and SHIPHRAH, midwives of Egypt, whom Pharaoh commanded, that when the Israelite women were delivered, the female children should be saved, and the males destroyed. Exod. i. 15, 16. Josephus, Antiq. lib. ii. cap. 5. Carthus. Abul. Lyr. alii. think these midwives were Egyptians, but the Hebrews, St. Austin, and others, contend for their being Israelites. The rabbins pretend, that Puah was the same as Jochabed, the mother of Moses and Aaron; and that Shiphrah was Miriam daughter of Jochabed, and sister to Moses and Aaron. But this is beyond all probability, though it is very likely they were Hebrews, since they shewed so much fear of God on this occasion. Besides, what likelihood is there that the Hebrews, who had so much aversion to the Egyptians, should employ Egyptian midwives?

There were, doubtless, more than two midwives among the Israelites; but Puah and Shiphrah were the most eminent. Scripture says, Exod. i. 17, 18, 19. they did not obey the king's commands; but restrained by the fear of God, preserved the male children. When Pharaoh expostulated with them, they answered, that the Hebrew women could bring forth of themselves, without the assistance of a midwife. Literally, the Hebrew women are as wild beasts; or, are delivered with the same ease as beasts of the field. Others translate, they are so strong, as not to need a midwife. It is thought that they told a lie, in affirming this, for, though eastern women in general, are brought-to-bed with great facility, yet this could hardly be said of all the Hebrew women. Remunerata est benevolentia, non fallacia; benignitas mentis, non iniquitas mentientis, says St. Austin, cont. Mend. cap. 15.

Instead of God built them houses; the Hebrew has only, he built them houses: which some understand, as if Pharaoh had built houses on purpose to lodge these midwives, that the Hebrew women might come thither to be delivered, in presence of officers appointed by the king. Others refer this to God, who rewarded the midwives, by a numerous posterity. But the Hebrew shews, that this respects the Hebrews, whose houses God built up, by a multitude of children. Vide FRAGMENTS. No. CCCXIII.

PUBLICAN, in Greek Τηλωνες, telones; an officer of the revenue, employed in collecting taxes. Among the Romans there were two sorts of tax receivers: some were general receivers, who in each province had deputies, who collected the revenues of the empire, and accounted to the emperor. These principals were men of great consideration in the government; and Cicero says, pro Planc. that among these, were the flower of the Roman knights, the ornament of the city, and the strength of the commonwealth. But the deputies, the under-farmers, the commissioners, the publicans of the lower order, were looked on as so many thieves and pickpockets. Theocritus being asked, Which was the most cruel of all beasts? answered, among the beasts of the wilderness, the bear and the lion; among the beasts of the city, the publican and the parasite." Apud Musonium

Among the Jews, the name and profession of a publican was excessively odious. They could not, without the utmost reluctance, see publicans exacting tributes and impositions laid on them by foreigners, the Romans: especially the Galileans or Herodians, the disciples of Judas the Gaulonite, submitted to this with the greatest impatience, and thought it even unlawful.—Those of their own nation who undertook this employ, they looked on as heathen; "Let him be unto thee as a heathen man, and a publican." Matt. xviii. 17. It is even said, they would not allow them to enter the temple, or synagogues; to partake of the public prayers, offices of judicature, or to give testimony in a court of justice. Vide Grot. ad Matt. xviii. Lightfoot, Her.

Heb. in Matt. Lastly, we are assured, they would not receive their presents at the temple, no more than the price of prostitution, of blood, or of any thing of the like nature.

There were many publicans in Judea, in the time of our Saviour. Zaccheus, probably, was one of the principal receivers, since he is called "chief among the publicans;" Luke xix. 2. but St. Matthew was only an inferior publican. Luke v. 27. The Jews reproached Jesus with being a "friend of publicans and sinners, and eating with them. Luke vii. 34. And our Saviour told the Jews, Matt. xxi. 31. that harlots and publicans should be preferred before them in the kingdom of heaven. In the parable of the publican and Pharisee, who prayed at the same time in the temple, we see with what humility his condition inspired the publican. Luke xviii. 10. He keeps afar off, and, probably, dared not so much as enter the court of the people, &c. Zaccheus assures our Saviour, who had done him the honour to visit his house, that he was ready to give half of his goods to the poor, and to return fourfold whatever he had unjustly acquired. Luke xix. 8. The Roman laws required, that whenever any farmer was convicted of extortion, he should be obliged to render four times the value of what he had extorted. L. Hoc Edicto in fine Digest. de Publican. [And this shews, that only a small part of his property really was acquired by oppression. His calling was in greater disrepute than his conduct deserved: no doubt, it was the same with many others.]

Some have thought, that by the Jewish laws, it was forbid to pay foreign tribute, or to be a publican; from Deut. xvii. 15. But it is certain, there were publicans, Israelites; such were Zaccheus and St. Matthew; though their employment was very odious. The Herodians, who refused to pay tribute to strangers, did not found their refusal on this law; since the Hebrews otherwise explain this passage. The disciples of Judas Gaulonites founded their refusal to pay tribute, on their being the people of the Lord, and because it was not permitted to a true Israelite to acknowledge any other sovereign than God. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 2.

PUBLIUS: chief or governor of Malta, when St. Paul was shipwrecked on this island, A. D. 60. Acts xxviii. 7, 8, 9. Publius received St. Paul and his company into his house very kindly, and treated them three days with great humanity. The apostle, in acknowledgment, restored to health the governor's father, who was ill of a fever and bloody-flux. It is said, that not only Publius and his father, but the whole island also, was converted to the Christian tian faith. Chrysost. Homil. 54. in Acta Apost. Gregor. Mag. in Job. lib. xxvii. cap. 11. et recent. plerique. Ado, with several Latin writers, affirm, that Publius was made a bishop by this apostle, and sent to preach the gospel; that coming to Athens, he was bishop there, and ended his life by martyrdom. But this opinion cannot be supported; since Publius, bishop of Athens, did not suffer martyrdom till the time of Marcus Aurelius. See MELITA.

PUDENS, mentioned by St. Paul, 2 Tim. iv. 21. A. D. 65. Baronius, An. 44. sec. 61. with others, believed, that Pudens was a Roman senator converted by St. Peter, with whom St. Paul abode some time. But there is reason to think, he confounds him with another Pudens, a senator, said to be father of Praxedus and Prudentiana, in the time of pope Pius, above an hundred years afterwards. The Greeks keep the festival of St. Pudens, the disciple, April 14. They put him in the list of the seventy disciples, and say, that after the death of St. Paul, he was beheaded by Nero. Some think that Claudia, mentioned by St. Paul after Pudens, was his wife. The common tradition is, that St. Peter not only lodged with Pudens, but also there consecrated the first church at Rome; subsequently that of St. Peter in Bonds. Comp. CLAUDIA and LINUS.

PUHITES, פוּתִי, 'Αφῆσι, that seduces; from פתה pathah: otherwise, mouthful; from פת path, and פתח pathah: in Chaldee, wideness. A family, mentioned 1 Chron. ii. 53.

PUL, פּוּל, bean; from פוּל phol: otherwise, destruction; from פלח palach, to cleave, to destroy. An Assyrian name; no etymology in Hebrew.

PUL, or PHUL, king of Assyria: 2 Kings xv. 19. he came into the land of Israel in the time of Menahem, to assist him, and confirm him in the kingdom. Hos. v. 13. The king of Israel gave him a thousand talents of silver, and Pul continued in the country till it was paid.—We conjecture that Pul was the father of Sardanapalus, who added the name Pal or Pul to that of Sardan; as Merodach added the name of Baladan, and called himself Merodach-Baladan. If this conjecture be true, Pul is the same as Anacindarexes, or Anabaxares, the name which profane authors give to the father of Sardanapalus. Athen. lib. vii. xii. Dipncs. Strab. Suid. Arrian. Stephanus Byzantinus calls him Cyndaraxes; Julius Africanus, Acracarnes; and Eusebius, Acraxapes. Pul is properly the first king of Assyria mentioned in Scripture.

from Syene. On this island are remains and ruins of very noble and extensive temples, built by the ancient Egyptians.

That the nation or people called Pul, or Phul, might give name to this island is not impossible: but it should rather seem that the most the name of this island is capable of, is to suggest the idea of their dwelling in this latitude.

The people called Phul I suppose to be represented in Egypt to this day, by the Pholaks, Pholeys, or Fellahs, which are for the most part husbandmen and cultivators.]

PUNISHMENTS of the Hebrews. There were several sorts of punishments used among the Jews, which are mentioned in Scripture. As, 1. The Cross. 2. Hanging, or the rope. 3. Stoning. 4. Fire, or burning. 5. The Tympanum, or whipping. 6. Imprisonment. 7. The Sword, or beheading. 8. The Precipice, or throwing from a rock. 9. Rending to pieces by thorns, or treading under the feet of animals. 10. The Saw. 11. Stifling, by being thrown down into a place full of ashes. 12. Cutting off the hair. 13. Blinding the eyes. 14. Being stretched on the wooden horse. There are others, mentioned in the Maccabees, or in the Government of Reason. See the articles following.

The Rabbins report many formalities which accompanied the decision of the judges in criminal cases. When the matter concerned life and death, they proceeded with great deliberation. After the witnesses had been heard, the affair was put off to the next day; the judges went home, ate but little, and drank no wine. The day following they assembled again, two by two, to examine the circumstances at more leisure: and the judgment might now be rectified or reversed.

Sentence being confirmed and pronounced, the criminal was led to execution. A man placed at the door of the court, held a handkerchief in his hand; a little farther was a horseman, or a crier on horseback. If any one offered himself to say any thing in favour of the condemned, the first centinel made a signal with his handkerchief, and the horseman galloped away, to have the prisoner brought back. Two of the judges went on each side of him, to hear if he had any thing farther to offer in his justification. The criminal might be brought back as often as five times, to hear those who could say any thing in his defence. If there was nothing to retard the execution of the sentence, it was published with a loud voice; "such an one is abandoned, for such a crime;—such and such have deposed against him:—if any one have any proofs of his innocence, they may now produce them."

The Jews were of opinion, that the death of offenders, might be of great efficacy to procure their salvation, if they suffered to satisfy the justice of God, and to make atonement for their sins. They were exhorted to confess their faults, and to say, "Let my death become an expiation of all my sins." Their maxim was, he that confesses his faults, has a share in the life to come.

They gave to criminals, at their execution, wine mingled with incense, myrrh, and other strong drugs, proper to stupify the senses, and to abate the severity of pain. Solomon advises, Prov. xxxi. 6. to give wine to such as are overwhelmed with pain. And we see an instance of this, in what was offered to Jesus Christ at his passion; wine mixed with myrrh, before his crucifixion; and vinegar, when he was on the cross, Matt. xxvii. 34, 48. These observations are general, and belong to all that were executed.

HANGING.

I do not observe any crime in the law, for which the guilty was condemned to be hanged. They often hanged up men after their death; but I cannot see that any were hanged alive.—The Jews maintain, that none but idolaters and blasphemers underwent this punishment. Achitophel hanged himself. 2 Sam. xvii. 23. also Judas, Matt. xxvii. 5. Acts i. 18. Moses pronounces him accursed, that is hanged on a tree; and he would have him cut down before sun-setting, Deut. xxi. 23. Haman and all his sons were hanged on a high gallows: Esth. vii. 9, 10. Pharaoh's chief baker was first beheaded, and afterwards hanged on a gibbet, Gen. xli. 18. Moses ordered those princes of Israel to be hanged on gibbets, who had partaken in the crime of worshipping Baal-peor. Numb. xxv. 4. Joshua hanged up the king of Ai, and he continued on the gallows until the evening, Josh. viii. 29. Another time he hanged up five kings of the Canaanites, Josh. x. 26. The Philistines hanged the bodies of Saul and Jonathan on the walls of Bethshan, 2 Sam. xxi. 12, 13. Jeremiah says, Lam. v. 12. that the princes of Israel were hanged up by the hand, after their death, by the Chaldeans. The soldiers of Antiochus Epiphanes hanged dead children on the necks of their mothers, who had circumcised them, 1 Macc. i. 62.

From all these examples, it may be inferred, that sometimes they hanged up men alive; and sometimes hanged up their carcasses, after they were dead.

BURNING

Was very common among the Hebrews.—When Judah was informed that his daughter-in-law Tamar was pregnant, he would have had her burnt as an adulteress, Genesis xxxviii. 24. The law of Moses inflicts this punishment on the daughters of priests, if guilty of fornication: Lev. xxi. 9. Abraham, say some, was cast into the fire, because he would not worship the gods of the Chaldeans, Gen. xi. 31. Nehem. ix. 7. Nebuchadnezzar caused Daniel and his companions to be thrown into a burning fiery furnace, on a like occasion, Dan. iii. 6. Moses ordered the man to be burnt alive, who should marry the mother and her daughter, Lev. xx. 14.

Jeremiah informs us, xxix. 22. that Nebuchadnezzar ordered Zedekiah and Ahab to be roasted in a pan, for abusing their neighbours' wives.—Antiochus Epiphanes exercised the same and similar punishments against the brethren Maccabees: the author of Ecclesiasticus says, that the flesh of the wicked shall be punished by worms, and by fire; i. e. probably shall be exposed in the fields, and burnt in the valley of Hinnom; they burnt there the carcasses of men, and animals, to prevent their stench from infecting the city; and to this Jesus Christ seems to allude, when he says, Mark ix. 43, 45, 47, that the worm of the damned dies not, and their fire is not quenched.

Some Jewish authors pretend, that he who was condemned to the fire, was not burnt in the flames: he was set up to the knees in a dung-hill, his throat tied about with a large piece of cloth, which was strained by the two ends, till the sufferer was forced to open his mouth: or it was forced open by an instrument. Then they poured melted lead down his throat, till his bowels were consumed. They found this sort of punishment upon what is said, that the fire did not consume the bodies of the children of Aaron, Lev. x. 1, 2, 3. (This is not said expressly in Scripture, which only takes notice, that they were carried out of the camp in their habits. This shews that they were not consumed by the fire.) So that they thought it not lawful for them to consume the bodies of their brethren. Besides, they thought this a more merciful kind of death. The rabbi Eleazar objecting against this determination, and affirming that he had seen the body of a priest's daughter burnt, who had committed a crime; he was answered, that then the Sanhedrim must have been composed of ignorant people, or of Cushites and profane persons, who did not understand the law.

IMPRISONMENT

Was not considered as a punishment, but to secure the accused. So Joseph detained his brother Simeon in prison, Gen. xlii. 19. The blasphemers phemer that was brought to Moses, Lev. xxiv. 12. and the man who was found gathering sticks on the Sabbath-day, Numb. xv. 34, were put in ward till the Lord declared what kind of punishment they should suffer. Jeremiah and John the Baptist were shut up in prison, to prevent their remonstrances to the people.

But, often, imprisonment was made a punishment by severities. Joseph was put into prison, and loaded with fetters, Gen. xxxix. 20. Samson taken by the Philistines, was cast into a dungeon, and forced to grind at the mill, Judg. xvi. 21. Hoshea, king of Israel, Jehoahaz, and Manasseh, kings of Judah, were shut up in prison by their conquerors the kings of Assyria and Chaldea. Zedekiah underwent the same hardships; to which was added the punishment of losing his eyes. Ahab, king of Israel, gave orders, 1 Kings xxii. 27. that the prophet Micaiah should be shut up in prison; that he should be fed with the bread of affliction, and the water of distress, till Ahab's return from Ramoth-gilead.

Bonds, fetters, shackles, manacles, chains, which usually attended imprisonment, must be considered as punishments, which greatly aggravated that of being kept in prison. The ancient Hebrews had also a kind of yoke, formed of two pieces of wood, long, and pretty broad, in which they cut away a semicircle to receive the neck of the criminal. Jeremiah xxvii. 2. was ordered by the Lord, to make bonds and yokes, to put them on his neck, and to send such to the kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, and Tyre, to denote their approaching captivity by the king of Chaldea. They also used stocks, wherein were holes at several distances, through which they made the prisoners put their legs, at a greater or less distance, according to the torment they meant to inflict. See Job xiii. 27. xxxiii. 11. Prov. vii. 22. Prudentius, hymn 4. has described this punishment,

Lignoque plantas inserit,
Divaricatis cruribus.

PRECIPITATION.

To throw headlong into the sea from a precipice, with a stone tied about the neck, was not a common punishment: if it has been sometimes used among the Hebrews, it was in extraordinary cases. Amaziah, king of Judah, forced ten thousand Idumeans, whom he had taken prisoners of war, to leap from the top of a high rock, 2 Chron. xxv. 12. Some are of opinion also, that they precipitated from the rock Oreb, the king of the Midianites, named Oreb, Judg. vii. 25. The Nazarenes intended to precipitate Christ from the top of their mountain, Luke

iv. 29. St. James the Just was thrown down from the higher part of the temple, into the space below. Zachariah, son of Baruch, was put to death in the midst of the temple, and his body thrown into a deep place beneath the walls of that holy structure, Joseph. de Bello, lib. v. cap. 1. Jesus Christ mentions the punishment of casting a man into the sea, with a stone about his neck: Matt. xviii. 6: We are told, this was common among the Syrians.

BEHEADING.

Pharaoh's chief baker had his head cut off; after which, his body was hung on a gibbet, Gen. xl. 19. Abimelech, son of Gideon, cut off the heads of seventy sons of Gideon, his brethren, on one stone, Judg. ix. 5. The people of Samaria beheaded seventy sons of Ahab, and sent the heads in baskets to king Jehu, 2 Kings x. 7. John the Baptist was beheaded in prison, by order of Herod, &c. Matt. xiv. 8, 11.

TRAMPLING TO DEATH

under thorns, under harrows, under the feet of elephants, is not known among us; but we find some instances in Scripture. When Gideon returned from pursuing the Midianites, he tore with thorns and brambles of the desert, the chief men of the city of Succoth, who had insulted him, Judg. viii. 16. It is thought David did something like this to the Moabites, 2 Sam. viii. 2. "And he smote Moab, and measured them with a line, casting them down to the ground; even with two lines measured he, to put to death, and with one full line to keep alive."—What is said of casting them down to the ground, favours this explication.

He made the Ammonites undergo a punishment still more cruel, 2 Sam. xii. 31. "he put them under saws, and under harrows of iron, and under axes of iron, and made them pass through the brick-kiln."

The harrows or sledges, of iron, here mentioned, were machines proper for thrashing of corn; of which there were several kinds. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XLVIII. He made them pass under axes of iron, and through the places for making of bricks. Whether by these last words we are to understand furnaces in which bricks are burnt, or the place where the earth is beat and macerated, in which these miserable wretches were executed; these punishments were very horrible, but were tolerated among those people, who allowed themselves the liberty of putting to death all that they took in war.

Lex nulla capto parvit, aut penam impedit.
SENECA, Trag. Troad.

Vide PTOLEMY PHILOPATOR, who would have trod the Jews to death by his elephants.—The prophet Micah alludes to this kind of punishment, when he says, chap. iv. 12. "He shall gather them as the sheaves into the floor. Arise and thresh, O daughter of Zion, for I will make thine horn iron, and I will make thy hoofs brass, and thou shalt beat in pieces many people." Amilcar the Carthaginian general, caused some Carthaginians and some strangers, who had betrayed the interests of the republic, to be trod under foot by his elephants. Porphyr. de Abstin. lib. ii.

LOSS OF HAIR.

To cut off the hair of guilty persons, seems to be a punishment rather shameful than painful; yet it is thought, that pain was added to the disgrace; and that they tore off the hair with violence, as if they were plucking a bird alive. This is the genuine signification of the Heb. אָמַרְטִי, decalvavi, depilavi, LXX. Ἐμαδάρωσα αὐτοὺς. "I contended with them, and smote certain of them, and plucked off their hair." Neh. xiii. 25. Sometimes they put hot ashes on the skin, after they had torn off the hair, in order to make the pain the more exquisite. Thus they served adulterers at Athens; as is observed by the scholiast on Aristophanes, in Nubibus.

This kind of punishment was common in Persia. King Artaxerxes, instead of plucking off the hair from his generals, who had been guilty of a fault, obliged them to lay aside the tiara, says Plutarch, Apothegm. The emperor Domitian caused the hair and beard of the philosopher Apollonius to be shaved, Philostrate. lib. iii. cap. 24. In France they cut off the hair of sorcerers and magicians. This torture has often been inflicted on martyrs for the Christian religion. In the impious book, (Toledoth Jesu) composed by the Jews, of the life of Jesus Christ, they say their ancestors caused his hair to be cut off, and afterwards his head to be rubbed with a liquor, which made him bald all his life after. It is observed in the book, called The Government of Reason, (sometimes called the fourth book of the Maccabees,) that Antiochus Epiphanes caused the hair and skin and all, to be torn from the heads of some of the seven brethren the Maccabees. [SCALPED: as the Indians of America?]

BLINDING.

To make blind, and to pluck out the eyes, are punishments not common; and though Moses appointed, that an eye should be given for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth, Exod. xxi. 24. Deut. xix. 18, 19, 20. Levit. xxiv. 20. yet it is the opinion of commentators, that this was seldom practised, but that the offender generally compounded by a pecuniary penalty, paid to the injured party. When the Philistines had seized Samson, they put him in prison, and bored out his eyes. Judg. xvi. 21. When Nahash king of the Ammonites made war with Jabesh-gilead, he threatened to put out the right eyes of the people. Nebuchadnezzar took king Zedekiah, slew his children in his presence, then caused his eyes to be put out, and afterwards had him carried to Babylon in chains. 2 Kings xxv. 7. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. CLXXXIX. CXC. CXCI. CXCII.

MAIMING.

To cut off the feet and hands, was a cruelty exercised by Adonibezek, on seventy kings conquered by him, who ate like dogs under his table, Judg. i. 6, 7. But God thought fit to have him tortured after the same manner. David punished the murderers of Ishbosheth by the same means, 2 Sam. iv. 12. Antiochus Epiphanes also cut off the extremities of the hands and feet from the seven brothers Maccabees. 1 Macc. i. 4. 2 Macc. vii. 4. When Alexander the Great came near to Persepolis, eight hundred Greeks presented themselves before him, to entreat his protection and their own liberty. They had been taken captive by the kings of Persia, and had been maimed; some having had their feet or hands cut off; others their noses. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXI. They had also the marks of slavery imprinted upon them, which were a sort of rough characters in the skin, that could not be got out. Diodor. Sicul. Just. Quint. Curt.

THE WHEEL

Is not known in the canonical books either of the Old or New Testament. But it is found in the fourth book of the Maccabees, or Government of Reason, cap. 9. in Græco. He says, that the fifth and sixth of the brethren Maccabees were put upon the wheel. The first of them was dragged upon a machine, which the author calls Catapulta, upon which they tied his knees with strong chains, and violently bent his back upon a wheel, so that he was rolled like a scorpion about the wheel. The second was also brought and fastened with violence upon the wheel, so that all his bones were dislocated; then they burned his sides and bowels with red hot irons.

I doubt not, but what is here called a wheel, is nearly the same thing as the wooden horse or tressel, concerning which so much has been said. The reader may compare what is here said said of the punishment of the wheel, with what has been said of the wooden horse, and he will find almost the same characters observable in both. They violently stretched out the criminals upon the machine, drawing their limbs with ropes or pulleys; then they whipt them, dislocated their joints, burnt their sides, tore off their skin with iron pincers, kept them lying sometimes upon their backs, sometimes upon their bellies, sometimes with their heads uppermost, sometimes bending double, and sometimes with their heads hanging downwards. The form of the wheel gave them opportunity of putting the miserable sufferers into all manner of painful postures. The wheel to which Ixion was fastened according to the fable, was always turning round. Suidas says, that they used to fasten slaves to the wheel, and there whip them. The acts of the martyrs often tell us, that they stretched the bodies of these saints upon this engine, and there made them suffer several kinds of horrible torture.

FIGHTING WITH WILD BEASTS

Was a punishment frequent among the Romans. St. Paul says, that he fought with beasts at Ephesus, 1 Cor. xv. 32. See St. PAUL. Sometimes they were exposed to the beasts, to be devoured by them, as St. Ignatius was to the lions; either to serve as sport to them, as St. Perpetua, who was exposed to a wild cow, being enclosed within nets, that she could not make her escape; or, lastly, to fight with the beasts.

OTHER PUNISHMENTS.

Some are of opinion, that the punishment of impaling was not unknown to the Persians, and that it is intimated, Ezr. vi. 11. Tollatur lignum de domo illius, et erigatur, et configatur in eo. Vat. Grot. Others think, the guilty person was hanged on an upright post, after the demolition of his house. Others understand it, that they were to be fixed to a piece of wood belonging to the house, and there to undergo the punishment of whipping. Schindler, and Lud. de Dieu, on 1 Esdr.

Sometimes they demolished the houses of offenders, and reduced them to a laystall for filth and dung. Thus the temple of Baal was treated by Jehu. Nebuchadnezzar threatened the diviners of Chaldea, to make them undergo this punishment and disgrace, if they did not declare his dream to him. Dan. ii. 9. He afterwards decreed the same penalty, to all such as should not worship the God of Shadrach, Meshech, and Abednego. Dan. iii. 29. And king Darius in the same manner threatened those, who should molest the Jews. Ezra vi. 11. However, there are good interpreters, who explain these passages as implying only confiscation to the king's use.

PUNITES, פוני, Φωνι, that regards; from פנה panah, to behold: otherwise, my face, from פני panim; countenance. Numb. xxvi. 25.

PUNON, פון, precious stone: or that beholds; perhaps from פן pinan, angle, corner, secret place. Copper mines were found here.

[Or well-looking; otherwise, mouth of eternity, or mouth of the son: from the Hebrew and Syriac, mouth of the fish.]

PUNON, or PHUNON, a station of the Hebrews in the wilderness: Numb. xxxiii. 42, 43. called Pheno, Phaino, and Metallo-phanon, because of its mines of metals. Eusebius in Φάνων, says, it was between Petra and Segor; and in Δαυδάν, he places it four miles from Dedan. Athanasius, Epist. ad Solitarios, says, these mines of Phanos were so dangerous, that murderers condemned to work there, lived but a few days. We find bishops of Phenos in the subscriptions of the councils.

It is thought to be at Punon that Moses erected the brazen serpent, for the cure of the murmuring Israelites, who had been bit by the fiery serpents. Others believe this happened at the encampment of Zalmonah. Numbers xxi. 7.

[Phinon was a duke of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 41. 1 Chron. i. 52. but Phunon was a station of the Israelites in the desert, Numb. xxxiii. 42. which Jerom reckons among the cities of the princes of Edom: it might be named from Phinon as Schmidt conjectures, Geog. Bibl. p. 506.

It afforded copper, as Bochart thinks, Hieroz. P. ii. col. 427. and that it was called both Phunon and Phinon. Vide Reland, Pal. p. 50. Suidas says, in Phaunos, that Phaunos, son of Picus, first taught the manner of smelting metals: and this name appears to be closely allied to Phunon.]

PUR, פור Κληρος, lot.

PUR, or PHUR, or PURIM; i. e. lots. This was a solemn feast of the Jews, instituted in memory of the lots cast by Haman, the enemy of the Jews. Esther iii. 7. These lots were cast in the first month of the year, and gave the twelfth month of the same year, for the execution of Haman's design, to destroy all the Jews of Persia. Thus the superstition of Haman, in crediting these lots, caused his own ruin, and the preservation of the Jews; who had time to avert this blow, by means of Esther. In memory of this deliverance, the Jews instituted a feast, which they named Pur or Purim. [The Jews of Persia, in the first instance, whence it spread to others; but, there are Jews in distant countries, countries, who do not observe this festival.] See HAMAN, ESTHER, and MORDECAI.

The word Phur or Pur, is rather Persian than Hebrew. The feast of lots was celebrated among the Jews in Shushan on the 14th, and in other parts of the Persian empire on the 15th of Adar, which answers to our February. Esther ix. 18. 2 Mac. xv. 39. The Jews have mostly kept this feast down to our times, and these are the ceremonies they observe in it. On the eve of the feast, if it be a day on which they may fast, they keep a strict fast, in memory of that kept by Esther and Mordecai. If the day be a sabbath, or the eve of a sabbath, on which they never fast, instead of fasting on the 13th of Adar, they fast on the 11th.

On the eve of the feast, they give alms liberally to the poor, that these also may enjoy the feast of lots: And on the feast day they send a share of what they have at table, to those who need. On the evening of Adar 13, when the feast begins, they assemble in the synagogue, and light the lamps; and as soon as the stars begin to appear, they begin to read the book of Esther. They continue reading it throughout. There are five places in the text, wherein the reader raises his voice with all his might, and makes such a dreadful howling, as to frighten the women and children. When he comes to the place which mentions the names of the ten sons of Haman, he repeats them very quick without taking breath, to shew that these ten persons were destroyed in a moment. Every time the name of Haman is pronounced, the children with great fury strike the benches of the synagogue with mallets, or stones, and make lamentable cries. It is said that heretofore they used to bring into the synagogue a great stone, with the name Haman written on it, and all the while the book of Esther was reading, they struck it with other stones, till they had beat it to pieces.

After the reading is finished, they return home; where they make a meal rather of milk-meats than of flesh. The day following, early in the morning, they repair to the synagogue, where, after they have read that passage of Exodus, wherein is mentioned the war of Amalek, they again read the book of Esther, with the same ceremonies as before. After quitting the synagogue, they make good cheer at home, and pass the rest of the day in sports and dissolute mirth, the men dressing themselves in women's clothes, and the women in men's, contrary to the express prohibition. Deut. xxii. 5. And their doctors have decided on this point, that on this day they may drink wine until they cannot distinguish between—Cursed be Haman, and Cursed be Mordecai. Heretofore they used to erect a gibbet, and upon it to burn a man made of straw, which they called Haman. But it was thought they had an intention of insulting the Christians on the death of Christ; and therefore the emperors forbade them this practice, on penalty of forfeiting all their privileges. Cod. de Judæis et Calicol. l. Jud.

The feast of Purim, or lots, in the manner the Jews observe it, has much resemblance to the ancient Bacchanalia of the pagans. Pleasures, diversions, joy, good cheer, make, as it were, the very essence of it. The spirit of revenge which animated the Jews of Shushan against their enemies, has passed undiminished to their posterity; who abandon themselves to it without measure and without bounds. They allow the drinking of wine to excess, because, say they, it was by making king Ahasuerus drink, that Esther procured the deliverance of the Jews. They compel every one to be present at the synagogue, man, woman, child, and servant; because all shared in the deliverance, as all were exposed to the danger. On this day scholars make presents to their masters, heads of families to their domestics, the great to those of mean condition. In a word, the whole day is spent in joyfulness and feasting. As it is said in the book of Esther; "That they should make them days of feasting and joy, and of sending portions one to another, and gifts to the poor." Leo of Modena, Ceremonies of the Jews, page 3. cap. 10. Esth. ix. 22.

This festival continues two days, but only the first is kept with solemnity. During these two days they may work or do business; yet they refrain the first day, though they are not obliged to it. The second day they read no new lesson in the synagogue, and the feast is not so great; but they, however, shew marks of festivity.—When the year consists of thirteen months, and there are two Adars, (See ADAR, MONTH.) they celebrate the feast of lots twice; the grand Purim on the fourteenth of the first Adar, and the lesser Purim on the fourteenth of the second Adar. But this second feast has properly nothing but the name. Basnage, Hist. of the Jews, tom. 5. lib. vii. cap. 1.

On the eve of the festival they collect the half shekel formerly paid to the temple, and which at present they distribute among such as undertake a journey to Jerusalem, whither several repair out of devotion, and where they covet to be buried; believing that all Jews are to rendezvous there at the last judgment, and that they shall even pass thither through the bowels of the earth.

They read the text of Esther out of a roll of vellum, vellum, in the ancient form, written with a particular kind of ink. After they have unrolled the volume, they make three prayers, to thank God for calling them to this ceremony, for having delivered them, and for having continued their lives to the celebration of this festival. On this day the reader may sit down, whereas at other times he must stand up, while he reads the law. The reading of the book of Esther is concluded with curses against Haman and his wife Zerah, with blessings on Mordecai and Esther, and praises to God for having preserved his people. Rest is observed very religiously, especially the first day, and the Jews tell us, that a man having sown flax on this day, not one grain of it came up.

It was the emperor Theodosius II. who forbade the Jews to erect gibbets, to fix images upon them, which they called Haman, and afterwards to burn them; because it was not fit that in their festivals they should insult any point of the Christian religion, A. D. 408. Yet three years after, some Jews in the extravagance of their frolics, notwithstanding this express prohibition, fastened a young Christian to a gibbet instead of a Haman, whom they whipped so cruelly, that he died on the spot: in the city of Inmestar, in Chalcis and Syria. The Christians in the country took arms; and the Jews were punished.

PURGATORY. This word is not in Scripture, neither in the Old or New Testament.—Purgatory means that state of those souls, which having departed out of this life without expiating certain impurities that deserve not eternal damnation, or which not having undergone the punishments due to their sins, expiate them by such punishments as God inflicts on them, before they enjoy his presence.—[This tenet is a favorite in the Romish church: but at best is deduced from inferences, rather than founded on clear expressions of SS. The passages usually appealed to are, 2 Macc. xii. 43. the instance of Judas Maccabeus, who seems to offer sacrifices for his slain soldiers:—but this is clogged with difficulties: 1. He might offer these sacrifices as expiation for his army in general. 2. It cannot be said these soldiers died “godly,” as the text insinuates. 3. The whole is rejected from canonical Scripture.]

As to the New Testament, Christ says, there are certain sins that shall not be forgiven, neither in this world, nor in the world to come, Matt. xii. 32. Consequently, he allows, that some sins may be forgiven in the other world. [But this does not prove they will be expiated in the other world: which is the intent of purgatory; they may be forgiven; pronounced pardoned, but not by procuration of the party's sufferings.] St. Paul prays for Onesiphorus then departed, [This may be doubted: see ONESIPHORUS.] “The Lord grant unto him that he may find mercy of the Lord in that day.” But if prayers may be made for the dead, then there is a purgatory, and a state wherein they may be benefited by our prayers. [This is a very weak argument; the phrase “God bless him!” spoken of the dead, is quite as conclusive on the subject: and yet this is daily used in the East: “the memory of the just is blessed.” So among ourselves we recollect the memory of departed friends with affection and praise: and I believe nobody would scruple to pray for the mercy of God on any of his friends “in that day,” who yet would not think of inferring a purgatory from this expression.]

The Jews acknowledge a kind of purgatory, which continues for one year after the person is departed. During these first twelve months, the soul is at liberty to come upon earth, to visit its body, and to frequent those places and persons, to which it had a particular relation during life. They pray for the repose of the dead during this time, and are persuaded, that they administer much consolation to them by their prayers, that they procure rest for them, and pardon of their sins.

They call purgatory, “Abraham's bosom, the treasury of the living, the garden of Eden, and Upper Gehenna.” Hell they call the Lower Gehenna. They believe that all Israelites have a portion in the world to come, or the state of happiness, either immediately after death, or after they have atoned for their sins in purgatory. There are but a very small number of their nation, who are great profligates, that are for ever excluded out of heaven. As for the rest, they hold that they continue not above a year in purgatory. The Sabbath-day is a day of remission to the souls in purgatory: they do not burn on that day. The Jews offer up a great many prayers, and works of satisfaction, on the day of solemn expiation, for the comfort of such souls as are in the Upper Gehenna. Leo of Modena, Part v. cap. 10. Vindet. de Vita Functorum Statu. sect. 8, &c.

PURIFICATIONS. There were many kinds among the Hebrews, according to the several kinds of impurities contracted. See LEPROSY, DEAD BODIES, NAZARITES, &c. When a woman was delivered of a boy, she was esteemed impure during forty days, Lev. xii. During the first seven days she defiled all which she touched. After this she was impure thirty days, but not so as to hinder her from taking care of her household affairs: only from the use and participation participation of holy things. If she had a girl, she was judged unclean for sixty days; during the two first weeks of which she could not touch any thing without defiling it.

When the days of her purification were ended, she offered a lamb at the tabernacle, or temple, for a burnt-offering, and a young pigeon, or dove, for a sin-offering. If she was unable to offer a lamb, she gave two doves, one for a burnt-offering, the other for a sin-offering.

Though the Holy Virgin was not subject to the law that says, Mulier si suscepto semine pepererit masculum, &c. [Vide Origen, homil. 8. in Levit. Basil. in Isai. vii. 14. Chrysost. homil. in occurs. domini. Cyrill. Alex. lib. ii. de fide ad Reginas. Procop. Theophyl. ad Luc. ii. Bern. serm. purific.] yet she complied with it, Luke ii. 22. And to preserve the memory of this, the church has instituted the feast of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, commonly called Candlemas-Day, February 2. on which those of the church of Rome carry wax candles in their hands, to represent more sensibly the coming of Jesus Christ, whom Simeon in his Canticle, calls "the light of the Gentiles, and the glory of Israel." But those who have most examined into this matter think, that the true reason of these solemn processions was, to wear out the memory of the profane sacrifices of the Pagans in the month of February: Februa sacra were kept in honour of Pluto, to lustrate or purify men, fields, and cities; also, that the candles used in this solemnity were instead of the torches carried by the Pagans in the feasts of Lupercalia, celebrated on the fifteenth of February, in honour of Pan, wherein naked men ran through the streets with lighted torches, and committed a thousand insolencies.

This feast was instituted by the emperor Justinian, about the middle of the sixth century; and perhaps in some places sooner. He fixed it to February 2. and ordained its celebration uniformly throughout the empire. This was readily followed by places not under his dominion. They called this feast Hypapante, which in Greek signifies meeting, because when Jesus Christ came into the temple, Simeon and Anna may be said to have met him, and with him Joseph and Mary.

In the same feast is celebrated the memory of the presentation of Jesus Christ in the temple, as the first-born of Mary, in obedience to the law, Exod. xiii. 13. See FIRST-BORN.

The Jews that lived at too great a distance from the temple, and could not resort thither to purify themselves from certain defilements, which were unavoidable; such as pollution contracted at the burial of the dead, &c. made use of the ashes of the red heifer sacrificed for this purpose at Jerusalem; which were distributed to all Israelites at a distance. See RED HEIFER, Numb. xix. 5.

A man and woman who used the marriage-bed, were unclean until the evening; they washed their clothes, and purified themselves by bathing, Levit. xv. 16, 17. 18. A woman under her infirmities was unclean seven days; and whatever she touched was defiled, &c. Lev. xx. 18. The ancient Christians on many occasions looked on these infirmities of women as defilements. The Turkish women forbear to come to worship while this lasts. The Indian women do not come into their houses. Tournefort's Travels in the Levant, tom. i. p. 44.

Involuntary pollutions in sleep, were purified by bathing, Deut. xxiii. 10.

The Hebrews had an infinite number of other purifications. They did not so much as eat, or sit down to table, until after they had washed their hands, by pouring water from their fingers ends up to their elbows. When they returned into their houses, they used to wash their hands. They also purified their pots and cups, their beds, and whatever else they made use of, following the traditions of their elders.

PURITY; pure, and purity, are taken in Scripture, 1. For external purity; 2. For internal purity. [See HOLY, Add.]

External purity is either in respect of persons capable of partaking of holy things, and of performing the duties of civil life; in respect of animals pure by the law; or in respect of things. Clothes, houses, utensils, were capable of impurities which prevented their being used, but when purged from these impurities, they became clean, and might be used without scruple.

Things that were impure in their own nature, as carcases, animals that died of themselves; and such as were so by appointment of the law, could never become clean. But men or women rendered unclean by any transient inconveniency, might recover their usual purity, when these inconveniences were passed, or were expiated. In respect of clothes, houses, and goods; they were purified, by water, fire, or lustration. When persons had contracted impurities, it was necessary sometimes that they should offer certain sacrifices of expiation. But the most general method of purification was by the bath, or by washing of the whole body.

Internal purity consisted in innocence of life, in purity of the mind and heart, in justice, in the exact observation of the law of the Lord; the only way of recovering this purity when impaired, was conversion, detestation of sin, sorrow and compunction for it. These dispositions, accompanied accompanied by the sacrifices required by the law, in cases of negligence, inadvertency, or ignorance; or even of perverseness and malice; might obtain pardon, not by virtue of the external sacrifice, but by the faith, contrition, &c. of the offerer, and the mercy of God.

Moses is not very explicit on the means of recovering this internal purity, nor is he so minute and accurate on this, as on external purity; because, as a law-giver, his first and principal view was to restrain the hands of men, and to regulate the state of his commonwealth. Yet Moses, and the other sacred authors of the Old Testament, say enough to those who desire to understand, to prove how little they relied on outward purifications and sacrifices, in comparison to the inward affections of the heart, contrition, faith, and charity. St. Paul in his epistles, and particularly in that to the Hebrews, has admirably displayed this truth, telling us, that the sacrifices and ordinances of the old law were of no virtue in themselves, to heal the inward distempers of the soul, and to repair the outrages done to God by our sins.

In the new law, Christians are freed from the yoke of ceremonies and legal impurities; and esteem as real defilements, none but those of the soul. Their chief care is (i. e. ought to be) employed, in preserving inward purity and innocence of mind, and to recover these by repentance, whenever they have been injured by frailty. See REPENTANCE.

PURPLE, colour of, Hebrew, אַרְגָּמָן, Argaman; Greek, Πορφύρεος, Porphyreos; Latin, Purpura. The Greeks also used the word Ἀμόργη, Amorge, derived from the Hebrew Argaman. It is thought that the fine purple colour was first discovered by Hercules Tyrius, whose dog by chance having eaten a shell-fish called Murex, or Purpura, and returning to his master with his lips tinged with a purple colour, gave occasion to the discovery of this precious dye. But purple is much more ancient than Hercules, since we find it mentioned by Moses in several places; [except under the name of Hercules, the Tyrians meant some very ancient hero, whom the Greeks afterwards confounded with others.] The colour of purple was of a very deep red, soft and shining. Pliny compares it to the colour of a rose, approaching to black: Nigricantis rosæ colore sublucescens, lib. ix. cap. 36, or, of coagulated blood drawing towards black, the red of which has a soft kind of shining: Concreti sanguinis nigricans aspectu, idemque suspectu refulgens, lib. ix. cap. 38. Purple was of more sorts than one. One was deeper, inclining to violet, mingled with a little red, which was the ground of it: the other was of a deep red, but shining; another more faint, pretty near our scarlet. They pretended that the true purple should strike the sight mildly and agreeably, in a manner not so forcibly as the carbuncle. Aspectu leniter blandum, neque in oculos ut carbunculi vibrat, Plin. lib. ix. cap. 41.

Moses used much wool of a purple colour in the works of the tabernacle, and in the ornaments of the high-priest. Purple was the colour used by princes and great men, by way of distinction. Judges viii. 26. it is observed that they made Gideon a present of the purple habit, which had been worn by the kings of Midian. The spouse of the virtuous woman was clothed with silk and purple, Prov. xxxi. 22. The wicked rich man of the gospel, was clothed in purple and fine linen, Luke xvi. 19. We see by Jeremiah and Baruch, that the Babylonians clothed their idols in habits of a purple and azure colour, Jer. x. 9. Baruch, vi. 12, 71.—When Daniel had explained the writing that God caused to appear to Belshazzar, while at his impious feast in Babylon; he (Daniel) was clothed in purple, and adorned with a chain of gold, Dan. v. 7. Alexander Balas, king of Syria, sent to Jonathan Maccabeus, a crown of gold, and a habit of purple, allowing him to take the title of the king's friend. 1 Macc. x. 20. Lastly, to make the royalty of our Saviour ridiculous and contemptible, they clothed him with [an old] purple robe at the time of his passion, Mark xv. 17. Matt. xxvii. 28.

PUTEOLI, the wells: now Pozzolo, a city in the Campania of Naples, eight miles from that city: a colony. Here St. Paul abode seven days, Acts xxviii. 13.

PUTIEL, פֻּטִּיֵּאל, God is my fatness; from פֹּחַד phut, and אֵל el, God. This etymology is very uncertain, for this name is not Hebrew.

PUTIEL, or PHUTIEL, grandfather of the high-priest Phineas. Exod. vi. 25.

PYGARGUS, Gr. Πύγαργος. This word signifies white-rump. This name is given to a kind of eagle with a white tail. In Moses, it signifies a four-footed animal, called פִּיגָרְגוֹס, dishon, q. d. ash-coloured; LXX. Πύγαργος. The tragelaphus has a part of its back ash-coloured; and Bellon, Obser. lib. ii. cap. 51. under this name, tragelaphus, describes an animal with ash-coloured spots, or streaks, on its sides. Plin. lib. viii. cap. 53. speaks of a kind of roe-buck called pygargus. Herodotus, Ælian, and Juvenal, mention it also. See Bochart, Animal. sacr. P. 2. lib. iii. cap. 20. Probably this is what the Septuagint and Vulgate mean by pygargus.

PYGMIES, פִּיגְמִיִּים, Gamadim. Ezek. xlvii. 11. Cubit high; from גָּמַד gamad, a cubit.

LXX.

LXX. Φύλακες, stout men, or guards; from the Greek πυγμή, who fights with the fist: or rather from πῦχυς, a cubit; or πυγμή, the measure from the elbow to the end of the hand.

PYGMIES. Mention is made of pygmies in the Latin translation of Ezekiel, xxvii. 11. Theodot. Sym. καὶ Μῆδοι, et Medi. Pygmies were extremely little men, and these were at continual war with the cranes, from which they had much ado to defend themselves. But it is believed, that these people never existed, but in the imagination and writings of the poets. The Hebrew word gamadim, has some relation to pymai, since literally it may signify men of the stature of a cubit. But what should pygmies do upon the walls of Tyre, in order to defend them? for there they are placed by Ezekiel, as being good warriors. The LXX. have rendered gamadim by guards, as if they had read somerim. Symmachus has rendered it by the Medes; as if he had read gam mudai—and the Medes. The Chaldee makes it the Cappadocians. By a slight alteration, one might read gomarim instead of gamadim. The gomarim are well known in Gen. x. 4. among the children of Japheth; and in Ezek. xxxviii. 6. where he mentions them as a very warlike people. Pliny, lib. ii. cap. 91. speaks of a city of Phenicia called Gemade; unless there is some fault in the text, and instead of gamade should be read gamale. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCCXXII. on “Isaiah, chap. xviii.”

Quorum tota cohors cubito non altior uno.

PYRAMIDS. The pyramids of Egypt are well known, by descriptions both ancient and modern. It is thought they were intended for tombs for the ancient kings of Egypt. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. DXLI. et seq. and PLATES, EGYPT, PYRAMIDS.

PYRRHUS, Πύρρος, ruddy, or red: from πύρρος. Father of Sopator, of the city of Berræa, in Macedonia. Acts xx. 4.

PYTHON. The Grecians surnamed Apollo, Pythius, because he killed the serpent Python, Ovid, Met. lib. i. v. 441. and, as Apollo was regarded as the god of divination and of oracles, those who were supposed to have the gift of foretelling future events, were said to be filled with the spirit of Python. The LXX. and Vulgate often use this expression, to signify fortune tellers, magicians, ventriloquists, such as spoke out of their bellies. Among all these people were much knavery, imagination, and often diabolical operations. Under penalty of death God forbade his people from consulting this kind of wizards. Deut. xviii. 11. Levit. xx. 6. Saul had destroyed them, throughout the land of Israel, yet afterwards was weak enough to have recourse to a sorceress. 1 Sam. xxviii. 7. &c. Moses ordered those to be stoned, who were possessed by the spirit of Python, or had a familiar spirit. Lev. xx. 27. The kings of Judah which forsook the Lord, such as Manasseh, increased the number of wizards, 2 Kings xxi. 6. and the pious kings, such as Josiah, rooted them out of their country. 2 Kings xxiii. 24. St. Paul, in the city of Philippi, in Macedonia, was teased by a servant-maid that was possessed by a spirit of Python; who brought great gain to her masters by fortune-telling: he drove out this evil spirit, and delivered the maid from it; which so provoked her masters, that they raised a tumult against him. Acts xvi. 16.

The Hebrew Ob or Oboth, which the Vulgate translates Python, signifies also a bottle of leather, wherein liquor was kept. Perhaps this name was given to wizards, because when they were under their fits of enthusiasm, they swelled as big as a bottle, [Vide FRAGMENTS, No. LVIII.] and their words proceeded, as it were, from the bottom of their stomach; whence the Latins called them ventriloqui, and the Greeks, engastrimythoi; i. e. people that speak out of their bellies. Isaiah, xxix. 4, says that Jerusalem being afflicted and brought low, shall speak as it were out of the hollow of the earth, as a Pythoress. She shall groan, and bring out her words, as from the bottom of a cave.

[The Pythia at Delphi was the most famous of these oracular priestesses: the temple stood on a rock, up a crevice of which a vapour rose, that was supposed to be impregnated with a prophetic virtue, the immediate gift of Apollo.

At first there was only one Pythia at Delphi, afterwards, as the oracle became popular, three were appointed. They were mostly poor girls, virtuous, but without education, or experience, and of very limited understanding. The Pythia was usually very reluctant to her office, melancholy and dejected: as she advanced she chewed laurel; she also wore a crown of laurel; and if she were already too fatigued, or refused her duty, the attendant priests had recourse to menaces, and even to violence. They seated her on the tripod, where a powerful vapour ascending the interior of her garments, and acting on her person, threw her into the most violent convulsions: her whole frame swelled; her bosom heaved; her countenance changed; her limbs were agitated with involuntary startings, she uttered the most plaintive cries, and deep groans: at length, with eyes sparkling, foaming at the mouth, and shivering, she howled out a few words, words, which were eagerly collected by the priests, and arranged by the prophet. [See PROPHET.] Many young females died in consequence of their sufferings: none were long lived; as nature could not support such violence: which were, no doubt, either wholly produced, or greatly augmented, by art: probably, by medicated liquors previously administered; in which state, the vapours, impregnated with active gases, and directed to an extremely sensible part of the body, produced hysterical fits, and convulsions, by excessive irritation of the nervous system. Comp. ORACLE.]

THE PYTHONESS OF ENDOR.

[This subject, by its singularity, is one of those which have occasioned the most considerable opposition of opinions among the learned. Those who maintain that Samuel himself appeared on this occasion, have undoubtedly the prima facie evidence of the present Hebrew text in their favour: nevertheless, those who consider the transaction as a mere juggling trick, have many arguments which are extremely difficult to be answered.

We observe, 1st, that the woman says, "Saul had slain the aubuth, pythonesses; and the jadioni, knowing ones:" yet Saul directs his servants to find him boluth Aub, a mistress of Aub. This title, possibly, means a person of superior talents, mistress in her art.—She lived, it seems, at Oin Dur, "the fountain of the circle,"—magical circle, I suppose; that figure being constantly affected by these soi disant magicians.

Observe, 2nd, that Saul at his best estate, was hypochondriac, and nearly out of his wits; but in his present distressed circumstances, the disease seems to have recurred upon him with peculiar rigour. 3rd, That he was by head and shoulders, the tallest man in his kingdom, so that however he might change his dress, he could not effectually disguise his person: that he took with him two inferior men (anushim), who would naturally treat him with considerable respect.

It is likely, that this mistress of Aub, had suspended her practices for some time, during Saul's persecutions; but, being now requested to resume them, she would naturally expect a considerable present, and would endeavour to sift out of the applicants, who their principal was. Add to this the easy distance of Gilboa from Endor. These circumstances render every way credible the opinion, that this woman knew Saul, but reserved the discovery of her knowledge to the point of time most favourable to herself. If the woman only suspected before, she would naturally be convinced of the dignity of her guest, when he wished the very Samuel, the prophet, the magistrate of Israel, to be brought up from the regions of the dead. What could a merely private individual want with that illustrious prophet, magistrate, and governor; who was in every sense of the word, a public person? And here we ought to remark, the distinction made, Deut. xviii. 11. between the pythonesses, mistresses of Aub, and the doresh al hemuthim, seekers to the dead. ———

It is probable, this woman stipulated to be employed in the former capacity; but she might not expect to be called on to exercise the latter. However, being mistress of her art, she undertakes this also; but her previous enquiry whom she was to raise, gives her an opportunity of adjusting her operations, with the greatest effect in her power.

Observe, how she leads Saul to expect the ascent of Samuel, i. e. from the earth; which agrees with what the prophet Isaiah says of these gentry, they chatter, and mutter out of the dust; that being most convenient for their deceptions. * Further, the woman seeing the Samuel, [as the keri]: now, this word, seeing, does not always mean actual vision; for we read, Exod. xxxii. 1. that "the people saw that Moses delayed to come down from the mount;"—whereas this was no subject of sight; et al. In like manner, this woman affected to see Samuel; but Saul did not see Samuel, for he asks her (2) hitherto—in so much—in so far as thou hast yet seen what hast thou seen? The spectre being supposed to be just now rising out of the earth, and only his upper part visible. The woman answered, I see (Aleim,) a dignitary, rising from the earth: Saul enquires, what is his appearance? she says, (Aish), a chief, an old man, i. e. an old chief, rises, and he is clothed with a MOIL:"—this moil was "the upper, and outer, vest; that which clothed from the shoulders downwards, to the thighs, or knees." [Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCXXX.] This moil Saul had ample cause to remember; for it had rent in his hands, when he endeavoured to detain Samuel formerly, 1 Sam. xv. 27. This moil, also, was officially worn by dignitaries: as David in regal procession, 1 Chron. xv. 27. It should even seem to be appropriate to persons of rank, from 2 Sam. xiii. 18. "the king's daughters wore such moilim." The woman expressly says, he was muffled up—wrapped, in this mantle: so that she did not even affect to see his face; and thereby avoided to describe his countenance, or features. She merely says, his dress is like that of a man of consequence.—Now Samuel was a person so well known, that a child would have attributed to him the proper age, that at which he died, dignity of person, and and dignity of dress, such as became the post he had occupied. And here we trace deception. Was this the real spirit of Samuel? wherefore was it so characteristically clad, in reference to stations it had occupied on earth? was it his body? no: for that was buried at a distance: and his dress of office, if buried with it, was equally distant from Endor; and, probably, decayed long ago. But the woman describes him according to his public character and station.—And Saul being informed, that this personage wore the moil, the dress of office, is persuaded that it was Samuel. And Saul knew from this description, that it was the true Samuel; and yet he had not seen this spectre, nor had its features been described to him; nor had it risen out of the earth, beyond head and shoulders; and those were muffled closely in a mantle.

It appears clearly, that Saul was at some distance from the scene of this incantation; that he knew nothing but through the medium of the woman; and the woman cried with a loud voice, as well by reason of her distance from Saul, as to make the greater impression on him.

There is nothing in this procedure beyond the reach of very moderate art; to have described Samuel otherwise than he is described, would have been folly; to have introduced him to Saul personally, might have been more convincing, but no such thing takes place. Directly as Saul is persuaded that it is Samuel, he stooped his face to the ground, and bowed himself. [See PLATE of ATTITUDES, Fig. C. E.] so, that he did not attempt to see any personage, but prostrated himself on the ground; and along this ground came the voice to him, which maintained the conversation with him; “muttering out of the dust.” On the whole, I do not see the necessity even of ventriloquism in this history: the time of night implies all the conveniences of darkness; the distance of Saul from the actual scene of incantation, the imperfect description of the person of Samuel, the passing of the voice along the ground, all afford so many means of deception, that I think ventriloquism may be dispensed with. Nevertheless, it is proper we should notice this remarkable faculty, which is possessed by some persons. It has been publicly exhibited at London; and I know a gentleman, who, when at school, was one of many, who heard a performance of the kind exhibited, by express desire of the tutor, in order to guard his pupils against similar deceptions in subsequent stages of life. This operator had the power of making his voice seem to come from above, as well as from below, from any part, or corner of the room; but he always took care to lead, by a dexterous insinuation, the ears of his auditors, to suppose he was, where he wished them to believe they heard him at.

The following information is selected from Chambers's Dictionary.

“We had a person formerly in London, a smith by profession, who had the faculty in such perfection, that he could make his voice appear, now, as if it came out of the cellar, and the next minute, as if in an upper room; and nobody present could perceive that he spoke at all.—Accordingly, he has frequently called a person first up, then down stairs; then out of doors, then this way, then that; and all this without stirring from his seat, or appearing to speak at all.

We cannot forbear making a few extracts on this subject from a work, published in 1772, entitled, Le Ventriloque, &c. The Ventriloquist, by M. de la Chapelle, censor royal at Paris, member of the academies at Lyons and Rouen, and F. R. S. Some faint traces of the art or faculty of ventriloquism are to be found in the writings of the ancients; but many more are to be discovered there, if we adopt this author's opinion, that the responses of many of the ancient oracles were actually delivered by persons possessing this quality, so very capable of being applied to the purposes of priestcraft and delusion. The abbé de la Chapelle having heard many very surprising circumstances related concerning one M. St. Gille, a grocer at St. Germain-en-Laye, near Paris, whose power as a ventriloquist had given occasion to many singular and diverting scenes, formed the resolution of seeing him. Being seated with him on the opposite side of a fire in a parlour on the ground floor, and very attentively observing him, the abbé after half an hour's conversation with M. St. Gille, heard himself called, on a sudden, by his name and title, in a voice that seemed to come from the roof of a house at a distance; and while he was pointing to the house from which the voice had appeared to proceed, he was yet more surprised by hearing the words, “it was not from that quarter,” apparently in the same kind of voice as before, but which now seemed to issue from under the earth, at one of the corners of the room. In short, this factitious voice played, as it were, every where about him, and seemed to proceed from any quarter, or distance, from which the operator chose to transmit it to him. To the abbé, though conscious that the voice proceeded from the mouth of M. St. Gille, he appeared absolutely mute, while he was exercising this talent; nor could any change in his countenance be discovered. He observed, however, that M. St. Gille presented only the the profile of his face to him, while he was speaking as a ventriloquist.

The abbé de la Chapelle takes occasion to account for all the circumstances attending Saul's conference with the WITCH of Endor, and endeavours to shew that the speech, supposed to be addressed to Saul by the ghost of Samuel, actually proceeded from the mouth of the reputed sorceress, whom he supposes to have been a capital ventriloquist,

He afterwards brings many instances to prove, that the ancient oracles principally supported their credit, and derived their influence, from the exercise of this particular art. Many other learned men have given the same account of the witch of Endor.

The art, according to this author, does not depend on a particular structure or organization of these parts, peculiar to a few individuals, and very rarely occurring, but may be acquired by almost any ardently desirous of attaining it, and determined to persevere in repeated trials. The judgment we form concerning the situation and distance of bodies, by means of the senses mutually assisting and correcting each other, seems to be entirely founded on experience, (see Reid's Inquiry into the Human Mind, p. 70, edit. 2.); and we pass from the sign to the thing signified by it immediately, or at least without any intermediate steps perceptible to ourselves. Hence it follows, that if a man, though in the same room with another, can, by any peculiar modification of the organs of speech, produce a sound, which in faintness, tone, body, and every other sensible quality, perfectly resembles a sound delivered from the roof of an opposite house, the ear will naturally, without examination, refer it to that situation and distance; the sound which the person hears being only a sign, which from infancy he has been accustomed, by experience, to associate with the idea of a person speaking from a house top. A deception of this kind is practised with success on the organ and other musical instruments, and there are many similar optical deceptions." So far from Chambers.

The art of ventriloquism, was well known in antiquity. Josephus calls this woman of Endor, expressly, "Engastrimytha, ventriloquist, a speaker from the belly, who made a trade of evocating the souls of the dead, and foretelling future events by their means," Ant. lib. vi. c. 15.

It is remarkable, that Saul receives no real information from the supposed Samuel: for, that David was to receive the kingdom, was publicly known—that the Philistines would overcome Israel [David was absent], was extremely probable—that before long (for the word rendered to-morrow, does not necessarily signify the next day.) Saul and his sons should enter the state of the dead, was certain, according to the course of nature, to a man of seventy years of age.

Observe the fallacies of this supposed information: "the Lord shall give Israel—the whole nation of Israel, WITH THREE into the hand (as captives, as subjects) of the Philistines;" whereas, Saul was succeeded in part of the government, by his son Ishbosheth, and by David in the other part; nor, did he, himself, fall into the hands of the Philistines as a captive, but avoided captivity by preferring death. If we take the word rendered to-morrow, strictly, it is false that the sons of Saul, were the next day in the state of the dead. Ishbosheth and Armoni, sons of Saul, remained; also Mephibosheth, his grandson, long after: and moreover, notwithstanding the especially [] of the predictor, that the "host of Israel should be delivered into the hands of the Philistines," many escaped. It is proper to notice these falsities, because, they concur in proving that the mistress of Aub could not correctly see into futurity; but her inferences and guesses were fallible, as well as fraudulent.

That this woman was no ordinary witch, but a person of consequence, appears from her having "a fat calf in her house," and her making good cheer, to revive her guest, after the effect her incantations had had on him. Now, such a person was, no doubt, well informed on public matters; and it is by no means impossible, that she had intelligence from the officers in Saul's army, of a disposition among the people, which led her to estimate their loyalty to their present king, at much less than their expectations from another. The event proved, that though Saul and his family did their duty as brave soldiers and officers, yet, that the host of Israel preferred safety by flight, to honourable death in the ranks.]

[As the Editor has expressed his dissent from Father CALMET, on this subject, in the Article SAMUEL, it is but reasonable that some of the arguments in support of that dissent, should be stated, as in the present Article.]

QUADRATUS. Numidius, or Caius Umidius Durmius Quadratus, was governor of Judea A. D. 51. In A. D. 52 he suppressed the troubles in Judea, by putting to death such Samaritans and Jews as had taken arms against the Romans. He sent Cumanus to Rome, with a tribune called Celer, to give account of their conduct to the emperor Claudius: also Jonathan son of Annas, Ananias the high-priest, and Ananus son of Annas; they were in chains, as being principal authors of the sedition. Quadratus's successor was Corbulo, whom Nero sent A. D. 60, after the death of Quadratus. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 5. De Bello, lib. ii. cap. 21. p. 795.

II. QUADRATUS, an apologist for the Christian religion. Euseb. Chronic. An. 127. Hist. lib. iii. cap. 37. He had been instructed by the apostles, was a prophet, and full of the Holy Ghost. Many modern interpreters suppose him to be the angel of the church at Philadelphia, whom Jesus Christ addresses Rev. iii. 7, 8, 9. But it is not easy to reconcile that opinion with the chronology and history of this holy man. Eusebius says, he was already famous in the church, in the time of Trajan. He was of the number of those apostolical men, who, following the zeal of their masters, built up the church; and sowed every where the seed of the word. They began by distributing their substance to the poor, and then went from province to province, preaching Jesus Christ to them who had not heard of him. Their preaching was generally attended with miracles.

Quadratus is the first who composed an Apology for the Christian religion: which he presented, himself, to the emperor Adrian, A. D. 126, according to the Chronicon of Eusebius. Jerom, de Vir. illust. calls this Apology a very useful work, full of strong reasoning, replenished with the life of faith, and worthy a disciple of the apostles. This piece had power enough to abate the persecution then raised against the church. We have only a few fragments of it. Jerom, Ep. 84. and the Latin martyrologies, suppose Quadratus was bishop of Athens, under Marcus Aurelius, and suffered martyrdom in the persecution of those times. Others think Quadratus, bishop of Athens, was very different from the Apologist. See M. de Tillemont, tom. ii. Persecution under Adrian, art. vii. note 7.

QUAILS. God gave quails to his people in the wilderness, on two occasions. First, in the wilderness of Sin, or Zin, a few days after they had passed the Red Sea. Exod. xvi. 1—23. A second time, at Kibroth-hataawah, or the graves of lust. Numb. xi. 32. Psal. cv. 40. Both of these happened in the spring, when quails pass from Asia into Europe. Then they are found in great quantities on the coasts of the Red Sea and the Mediterranean. God, by a wind, drove them within, and about, the camp of Israel; and in this the miracle consists: that they were brought so seasonably to this place, and in so great numbers, as to suffice above a million of persons longer than a month. Exod. xvi. 13. The Hebrew shalav, שליו, Chald. סלין Selan. Syriac, סלין Salvai. Arabic, سلى Salva. LXX. ὀπρωγομήραν, Coturnix, signifies a quail, by the agreement of the ancient interpreters. The Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic call them nearly by the same name. Yet M. Ludolf, in his Ethiopic History, lib. i. cap. 13. sec. 96. takes great pains to shew, that Moses did not mean quails, but locusts.

The following are his reasons: He observes, that selav may derive from a root that signifies abundance; which agrees better with locusts than quails. He owns, that the Oriental versions explain it by quails; but he maintains, that they did not truly understand the text. Porphyry, de Abstin. lib. i. cap. 55. observes, that an army in Africa, ready to perish by famine, was seasonably relieved by a cloud of locusts, on which they fed. Ludolf conjectures, that a like event satisfied the desires of the Israelites in the deserts of Arabia. There is an almost incredible number of locusts in the East; the people of Arabia live on the locusts brought by the wind; they lay them on heaps, preserve them in salt, eat of them gladly, and serve them up even at kings' tables. They are of an excellent taste, very wholesome, and nourishing. [But comp. LOCUSTS.]

Sometimes locusts fly in the air in such vast quantities, as to darken the sun, and to cover the harvesters as with a cloud of ill omen. Pliny, lib. x. cap. 23. And when they descend on a country, country, they leave nothing untouched; they gnaw, devour, and blast every thing. Whole nations have been compelled to forsake their habitations, to avoid these troublesome insects.

Ludolf shews, that the account of Moses is favourable to this opinion. First; locusts are good to eat, and are expressly allowed by the law. Secondly; the wind brought the creatures mentioned by that law-giver, into the camp: this agrees much better to locusts than to quails. Thirdly; they were scattered over the field, and covered the ground, a day's journey; to the depth of a cubit; they were gathered up on heaps; they filled ten omers with them. These expressions are very difficult to reconcile, on the common supposition of quails, but may be naturally understood of locusts. Fourthly; they were spread all round the camp; or, according to the Vulgate, Numb. xi. 32. they dried them all round the camp: which cannot be understood of quails; for they would soon have been full of worms, had they been thus exposed.

But what overthrows all these conjectures, is, first, the consent of the languages, and oriental versions, which have understood quails by the name of selav. The LXX. Josephus, and all commentators ancient and modern, understand it so. Besides, the Hebrews asked Moses for flesh, being disgusted with manna; and would they have been contented with locusts?

Mahomet, in the Koran, speaking of the miracle in favour of the Israelites, uses the same word with Moses. [Moses says selav, and Mahomet says salva.] One of his interpreters, Houssain Vaez, Bibl. Orient. p. 749, says, that the word salva does not only signify quails, but also honey. Another interpreter says, that the word salva is usually explained by sumani, which is a word more in use among the Arabians, to signify a quail; which the Persians also call se-marrah. However, adds he, this is a bird peculiar to Arabia Felix, larger than a sparrow, but smaller than a pigeon, a bird which has neither sinews, bones, nor veins, and of which the flesh is very agreeable. He says, besides, that the wind which God sent was so violent, that it broke the wings of those birds, and made them fall like a very thick cloud into the camp of the Israelites, who took them with their hands, and ate them with the manna. What they tell us of this bird, that it has neither bones, veins, or sinews, must be understood as an hyperbole, to express its being very fat and tender, something like our fig-peckers, ortolans, and red-breasts.

QUARREL. Solomon compares him, who, going along the streets, meddles with the quarrels of people unknown, to one that will take a dog by the ears, and so rashly exposes himself to be bit. This is what we may see any day, in public quarrels. Those who endeavour to mediate peace among persons engaged in a controversy, instead of reconciling them, do but provoke them, and irritate them still more, and often meet with anger on both sides, for intermeddling. But it should not be concluded from hence, that we ought never to endeavour to reconcile neighbours; yet it must be attempted with much prudence, caution, and charity, for fear of increasing the evil we undertake to appease.

QUARTODECIMANS. This name was given to certain heretics, who kept Easter-day always on the fourteenth day of the moon, on whatsoever day it happened: whereas most of the churches kept it on the Sunday following the fourteenth day of the moon. The Quartodecimans were a branch of the Montanists and Quintilians, according to Epiphanius, Hæres. 50. c. 1. Yet they were not properly treated as heretics, until after the council of Nice, which ordained, that all the churches should keep Easter-day on the Sunday that followed the fourteenth day of the moon. Concil. Nic. can. 21. Arab.

QUARTUS, a disciple of the apostles, mentioned by St. Paul, Rom. xvi. 23. The Greeks keep his feast November 10, and say he was one of the seventy disciples, and bishop of Berytus. The Latins, as Usuard, Ado, &c. place his feast November 3.

QUEEN of heaven: this name the Hebrew idolaters gave to the Moon. Jeremiah, vii. 17, &c. says, "The children gather wood, and the fathers kindle the fire, and the women knead their dough to make cakes to the queen of heaven." And chap. xlv. 16, 17, 18. the disobedient Israelites tell the same prophet; "We will certainly do whatsoever thing goeth out of our own mouth, to burn incense unto the queen of heaven.—For since we left off to burn incense to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink-offerings unto her, we have wanted all things, and have been consumed by the sword and by famine." We think it to be the Meni of Isaiah, lxv. 11. "But ye are they that prepare a table for that troop, and that furnish the drink-offering unto that number." The Hebrew says, table for Gad, and drink-offering to Meni. See MENI. We take all these to be the moon, Astarte, Trivia, Hecate, Diana, the heavenly Venus, Isis, according to different superstitions. They placed altars to her on the platforms or roofs of their houses, at the corners of the streets, near their doors, and in groves. They offered cakes to her, kneaded with oil or honey, and made libations to her, with wine and other liquors. The

Rabbins think they printed on these cakes the resemblance of a star, or half-moon. [Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DIII.]

QUESTION. Quæstio. This word is often put for dispute, difficulty, suit at law. Si quid natum fuerit quæstionis, if any difficulty should arise, Exod. xxv. 14. St. Paul advises Timothy and Titus, to avoid vain questions, or useless disputes, which are only concerning genealogies, and the sense of the law, because this kind of question is more apt to give offence than to edify. The Wise man says, that he knew God created man upright; but that he has perplexed himself with a thousand questions, and incumbered himself with a thousand tiresome and intricate disputes. Eccles. vii. 30.

QUESTION, or punishment. It was customary among the Romans, to put criminals to the question, by whipping them, not with rods, but with thongs, or scourges. Some think, that the offender was stripped to his waist, and that his hands were tied to a pillar, that his back might be stretched out to receive the blows. Others affirm, that his hands were fastened to a stake driven into the ground, of a foot and a half, or two feet high; so that the criminal stooping with his face towards the ground, might present his naked back to the soldiers. Lastly, others are of opinion, that the soldiers tied him neck and heels, and held him stretched out upon the ground, while other soldiers beat him all over his body. This way of whipping is still common among the Orientals. See the PLATE, SLAVES IN THE EAST. Fig. N.

When St. Paul addressed the people at Jerusalem, and related the manner of his conversion, they listened to him very attentively till he came to that part of his discourse, wherein he told them that God had sent him to preach to the Gentiles; then they raised their voices, and cried out, that he was not fit to live, and were going to put him to death. Lysias the tribune, commanded that he should be put to the question; but whilst they were binding him, Paul asked the centurion there present, Is it lawful for you to scourge a Roman citizen, he being uncondemned? The centurion acquainted the tribune with it, who presently came to Paul, and enquired particulars; then those who were to put him to the question retired, and Lysias caused him to be unbound. Acts xxii. 21.

QUINTILIUS VARUS. It is not positively known whether Quintilius Varus were governor of Syria the year of our Saviour's birth; however, this is the general opinion. See M. de Tillemont, on J. C. tom. i. p. 447. note 4.—He governed with great wisdom and moderation, to the time of the banishment of Archelaus, in the sixth year of Christ. He succeeded Saturninus in the government of Syria, and was succeeded by Quirinius or Cyrenius. Varus presided in the assembly in which Antipater, son of Herod, was judged. He supported the interests of Archelaus, another of Herod's sons, before Augustus, to procure him the kingdom of Judea. He afterwards appeased the troubles raised in Judea, by the avarice of Sabinus.—Being recalled from his government of Syria, he and his whole army perished in Germany, in the ninth year of Jesus Christ. Augustus tore his clothes at this news, and let his beard and hair grow for several months; so much he laid this loss to heart. Vell. Paterc. lib. ii. cap. 117.

QUIRINIUS. See CYRENIUS.

QUOTIDIAN. "Give us this day our daily bread," our quotidian bread,—or every day's bread. The Latin of St. Luke reads, panem nostrum quotidianum. But that of St. Matthew has, panem nostrum supersubstantialem da nobis hodie. The Greek ἐπιούσιος, epiousios, used by the evangelists, may signify either supersubstantialis, or sufficiens, or futurus, crastinus. Jerom observes, that the Hebrew gospel of the Nazarenes, had machus, which signifies the next day, or the future. Give us our bread, or food, necessary to sustain us to-morrow, or for the time to come: We have recourse to thy providence for our support for the time to come. Theophylact and Suidas, say, give us our sufficient bread, the nourishment we need. Epiousios in this place, is opposed to περιούσιος, periousios, superfluous. Those who contend for the reading supersubstantialem, maintain, that in this prayer Christians do not ask of God the nourishment of the body, but that of the soul, the knowledge of the will of God, his word, his grace, the holy eucharist: whatever contributes to spiritual invigoration and support.

RAAMAH, רַעְמָה, Paymà, greatness, thunder : from רָעַם raham : otherwise, some sort of evil, or bruising, or company ; from רוּעַ ruah, evil, &c. or רָעָה rahah, or rohe, society ; and the adverb מָה mah ; some sort.

I. RAAMAH, רַעְמָה, or REGMA, fourth son of Cush ; he peopled a country of Arabia, whence were brought to Tyre, spices, precious stones, and gold. We think this country to have been in Arabia Felix, at the entrance of the Persian gulph. Gen. x. 7. Ezek. xxvii. 22.

[Niebuhr places Rema, in N. lat. 15½. not far from Sanaa, south ; which corroborates the conjecture that here we may place Raamah.]

RAAMIAH, רַעְמִיָּה, Ρεεμιαί, thunder of the Lord ; from רָעַם raham, thunder, and יָהּ jah, the Lord. [Stroke of the Lord?]

RAAMAH, or Raamiah ; returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel. Neh. vii. 7.

RAAMSES, רַעַמְסֵס, thunder ; from רָעַם raham : otherwise, reproach of the moth : from הָאֵם, to reproach, and סַס sas, a moth : otherwise, he that destroys or dissolves evil ; from מַסַּס masas, to dissolve, and רוּעַ ruah, evil. This word is not Hebrew.

[It has been derived from the Egyptian, as if compounded of RE, the sun, and messes, a district or hamlet, whence Heliopolis, or city of the sun ; which some have supposed to be the same place. But see a very different derivation, in FRAGMENTS, No. DCLI.]

VOL. II. PART XXIV, Edit. IV.

RAAMSES, or RAMESSES, a city built by the Hebrews, during their servitude in Egypt, and which probably took its name from a king of Egypt. Gen. xlvii. 11. Exod. i. 11. Its situation is not known. Herodotus speaks of Papremisus, in Lower Egypt, and Pliny joins the Ramisians and Patamians ; which are probably the inhabitants of Raamses and Pithom. He joins them to the Arabians bordering on Egypt. Herodot. lib. ii. cap. 59, 71, 165. Pliny, lib. vi. cap. 27.

RAB, רַב, great. [multitude, or magnitude.]

RAB, RABBIN, RABBAN, RABBAM ; a name of dignity among the Hebrews, given to masters and doctors, to chiefs of classes, and to principal officers of the court of a prince : e. gr. Nebuzaradan, general of the army of king Nebuchadnezzar, is always called Rab Tabachim, רַב טַבַּחִים, Magister Laniorum, master of the butchers, cooks, or guards. 2 Kings xxv. 8, 20. et passim. Jer. xxxix. 9, 10, et passim. Esther i. 8. says, that Ahasuerus appointed a Rab of his court over every table of his guests, to take care that nothing should be wanting, Daniel, i. 3. speaks of Ashpenaz רַב סַרִּיסִים Rab Sarisim, i. e. Rab of the eunuchs of Nebuchadnezzar, and of the Rab of the Saganim, or chief of the governors, or peers, chap. ii. 48. This prophet himself was preferred to be chief interpreter of dreams, or Rab of the Chartumim. Dan. v. 11. It appears that this name came originally from the Chaldees ; for before the captivity, when mention is made of Judea, we find it used only in reference to the officers of the king of Babylon.

Rab, or Rabban, properly signifies master, or one who excels in any thing ; Rabbi or Rabbani, is my master. Rabbin is the plural. Thus Rab is of greater dignity than Rabbi, and Rabbin or Rabbim, is of greater dignity than Rab or Rabbi.

There were several gradations among the Jews before the dignity of Rabbi, as among us, before the degree of doctor. The head of a school, was called Cacham, or wise ; he who aspired to the doctorship, had the name of Bachur, or Elou ; he frequented the school of the Chacham. When farther advanced, he had the title of Cabar of the Rab, or master's companion. Lastly, when perfectly skilled in the knowledge of the law and traditions, he was called only Rab or Rabin, and Morena, our master.

Leo of Modena, says, Cerem. Jud. P. ii. cap. 3. that among the Jews it was a kind of shame, a presumptuous piece of vanity, to be known to seek the doctorship. There was no examination for it ; but when a man was found to have studied the oral law, he was saluted by the public voice with the title of Cacham ; or wise. At least such is the custom among the eastern Jews ; whereas in Germany and Italy, he receives this title from the most ancient of the Rabbin, who either by word of mouth, or writing, declares him Cabar of the Rab, companion of the Rab ; or Morena, master.

The Cacham Rab, or master Rabbi, decides differences, determines things allowed or forbidden, and judges in religious, and even in civil controversies. He celebrates marriages, and declares divorces. He preaches, if he has a talent for it ; and is head of the academies. He has the first seat in the assemblies, and in the synagogues. He reprimands the disobedient, and can excommunicate them ; which procures him great respect.

In their schools they sat on raised chairs, and their scholars were seated at their feet. Hence, Acts xxii. 3. St. Paul is said to have studied at the feet of Rabbi Gamaliel. Philo affirms, that among the Essenians, the children sat in the schools at the feet of their masters. Ambrosiaster, on the first epistle to the Corinthians, observes, that in their schools the Rabbins sat in their chairs, the most advanced of their scholars sat by them on benches, and the juniors sat on the ground on mats. The Jews are used to say to their children, by way of Proverb, "Roll yourselves in the dust of your masters' feet ;" instead of saying, Frequent their schools diligently, and sit down at their feet. Pirke Avoth. cap. 1. sect. 4. Very learned men think, that they never sat down in the temple, but only in the synagogues. They insist, that when our Saviour was sitting in the midst of doctors, it was only in a synagogue adjoining to the temple. See Deylin. Observ. tom. iii. cap. 30. Our Saviour upbraids the Rabbins and masters of Israel with their vanity, and eagerness to occupy the first places at feasts, and the head seats in the synagogues ; also, with their being saluted in the streets, and desiring to be called Rabbi, my master.

The studies of the Rabbins are either the text of the law, or the traditions, or the Cabala ; these three objects form so many different sorts of Rabbins. Those who chiefly apply to the letter of Scripture, are called Caraites, q. Literalists. Those who chiefly study the traditions and oral laws of the Talmud, are called Rabbanists. Those who give themselves to their secret and mysterious divinity, letters and numbers, are called Cabalists ; q. Traditionaries. See CARAITES, and CABALA.

Leo of Modena says, P. v. cap. 1. that the Caraites keep to the Pentateuch only, rejecting the explications, paraphrases, or constitutions of the Rabbins. This author adds, that they were originally Sadducees, but are reformed and meliorated ; and, that they might not become odious to all sorts of religions, they have forsaken such opinions of the Sadducees as gave most offence, and espoused some of the most ancient of the traditions. Nevertheless, the Rabbinists mortally hate the Caraites, and treat them only as Mamzerim, or bastards. They refuse all alliance with them, nor will they converse with them ; and though a Caraites should desire to become a Rabbinist, the other Jews would not receive him.

M. Simon, in his supplement to that passage of Leo of Modena now cited, believes with F. Morin, that the Caraites did not appear among the Jews until after the publication of the Talmud, i. e. about the eighth century ; and that the most understanding Jews at that time, being desirous to oppose the multitude of whimsies then current under the specious name of Moses, were called Caraites, by the defenders of those traditions ; insinuating that they adhered only to the letter of Scripture. We have but few works of the Caraites. M. Simon quotes some in MS.

MS. It might be wished that the best of them were printed; they would be much more useful than those of the Rabbinists, wherein we find a vast number of trifles, vain, frivolous, and childish explications, founded on pretended traditions of the ancients. The Rabbins are generally very ignorant in history, chronology, philology, antiquity, and geography. They understand the holy language but imperfectly. They know not the true signification of a multitude of words in the sacred text. They are prodigiously concerned about their traditions, so that there is very little profit in reading them; and experience shews, that most who have applied themselves to peruse their books, have been but little benefited by them, and have entertained a perfect contempt of their understanding and their works.

Beside the names of Rab, and Rabbi, or Rabboni, which the Jewish doctors assume, they took also those of Maran, lord; More, doctor; Cacam, sage; Marbitz Thora, cousin to the law, because the law rested on them; Dom, or sir. It was chiefly in Spain that they took, formerly, this last title, which is still given to persons of great distinction.

The chief function of the Rabbins is to preach in the synagogue, to make public prayers there, and to interpret the law. They have the power of binding and loosing, i. e. of declaring what is forbid, and what is allowed. When the synagogue is poor and small, there is but one Rabbi, who at the same time discharges the offices of a judge and a teacher. But when the Jews are numerous, and powerful, they appoint three pastors, and a house of judgment, where all their civil affairs are determined. Then the Rabbi applies himself to instruction only, unless it be thought proper to call him into the council, to give his advice; in which case he takes the chief place.

They have the authority of creating new Rabbins. They pretend, that formerly every doctor had a right of giving this title to his disciple; but that in the time of Hillel they relinquished this power to him, and restrained themselves to asking leave of the head of the captivity, at least in the east.

At present they content themselves with installing the new Rabbi in an assembly of doctors. Sometimes it is sufficient for one Rabbi to lay on his hands, when it is difficult for several to assemble. In Germany they are created by word only, and often, at their creation, their power is restrained to certain functions, and others are excluded, E. gr. to teach the law, but not to judge; neither were they to exercise those functions to which they were appointed, unless their master was absent.

The Rabbins omitted nothing to procure credit, authority, and respect, among the people, who nevertheless were generally inclined to despise them. They maintain, that their laws and commands were not to be transgressed, but at the hazard of the lives of the offenders. They instance the example of Rabbi Jochanan, who made of one of his disciples a heap of bones, because he would not believe what he taught him. They boast also, that a Rabbi cannot be damned. They prove it by Rabbi Asher, who fell into capital errors and crimes, which were enough to have plunged him into damnation.—It is said, he even derogated from the power of the Supreme Being, that he admitted of two principles, that he had blasphemed the angel Metatron, that he had rode on horseback on the sabbath-day, that he had tore to pieces a young scholar, and had sent the parts of his body to thirteen Levites. Nevertheless, Rabbi Meir, his disciple, maintained, that he was not damned, but only detained in purgatory; which he proved by causing smoke to come out of his tomb on a sabbath-day. Another Rabbi caused this smoke to cease, and it was concluded from thence, that he was saved. Excerpta Gemaræ apud Hott. p. 101, &c.

The Jews have books composed by their Rabbins. These are written in Hebrew, though different from that of the Bible; having a great mixture of words and phrases taken from foreign languages. When their writings are not on Bible subjects, they have been obliged to borrow other terms, to express what they treat of; as, in astronomy, physic, theology; but their style is still in imitation of Scripture. Their manner of pronouncing Hebrew is different: the Italians pronounce it otherwise than the Germans, and the Germans differ from the Spaniards and from the Levantines. The characters they commonly use in their writings are not so beautiful as those of the Bible; they are rounder, and more of a running-hand. And he that reads and understands very well the Hebrew of the Bible, will neither read nor understand the Hebrew of the Rabbins. The writing and style of these doctors is a particular study.

Nine classes of doctors are distinguished among the Hebrews. Abrabanel, proem. in lib. Nachalat Avoth. Morin. Exercit. Bibl. lib. ii. Exercit. 2. c. 1. (1) That of Moses, Joshua, Eleazar, and the seventy elders chosen by Moses, to assist him in the government. (2) That of the ancients, who succeeded Joshua and Eleazar, comprehending, according to them, the judges, senators, and sanhedrim. (3) That of the prophets. (4) The great synagogue, composed of six score persons, after the return from the captivity. (5) The Tanaim, mentioned in the Mishna. (6) The Amoraim, or commentators on the Mishna. (7) The Giours, or eminent doctors. (8) The Seboreans, or doubters. (9) The Gaons.

We must not be surprised by the pompous titles the Hebrews give their doctors, nor by their pretended antiquity. They would be very much puzzled to prove that succession of Rabbins they boast of, from Moses to the present times. Abraham Ben-David, who lived at Pescaire at the beginning of the twelfth century, has made a succession of Rabbins from Adam to his own time, Hallevi Sepher Hakkalal. Vide Bartolucci, tom. i. p. 18. Abraham Zaccuth Iuchasim, a Jew, expelled Spain with the other Jews, composed a catalogue of Rabbins from the beginning of the world to A. D. 1500. Gedaliah also made a traditional chain of them down to A. D. 1586, in which he lived.—But there is so great a difference in the calculations of these historians, they fall into such anachronisms, they disagree so much in the names of these doctors, that it is easy to see they have no certain principles, nor any distinct knowledge of what they advance.

In vain do the Rabbins boast of the antiquity of their schools, and doctors: when we search into these things, we find nothing but confusion and uncertainty. They speak with great emphasis of their schools at Japhne and Tiberias, in Palestine, after the destruction of the temple; also of those of Nahardea, Pundebita, and Sora, in the east. They produce lists of doctors who taught therein; but all these are so ill put together, that nothing can be concluded from them. They have certain books, of whose antiquity they very much brag; the Midraschin, for example, or Commentaries on Scripture, which they say were composed by Rabbins in the time of Judah the Holy, A. D. 215. Yet the Gemara is quoted therein, which was composed long after the Midraschin Rabbith, or Grand Commentaries, imputed to Nachmanides, who lived, they say, at the end of the third century; mention is made therein of the endeavour of the emperor Julian, to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem. The Sentences of the Fathers, or Pirke Aroth, published under the name of Eleazar, who lived under Gamaliel the second, is much more modern than that time, as appears in the work itself. See SCHOOLS.

We have spoken of the paraphrasts Onkelos, Jonathan, Joseph the Blind, [one-eyed] of the Gemara, the Talmud, and the Misna. Vide also Bartolucci, Bibliotheca Rabbinica; and Basnage's Hist. Jews, tom vii. lib. x. cap. 3, &c.

[As the Rabbins are so frequently quoted by commentators, it seems no more than proper to acquire some acquaintance with the principal.—That those whose works chiefly come under our inspection are modern, must be acknowledged; yet, the inquisitive and reasoning among them might have recourse to writings, which are, at present, but little known, especially to Christians. In Spain, for instance, the learned Hebrews derived much assistance from familiarity with the Arabic language, which they studied and spoke; they also held literary assemblies among themselves, in which they discussed the more abstruse questions of their law, and the more difficult passages and terms of Scripture. Later days have also produced Rabbins, who justly acquired extensive reputation by their learning, which was not confined to Hebrew or Rabbinical knowledge, but included classical studies. Much has recently been done in Germany, and elsewhere on the continent, to promote a spirit of general knowledge among the Jews at large; and, if possible, to prevent unqualified teachers from assuming public employments.

As almost all the learning of the Rabbins is traditional, or at least depends on tradition, it must be tried by the rules of historical enquiry, and the dictates of common sense. Among a prodigious mass of trifling, the Talmud, and its fellows, may contain some ancient facts; it is even possible, that a few of the papers in circulation against Christianity in its early days,—which probably were very numerous—may be preserved, as to their essential contents; but certainly, not with integrity. We know very little respecting the eastern schools of the Jews; except that they have been exposed to many insults and sufferings. With the western Doctors we are better acquainted: and shall set a few of them before the reader, in alphabetical order.

ABEN EZRA, or rather ABRAHAM ABEN EZRA, one of the most ancient Jewish Rabbins, wrote literal commentaries on most parts of the Bible, which are printed in the great Bibles of Venice and Basil. His style is very concise, and sometimes obscure. He wrote also several works on Grammar. In his Jesud Moreh, he incites to the study of the Talmud. He lived in the twelfth century; he was at Rome in 1146, at Rhodes in 1156, and died in 1165, but others say in 1174.

ABRAVANEL, or Don ISAAC ABRAVANEL, was driven out of Spain with other Jews, in 1492.

1492. He wrote very large commentaries on most of the Bible. In his Ros Amana, [Chief of the Faith] he very subtly treats of the principal articles of the Jewish religion. Vorstius translated it into Latin, and added notes. His Nahalat Avoth, [Possession of the Fathers] is a commentary on the treatise Pirke Avoth. Both were printed at Venice, in 4to. in 1545. In a learned preface before his book Nahalat Avoth, he explains the succession of tradition among the Jews, which is very intricate. His Miphaloth Elohim, [Works of God] learnedly treats on the creation of the world, and examines whence Moses obtained his documents for the book of Genesis.

BEN ASHER, BEN NEPTHALY, are two famous Jewish Doctors, who corrected the Hebrew copies of the Bible, and afterwards divided the Jews about the various readings. We know not exactly the time they lived in. R. Gedaliah places them about the beginning of the eleventh century. We usually say Ben Asher, but the name of this Doctor is R. Aaron son of R. Moses of the tribe of Asher; so the entire name of Ben Nephthali is, R. Moses son of David of the tribe of Nephthali.

ELIAS LEVITA. His book, intituled Massoret Hammassoret, is an excellent treatise on the Massoret; printed at Venice by Bombergue, in 4to.; he wrote besides a Chaldee Dictionary; and another Dictionary called Tisbi, which is a glossary on the barbarous Hebrew words: it has been translated into Latin by Fagius. He is the first and almost only Jew who applied himself to the Massoret, or criticism on the Hebrew text; and although he was a Jew, he taught the Christians at Rome and Venice. He also composed several books of Grammar, most of which have been translated into Latin. He has made very good observations on the books of R. David Kimchi, and Moses Kimchi; in a word, he is the least superstitious among the Rabbins, and deserves to be read.

KIMCHI. There are three Rabbins of this name; Joseph Kimchi, [about A. D. 1160.] David Kimchi, and Moses Kimchi; the first was father to the two others. He lived at Narbonne in France. David Kimchi has been the most followed of all the Jewish grammarians, by Christians, in their Dictionaries and translations of the Bible; especially his Commentaries on the Scripture, most of which have been printed in the great Bibles of Venice and Basil; of his Grammar called Sepher Miclol, and his Dictionary Sepher Scorascim, there are several editions, beside that printed at Venice, in folio, by Bombergue, 1545, and 1546, which has the notes of R. Elias Levita. The Jews, alluding to his name, which signifies miller, have a saying, there is no meal without the miller:—the sanction of Kimchi is necessary to a point of grammar.

MOSES BEN MAIMON, usually called by abridgment, Rambam, or Maimonides, was born at Corduba, in Spain, A. D. 1131. His father Maimon, pretended to be of the race of David. He has acquired the greatest reputation of any Jew, as well among Jews as Christians. He made an abridgment of the Talmud in Rabbinical Hebrew, when he was but very young, which has since been printed under the title of Jad Haz Zaka, [Strong hand]. It is very useful to those who would understand the Jewish laws and ceremonies. He afterwards composed his Commentary on the Mishna, which the Jews call his great work: this he wrote in Arabic: the translation into Rabbinical Hebrew is not his. His More Nevochim, was translated into Latin by Buxtorf the Son. R. Moses composed this work also in Arabic, which was afterwards translated by Samuel ben Tibbon his scholar, so that he himself received the translation, and approved it. This book being full of philosophy and many novelties, very much scandalized the Jews, especially those of France, who opposed the publishing of it; as also the first book of his abridgment of the Talmud, where he maintained the same principles: they went so far as to condemn this book to be burnt; as we may see in this Rabbi's letters printed at Venice, in 12mo. More Nevochim has been printed at Venice, and many other places in folio. This Rabbin is often called the Egyptian; because, being forced to quit Spain, he fled into Egypt, where he was physician to the Soldan. He died at the beginning of the thirteenth century. [A. D. 1205.]

MOSES BAR NAHMAN, who is called for shortness Ramban, lived at the same time, he made a commentary on the books of the law, which has been printed in folio, under the title of Hidusce Hattorah, [New Meditations on the Law.]

NATHAN, otherwise, R. ISAAC NATHAN, is the first Jew who made a Hebrew Concordance to the Bible, which was printed at Venice, in folio, by Bombergue, in 1524. He composed this Concordance by the Latin one, so that the Jews are beholden to the Christians for the Concordances they have at present, which are absolutely necessary for understanding the Massoret, or Criticism on the Hebrew Text. He was head of the Academy at Rome. He died A. D. 1106.

SOLOMON JARCHI. We are often mistaken in quoting this Rabbin, whose name is properly, perly, Isaaki, not Jarchi, however, by reason of this pretended name of Jarchi, some have thought that he was of Lunel in Languedoc; (where the Jews had an academy, in which it is said, he taught: from the name Lunel (Moon-town) is derived the surname of Jarchi, which imports Moon-struck, or Lunatic.) but he was of Troyes in Champagne, as R. Gedaliah and most Jewish Chronologists affirm; he lived in the twelfth century. His books are much esteemed by the Jews, and we may say he is their great author. We have his Commentaries on the Scripture in the Bibles of Venice and Basil; also, with the body of the Talmud, his Glosses, or Commentaries on that great book.]

RABBAH, רַבָּה, Ἀρεβὰ, great, or powerful; from רַבָּב rabab, or רַבָּה rabah: otherwise, contentious, or disputative; from רוֹב rub.

RABBAH, or AREBBA, a city, Joshua, xv. 60. Perhaps Arba, or Hebron. Jerom speaks of a city called Rebbo, bordering on Eleutheropolis east.

[It is written differently from Rabbath, yet appears to be the same.

1. Rabba, or Rabbath, q. Megalopolis, the great city; the metropolis of the Ammonites. Deut. iii. 11. 2 Sam. xi. 1. 1 Chron. xx. 1. Jer. xlv. 3. See RABBATH, below.

2. Rabba, metropolis of the Moabites. Josh. xiii. 25. Vide AR. Cellarius, Geog. Ant. tom. ii. p. 674. See RABBATH-MOAB, post.

3. Rabba, with the article, in Judah, Josh. xv. 60.

4. Rabba, or Rabbith, in Issachar, Josh. xix. 20.

RABBATH PHILADELPHIA was thought by Eusebius to be the same as Rabba of the Ammonites.]

RABBATH, רַבָּת, Ἀκρα Παββάθ, great, a multitude.

RABBATH, or RABBAT-AMMON, RABBAT-AMMONA, or AMMANA; or Rabbath of the children of Ammon, afterwards called Philadelphia, the capital of the Ammonites, situated beyond Jordan. It was famous and considerable even in the time of Moses, who tells us, that here was preserved the iron bedstead of king Og. When David declared war against the Ammonites, his general Joab, laid siege to Rabbath-Ammon, where the brave Uriah lost his life, by a secret order of his prince. And when the city was reduced to the last extremity, David himself went thither, that he might have the honour of taking it. From this time it became subject to the kings of Judah. Afterwards the kings of Israel became masters of it, with the tribes beyond Jordan.

But towards the conclusion of the kingdom of Israel, Tiglath-pileser having taken away a great part of the Israelites, the Ammonites were guilty of many cruelties against those who remained; for which cause, the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel pronounced very severe prophecies against Rabbath, the capital of the Ammonites, and against the rest of the country, which probably had their completion five years after the destruction of Jerusalem. Antiochus the Great took the city of Rabbath-Ammon about A. M. 3786. Some time before this, Ptolemy Philadelphus had given it the name of Philadelphia. Vide PHILADELPHIA.

RABBATH-MOAB, or RABBATH of the children of Moab, the capital of the Moabites, otherwise, Rabbat-Moba, Ar, Areopolis, Ariel of Moab, Kirheres, or the city with brick walls. Jer. xlviii. 31, 36, &c. This city stood on the river Arnon, by which it was divided; whence in the Kings it is called the two Ariels (lions) of Moab. This city underwent many revolutions; and the prophets threatened it with great misfortunes. Vide AR. The Romans generally kept a garrison at Areopolis, because of the importance of this pass over the Arnon. See the ancient Notitia, and Eusebius and Jerom on ARNON.

RABBI, Ῥαββί, master, doctor. See RAB.

RABBITH, or RABBOTH, רַבּוֹת, multitude; from רַבָּב rabab: otherwise, quarrel; from רוֹב rob: or usury, loan; from מַרְבִּית mar-bith. A city of Issachar. Josh. xix. 20.

RABBONI, Ῥαββוני, a diminutive from Rabbi. John xx. 16. [rather, my master.]

RAB-MAG, רַב־מַג, Ῥαβμαγ, who overthrows, or destroys a multitude; from מוֹג mug, to dissolve, and רַבָּב robab, a multitude; otherwise, chief, or prince of dissolution; from רַב rab, master, and מוֹג mug, dissolution; or, perhaps, chief of the mugians. A Babylonish word.

RAB-MAG, or REB-MAG, a general officer of Nebuchadnezzar's army, at the taking of Jerusalem, Jerem. xxxix. 3. A. M. 3416, ante A. D. 188. I imagine that רַב־מַג Rab-mag signifies chief of the Magi. 2 Kings xviii. 17. [As it may happen that the reader should meet with the word RAB-MAG as signifying a Jewish Rabbi, we shall hint that it refers to Rabbi Maimonides-ben-Gershon, and is formed of the first letters of his name compounded into one word.]

RAB-SHAKEH, רַב־שָׁקֵה, cup-bearer of the prince, or, chamberlain; from רַב rab, master, and שָׁקַה shaka, to drink. [Chief butler. Comp. Gen. xl. 2.]

RAB-SHAKEH, or RAB-SACES, i. e. chief butler or cup-bearer. A term of dignity, a title of office, not a proper name. Rab-shakeh, was sent by Sennacherib, king of Assyria, to summon Hezekiah, Hezekiah, which he did, in a very haughty and insolent manner, and told him, in Hebrew, that he ought not to put confidence, either in the king of Egypt, or in the Lord, who had ordered Sennacherib to march against Judea. 2 Kings xviii. 17.

After this Rab-shakeh returned to his master, who had quitted the siege of Lachish to meet the king of Egypt, then coming to assist Hezekiah. But in this march the destroying angel slew 185,000 of the army of Sennacherib; and he was obliged to hasten back to Nineveh, where he was slain by his own sons. See HEZEKIAH and ISAIAH. Isa. xxxvii. 36, 37, &c. 2 Kings xix. 35, 36, 37.

RAB-SARIS, רַב־סָרִיס, grand master of the eunuchs; from רַב rab, master, and סָרִיס sarim, eunuchs: or, gentleman of the chamber to the sovereign.

RAB-SARIS, or RAB-SARES, sent with Rab-shakeh and Tartan, to summon Hezekiah. Rab-saris is not a proper name, but a name of dignity, a title of office, 2 Kings xviii. 17. Jer. xxxix. 3.

RACA, 'Pakà. Jerom says, that this word is derived from the root רִיק rik, vain, trifling, witless, brainless: otherwise, beggarly, worthless. It is thus translated by the Vulgate, Judg. xi. 3. [vain men. Eng. Tr.]

RACA, or RACHA; a Syriac word, signifying foolish, and including a strong idea of contempt. Jesus Christ says, Matt. v. 22. whoever shall say to his neighbour, Raca, shall be condemned by the council, or sanhedrim. We read in the Hebrew, that when Jephthah was expelled by his brethren, he headed a company of Rakim, רַקִּים. LXX. ἄνδρες κενοί, men of desperate fortunes. Judg. ix. 4. xi. 3. Also, Jeroboam, son of Nebat, assembled a company of Rakim, beggars, sons of Belial, 2 Chron. xiii. 7. Lightfoot assures us, that in the Jewish books, the word Raca is a term of the utmost contempt; and used to be pronounced with certain gestures of indignation, as spitting, turning away the head, &c.

RACHAL, רַכֵּל, Injurious, from רַכֵּל rakil: otherwise, perfumer, or trafficking; from רַכֵּל rakal. [A market, perhaps, a fair.] A city of Judah, whither David sent some of the spoil taken from those enemies, who had plundered Ziklag. 1 Sam. xxx. 29.

[RACE, RUNNING. The numerous allusions in the writings of St. Paul, to the races and games established in Greece, require some acquaintance with the nature and laws of those institutions, to render such passages intelligible. It may therefore, be proper to adduce a specimen of the regulations, &c. attending them, Comp. ATHLETA.

The apostle says, 1 Cor. ix. 24. "Know ye not that they who run in a race, run all, but one (only) receiveth the prize?—so run that ye may obtain. And every one who striveth is temperate," &c. Also, 2 Tim. ii. 5. "if a man strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned except he strive lawfully." See also Heb. xii. 1 Gal. v. 7, &c.

"Such as obtained victories in any of these games, especially the Olympic, were universally honoured, nay, almost adored: at their return home they rode in a triumphal chariot into the city, the walls being broken down to give them entrance; which was done (as Plutarch is of opinion) to signify, that walls are of small use to a city that is inhabited by men of courage and ability to defend it. At Sparta they had a honourable post in the army, being stationed near the king's person. At some towns they had presents made to them by their native city, were honoured with the first place at shews and games, and ever after maintained at the public charge. Cicero reports, that a victory in the Olympic games was not much less honourable than a triumph at Rome. Happy was that man esteemed, who could but obtain a single victory: if any person merited repeated rewards, he was thought to have attained the utmost felicity that human nature is capable of: but if he came off conqueror in all the exercises, he was elevated above the condition of men, and his actions styled wonderful victories! Nor did their honours terminate in themselves, but were extended to all about them; the city that gave them birth and education was esteemed more honourable and august: happy were their relations, and thrice happy their parents. It is a remarkable story, which Plutarch relates of a Spartan, who meeting Diagoras, that had himself been crowned in the Olympic games, and seen his sons and grand-children victors, embraced him, and said, Now die Diagoras, for thou canst not be a god! By the laws of Solon, a hundred drachms were allowed from the public treasury to every Athenian who obtained a prize in the Isthmian games; and five hundred drachms to such as were victors in the Olympian. Afterwards, the latter of these had their maintenance in the Prytaneum, or public hall of Athens."

The Πένταθλον, Pentathlon, or Quinquetium, [five games] consisted of the five exercises contained in this verse.

Ἀλμα, ποδωκίην, δίσκον, ἄκοντα, πάλην.

Leaping, Running, Throwing, Darting, Wrestling.

Instead of darting, some mention boxing; others speak of exercises different from those mentioned.

mentioned. For Pentathlon seems to have been a common name for any five sorts of exercise performed at the same time. In all of them there were some customs that deserve our observation. Dromos, Δρόμος, the exercise of running, was in great esteem among the ancient Grecians, insomuch, that such as prepared themselves for it, thought it worth their while to use means to burn or parch their spleen, because it was believed to be a hindrance to them, and retard them in their course. Homer tells us, that swiftness is one of the most excellent endowments a man can be blessed withal.

Οὐ μὲν γὰρ μείζον κλέος ἀνέρος ὄφρα κεν ᾗσιν.
 Ἡ ὅ, τι ποσσὶν τε ῥέξει, καὶ χερσὶν ἔῃσιν.

No greater honour e'er has been attain'd,
 Than what strong hands, or nimble feet have gain'd.

Indeed, all those exercises, that conduced to fit men for war, were more especially valued: now swiftness was looked on as an excellent qualification in a warrior, both because it serves for a sudden assault and onset, and likewise for a nimble retreat; and therefore, it is not to be wondered that the constant character which Homer gives of Achilles is, that he was πόδας ὠκὺς, or swift of foot: and in the holy Scripture, David, in his poetical lamentation over those two great captains, Saul and Jonathan, takes particular notice of this warlike quality of theirs: "they were (says he) swifter than eagles, stronger than lions." 2 Sam. i. 23.

All such as designed to contend were obliged to repair to the public gymnasium, at Elis, ten months before the solemnity, where they prepared themselves by continual exercises; we are told, indeed, by Phavorinus, that the preparatory exercises were only performed thirty days before the games; but this must be understood of the performance of the whole and entire exercises in the same manner they were practised at the games, which seems to have been only enjoined in the last month; whereas, the nine antecedent months were spent in more light and easy preparations. No man who had omitted to present himself in this manner, was allowed to contend for any of the prizes; nor were the accustomed rewards of victory given to such persons, if by any means they insinuated themselves, and overcame their antagonists: nor would any apology, though seemingly ever so reasonable, serve to excuse their absence. In the CCVIIIth Olympiad Apollonius was rejected, and not suffered to contend, because he had not presented himself in due time, though he was detained by contrary winds in the islands called Cyclades; and the crown was given to Heraclides without performing any exercise, because no just and duly qualified adversary appeared to oppose him. No person who was, himself, a notorious criminal, or nearly related to any such, was permitted to contend. Farther, to prevent underhand dealings, if any person were convicted of bribing his adversary, a severe fine was laid upon him: nor was this alone thought a sufficient guard against evil and dishonourable contracts and unjust practices, but the contenders were obliged to swear, that they had spent ten whole months in preparatory exercises: and farther yet, both they, their fathers and brethren took a solemn oath, that they would not, by any sinister or unlawful means, endeavour to stop the fair and just proceedings of the games.—POTTER's Antiq. Græc.

The rewards (the crowns) given in these games have been thus rendered into English by Mr. Addison, from the Greek. Anc. Med. Dial. II.

Greece, in four games thy martial youth were train'd;
 For heroes two, and two for Gods ordain'd;
 Jove bade the olive round his victor wave;
 Phæbus to his an apple-garland gave;
 The pine, Palæmon; nor with less renown,
Archemorus conferr'd the parsley crown.

Compare with these fading vegetable crowns, that immortal life which the Gospel offers as a prize to the victor; in order to understand the apostle's comparison, 1 Cor. ix. 25. 1 Pet. v. 4.

N. B. No slave was allowed to contend in the games; but all were freemen; and indeed, usually, were persons of consideration in life; which their success increased.]

RACHEL, רַחֵל, sheep.

RACHEL, daughter of Laban, and sister of Leah. When Jacob fled from his brother Esau's resentment, he arrived in Mesopotamia, near the city of Haran; meeting some shepherds there, he inquired if they knew Laban, son of Nahor. They answered, we know him well, and here is his daughter Rachel coming with the flock. Jacob introduced himself to her, was brought into Laban's house, and entertained with great civility. When he had been there about a month, Laban desired him to propose some recompence for his services. Jacob offered to serve him seven years for his younger daughter Rachel in marriage. Laban agreed; but instead of Rachel, he imposed her elder sister Leah on Jacob.

Jacob, the next morning, made bitter complaints; Laban excused it; and offered, if he were willing to serve another seven years, he should have Rachel also. When the week of Leah's wedding was over, Jacob married Rachel. His affection for Rachel abated his kindness for Leah; but the Lord gave children to Leah,

Leah, and none to Rachel, who became angry, and said to Jacob, "give me children, or else I die:" but, Jacob answered her with indignation. Rachel said, take my maid Bilhah, that I may have children by her. Jacob taking Bilhah, she brought a son, whom Rachel called Dan. Bilhah had another son the year following, whom Rachel named Naphthali.

At length the Lord remembered Rachel; she brought forth a son whom she named Joseph. Some years after, Jacob returning to Canaan, Rachel, unknown to Jacob, privately took away the Teraphim, or domestic gods (Vide TERAPHIM) of her father, A. M. 2265, ante A. D. 1739. Gen. xxxi. Laban pursued Jacob; and charged him with this theft: Jacob wished him to search every tent, which he did, without finding any thing. Laban coming into Rachel's tent, she hid the Teraphim under her camel's furniture, and sat down upon it. Excusing her not rising, she said "the custom of women is upon me."

When Jacob passed over the brook Jabok, he divided his wives and children into three companies. He put the two maids and their children first; Leah and her children second; and lastly, Rachel and her son Joseph. This he did, that if Esau should assault the first company, the second and third might escape; or at worst, the third might avoid his fury. After he passed over Jordan, as he advanced towards Hebron, and was not above a furlong—(Hebr. Kiberath. See the article Kiberath-aretz.) from Bethlehem, otherwise called Ephrath, Rachel was seized with the pains of child-birth. She brought forth a son, whom she named Ben-oni, son of my pain;—but Jacob named him Benjamin, or the son of my right hand. Here Rachel died, and Jacob buried her, erecting a monument, (Heb. מצבה, Matzebah. LXX. Στήλην, a pillar. Jeron., Titulum.) for her, which continued for ages. A. M. 2265, or 2266, ante A. D. 1739.

[They still shew a monument which they call Rachel's; but it is too like the Turkish monuments to be ancient. It may have been renewed in later ages.]

The prophet Jeremiah, xxxi. 15. and after him St. Matthew, ii. 18. have, as it were revived Rachel, in the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, born from Joseph, son of Rachel. "In Rama (or, on the high places) was there a voice heard, lamentation and weeping, and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they are not." This was fulfilled, when these tribes were carried into captivity beyond the Euphrates. St. Matthew; has accommodated this prophecy to the lamentations of Bethlehem, when Herod slew the children there. Then Rachel, who was buried there, might be said to renew her cries and lamentations for the death of so many infant innocents, sacrificed to his jealousy and cruelty! See PLATE, MOURNING WOMEN AT RAMAH.

VOL. II. PART XXIV. Edit. IV.

RADDAI, רַדַּי, 'Radai, (that defends; from רַדַּד radad, to stretch out: [extended of God?]) or that rules; from רַדַּח radah. Fifth son of Jesse, and brother of David. 1 Chron. ii. 14.

RAGABA, a very strong castle beyond Jordan, Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 23. Probably Argob, mentioned in several places, Deut. iii. 4, 13, 14. 1 Kings iv. 13. 2 Kings xv. 25. Eusebius places Argob in the canton of Gerasa, fifteen miles east.

RAGAU, a large plain wherein Nebuchadnezzar, king of Nineveh, overcame Arphaxad, king of Media, in the country of Arioch, king of the Elymeans. Judith i. 5, 6. These plains of Ragau are probably those about Rages in Media.

[RAGE, vide ANGER.]

RAGES, Ράγος, tempest, tumult, sedition; [or commotion] from ראג ragash. A Medish word.

RAGES, or RAGÆ, a city of Media, on the mountains of Ecbatana. Tob. i. 14. Tobit having deposited ten talents with Gabael, a citizen of Rages, (or having lent it him, according to the Vulgate) sent his son Tobias to fetch it. But being obliged to stay at Ecbatana, to celebrate his marriage with Sara, the daughter of Raguel, Tobias desired his companion, the angel Raphael, to go to Gabael, and bring the ten talents; which Raphael performed. Rages was a little day's journey from Ecbatana, on the southern part of Media, in the mountains that divide this country from Parthia.

Rages has its representative in the modern Rey, of which incredible stories are reported by the Persian writers. They say, that in the ninth century it was so large as to be divided into 96 districts, each of which contained 46 streets; that it had 6,400 colleges, 15,000 mosques, and other edifices in proportion; that it was the next city after Babylon, &c. It is now greatly reduced. The air is unhealthy, tinges the complexion yellow, and occasions agues. Yet the inhabitants live as long as those of other places; which has made the Persians say that "the angel of death himself flees from the unwholesome vapours of Rey." Among its titles is the market of the universe: so that we need not wonder at finding Jews attracted to it.

"REY is a very considerable city. In this place are many bazaars, and caravanseras, and, market-places.

market-places. Here they have both river water, and water brought by canals, or trenches : one of these is called the Royal Aqueduct. For the most part the inhabitants drink the water of these aqueducts. There are many canals beside. Here they cultivate the land, and practice husbandry, and traffic for gold and direms. The people are hospitable and polite. Here they manufacture fine linen, cotton, and camelots, which are sent to all parts of the world. In the territory of Ray are villages larger than some towns,—containing two thousand inhabitants, or more. Ibn Haukal, p. 178.

We need not doubt but that some of these large villages, or others near them, might receive many of the Jews of the captivity.]

[The ruins of Rae, about three miles S. E. of Tehran, the present capital of Persia, cover a great extent of country, but offer nothing worthy of observation ; for, as most of the buildings in Persia are of brick dried in the sun, they are no sooner deserted than they crumble into dust, and we therefore find (with few exceptions) that the remains of all the cities in this country present the same appearance of mounds or hillocks of sand, covered with pieces of lacquered tile.—The city of Rae holds a distinguished place in the annals of Persia, and continued to flourish till sacked by the generals of Jungeez Khan. [Genghis Khan] KINNEIR'S Memoir of Persian Empire. Lond. 1813. p. 120. See also MORIER'S Travels in Persia.]

RAGUEL, רַעוּאֵל, shepherd of God, or friend of God; from רָעָה rahaḥ, or roheh, according to different readings: otherwise, rupture of God; from רָעָה ruah, rupture, or bruising, and אֵל el, God.

RAGUEL, otherwise, JETHRO. See JETHRO.

II. RAGUEL, father of Sara, and father-in-law to young Tobias. He dwelt in the city of Ecbatana, and was rich. Tob. vi. 11—14. Tobias coming to Ecbatana, his companion, the angel Raphael, urged him to demand Sara as his wife, because he was the nearest kinsman to Raguel, and therefore obliged to marry her, according to the law. Raguel consented, though not without difficulty, fearing it might happen to him, as it had happened to his daughter's seven former husbands. But the Lord preserving Tobias, Raguel kept him fifteen days, made a great feast, gave him half his estate, and secured the other half to him after his own death.

RAHAB, רַחַב, which is large and extended, or public place; from רָחַב rachab. [amplification, i. e. of the family: it is written Παράβ, Matt. i. 3. and Παβ, Heb. xi. 31.]

RAHAB, a hostess of Jericho, who received and concealed the spies sent by Joshua. The Hebrew calls her Zona, Josh. ii. 1. זֶנָּה זֶנָּה. LXX. Γυναικὸς πορνῆς, which Jerom and many others understand of a prostitute. Others think she was only a hostess or inn-keeper, and that this is the true signification of the original word. (Ita Chald. Rabb. Lyr. Arias. Pagn. Titelman. Vide, si placet, Sanct. in 3 Reg. iii. 26.) Had she been a woman of ill fame, would Salmon, a prince of the tribe of Judah, have taken her to wife? or could he have done it by the law? Besides, the spies of Joshua would hardly have gone to lodge with a common harlot, they who were charged with so nice and dangerous a commission. Those who maintain she was a harlot, suggest, that perhaps she was one of those women that prostituted themselves in honour of the pagan deities; as if this could extenuate her crime, or the scandal of her profession, if she were a public woman. [Such women are not called Zona, but Kadeshah, in the Hebrew.]

But whatever was Rahab's profession, when the spies had entered her house, notice was given to the king of Jericho, who sent to Rahab to produce those men: but she extended to them the protection of hospitality, hid them, and told the messengers, that such men had been at her house, but when the gates of the city were shutting, they went out. Pursue them quickly, she said, and you may overtake them. They forthwith pursued them, but in vain, for they were concealed on the terrace of Rahab's house.

When the king's messengers were gone away, Rahab went up to the terrace, or roof of her house, and said to the spies, I know the Lord has delivered this country into your hands; promise me, now, that you will save the lives of me and my family, when you take this city.—The spies promised her, with an oath, and bid her tie a scarlet string to her window, that her house might be distinguished when the Israelites should enter Jericho.

Then she let them down by a rope; for her house adjoined the walls of the city; advising them to return by the mountains, for fear of meeting those who had been sent in quest of them; and to continue on the mountains three days, in which time the messengers would return, after which they might proceed. The spies followed Rahab's counsel exactly, and at the end of three days arrived at Joshua's camp, to whom they related all they had discovered at Jericho, and their promises to Rahab. When Joshua took the city, he sent the two spies to the house of Rahab, to bring her out safe, with all her relations. Rahab married Salmon, a prince of Judah, by whom she had Boaz; from whom whom descended Obed, Jesse, and king David. —Thus Jesus Christ condescended to reckon this Canaanitish woman among his ancestors. —St. Paul magnifies the faith of Rahab. Heb. xi. 31.

RAHAB, רַחַב, proud; from רָחַב raab: otherwise, quarrelsome; from רִיב rob. [rather rib, or ribi; probably an Egyptian name for a pear.]

II. RAHAB. The Psalmist speaks of another Rahab, Psalm lxxxvii. 4. אֶזְכִּיר רַחַב. "I will make mention of Rahab and Babylon, to them that know me." Also, Psalm lxxxix. 10. "Thou hast broken Rahab in pieces," or the Egyptian. Isaiah, li. 9. and xxx. 7. uses the same word Rahab to denote the destruction of Pharaoh and his army in the Red Sea. See also Job xxvi. 12. "By his understanding he smiteth through the proud;" Heb. Rahab. The most skilful commentators explain this of Egypt, particularly of the Delta. This part of Egypt is still called Rib or Rif, the pear, because of its similitude to the shape of this fruit. M. d'Herbelot says, in his Bibliotheca Orientalis, that the name Rif, is given to that part of Egypt, which begins at Cairo, and lies to the north, i. e. the Delta.

Jerom, and the ancient Greek interpreters have often translated Rahab by pride, or the proud. But, not a few have misunderstood the original, as referring to Rahab, the woman of Jericho!

RAHAM, רַחֵם, bowels, or fellow-suffering; from רָחַם racham. Son of Shema, father of Jorkoam, of the race of Caleb. 1 Chron. ii. 44.

RAIN. It should seem by some expressions in Scripture, that the ancient Hebrews imagined rain to be derived from certain great reservoirs above the heavens, which Moses calls the superior waters, in contradistinction from the inferior waters, the sea. Moses says, that at the deluge, "All the fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened." And Hosea says, ii. 21. that in times of great drought the clouds cry to the Lord, beseeching him to permit the waters which he keeps in his treasures and repositories, to fall into them and replenish them. In other places of Scripture, the clouds are described as great bodies, filled with waters supplied to them from the firmament. Even the dews themselves are represented as proceeding from the superior waters, "His heavens shall drop down dew." Deut. xxxiii. 28. Job. xxxvii. 11. xxxviii. 37. Psalm xviii. 11. 2 Kings xxii. 12.

The sacred writers often speak of rain of the former season, and rain of the latter. Deut. xi. 14. "I will give you the rain of your land in his due season, the first rain and the latter rain." So Hosea, vi. 3. "He shall come unto us, as the rain, as the latter and the former rain unto the earth." The Rabbins, and the generality of interpreters are of opinion, that the former rain, called in Hebrew יֶרֶחַ jorah, signifies the rain of the autumn, and that the latter rain, called in Hebrew מַלְקוּשׁ malkush, signifies the rain of the spring. The Jews began their year at autumn; which gives some probability to this opinion. —But on the contrary, we think that jorah signifies the rain of spring, and malkush that of autumn. In Judea it commonly rained but in two seasons, spring and autumn. Jorah is always put first, and malkush afterward. The natural order is, that spring should come before autumn. Malkush is derived from the verb la-kash, which signifies to make a vintage, to delay, to put off, to gather in the after-marth, or the grass that grows in the meadows in the latter season. Besides, malkush signifies a rain that is (as it were) earnestly desired by the earth, as coming after the dry season of summer. Job xxix. 23. Prov. xvi. 15. Hos. vi. 3. Joel ii. 23. —Joel says, "He will cause to come down for you the rain, the former rain, jorah, and the latter rain, malkush, in the first month." But if malkush signifies the rain of autumn, it will be easily granted, that jorah must signify that of spring. The Septuagint have taken it in this sense: and Hesiod has expressed the rain of the spring and autumn in words of the same import, as those used by the Septuagint. He calls ὤρινον ὀμβρον, the rain of the spring; and ὀπώρινον ὀμβρον, the rain of autumn. Oper. et Dies. lib. ii. Comp. CALENDAR OF PALESTINE, FRAGMENTS, No. CCCCLIV. et seq.

Moses describing the land of Canaan, and its advantages over Egypt, says, Deut. xi. 10, 11. the land of Canaan is not like that of Egypt; Palestine being a country of hills and valleys, is watered by rain from heaven. Hence it is that God promised the Israelites, to send them rain in due season. Lev. xxvi. 3. On the other hand, Moses threatens them, if they depart from their fidelity to God, to send them showers of sand and dust. Deut. xxviii. 24. Comp. PLATE OF AGRICULTURE. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. CLXXII. CLXXIII.

The Hebrews often compare speech and discourse to rain. Deut. xxxii. 2. Ecclus. xxxix. 9. Job says, that in the time of his prosperity, he was attended to with great respect and eagerness; that his discourse distilled like soft rain, chap. xxix. 21. that his hearers expected it like rain, and opened their mouths, like the earth, when awaiting the rains of the latter season.

RAKEM, רָקֵם, empty, or vain; from רָק rak, or רַקַּח rakah: otherwise, painting, or embroidery of several colours: or shadowings; from רַקַּח rakam: or their spittle; from רַקַּח rakak, spittle, and the pronoun נָם am, theirs. Son of Shereth. 1 Chron. vii. 16. Of the tribe of Gad, and family of Machir.
C 2 or

RAKKATH, רַקַּת, 'Pakkàθ, empty, [emptiness] or spittle, or spit, or temple of the head; from רַקַּח rakak, or רַקַּח rakah. A fenced city of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 35.

[Simon thinks a bank or shore, as the root implies in Chaldee and Arabic. It was probably situated on the bank of the sea of Galilee, or of the Jordan, "Bank-town?" The Jews understand by it, Tiberias. So Racca in Mesopotamia is situated on the shore of the Euphrates; and in Homer and Stephens we have similar appellations.]

RAKKON, הַרְקֹן, 'Hpekkōv, vain, void; from רַקַּח rakak, or רִיק rik: otherwise, mountain of lamentations and tears; from הַר har, a mountain, and קֹן kun, to lament: otherwise, mountain of enjoyment; from קָנָה kanah, to possess, to enjoy. A city of Dan. Josh. xix. 46.

RAM, רָם, elevated, sublime; from רָם rum: or who rejects, or is rejected: from רָמָה ramah. Son of Hezron, and father of Aminadab, of Judah, 1 Chron. ii. 9.

II. RAM. Job xxxii. 2. "Then was kindled the wrath of Elihu, the son of Barachel, the Buzite, of the kindred of Ram." In this place Ram is apparently put for Aram. Elihu was of the race of Buz, son of Nahor the Aramean, or Syrian.

RAM, or BATTERING RAM. A well-known engine of war. Mentioned Ezekiel iv. 2. xxi. 22. Nebuchadnezzar used it at the siege of Jerusalem. Pliny says, lib. vii. cap. 56. it was invented by Epeus at the siege of Troy: but Vitruvius, lib. x. cap. 19. and Tertullian, ascribe this invention to the Carthaginians. Tertul. de Pallio. I believe Ezekiel is the earliest author that has mentioned this machine. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCXXIII. and Plate of the "BATTERING RAM."

RAMAH, רָמָה, the height; from ram.

RAMAH, or AREMAH; this word signifies an eminence; from hence are so many places in Palestine named Rama, Ramath, Ramatha, Ramoth, Ramathaim, Ramala, and Ramathan. Sometimes the same place is called Rama, Ramatha, Ramoth, and Ramathaim, all these words signifying the same. Sometimes Rama or Ramoth is joined to another name, to determine the place of such city, or eminence. Lastly, Ramah is sometimes put simply for a high place, and signifies neither city nor village. The following are the chief places mentioned in Scripture by this name.

RAMAH, a city of Benjamin, between Gaba and Bethel, toward the mountains of Ephraim, six miles from Jerusalem north. Jerom places it near Gaba, seven miles from Jerusalem: it was in his time, only a small village; on the road from Samaria to Jerusalem; for this reason Baasha, king of Israel, caused it to be fortified, to obstruct the passage from the land of Judah into that of Israel. Josephus, Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 6. calls it Ramathan. Josh. xviii. 25. Judg. iv. 5. xix. 13. Euseb. in locis. Jerom, in Osee. v. in Sophon. 1. 1 Kings xv. 17. 2 Chron. xvi. 1.

I make no doubt but this is the Ramatha, or Ramathaim-zophim, of the prophet Samuel. 1 Sam. i. 1, 19. ii. 11, &c. It was on the frontiers of Ephraim and Benjamin; and frontier cities were often inhabited by both tribes. The other Ramah, or Ramula, thought to be the country of Samuel, cannot be so. Vide RAMAH II. also RAMATHAIM.

It is also very probable, that Jeremiah speaks of this Ramah, chap. xl. when he says, Nebuzaradan, who commanded the Chaldean army, having found him among the captives at Ramah, whither they had been all brought, set him at liberty. Of the same place we explain the prophecy, chap. xxxi. 15, 16, 17. wherein the Lord comforts Rachel, on account of the taking her children of Ephraim and Manasseh, into captivity: "A voice was heard in Ramah, lamentation and bitter weeping: Rachel weeping for her children," &c. St. Matthew ii. 18. has accommodated this passage, to the massacre of the infants of Bethlehem by Herod. [But Rachel was buried in the way to Bethlehem. See FRAGMENTS, and PLATE OF WOMEN MOURNING AT RAMAH.]

II. RAMAH. Scripture often joins Ramah with Gaba, Geba, or Gibeah, as neighbouring places. Ezra ii. 26. Neh. vii. 30. Isai. x. 29. Hosea v. 8. We also see, 1 Sam. xxii. 6. that Saul, when in Gibeah, sat under a tree at Ramah; but in this place we take Ramah only to signify the eminence at Gibeah.

III. RAMAH, or Ramatha, Ramolu, Ramula, Ramba, Ruma, or Remphitis, a city west of Jerusalem, between Lydda and Joppa, as Jerom, in Epitaph. Paulæ, places it; or between Joppa and Jerusalem, as modern travellers describe it. Le Bruyn, p. 251. Phocas puts it about thirty-six miles from Jerusalem. Abulfeda, quoted by Reland, Palest. lib. iii. says, that this city was built by Solyman, son of Abdolmelic, after the destruction of Lydda; and Sanutus, in Secretis Fidel. Crucis, says, that the Arabians built it near Lydda, after the Crusades began in that country: M. de Bruyn describes the fine reservoirs of water to be seen here, and many other marks of antiquity: he says it is but four leagues from Jaffa, or Joppa, and stands in a plain and even country: he says also, that Lydda is on one side, and about three miles from Rama.

These circumstances determine me to think that this is the place Eusebius and St. Jerom took for Arimathea, the country of Joseph. Matt. xxvii. 57. Jerom places it between Lydda and Joppa: and Eusebius says it is in the district of Thamnis, near to Diospolis, otherwise called Lydda. This was taken from Samaria, and added to Judea: 1 Macc. xi. 34. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 8. But if so, we must acknowledge this city to have been very ancient, and long before our Saviour's time: consequently, that in the time of the crusades, it was rebuilt, repaired, or fortified anew. Eusebius and some others seem to have thought, that this city is the Ramath of Samuel, or Ramathaim-zophim of the mountains of Ephraim. But this opinion cannot be supported. Euseb. also, Jerom in Armathea-sophim. Comp. the modern accounts, post.

IV. RAMA, or Ramatha. Phocas says, in his Travels, that Ramah, or Armathe, where Samuel was born, was about six miles from Jerusalem west. Le Bruyn says, Voyage de Syrie, p. 259. that going from Ramah to Jerusalem, he passed through Cobeb, Benop, Carith-leneb, Soud, Souba, and Samuel; which is a church on a hill, where, they say, was the town of Samuel. But this town of Samuel was north, not west, from Jerusalem; in the mountains of Ephraim, and not in those of Judah. See ARIMATHEA.

V. RAMA, a city of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 36. on the frontiers of Asher, Josh. xix. 29. Jerom reads Horma in the Hebrew; but the LXX. and Eusebius read Rama. The same Eusebius, and Cyrillus of Jerusalem, on Zechariah, admit a Rama in Asher, and another in Naphtali.

[Another in Mount Ephraim, 1 Sam. i. 19. ii. 11. vii. 17. the same, or nearly, as Ramathaim Zophim. Comp. Ramathem, 1 Macc. xi. 34. This name, importing heights, is frequently found prefixed to other names:—sometimes it means the height adjoining a town, sometimes that on which a town is situated. So we have,

1. Ramoth Mispah, near Mispah, a city of Gilead, Josh. xiii. 26. the same probably with Ramoth. Josh. xxi. 38. 1 Kings iv. 13.

2. Ramoth Negebh, Southern Ramoth, a city of Simeon, Josh. xix. 8. the same as Ramath Negebh, 1 Sam. xxx. 27.

Remeth, Josh. xix. 21. Ramoth, 1 Chron. vi. 58. Jarmuth, i. 6. Ja-ramuth, Josh xxi. 29. and other names are derived from the same root, signifying height, or elevation.]

RAMATHA, רמטה, 'Αραμαθαίμ, 'Αραμαθίμ. See RAMATHAIM.——Also,

RAMATHA, and RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM. [RAMATHA, heights. See RAMA I.

A city in Mount Ephraim. 1 Sam. i. 1. xv. 34.

Jerom says it was situated in the neighbourhood of Timnah, near Diospolis.]

RAMATHAIM, רמתי, the two RAMATHAS; probably, because the city was divided into two parts. The Ramah, Samuel's birth-place, was also called Zophim, because of a family of Levites dwelling there, who were descended from Zoph.

[RAMATHAIM, the double heights. Called also Ramatha, and Arimathea. 1 Sam. i. 1.

D'Arvièux, Travels, v. ii. p. 26. distinguishes between Ramathaim Zophim and Rama; for he says, "We arrived at the foot of a hill on which was built that very ancient city called Ramathaim Zophim. It is at present almost wholly ruined. There remain but a few houses, with a mosque of considerable size and in good condition, which is highly venerated by the Turks and Jews, because they believe that it contains the sepulchre of Samuel the prophet. Here the interpreters and religious, who had accompanied us, took their leave, and returned to Jerusalem, while we took the road which led us to Ramah, where we arrived in the afternoon,"—from thence, to Jaffa.

Ramah is now called Ramla. See RAMLAH. The following are the accounts of this town, which have come to our knowledge.

Ramlah. The houses are built of stone, and are provided with domes and terraces. The country around is a plain of several miles in extent—extremely fertile. The town is situated on a rising ground, commanding a very extensive view of the level, open country, by which it is surrounded on all sides. Ophthalmia very prevalent here. Dr. WITTMAN, p. 152.

At Ramla "we saw several plantations of Indian corn, with vineyards, gardens containing fruit and vegetables, and fields of cotton. The numerous olive trees without the town, and the numerous date trees interspersed between the buildings, furnished a most agreeable picture.

The pavement of the streets is intermixed with portions of marble: and the houses, being partly built of that material, which is here of a yellowish cast, and partly of stone, with the addition dition of domes and terraces, have a neat appearance. p. 172.

Oct. 15, 1800. Visited the ruins of an old mosque, about a quarter of a mile from the town of Ramla: went up the steeple. Counted 112 steps to the gallery. Ruins and remains of a large building, with subterranea. Ramla is built on a gentle eminence on the plain westward of the mountains: has all the appearance of plenty around it; the country having a very fertile aspect. There are many buildings in ruins in the town.

16. Left Ramla about 5 o'clock. Stopped at a small miserable, Arab village, about two hours' ride off. At the entrance of the pass through the mountains is another village, where the kings of the Jews once resided, called Latron. A ruin to the left, said to have been a palace. Between this place and Ramla the country begins to alter its shape, becoming by degrees mountainous. We continued our route from Latron to Jeremiah, a village in the mountains, about three hours' ride from Jerusalem. At Jeremiah, they say the prophet of that name was born: here are the remains of a church, built by the empress Helena. On our way to Jerusalem, we met six Greek priests, who, we at first imagined, were come out to meet us; but it proved otherwise, as they continued their route, having only alighted from their horses in compliment to the general. Not long after, and as we got up the last hill, the Mosolem and others came out to meet the general, with a concourse of men and boys; and, I suppose, between two and three thousand men, women, and children, assembled outside the town, to see us, and to follow us into the city. Men with a kind of torch lighted us along. [Major HOPE.]

[When Dr. E. D. CLARKE was here, in 1801, it was a dreadful scene of devastation. Skeletons were lying in all the streets. A plague during the preceding year had carried off not only men, women, and children, but cattle of all kinds, and every thing that had life. Comp. RAMAH III. which is the same town.]

It is thought that the term Zophim imports the places which have an extensive view, or the watch-towers: as all Ramahs were heights, this appears to be very credible.

Possibly this might have a view of the Mediterranean sea on one side, and of the temple on the other side. This conjecture may be determined by some attentive traveller.]

RAMATH-LEHI, רַמַּת־לֶחִי, 'Ανελπισς ἑραυδωος, elevation of the jaw-bone; from רָם ram, to lift up, and לֶחִי lehi, or lechi, a jaw-bone.
LXX. throwing up of the jaw-bone; from רָם ramah, to cast.

RAMATH-LEHI, or RAMAT-LECHI, the Height of the Jaw-bone, or the cast of the Jaw-bone. The name of the place where Samson threw the jaw-bone on the ground, with which he had beat the Philistines. Probably this is the Lehi, Judg. xv. 9. See LEHI.

RAMETH, רָמַת, 'Ραμὶθ, lofty, sublime.
A city of Issachar, Josh. xix. 21.

[RAMESSES, the thunder, or exprobaton of the worm; otherwise, the apple falling, or dissolving, or the breaking of dissolving, or breaking of the worm.]

RAMESSES, or RAMESSE. Several kings of Egypt are known by this name. Syncellus reckons six. Chronic. p. 101, 103.

I. RAMESSES, successor of Uses, who reigned twenty-nine years.

II. RAMESSE-MENES, fifteen years.

III. RAMESSE-SEOS, twenty-three years.

IV. RAMESSE-MENOS, nineteen years.

V. RAMESSE-TUBAETE, thirty-nine years.

VI. RAMESSE-VAPHRES, twenty-nine years.

All these princes reigned successively; only between the second and third was one called Thusimares. Syncellus speaks elsewhere of another Rameses, whom he places between Armais and Amenophis, kings of Egypt; also of one called Rhampsis, whom he places between Kertos and Amenemes.

speaks of Rameses, or Armeses, and of Ramesses Miamum, predecessor of Amenophis.—
Usher places Rameses, the successor of Armais,
A. M. 2426. He reigned but a year and four months; and Rameses Miamum succeeded him, A. M. 2427, and reigned sixty-six years and two months. His successor was Amenophis. Usher thinks Rameses was that new king who knew not Joseph, and oppressed the Israelites in Egypt, Exod i. 8. He was drowned in the Red Sea.

Marsham places this Rameses in the sixteenth century of the Egyptian era; which answers to the reigns of Joash, Amasiah, Azariah, Jothan, and Ahaz, kings of Judah. He thinks it was he who caused to be made the famous obelisk mentioned by Pliny, Hermapion, and Ammia-nus Marcellinus, which is now before the church of the Lateran at Rome. Pliny, lib. xxxvi. cap.
8. Hermap. apud Ammianum Marcel, lib. xviii.
—The magnificent encomiums on this prince, inscribed on this obelisk in hieroglyphical characters, and the empire of the world ascribed to him,

him, cannot agree, according to Marsham, with any other than a successor of Sesostris, whom he thinks to be much later than the time of Moses.

Pliny says, lib. xxxvi. cap. 8. that Ramesses who caused this great obelisk to be made, reigned in Egypt at the time of the taking of Troy.

[A city in the extremity of Egypt, built by the Israelites, as Jerom informs us in his Hebrew Questions, in the nome called Arsenoitic. Gen. xlvii. 11. Numb. xxxiii. 5. Whether Ramesses were the name of a king of Egypt,—see FRAGMENTS, No. DXLI. Whether the modern Rhammaniah, between Alexandria and Cairo ?]

RAMIAH, רמיה, elevation, or sublimity of the Lord; from רם rum, and יה jah, the Lord; or, rejected of the Lord; from רמח to reject.

RAMIAH, or ΡΕΜΕΙΑ, son of Parosh, a singer, who returned from Babylon; Ezra x. 25.

RAMLA, a city of Palestine, on the road from Joppa to Jerusalem. See II RAMAH.—This city was formerly very magnificent, and surrounded by strong walls. It is said, that a house there, which is the ordinary residence of pilgrims, belonged to Nicodemus. There are still remaining two fine churches, at present reduced to mosques; one dedicated to St. John, the other to the Holy Virgin; under the name of the forty Martyrs, whose bodies were brought from Sebaste in Armenia.

RAMOTH, רמות, Ραμὼθ, eminences, high places.

RAMOTH, a famous city in the mountains of Gilead. Often called Ramoth-Gilead; sometimes Ramoth; and sometimes Ramath-mizpeh, or the Watch-tower. רמות המצפה. Josh. xiii. 26. The Vulgate makes two cities of it, Ramoth and Masphe. Josephus calls it Ramatham, or Aramatha. This city belonged to Gad. It was assigned to the Levites, and was one of the cities of refuge beyond Jordan. Deut. iv. 43. Josh. xx. 8. xxi. 38. It became famous during the reigns of the later kings of Israel, and was the occasion of several wars between these princes and the kings of Damascus, who had conquered it, and from whom the kings of Israel endeavoured to regain it. 1 Kings xxii. 2 Kings viii. 28, 29. 2 Chron. xxii. 5. Jehoram king of Judah, was dangerously wounded at the siege of this place: and Jehu, son of Nimshi, was here anointed king of Israel, by a prophet sent by Elisha. 2 Kings ix. Ahab, king of Israel, was killed in battle with the Syrians before this place. 2 Chr. xviii. 3. Eusebius says, Ramoth was fifteen miles from Philadelphia east. Jerom places it in the neighbourhood of Jabok, and consequently, north of Philadelphia.

II. RAMOTH, son of Bani. Ezer. x. 29.

[RANSOM. A price paid to recover a person or thing, from one who detains that person or thing in captivity. Hence prisoners of war are said to be ransomed, when they are liberated in exchange for a valuable consideration: hence captives taken as slaves, by the piratical states of Barbary, &c. are said to be ransomed, when they are bought from those who hold them in slavery. Whatever is substituted, or exchanged, in compensation for the party, is his ransom; but, apparently, the word ransom is more extensively taken in Scripture: hence a man is said to ransom his life. Exod. xxi. 30. to substitute a sum of money instead of his life, vide chap. xxx. 12. Job xxxvi. 18. Psalm xlix. 7. and some kinds of sacrifices might be regarded as ransoms, in some respects, i. e. as substitutes for the offerer. In like manner Christ is said to give himself a ransom for all, 1 Tim. ii. 6. Matt. xx. 28. Mark x. 45. a substitute for them, bearing sufferings in their stead, undergoing that penalty which would otherwise attach on them. Vide Rom. iii. 24. vii. 23. 1 Cor. i. 30. Ephes. i. 7. iv. 30. Heb. ix. 15. Comp. REDEEMER.]

RAPHIA, ראפיה, relaxation: otherwise, physic. 1 Chron. viii. 2. Fifth son of Benjamin.—Son of Tola, of Issachar, 1 Chr. vii. 25.

II. RAPHA, or Rephaiah, son of Binea, of Benjamin. 1 Chr. viii. 37.

RAPHAEL, ראפאל, physic of God; from ראפא rapha, to cure, to administer physic, and אל el, God. [q. protector?] 1 Chron. xxvi. 7.

RAPHAEL, one of the seven arch-angels which stand continually before the throne of God, ready to perform his commands. The name of the angel Raphael is not found in Scripture, but only Tob. xii. 15. It is not in the New Testament; and, in general, the names of angels do not appear to have been known before the captivity of Babylon. Tobit having determined to send his young son Tobias, to fetch money from Gabael, as Tobias was seeking a guide, he happily found an angel, in a human form, who offered himself for a drachma a day, and his food, to conduct him safe to Rages, and back to Nineveh. The Vulgate makes no mention of this bargain; but the Greek and Latin notice it. The Roman drachma or denarius was about seven pence three farthings of our money. This guide took the name of Azarias, son of Ananias the Great, and Tobit, who knew that family, said, "You are of an illustrious race, my brother:" he ate and drank with Tobias during the journey, and did nothing that could give any suspicion of his being an angel.

They departed from Nineveh; and on the banks of the river Tigris, Tobias went to wash his feet in the river; when a great fish advanced toward him as if to devour him. But Raphael bid.

bid him seize it, cut it up, and take out the heart, gall, and liver, which he was to reserve. When near Ecbatana, Raphael said to Tobias, here dwells Raguel, who has an only daughter, whom you ought to marry, according to the law, for you are her nearest kinsman, and she is the only heiress of her father. Tobias mentioned a report, that this young woman had already had seven husbands, who had all been put to death by an evil spirit. Raphael bid him take courage, told him the devil could have no power over those, who entered into the state of matrimony in the fear of the Lord; that, besides, he had a sure remedy against evil spirits, in the heart of the fish he had about him; for he need but broil it on the fire, and they would presently be put to flight.

They went therefore to Raguel's house; Tobias married Sarah; and, by observing the direction of Raphael, was secured from misfortune. While the days of the marriage were celebrating, Tobias sent Raphael to Gabael, to receive the money. When returning to Nineveh, Raphael persuaded Tobias to go before, to his father and mother, who were in great anxiety on account of his long absence. After their first salutations, Tobias, by advice of Raphael, put upon his father's eyes the gall of the fish he had taken; by which in half an hour's time the old man recovered his sight.

After this, they addressed themselves to Raphael, whom they still took for a man, and desired that he would accept of half their substance, as a recompence for his great services.—But Raphael told them in private, that they must thank God the author of all their good. When you gave alms, said he, and when you buried the dead, I presented your prayers to the Lord; and because you were acceptable in his eyes, he brought you into temptation in order to prove you. Now therefore the Lord has sent me to cure you, and to deliver Sarah, your son's wife, from the power of the devil; for I am the angel Raphael, one of the seven that are always before the Lord. Bless him therefore, and sing his praises. Having said this, he vanished. Vide TOBIT, &c.

It has been inquired, whether in this Raphael did not tell an untruth? It cannot be denied that he told a falsehood, since certainly he was neither Azarias, nor the son of Ananias, nor an Israelite, nor a man, as he appeared to be. He speaks contrary to his own thoughts, and against his own knowledge; he made Tobias believe what was contrary to truth. But commentators generally acquit him of lying. He was sent of God, to conduct young Tobias, under the shape of a young man called Azarias; he was therefore to act and speak like him, and in his name. The angels that appeared to the patriarchs, and to Moses, spoke and acted as if they were God himself, because God sent them to represent his person. An actor who represents Cyrus, says, without speaking an untruth, "I am Cyrus."—Besides, supernatural actions, are not subject to common and ordinary rules, but are of a higher order and character.

It is inquired how Raphael ate and drank? whether he did really eat and drink, or in appearance only? Some maintain that he did not drink, and Raphael seems express for this opinion, when he says, "it seemed to you that I ate and drank with you; but as for me, I am fed with invisible food." Therefore he only seemed to eat, and the senses of Tobias and the rest were imposed upon when they thought he took nourishment, whereas really he took none. Others pretend, that such angels as have appeared to men have really eaten. Justin Martyr, Dialog. cum Tryphon. makes no difficulty of it, since in heaven the blessed spirits are fed, as he says, with the bread of angels, as the Scripture speaks. Tertullian also acknowledges, that angels having appeared clothed with natural flesh, may also have eaten really and naturally. Cont. Marcion, lib. iii. cap. 9. [Vide ASMONEUS: and consider whether, supposing the story of Tobit to be founded on fact, the angels both good and bad are not figurative personages: whether Raphael signifies any thing more than the salutary protecting agency of Divine Providence, so disposing events as to produce a happy issue: consequently, no just inferences can be drawn from this history beyond the general notion of a superintending power which employs whatever means it pleases to accomplish its purposes; to reward piety, and to punish profligacy: a sentiment better illustrated elsewhere; in the sacred volume.]

RAPHAÏM, רַפְּאִים, giants, Deut. ii. 11. from רָפָא raphah: otherwise, physicians, or relaxed, or that relax, that weaken; from רָפָא raphah [q. protectors?] Vide REPHAÏM.

RAPHANEA, a city of Syria, between which and Arca, or Arac, a city of Judea belonging to the kingdom of Agrippa, the Sabbatical River flowed. Joseph. de Bello, lib. vii. cap. 24. Raphanea, perhaps, is the Arpad of 2 Kings xviii. 34. xix. 13. Isai. x. 9. xxxvi. 19. xxxvii. 13. Jerem. xlix. 23. See ARPAD.

RAPHIA, a famous city on the Mediterranean, between Gaza and Rhinocorura. I do not find it in the Old Testament, which is pretty remarkable, except it be Gath, of the Rephaim; 1 Chron. xx. 6. whence perhaps it might be named Raphia or Raphia. Gath could not be far far distant. Raphia is famous for the victory of Philopator, king of Egypt, over Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. 3 Macc. i. 11. Josephus says, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 21. that Raphia was taken by Alexander Jannæus; and that having been ruined in the wars, it was repaired by Gabinius. Josephus and Polybius put Raphia as the first city of Syria, on the road from Egypt. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 10. de Bello, lib. v. cap. 14. Polyb. Hist. lib. v. Reland. Palæst. lib. iii. p. 967. There are extant some ancient medals struck at Raphia; and bishops of this city are found in the lists of the eastern councils.

RAPHON, 'Ραφὼν, physic, or suppression; from רפא rapha: otherwise, giant: from רפה raphah: otherwise, softness; from ריפון riphon.

RAPHON, a city beyond Jordan, on a brook, not far from Carnaim.

This city is hardly known, but by the victory of Judas Maccabeus over Timotheus, whose army was composed of Arabians, and what other people he could get, to the number of 120,000 foot, and 2,500 horse.

Judas had then but 6,000 effective men: he instantly marched to meet Timotheus, and crossed the brook at the head of his little army. The enemy was so surprised at this bold attempt, that they could not stand the assault, but fled with great precipitation. 1 Macc. v. 37.

RAPHU, רפא, 'Ραφὼ, cured, comforted. Father of Palti, Numb. xiii. 9.

RAVEN, a bird of prey, in colour black: unclean by the law; Levit. xi. 15. When Noah sent the raven out of the ark, to see if the waters were withdrawn from covering the earth, this bird did not return to him. Gen. viii. 6. 7.

When the prophet Elijah, by order from the Lord, retired near the brook Cherith, the Lord fed him for some time by means of ravens, who brought him bread and flesh morning and evening. 1 Kings xvii. 5. אֶת הָעֹרֵבִים צִיֵּיתִי. Some interpreters, instead of ravens, translate the words Arabians, or merchants, or inhabitants of the city of Arabo, or Oreb, near to Bethshan. Euseb. et Hieronym. in Araba, seu Aravas.—To support these translations it is observed, that the raven being an unclean bird, there is no probability that God would use his service.—Notwithstanding, the generality of interpreters keep to the version of ravens. If those that supplied Elijah with flesh and bread had been men, why could they not also have supplied him with water, when the brook Cherith was dried up? then he need not have been forced to another retreat, with the poor widow of Sarepta. See ELIJAH. Add.

The raven was consecrated to Apollo, as the god of divination. The blackness of the raven is proverbial. "His locks are bushy and black as a raven." Cant. v. 11. However, white ravens, are not rare in northern countries, where the snow lies long on the ground. The raven is long-lived. Pliny says, lib. vii. cap. 48. it lives the age of nine men; but he allows this to be a story. We are assured, that they live sometimes a hundred years. They feed on carrion, and eat the bodies of men hung up, or crucified:

— Non pasces in cruce corvos, says Horace, Epist. l. 1. v. 48.

The wise man says, Prov. xxx. 17. "The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it." Zephaniah, ii. 14. seems to suggest, that they fed ravens at the doors of their houses. But he rather insinuates, that after the desolation of the Edomites, the Moabites and the Ammonites, the ravens [Eng. Tr. the cormorant and the bittern] shall be seen upon their windows, and upon the doors of their ruined houses. This bird may be taught to talk, and to imitate the human voice.

There are several kinds of ravens. Some have their bills and legs red. There is also a red raven, Pyrrhus corax; it is smaller than a crow, and about the bigness of a small owl. Its legs and beak are yellow, inclining toward black; but every where else it is quite black.

The wood-raven, called by the Lorrainers, the sea-crow, is the size of a hen. Seen at a distance, it seems to be black all over; but seen close, especially when the sun shines on it, it appears greenish. Its bill is reddish and pretty long, its feet are like those of a hen, it feeds on worms and insects; its legs are long and of a dark ruddy colour. It builds its nest at the top of uninhabited towers that are going to decay.

The small raven, or night-raven, nycticorax, haunts the waters, and retires into the reeds, where in the night-time it makes a very disagreeable noise, such as a man when he is vomiting. It builds its nest at the top of a tree, lays two or three eggs, and generally feeds on fishes. We find in Moses the name of a bird which is translated pelican, Psalm. cii. 6. and Levit. xi. 18, which comes from a root that signifies to vomit, and which may be this raven. See PELICAN; also, the NATURAL HISTORY.

RAVISH, Rapere. This word in its common signification imports the taking away of any thing from any one by violence. Alii rapiunt non sua. Prov. xi. 24. It is also used for the taking away by force, (i. e. the rape of) a woman or virgin. Sichem rapuit Dinam, et dormivit cum ea. Gen. xxxiv. 2. And in Judges, Rapite ex his singuli uxorem sibi. chap. xxi. 21. D div. 2 Saul Saul in his anger calls Jonathan his son, Fili mulieris virum ultra rapiens; Vulgate: the son of a woman that ravisheth a man, 1 Sam. xx. 30.

RAZIS, 'Pazic, secret; or mystery of the Lord: or the Lord is my secret; from רז naz, secret, and יה יה, the Lord.

RAZIS, or RAZIAS; one of the most considerable doctors at Jerusalem, in the time of the persecution by Antiochus Epiphanes. After the death of this prince, and of Antiochus Eupator his son, and under the reign of Demetrius Soter, son of Seleucus, 2 Macc. xiv. 37. A. M. 3843, ante A. D. 161. Alcimus, the usurper, having bought the high-priesthood of the Jews, of king Demetrius, was sent into Judea, with Nicanor to support him in his dignity. Razis was accused to Nicanor, probably as being partial to Judas Maccabeus, and averse to Alcimus, he having no right to the high-priesthood. Nicanor therefore sent 500 men to arrest him, thinking that if he could succeed in bringing him over, it would make a great impression on the rest of the Jews.

When therefore, Razis saw that the soldiers would break into his house, and put fire to it, and that he could not avoid falling into their hands; he fell upon his sword, choosing rather to die bravely, than to see himself in the power of wicked men, and to suffer indignities unbecoming his birth and quality. But in his hurry, not having wounded himself mortally, and seeing the soldiers enter in multitudes into his house, he ran up to the platform, and threw himself from thence into the street; yet neither did this fall entirely dispatch him; but he drew his own bowels out of his body, and threw them with both his hands among the people, invoking the ruler of life and of the soul, to restore them again to him another day.

The Jews put Razis among their most illustrious martyrs, and pretend to prove from his example, and from those of Saul and Samson, that in certain cases self-murder is not only allowed, but is laudable and meritorious. The Circoncilians, a sort of noted heretics of Africa, in the time of St. Austin, pleaded the example of Razis, in justification of those cruelties they exercised against themselves, by throwing themselves headlong, and putting themselves to death in a thousand different manners; to promote, as they pretended, the glory of God.

Nevertheless, St. Austin, Thomas Aquinas, and other casuists, maintain that the example of Razis being only related in [Apocryphal] Scripture, but not approved, nothing could be concluded from thence to justify the action. Is it thus the martyrs used to behave themselves? true, he died bravely and heroically; but were it not better to have died humbly, patiently, and submissively? St. Austin's words are; dictum est quod elegerit nobiliter mori. Malius vellem humiliter; sic enim utiliter. Illis autem verbis historia gentium laudare consuevit, sed viros fortes hujus sæculi, non martyres Christi.

[RAZOR, an instrument for shaving the hair from the face, head, &c. The Psalmist compares the tongue of Doeg (Psalm lii. 2.) to a sharp razor, starting aside from what should be its true operation, to a bloody purpose and effect. The prophet threatens to shave, i. e. to scrape with violence, to despoil very closely, to leave nothing untouched, with a hired razor, i. e. by a person who will be paid, a power who fights for plunder, the cities and provinces of Judah, &c. every part of them; the hair of the head, the hair of the beard, and the hair of the feet, or pubes. Isa. vii. 20. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CLII.

Shaving was a sign of mourning, (vide SHAVING) but shaving by a stranger, a foreigner, an enemy, was a sign of captivity, and very likely it alludes to a custom of the heathen priests, who (at least, those of Egypt, as Herodotus testifies) shaved themselves every day, or two, all over, as well the body, as the head and beard: if this were also a custom among the Babylonians, as is very credible, then the application and force of this metaphor is clear.

In reference to this "shaving by a razor that is hired," I think it likely that there is an implication of contempt as well as suffering, included in it, as the office of a barber ambulant has seldom been esteemed of any dignity, either in the east or in the west. That the allusion is not unknown at present in Asia, appears from a song, whose versification, if none of the best, yet was popular, "being bawled about the streets of Aleppo, after the retreat of Nadir Shah from Mousul, in the year 1748.

Tahmas, where is he! where is he!
An iron mace between his shoulders;
May a razor shave his beard!
And a sword cut off his head!
Tahmas, where is he! where is he!

As Nadir had failed of his purpose, is not contempt likely to be vented by his enemies, in this triumphant ballad?]

[REAP,

[REAP, REAPING, is such a natural employment in agriculture, that it almost glides of itself into a metaphorical action, at once expressive, and easily understood. REBA, or REBE, or REB, a prince of the Midianites, killed in the war that Moses, by order from the Lord, waged against them by the hand of Phinehas, son of the high-priest Eleazar, for the punishment of their crime in seducing Israel. Numb. xxxi. 8. Josh. xiii. 21.

REBEKAH, רבקה, fat, fattened; from רבק rabak; otherwise, quarrel appeased, or removed; from רוב rub, quarrel, dispute, and קחח kachah, to make dull. [plump; like an animal cooped up.]

REBEKAH, or REBECCA, daughter of Bethuel. Gen. xxiv. Eliezer, the steward of Abraham's house, went to fetch a wife for Isaac from Haram, a city of Mesopotamia; and he brought Rebecca. She lived with Isaac twenty years, without having children: he interceded for her by his prayers; and she became pregnant with two children; these struggling together in her womb, and giving her great uneasiness, she consulted the Lord on this occasion; who told her that two nations were in her womb; and that the elder should be subject to the younger. It is not agreed who Rebekah consulted with: some insist, that she went to Shem, son of Noah; others, to Melchisedec; others, to Heber; others to Abraham: and some think she went to sacrifice on Mount Moria, or on the altar erected by Abraham, in the forest of Beer-sheba, and that while she slept there God revealed this to her. Petr. Comestr. Hist. Scholiast, Diodor. et Procop. in Genes. Theodor. qu. 76. in Genes.

When Rebekah's time was come, she was delivered of twins. The first being ruddy and hairy, they named Esau. The other immediately followed, holding in his hand the heel of his brother; wherefore they called him Jacob; the Heeler. Esau delighted in hunting; but Jacob was a plain, homestead man. Isaac had most inclination for Esau, but Jacob was the favourite of Rebekah. See JACOB and ISAAC.

A great famine having forced Isaac to Gerar, a city of the Philistines, of which Abimelech was king; when asked, who Rebekah was? Isaac answered "his sister;" because he feared they might put him to death, in order to possess his wife. Abimelech one day perceived him to caress her in a manner, that better agreed with a husband than a brother: he ordered Isaac to be called, and reprimanded him; and forbade any one to meddle with this man's wife, on pain of death.

Jacob, by the management of his mother Rebekah, having surprised his father's blessing, to the prejudice of his brother Esau; Esau threatened to take his revenge for it. Rebekah had notice of his design, and to prevent it, advised Jacob to travel into Mesopotamia, to his uncle Laban, and there to marry one of his daughters. She prevailed with Isaac to consent to this journey, insinuating, that her life was a burden, on account of the daughters of Heth, whom Esau had married; and that if Jacob should also take a wife of this country, her life would no longer be supportable. Scripture makes no farther mention of Rebekah; and the year of her death is uncertain: but she certainly died before Isaac; because it is said, that Isaac was put into the tomb with Rebekah his wife; which tomb was the same wherein Abraham and Sarah were buried, and afterwards Jacob and Leah. Gen. xlix. 31. xxxv. 29.

RECHAH, רכח, tender, soft; from רכך racac. [the side; a place in the side of a mountain.] 1 Chron. iv. 12.

RECHAB, רכב, square, or chariot, or team of horses, or rider. 2 Kings x. 15.

RECHAB and Baanah, assassins of Ishbosheth, son of Saul. See ISH-BOSHETH, or BAANAH.

II. RECHAB, father of Jonadab, and of the Rechabites. It is not known in what time this Rechab lived, nor what was his origin. Some derive him from the tribe of Judah. Theodoret, in 1 Paral. initio. Others think he was a priest, or at least a Levite; Hegesippus, apud Euseb. lib. ii. cap. 23. Hist. Eccles. because it is said, Jeremiah xxxv. 19. that there shall be always found of the descendants of Jonadab steadfast to the service of the Lord. Some Rabbins pretend, that the Rechabites having married daughters of the priests or Levites, their children were employed in the temple service.—Others think, that indeed they waited in the temple, but only as servants, like the Gibeonites, and Nethinim. Josh. ix. 27. 1 Chron. ix. 2. Ezra ii. 43, 55, 58, 70. Neh. vii. 57, &c. We read in 1 Chron. ii. 55. that the Rechabites were originally Kenites, and that they were singers in the house of God. The Hebrew has it; “porters and the obedient, that dwell under tents; these are those that are called Kenites, who are descended from Hemath, chief of the house of Rechab.”

The Kenites descended from Midian, son of Cush, by Hobab, or Jethro, father-in-law of Moses. They entered the promised land with the Hebrews, and dwelt in the tribe of Judah, about the Dead Sea. They were distinguished from the Israelites by their retired life, and by their dislike of cities and houses. Some have thought, that Hobab or Jethro was the first founder of the Rechabites; that Rechab was one of his names; that Jonadab, in the time of Jehu, was one of his posterity; that Heber the Kenite followed the customs of the Rechabites. Serrarius distinguishes the ancient Rechabites, descended from and instituted by Jethro, from the new Rechabites of Jonadab, son of Rechab, in the time of Jehu. Arias Montan. in Judic. i. Sanctius, in Jerem. xxxv. n. 5, 6, 7. Serrarius. Trihaeres. lib. iii. cap. 9. Minerval. cap. 13, 14, 15.

Scripture acquaints us, Jer. xxxv. 6, 7. that Jonadab, son of Rechab, in the time of Jehu, king of Israel, laid an injunction on his posterity, not to drink wine, not to build houses, not to plant vineyards, to have no lands, and to dwell in tents, all their lives. This laid no obligation on other Kenites, nor on other descendants of Jethro. This they continued to observe above three hundred years; Jehu began to reign A. M. 3120, and Jehoiakim, king of Judah, was put to death A. M. 3405, ante A. D. 599. but in the last year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, Nebuchadnezzar coming to besiege Jerusalem, the Rechabites were forced to take refuge in the city, still, however, lodging in tents. During this siege, Jeremiah received orders from the Lord, to invite them into the temple, and to offer them wine to drink. But they answered; “We will drink no wine; for so Jonadab the son of Rechab, our father, commanded us,” &c. “Then came the word of the Lord unto Jeremiah, reproving Judah, saying, “The words of Jonadab the son of Rechab, that he commanded his sons not to drink wine, are performed; yet I have spoken unto you, rising early and speaking, but ye hearkened not unto me.” Lastly, directing his discourse to the Rechabites, he tells them; “Because ye have obeyed the commandment of Jonadab your father, Jonadab the son of Rechab, shall not want a man to stand before me for ever.”

The Rechabites were, probably, led captive, after the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans; since we read in the title of Psalm lxx. that it was sung “by the sons of Jonadab, and by the principal captives,” (Vulgate, Psalmus David, filiorum Jonadab, et priorum captivorum) which were Ezekiel and Mordecai, carried away by the Chaldeans beyond the Euphrates, after the taking of Jerusalem under king Jehoiakim. They returned from their captivity, and settled in the city of Jabez beyond Jordan; as appears by 1 Chron. ii. 55. “The race of the scribes that dwelt at Jabez, called porters, obedient, and dwelling in tents, are the Kenites, descended from Hemath, father of the house of Rechab.” [Thus the author translates this passage, which is variously rendered by interpreters. The Vulgate has it; Cognationes quoque scribarum, habitantium in Jabez, canentes atque resonantes, et in tabernaculis commorantes. Hi sunt Cinari, qui venerunt de Calore patris domus Rechab. The English reads; “and the families of the scribes which dwelt at Jabez; the Tirathites, the Shimeathites, and Suchathites: these are the Kenites that come of Hemath the father of the house of Rechab.” The Hebrew will admit either of these interpretations.] This passage has its difficulties: some think, that Jabez is not a city, but a person whom the Kenites acknowledged as master. No farther mention is made of the Kenites, in the books written after the captivity of Babylon.

Some have suggested that the Assideans of the Maccabees, 1 Macc. ii. 42. vii. 13. 2 Macc. xiv. 6. were successors and followers of the Rechabites. Others have confounded the Rechabites with the Essenes. Ita ex Nilo et Suid. Serrarius. Trihaeres. lib. iii. cap. 9. But certain it is, that the manner of life of the Essenes, which is well known, was very different from that of the Rechabites; as appears from Josephus, Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 2. who informs us, that the Essenes had fields, and dwelt in houses; but had neither wives nor children; and performed no religious ceremonies with the other Jews at Jerusalem: all which was contrary to the practice of the Rechabites. Hegesippus, cited by Eusebius, lib. ii. cap. 23. relates, that as St. James was leading away to be stoned, a priest of the race of the Rechabites, cried out to the Jews, “What are you doing? The just man prays for you.” It is certain, as we have observed, that the Rechabites were not priests: but, as they served served in the temple, this author might have taken them for priests; or he may have used the word priest in a generical sense, meaning all ministers of the Lord.

Benjamin of Tudela, Itiner. p. 75, 76. says, that in his travels, he saw a large country inhabited by the sons of Rechab. But his whole relation has the air of a fable.

REDEEMER. This name is given, by way of eminence, to Jesus Christ the Redeemer and Saviour of the world. In the law of Moses, Lev. xxv. 25, 47, 48. it is given to him who has the right of redemption in an inheritance, or even to a near kinsman, who may redeem it from a stranger, or any Jew that had bought it. Moses ordained, that neither estates in land, nor the persons of the Hebrews, should be sold for ever; but that every one might resume the possession of his estate, or his personal liberty, in the sabbatical year; and at the jubilee. But without waiting for these years, when any relation was rich enough, and had power to redeem the goods or liberty of his brother, the law enabled him to do it. And this it calls the right of redemption; giving also the name of redeemer to the relation who claimed this right. Lev. xxv. xxvii.

We see an instance of the practice of this law, in the history of Ruth. Ruth ii. 20. iii. 9, &c. Boaz being one of the nearest relations of Elimelech, married Ruth the heiress of Elimelech, and thereby re-entered into the possession of her estate. Jeremiah redeemed the field of his nephew Hanameel, which was on the point of being sold to another. Jer. xxxii. 7, 8.

He was also called The Redeemer of Blood [Eng. Tr. The Revenger of Blood] גואל הדם Goel haddam; Numb. xxxv. 12, 19, 21. Deut. xix. 6, 12. who had a right to revenge the blood of his murdered kinsman. To curb the resentment of these avengers, or redeemers, God appointed cities of refuge throughout Israel. Vide REFUGE, and FRAGMENTS, No. X.

REDEMPTION, of the first-born. See FIRST-BORN, or Exod. xiii. 2, 13, 29, 30. Numb. xviii. 15, 16, 17.

RED-HEIFER. The Lord spake unto Moses, saying: "Command the children of Israel to bring a red-heifer, perfect and without blemish, which has never borne the yoke. Eleazar the high-priest, taking it without the camp, shall kill it before all the people. He shall dip his finger in the blood of this heifer, and shall make aspersions seven times towards the entry of the tabernacle, and shall burn it in the presence of all the people, putting into the flames not only the flesh and the hide, but also the blood and the excrements of the victim. Also the priest shall cast into the fire that consumes the heifer, a bundle of cedar-wood, some hyssop, and double-dyed scarlet. Then he shall wash his garments and his body, and returning into the camp, shall be unclean till the evening, &c. Vide Numb. xix.

Spencer, de Leg. Rit. lib. ii. cap. 15. thinks, that this ceremony was designed in opposition to the Egyptian superstitions. The Egyptians never sacrificed cows or heifers; and the Hebrews seldom sacrificed any but male animals. The Egyptians abhorred red hair, and all animals of that colour. The Hebrews made no distinction in the colour of their victims, except on this occasion. Jerom, Epist. 27. and others think, they sacrificed the red-heifer yearly, and distributed the ashes into the towns of Israel.—Some rabbins maintain, that there was but one burnt from Moses to Esdras; and that from Esdras to the destruction of the temple by the Romans, there were but six burnt, or nine at most. Jerom informs us, that this ceremony was performed on the Mount of Olives, over against the temple, after the ark was settled at Jerusalem. The Jews say, that the high-priest always offered this sacrifice, from the first building of the temple.

The red-heifer offered without the camp, was a type of Jesus Christ, whose blood purifies our consciences from all sin. Heb. ix. 14.

[There are various particulars connected with this ceremony. Though the Apis of Egypt was black, yet the Apis of India is "red-coloured," see APIS, Add. consequently, the Hebrew red heifer could not be in opposition to this; which is the original of the Egyptian superstition. The virtue of purifying from defilement by contact with a dead body, did not reside in the abundance of water with which the person previously washed himself; but in the ashes of the heifer, however small their quantity, with which he was baptized by sprinkling, Heb. x. 10, 13. It is no improbable conjecture, that the dispute between the disciples of John and the Jews about purifying, John iii. 25. turned on this point, "How could simple water—water having no ashes in it,—purify?" and the Baptist, in another place, pleads the authority of "him who sent me to baptize with simple water." As no heifer can be burnt under the present condition of the Jews, it follows, that they cannot, on their own legal principles, be fully purified from the defilement communicated by the dead: they wash wash their clothes, the furniture of their apartments, their rooms, &c. but the ashes are still wanting, for the purification of their persons.]

REEDS. The Vale, or Brook, of Reeds, Vallis Arundineti, River of Kanah. נַחַל קָנָה. Josh. xvi. 8. xvii. 9. Was at the northern limits of the tribe of Ephraim, bordering on the tribe of Manasseh. The precise situation is unknown.

REED, put into the hands of our Saviour, at his passion. It is thought this was a common reed or cane, given him in derision, instead of a sceptre, as an appendage of mock-royalty.

REELIAH, רִעְלִיָּה, Ῥεελιας, surprise, or astonishment of the Lord, or the Lord that inebriates, the Lord is my drunkenness; from רָעַל rahal, astonished, drunk, and יָהּ jah, the Lord; otherwise, shepherd, or companion of the Lord; from רָעָה raha, or roheh, according to different readings, pastor, or companion, לִי li, to, and יָהּ jah, the Lord. [trembling of the Lord; i. e. perhaps, a very great trembling, or occasion of alarm and trepidation.] One of the priests, who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel, Ezr. ii. 2.

REFUGE. Cities of Refuge. To provide security for those, who undesignedly should happen to kill a man, the Lord commanded Moses to appoint six cities of refuge, or Asyla, that whoever against his will should have spilt blood, might retire thither, and have time to prepare his defence before the judges; and that the kinsman of the deceased might not pursue him thither and kill him. Exod. xx. 13. Numb. xxxv. 11, &c. Of such cities there were three on each side Jordan. West of Jordan were Kedesh of Naphtali, Hebron, and Shechem. East of Jordan were Bezer, Golan, and Ramoth-Gilead. Josh. xx. 7, 8. They served not only for Hebrews, but for all strangers, who resided in the country. The rabbins confine the name strangers to proselytes; but in this, I think, they depart from the design of the law. Deut. xix. 1—8. The Lord also commanded, that when the Hebrews should multiply, and enlarge their country, they should add three other cities of refuge. As this command was never fulfilled, the rabbins say, that the Messiah will accomplish it.

Maimonides, from the traditions of the ancients, assures us, that all the forty-eight cities, appointed for habitations of the priests and Levites, were also cities of refuge; and that all the difference between them was, that the six cities appointed by the law, were obliged to receive and lodge refugees gratis: whereas the other cities might refuse to admit such as fled to them, and were not obliged to lodge them gratis. Besides the cities of refuge, the temple, and especially the altar of burnt-offerings, enjoyed the privilege of an asylum. Philo, Legat. ad Caium.

The rabbins say, that generally the altar was only for the priests. Those who took sanctuary in the temple, were presently examined by the judges; and if found guilty of murder, they were forced away even from the altar, and put to death without the temple. But if found innocent, they had a guard appointed to conduct them safely to some city of refuge.

These cities were to be of easy access. Every year, on the fifteenth of Adar (February) the magistrates of the cities inspected the roads, to see that they were in good condition. The city was to be well supplied with water and provisions. It was not allowed to make any weapons there, that the relations of the deceased might not procure arms to gratify their revenge. Lastly; it was necessary, that whoever took refuge there, should understand a trade or calling, that he might not be chargeable. They used to send some prudent and moderate persons, to meet those who were pursuing the culprit, in order to dispose them to clemency, and forgiveness, and to await the decision of justice.

[The rabbins say, that Moses appointed three cities of refuge beyond Jordan; and Joshua appointed three cities for the same purpose in Canaan; and these were opposite to each other. Hebron in Judea, was opposite to Bezer in the wilderness; Shechem in Mount Ephraim, to Ramoth in Gilead; and Kadesh in Mount Naphtali, to Golan in Bashan. The intervals also between these cities were as equally disposed as possible, so that there should be the same distance between them. Every impediment was removed from the roads to these cities: over every river was a bridge: every road was at least thirty-two cubits broad: and at every division of the road was a direction-post, on which was written Refuge, Refuge, for the guidance of him who was fleeing for security. At the death of the high-priest, the refugee might quit the city where he was: if he died before the high-priest, his remains were kept till the death of the high-priest: if any one should accidentally kill the high-priest, he might enter a city of refuge, but never quit it, say the rabbins.]

Though the manslayer had fled to the city of refuge, yet he was not thereupon exempt from the power of justice; Numb. xxxv. 12.: an information was lodged against him; he was summoned before the judges, and the people, to prove that the murder was truly casual, and involuntary. If found innocent, he dwelt safely in the city to which he had retired; if otherwise, he was put to death, according to the law. Scripture is not very express, whether the affair came under the cognizance of the judges of the place where the murder was committed, or of the judges of the city of refuge, to which the murderer had fled; and commentators are at variance on this matter. Comp. Deut. xix. 11, 12. Josh. xx. 4, 5, 6. Numb. xxxv. 25. But it appears to us, from the passage of Joshua, that the fugitive underwent two trials: first in the city of refuge, where the judges summarily examined the affair; secondly, in his own city, where the magistrates examined the cause more strictly. If the latter judges declared him innocent, they re-conducted him under a good guard to the city of refuge.

To inspire the greater horror, even of involuntary bloodshed, the law punished it by a kind of banishment; for the accused was obliged to dwell in this city, without quitting it, till the death of the high-priest: but after the high-priest's death, he was free to go where he pleased.

As to places of refuge among the Greeks and Romans, see ASYLUM. There was an asylum established at Athens by the Heraclidæ, in the temple of Misericordia. Theseus also built one there, in favour of slaves, and of the poor who should fly thither, from the oppression of the rich. There was one in the isle of Calauria.—The temples of Apollo at Delphi, of Juno at Samos, of Esculapius at Delos, of Bacchus at Ephesus, and many others in Greece, had the privilege of being asyla. Romulus gave this right to a wood adjoining the temple of Vejovis: Virgil, Æneid. viii. 342. Ovid speaks of a consecrated wood near Ostium, that enjoyed the same privilege. Fast. l. 1. St. Austin observes, de Civit. lib. i. cap. 34. that the whole city of Rome was an asylum to all strangers.—The number of these privileged places was so much increased in Greece, under the emperor Tiberius, that he was obliged to recall their licences, and to suppress them all; Sueton. in Tiberio. Tacit. Annal. lib. iii. cap. 6: but his decree was little observed after his death.

The right of asylum, passed from the temple of Jerusalem to Christian churches. The emperors Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius the Great, condemned to banishment, to whipping, to the loss of hair and beard, all who, on their own authority, should take a man out of a church, who had fled thither for refuge. Cod. Justin. lib. ix. tit. 29. Honorius and Theodosius the Younger, ordered, that such offenders should be punished as if guilty of treason. Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 11. But, afterwards, they were obliged to diminish these privileges, and to exempt certain crimes from the benefit of asylum. The emperor Justinian allowed, that all murderers, adulterers, ravishers, or stealers of virgins, might be taken from asylum. Innocent III. also excepts public robbers, and those who spoil fields in the night-time. The right of asylum subsists still in Italy, and in some other [Catholic states and] places.

REGEM, רֶגֶם, 'Ρεγμα, that stones, or is stoned; from רָגַם ragam: otherwise, purple; from אֲרָגָן argaman. [Possibly of the same import as in the feminine is written רִגְמָה reg-mah, a troop or array, sc. of children.] Son of Jahdai. 1 Chron. ii. 47.

REGEM-MELECH, רֶגֶם-מֶלֶךְ, 'Ρογὸν ὁ βασιλεὺς, he that stones the king; from רָגַם ragam, to stone, and מֶלֶךְ melec, a king; otherwise, the purple of the king, or of the council; from the Chaldean אֲרָגָן argaman, purple.—[Perhaps, the king's friend, in the sense of support or defence, as a troop or array of soldiers might be.] A Medish word.

REGEM-MELECH, and Sherezzer, sent a deputation to the priests and prophets at Jerusalem, to know if they were still to fast on the fifth month of the holy year, in memory of the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem, which had been burnt by the Chaldeans on the tenth day of the fifth month. Zech. vii. 2, &c. The answer of Zechariah the prophet, was, that God little regarded their fasts, unless accompanied by justice and charity: but he did not answer directly the question, concerning the fast of the fifth month. For which reason they continued the observance of it, and still continue it.

Who were Regem-Melech and Sherezzer?—Some think they were Babylonian proselytes, fearing God, and officers of the king, who conformed to the religious observances of the Jews of their country. Ita Hebræi tempore D. Hieronym. ad Zech. vii. Theodoret conjectures that they were chiefs of the Cushites in Palestine, or of other people come into this country. Grotius, Sanctius, Menochius, think they were chiefs of Jews dwelling at a distance from Jerusalem: and indeed there is great probability that this deputation came from beyond the Euphrates.—Could the Jews of Palestine be ignorant of what was observed in the country where they lived; they, who every year went thrice to Jerusalem?

REGENERATION, is used in two senses, by the sacred authors of the New Testament: 1st, for that spiritual birth received from grace; 2dly, for that new life we expect at the resurrection.

By the transgression of Adam, we are born children of wrath, according to St. Paul: Eph. ii. 3. To efface this original blemish, we must receive a new birth by grace, which may make us children of God. St. John mentions it in several places: In the beginning of his gospel, chap i. 12, 13. he says, that believers in Jesus Christ, become children of God; not by the will of the flesh, nor by the will of man, but by a new birth from God. And our Saviour, speaking to Nicodemus, chap. iii. 3, 4, 5. says, "Verily, verily, except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God. Except a man be born of water, and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

St. Peter says in like manner, 1st Epist. i. 3. that God has regenerated us; i. e. has given us a new birth, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ, which imparts a lively hope of an incorruptible and eternal inheritance. And St. Paul, writing to Titus, iii. 5. says, "our Saviour has procured salvation for us—not by works of righteousness, which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost." And St. John, 1 Epist. iii. 9. "Whoever is born of God, doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is born of God." This is the new birth, or regeneration, which comes from God, and is exactly described, with its effects; which are, to preserve us from sin.

The second acceptation of the term regeneration, respects a future new birth into another life, for eternity. The first regeneration renders us children of God, and annexes a claim to eternal life; as the inheritance of the regenerate. But the second regeneration, the resurrection, puts us in possession of this inheritance: "And Jesus said unto them, verily I say unto you, that ye that have followed me in the regeneration, when the son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. Matt. xix. 28.

ADDITION.

[Properly speaking, there are only two places where the term regeneration, παλιγγενεσία, occurs; these are Matt. xix. 28. and Titus iii. 5. the first refers to a change of state, the second to a change of profession. It will be of advantage, therefore, to notice the import of this term in other writers. It is compounded of πάλιν, again, and γένεσις, generation, or origin. It is used by Greek writers to express the state of the earth in the spring, when the face and appearance of nature is renovated, and the crops and vegetables, corn, &c. are regenerated in the successors of those of the last year. Trees, however, are not regenerated; but their leaves and fruits are: nature having formed the buds and germs previous to the winter, which, after the winter, put themselves forth, open, and spread themselves.

Cicero writing to Atticus, expresses the state and dignity to which he was re-appointed after his return from exile, by the term palingenesia, regeneration. Josephus speaking of the Jews who were made acquainted by Zorobabel with the edict of Darius permitting their return to Jerusalem, says,—“they gave thanks to God—and for seven days they continued feasting, and kept a festival for the rebuilding and restoration, —palingenesia, regeneration—of their country.” It is this last passage, principally, that induces Schleusner to interpret Matt. xix. 28. of a renovation of the minds and characters of the Jews and Gentiles by means of the Gospel. The Syriac translates, in the new age.

This is perfectly agreeable to the phrases—the age to come—the world to come—the Father of the future age—the age of the Messiah, &c. which were familiar, and customary, among the Jews, previous to, and at, the time of Christ.—In this acceptation, the term regeneration must be construed with the foregoing words; and it is consistent with 2 Peter iii. 13. 2 Cor. v. 17. But Parkhurst “owns himself most inclined to construe these words with the following part of the sentence, and so refer them to the grand renovation of all things at Christ’s second coming, (Comp. Acts iii. 21.) and particularly to God’s children being born again, as it were, from their graves:” i. e. Resurrection is regeneration.—Comp. Acts xiii. 33.

Taken either way the passage is metaphorical; but, as it was intended to be understood by the hearers, it seems most proper to explain it in that sense which was most likely to strike those hearers, as consonant with phrases then current. This seems to establish the verbal meaning in coincidence with Schleusner: a more exalted meaning might be couched under the term, and might even be present to the mind of the speaker; but the hearers would be most likely to understand its import according to its application by their native historian Josephus.

The second place in which this word occurs, Titus iii. 5. alludes beyond all question to the rite of baptism. Our translators have taken the term connected with it, for the fluid with which that rite is administered; or, the action by which it is performed; but the general course of the Greek language rather leads to the vessel containing the fluid. But, in whatever sense that term be taken, it is clear, that regeneration, in this place, means a professional or ritual change of life, of personal habits, of objects, purposes and endeavours. It is the external profession of those intentions of which the renewing of the Holy Spirit, mentioned in connection with it, is the prime mover, and promoter;—the out-ward ward and visible sign, of which the actuating principle is the inward and spiritual grace. The Fathers have uniformly employed the term regeneration to signify baptism; and this is so evident, that Phavorinus says expressly, referring to this place, παλιγγενεσία—ἡ τὸ ἁγίου βάπτισμα λέγεται. The holy rite of Baptism is called Regeneration. It is so used by Justin Martyr, and other early Christians. Baptism was always thought to denote a resurrection, a transplantation, a change of manners, of society, of interests and of cares, as those who are “risen with Christ,” who are “alive from the dead,” with whom “old things are passed away, and all things are become new,” &c. &c.

Very different is the term used, John iii. 4, 5, &c. it is there, γεννηθῇ ἄνωθεν, born again, or, as some prefer, born from above. But, this latter acceptation seems inconsistent with the following conversation, and the objections raised by Nicodemus, “how can a man γεννηθῆναι, be born again, when he is old? Can he enter a second time into his mother’s womb, and be born again?” He must, says Jesus, be born of water and spirit.” Ritually, professionally, or externally, of water; internally, or actuatingly, of the spirit: i. e. renewed in the spirit, disposition, or habit of his mind;” in this sense he is “a child of God”—“born of God,”—God is his Father, &c.

Though these terms are currently used promiscuously, and indiscriminately, yet this appears to be an incorrectness; which, probably would appear more striking, if proper care were taken to distinguish accurately between the terrestrial and the celestial kingdom of God;—the professional or temporal kingdom of Grace, and the ultimate or eternal kingdom of Glory, &c.

The term used by St. Peter, 1 Epist. i. 3. who thanks God for his abundant mercy by which he regenerates us, ἀναγεννήσας, in a lively, or life-giving hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead,” seems to come very near to the import of palingenesis. It seems to imply, that mankind—the Jews, especially, had once possessed the hope of a glorious immortality, but had lost it: this is revived, re-animated, re-begotten in us, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ; nor should it be forgot, that whoever was baptized, professed conversion to, and commemoration of, a risen Saviour. A man totally dead could be no Saviour: the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting, were, in that case, no better than cunningly devised fables, and the “hope of worms,” as the Christians were reproached by their adversaries.]

places of our translation, this word would be a proper substitute for “all the earth,” as the circumstances alluded to do not justify a reference to the whole habitable globe. Psal. xlv. 16. Thy children, whom thou mayest make princes in all the earth”—i. e. in the cities, &c. round about, the neighbouring region. Luke xxiii. 44. darkness over all the earth”—not over the whole globe, but the region round about. Jer. li. 49. “As Babylon hath caused the slain of Israel to fall, so at Babylon shall fall the slain of all the earth;” of the region round about that capital, gathered into it, to defend it. The same remark applies to many places where the word world is used: though it is acknowledged that this word world sometimes denotes the whole of an empire; as of Egypt, Isaiah xviii. 3. of Rome, Luke ii. 1. and some think of Parthia, 1 Peter v. 9. but this is uncertain, as it may refer to the world at large, or to the Roman empire only.]

REHABIAH, רחביה, breadth, or extent, or place, of the Lord; from רחב rachab, breadth, &c. and יה jah, the Lord: or God is my extent, he hath set me at liberty. [or, God hath extended, sc. my family.]

REHABIA, eldest son of Eliezer, and grandson of Moses, 1 Chron. xxiii. 17. xxvi. 25. He and his brethren were Levites, and treasurers of the temple.

REHOB, רחב, breadth, space, or extent; from רחב rachab. Father of Hadadezer, king of Syria, of Zobah, 2 Sam. viii. 3. [BROAD] REHOB, a city of Asher, Josh. xix. 28. given to the Levites of the family of Gershon. 1 Chron. vi. 75. Josh. xxi. 31. This city was in Syria, on the road to Hamath, Numb. xiii. 21. 2 Sam. x. 6, 8, and, probably, between Libanus and Antilibanus. The city of Laish, or Dan, was situate in the canton of Rehob, or, as the Hebrews call it, Rechob, Judg. xviii. 28.

REHOB, an Israelite who returned from Babylon. Neh. x. 11.

REHOBAM, son and successor of Solomon: born of Naamah, an Ammonitess; 1 Kings xiv. 20, 21. He was forty-one years old when he began to reign; consequently, he was born in the first year of his father's reign. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XLV. He began to reign A. M. 3029, ante A. D. 975. Solomon was eighteen, or nineteen years old when Rehoboam was born. This prince reigned seventeen years at Jerusalem, and died A. M. 3046, ante A. D. 958.

After the death of Solomon, Rehoboam came to Shechem, where all Israel assembled.—Jeroboam, son of Nebat, who had headed a sedition against Solomon, and had taken refuge in Egypt, when he heard of Solomon's death, returned into Judea, and was at this assembly of the people. The Israelites would have made terms with Rehoboam, and said to him, "Diminish the weight of your father's yoke, and we will serve you, as we have served your father." This proposal manifests that the succession to the kingdom was not absolutely hereditary, or fully established in the house of David. Rehoboam postponed his answer three days. In the interim he advised with the ancient counsellors of his father, who represented, that by an obliging answer, he would fix the people in his interest for ever. But Rehoboam adopted the contrary advice of his young counsellors, and answered the people roughly; which he had soon reason to repent of; for they began to cry out, "What part have we in David? what interest have we in the son of David? To your tents, O Israel; David, look to your own house." The tribes of Judah and Benjamin continued faithful to Rehoboam; but the other ten tribes followed Jeroboam, son of Nebat. Whence originated the kingdom of Israel.

Rehoboam being come to Jerusalem, assembled the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, to the number of 180,000 men, to reduce the revolted ten tribes. But the prophet Shemaiah forbade the expedition. Then Rehoboam continuing at Jerusalem, began to apply himself to the defensive, strengthening his kingdom against Jeroboam: he fortified and stored, several cities; as Bethlehem, Etam, Tekoa, Beth-zur, Shocoh, Adullam, Gath, Mareshah, Ziph, Adoraim, Lachish, Azekah, Zorah, Aijalon, Hebron.

The number of his subjects was considerably increased by the priests and Levites, from the cities and territories of Jeroboam, who seeing that this new king abolished the established worship of the Lord, and made priests for his golden calves, they withdrew into the land of Judah and Benjamin, that they might attend in the temple at Jerusalem. But Rehoboam and his people did not continue faithful to the Lord above three years. Judah also did evil before the Lord, and provoked him by their wickedness, more than their fathers had done; and, in short, they committed all the wickedness and abominations of the Canaanites, whom the Lord had driven out.

Rehoboam married eighteen wives, and had sixty concubines; by these he had twenty-eight sons, and sixty daughters. In the fifth year of Rehoboam, God sent against Judah Shishak (or Sesac), king of Egypt, who carried off all the treasure of the house of the Lord, the king's treasures, the golden bucklers made by king Solomon, and laid waste the whole country, 2 Chron. xii. 1 Kings xiv. 25. The prophet Shemaiah went to attend Rehoboam, and the princes of Judah who were with him in Jerusalem, and said to them from the Lord "you have forsaken me, and, I, in my turn, have forsaken you, and delivered you into the hands of Shishak." The princes being convinced of the justice of these reproaches, humbled themselves; and God said to Shemaiah, that he would not utterly abandon them, but only make them sensible of the difference between serving the Lord, and being subject to a foreign power.

After the departure of Shishak, Rehoboam made brazen bucklers, instead of those of gold, which the king of Egypt had taken away; and when he went to the temple, his guards carried these brazen bucklers before him. The history of Rehoboam was written at length, by the prophets Shemaiah and Iddo; but those accounts are not come to our hands: nor any particulars of those constant wars which were between Rehoboam and Jeroboam. Rehoboam died after a reign of seventeen years, and was buried in the city of David. His son Abijah was his successor.

Scripture speaks of this prince in a manner not at all to his honour. Jesus, son of Sirach, says of Rehoboam, after he had spoke of Solomon, Eccles. xlvii. 23. "Thus rested Solomon with his fathers, and of his seed he left behind him Roboam, even the foolishness of the people, [It is likely that here is a play of words on the name of this king.] and one that had no understanding, who turned away the people through his counsel." Abijah, son of Rehoboam, speaking of his father, says, he was an ignorant prince, unskilled in the art of government, a weak man, and without courage. 2 Chron. xiii. 7. Vulg. Porro Roboam erat rudis, et corde pavido, nec potuit resistere eis. Lastly, Solomon seems to have had this son, his successor, before his eyes, when he said, Eccl. ii. 18, 19. "Yea, I hated all my labour which I had taken under the sun, because I should leave it unto the man that should be after me; and who knoweth whether he shall be a wise man, or a fool? Yet shall he have have rule over all my labour wherein I have laboured; and wherein I have showed myself wise under the sun. This is also vanity."

REHOBOTH, רְחוֹבוֹת, spaces, or places; from רָחַב rachab. Vulgate, Gen. x. 11. the places of the city; the signification put for the name. LXX. Ῥώβωθ πόλις, city of Rehoboth.

[It is extremely perplexing to determine the meaning of the term Oir, added to Rehoboth; this word usually means a city; but as the companions of Rehoboth in this list are also cities, this addition, in that sense, forms no distinction. Some, therefore, as Jerom, have supposed that Rehoboth-oir was descriptive of Nineveh,—“even the city of squares,” or handsome places. But, in this intention, Moses would either have written “Nineveh, and its squares;” or “the squares of the city.”

The Vulgate reads, “the city of streets,” or squares; so does Onkelos, and the Jerusalem Targum; but, without understanding the term; for it they use the word plathitha, which is of Greek origin. The Samaritan interpreter reads Sittacen, and we have a city and region of this name, not far from Babylon: but the order in which these cities are ranged, does not allow of this being Rehoboth-oir. Nevertheless, not far from this is the sentiment of the Talmudists, in Joma; for they read Maischon, and we have a Maischon, or Mesene, not far from Sittacen. The Syriac does not explain, but merely substitutes an expression, which Ephraim, the Syrian, understands to mean Chadjab, or Adiabene: if we may take this for the Zab, the river Lycus, or “Wolf” of the Greeks, we may see how Chadjab was by the Greeks formed into Adiabene: and this the rather, because there are two rivers of this name, the great Zab and the little Zab, so that the district between them may well take its name from them. We seem, however, as yet to have made little progress in finding a city in these parts, but here we are assisted by Ammianus, lib. xviii. who informs us that the kings of Nineveh had a very large city in Adiabene, beyond the passage of the river; in the midst of the bridge of Auzaba they offered sacrifices, and the omens being favourable, they passed over joyfully. This city in Adiabene appears to be in Assyria Proper, a large city, somewhere not far from the river Zab, but, being unknown to our geographers, nor its ruins described, we cannot determine its true situation on the Zab. We have, however, on the direct road between Nineveh and Babylon, a town called Altun Kiupri, “the bridge of gold:” which is a bridge of considerable importance over the Zab. To the derivation of Bochart it may be objected that the Virta of Ammianus is in Mesopotamia, west of the Euphrates; whereas the text of Moses rather leads us to the east of that river. Such are the ideas of Michaelis, 243.

Bushing seems to hint at two bridges over the Zab. He supposes the bridge at Altun Kiupri to have been constructed of stone: and so does D’Anville, who seems to have thought this ancient city occupied the place of Schirtzul, not far from the greater Zab, over which was a great bridge, made of squared stones.

Niebuhr says, “Altun Kiupri (that is to say, ‘the bridge of gold’) is a city of four or five hundred houses. It stands on the little Zab, on an island, and has its name from a great bridge, which is built over one of the arms of the river. It is remarked of this bridge, that the arcade is extraordinary high, and that the old bridge, which was carried away some years ago, was not so high; but that no architect could be found who could construct it lower.” It appears that his caravan passed right through the town, and encamped on the other side of the river, while he himself staid in the town during the night; but the next morning the river was so swelled, that he passed it with great difficulty and danger.—This may prove the necessity of a bridge in this place.

These reasonings are in support of the sentiments stated under the word AROR; and are to be taken in connection with them.

On the whole, we place “Rehoboth of the bridge,” at Altun Kiupri, which is a considerable town, says Mr. Kinneir.]

REHOBOTH, or רְחוֹבוֹת, a river of Idumea. Saul or Shaul, a descendant of Esau, who reigned in Idumea, was native of the country bordering on the river Rehoboth. Gen. xxxvi. 37. 1 Chron. i. 48.

REHSA, or RHESA, רֶהְסָא, will; from רָצָה rat-sah: otherwise, course; from רוּץ rutz. Son of Zorobabel. One of the ancestors of our Saviour. Luke iii. 27.

REHUM, רְחֻם, merciful, compassionate, or friendly, according to the Syriac. A Levite, son of Bani; he returned from Babylon with Zorobabel. Ezra ii. 2. Nehem. iii. 17. xii. 3.

REHUM, the Chancellor, or king’s agent: prætor regis. An opponent of the Jews. Ezra iv. 8, 9, 17, 23.

REI, רֵי, Ῥοι ἑταῖροι ῥοι, my shepherd, my companion, my friend; from רָחַב racha, or rohe, according to several readings; or my evil, or my breaking; from רוּחַ roah, and י, my.

REI. Jerom has understood this word, 1 Kings i. 8. as signifying some general of the troops, or chief officer of the house of David. Semei, et Rei, et robur exercitus David, non erat cum Adonia. The Septuagint have taken it in the same sense. [Our English translation reads, "But Zadok the priest, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and Nathan the prophet, and Shimei, and Rei, and the mighty men which belonged to David, were not with Adonijah."] The author of the Hebrew traditions on the books of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles, will have Shimei to be Nebat, father to Jeroboam, and governor to Solomon; and Rei to be Ira, the Jairite, a chief ruler about David, 2 Sam. xx. 26.—The Hebrew may be thus translated: Shimei and Rei may be the hearers and seers, i. e. the public, all Israel, or those who acted with circumspection, and knew the intentions of the king. Or lastly, the prophets and their disciples, the seers and their auditors. Some Greek copies read, Shimei and his companions or friends. 1 Kings i. 8. שמעי ורעי, or שמעי ורואי. LXX. Καὶ Σεμεὶ καὶ Πησι, fortè Ρεσι. Edit. Complut. et Antwerp. et Paris. Καὶ Σεμεὶ καὶ δι ἑταῖροι αὐτοῦ.

REINS, or KIDNEYS. The Hebrews ascribe to the reins, or kidneys, knowledge, joy, pain, pleasure; hence in Scripture it is so often said, that God searches the heart and the reins. Elsewhere, the Scripture imputes to the reins love, and the fountain of generation. 1 Kings viii. 19. Filius tuus qui egredietur de renibus tuis. God upbraids the Jews with having him enough in their mouths, but not in their reins and hearts. Jer. xii. 2.

In trouble and in fear the reins are disturbed and tremble. They faint away. Defectio in cunctis renibus. Nahum ii. 10. They are relaxed, and let the water pass from them. Dan. v. 6. Compages renum ejus solvebantur. Ezek. xxix. 7. Dissolvisti omnes renes eorum. The Psalmist says, that his reins have encouraged and excited him to praise the Lord. Psalm xvi. 7. Jeremiah says, Lam. iii. 19. that the Lord had sent the daughters of his quiver into his reins; i. e. he has pierced me with his arrows; he hath exhausted his whole quiver upon me: the daughters of the quiver are a poetical expression for arrows. Metaphorically it is said, Deut. xxxii. 14. the fat of the reins of wheat, to signify the finest flour: Vulgate, medulla tritici, marrow of wheat.

REKEM, רקם, void, or vain; from רק rac, or רקח racah: otherwise, painting, or embroidery of several colours, or shades; from רקם racam: or their spittle; from רקק racas, spittle, and נא am, theirs.

[Simon supposes that this name implies an ornament to the parents, i. e. their son. He supposes also, that in allusion to a flowered garment, the city Rekem might stand in fields and meadows, painted, as it were, with flowers and plants.

Josephus says that Rekem, a king of the Midianites in Arabia, gave his name to the city afterwards called by the Greeks Petra. Ant. lib. iv.

Ibn Haukal says, "Rekem is a town situated near Bilka: all the walls and houses are of stone, in such a manner that one would imagine they were all of one piece."

REKEM, a prince of Midian, slain by Phineas, for the abomination of Baal-peor. Numb. xxxi. 8.

II. REKEM, son of Hebron, and brother of Korah. 1 Chron. ii. 43.

III. REKEM, a city of Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 27.

IV. REKEM, otherwise, PETRA, the metropolis of Arabia Petræa. See PETRA, and comp. above; also FRAGS. NO. DLXI. DLXII.

RELIGION. The Latin word religio, is taken in three senses in Holy Scripture. First, for the external and ceremonial worship of the Jewish religion. Hæc est religio phasæ, Exod. xii. 43. This is the ceremony, or service, of the passover. Quæ est ista religio? What is the meaning of this ceremony, or service? After the death of Haman, many embraced the religion of the Jews. Plures eorum religioni et ceremoniis jungerentur.

Secondly, for the true religion, the best manner of serving and honouring God. True religion and undefiled before God, even the Father, is to visit the fatherless and widow, &c. James i. 27. St Paul says, that he had lived in the sect of the Pharisees, which was regarded as the most perfect in the religion of the Jews.

Thirdly, religion in Scripture, as well as in profane authors, is often put for superstition. Do not imitate those who affect to humble themselves before the angels, and to pay them a superstitious worship. Nemo vos seducat, volens in humilitate et religione angelorum, &c. Vide SUPERSTITION.

REMALIAH, רמליהו, elevation of the Lord; from רם ramam, elevated, and יה jah, the Lord: otherwise, who is rejected of the Lord; from רם ramah, to cast, ל l, and יה jah, the Lord. Father of Pekah, king of Israel. 2 Kings xv. 25.

REMEMBRANCE, or MEMORY. God requires, that we should keep his commandments in remembrance. He tells Moses, Exod. xvii. 14. that he "will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven;" i. e. he will destroy him so entirely, that no farther mention shall be made of him, as a people. He says, Psalm xxxiv. 16. that "the face of the Lord is against them that do evil, to cut off the remembrance of them from the earth." And

Psalm ix. 6. "thou hast destroyed cities, their memorial is perished with them." On the contrary, God has promised to the righteous and just, that their memory shall be blessed, and shall never perish.

REMETH, רַמֶּת, high, lofty.

REMETH, or RAMATH, or BEER-REMETH, or SOUTH-RAMATH. All these words signify the same place; i. e. a city of Simeon, in the southern part of that tribe. Josh. xix. 8, 21. 1 Sam. xxx. 27.

II. REMETH, a city of Issachar. Josh. xix. 21. Called Ramoth, 1 Chron. vi. 73. very likely the same as Jerimoth, Josh. xxi. 29. It was assigned to the Levites. [Jarmath. Eng. Tr.]

REMISSION, is sometimes taken for the year of jubilee, or the sabbatical year, in which the slaves were set at liberty, and in which every one returned into his own inheritance. Levit. xxv. 10. Numb. xxxvi. 4. Deut. xv. 1.

Remission is also used for pardon of sin. The Gospel says, that "John did baptize in the wilderness, and preach the baptism of repentance, for the remission of sins." Mark i. 4. Luke iii. 3. And it is said, that the blood of Jesus Christ was shed, to procure remission of our sins. Ephes. i. 7. Col. i. 14. Matt. xxvi. 28.

[It is somewhat remarkable, that the term pardon of sin, does not occur in the N. T. but, we read of remission and forgiveness. Certainly these words, with the ideas they represent, are allied; yet there seems to be some distinction preserved between them. When the observation is made, "this man who takes upon him to forgive sins, blasphemeth: who can forgive sins but God?" it should seem as if had our Lord said "thy sins are remitted," that term would not have justified the inference made. When John preached the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins, and when our Lord gave power to his Apostles, "whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted;" we cannot suppose that either of these parties invaded an acknowledged prerogative of God. If the remission of sins by the Apostles was declaratory—if John the Baptist, was the prophet of the Highest—to give the knowledge of salvation to his people, by the remission of their sins—if, in consequence of the confession of sins made previous to baptism by John, that prophet remitted sins by baptism, i. e. declared them to be remitted,—if Peter advised the Jews to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins,—then we must admit that the exercise of this power by men, was by no means identical with the forgiveness of sins, which appertains to God only. Under the Old law there was no remission of sins without shedding of blood; i. e. until the proper sacrifices were offered, the priest could not pronounce the transgressor free from the consequences of his transgressions: under the new law no blood was shed by John, or by the Apostles: but the blood of Jesus Christ was shed for many, for the remission of sins; and remission of sins was preached in his name.

The term ἀφῆσις, rendered remission, signifies to announce liberty to the captive, Luke iv. 18. to release the obligation of a debt, as in the Sabbatical year, Deut. xv. 3. The term ἀφῆμι, rendered forgive, is, with the greatest propriety addressed to God; forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors;"—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do;" and the power of forgiving—"Son, be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee," assumed by our Lord, was greatly superior to that of announcing remission, conferred on the Apostles; and could be becoming, only, in a personage infinitely above them in dignity and power.]

REMMON, רַמּוֹן, greatness, elevation; from רַמַּם ramam: otherwise, a granate tree; from רַמֵּן rimmon.

REMMON, or RIMMON; this word may be taken generally for any eminence. Also, a city in the tribe of Simeon, Josh. xix. 7. probably that ascribed to Judah. Josh. xv. 32. Neh. xi. 29. also called Remmus. Eusebius, in Remmon, places it south in Judah, sixteen miles from Eleutheropolis, south. Several cities of Judah were yielded to Simeon. Probably this city is mentioned Zech. xiv. 10. "From Geba to Rimmon, south of Jerusalem."

II. REMMON, a village fifteen miles from Jerusalem north, Euseb. in Remmon.

III. REMMON, Adad-Remmon, or Maximianopolis. See ADAD-REMMON.

REMMON-METHOAR, ANTHAR, or AMTAR. Josh. xix. 13. Some make but one city of this: it is plain they were two. Josh. xix. 7. See REMMON of Simeon, above.

REMMON-PARES, רַמּוֹן-פָּרֵץ, division of the granate, or granate-tree of division; from פָּרַץ paratz, to break, to divide, and רַמֵּן rimmon, a granate. A station of Israel, Num. xxxiii. 19.

REMPHAN, רֵמְפָן, 'Ρεμφᾶ, an idol, according to the LXX. Vulgate, the star of your god. Aquila and Symmachus, pedestal, support, preparation.

REMPHAN, or RẔEPHAN. Amos, v. 26. upbraids the Hebrews with having carried, during their wanderings in the wilderness, "the tabernacle of their Moloch, the image of their idol, and the star of their god." רֵמְפָן Rēmpān. LXX. Τὸ ἄστρον τῆς Θεᾶς ὑμῶν 'Ραιφᾶν. [Eng. Tr. "But ye have borne the tabernacle of your Moloch and Chiun, your images, the star of your god, god, which ye made to yourselves.] Vide FRAG. Nos. CCXIII. DXXXVII. Stephen, Acts vii. 43. quoting this passage, says, "Ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan." This last word has occasioned many conjectures. Grotius on Amos v. thinks it to have been the same deity as Rimmon; the u vowel having been changed into the v consonant, and instead of Remuan they have read Remvan. The LXX. read Remman instead of Remmon, 2 Kings v. 18. This Remvan, according to him, is the planet Saturn. Others derive Rephan from the Hebrew Rapha, to be negligent, soft, or slothful; because Saturn is the slowest or most slothful of the planets. Capellus and Hammond, on Acts vii. 43. think Remphan to be the name of a king of Egypt, who was deified by his people. Diodorus Siculus says, lib. i. p. 39. that king Remphis succeeded Proteus; but does not say that he had been deified; and speaks of him as very unworthy of divine honours.

Louis de Dieu thinks, that Rephan is an Egyptian term, which in that language signified Saturn. In a Coptic alphabet sent from Rome to Scaliger, the planet Saturn is called Rephan. The Arabic word Reph, signifies voracity, a quality agreeing to Saturn, who according to the fable, devoured his own children. Vossius, de Origin. Idololat. lib. ii. cap. 23. believes Rephan, or as Amos has it, Chiun or Chevan, was the moon. Those that reject Rephan, and keep to the Hebrew of Amos, maintain, that Chiun or Chevan signifies Saturn. Vide Abenezra, Kimchi, Lud. de Dieu, Grot. Castell. Lexicon. Pokoc. fol. ult. The Arabians, Syrians, and Persians, thus call that false deity. Others have thought, that the Rephan, of the LXX. is a mere fault of the transcribers, who taking a K for a P, instead of ΚΕΦΑΝ have read ΠΕΦΑΝ.

REMPHTIS, a city of Palestine, the Rama or Ruma, near Lydda. Euseb. in Ruma.

REPAST, or food placed on the tombs of the dead: Cæna mortui. Baruch vi. 31. mentions it in these words. "The Pagans howl in the presence of their gods, as in the repast made for the dead." He speaks of certain solemnities, wherein the idolaters made great lamentations: as, in the feasts of Adonis. Repasts for the dead, are distinguished into two kinds: one made in the house of the deceased, at the return of the mourners from the grave; to this were invited his kindred and friends; where they did not fail to express their grief by cries and lamentations. The other kind was made on the tomb of the dead, where was provided a repast for the wandering soul, and they believed that the goddess Trivia, who presided over streets and highways, repaired thither in the night time. But in truth the beggars and the poor, in the darkness of night, carried away what was left on the tomb.

Est honor et tumulis animas placare paternas,
Parvaeque in extructas munera ferre pyras.

Sometimes, however, the relations made a small repast upon the tomb of the deceased. Ad sepulchrum antiquo more silicernium confecimus, id est, περιδῆπνον, quo pransi discedentes dicimus alius alii Vale. Nonnius Marcell. ex Varro.

The custom of setting food on the sepulchres of the dead, was common among the Hebrews. Tobit thus advises his son; "pour out thy bread on the burial of the just, but give nothing to the wicked," Tobit iv. 17. And Jesus son of Sirach, Ecclus. xxx. 18. affirms, "that delicacies poured upon a mouth shut up, are as messes of meat set upon a grave:" utterly lost, as to any benefit! And Ecclus. vii. 33. "A gift hath grace in the sight of every man living, and for the dead detain it not."

This custom was almost universal. We find it among the Greeks, the Romans, and almost all the East. It still obtains in Syria, in Babylonia, and in China. St. Austin, Ep. 22, 29. observes, that in his time, in Africa, they laid victuals upon the tombs of the martyrs, and in church-yards. This at first was done very innocently, but afterwards it degenerated into an abuse: and was with difficulty suppressed. St. Monica being at Milan, had a mind according to custom, to offer bread and wine to the memory of the martyrs; but the porter would not open the door to her, because St. Ambrose had forbid him. Aug. Confess. lib. vi. cap. 2.

The repast in the house of the deceased among the Jews, was of two kinds. One was during the time of the mourning; this was considered as unclean, because those who partook of it were unclean, as having assisted at the funeral obsequies. Hosea says, ix. 4. "Their sacrifices shall be unto them as the bread of mourners; all that eat thereof shall be polluted." In the form used by the Israelites, when they offered their first-fruits, they addressed God, saying, "O Lord, I have not neglected thy ordinances; I have not used these things while I was in mourning; nor at the funerals of the dead." God would not permit Ezekiel to mourn for his wife, Ezek. xxiv. 17. "Cover not thy lips, and eat not the bread of men." And Jeremiah xvi. 7. "Neither shall men give them the cup of consolation, to drink, for their father, or for their mother"

Other

Other repasts made in the time of mourning, were given after the funeral. Josephus, de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 1. relates, that Archelaus treated the whole people magnificently, after he had completed the seven days' mourning for the king his father. He adds, that it was the custom of his nation to make great feasts for the relations, which could not be done without injury to many families, by such large expences. St. Paulina commends Pammachius, for having made a great feast for the poor, in the basilicon of St. Peter, on the day of the funeral of his wife Paulina. Paulin. illustrat. p. 29, 30.

REPENTANCE, Pœnitentia; Μετάνοια, Metanoia. This word is generally taken for that contrition, compunction, regret, or sorrow which rises in us, after having done something contrary to our duty; joined to a sincere resolution of avoiding the like in future. It is also taken for the works of penitence; fasting, weeping, alms, and works of satisfaction: [i. e. retribution.]

There is a false repentance, as that of Antiochus Epiphanes, of Judas Iscariot, of Pharaoh, of Saul, of Ahab. Judas wanted confidence in the mercy of God, and therefore fell into despair. Antiochus had no sincere contrition. Pharaoh and Saul were terrified, but not moved by a true repentance; they continued hardened, and changed neither their minds nor their manners. Ahab was indeed touched, but he wanted perseverance in rectitude.

In Leviticus v. 5. Vulg. it is said, that he that shall acknowledge his sin, shall repent of it, and shall offer the sacrifices appointed, agat pœnitentiam pro peccato, et offerat, &c. But the original says, that he that shall have sinned, that shall have acknowledged his fault, and confessed it, shall offer the victims prescribed by the law. It does not expressly mention repentance; but enjoins acknowledgment, and confession of the fault, and then the sacrifices of expiation. This is certainly to repent of it.

Judges xxi. 6, 15. the children of Israel repent, and bemoan the loss of a tribe of their brethren: i. e. they repent at having pushed the war too far against that tribe. They afterwards consider of means to repair the loss.

Samuel says to Saul, 1 Sam. xv. 29. "The strength of Israel will not lye, nor repent, for he is not a man that he should repent." He will not change his resolution, as men make resolutions, and then repent of them, and perform them not. He has passed his sentence against you, and will not annul it.

St. Paul says in the same sense, the gifts and calling of God are without repentance. God does not revoke his favours; he never forsakes us first; never changes his mind. Non deserit, nisi deseratur.

The Book of Wisdom v. 3. represents the wicked in another life, as repenting and bewailing: seized with compunction and despair, at seeing good men in honour, while they themselves are in trouble. We know that in another life, repentance and remorse are useless. [Vide the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. Luke xvi. 24.]

The same author says, Wisd. xii. 10, 19. that when God shewed his judgments against the Canaanites, and chastised them by degrees, he gave them place for repentance. Partibus judicans dabat locum pœnitentia. He says the same thing, speaking of the Hebrews and the children of God, meaning, that the severity of God against the elect, as well as against the reprobate, purposes to reform them, and to bring them to repent of their transgressions.

The sacred writers often represent God as a king, moved with regret or repentance, or relenting, for having suffered, or having resolved on, certain things: so, Moses says, Gen. vi. 6, 7. God repented that he had made man, seeing the wickedness of his actions had proceeded to such extremity. So 1 Sam. xv. 11. that God repented of having made Saul king: not as if God had conceived any regret at what he had done, or that he repents of having taken a false step, as a man does when he perceives he has committed an error. God is not capable of repentance in this sense. But sometimes he changes his conduct toward those who are unfaithful to him, and after having treated them with disregarded mercy, he corrects them with deserved severity.

God is said to repent of evil he was about to inflict, when moved with compassion toward the miserable, or, intreated by their prayers, or, affected by their repentance, he remits the punishment of their sins: and does not execute his threatenings against them. Thus it is said, Psal. cvi. 45. That he repented according to the multitude of his mercies, and that he caused his people to find favour in the eyes of those, to whom he had given them up into bondage. And Jeremiah xviii. 8. the Lord declares, that if his people repent of their evil doings, he will also repent of the evil which he designed to inflict on them: i. e. he would treat them favourably; but on the contrary, if his people would not obey his commands, he would repent of the good he intended them.

[These expressions are used after the manner of men, and in accommodation to human language, because no otherwise can we conceive of the actions of Deity. When human passions are ascribed to God, there is no intention of supposing supposing him to be affected by such weaknesses; but those ascriptions are intelligible to us; and are understood as metaphors, and figures of speech: always remembering, that threatenings are conditional, and may be either revoked or abated; not so promises, unless expressed: they may be depended on for full realization.]

The baptism of repentance, is that which John the Baptist preached to the Jews, when he baptized them in Jordan, and exhorted them to "bring forth fruits worthy of repentance," Matt. iii. 11. Mark i. 4. Luke iii. 3.

The repentance of the Ninevites is celebrated in the Gospel, Luke xi. 32. Jesus Christ tells the Jews, that the Ninevites would rise up in judgment against them; because, they repented at the preaching of Jonah, whereas the Jews would not be converted at the preaching of Jesus Christ, who was so far superior to Jonah.

REPHAH, רפח. See RAPHAH.

REPHAH, or RAPHA, son of Beriah, and grandson of Ephraim. 1 Chron. vii. 25.

II. REPHAH, or Arapha, father of the ancient giants of Palestine; from whom they were called Rephaim or Raphaim. 1 Chr. xx. 4. Gen. xiv. 5.

REPHAIAH, רפחיה, medicine, or freedom of the Lord, or God is my physic; from רפח rapha, medicine, and יה jah, the Lord.

REPHAIM, רפאים. See RAPHAIM.

REPHAIM, or RAPHAIM, ancient giants of Canaan. There were several families of them in this country. It is commonly thought, they descended from an ancestor called Rephah, or Rapha; but others imagine that the word Rephaim properly signified giants, in the ancient language of this people. There were Rephaim beyond Jordan, at Ashtaroth Karnaim, in the time of Abraham, Gen. xiv. 5. Also some in the time of Moses. Og king of Bashan was of the Rephaim. In the time of Joshua some of their descendants dwelt in the land of Canaan. Josh. xii. 4. xvii. 15. Lastly, we hear of them in David's time, in the city of Gath, 1 Chron. xx. 4, 5, 6. The giants Goliath, Sippai, Lahmi, and others, were remains of the Rephaim. Their magnitude and strength are well known in Scripture. Vide GIANTS.

The Valley of the Rephaim, or giants, was famous in Joshua's time, and also in David's. Josh. xv. 8. xviii. 16. 2 Sam. v. 18, 22. 1 Chr. xi. 15. xiv. 9. It is mentioned likewise, Isaiah xvii. 5. It is called in Greek, the Valley of the Titans; Vulgate, the valley of the Giants, 2 Sam. xxiii. 13. Joshua places the valley of Rephaim as one limit of the portion of Judah. It was near Jerusalem, and it may be doubted whether it belonged to Judah or to Benjamin, because of the contiguity of these two tribes.—Eusebius places it in Benjamin; but Joshua xviii. 16. and those passages of the books of Samuel where it is mentioned, hint that it belonged to Judah, and was south or west of Jerusalem.

[The same as was also called Sephela, perhaps spreading to the South.]

REPHIDIM, רפידים, couches, beds, or places of rest; from רפד raphad. [otherwise, the letting go of the hand, or medicine of the hands.]

REPHIDIM, a station or encampment of Israel in the desert, Exod. xvii. 1. Here the people wanted water; they began therefore to murmur against Moses, saying, Why have you brought us out of Egypt, to kill us with thirst in this desert? Moses then cried to the Lord, who said, Take the people to the rock of Horeb, with the elders: I shall be there on the rock before you; you shall strike it with your rod, and water shall gush out, that the people may drink." This Moses did. The place was called Temptation, because of the complaints of Israel, who there tempted the Lord, saying, Is the Lord among us, or not?

Rephidim could not be far from Horeb, because God ordered Moses to go from thence to the rock of Horeb, to give the people water.—And this same water served the Israelites, not only in the encampment of Rephidim, and in that of Mount Sinai, but also in other encampments, perhaps as far as Kadesh-barnea. St. Paul says, 1 Cor. x. 4. that this rock followed them in their journey; and that it was a figure, or type, of Jesus Christ. "For they drank of that spiritual rock that followed them, and that rock was Christ." Whether the stream of water followed them, or, they followed the course of the water; or, always carried some of this water with them, as Ælian says, Var. Hist. lib. xii. cap. 40 the water of Choaspes always followed the king of Persia, i. e. it was always carried after him, because he drank no other. Or, lastly, whether the rock of Horeb might not be drawn upon a carriage, in the manner of a great tun always full, and always open to whoever had inclination to drink. [This hypothesis is embraced by the Rabbins, and some of the ancient Fathers]

This miracle at Rephidim happened A. M. 2513, in the second month after the departure from Egypt. And here Joshua obtained a famous victory over the Amalekites, while Moses lifted up his hands toward heaven. Exod. xvii. 8, 9, 10.

REPRESENTATION. The law of God forbade representations of men, beasts, stars, &c. formed in order to receive worship; whether in relievo, or embossed; in painting, or sculpture; in in wood, stone, plaster, copper, gold or silver, &c. Exod. xx. 3, 4. But the best interpreters notice, that this general prohibition must be limited agreeably to Leviticus xxvi. 1. where the same prohibition is repeated with the addition, ut adoretis ea : to worship them. We know that Moses himself made cherubim, on the ark ; that Solomon also made several cherubim in the sanctuary ; and brazen bulls to support the Brazen Sea, &c. Therefore, where there was no fear of idolatry, the bare making of images or representations, was not forbid.

The Hebrew פסל Pesel, Exod. xx. 3, 4. Vulgate, Sculptile. i. e. a graven image, is translated by the LXX. Ἰδύπτρον, or Εἰδῶλον, Idolum, a vain representation : by Onkelos, Zelum, an image, a picture. By this word we may understand all kinds of figures in relief ; and under the word תמוכה כל, LXX. Πᾶν ὁμολῶμα, Vulgate, omnem similitudinem, all kinds of representations, whether in painting, embroidery, tapestry, enamel, engraving, &c. [This certainly, would include the hieroglyphics of Egypt, as extant in the temples : and seems to oppose the notion that picture-writing was practiced in the days of Moses ; or, at least, among the families of those who continued pure from idolatry.]

REPROACH, is used in two senses, (1) for the disgrace or confusion that any one suffers in himself, (2) for that which he causes in another.

Among the Hebrews, to be uncircumcised was a reproach : and when Joshua circumcised those born in the wilderness, he tells them, "I have rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you." Josh. v. 9. Barrenness was a reproach : Rachel on the birth of a second son, says, "The Lord has taken away my reproach," Gen. xxx. 23. Isaiah says, iv. 1. that the time shall come when men shall be so scarce in Israel, that seven women shall lay hold of one man, and shall say to him, "We ask you nothing for our maintenance, only deliver us from the reproach of sterility and a single life : Take us as wives," &c. The Lord struck the Philistines with a shameful malady in ano, and thereby loaded them with an eternal reproach. Psalm lxxviii. 66.

Servitude, slavery, poverty, subjection to enemies, extraordinary diseases, as the leprosy, &c. were reckoned reproaches, because they were supposed to be the effect of cowardice, or idleness, or bad management ; or, to be inflictions sent from God, to punish injustice and impiety. God in many places threatens his people, to make them a reproach and a proverb ; which has been fulfilled in numerous instances, by the servitudes with which the Jews have been overwhelmed, and by the misfortunes which have happened to them. The Psalmist often complaints, that God had made him a reproach to those about him ; who insulted over his misfortunes, and disgrace.

"Not to take up a reproach against his neighbour," Psal. xv. 3. is, not to listen to slanders and calumnies brought against him. David took away the reproach from Israel ; by slaying Goliath. 1 Sam. vii. 26. Eccclus. xlvii. 4. Jeremiah says, "I was ashamed, yea, even confounded, because I did bear the reproach of my youth." Jerem. xxxi. 19. "Thou hast brought the shame of my youthful faults upon me ; thou hast shewed me the horror of them, and hast made me bear the pain and confusion arising from them." And Isaiah liv. 4. "Thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth, and shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood any more." He speaks to the tribe of Judah, after the return from the captivity. Thou shalt no longer remember the reproach thou hast suffered among foreign nations.

[REPROBATION, is equivalent to REJECTION : rejection always implies a cause—"reprobate silver shall men call them." Jer. vi. 30. i. e. they are base metal, counterfeit coin.—Where ALL are equally unworthy, if SOME be preferred to honour, the rest may be said, in a sense, to be reprobated, i. e. left where they were ; their condition is not worse, but it is not improved ; nevertheless, those only can be said to be rejected, who have been offered, either by themselves, or by others ; God never rejects any who offer themselves, but, those who by continuing in sin, reject the offered mercy of God, reprobate themselves ; they say unto God, "Depart from us, for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways."]

REPTILES ; רמשים, Ramisim ; Gr. Ερπετον, Reptilia ; animals that have no feet, or such short ones, that they seem to creep, or crawl, on the ground. Serpents, worms, locusts, caterpillars, are taken for reptiles. The Hebrews put fishes also among reptiles, [they having no feet] whatever be their nature, or shape. Gen. i. 21. Levit. xi. 46. Psalm lxix. 34, &c. This name is sometimes also extended to such land animals, as are not of the same nature with the great beasts for service, nor of the larger wild beasts. In a word, "to creep upon the earth," is sometimes used for moving, or going to and fro, as all four-footed creatures do.

REPUDIATION, or divorce. The law of Moses allowed polygamy, and divorce among the Hebrews. Vide DIVORCE.

RESEN, רסן, a bridle, or bit. A city of Assyria, built by Ashur, between Nineveh and Calah, Gen. x. 12. on the river Chaboras in Mesopotamia ; we read of a famous city called Resene
F div. 2.

Resine or Resaine. There are also extant medals struck in this city. See Cellar. Asiae, lib. iii. cap. 15. See PLATE, ORIGIN OF GANGES, Nos. 6, 8, 9.

[The LXX. appear to have read Dase, or Dasem. This city, though great in the days of Moses, is now obscure. Bochart is very bold in thinking Larissa could be Resen; nor is his mode of forming this name by prefixing L, the sign of the genitive case, to be passed without censure. The name is retained by Onkelos, Ephraim Syrus, and the Arabs edited by Erpenius. Ephraim says, Rischaina is Rassa, which Asseman explains, Bibl. Orient. tom. iii. P. ii. p. 709. The Rassa of Ephraim is not that which is in Mesopotamia, where the tomb of the younger Gordian was, but another in Assyria, beyond the Tigris, between Nineveh and Salach, mentioned by Thomas of Marga, in his Historia Monastica; he says Rhesius was a village of Saphsaph in the region of Marga. In the Chronicle of Dionysius, patriarch of the Jacobins, A. D. 772, among the Ninevite cities which were depopulated by the Arabs, we find Ressin, which is, no doubt, the Resen of Scripture; it is there associated with Bethgarna, Hasa, Marga, Chonizapor, Coch, and Salacha, which are cities of Assyria.

N. B. We must not confound this Ressin with Ras-ain, or fountain-head, of the Hebrew; as almost every letter in it is different. Taken as an appellative, it signifies a halter, noose, or cord; i. e. a restraint or curb on the neighbouring people, as a bridle, &c. is to an animal.]

RESEPH, רָצַף, 'Ρασεφ, bed, or extension, or cole, or fiery stone: from רָצַף ratzaph. 2 Kings xix. 12. Isaiah xxxvii. 12. A city taken by the king of Assyria.

RESEPH, רֶשֶׁף, 'Ρησα, burning arrow; from רֶשֶׁף resheph: otherwise, a bird, or the devil; from סָרַף saraph, a serpent. [burning coal?]

RESHEPH, or RESEPH, son of Rephah, a grandson of Sarah, daughter of Ephraim, 1 Chron. vii. 25. The text seems to say, that Resheph was the immediate son of Sarah.

RESPECT of persons. God appointed that the judges should pronounce sentence without respect of persons; Levit. xix. 15. Deut. xvi. 17, 19. That they should consider neither the poor nor the rich, the weak, nor the powerful; but should attend only to truth and justice. God has no respect of persons. And the Jews complimented our Saviour, that he told the truth, without respect of persons, without fear; Matt. xxii. 16. Jude, ver. 16. instead of the phrase, to have respect of persons, uses this, to admire persons. Isaiah lays it down as one distinguishing mark of the Messiah, that he should have no respect of persons, Isai. xxxii. 25.

[Our English term respect, seems to imply some kind of deference or submission to a party: but this is not always the proper meaning to be annexed to it in S. S. When we read Exod. ii. 25. God had respect to the children of Israel, it can only express his compassion and sympathy for them: when God had respect to the offering of Abel, Gen. iv. 4. it imports to accept favourably, to notice with satisfaction. Comp. 1 Kings viii. 28. Numb. xvi. 15. also for the effects of proper and of improper respect, comp. Isaiah xvii. 7, 8.]

RESSA, a pretty famous city of Arabia Petraea; probably Rissah, an encampment of Israel in the desert. Josephus, de Bello, lib. i. cap. 13. mentions the castle of Ressa in Idumea: and Jerom in the Life of Hilarion, says; that saint converted the whole city of Ressa, situate between Kadesh and Gaza. Perhaps this is the Larissa, mentioned by William of Tyre, lib. xi. ad finem. and Arischi, an episcopal city, in the desert of the children of Israel. Renaudot, Liturg. Oriental. tom. i. p. 448. Guliel. Tyr. El Arisch is a maritime city on the way to Egypt.

REST, or Repose. This was enjoined the Israelites, on the Sabbath-day, for the glory of God; in that he rested after the six days of creation. See SABBATH.

Rest also signifies a fixed, and secure habitation. You shall go before your brethren, "until the Lord shall give rest to your brethren, as well as to you, in the land which they are going to make a conquest of," Deut. iii. 20. And Deut. xii. 9. "For ye are not as yet come to the rest, and to the inheritance, which the Lord your God giveth you." You are not as yet settled in that land which you are to possess. And Naomi says to Ruth, "my daughter, shall I not seek rest for thee, that it may be well with thee?" Ruth iii. 1. I shall endeavour to procure you a settlement. David speaking of the ark of the covenant, which till his time had no fixed place of settlement; says, "Arise, O Lord, into thy rest, thou and the ark of thy strength." Psalm cxxxii. 8. And Ecclesiasticus xxxvi. 15. "O be merciful unto Jerusalem, thy holy city, the place of thy rest."

In a moral and spiritual sense, rest denotes the fixed and permanent state of repose enjoyed by the blessed in heaven.

St. Paul makes an application of what is said of the settlement of the Israelites in the Land of Promise, to the rest of the Saints in heaven. I swear to them in my wrath, that they should not enter enter into my rest, i. e. into the land of Canaan. Psalm xcv. 11. Therefore, says St. Paul, Heb. iii. 17, 18, 19. iv. 1, 2, 3. as they could not enter therein by reason of their unbelief, let us be afraid of imitating their example : for we cannot enter but by faith, &c.

RESTITUTION. Natural justice requires, that we should repair whatever injuries we have done to our neighbour, whether in his person, estate, or reputation. The law of Moses prescribed, Exod. xxi. 23, 24, 25. Levit. xxiv. 20. Deut. xix. 21. "life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe." Also, that they should render five oxen for one ox, and four sheep for one sheep : Exod. xxii. —or, that the thief should be sold, to make restitution for his theft : that if he had taken away any beast of service, as an ox, an ass, or even a sheep, he should restore it two-fold ; that whoever should damage the field of another, should repair the damage, according to an estimate. He who, by ignorance, should omit to give to the temple what was appointed by the law, for example, in the tithes or first-fruits, was obliged to restore it to the priests, and to add a fifth part beside ; over-and-above which, he was bound to offer a ram, for his expiation. Nehemiah prevailed with all those Israelites to make restitution, who had taken interest of their brethren, Nehem. v. 10, 11. "I pray you let us leave off this usury. Restore, I pray you, to them, even this day, their lands, their vineyards, their olive-yards, and their houses, also the hundredth part of the money, and of the corn, the wine, and of the oyl, that ye exact of them."

Zaccheus, Luke xix. 8. promises a four-fold restitution, to all from whom he had extorted, in his office as a publican. The Roman laws condemned to a four-fold restitution all who were convicted of extortion, or fraud. Zaccheus here imposes that penalty on himself to which he adds the half of his goods ; which was what the law did not require.

He who had killed a labouring beast, or any other beast, as an ox, was to render another for it, or the value of it, Levit. xxiv. 18, 21.

The Jews expected Elias, who was to restore all things : Matt. xvii. 11. This is an allusion to Mal. iv. 5, 6. "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet, before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord. And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse." Also St. Peter, Acts iii. 21. calls the last day, the day of restitution of all things. At the end of the world Jesus Christ will unite the church with the synagogue, the Jew with the Christian, the Christian with the Gentile : then all things will be restored to a perfect union, and there will be but one shepherd and one flock.

RESURRECTION. The belief of a resurrection from the dead, is an article of religion common to Jew and Christian : it is expressly taught both in the old and New Testament. I do not speak of that miraculous resurrection, which consists in reviving for a time, to die again afterwards ; as Elijah, Elisha, Jesus Christ, and his apostles, raised some from the dead ; but I mean a general resurrection of the dead, which will take place at the end of the world, and which will be followed by an immortality either of happiness or of misery. So the Psalmist says, xvi. 10. "For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, (in the grave) neither wilt thou suffer thine holy one to see corruption." Job. xix. 25, 26, 27. "For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand in the latter day upon the earth. And though after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh I shall see God : whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another ; though my reins be consumed within me." Ezekiel also, in his vision of a great quantity of bones in a large field, which at the breath of the Spirit of the Lord, began to unite, to be covered with flesh, nerves, and skin, and at last to revive ; has left us a proof and an assurance of a general resurrection, Ezekiel xxxvii. See also Isaiah xxvi. 19.

The Book of Wisdom, chap. iii. iv. 15. speaks of it in a very lively manner, that the souls of good men, and such as suffer persecution in this world, shall receive a recompence in the day of visitation : for thus he calls the resurrection. In the Maccabees we see the same truth maintained still more expressly. One of the seven brethren, who suffered death under Antiochus Epiphanes, tells that tyrant, "Thou, like a fury, takest us out of this present life ; but the king of the world shall raise us up, who have died for his laws, unto everlasting life."—Their mother encouraged them, by the same hope of the resurrection : and they were so entirely persuaded of it, that they despised death, tortures, and all the menaces of the king, 2 Mac. vii. 9, 14, 23, 29. Heb. xi. 35.

When our Saviour appeared in Judea, the resurrection from the dead was received as a principal article of religion, by the whole Jewish nation, except the Sadducees ; a sect then tolerated : and some of them held principal employments in the state, Acts v. 17. Joseph. Ant. lib. xviii. cap. 2. but at this day they look on them as heretics, Epicureans, and deny them a share in the life to come. Our Saviour, in his Gospel, has effectually confuted the error of the Sadducees: he has promised his faithful servants, a complete state of happiness, after the general resurrection. He arose himself from the dead, to give, in his own person, a proof, a pledge, a pattern of the future resurrection.—St. Paul, in almost all his Epistles, speaks of a general resurrection; refutes those who denied or opposed it; proves it to those who had difficulties about it; in some degree explains the mystery, the manner, and several circumstances of it: says, that to deny the resurrection of the dead, is the same as to deny our Saviour's resurrection: and that, if we were not to rise again from the dead, we should be of all men the most miserable. 1 Cor. xv.

Some Jews teach, that all men shall not rise again, but only Israelites; others are of opinion, that all men shall rise again. Some among them maintain, that when men are once raised again, they shall be no more subject to death.—But others think they shall die again, and that their souls alone shall enjoy everlasting happiness. See Manasseh-ben-Israel, on the Resurrection of the Dead, lib. iii.

Leo of Modena, Part iv. chap. xi. of The Ceremonies of the Jews, expresses himself thus: “There are Jews who think, with Pythagoras, that souls pass from one body to another; this they call Gilgul, or circulation. They endeavour to support their opinion from several passages of Scripture, taken chiefly out of Ecclesiastes and Job. But this notion is not universal; and whether it be embraced or rejected, it makes no schism, or heresy among them. As to the resurrection of the dead, it is one of their thirteen articles of faith, that at the end of the world, all the dead shall arise; and that God shall summon all mankind to his general judgment, whether in or out of the body: according to that of Daniel; “and many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt, Dan. xii. 2.

It is also a common opinion among the Jews, that at least all Israelites shall rise in the land of Israel, Bereshith Rabba, sect. 96; hence proceeds their ardent desire to be buried in that country. They believe, those who have this advantage, will rise before all others, to enjoy the happiness of seeing the kingdom of the Messiah. But then, what shall become of the just who have died and are buried out of the land of Israel? They answer, that God will open them passages in the earth, and subterraneous conveyances, through which they shall roll into this country; and when they are come thither, God will give them the breath of life, and they shall revive. They think it was for this priority of resurrection, that Jacob and Joseph desired to be carried into the land of Canaan. And we read in some books of the Rabbins, that often they carried the bodies of certain Jews, of more than ordinary devotion, from very distant countries, to be interred in the land of Israel. [We have lately heard of the same in Britain.]

We have also seen, in the Christian church, a variety of opinions concerning the resurrection of the dead. Several of the ancient fathers acknowledged a two-fold resurrection. First, that which is to precede the Messiah's reign of a thousand years upon earth. Secondly, that which is to follow the reign of a thousand years, and to begin the reign of the saints in a state of everlasting happiness. This sentiment these fathers had borrowed from the Jews; it is found clearly enough in the second book of Esdras, iv. 35. vi. 18, &c. in the Testament of the twelve patriarchs; and in several of the Rabbins.

The ancient philosophers who believed the immortality of the soul, admitted also of a resurrection: whether they had received this opinion from the Eastern people, among whom they had travelled; or whether they inferred a resurrection, from the immortality of the soul, as a necessary consequence; persuading themselves, that a soul could not long continue, without being united to a body. But this resurrection some explained after one manner, and others after another. Pythagoras, who first introduced the sentiment of the soul's immortality among the Greeks, acknowledged a metempsychosis, or transmigration of the soul out of one body into another. Thales, apud Arist. 13. de Animâ, cap. 6. and Democritus, apud Theopomp. Philippic. viii. apud Laert. in proem. held also a kind of resurrection: but the manner in which they explained it, is not known. Plato, in Politico, vide Aug. de Civit. lib. xiii. cap. 19. lib. xxii. cap. 12. was pretty much of Pythagoras's opinion; he maintained, that souls which had already animated bodies, passed from them into a state of liberty, whence they afterwards returned to animate other bodies.

This doctrine of Plato was espoused by the Pharisees among the Jews. Vide Joseph. de Bell. Jud. lib. iii. cap. 14. et alibi. and by Philo de Gigantib. p. 222, 223. de Confus. Lingu. p. 270. It appears also from the Gospel, John ix. 2. Matt. xvi. 14. that many Jews admitted a kind of metempsychosis. But we find from the Book of Wisdom, iii. 6, 13. iv. 15. and the Maccabees, 2 Macc. vii. 9, 14, 23, 29. that the generality of the nation held the resurrection, much as we do now. Jesus Christ in his Gospel, supposes this doctrine, and teaches it without any contradiction, except from the Sadducees. The Apostles urged it likewise : and, notwithstanding the attempts of some heretics, who opposed it, the Catholic church has constantly embraced it, as a fundamental article of Christianity.

But many opinions have been tolerated in the church, concerning the time, the manner, and other circumstances of this resurrection. When the apostles asked of Christ, when the end of the world should happen, and his coming ?—he only informs them, that the last day will come as a thief in the night, and shall surprize mankind, when they least expect it, Mark xiii. 32. Matt. xxiv. 43, 44. St. Paul says, 1 Thess. v. 2, 3, 4. that at that time many shall pass from life to death, and from death to the resurrection, so rapidly, that in the twinkling of an eye they shall be changed, and their bodies shall be invested with incorruptibility and immortality.

Some Greek fathers, and some Rabbins believe that those who shall then be found alive, shall not die, but undergo that happy change, of passing instantly from life to immortality. Vid. Chrysost. Theodoret, Theophylact, on 1 Cor. xv. 51. Tertull. de Resurrect. cap. 41. Hieron. ad Marcellam. But the opinion seems to be more general, that all men shall suffer the sentence pronounced on the children of Adam :—it is appointed for all men once to die ; and after death, the judgment. Heb. ix. 27.

Jerom assures us, on Matt. xxvi. 6. that the tradition of the Jews is, that the dead shall rise in the night-time, or at break of day (the same time as Jesus Christ came out of his tomb.)—This tradition passed from the synagogue to the church, as may be seen by Lactantius, Institut. Epitome, et lib. vii. de Divin. Præm. cap. 19. by St. Chrysostom, on Matt. xxv. and by such Greek writers as generally follow him. This tradition is founded on those words of St. Peter ; “ the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night,” 2 Pet. iii. 10. And on those of Jesus Christ, in the parable of the ten virgins ; “ at midnight there was a cry made, behold, the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him,” Matth. xxv. 6. Prudentius, Hymn cathemer. thinks that the world will end, and consequently, the resurrection commence, in the morning. Thomas Aquinas, Tostatus, and Suarez, on the contrary, are of opinion, that it will be at mid-day. St. Paul informs us, 1 Cor. xv. 52, 53, that it will begin at the first sound of the trumpet.—To reconcile this variety of opinions, about a matter of more curiosity than consequence, why may we not say, that the general resurrection will happen at all these times at once ? For in different places of the earth all these times must coincide, and must be at one and the same hour.

Those, among the Jews, who admit a transmigration of souls, are perplexed about the manner of the resurrection. For how can the soul re-animate all the bodies which it has inhabited ? If it can animate but one of them, what must become of the rest ? Must it have its own choice, and return to that it likes best ? Some think it must re-animate its first body ; others, its last ; and that the other bodies will remain in the dust, as barren trees are deserted. I should rather conclude, that almost all who held the metempsychosis, did not admit of a general resurrection ; and that this revolution, or successive passage of the same soul through several bodies, was what they understood by a resurrection. This I take to have been the notion of certain Pharisees mentioned by Josephus.

It is inquired, what will be the nature of bodies when raised, what their stature, their age, their sex ? Jesus Christ tells us, Matt. xxii. 30. that after the resurrection men shall be as the angels of God ; i. e. according to the fathers, they shall be immortal, incorruptible, transparent, light, luminous, and in some sort, spiritual, yet without losing the qualities of bodies, as we find our Saviour's body, after his resurrection, was tangible, and had flesh on his bones. Luke xxiv. 39. But Jesus Christ laid aside the brightness of the glory of his body, and did not suffer it to irradiate his disciples ; whereas, the glorious and bright emanations from the bodies of the blessed, shall shine as the sun, as our Saviour expresses it, Matt. xiii. 43.

Some ancient Hebrew doctors, Bereschith Rabba, Parasch. 95. Gemar. Sanhedrin. and Jalkut Rabati. maintain, that men shall rise of the same stature, with the same qualities, and the same corporal defects they had in their lifetime. That the blind shall rise blind, the lame, lame, and so on. They confirm this conjecture by the appearance of Samuel, to the witch of Endor, in the same shape he had upon earth ; and by Ecclesiastes i. 4. “ One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh.” Some Christians in St. Austin's time maintained the same opinion, which they founded on Jesus Christ's appearance after his resurrection, with all the marks of his wounds. But the holy father confutes this sentiment ; and undertakes to shew, that if our Saviour preserved the marks of his wounds, it was by an effect of his power, and to convince the very senses of his disciples. See also what he says, Enchirid. de Fide, Spe, et Charitate, cap. 9.

The resurrection of infants is attended with great difficulties. If they are to rise little, weak, and such as they quitted this world ; of what what use can their resurrection be to them? And if they are to rise full grown, comely, in mature age, they will not be the same as they were; and this will not properly be a resurrection. St. Austin will not venture to determine whether children will rise small or great, but he rather inclines to that opinion, which supposes them to arise in a perfect age. Serm. 242. c. 3. et Epist. 167. nov. edit. Speaking of the resurrection of children still-born, he says, that the resurrection will give them all the perfection they would have had, if they had had time to grow up; and that it would secure them from all such imperfections, as they might have contracted had they lived. Enchirid. de Fide, Spe, et Charit. cap. 85, de Civit. lib. xii. cap. 13.—Many, both ancients and moderns have thought, that men will rise at the age at which Jesus Christ died, i. e. about the age of thirty-three or thirty-five years. So that both old and young will all appear to be about that age, to fulfil those words of St. Paul; Ephes. iv. 13. “Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ.” Aug. de Civit. lib. xxii. cap. 15. Hieronym. Epitaph. Paulæ. cap. 12. Anselm, seu D. Thom. et Est. in Ephes. iv. 13.—But the more judicious explain St. Paul, as meaning the progress of the faithful in faith and virtue, till they arrive at Christian perfection.

Many ancients, as Origen, on Matth. xxiii. 30. Hilar. and Jerom, in eund. loc. Athanas. Serm. 3. contra Arian. Basil, seu alius in Psal. cxiv. ulu apud Aug. de Civit. lib. xxii. cap. 17. doubted whether women are to rise in their proper sex. They grounded their doubts on those words of Jesus Christ, Matth. xxii. 30. “In the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage; but are as the angels of God in heaven.” And on what is said by St. Paul, Rom. viii. 29. “to be conformed to the image of his son:” adding, that according to Moses, man alone was created out of the earth, and woman was taken out of man, as an accessory. To this it is answered, that if distinction of sex be unnecessary after the resurrection, it will be equally unnecessary to men as to women: that woman is not less perfect in her kind than man; that the manner in which Eve was formed, is in some sort more advantageous to the sex, than the creation of man. He was created immediately from the earth, but she from him. Lastly, the sex of the woman is no defect or imperfection, but an appointment of nature.

city, and appeared to many, Matth. xxvii. 51, 52, 53. This subject deserves a few words. The names of those who arose on this occasion are unknown. Some insist they were all the most ancient fathers and patriarchs: others, that they were the most modern, such as were best known to the Jews then living. Others, that this favour was granted only to those buried at Jerusalem, or thereabouts: [which seems to be the most probable opinion. Perhaps, mostly those buried in the sepulchres on Mount Sion, lately discovered by Dr. E. D. CLARKE. They went into the Holy City, i. e. Zion, where were their “rocks, which rent,” and their “monuments which opened.” Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DLXXV. et seq.]

They dispute also about the hour of their resurrection. Some maintain that they did not rise till after our Saviour, who is called the first fruits of those that slept. 1 Cor. xv. 20. Origen, Jerom, Gregory the Great, Raban-Maur, Paschasius, Radbert, Bede, Drutmar, Liran, the common gloss, and several others, are of this opinion. But St. Chrysostom, and the Greek authors who generally follow him, Hilary, and many others, believe that they arose at the moment of our Saviour's death; and that Jesus Christ raised them before he raised himself, to display his triumph over death more remarkably. It must be allowed, that the text of the evangelist Matthew, is not decisive for either opinion.

But these saints being thus raised, did they die again, and re-enter their graves, after the ascension of Jesus Christ, or did they ascend with him into heaven? Those who think Jesus Christ led them with him into heaven, as it were in triumph, quote Hosea, xiii. 14. “I will ransom them from the power of the grave, I will redeem them from death; O death, I will be thy plague; O grave, I will be thy destruction.” And those of the Psalmist, lxviii. 18. “Thou hast ascended on high, thou hast led captivity captive.” And St. Paul; “When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men.” Eph. iv. 8. Is it probable, that after having restored life to these saints and illustrious dead, God should think fit to subject them again to death and the grave? Would not this be to plunge them again into pain and bitterness, after giving them a taste of happiness? Lastly, would it not be agreeable to the justice, the goodness, and the majesty of their divine deliverer, to complete his work, and to lead them with him into heaven, after he had restored them to life upon earth?

We might produce a great number of the fathers, who have been of this opinion. Ignatius the Martyr, to the Magnesians. Origen, on Matt.

Matt. xxvii. and on the Canticles. The author of the Orthodox Questions, Quest. 84. Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. lib. vi. Eusebius of Cæsarea, Demonstration, cap. xii. Hilary on Psalm ii. Venerable Bede, Raban-Maurus, Drutmar, Paschasius, Radbertus, and a multitude of modern interpreters, maintain positively, that the holy patriarchs raised with Jesus Christ, enjoy with him the happiness of heaven, and were partakers of his triumphant ascension.

But the contrary opinion is maintained with not less authority, nor fewer proofs. St. Paul says expressly, Heb. xi. 39, 40. that the holy patriarchs, "having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise: God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect."—Therefore he did not think them yet raised, nor in possession of the glory of heaven. He says, elsewhere, that "Jesus Christ is the first-fruits of those that slept" the sleep of death, and were to arise one day, not to sleep any more. Besides, if any one had been to rise with our Saviour, doubtless it would have been the holy king David, John the Baptist, the patriarchs and the prophets buried at Jerusalem, and in Palestine. But St. Peter, speaking to the Jews of Jerusalem, says, expressly, Acts ii. 29. that David's tomb was still to be seen among them; that David had foretold the resurrection of our Saviour, but says nothing at all of his own. What strength has St. Peter's reasoning, if David had been raised, and had ascended into heaven with Jesus Christ?

The fathers that have treated this subject with the greatest care, have declared for this opinion. Tertullian, de Animâ, cap. 55. purposely confutes those who thought, that the patriarchs and prophets ascended into heaven after the resurrection of our Saviour. St. Chrysostom says, Homil. 40. on 1 Cor. that they who arose while Jesus Christ was on the cross, died again. And Homil. 28. on Heb. xi. he owns with the apostle, that the just men of the Old Testament have not yet received their reward. Theodoret expresses himself in the same manner. Theophylact and Euthymius, explaining Matthew xxvii. acknowledge, that the holy patriarchs arose as proofs of the resurrection of Christ; but that they afterwards died again, to rise a second time at the end of the world. St. Austin, in his Epistle to Evodius, expressly treats this question, and explains himself clearly enough for the temporary resurrection of these saints. Thomas Aquinas, iii. part, art. 53. art. 3. having produced the reasons on which each of these opinions is founded, declares himself for those who hold, that they died again; and this opinion seems to us to be best supported, by Scripture and by the fathers. [If Lazarus died again, why not these?]

[There are several questions connected with this subject, as it appears in S. S. which comprize much greater importance than those so assiduously treated by the schoolmen. That some notion of a resurrection was in circulation among the Jews, appears from the perplexity of Herod the Tetrarch, Matt. xiv. When he heard of the fame of Jesus, he said, "This is John the Baptist; he is risen from the dead, and therefore mighty works do shew forth themselves in him." How could he conceive of a resurrection of John, when he knew that he had been decolated?—that his head was in the keeping of Herodias, and that his body had been buried by his disciples, verse 12. It could not be a corporal resurrection: the body without the head was, undoubtedly, imperfect and incapable of life.—If Herod supposed (as some say) that the soul of John animated the body of Jesus, how was that a resurrection? and what could be his reasons for imagining that, in such case, "mighty works" would be wrought by a soul returned to earth from the abode, or the state, of separate spirits?

Very confused, undoubtedly, were the notions of the best instructed of the disciples of Jesus, on this subject. When Peter, James, and John, as they came down from the Mount of Transfiguration, were charged to preserve secrecy as to what they had witnessed, "till the son of man should be risen from the dead," they cross-examined each other as to the import of this phrase. They could not think themselves enjoined to silence till the general resurrection: undoubtedly they should all be dead long enough before that: and as to the particular resurrection of the Son of Man, they were completely at a loss, since they, in common, with other Jews, had heard out of the law that the Messiah abideth for ever. This was explained to John (first, apparently) and to Peter, John xx. 8. and this "questioning among themselves," might be no bad preparative for that conviction. In the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, Luke xvi. the passage of a separate spirit from a state of felicity to this world, is plainly supposed to be possible: and the phrase "rising from the dead," is used in a manner to shew that it was common and current at that time, and among that people.

The doctrine of a general resurrection as an article of faith, is expressly acknowledged by Martha, at the grave of Lazarus, John xi. 24. and it is clear, that no individual can receive according to the deeds done in the body, unless the the body be party to the sentence as well as to the deeds.

But, the conceptions of both Jews and Gentiles were exceedingly gross and obscure, on a doctrine so contrary to universal experience.—They inclined too much to the notion of a corporeal resurrection to a renovated term of sensual enjoyment, to terrestrial pleasures, a freedom from the evils of life, but a participation in its joys and advantages; a prolongation of being, in its favourable sense, on earth; but again to close, and terminate. Of resurrection of the body to eternal life, properly speaking, and in a state of perfect holiness, and glory, superior to the delights of sense, they appear to have had no idea: hence the Gentiles, especially, both ridiculed and hated the doctrines held and enforced by the disciples of Jesus.

It was the opinion of Chrysostom that the philosophers addressed by St. Paul at Athens, Acts xvii. 19. took Jesus and the resurrection—Ἀναστασιν—for a god or deified man, and a goddess, or deified principle. Dr. Hammond adopts this idea, and is followed by later writers. It is countenanced by their expression—“he seems to be a setter forth of foreign demons,” i. e. of departed spirits existing in a separate and more exalted state, but exercising great power in this lower world.

Undoubtedly, Paul was the best qualified of all men to describe the glories of the resurrection-body of Christ: for, during his abode on earth, Christ suspended, or suppressed, those glories; and the appearances of Christ, seen by the writer of the Apocalypse, being in vision, and that vision emblematical and mysterious, they will not bear arguments so cogent as the manifestation in the way to Damascus. St. Paul repeatedly asserts that “he had seen the Lord,”—that he had been commissioned by him: he reports a long communication that took place, Acts xxvi. 13—18. and he affirms the excessive refulgence of the splendor from the body of Jesus, its effects on his companions, and more especially on himself; in whom it produced blindness, i. e. the cornea of the eye was so greatly indurated, that its transparency was lost: nor was the power of seeing restored to the eye, till after the original cornea had peeled off, in the form of scales.

It may well be supposed that pre-eminence in point of splendor is conferred on the resurrection-body of Christ; nor should we press too closely the words of John, “We shall be like him, when we shall see him as he is.” Nevertheless, we may modestly conjecture, that a glory somewhat similar will be attached even to the bodies of saints; though it becomes us to confess that our ignorance on all celestial subjects is rendered the more sensible, by the very communications with which we have been favoured by Divine revelation, itself. We are more conscious of our ignorance, incompetency, and weakness, than the uninstructed heathen, or the partially instructed Hebrews, could possibly be. We repose our confidence on the infinite power of our Maker, we receive the doctrine simply as an article of Divine Revelation; and, notwithstanding the difficulties of the subject and the power of opposing appearances, we rejoice in hope of the Glory of God.]

REU, רעו, his friend, his shepherd: or his misfortune; from רעה rehah, or roheh, society; or from רוע ruah, evil, or bruising.

[Reu may mean consociation, and might be imposed in consideration of the Hebrew family keeping together when the other families of the earth were divided. The same is the import of his son's name Serug. Reu is written Ragau, Luke iii. 35. as Reuel is written Raguel, Tobit vi. 10.]

REU, or RAGAU, or RETUI, son of Peleg, born A. M. 1787. His father was then thirty years old. He begat Serug, being thirty-two years old, A. M. 1819, and died at the age of two hundred and thirty-nine years, A. M. 2026, ante A. D. 1976. It is not impossible, that the city of Rages, and the plain of Ragau, might take their names from Reu, Rehu, or Ragau; for these are the same in the Hebrew. The difference depends on the pronunciation of the letter y ain or gnain. Gen. xi. 18. 1 Chron. i. 25.

REUBEN, ראובן, who sees the son, or vision of the son; from ראה raha, to see, and בן ben, a son. [He, the Lord, sees the son; so called in reference to the sentiment of his mother, “The Lord hath looked on my affliction.”]

REUBEN, eldest son of Jacob and Leah; born A. M. 2246, ante A. D. 1758. Gen. xxix. 32. One day Reuben being yet young, went into the field, and found a fruit called dudaim, (generally interpreted mandrakes) which he brought to his mother Leah. Gen. xxx. 14. Rachel was desirous of having them, and asked them of Leah, who bargained with her for Jacob's company the night following. Long after this, Jacob being returned into the land of Canaan, Reuben defiled his father's concubine Bilhah, for which he lost his birth-right, and all the privileges of primogeniture. Gen. xxxv. 22. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CLXXXVI.

When Joseph's brethren had taken a resolution to destroy him, Reuben endeavoured by all means to deliver him. He proposed to them, to let him down into an old water-pit, which had had then no water: that afterwards he might take him up again, and restore him to his father Jacob. His brethren took the advice; but while Reuben was at some distance, they sold Joseph to a party of Ishmaelites. Reuben going to the pit, and not finding him there, tore his clothes, and said to his brethren; "The child is not to be found, and whither shall I go?"

Jacob, when dying, warmly reproaches Reuben with his crime committed with Bilhah; saying, "Reuben, thou art my first-born, my might, —but, unstable as water, thou shalt not excel, because thou wentest up to thy father's bed; then defiledst thou it." Moses, before his death, said of Reuben, Deut. xxxiii. 6. let Reuben live and not die, yet let his number be but small, says the Vulgate: [Eng. Tr. "let not his men be few."] The tribe of Reuben was never very numerous, nor very considerable in Israel. They had their inheritance beyond Jordan, between the brooks Arnon south, and Jazer north, having the mountains of Gilead east, and Jordan west. The time of Reuben's death is unknown.

We read in the apocryphal book, called, The Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, a particular account of Reuben's crime. But it is well known that this book is the work of an impostor, who would assert, as genuine, the spurious book of Enoch, and other Jewish traditions.

[REUBEN, Tribe of. This tribe having much cattle, solicited and obtained from Moses, possessions east of the Jordan; by which river, it was separated from the main body of Israel: it was, in consequence, exposed to various inroads and oppressions from which the western tribes were free: and it was among the first carried into captivity by Tiglath Pilnesser. 1 Chr. v. 26. However, its distinction as a tribe, was in some sort preserved, as we read Rev. vii. 5. "of the tribe of Reuben were sealed twelve thousand."]

REUEL, ראַעל, 'Ρασηλ, shepherd, or friend of God; from ראַהא, shepherd, friend: otherwise, bruising of God; from ראַח, and אַל, God. See RAGUEL. [and REU, ante.]

REUEL, or RAHUEL, son of Esau and Bashemath, daughter of Ishmael. Reuel was father of Nabath, Zerah, Shammah, and Mizzah. Gen. xxxvi. 4, 17.

REVELATION, Ἀποκάλυψις, Apocalypsis. See APOCALYPSE, for the book of the Revelations.

REVELATION, is meant when God, in an extraordinary and supernatural manner, discovers any thing to man; whether by dream, vision, ecstasy, or otherwise. St. Paul alluding to his visions and revelations, 2 Cor. xii. 1, 7.

VOL. II. PART: XXIV. Edit. IV.

speaks of them in the third person out of modesty; and declares, that he could not tell whether he were in the body, or out of the body.— Elsewhere he says, that he had received his gospel by a particular revelation. Gal. i. 12.; again, that he did not go to Jerusalem after his conversion by the mere motion of his own mind, but in consequence of a revelation. Gal. ii. 2.

Revelation is used to express the manifestation of Jesus Christ to Jews and Gentiles, Luke ii. 32. the manifestation of the glory with which God will glorify his elect, and faithful servants at the last judgment, Rom. viii. 19. and the declaration of his just judgments, in his conduct both towards the elect, and towards the reprobate. Rom. ii. 5.

The Latin words revelatio and revelare, signify barely a discovering of what was before concealed. [But there is a very noble application of these words to the consummation of all things, or the revelation of Jesus Christ in his future glory, 1 Cor. i. 7. 1 Peter i. 13.]

REVENGE, as it includes a sense of sorrow and trouble for injuries suffered by us, cannot by any means belong to God. None of his creatures can disturb his peace, or cause him any trouble, or resentment. Ultio doloris confessio est, says Seneca, de Ira. lib. iii. cap. 5. Man has recourse to revenge only because he is sensible of injuries. When therefore Scripture says, that God revenges himself, it speaks after a popular manner: he vindicates the injuries done to his justice and to his majesty, and to the order established by him in the world; yet without any emotion of pleasure or displeasure. He revenges the injuries done to his servants, because he is just, and because order and justice must be preserved. Men revenge themselves out of weakness; because they are offended; because they are too much influenced by self-love. A great soul despises injuries; a gracious soul leaves the revenge of injuries to God.

[So far as I am able to judge, our language maintains a distinction that ought to be observed between the terms revenge and avenge, although it is too often overlooked. That God may avenge, i. e. punish in proportion to sins committed, is the indefeasible consequence of his infinite justice, of his moral government, holiness, &c. but, to revenge seems rather the act of a man when he inflicts an injury on another, commensurate, in his estimation, to the injury he has received from that other, and in this he is likely to be guilty of excess. It is, therefore, not without great pain I read of God's revenging, since a disposition to revenge, or a spirit of revenge, is very improperly imputed to
G div. 2. Deity,

Deity, and we cannot be too cautious on this subject. To avenge a broken law, to avenge the injuries sustained by the widow and fatherless, i. e. to punish those who oppress them in proportion to demerit, is no more than justice, and may be accomplished in various ways; possibly even, without inflicting evil on the culprit—but by bringing him to a penitent sense of his misconduct, inducing him to make restitution, to make amends, to compensate for damages, and to resolve on better conduct for the future, &c. In short it should seem that determination to avenge, is a pure and simple wish to do justice, or to see justice done; while the desire to revenge, springs from pride, or self-love, and is a human infirmity actuated by passion, vehemently assuming the character of retaliation, vexing, or injuring the object of it, &c.]

In the Old Testament God tolerated revenge in certain cases, to avoid greater evils: “an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth,” &c. Exod. xxi. 24. The relations of a man who had been killed might take revenge on the murderer. Numb. xxxv. 16, 17, 18, &c. The relations thought it their duty to pursue to vengeance such murderers, and the Hebrews called goel or revengers, those to whom this sort of vengeance appertained.

God has sufficiently declared, that vengeance belongs only to him; Deut. xxxii. 35. He forbids malice and revenge in express terms; he will not allow us to keep any resentment in our hearts against our brethren; Lev. xix. 17, 18. And when God seems to have established the lex talionis, he does not thereby allow of revenge, but sets limits to it. Non fomes, sed limes furoris est, says St. Austin, cont. Faust. lib. xix. cap. 25. He does not intend to provoke to anger, but to stop the progress and consequences of it. Non ut id quod sopitum erat, hinc accenderetur; sed ne id quod ardebat, ultra extenderetur.

The day of revenge, or of vengeance, sometimes expresses the day of judgment, in which God will take vengeance on all his enemies; and sometimes the day of vengeance stands for the punishment God exercises on his enemies, when their iniquities have attained their full measure. See Exod. xxxii. 34. Isai. xxxiv. 8. lxi. 2. lxiii. 4. Luke xxi. 22.

Vengeance is often expressed in the Hebrew by the word consolation; and though Jerom has generally put the word revenge, yet he has sometimes used the words comfort and consolation, in the sense of revenge.

In Scripture sometimes revenge is taken for the mere action of assault, or for injury committed against another; yet not without a colour and pretence of just revenge. By these expressions we must understand their hatred, their ill-will.

When it is said, that God grants his revenge to any one; Psalm xviii. 47. Deus qui dat vindictas mihi; this intimates, either that God gives up his enemies into his hands, to take vengeance on them; or, that they having afflicted his servants, he punishes them himself, by some terrible effects of his justice.

REVENGER, or Revenger of Blood. This name is given in Scripture to the man who had the right, according to the Jewish polity, of taking revenge on him who had killed one of his near relations: ultor sanguinis. If a man had been guilty of manslaughter, involuntarily and without design, he fled to a city of refuge. Vide REFUGE: and FRAGMENTS, No. X.

REUMAH, רֹאמָה, Ῥῥῡῶν, lofty, sublime; from רָמָה ramam: otherwise, rhinoceros; from רָחַם rehem. [raised up, or the cause of raising up, i. e. of increasing, sc. the family.]

REUMAH, or ROMA, concubine to Nahor, the brother of Abraham: mother to Tebah, Gaham, Thahath, and Maachah. Gen. xxii. 24.

[REVERENCE, a respectful, submissive disposition of mind, arising from affection, and esteem, from a sense of superiority in the person reverenced. Hence children reverence their fathers, even when their fathers correct them by stripes, Heb. xii. 9. hence subjects reverence their sovereign, 2 Sam. ix. 6. hence wives reverence their husbands, Eph. v. 33. and hence all ought to reverence God. We reverence the name of God, the house of God, the worship of God, &c. we reverence the attributes of, God, the commands, dispensations, &c. of God; and we ought to demonstrate our reverence by overt acts, such as are suitable and becoming to time, place, and circumstances; for though a man may reverence God in his heart, yet unless he behave reverentially, and give proofs of his reverence by demeanour, conduct, and obedience, he will not easily persuade his fellow-mortals, that his bosom is the residence of this divine, this heavenly disposition: for, in fact, a reverence for God is not one of those lights, which burn under a bushel, but one of those whose sprightly lustre illuminates wherever it is admitted.

Perhaps, in strictness, reverence is the internal disposition of the mind, φόβον, Rom. xiii. 7. and honour, τιμήν, is the external expression of that disposition.]

[REWARD, a recompence, requital, retribution, for some service done; the fruit and benefit of labour. It is of several kinds:—as mental; the reward of a good action is enjoyed in reflection, satisfaction, a sense of having been useful, useful, &c.—as pecuniary; profitable, such as is due to labourers for their work, 1 Tim. v. 18. Job. vii. 2. a gift, or acquisition to counterbalance an injury. Prov. xxi. 14. xxii. 4. Rewards are not always conferred by Providence on good men, in this life, but their reward is in heaven, Matt. v. 12. Luke vi. 23. The essence of reward being satisfaction, a reward given freely, a reward prompted by grace and favour, is, a donation not claimable by the party who receives it, on account of his own merit, but bestowed in kindness by the giver, and therefore, though in strictness it is not reward for work done, yet it is no less a remuneration, and is at once a gift and a satisfaction. “Raphelius has shewn, (says Dr. Doddridge,) that μθον not only signifies a reward of debt, but also a gift of favour; and that the phrase μθον δοσεν occurs in Herodotus: so that a reward of grace, or favour, is a classical as well as theological expression.” Note on Rom. iv. 4.]

REZEPH, RESEPH, RESIPH, RESAPHA, or RISAPHA, a city of Syria, 2 Kings xix. 12. Isaiah xxxvii. 12. noted in Ptolemy, in the tables of Peutinger, and in the eastern Notitia. Vide RESEPH.

REZIA, רִצְיָא. See RESA.

REZIA, or RESIA, daughter of Ulla, of Asher. 1 Chron. vii. 39.

REZIN, רִצִּין, Ῥαζών, voluntary, or goodwill, from רָצָא ratsa; or runner, from רָץ rats. [From the Arabic, firm, stable.]

REZIN, or RASIN, king of Syria. He combined with Pekah, king of Israel, to invade Judah, 2 Kings xv. 37, 38. xvi. 5, 6. A. M. 3262, ante A. D. 742. See also 2 Chron. xxviii. 5, 6, 7. The first year of Abaz they besieged Jerusalem: but not being able to take it, they wasted the country round about, and withdrew. The year following they returned, and the Lord delivered up to them the army, and the country of Abaz. After this, they separated their armies;—that of Rezin plundered every where, and carried away captives to Damascus.

About the same time, Rezin took Elath, on the Red Sea; he drove out the Jews, and settled Idumeans in their room, who, probably, had engaged him to undertake this war. The Hebrew and the Vulgate seem to intimate, that Rezin, king of Syria, conquered Elath for the Syrians. But the tenor of the discourse sufficiently shews, that we ought to read, “for the Idumeans:” and that the Hebrew should be read Edom, not Aram. The difference between these two words in the original, is hardly perceivable. 2 Kings xvi. 6. אֶת אֵילַת לְאָדָם, read לְאָדָם, Leadom, instead of Learam. [Eng. Tr. Syria.]

Abaz finding himself not strong enough to withstand Rezin and Pekah, applied to Tiglath-pilneser, king of Assyria, and with a very large sum of money bought his assistance. Tiglath-pilneser marched against Damascus, took the city, and slew Rezin: he also carried away his people to Kir; probably the river Cyrus in Iberia. 2 Kings xvi. 9.

[REZIN, a Jew, who returned from Babylon, Ezra ii. 48. Neh. vii. 50.]

REZON, רִזִּון, Ῥαζών, lean, or small; from רָצָא razah, to grow lean: otherwise, secret; from רָז raz: otherwise, prince; from רָזָן razon. [From the Arabic, reserved, grave, modest.]

REZON, or RAZON, son of Eliadah: he revolted from his master Hadadezer, king of Zobah, while David made war against him; and heading a band of robbers, he made inroads into the country about Damascus. 1 Kings xi. 23.—He at last became master of this city, and was acknowledged king. It should seem that he could not settle here, till toward the end of Solomon's reign; for David conquered Damascus, with the rest of Syria; and Solomon maintained his command over all the provinces David had subjected. But if Rezon did not rule at Damascus till toward the end of Solomon's reign, he must have lived very long: for, from David's war with Hadadezer, about A. M. 2960, to the end of Solomon's reign, who died A. M. 3029, must be sixty-nine years. Rezon was at least five-and-twenty or thirty years of age at the time of the first wars; since he was then a general in Hadadezer's army, and presently became head of a troop of freebooters: so that he must have been about ninety years of age when he began to govern at Damascus. If this seems hardly credible, it may be allowed, that Rezon might have reigned at Damascus under David and Solomon, as tributary to these princes; and that he did not begin to revolt till towards the end of Solomon's reign.

RHEGIUM, Ῥήγιον, rupture, or fracture; from the Greek ῥήγιον.

RHEGIUM, a city of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples. St. Paul landed here in his way to Rome, A. D. 61. Acts xxviii. 13, 14. St. Luke being then of his company, and having said nothing of those miracles that are pretended to have been performed by St. Paul in this place; his silence ought to render them very much suspected; or rather, to put a total negative upon them.

RHINOCEROS, an animal thus called, because he has a horn on his snout. The name rhinoceros occurs in the Vulgate, Numb. xxiii. 22. xxiv. 8. Deut. xxxiii. 17. Job. xxxix. 9, 10.

The Hebrew monoceros is rendered in the LXX. by monoceros, unicornis, or rhinoceros.

The Arabians and Persians call this animal kerkbedan. Vide UNICORN.

Father le Compte says, the rhinoceros is as long as an elephant; but its legs are shorter; and its hoofs are cloven. Its feet are thick, and its body unwieldy: its legs appear as if they had boots on; and its head seems to be covered behind with a kind of hood, whence the Portuguese name it, the monk of the Indies.

Its head is thick, its mouth not wide; its muzzle long, and armed with a thick and long horn; which makes it terrible even to tigers, buffaloes, and elephants. Its tongue is covered with so hard a membrane, that it differs but little from a file: thus it fleas every thing it licks, and eats with great facility the rough branches of trees, though defended all round with sharp thorns: it bends them easily upon its tongue, and breaks them in its mouth without any trouble. Vide FRAGMENTS and PLATES.

RHINOCOLURA, or RHINOCORURA; but the first reading is the most correct. This word signifies the cutting of the nostrils, because the ancient inhabitants of this city were thus mutilated. Strab. lib. xvi. Ῥινοκόλῦρα, ἀπὸ τῶν εἰσωρισμένων τὰς ῥίνας ἔτω καλεμένη. Diodorus Siculus relates the matter thus, lib. i. cap. 60: Actisarus, king of Ethiopia, desirous to clear his kingdom of robbers, yet unwilling to put them to death, apprehended as many as he could, slit their noses, and banished them into a desert and barren place, where they built a city, which, because of their slit-noses, was called, Rhinocolura. Seneca, de Ira, lib. iii. cap. 20. says, it was a king of Persia, probably Cambyses, who made them undergo this ignominious punishment. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXI.

Near the city of Rhinocolura is a river which several have taken to be the river of Egypt. But we take the river of Egypt to be the Nile; and the stream that runs near Rhinocolura, we think to be the brook Besor, or the river of the Wilderness, of Scripture. This city of Rhinocolura is ascribed sometimes to Syria, sometimes to Palestine, and sometimes to Egypt, on which it afterwards depended. Its bishop was a suffragan of Pelusium. It is unknown what the ancient name of this district was, I mean the Hebrew name, before the Grecians named it Rhinocolura, and before the story of the slit-noses was invented.

RHODA, Acts xii. 13, 14. a young maid of the household of Mary, the mother of John-Mark, who coming to open the door to a person that knocked at it, was so transported with joy, at hearing Peter's voice, whom she thought to be in prison, and who was just then miraculously delivered by an angel, that, without staying to open the door, she ran back to inform the believers, then assembled in the house. They looked on her as visionary or mad, but she still maintained that she heard Peter's voice. The apostle continuing to knock, she returned, and opened the door. We know no other circumstance of the life of Rhoda; for, as to her exile and her martyrdom, which, it is pretended, she suffered in the Isle of Sardinia, we place them in the number of apocryphal stories. One Helcias, bishop of Ausburg, is quoted for this; but I do not find Rhoda's name in any martyrology.

The Masoretic text, the Chaldees, Syriac, Latin, and Arabic of Erpenius, read with D, in the Pentateuch: and so do many editions in the Chronicles. The same may be said of MSS. some of them very ancient, and not corrected by the Massorites. The Complutensian and Aldine bibles have D. [Eng. Tr. agrees with them.]

On the other side, the Samaritan text in Genesis reads Rhodanim, also the LXX. Josephus wholly omits the name; whence Michaelis suspects that this name is an explanation of the former name, Chittim. The Arabic of the Polyglots reads neither Rhodanim nor Dodanim, but Adana, which is a town in Cilicia, not far from Tarsus.

If Dodanim be the true reading here, then it points to Dodona, an extremely ancient oracle in Epirus, which equally applies to a son of Javan, in Greece.

If Rhodanim be the true reading, then the isle of Rhodes is the most obvious station for the Rhodanim.

To this it has been objected, that this island is one of those which have been raised from the bottom of the sea, as Pliny asserts; and therefore was not extant in the time of Moses.

In my opinion, these principles may be reconciled by supposing, that, as other cities, Tyre, Aradus, &c. were originally built on the opposite and almost adjoining continent, yet were afterwards removed to islands close by, so Rhodes was a truly ancient city, on the continent first, but at length removed to the island, where it still continued to assert its antiquity.]

RHODES, Ῥόδος, rose; from ῥόδη.

RHODES, an island and famous city of the Levant: its ancient name was Asteria, Ophiusa, and Etheria. The name Rhodes alludes to the great quantity and beauty of the roses recess that grew there. This city is chiefly famous for its brazen Colossus, which was one hundred and five feet high; made by Chares of Lyndus: it continued perfect only fifty-six years, being thrown down by an earthquake, under the reign of Ptolemy III. Euergetes, king of Egypt, who began to reign A. M. 3758, ante A. D. 244. When St. Paul went to Jerusalem, A. D. 58, he visited Rhodes. Acts xxi. 1.

The LXX. Gen. x. 4. put the Rhodians, 'Ρόδιοι, among the children of Javan. They probably read דודנים Rhodanim, instead of דודנים Dodanim. 1 Chron. i. 7. The Samaritan reads also Rhodanim in Genesis; Eusebius, Jerom, and Isidore, follow the LXX. and think the Isle of Rhodes to have been peopled by the Rhodanim, the posterity of Javan. Bochart does not reject the reading Rhodanim; but maintains, that the Rhodians are too modern to have been planted there by any immediate son of Javan: he thinks that, in Genesis, Moses rather intended to mark the Gauls, on the Mediterranean, toward the mouth of the Rhone, near Marseilles, where we find a district called Rhodanusia, and a city of the same name.

The LXX. translate Ezekiel xxvii. 15. בני דדן Beni Dedan, children of the Rhodians, instead of children of Dedan, as the Hebrew. Probably, they read children of Redan, or Rodan; but in Gen. x. 7. they read Dedan, as the Hebrew. Nothing is easier than to confound ד Daleth and ר Resh. If the text of Genesis did not determine us to Dedan, we might admit the Rhodians in this passage of Ezekiel; for, in the time of this prophet, it is very probable that this island was well-peopled.

[The name of Rhodes is by some derived from a son of Amphitrite and the sun, or Neptune and Venus, as others say. The Telechines, a people crossing over from Crete to Cyprus, first settled at Rhodes. They were foretellers of future events, addicted to incantations, &c. Comp. Ovid, Metam. vii. They are said to have been excellent artists, to have first taught the art of smelting iron, and to have made statues of the gods. The island was fertile and pleasant, says Homer. It was so frequently refreshed with showers, that Jupiter was said to visit the inhabitants at their pleasure, yet in some part of every day they saw the sun. The Rhodians were famous for commerce; and for maritime institutions; many of their laws prevail to this day. The city was taken by Soliman, emperor of the Turks, in 1522, after a siege extremely honourable to the Knights, (now of Malta,) who defended it. It is famous in antiquity for a prodigious Colossus, which was reckoned one of the wonders of the world. Pliny, lib. xxiv. cap. 7. It produced many learned and famous men.

Niebuhr says, Travels, vol. i. p. 26. "The city of Rhodes still exhibits several things to remind the traveller that it was once inhabited by the Knights of the order of St. John, who, on their expulsion hence by the Turks, were fixed at Malta. It contains a number of noble old buildings, some of which are decorated with the armorial bearings of some of the most ancient families in Europe; but the palace, which belonged to the Grand Master of the Order, is now falling into ruins. The Turks neglect the fortifications; although they might know their importance from having besieged the island so long before they could make themselves masters of it."

RHODOCUS, 'Ρόδοχος, a chariot of roses; from ῥόδον, a rose, and ὄχος, a chariot. A traitor in the army of Judas Maccabæus, who went to the camp of Antiochus Eupator, king of Syria, to betray the counsels of his party, 2 Mac. xiii. 21. He was afterwards discovered, convicted, and imprisoned, A. M. 3841, ante A. D. 163.

RIBAI, ריבי, that multiplies; from רבה rabah, or רבב rabab: otherwise, that disputes, or reproves; from ריב rub. Father of Ittai, of Benjamin, one of David's heroes. 2 Sam. xxiii. 29.

RIBLAH, ריבלה, quarrel, or greatness to him; from רבב rabab, greatness, or ריב rub, quarrel, and the preposition ל l, to, and the pronoun ה ah, him: otherwise, quarrel that increases, or that spreads; from ריב rub, quarrel, and ליה liviah, to increase. No Hebrew word.

[It should seem rather to be derived from the Arabic root importing multitude, confluence either of people or of wealth. It was beyond the land of Canaan, north. Johannes Phocas calls it "a full city, of riches and of splendid magnificence."] RIBLAH, REBLA, RIBLATA, or REBLATA, a city of Syria, in the country of Emath. Its situation is unknown. Jerom, (in Isai. xiii. et in Amos vi. 2. Item in locis, in Reblata; et in Ezek. xlvi.) has taken it for Antioch of Syria, or for the country of Emath, or Emmas, which was still in his time, the first stage of those who travelled from Syria into Mesopotamia. We know not the ancient name of the city of Antioch; but we know, the name it bore after the reign of the Seleucidæ, and what it still bears, is a new name. Jerom had, probably, some particular knowledge, since he assures us so positively, and repeatedly, that the ancient Riblah was Antioch.

However,

However, this lies under great difficulties. Antioch was at a distance from Emesa; nor was it on the road from Judea to Mesopotamia.—When Moses describes the eastern limits of the Land of Promise, Numb. xxxiv. 10. he says, “ye shall point out your east border from Hazar-enan to Shepham. And the coast shall go down from Shepham to Riblah, on the east side of (the fountain) Ain; and the border shall descend, and shall reach unto the side of the sea of Cinnereth, (i. e. of Tiberias) eastward. And the border shall go down to Jordan; and the goings out of it shall be at the Salt-sea (or, the Dead-sea). The name of Daphne is not in the Hebrew: but the Chaldee paraphrasts and Jerom explain the fountain of Riblah by that of Daphne, near Antioch. Ezekiel draws the northern bounds of the Land of Promise from the Mediterranean sea to Hazar-enan, or Atrium Enan. He says, the city of Emath limits the Holy Land toward the north; and its southern limits go through the middle of Auran, Damascus, and the mountains of Gilead. He does not mention Riblah, but Emath; in the territory of which Riblah was situate.

Riblah, as a residence, was one of the most agreeable of Syria; whence it was selected by the kings of Babylon. Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt, made a stop here, on his return from his expedition against Carchemish, 2 Kings xxiii. 33.; and having sent for Jehoahaz, king of Judah, hither, he deprived him of the royal dignity, and promoted Jehoiakim. Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, continued at Riblah, while his general Nebuzaradan besieged Jerusalem: and after the reduction of that city, king Zedekiah, with the other prisoners was brought to Riblah, where Nebuchadnezzar caused Zedekiah's eyes to be put out, &c. 2 Kings xxv. 6, 20. Jer. xxix. 5. lli. 9.

RIGHT-HAND. The right-hand denotes power, strength. Scripture generally imputes to God's right-hand, the effects of his omnipotence. Exod. xv. 6. See Psalm xxi. 8. xlv. 4, et alibi passim.

To sit down at the right-hand of God, is generally put for obtaining an equality of glory and power. The Son of God is often represented as sitting at the right-hand of his Heavenly Father, Psalm cx. 1. And “hereafter shall ye see the Son of Man sitting on the right-hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven,” Matt. xxvi. 64. Col. iii. 1. Hebr. i. 3. x. 12.

The right-hand commonly denotes the south, as the left-hand denotes the north. For the Hebrews speak of the quarters of the world in respect of a person, whose face is turned to the east, his back to the west, his right-hand to the south, and his left-hand to the north. Thus Kedem, which signifies before, denotes also the east; and Achor, which signifies behind, marks the west; Jamin, the right-hand, is the south; and Shemol, the left-hand, is the north. For example; “doth not David hide himself with us in strong holds in the wood, in the hill of Hachilah, which is on the south of Jeshimon?” Heb. on the right-hand of Jeshimon. 1 Sam. xxiii. 19, 24.

The accuser was commonly at the right-hand of the accused; Psalm cix. 6. And in Zechariah, Satan stands at the right-hand of the high-priest Joshua, to accuse him, Zech. iii. 1.

Often in a quite contrary sense, to be at any one's right-hand, signifies to defend, to protect, to support him, Psalm vi. 8. “I have set the Lord always before me; because he is at my right-hand, I shall not be moved.” Psalm cix. 31. “For he shall stand at the right-hand of the poor, to save him from those that condemn his soul.” Psalm cviii. 6.

“To depart from the law of God, neither to the right-hand, nor to the left,” is a frequent Scripture expression, meaning a strict adherence to it: neither attempting to go beyond it, and doing more than it requires; nor doing less: we must observe it closely, constantly, invariably; as a traveller, who does not quit his way, either to the right, or the left, lest he should lose it entirely.

Our Saviour, in the Gospel, to shew with what privacy we should do good works, says, Matt. vi. 3. “That our left-hand should not know what our right-hand does.” Above all things we should avoid vanity and ostentation in alms and beneficence.

Dextralia, or Dextraliola, are bracelets which men, as well as women, used as ornaments. Of these Moses spoke, Exod. xxxv. 22. Numb. xxxi. 50. when he enjoined the Israelites to have always the law of God in their minds; and that it should be “for a sign unto thee upon thine hand,” as a seal fastened to their ring or bracelet. Compare this passage with Ecclus. xlix. 13. Quomodo amplificemus Zerobabel? Num et ipse quasi signum in dextra manu.—Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CCLXVI.

To give the right-hand, dare dexteram, is a mark of society and friendship. St. Paul says, that James, Cephas, and John, gave him the right-hand of fellowship, Gal. ii. 9. In the Books of the Maccabees this expression occurs very often.

In taking an oath they lifted up their right-hand, Isaiah lxii. 8. Gen. xiv. 22. Deut. xxxii. 40.

venient length: it is, however, worth while to become acquainted with some of the distinctions allotted by S. S. to the right-hand. When Jacob called Benjamin the son of my right-hand, as the margin reads, it certainly denoted a special degree of affection for that child of his beloved Rachel: and when he purposely crossed his hands, so as to lay his right-hand on the head of Ephraim, Gen. xlviii. 14. this token, indicating greater prosperity, was readily understood by Joseph, as it was intended by his father. When we read 1 Chron. xxix. 24. on occasion of the inauguration of Solomon, that "all the sons of David gave the hand unto Solomon as king;" understand the right-hand, given in token of allegiance, and submission. Compare FRAG. No. CXXXI. In like manner, of Babylon, Jer. l. 15. "She hath given her hand, i. e. her right-hand, has pledged her fidelity; and the same, Lam. v. 6. we have given the hand—the right-hand, protesting thereby our submission, to the Egyptians, and to the Assyrians, to be satisfied with bread." When Abraham says, Gen. xiv. 22. "I have lifted up my hand to the Lord, and I cannot retract," he certainly means that he had sworn to the Lord, by lifting up his right-hand. What then, can we think of those of whom it is alleged, Psalm cxliv. 8. their right-hand is a right-hand of falsehood; their oath is not to be taken; or of those who are so besotted as to worship gods of their own making, and never to question whether there be no lye in their right-hand; where truth, fidelity, and even scrupulous accuracy, should be maintained without intermission. Isaiah xlv. 20.

The right-hand was stretched forth as an action of address, whether of intreaty, as Prov. i. 24. Isaiah lxv. 2. or of oratory, as Acts xxvi. 1. or of protection, direction, &c. &c.

The right-hand, especially, was lifted up in prayer; and it deserves notice that every figure delineated by the early Christians, remaining in their sepulchres, or elsewhere, intended to represent the action of prayer, has the hands—but especially the right-hand—lifted up, solemnly and steadily.

As much of the labour of life is performed with the right-hand, and as most of our Lord's hearers were labouring men, we ought not to pass without notice the emphatic nature of his advice—"if thy right-hand cause thee to offend, cut it off," Matt. v. 30. The inducement could not be slight, nor the conviction trivial, that could effect a loss and a suffering expressed by this figurative language.

To seat a person at the right-hand is a token of peculiar honour; so Bathsheba as the king's mother, was placed at the right-hand of Solomon, 1 Kings ii. 19. comp. Psalm xlv. 9.: and when Christ is said to be seated on the right-hand of God, Acts vii. 55. Rom. viii. 34. Col. iii. 1. it imports unequalled dignity and exaltation.

It is evident, that when a hand, or the right-hand, is attributed to Deity, the expression can be taken only after the manner of men. Deity has neither right-hand nor left-hand; but, the strength, the skill, the power of man lying much, and principally, in his right-hand, the idea is transferred to God, by an inevitable, and, therefore, a pardonable liberty of speech.]

[RIGHTEOUS, RIGHTEOUSNESS, is taken in several senses in Scripture.

1. For absolute perfection of rectitude and holiness, in which sense it is applied to God, who always observes the very strictness of equity, as well from the justice of his own nature, as in regard to his creatures, Job xxxvi. 2. John xvii. 25.

2. The truth and faithfulness of God, in performing his promises, the rectitude by which he is governed in making, and in fulfilling his promises.

3. The righteousness of Christ, the righteousness acceptable to God, the manner of becoming righteous in the sight of God; are other acceptations of the word.

4. Righteous is spoken comparatively of men. No man is absolutely righteous; but he who practises uprightness, justice, equity, integrity in his conduct, behaviour, dealings, &c. is comparatively righteous. Whoever in his course of life "walks in all the ordinances and commandments of the Lord, blameless," is so far righteous. Hence some persons in Scripture are called righteous, as Noah, Gen. vii. 1—9. i. e. a man of integrity, and holy manners. So Abraham supposes, Gen. xviii. 23. there might be fifty righteous in Sodom, men who were not profligates like the Sodomites in general; and this sense is frequent in the Psalms, &c. Alms are called righteousness, Matth. vi. 1.

Righteousness in the New Testament is applied to God; to Jesus Christ the righteous, 1 John ii. 1. and to men: but as men have, at best, but a broken, damaged, and imperfect righteousness, this word is applied to men in a very limited and qualified sense; and also with respect to a better righteousness than merely human; that obtained by faith, that freely bestowed by God, and as bestowed, so received, through Christ.

Righteousness denotes the ordinances of God, Matt. iii. 15. xxi. 32.

Righteousness is sometimes much the same as holiness, Acts x. 35. Eph. v. 9. The righteousness.

ness of the Pharisees, which was in their own eyes excellent, was precise to superstition, yet was imperfect and worthless before God, Luke xviii. 9. Matt. ix. 13. To acknowledge as righteous, to pronounce righteous, i. e. to acquit. Vide JUSTIFICATION.]

RIMMON, REMMON, or REMMONA, a city of Zebulun, 1 Chron. vi. 77. Perhaps Dimnah, Dimona, or Damna. Josh. xxi. 35.

II. RIMMON, a rock to which the Children of Benjamin retreated. Judg. xx. 45. xxi. 13. 1 Sam. xiv. 2.

III. RIMMON, an idol of Damascus. Naaman, the Syrian, confesses to Elisha, that he had often been in the temple of Rimmon with the king his master, who leaned on his arm, while he paid his adorations to Rimmon, 2 Kings v. 18. It is thought this god was the sun, named Rimmon, or high, because of his elevation. Grotius, in loc. takes it for Saturn, because that planet is the most elevated. Selden, de Diis Syris, Syntag. 2. cap. 10. thinks it to be God Most High, Elion of the Phœnicians. Serrarius believes it to be the goddess Venus. We know no other god, in all antiquity, but this, by the name Rimmon [q. Baal with the pomegranate?]

[1. Rimmon in the tribes of Judah and Simeon. Josh. xv. 32. xix. 7. 1 Chron. iv. 32. Nehem. xi. 29. Zech. xiv. 10.

2. A valley, Zach. xiv. 10. but Lyra thinks it was a city not far from Megiddo, afterwards called Maximianopolis.

3. Rimmon Methoar, the pomegranate with the circle (of rays) around it. Otherwise, as some think, Rimmon of the Circles, i. e. of Galilee. A city of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 13.]

RIMMON PAREZ, an encampment of Israel in the wilderness; from Rithmah they came to Rimmon-parez, and from hence went to Libnah. Numb. xxxiii. 19. [the division of the pomegranate, or the divided pomegranate, or the division of height.]

RIMMON of Beroth; the father of Baanah and Rechab, the murderers of king Ishbosheth. 2 Sam. iv. 5, 9.

[RIMMONO, his pomegranate, or his height. A city of the priests in Zebulun, 1 Chron. vi. 62. Thought to be the same as Rimmon Methoar.]

RINGS. The antiquity of rings appears from Scripture and from profane authors. Judah left his ring with Tamar, Gen. xxxviii. 18. When Pharaoh committed the government of Egypt to Joseph, he gave him his ring from his finger, Gen. xli. 42. After the victory of the Israelites over the Midianites, they offered to the Lord the rings, the bracelets, and the golden necklaces, taken from the enemy, Numb. xxxi. 50. The Israelitish women wore rings, not only on their fingers, but also in their nostrils and their ears. St. James distinguishes a man of wealth and dignity by the ring of gold on his finger, James ii. 2. At the return of the prodigal son, his father orders a handsome apparel for his dress, and that a ring be put on his finger, Luke xv. 22. When the Lord threatened king Jeconiah with the utmost effects of his anger, he tells him, that though he were the signet or ring upon his finger, yet he should be torn off, Jer. xxii. 24. See FRAGS. No. CCLXVI.

The ring was used chiefly to seal with, and Scripture generally assigns it to princes and great persons; as the king of Egypt, Joseph, Ahaz, Jezebel; king Ahasuerus, his favourite Haman, Mordecai, king Darius, 1 Kings xxi. 8. Esther iii. 10, &c. Dan. vi. 17. The patents and orders of these princes were sealed with their rings or signets, an impression from which was their confirmation.

The ring was one mark of sovereign authority. Pharaoh gave his ring to Joseph, as a token of authority. When Alexander the Great gave his ring to Perdiccas, this was understood as nominating him his successor, Quint. Curt. l. x. c. 5. When Antiochus Epiphanes was at the point of death, he committed to Philip, one of his friends, his diadem, his royal cloak, and his ring, that he might give them to his successor young Antiochus, 1 Macc. vi. 15. Augustus being very sick of a distemper which he thought mortal, he gave his ring to Agrippa, as to a friend of the greatest integrity. Xiphilin. in Aug.

We read of magical rings, to which several extraordinary effects were ascribed, either as preservatives against certain evils, or for procuring certain advantages and good fortune.

The rings and pendants for the ears, so frequent in Palestine and Africa, were also probably superstitious rings, or talismans. When Jacob arrived at Canaan, on his return from Mesopotamia, he ordered his people to deliver to him, "all the strange gods which were in their hand, and all their ear-rings which were in their ears." Gen. xxxv. 4. This seems to insinuate, that those strange gods were superstitious and magical figures, engraven on their rings, their bracelets, and the pendants in their ears. Or, according to some commentators, that these rings and pendants were upon the hands, and in the ears of these false gods. St. Austin, Q. cxi. in Gen. inveighs very pathetically against these phylacteries of false gods, which his countrymen, the Africans, fastened to their ears, east, and to which they imputed a thousand supernatural and superstitious virtues; intending by this kind of ornament, not so much to adorn themselves, to please men, as to please and serve demons. Execranda superstitio ligaturarum, in quibus etiam in aures virorum in summis ex una parte auriculis suspensæ deputantur; non ad placendum hominibus, sed ad serviendum dæmonibus, adhibetur. Aug. Ep. ad Possidium. 73. Vide FRAGMENTS, and PLATE of SEALS.

RINNAH, רִנָּה, 'Pevà, song; from רָנָן ra-nan. Son of Shimon of Judah. 1 Chr. iv. 20.

RIPATH, רִפְתָּ, remedy, or medicine, or release, or pardon; from רָפָא, or רָפָה raphah: otherwise, stable; from רָפַת raphath. [Simon thinks the great breaking out, or terror of the enemy; from the Arabic. Diphath has the same import.]

RIPHATH, second son of Gomer, and grandson of Japhet, Gen. x. 3. called Diphath, 1 Chron. i. 6. The resemblance of ר Resh and ד Daleth is so close, that they are very often confounded. The learned are not agreed what country was peopled by the descendants of Riphath. The Chaldee and Arabic take it for France; Eusebius for the country of the Sauromata; the Chronicon Alexandrinum for that of the Garamantæ; Josephus for Paphlagonia. Mela, lib. i. assures us, that anciently the people of this province were called Riphatai, or Riphaces: and in Bithynia, bordering on Paphlagonia, is the river Rhebeus, a people called Rhebantes, and a district of the same name. Hence Bochart believed, that Riphath peopled Paphlagonia. Others think he peopled the Montes Riphei, and this opinion seems the most reasonable; because the other sons of Gomer peopled the northern countries towards Scythia, and beyond the Euxine sea.

RISSAH, רִסָּה, watering, distillation, or dew; from רָסַס rasas. An encampment of Israel in the wilderness. They came from Libnah to Rissah, and from Rissah they went to Kehelathah. Numb. xxxiii. 22.

[More probably rupture, or rather opening, i. e. on the shore, clear of rocks: which is the character of the place: now called El a Rissa. See the PLATE, TRAVELS OF ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS.]

RITHMAH, רִיתְמָה, juniper; from רִיתָם ro-them: otherwise, sound, noise, according to some. An encampment of Israel in the desert. From Hazeroth they arrived at Rithmah, whence they went to Rimmon-parez. This station must be in the wilderness of Paran, not far from Kadesh-barnea. Numb. xxxiii. 18. [See the PLATE, TRAVELS OF ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS.]

VOL. II. PART XXV. Edit. IV.

RIVER. The Hebrews give the name of the river, without addition, sometimes to the Nile, sometimes to the Euphrates, and sometimes to the Jordan. The tenor of the discourse must determine the sense of this uncertain and indeterminate way of speaking. They give also the name of river to brooks and rivulets that are not very considerable.

THE PRINCIPAL RIVERS OF PALESTINE, were

The JORDAN.

The ARNON,

The JABOK,

The KARITH,

The SOREK.

The BESOR.

The KISHON.

The BELUS.

The brook of JEZREEL, which falls into the Jordan, near Scythopolis.

The ELEUTHERUS.

The SABBATION.

The brook of Reeds, or of Kanah.

The BARRADY, otherwise, Abanah and Pharphar, rivers of Damascus.

See their proper articles.

The name of river is sometimes given to the sea; Jonah says, ii. 5. he was surrounded by the rivers, i. e. the waters of the sea [currents.] Habakkuk, iii. 8, 9. speaking of the passage through the Red Sea, says, the Lord divided the waters of the rivers. So the Psalmist, lxxiv. 15. the Lord dried up the rapid rivers, or the rivers of strength. And Psalm xxiv. 2. the Lord hath founded the earth upon the sea, and established it upon the rivers: which signifies the same in both places. Herodotus relates, that when king Xerxes cast bonds into the Hellespont, and ordered it to be whipped, he said to it: "It is with good reason that no body offers sacrifices to thee, O thou deceitful and turbulent river." Herodot. lib. vii. ὡς ἔοντι καὶ δολερῷ τε καὶ ἀλμυρῷ ποταμῷ. Vide SEA.

RIZPAH, רִצְפָּה, bed, or extension, or coal, [glowing coal] or fire-stone; from רָצַף ratzaph.

RIZPAH, daughter of Aiah, concubine to king Saul.

Soon after the death of Saul, Abner, the general of his army, fell in love with Rizpah, and took her. Ishbosheth, son of Saul, who reigned at Mahanaim beyond Jordan, and was supported in his regal state, only by the credit of Abner's valour, resented this; and upbraided him with it. Abner was so irritated at this reproach, that he vowed to ruin Ishbosheth, and league with David. 2 Sam. iii. 7, 11.

Saul having put to death a great number of the Gibeonites, on what occasion is not known;

God

God to punish this massacre, sent a famine into Israel, which lasted three years: 2 Sam. xxi. 1, 3, &c. from A. M. 2983, to 2986, ante A. D. 1011. Saul had been now dead 34 years, having been killed in 2949. To expiate this, David delivered to the Gibeonites Armoni and Mephibosheth, two sons of Saul by Rizpah, daughter of Aiah: also five sons of Michal, daughter of Saul, by Adriel, son of Barzillai; or rather by Phaltiel, vide 1 Sam. xxv. 44. These they hanged on the mountain near Gibeah, at the beginning of barley-harvest.

Rizpah, took a sackcloth and spread it upon the rock; and continued there from the beginning of harvest, till water from heaven fell on them; or till the Lord sent his rain on the earth, and restored its former fertility. She hindered the birds from tearing the bodies by day, and the ravenous beasts from devouring them by night. When this action of Rizpah was related to David, he was moved with compassion, and sent to fetch the bones of Saul and Jonathan, which were at Jabesh-gilead, brought them to Gibeah, and deposited them in the tomb of Kish, the father of Saul; together with the bones of the seven men who had been executed by the Gibeonites.

On this occasion the law of Deuteronomy xxi. 23. which orders that they should take the bodies down from the cross or gibbet, before the setting of the sun, was violated. But these unhappy remains of Saul's family, were left, probably, from the beginning of the spring to autumn: whether because the crime of their father deserved this severe treatment, or because the Gibeonites, being only proselytes of habitation, were not obliged to the observation of this law of Moses. Lastly, whereas God had ordered David to give satisfaction to the Gibeonites, this prince thought fit to leave the management of it to themselves.

[This statement may be doubted; it might not be long before the bodies were wetted by rain;—if the phrase “waters from heaven” may not signify copious and fertilizing dews.]

ROCK. Palestine being a mountainous country, had many rocks; which rocks were part of the strength of the country; for in times of danger the people retired to them, where they found refuge against sudden irruptions of their enemies. When the Benjaminites were overcome and almost exterminated by the other tribes, they secured themselves in the rock Rimmon, Judg. xx. 47. Samson kept garrison in the rock Etam, Judg. xv. 8. When David was persecuted by Saul, he often concealed himself in caverns, in rocks; Joshua shut up five kings of the Canaanites in the cave of Makkedah, Josh. x. 16, 17, &c. During the oppression of Israel by the Midianites, they were forced to hide themselves in cavities of the rocks, Judg. vi. 2. St. Jerom says, that the southern parts of Judah are full of caves under ground, and of caverns in the mountains, to which people retired in time of danger. The Kenites dwelt in the hollow places of the rocks, Numb. xxiv. 21. —Even at this day, the villages of this country are subterraneous, or in rocks. Bellon, Observat. lib. ii. cap. 61. Josephus in several places speaks of hollow rocks, where thieves and robbers had their haunts; and travellers find a great number of them in Palestine, and in the adjoining provinces. Comp. FRAGS. No. DLIX.

The name of rock is also given to God, metaphorically, because God is the strength, the refuge, and the asylum of Israel; as the rocks were, of those who resorted thither. This way of speaking is very common in the Hebrew.

The Hebrews also give in general the name of rock to sundry places of retreat and security.

Moses says, that the Lord had settled his people in a high country, “and made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock,” Deut. xxxii. 13. i. e. he brought them out of Egypt, a flat country, subject to inundations, and placed them in Palestine, a mountainous country, of great fertility, whose hills were loaded with vines and olive-trees; and the very rocks with swarms of bees, whose honey added not a little to the plenty of the land.

Rock is also used figuratively, for the patriarch of a nation, the first father, the original from whom the men of that nation proceeded. For example, Isaiah li. 1. “Look unto the rock whence ye are hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence ye are digged. Look unto Abraham your father, and unto Sarah that bare you.” And Moses, speaking to the Jews, says, Deut. xxxii. 18. “Of the rock that begot thee thou art unmindful;” i. e. of the quarry from whence thou wast taken.

Scripture mentions several rocks. As,

The rocks of Arnon: Numb. xxi. 14, 15. probably these were rocks on the banks of the river or brook Arnon, especially at the place where Israel passed over it. They used to say, as it were, proverbially, that the Lord had broke down or made plain the rocks of Arnon, to make a passage for his people. Scopuli torrentium inclinati sunt.

The rocks Bozez and Senah, 1 Sam. xiv. 4. between Michmash and Gibeah.

Sela-hammah-lekoth, or the rock of divisions. 1 Sam. xxiii. 2. in the desert of Maon, was so named, because Saul was here obliged to quit his his pursuit after David, to return to the assistance of his country, then invaded by the Philistines.

The rock of Horeb. There are three rocks denoted by this name in Scripture.

1. That from which Moses caused the waters to gush out, to supply the people, at Rephidim. Exod. xvii. 6.

2. That on the top of mount Horeb, where God manifested a part of his glory to Moses, and afterwards to Elijah. Exod. xxxiii. 21, 22, 23. xxxiv. 6, 7. 1 Kings xix. 10, &c.

3. Oreb, where the prince of the Midianites was put to death. Judg. vii. 25. Isai. x. 26. But this is rather written Oreb, whereas the other two are written Horeb.

The rock Adullam, in the neighbourhood of the city Adullam, in Judah.

The rock Etam; Judg. xv. 8, 11, 13. probably near the city of this name. In the Greek, Josh. xv. 60. 1 Chron. iv. 32. 2 Chron. xi. 6. In Judah, south of Jerusalem. See ETAM.

The rock Jektiel. This, according to several interpreters, is Petra, the capital of Arabia Petrea. See PETRA, and FRAGMENTS. No. DLXII.

The rock, or stone, of Zohemoth, 1 Kings i. 9. See ZOHELETH.

The rock of the waters of Meribah, or strife. Here the faith of Moses failed; and Scripture reproaches him with having hesitated in his heart, and not honouring God as he ought to have done, before Israel. Numb. xx. 10, 11. It was named the rock of strife; and the waters, the waters of strife, because of the murmurings of the children of Israel, and their sedition against Moses. For other rocks see their articles; or that of cities adjacent to them.

ROD, Virga. This word is used variously,

(1) For the branches of a tree: Gen. xxx. 37. "And Jacob took him rods of green poplar, and of the hasel and chesnut-tree.

2. For a staff or wand: Exod. iv. 17, 20. "And thou shalt take this rod in thine hand, wherewith thou shalt do signs. And Moses took the rod of God in his hand."

3. For a shepherd's crook; Levit. xxvii. 32. "And concerning the tythe of the herd, or of the flock, even of whatsoever passeth under the rod; the tenth shall be holy unto the Lord."

4. For a rod, properly so called, which God uses to correct men. 2 Sam. vii. 14. "If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men." Job. ix. 34. "Let him take his rod away from me."

5. For a royal sceptre: Esth. iv. 11. Psalm xlv. 6. Heb. i. 8. The empire of the Messiah is represented by a rod of iron, to express its power and might. "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron." Psalm. ii. 9. Rev. ii. 27. xii. 5. xix. 15.

6. For a young sprout, or branch, to distinguish the miraculous birth of the Messiah, from a virgin mother. Numb. xxiv. 17. "There shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre (or rod) shall rise out of Israel." And Isaiah says, xi. "There shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots." In Jeremiah, the watchful rod (Virgam vigilantem ego video. Jer. i. 11. Vulgat.) according to the Hebrew, is a branch, or rod, of an almond-tree. This tree flourishes the earliest of any; and the Lord intended to denote by it Nebuchadnezzar, who was just then ready to pour his forces upon Judea. Vide ALMOND.

7. Rods sometimes signifies a tribe, or people; Psalm lxxiv. 2. "Remember thy congregation which thou hast purchased of old, the rod of thine inheritance which thou hast redeemed." Jer. x. 16. "Israel is the rod of his inheritance."

The rod of Moses was the staff used by that prophet generally for driving his flock: this God commanded him to take with him, for working miracles before Pharaoh, Exod. iv.—This rod Moses kept while he lived, and it became the instrument of performing many miracles. Scripture does not inform us what became of it after his death; probably it devolved to Joshua, his successor. The Mussulmen say it was laid up in the ark of the covenant; but they confound this rod with that of Aaron.

The rabbins relate many wonderful things of this famous rod. As that—it was first created by God for the use of Adam; that—it came by succession to Abraham, then to Joseph, who left it to the kings of Egypt, as a pledge of his acknowledgment. Jethro coming into Egypt, stole it from thence, and carried it into his own country. He there planted it, in a garden, where it took such root, that no one could pluck it up. Jethro, who knew the virtue of it, promised his daughter in marriage to whosoever could pull it up. Many young men offered themselves, and attempted the task; but no one could accomplish it, till Moses undertook it, and plucked up the rod without difficulty: Zipporah was his reward. The name of God was written on this rod, and this communicated all its virtue and merit. [I suspect, the rabbins mean by this mystical descent, the true religion; or perhaps the power of government; vide the description which Achilles gives of the descent of his sceptre in Homer, Iliad. i. If they mean the true religion, they do great honour to Jethro; which N. B. See JETHRO.]

The rod of Aaron; the staff that high-priest commonly used. In the conspiracy of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, against Moses and Aaron, God directed Moses to receive a rod from each of the heads of the twelve tribes, and to add that of Aaron to the number, that the Lord might shew by a miracle which tribe he chose, to exercise the priest's office. They wrote on each of these rods the name of its tribe; and put them in the tabernacle of the congregation; the day following, they observed, that in the interval the rod of Aaron had put forth buds and blossoms, and that the blossoms were those of the almond-tree. Numb. xvii.

There was no room for any suspicion, that the rods had been changed. Every one had wrote his name on his own, and that of Aaron was very well known; and no human industry could produce so great a wonder. Thus the priesthood was confirmed to Aaron and his posterity. To preserve the memory of this miraculous event, God commanded Moses to lay up this rod in the tabernacle of the congregation. Some think it preserved its leaves and fruit so long as it continued in this holy place. And indeed it was necessary, that it should preserve some marks of the miracle, for the conviction of posterity.

It is inquired, whether this rod were put within the ark of the covenant, or only by the side of it. God commands Moses only to put it in the tabernacle, to be preserved there. Numb. xvii. 20. But St. Paul says, Heb. ix. 4. it was in the ark, with the urn of manna, and the law. Others affirm, it was not put in, but only at the side of, the ark. They allege that 1 Kings viii. 9. intimates, that there was nothing in the ark, but the tables of the law; others contend, that this passage of St. Paul should be understood literally; that there could be no hindrance to the putting of Aaron's rod into the ark, since the ark was five feet long. This rod was sanctified by the miracle; and when Scripture says that there was nothing in the ark, but the tables of the law, it may be understood that nothing else was originally there, the ark being only intended for this use. But this need not hinder its containing, afterwards, some other things.

Artapanus in Eusebius, lib. ix. reports, that the rod of Moses, which Aaron used in performing so many prodigies, before Pharaoh, became in after ages an object of idolatrous worship to the Egyptians; who kept it in a temple of Isis.

Some learned men have thought, that the Thyrsus, carried by Bacchus, and the Bacchanals, (which was a rod encircled with vine-branches) was an imitation of Aaron's rod that flourished. Gerard Voss. de Idolat. cap. 16. p. 86. Bochart, Phaleg. lib. i. P. 2. cap. 12. p. 431. Euripides relates, that one of the priestesses of Bacchus struck one of the rocks of Mount Cytheron with her Thyrsus, and that a spring of water immediately gushed out; another imitation, say they, of the miracle at Horeb.

[ROLL. Vide BOOKS, also REGISTER, and FRAGMENTS, No. LXXIII. "ON ANCIENT BOOKS." Roll is taken for RECORD, Ezra vi. 2. "Search was made in the house of the Rolls"—(so we have among ourselves the Office of the Rolls): and a roll was found, containing Cyrus's decree in favour of the Jews. Ezekiel was commanded to eat a roll, or small volume of a book; to signify the information about to be communicated to his mind:—but, it must be owned, that foreknowledge in general, is like the roll of this prophet in the foregoing chapter, "written within and without: full of lamentation, and mourning, and woe"—which makes the author of the Revelations say, the book which he ate, was in his mouth sweet as honey, i. e. in its first taste, or knowledge communicated; but, in his belly, it was bitter as gall, i. e. in digestion and rumination, foreknowledge is little but anticipation of evils.

The prophet Zechariah chap. v. 1. saw a flying roll, in length twenty cubits, or thirty feet, in breadth ten cubits, or fifteen feet; it appears also to have been written on both sides: "for every one that stealeth shall be cut off according to the curse,—or penalty of the law,—written on that side." ROMAMTI-EZER, רוממטי עזר, elevation of help; from רמם ramam, to lift up, and עזר ezar, zer, help. [Education to a period at which the subject of it may contribute help; brought up to help. Son of Heman, 1 Chron. xxv. 4, 31.]

ROMANS, Heb. כְּרִיתִים, Khrîtoî, that break or bruise; from כָּתַת cathath, to bruise: or, breaking of the sea; from cathath, to break, and יָם jam, the sea: otherwise, of the finest gold, or diadem, or staining; from כֶּתֶם cethem. The Latin word Romani signifies strong, powerful, the Greek Ῥωμαῖοι, strength.

ROMANS. Jerom seems to have thought, that Chittim was put for Italy, Numb. xxiv. 24. Balaam says, "And ships shall come from the coasts of Chittim, and shall afflict Ashur, and Eber." Jerom translates, "ships shall come from Italy." But this ought rather to be referred to the Greeks, who under Alexander the Great, invaded the Hebrews, at that time under the Persians. The Greeks overthrew the Persian empire, but were themselves overthrown by the Romans. Jerom says, on Ezek. xxvii. 6. that the workmen of Tyre used what came from the isles of Italy, to make lodgings (or cabins) for the captains of Tyrian ships. Prætoriola de insulis Italiæ. (Vulgate.) But what rarities could there be in these islands of Italy, that were not in Phœnicia and the neighbouring provinces?—Vide IVORY, CHITTIM, and FRAGMENTS, No. CCXVII.

Jerom also translates the Hebrew Tubal by Italy, Isaiah lxvi. 19. which according to some signifies Spain, according to others, the Tibarenians. See TUBAL.

He has also rendered the Hebrew Chittim by Romans, and elsewhere, by Italy; which, as far as we can judge, signifies Macedonia. See Gen. x. 4. and the commentators on Dan. xi. 30. True it is, in this place the prophet speaks of the Romans; but it is because the Romans he alludes to sailed from Delos in a Macedonian fleet, which they found in the harbour of Delos. Vide Livy, lib. xlv. Bochart, Phæleg. lib. iii. cap. 5. has displayed all his learning to support the opinion of the Rabbins, who by Chittim understand Rome and Italy. He shews, that in this country are found cities named Cethim and Echetia, also a river called Cethus; but he also brings very good proofs that Chittim imports Macedonia. See CHITTIM.

The Jews generally call the Romans, Idumeans; and the Roman empire, the cruel empire of Edom. It is difficult to guess their reason, since Italy and Rome are far from Idumea, and have never had any affinity with the Idumeans. When the more learned Rabbins are asked—wherefore? they maintain with great assurance and obstinacy, that the Idumeans embraced Christianity, settled themselves in Italy, and there extended their dominions.

Abravanel, who passes among them for a man of sense, pretends that the Romans, and all Christians, may be called Idumeans, in the same sense as Isaiah called wicked Jews by the name of Sodom and Gomorrah, because they too closely resembled them. As Esau brought many strangers into the race of Jacob; so in the Roman empire, and in the Christian church, are found a medley of all nations, that provokes God. Esau hated Jacob, and endeavoured to rob him of his birth-right and other privileges; Christians do the same thing, say they, by the people of Israel, &c. Vide ESAU, EDM.

Josephus ben Gorion, relates this affair in a more historical, or rather more fabulous manner. Tsepho grandson of Esau, being imprisoned by Joseph in Egypt, escaped to Æneas, then king of Carthage, who made him commander of his forces. Æneas went from Africa into Italy, where he twice defeated Turnus king of Beneventum, and took Lavinia for his wife.

The Africans under the command of Tsepho, often made incursions into Italy, and committed great havoc. In one of these expeditions, losing a young heifer, he found it again in a cave, where it was devoured by a monstrous beast, half a goat and half a man, which he killed. The inhabitants being delivered from this monster, honoured Tsepho as a hero, with offerings and libations. They called him Janus, which was the name of the monster slain by him, and also Saturn, the name of a star that was then worshipped. Such therefore was Tsepho, grandson of Esau.

Latinus succeeded him, then Æneas the Trojan; and long after, Romulus, the founder of Rome. At this time David made war with the Idumeans; then Adarezer, and his grandson Zir, officers of king David, revolted from him, and fled into Italy, where they built old Alba. Here they reigned, and their posterity, down to the times of Josephus ben Gorion, the contriver of all these whimsies. Thus he shews, how the Idumeans by means of Tsepho, and the Jews by means of Adarezer, and Zir, settled in Italy. I pass over many circumstances, that I may not trespass too much on the patience of the reader. It is not amiss, now and then to shew something of the genius of the Jews, by the traditions and histories of their invention. See Basnage, Hist. Jews, tom. 1. lib. ii. cap. 5.

But this tradition is not peculiar to the Jews; it has passed from them to the Arabians, and we read in almost all the Mussulman authors, says D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 80 that Esau had a son called Roum, from whom descended the Grecian and Roman emperors. Lastly, a tradition is common to almost all the nations of the Levant, who have any knowledge of the sacred writings; that in the time of Abdon, judge of the Hebrews, a colony of Idumeans passed into Italy, and settled there. That Latinus reigned among them, and that Romulus, the founder of Rome derived his origin from them. There is great probability, that these fables were first invented with design to give a pretence to the Jews, among themselves, to apply to the Christians all those curses which they find in their holy writings against Edom, and the Idumeans. And when these stories once got footing, they became the common belief of the Jews, and Orientals.

The Roman empire is denoted Dan. ii. 40. by the kingdom of iron, which bruises and breaks in pieces all other kingdoms: this is the explication of almost all interpreters. But we think it is rather the empire of the Lagidæ in Egypt, and of the Seleucidæ in Syria.

In the books of the Old Testament written in Hebrew, I find no mention of Rome, Romans, or Italy. But in the Maccabees, and in the New Testament, they are often mentioned. 1 Macc. viii. 1, 2. "Judas had heard of the fame of the Romans, that they were mighty and valiant men, and such as would lovingly accept all that joined themselves unto them, and make a league of amity with all that came unto them. And that they were men of great valour. It was told him also of their wars and noble acts, which they had done among the Galatians, and how they had conquered them, and brought them under tribute." Judas had also been informed of their conquests in Spain, &c. that they had subdued Philip and Perseus, kings of Macedonia, or Chittim, and Antiochus the Great, king of Syria; that they had deprived him of various provinces; and had also reduced the Greeks, who attempted to resist them; in a word, that they confirmed in their kingdoms all whom they desired should reign, or deprived those of their crowns whom they intended to punish.—Nevertheless, that none of them wore the diadem or the purple, but that they had a senate, consisting of three hundred and twenty senators, who consulted every day about the affairs of the republic; that they committed every year the sovereign magistracy to one person, who commanded through all their territories, and thus all were obedient to one, without envy or jealousy.

The first alliance of the Jews was made with the Romans, A. M. 3842, ante A. D. 162.—Some years after this, A. M. 3860, ante A. D. 144, Jonathan, brother of Judas Maccabeus, finding the opportunity favourable, sent a deputation to Rome, to renew this alliance. Lastly, Simon Maccabeus, also, sent to Rome, an ambassador called Numenius, with a present of a great golden buckler. 1 Macc. xiv. 24, ante A. D. 149.

Before this, A. M. 3841, ante A. D. 163, 2 Macc. xi. 34, 35, 36. Quintus Memmius and Titus Manilius, the Roman legates, being sent into Syria to settle some affairs with king Antiochus Eupator, interested themselves in promoting the tranquillity of the Jews.

The Romans took the city of Jerusalem three times: first by the arms of Pompey, A. M. 3941, ante A. D. 63. Secondly, by Sosius, A. M. 3967, ante A. D. 37. The third and last time was under Titus, A. M. 4070, A. D. 70; when both the city and the temple were destroyed. They reduced Judea into a province; that is, they took from it the privilege of being a kingdom, and of having kingly government.—First, after the banishment of king Archelaus, son of Herod the Great, A. D. 16. and this continued to A. D. 37. It was again reduced to a province after the death of king Agrippa, A. D. 43; and it remained in this condition till it was entirely overthrown.

ROMAN GOVERNORS of Judea. See GOVERNORS.

EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS. This is placed before the other Epistles of St. Paul, not because it was first composed in order of time, but, because of the dignity of the imperial city, to which it is directed, or of the excellence of its contents; or, of the magnificence and sublimity of the mysteries, of which it treats. It passes for the most exalted, and the most difficult of all St. Paul's epistles. Jerom, Epist. 151, cap. 8. was of opinion, that not one book only, but many volumes were necessary, for a full explanation of it. And some have thought, that St. Peter had chiefly this Epistle in his eye, when he said, 2 Pet. iii. 15, 16, "As our beloved brother Paul also, according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you. As also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things; in which are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable, wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction." But others with good reason think, St. Peter rather refers to St. Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews. [Or, perhaps, to what were earlier written, and to countries nearer to those addressed by Peter.—The dates of the Epistles must be considered in this reference.]

St. Paul's design, in his Epistle to the Romans, is to terminate certain domestic disputes, which which then prevailed among the believers at Rome, and divided the converted Jews and Gentiles. The Jews insisted on their birth-right, and the promises made to their fathers; on account of which they assumed a certain priority or preference over the converted Gentiles, whom they regarded as foreigners and interlopers, out of pure favour admitted into the society of the faithful; and to the participation of Christian privileges. The Gentiles on the other hand, maintained the merit of their sages and philosophers, the prudence of their legislators, the purity of their morality, their exactness in following the law of nature. They accused the Jews of infidelity toward God, and violation of his laws. They aggravated their faults, and those of their fathers, which had excluded the greater part of them from the inheritance of the saints, from the faith, &c. as witnessed by their own scriptures, &c.

To end these contentions, St. Paul applies himself to restrain the presumption of both parties. He shews that neither could pretend to merit or had reason to glory, or boast of their vocation; which proceeded from the mere grace and mercy of God. He proves, that even if the Jews had observed the law of Moses, and the Gentiles the law of nature, this could not have merited for either the grace of their vocation, nor justification. That nothing but faith in Jesus Christ, enlivened by charity, and good works, can justify us. He answers objections, by arguments taken from these principles.—E. gr. the gratuitous vocation, or, the non-vocation, of Jew and Gentile; the insufficiency of the works of the law, without faith; the superiority of the Jews above the Gentiles; the infallibility of the promises of God. This introduces a discussion of predestination and reprobation, which makes a principal part of this epistle, and contains some of the greatest difficulties in it.

In chapters xii. xiii. xiv. xv. he gives excellent rules of morality, concerning mutual harmony; mutual forbearance; and reciprocal condescension to infirmities, for fear of scandalizing or offending one another, by indiscreet liberties. He describes the false apostles, and exhorts the faithful to avoid them. Chap. xvi. contains civilities and commendations, addressed to particular persons.

This was writ A. D. 58, in Corinth, whence St. Paul was immediately to depart, to carry to Jerusalem some collections made for the saints. Phœbe, a deaconess of the church of Cenchrea, near Corinth, was bearer of it. No doubt has ever been made of its being authentic; and though it was addressed to the Romans, yet it was written in Greek. Tertius was St. Paul's secretary on this occasion.

The Marcionites made great defalcations in the epistles of St. Paul, especially in this to the Romans, of which they suppressed the last two chapters. There is much probability that St. Paul designed to finish this epistle at the end of the fourteenth chapter; but afterwards, added the concluding chapters. At the end of the fifteenth chapter, we find this conclusion. "Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen;" which seems to shew that the letter was then finished. We see the same conclusion no less than three times in the sixteenth chapter, verses 20, 24, 27. which leads us to imagine that these additions were composed at intervals. [Probably, while waiting for an opportunity of sending it off; whether by Phœbe, or by any other safe hand.]

ROME, 'Ρωμη, strength, power; from ῥώμη. [Well-faring, or powerful: otherwise, robust.]

ROME. The city of Rome was founded by Remus and Romulus, according to Usher, A. M. 3966 of the Julian period, A. M. 3256, ante A. D. 748, towards the close of the reign of Hezekiah, king of Judah. This city is so well known, that it is needless to give any account of it here. The Old Testament has not mentioned it, that we know of; but it is prominent in the Books of the Maccabees, and in the New Testament. St. Peter, 1 Epist. v. 13. has denoted it by the figurative name of Babylon.—"The church that is at Babylon, elected together with you, saluteth you." St. John, Revelations, xiv. 8. xvi. 19. xvii. 5. xviii. 2, 10, 21. describes it by the same name, and in such a manner, as only agrees to Rome; 1. by its command over all nations; 2. by its cruelty towards the saints; and 3. by its situation upon seven hills. Rev. xvii. 9.

Some have denied, that St. Peter ever was at Rome. They pretend that Babylon, mentioned by him, is the Babylon of Chaldea, or that of Egypt. They reject as fables, the voyages of St. Peter to Rome, his opposition to Simon Magus, and his martyrdom in this city. But all antiquity attests this fact; monuments, tombs, statues, paintings, public places, witness the imprisonment and martyrdom of St. Peter at Rome. [It has been shewn that Chaldean Babylon was no longer a city, at the date of St. Peter's Epistle. Comp. BABYLON III.]

St. Paul came twice to Rome. First, A. D. 61, when he appealed to Cæsar. Secondly, A. D. 65, a year before his martyrdom, which happened in A. D. 66.

St. Peter was also at Rome more than once. It

It has been thought he went thither A. D. 42; he might return thither about A. D. 45, 58, and 65. [He was in ~~the~~ ~~city~~ ~~of~~ ~~Rome~~ ~~at~~ ~~that~~ ~~time~~ ~~there~~ ~~about~~ ~~A. D. 66.~~ [He was in Rome on the same day with St. Paul; it might be on the same day of the year, without being in the same year.]

St. John the Evangelist was banished from Ephesus, and sent to Rome, during the persecution of Domitian, A. D. 95. He was there plunged into boiling oil, without receiving any hurt, but on the contrary, came out more hale and vigorous than before. Tertull. lib. de præscript. cap. 36. Jerom, in Jovin. lib. 1. cap. 14.

[ROMAN is used, 1. as denoting a person native or inhabitant of the city of Rome; or, at least, of the country around that metropolis; as in the Epistle to the Romans.

2. For the power of the Roman government: John xi. 48. "The Romans shall come and take away both our place and nation." Acts xxv. 16. "It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die, till we have heard his defence." Vide chap. xxviii. 17, &c.

3. For a person who possessed the privileges attached to the citizenship of Rome: Acts xxii. 25. "Is it lawful for you to scourge a man who is a Roman, he being as yet uncondemned?" St. Paul who pleads this privilege, was not actually a Roman, by having been born at Rome, or in Italy. Some think, that being born in a city favoured with the communication of the privileges of the imperial city, he was competent to claim Roman exemptions by his birth-right; being native of a municipium—a city thus favoured, and born of parents thus entitled.—Others think, that St. Paul's father had been rewarded with this privilege, for services rendered to the Romans; whether of a military or other nature; which would render it so much the more disgraceful, to degrade by the treatment of a slave, a man entitled to especial marks of honour. And this might be the fact, as such a reward was received by many Jews, about this time.

The Valerian law forbade that a Roman citizen should be bound: the Sempronian law forbade that he should be scourged, or beat with rods.—If any man falsely claimed the privileges of a Roman citizen, he was severely punished.—By the emperor Claudius with death. Suet. Claud. cap. 25.

[ROOF. See FRAGMENTS, No. CCIV. "ON EASTERN HOUSES." The roof of a house was ordered to be made flat, and to be well secured all around its edge, that no person might fall from it, "to bring blood upon that house," Deut. xxii. 8. The roof was the place for walking on, Josh. ii. 6. Judg. xvi. 27. Idolaters burned incense on the roofs of their houses, Jer. xix. 13. In fine weather the roof of the house was shut upon. It is used for the whole habitation—residence, Gen. xix. 8. "do no injury to these men, for therefore came they under the shadow of my roof"—under my protection; under my hospitality: under the security of my residence. Vide Matt. viii. 8. The same allusion is preserved among the ancient Britons, to this day; it is a common compliment for a guest to drink "success to the roof-tree" of his host.]

ROOT. Covetousness is the root of all the evils, and of sins; 1 Tim. vi. 10. The root, i. e. the origin, the cause, the occasion. Lest any root of bitterness trouble you, Heb. xii. 15. guard against pestilential men, who draw down the effects of God's anger. Deut. xxxix. 18. Roots of gall and bitterness. Job. xix. 28. Radicem verbi inveniamus contra eum. Let us seek against him occasions of discourse and reproof; or let us find opportunities to accuse him. The Hebrew says, [and Eng. trans.] the root of the word is in me. I am always in a condition of defending myself sufficiently. [Rather, my integrity, the principle of rectitude, grace, &c.] Deus evellet radicem tuam de terra viventium. God will pluck up thy root out of the land of the living. He will snatch you out of the world, and destroy you and yours.

The root may also denote the race, the posterity, Prov. xii. 3. The root of the just shall not be disturbed, shall not fail. And Jeremiah, xii. 2. Whence do the wicked prosper in all things? Thou hast planted them, and they have taken root. In Daniel, and in the Maccabees, Antiochus Epiphanes, the persecutor of the Jews, is represented as a young sprout or sucker, or root of iniquity, proceeding from the kings, the successors of Alexander the Great. And Jesus Christ, in his humiliation, is described as a root ill-nourished, growing in a dry and barren soil, Isaiah liii. 2. Chap. xi. 1, 10, he is called the root of Jesse. Vide Rom. xv. 2.

In a contrary sense, St. Paul says, Rom. xi. 16, 17, 18. that the Jews are, as it were the root that bears the tree, into which the Gentiles are grafted. And that the patriarchs are the pure and holy root of which the Jews are, as it were, the branches. And that Jesus Christ is the root, on which Christians depend, and from which they derive life, and subsistence. Col. ii. 7.

ROSH, ~~rosh~~, the head, or the top, or the beginning; from ~~rosh~~ rosh, the head. [so the name Cephalus, among the ancients; and the name Head, among ourselves.]

ROSH,

ROSH, Ros, son of Benjamin, Gen. xli. 21.

ROSH. The Hebrew, Ezekiel xxxviii. 2, 3. has a people called Rosh, which is not in the Vulgate. Jerom has taken it in an appellative sense, as head, or prince. [The English version takes it in the same sense.] Principem capitis Mosoch et Thubal. Whereas the Hebrew reads, וְשֵׂא רֹאשׁ מִשָּׁךְ חִטְבָּל, principem Rosh, Mesech et Thubal. In Gen. x. 2. חִטְבָּל וְשֵׂא מִשָּׁךְ, where mention is made of Tubal and Meshech, we find also Tiras, which has some relation to Rosh.—The LXX. have followed the Hebrew in Ezekiel, and the best interpreters make no question, but that Rosh is the name of a people. But they are not agreed about the country they inhabited, nor their present appellation.

The Orientals hold, says D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 722, that Japheth had a son called Rous, not mentioned by Moses, who peopled Russia, i. e. Muscovy. They add, that Rous was of a very uneasy and turbulent disposition. He possessed the country beyond the Esel, or the Volga, and often made inroads into the territories of his brother Khozar, who, to live in peace with him, was forced to cede all the islands of this great river, which falls into the Caspian Sea. In all these islands Rous caused to be sown Turkey wheat, which the Turks to this day, in their own tongue, call wheat of Rous, or of Bulgaria. He enacted very unjust laws, to which he forced all his subjects to submit.—Among others, one excluded male heirs from succeeding to their father's estates, and made them devolve entirely to females. He likewise introduced the custom, of putting a sword into the hands of boys, as soon as they were able to manage it, with these words, "This is your inheritance."

The same authors relate, that Japheth had a son called Seclab, who chiefly turned his mind to building of houses and cities, because of the number of his children. When these had increased to a great multitude, they desired lands for cultivation, of their brethren the children of Rous, but met with a positive refusal. They afterwards solicited the descendants of Khozar and Gomari, their brethren also, but with no better success; so that they thought force was their only means to acquire possession: but then all their neighbours confederated against them, so that they were obliged to relinquish their enterprize, and to retire to a very cold country, beyond the seventh climate. Mirkond says, that the Seclabs inhabit the country of the Hyperboreans to this day, where they are forced to live under ground during the winter season. M. D'Herbelot thinks, that these are the Samoiedes, or the Laplanders.

VOL. II. PART XXV. Edit. IV.

The same Mirkond says, that Seclab had a son, whose mother died at his birth; so that they were obliged to feed him with the milk of a hare: for this reason, when the child grew up, he could leap and run with incredible nimbleness and swiftness, which qualities continued hereditary in the family. The name of Seclab has so much relation to that of Slaves, or Sclavonians, and to what M. D'Herbelot says elsewhere of the Slaves, that I am much inclined to think it is of these Mirkond speaks. See Bibl. Orient. p. 470.

To return: we question not but Rosh, or Ros, signifies Russia, or the people that dwell on the Araxes, called Rosch by the inhabitants; which is the ancient habitation of the Scythians.

[It deserves notice, that the LXX. render the passage in Ezekiel—Γῶγ, ἀρχὸντα Ρῶς, Μεσὸκ, καὶ Θοβελ, Gog, the chief of Ros, Mesoch, and Thobel; and Jerom, not absolutely to reject this name, inserts both renderings: Gog, terram Magog, principem capitis (sive Ros) Mosoch, et Thubal. Symmachus and Theodotion also perceived Ros to be in this place, the name of a people: and this is now the prevailing judgment of interpreters.

Bochart, about A. D. 1640, contended that Russia was the nation meant by the term Ros: and this opinion is supported by the testimony of various Greek writers, who describe "the Ros as a Scythian nation, bordering on the northern Taurus."

Mosok, or Mesech, appears to be the same as the Moskwa or Moscow, of the moderns; and we know, that not only is this the name of the city, but also of the river on which it stands.

Russia, as a political power, has within these few years come so very forward among the nations of Europe, that we ought somewhat to suspect our application to that empire of whatever has the appearance of novelty. We therefore refer with the greater satisfaction to the sentiments of writers who lived before the present system of European sovereignties could be imagined. The late invasion of Russia (1812) by the most astonishing military power, assembled under Buonaparte, emperor of the French, (estimated at not less than 600,000 men) with the total destruction of that immense force, by the severity of the season, certainly marked an interposition of Providence, and became introductory to the emancipation of Europe from the tyranny of France: it issued also in the dethronement of Napoleon. This has led some persons to conclude that these events were the primary objects of the prophecy of Ezekiel, xxxviii. xxxix. That many of the features of the narratives, prophetic and historical, are remarkably similar, similar, is acknowledged; but, in what sense the countries of Russia and Moskwa, could be described as the mountains of Israel, verse 8. or, how the Russians, should be "my people Israel," verse 14. demands more determinate elucidation than it has as yet received.

There are other particulars also, which seem to point at other instruments, for the fulfilment of this prophecy; and certain it is, that the countries which principally suppose themselves to be threatened by Gog and Magog, have abated nothing of their apprehensions in consequence of the events alluded to. We live in revolutionary times; in times, perhaps pregnant with great events—which very consideration, had we no other, should make us cautious of applying to what interests us, incidents intended on a larger scale to interest all mankind.]

RUE, Rutha; a well-known garden herb. Jesus Christ reproaches the Pharisees with their superstitious affectation of paying the tythe of rue, which was not in reality subject to the law of tythe. He did not blame, however, this scrupulous exactness, but their neglect of the more essential parts of the law. Luke xi. 42.

Josephus, de Bello, lib. vii. relates, there was in the castle of Macherus, beyond Jordan, a plant of rue of such extraordinary magnitude, that no fig-tree was equal to it, either in height or extent. It was said to have been in that place ever since the time of Herod the Great; i. e. at least seventy-three years before the end of the Jewish war, when it perished.

RUFUS, son of Simon the Cyrenean, which Simon assisted our Saviour in carrying his cross, Mark xv. 21. Rufus probably was famous among the first Christians, since Mark names him with distinction. Is this the Rufus whom St. Paul salutes, with his mother? Rom. xvi. 13. Polycarp in his letter to the Philippians, written A. D. 107, proposes Ignatius and Rufus, as models and patterns of patience. Usuard, Ado, and other ancient martyrologists, place Rufus the martyr, December 18, and insinuate, that he was son of Simon the Cyrenean; since they say he was one of the ancient disciples, by whom the first churches were founded. The Chronicon of Lucius Dexter, a work of no credit, speaks of Rufus, bishop of Tortosa, in Catalonia, honoured November 11, and of Alexander, his brother, martyred at Carthage, March 11.

II. RUFUS, Rom. xvi. 13. is, perhaps, the Rufus, son of Simon, the Cyrenean. The ancient martyrologies of Bede, Usuard, Ado, and the Roman, place his festival November 21. The false Dorotheus makes him bishop of Thebes. We have seen, in the foregoing article, what the Spaniards say of him.

[There is more attached to the character of this Rufus, than appears at first sight; inasmuch as St. Paul calls the mother of Rufus—"his mother." Now, she could not be the natural mother of St. Paul, unless Paul and Rufus were brothers; nor could she be the mother-in-law of Paul by natural relation to his wife, unless Rufus were brother-in-law to Paul: but, of such connexion we have no account, nor even surmise. It should seem to follow, that the term mother, in this place, imports that a great degree of intimacy had existed between Paul and the mother of Rufus; and that she had favoured him with those attentions and services, truly maternal, which a mother might have done; and therefore the Apostle salutes her son Rufus; and herself under this affectionate recollection.

This leads again to an enquiry where this intimacy could have taken place? To answer which, we must recollect, that, if Rufus were son of Simon the Cyrenean, and if Simeon the teacher at Antioch were that Simon, then, as we know that Paul was long at Antioch, where the wife of Simeon was, with her husband, we see time, place, and occasion, of the services rendered by the mother of Rufus to Paul; and of the mutual kindness and intimacy between them. We know that Simon must have been at Antioch, an old man; the oldest of all the teachers settled there; for which reason he is placed first on the list: doubtless, his wife also was well stricken in years; and, very probably, her son Rufus and Paul were about the same age; so that, relatively, they might both by familiarity be called by her, her sons; and both might pay her that respect which in one was duty, and in the other was deference and regard.

As to the residence of this pious woman at Rome, with her son Rufus, we may well suppose that her husband Simon was dead, at Antioch; and that she accompanied her son to the capital of the empire, where many Jews had settled. In what capacity Rufus was, at Rome, we have no means of determining. If he were a Christian teacher, as his father was, it should appear that he visited Philippi in his journeyings, where he suffered many adversities; for Polycarp speaks of—"Patience, which ye have seen set forth before your eyes, in the blessed Ignatius, and Zozimus and Rufus, and in Paul himself."—This association of persons contributes to confirm to Rufus the character of teacher; and to mark him as the same Rufus, elect in the Lord, with whom Paul was familiar;—his brother, not only by profession and grace, but also by intimacy, and perhaps, by constant residence in the same family. See MOTHER, SON, &c.]

III. RUFUS

III. RUFUS (Annius) governor of Judea, about A. D. 13, succeeded Ambivius, and was succeeded by Valerius Gratus, A. D. 15 or 16.

IV. RUFUS (Terentius) or, as the Jews call him, Turnus Rufus; was left by Titus at Jerusalem with the tenth legion, after the destruction of that city. Joseph. de Bello, lib. vii. cap. 17. A. D. 70. The Jews assure us, that Rufus caused the plough to go over it. He sent prisoner to Titus a chief Jew called Simon Gioras, who had hid himself in one of the common sewers of the temple. [N. B. It is thought Rufus passed the plough-share rather over the area of the temple, than over the city, at least, generally speaking. Comp. PLATES, MEDALS of JERUSALEM, No. 1. also FRAGMENTS, No. DLXXIII. &c.]

[RULE, and RULERS. These words are applied to different stations of authority. God ruleth over all, and the proud Nebuchadnezzar is degraded from his throne till he acknowledges this truth, Dan. iv. 26. The Messiah rules among the sons of men, and even rules, in power, over his enemies, Psalm cx. 2. but in goodness over his people. Adam ruled over the creatures, in paradise, as their superior: over his wife, after the fall, as the guardian sex, and the regulator of propriety, and restraint. He reigned also over his posterity, as their king and judge, governing their social conduct as their common father.

Husbands rule their wives; and their own families. Pastors rule the churches, which they teach. Princes and nobles rule to wherever their power extends; and sovereign rule is over all for the benefit and advantage of its subjects. In proportion as the sphere of regulating authority is enlarged, it requires greater energy of mind, greater capability of apprehension, greater fortitude, and greater rectitude, to discharge the duties attached to its importance, its dignity, and its influence.

Nothing can be greater unhappiness than to be subject to the rule and caprice of babes, Isaiah iii. 4. of servants, Lam. v. 8 of women, Isaiah iii. 12. of the wicked, Prov. xxviii. 15. xxix. 2.

The ruler of Joseph's house, Gen. xliii. 16. is his house-steward: his domestic inspector and regulator: the ruler of the people is the civil, the judiciary magistrate, Exod. xxii. 28. thou shalt not revile the ruler of thy people: especially in the discharge of his office. For ruler of the synagogue, vide ARCHISYNAGOGUS.]

RUMA, רומא, exalted, sublime, or rejected; from רומ rum, elevated, &c. and רמה ramah, rejected. A city, Judg. ix. 41. The Heb. has

רומא Dumah, Josh. xv. 52. [Arumah. Eng. Trans.]

RUMA. Josephus speaks of Ruma, a village of Galilee. De Bello, lib. iii. cap. 9. In 2 Kings xxiii. 36. there is mention of Ruma; but Josephus there reads Abuma.

RUMP of the sacrifices. Moses ordained, that the rump and fat of the sheep, offered for peace-offerings, should be given to the fire of the altar. Exod. xxix. 22. Levit. iii. 9. vii. 3. viii. 25. ix. 19. The rump was esteemed the most delicate part of the animal, being the fattest. Travellers, ancient and modern, speak of the rumps of certain breeds of sheep in Syria and Arabia, as weighing some twenty or thirty pounds. Herodotus, l. iii. c. 113. says that some may be seen three cubits long, or four foot and a half: they drag upon the ground; and for fear they should be hurt, or the skin torn, the shepherds put under the tails of these sheep little carriages, which these animals draw after them. The Pagans had also this regard for the rumps or tdils, that they always made them a part of their sacrifices. Aristophan. in Pace, et Acharnes. act. 3. scen. 3. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXLVIII. and Plate of SYRIAN ANIMALS.

[To RUN is to pass very swiftly, to make rapid progress. It is used metaphorically not only for rapidity, but for perseverance; "So run that ye may obtain" the crown, the reward. "I therefore so run, as not incorrectly"—not passing over the boundaries, the limits of the course. Heb. xii. 1. "Let us run with patience"—perseveringly—steadily—the race set before us." To run to excess of riot, 1 Pet. iv. 4. is to pursue with avidity, to follow with prolonged attention, sensual gratifications, indulgences, &c.

As men when running, especially when running for a prize, labour with great diligence, earnestness, and intensity, the apostle uses this word to run, to express the course of his conduct among his Christian converts; his continued behaviour towards them, Gal. ii. 2. "lest by any means I had run, or should hereafter run in vain"—lest my ministerial labours should suffer under the imputation of improper motives, conduct, or management. The same apostle also tells his Galatian converts, chap. v. 7. "Ye did run well; who did hinder you?" Ye did run with speed and vigour, who came across your course, and so drove you back in your Christian race, your profession of Godliness? See RACE.]

RUTH, רוט, drunk, satisfied. [Rather, contracted

tracted from רִמְרָה, seen with delight; the sight of whom gives pleasure: q. lovely, charmer.]

RUTH, a Moabitess, who having married Chilion son of Elimelech and Naomi, who had settled in Moab, was left a widow, without children. Naomi having lost her husband and two sons, was desirous to return to Bethlehem, her own country. Her two daughters-in-law offered to attend her. However, Orpah was persuaded to continue in Moab, but Ruth would accompany Naomi to Bethlehem. This happened at the close of the time of the Judges, and under the government of Eli, if we may believe Josephus, Antiq. lib. v. cap. 11. The rabbins pretend that Boaz, who married Ruth, is Ibzan judge of Israel, who governed seven years, between Jephthah and Elon, about A. M. 2823. The greater Chronology of the Hebrews places this history in the time of Ehud, and of the servitude of the Israelites under Eglon, king of Moab. Others place it under Barak and Deborah; others, under Gideon; others under Abimelech. Usher, whom we follow, places it under Shamgar, about one hundred and twenty years after Joshua.

At Bethlehem, Ruth went to gleaning for their support. By chance [i. e. providentially] she entered the field of a rich citizen of Bethlehem, named Boaz, related to Elimelech her father-in-law. When Boaz came to see his harvesters, he found Ruth, and favoured her. In the evening she told Naomi of his civilities. Naomi blessed God, who had put such sentiments in Boaz's heart, and acquainted Ruth that this was their kinsman.

At the end of harvest Naomi said to Ruth, go to night, and lie at the feet of Boaz, who winnows his corn; and do what he advises. She went accordingly. Boaz awaking, in the night, was alarmed. But she said, "I am Ruth, thine handmaid; spread therefore thy skirt over thine handmaid, for thou art a near kinsman." Boaz acknowledged that he was a near kinsman, yet there was a nearer than himself; and if he should refuse to marry her, he himself would take her to wife. Rising very early, before daylight, he filled Ruth's kerchief with corn, as a present to Naomi.

Boaz went to the gate of Bethlehem, and cited before the elders of the city, the nearest kinsman to Elimelech; on whom the duty devolved of marrying Ruth, the widow of Chilion. This person declining it, Boaz insisted, that he should renounce his right: this he willingly did;—and then Boaz declared his resolution to marry her himself. Thus Ruth became the wife of Boaz, by whom she had a son called Obed, who was father to Jesse, and grandfather to king David.

THE BOOK OF RUTH, which contains this history, is placed in our Bibles, between the book of Judges and the books of Samuel, as being the sequel of the former, and an introduction to the latter. Jerom informs us, Prolog. Galat. that the Jews added it to the book of Judges, because the transactions it relates, happened in the time of the judges of Israel: Judg. i. 1.—And several of the ancient fathers make but one book of the Judges and Ruth. But the modern Jews commonly place in their Bibles, after the Pentateuch, the five Megilloth; 1. The Song of Solomon; 2. Ruth; 3. The Lamentations of Jeremiah; 4. Ecclesiastes; 5. Esther. Sometimes Ruth is placed the first of the five, sometimes the second, and sometimes the fifth.

The scope of the author of this book, is to trace the genealogy of David; and in all probability, he was the same author as composed the first book of Samuel; in which, because he could not conveniently place this genealogy of David, he chose rather to give it by itself. The writer observes, at the beginning of his work, that the history he was about to relate, happened when the judges governed Israel; therefore, they ceased to govern it when he wrote. Also, he speaks of David at the end of his book; which shews, that, at soonest, it must have been written in the time of David. Besides, I have observed two ways of speaking in it, or particular phrases, which are only found in the books of Samuel and of the Kings: the first is, "The Lord do so to me, and more also:" Ruth i. 17. Compare 1 Sam. iii. 17. xiv. 44. xx. 23. 2 Sam. iii. 9, 35. xix. 13. 1 Kings ii. 23. xix. 2. xx. 10. 2 Kings vi. 31. the second, "I have discovered to your ear;" for, I have told you; Ruth iv. 4. Compare 1 Sam. xx. 2. 2 Sam. vii. 27.

The canonicalness of this book was never disputed. Ruth the Moabitess is in the genealogy of our Saviour, Matt. i. 5.

SABACON, king of Egypt. Herodotus relates, lib. ii. that Sabacus, or Sabacon, king of Ethiopia, having made an incursion into Egypt, Anysis, who then reigned, being blind, escaped into the marshes, and abandoned his kingdom to Sabacon, who reigned there fifty years. [Vide FRAGS. No. CCCXXII.] His maxim was, never to put any person to death, but to condemn all offenders to work upon the banks of the Nile. He withdrew into his kingdom of Ethiopia, having had a dream, which commanded him to cut asunder in the middle all the priests of Egypt. He chose rather to quit the country; and this the readier, because the number of years was completed, which the oracle had told him he should reign in Egypt. After he was withdrawn, Anysis came out of his retreat, and resumed the government. He had Sethon for his successor, who lived under Senacherib.

It is probable, that Sabacon, is called in Scripture, So. 2 Kings xvii. 4. After this usurper had, in a short time, rendered himself very powerful, Hoshea, king of Israel, made an alliance with him; thinking, by his assistance, to shake off the yoke of the Assyrians; and he refused to pay the Assyrians their tribute. 2 Kings xviii. 9. To revenge this, Shalmanesar marched against him, and besieged Hoshea in Samaria. He was forced to surrender, after a siege of three years, A. M. 3283, ante A. D. 721.

SABACHTHANI, שבקתני, thou hast forsaken me; from שבק shabac. The Hebrew, Psalm xxii. 1. reads עזבתני asabtani, thou hast forsaken me; but it might be read זבחתני, Zabachthani, thou hast sacrificed me. [It appears to be a Syriac, or Chaldee-ism.]

We read in the gospels, that Christ on the cross, cried out, Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Matt. xxvii. 46. Mark xv. 34. This is a corrupt reading of the word Azabthani, or Gnazabthani; Psalm xxii. 1.

SABAOTH, or rather ZABAOTH, a Hebrew word, signifying hosts or armies, יהוה צבאות, Jehovah Sabaoth, The Lord of Hosts: Whether we understand the host of heaven, or the angels and ministers of the Lord; or the stars and planets, which as an army ranged in battle array, perform the will of God; or, lastly, the people of the Lord, both of the old and new covenant, which is truly a great army, of which God is the general and commander.

The Hebrew Zaba is often used also, to signify the service his ministers perform to God in the temple; because they are there, as it were, soldiers, or guards, attending the court of their prince, Numb. iv. 3, 23, 30, &c. This word is also used, to express the duty of the women who watched at the door of the tabernacle, and kept guard there during the night-time, Exodus xxxviii. 8. במראות הצבאות.

SABBATH. God having created the world in six days, rested on the seventh; Gen. ii. 2, 3. i. e. he ceased from producing new beings, in this creation; and because he had rested on it, he blessed this day, i. e. sanctified it, and appointed it in a peculiar manner for his worship. The Hebrews, afterwards, in consequence of this designation, and to preserve the memory of the creation, sanctified, by his order, the Sabbath-day, or the seventh day of the week, abstaining from all work, labour, and servile employment, and applying themselves to the service of the Lord, to the study of his law, and to prayer.

Sabbath (or sabbathum) is sometimes taken merely for rest: sometimes, for eternal rest and felicity in heaven. See Hebrews iv. 4, &c.

The days of Sabbath (sabbatha) are taken sometimes, for all the Jewish festivals. "Keep my sabbaths," Levit. xix. 3, 30. i. e. my feasts; as, the Passover, Pentecost, Feast of Tabernacles, &c.

Sabbathum is also taken for the whole week. Jejuno bis in sabbatho, Luke xviii. 12. Vulgate. I fast twice a week. Una sabbathi the first day of of the week, John xi. 1, 19. Luke xxiv. 1. Acts xx. 7. 1 Cor. xvi. 2.

On occasion of the sabbath, it is disputed, whether God created the whole world by one single fiat, all at once, by a simultaneous action, and by a simple act; or at six different operations, and in six days successively, so that the seventh day was really and truly a day of rest to the Lord, at the end of his successive creation. Philo, Allog. lib. i. et de Mundi Opificio. Origen, lib. vi. cont. Cels. St. Austin, lib. iv. de Genes. ad Litter, cap. 18. lib. xi. de Civit. lib. vii. xii. Cons. cap. 29. Procopius, Cajet. Canus, and some moderns, maintain, that God, not only created all matter in the same instant, but, that at the same time he disposed it in order, and gave every thing its proper form, without waiting for a course of six days. That the account Moses gives, and the distribution of the works of the Creator into six days, is not a succession of time, but only a succession of order and reason, proposed by way of accommodation to the comprehension of the people, and to impart a distinct notion of the material creation, by distributing it into parts, and into a certain disposition or arrangement.

But the greater part of the fathers and commentators maintain a successive creation, agreeably to the account of Moses. And indeed, there is no necessity for departing from the literal sense of Scripture in this place. The reiterated acts, and the different operations mentioned by Moses, ought indeed to be explained consistently with the infinite power, and perfect simplicity of the acts of the Creator, and so as to exclude the notion of any weakness, weariness, or imperfection in them. But all this may be done, without denying a successive creation. God, by his infinite power, drew forth out of nothing, all the matter of the universe; by his wisdom, he gave every part all the motions necessary to arrange the Chaos, whose parts being disentangled from one another, and combined with others more appropriate, might compose what we call the world, in its present condition. This motion, conducted by the Spirit and wisdom of God, might continue six days; after which, God rested; i. e. he ceased from producing any new being; but he continued still to act by his Providence, and his concurrence, and to preserve his work, in the state of beauty and perfection to which he had brought it.

As to those particular beings, that could not be produced by a continuation of the general laws of motion communicated by God to matter, as men, plants, and animals, it must necessarily be acknowledged, that God formed them successively, as Moses acquaints us, by applying, forming, animating matter, agreeably to the designs of his wisdom; by inspiring into man a reasonable soul; by giving to animals their several instincts, for their preservation and re-production; by communicating to plants those qualities that distinguish them from each other, with their seeds and grains proper for their renovation.

Another great question, about the sabbath, is, Whether, from the beginning of the world, God gave the law of the Sabbath? and, whether this day was also observed, at least among the more pious of the first men, as the patriarchs, before the promulgation of the law? Whether this be the sense of those words, Gen. ii. 2. "And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it."—Some fathers, Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. v. Euseb. Præpar. lib. xiii. cap. 12. and some Jewish doctors, de Creat. Prob. 8. have asserted the affirmative; and Menasseh Ben-Israel, apud Selden de Jure Nat. et Gent. lib. iii. cap. 13., &c. assures us, that, according to the tradition of the ancients, Abraham and his posterity having preserved the memory of the creation, observed the Sabbath also, in consequence of the natural law to that purpose. Some also believe, that the religion of the seventh day is preserved among the Pagans, and that the observation of this day is as old as the world itself. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XX.

Philo says, de Mundi Opificio, that the Sabbath is not a festival peculiar to any one people or country, but is common to the whole world; and that it may be named the general and public festival, and that of the nativity of the world. Josephus, contr. Appion, lib. ii. advances, that there is no city, Greek or Barbarian, nor any nation, where the religion of the Sabbath was not known.

Aristobulus, in Eusebius, Præp. lib. xiii. cap. 12. quotes Homer and Hesiod, who speak of the seventh day as sacred and venerable. Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. lib. v. speaks of the Sabbath in the same terms as Aristobulus, and he adds some passages from the ancients, which celebrate the seventh day. [Comp. WEEK.]

Some believe, that Job observed the sabbath-day; because at the end of seven days he offered a sacrifice to the Lord on account of his children, Abenezra, apud Boulduc. Job. i. 2, 5. Some Rabbins inform us, that Joseph also observed the sabbath in Egypt.

But the contrary opinion is not without its proofs. The greater part of the fathers and commentators hold, that the benediction and sanctification of the sabbath, mentioned by Moses in the beginning of Genesis, signifies only that appointment then made of the seventh day, to be afterwards solemnized and sanctified by the Jews. It does not appear from any passages of Scripture, that the ancient patriarchs observed the sabbath; or that God designed to oblige them thereto, before the law. Philo says, Vit. Mos. lib. i. that the Hebrews having forgotten the day of the creation of the world, were again reminded of it, when God having caused it to rain manna all the other days of the week, withheld it on the sabbath-day. The seventh day which was honoured by some Pagans, and of which they have spoken, as of a holy day, was either dedicated to Apollo; or, it was an imitation of the Jewish Sabbath, which some Pagans held in honour, heretofore, either out of superstition or devotion.

Ezekiel, xx. 12, 20. says expressly, that the Sabbath, and the other feasts of the Jews, are signs given by God to his people, to distinguish them from other nations. "I gave them my Sabbaths, to be a sign between me and them, that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them." And again, "Hallow my Sabbaths, and they shall be a sign between me and you, that ye may know that I am the Lord your God." And Moses, Deut. v. 15. "The Lord hath brought thee out of Egypt, therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath-day." Vide FRAGS. No. CXXIX. Justin Martyr, Dial. cum Tryph. Tertullian, cont. Jud. lib. iv. cap. 4. Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. cap. 4. Præp. lib. vii. cap. 3. Dem. lib. i. cap. 6. in Psalm xci. 1. St. Bernard, in Cant. Serm. 50. advance, as a matter not to be doubted, that neither the patriarchs before the deluge, nor those after, observed the Sabbath. Irenæus, adv. Hær. lib. iv. cap. 30. says expressly, that Abraham had faith, and was called the friend of God; yet neither was circumcised, nor observed the Sabbath. Abraham ipse sine circumcissione, et sine observatione Sabbathorum, Deo credidit, et amicus Dei appellatus est. On this subject, see Selden, de Jure Nat. et Gent. lib. iii. cap. 13, 14, 15.—Spencer, de Legibus Heb. lib. i. cap. 4. sect. 7.

God gave the precept of the Sabbath to the Hebrews, at Marah, one month after their coming out of Egypt, Abib 15, (March) A. M. 2513, ante A. D. 1491. Manna began to fall, according to several of the fathers, on the Sunday, six days before the Sabbath. Origen, Homil. 7. in Exod. Synod. Cæsar. apud Bed. Ambrosiaster, in 1 Cor. x. 5. Athanas. Serm. 25. de temp. apud Aug. According to others, it fell on the very eve of the Sabbath. However this be, it was probably on occasion of the manna, that God commanded the Hebrews to observe the seventh day; and not to go out to gather any on that day, for none would fall. The same command of celebrating the Sabbath occurs several times in the law. Exod. xx. 8, 9, 10, 11. Lev. xxiii. 3. Deut. v. 12.

In Exod. xxi. 13. xxxv. 2. it is said, that God established his Sabbath among the children of Israel, as a sign to make them remember, that he is the Lord who sanctifies them. Adding, that whosoever shall profane the Sabbath shall be punished with death; and we see the execution of this law on the man, who having gathered wood on the Sabbath-day, was stoned. Numb. xv. 32, 35. On other holy days it was allowed to light a fire, and to dress victuals; but this was expressly forbid on the Sabbath-day. Exod. xxxv. 2, 3. The rabbins confine this prohibition to servile works only; as to bake bread, to dress meat, to forge metals, &c. They suppose that for such sort of works it is forbid to light a fire, but not for one to warm himself. On the Sabbath-day the ministers of the temple entered on their week; and those who had attended the foregoing week went out. They placed on the golden table new loaves of shewbread, and took away the old ones. Levit. xxiv. 8. Also, on this day were offered particular sacrifices, of two lambs for a burnt-offering, with the wine and the meal. The Sabbath was celebrated, as the other festivals, from evening to evening.

Let us inquire what has been the practice of the Jews, in consequence of this institution.

The first obligation of the Sabbath expressed in the law, is to sanctify it. Numb. xxviii. 9, 10. Exod. xx. 8. "Remember to sanctify the Sabbath-day." It is sanctified by doing good works in it; by prayers, by praises and thanksgivings, by public and private worship of God, by the study of his law, by justice and innocence, and tranquillity of mind.

The second obligation is that of rest. "Thou shalt do no work on the Sabbath." Meaning any servile or laborious work, that might fix the mind, and interrupt that attention which is due to God, and which is necessary when we pay acceptable worship to him. The Jews have varied about the manner, in which they ought to observe the rest of the Sabbath. In the time of the Maccabees, they durst not so much as defend themselves from an enemy on this day, even in the most pressing necessity. 1 Macc. ii. 32, 33, &c. Since that time they have not scrupled to take arms, and stand on their necessary defence. But it may be seen by Josephus, that they would not attack their enemies, nor hinder them from advancing their works; nor would they march with their armies, even in time of war, or in the enemies country, on the Sabbath-day.

day. Antig. lib. xii. cap. 3. xiii. cap. 1, 16.

—In the time of our Saviour, they would water their cattle, or take out of a ditch a beast that had happened to fall in, on the Sabbath-day: but by a false delicacy they could not bear with our Saviour's healing the sick on that day. Matt. xii. 11, 12. Since that time they have determined, that a man might give food to a beast, that had fallen into a pit, but must not take him out on that day. The Jews complained of our Saviour's disciples, who passing through the corn-fields on the Sabbath-day, gathered some ears of corn, and rubbed them between their hands, in order to eat the grain. This action of his apostles, our Saviour excused, from the necessity of the thing, and because they had need of nourishment; adding, that the priests themselves in the temple do work, which every where else, and in every one else, would be esteemed violation of the Sabbath; that the son of man was Lord of the Sabbath; and that the Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath.

The rabbins reckon thirty-nine primary prohibitions, which ought to be observed on the Sabbath, and several other secondary ones dependant on them. Their number is so great, that it is almost impossible to keep them all; and the rabbins affirm, that if the people of Israel could keep but two Sabbaths as they ought to be kept, they should soon see themselves delivered from the evils under which they groan.—Vide Buxtorf. Syn. Jud. cap. 11. Their scrupulosity even forbids to peel, or to roast, an apple, to kill a flea, a fly, or other insect, if it is so big, that the sex may be distinguished; to sing, or to play on an instrument, so loud as to awaken a child. Yet, notwithstanding all this, the Samaritans pretend, that the Jews are not religious enough in their observation of the Sabbath. As for them, they will not light a fire on this day, they abstain from the use of marriage, they do not stir from their places, save only to go to the house of the Lord. They employ themselves wholly on that day in reading the law, in prayers and thanksgivings. (Letter of the Samaritans to Mr. Huntington.)

Of all the festivals God has enjoined, there are none of which the Jews are so jealous, or of which they speak so magnificently, as of the Sabbath. They call it their Spouse, because God has given it to them, specially, exclusive of all other nations. Leo of Modena, who alone is equivalent to all the modern Jews, says, the rabbins have reduced all that is forbid on the Sabbath-day, to these thirty-nine heads, each of which have their circumstances, and dependences:—to till the ground; to sow; to reap; to make hay; to bind sheaves of corn; to thresh; to winnow; to grind; to sift meal; to knead dough; to bake; to shear; to whiten, comb, or card wool; to spin; to twine, or twist; to warp; to dye; to tie; to untie; to sew; to tear, or pull in pieces; to build; to pull down; to knock with a hammer; to hunt, or fish; to kill a beast; to flay it; to dress it; to scrape the skin; to tan it; to cut leather; to write; to scratch out; to rule paper for writing; to light a fire; to extinguish a fire; to carry any thing from place to place; to expose any thing to sale.

Other things are forbidden, as consequences from these. E. gr. to file, is comprehended under grinding; to curdle milk, under boiling: and so of others. They must neither light, nor put out, a fire or a lamp; and, commonly they keep Christian servants in their houses, to do such offices for them on the Sabbath-day. They not only forbear from carrying burdens, but on this day they will not dress themselves; and carry their exactness so far, as to inspect the ornaments and clothes of their women, children, and servants. They speak of no business, or secular affairs; they neither give nor receive; neither sell, nor buy, or make any bargain.—They handle no tool, nor any thing heavy; they touch no money, neither go on horse-back, nor in a boat. They neither bathe, nor use any chirurgical operations, but in cases of great necessity. They may walk as much as they please within the city, or suburbs, where they inhabit; but they must not go out of the city or suburbs, above the distance of two thousand cubits.

They undertake no work on the Friday, but such as may be easily finished before the evening. About an hour before sun-set, they put into a warm place what they have prepared to eat the day following; and about half an hour before sun-set all work is quitted, and the Sabbath is supposed to be begun. Then the women light a lamp in their chambers; which lamp commonly has six wicks, or, at least, four, and it burns during great part of the night. They also set out a table covered with a fair table cloth, whereon they put bread, which they cover with another long, narrow cloth. Some, to begin the Sabbath well, put on clean linen, and wash their hands and face. They all go to the synagogue, where they rehearse certain prayers, from their books; after which they return to their houses, and salute one another by wishing a good Sabbath.

Being come home, the fathers bless their children, and the masters their disciples; then sitting down to table, the master of the family pronounces certain blessings on the bread and wine, wine, and makes mention of the institution of the Sabbath. He drinks a little of the wine he has blessed, and gives it round to all at table. He does the same by the bread; and then they entertain themselves. On the Sabbath-day morning they rise later than on other days. At the synagogue, they rehearse several psalms and prayers, in commendation of the Sabbath, intermingled with singing, and the ordinary prayers. Then they read out of the prophets a section, which has some relation to what was read out of the law. Lastly, he who holds the book in his hands, lifts it up on high; and gives his blessing to all present. They pray afterwards for those princes under whose jurisdiction and protection they live; and they make a sermon, or exhortation, in the morning or afternoon, according to the custom of the place.

When night comes, and they can discern in the heaven three stars of moderate magnitude, then the Sabbath is ended, and they may return to their ordinary employments. Those who go to the synagogue, add to the common evening prayers, certain lessons and benedictions, in relation to the Sabbath; and as they think, that the punishment of souls in purgatory is suspended on this day, they prolong its continuance as much as they can. When each is returned home, they light a taper or a lamp, which has, at least, two wicks, the master of the house takes a cup of wine and sweet-scented spices, and after pronouncing some benedictions, he blesses the wine and the spices; then he flavours the spices, and throws the wine upon the ground, in token of cheerfulness, and pronounces some blessings. Thus the ceremony of the Sabbath is ended. Those who meet compliment one another, by wishing each other a happy week.

Some ancient fathers quote the law which enjoins the rest of the Sabbath, with this exception; you shall do nothing on this day, except what is for the health of the soul, or the support of life; or except in such things wherein life is in danger. Omne opus servile non facietis in eo, præterquam quod ad animam pertinet, as Tertullian reads it: adv. Judæo, cap. 4. or, as cont. Marcion, lib. iv. cap. 12.—nisi quod fiat omnis animæ. Or, lastly, as Jerom reads it, on Isaiah xxviii. Lege præceptum est, ne in Sabbatho opus servile faciamus—ut illa tantum faciamus, quæ ad animæ salutem pertinent. A very ancient gloss this, and authorised by the practice of the primitive Jews, who used to allow the taking a beast out of a ditch, that should happen to fall in on the Sabbath, and was in danger of losing its life.

Such profane authors as have ventured to speak of the origin of the Sabbath, have only shewn their ignorance of Jewish affairs. Tacitus, Hist. lib. v. thought they observed the Sabbath in honour of Saturn, to whom Saturday was consecrated by the pagans. But Plutarch asserts, Sym. lib. iv. it was kept in honour of Bacchus, who is called Sabbos; and because in the festivals of this false deity they used to cry Saboi. Appion the grammarian maintained, that the Jews celebrated the Sabbath in memory of their being cured of a shameful disease, which in the Egyptian language was called Sabbosis. Pagan authors speak pretty frequently of the fast of the Sabbath; as if the Jews had ordinarily fasted on this day. Recutitæque Sabbathæ palles, says Persius, Sat. 5. And Petronius, Et non jejuna Sabbathæ lege premet. They were not aware, that fasting was utterly forbid the Jews on the Sabbath; but they either very grossly mistook the Sabbath for the whole week, in which some of the Jews fasted two days; or they took it in too general a sense, for all sorts of feasts; and because they used to fast on the day of solemn expiation, they very improperly concluded that they fasted on all Sabbath-days.

A Sabbath Day's Journey. We have explained from Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 16. that John Hircanus, in an expedition he made beyond Euphrates, with the king of Syria, was the occasion that the whole army halted on a Sabbath-day; which proves that long journeys were forbidden the Jews on that day. We see the same thing, 2 Macc. viii. 25, 27. where Judas could not pursue his victory over Nicanor, because of the interposition of the Sabbath.—"Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath-day," says our Saviour, Matt. xxiv. 20. And Ovid says, fear not the rain, and let not the Jewish Sabbath hinder you:

Nec pluvias vites, nec te peregrina morentur
Sabbatha.

OVID. de Remed. Amor.

However, it is evident the Jews were allowed to walk a certain space on the Sabbath-day, since we know they went, at least, to the temple or tabernacle, from the remote parts of the city or camp. And St. Luke informs us, Acts i. 12. that the Mount of Olives was distant from Jerusalem about a Sabbath-day's journey. The rabbins generally fix this distance at two thousand cubits. Josephus says, Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 6. that the Mount of Olives was five stadia from Jerusalem, which makes six hundred and twenty-five paces. Thus the journey that was allowable on a Sabbath-day, was about six or seven hundred paces, or something more: for the same Josephus, de Bello, lib. vi. cap. 3. puts the Mount of Olives at six stadia from Jerusalem. Origen says, that the journey of a Sabbath-day

bath-day is one mile, or two thousand cubits. The Jews also used to make a mile consist of two thousand cubits: Reland, Palest. lib. ii. cap. 1. page 397. so that their cubit must be two feet and a half, since their mile contains a thousand paces, or five thousand feet, taking their paces at five feet each. Maimonides, in Hilcoth. Sab. cap. 27. §. 4. will have it, that he who does not know exactly the distance of a place, may walk on the Sabbath-day two thousand moderate paces, which makes a thousand geometrical paces of five feet each. Epiphanius says, Hæres. lxvi. that the Jews believe they are forbid from walking on the Sabbath-day above six stadia, or seven hundred and fifty paces. The Syriac translator of the Acts of the Apostles, puts about seven stadia for a Sabbath-day's journey; which is according to what some rabbins say, that a mile is seven stadia and a half. See Selden, de Jur. Nat. et Gent. lib. iii. cap. 9.

The second Sabbath after the first. Luke vi. 1. This expression has much divided commentators. Some (Isidor. Pelus. lib. iii. Ep. 110. Euthym.) have taken it for the second, others (Epiphani. Hæres. li. n. 31. Osiand. not. ad Harmon. Evang. Vat. Pisc. Drus. Bez.) for the last day of unleavened bread; and some, as Maldon. Mercat. for the day of Pentecost.—The passover was the first Sabbath, according to them, and Pentecost the second. Others have thought, that the first grand Sabbath was the first Sabbath of the civil year, in the month Tizri; and that the second grand Sabbath was the first of the holy year, or of the month Nisan.—But Joseph Scaliger, de emend. Temp. lib. vi. who is followed in this by a great number of able writers (Lightfoot, in Luc. Casaubon, Exercit. 13. in Baron. alii passim.) thinks that to have been the first Sabbath, which followed the second day of unleavened bread.

The Jews thus reckoned their Sabbaths from the passover to Pentecost; the first was called the second after the first; i. e. the first (Sabbath) after the second day of unleavened bread. The second was called the second Sabbath-day after the second day of unleavened bread. The third was called the third Sabbath-day after the second day of unleavened bread. And so of the rest, as far as secundo-septimum, i. e. the seventh Sabbath-day after the second day of unleavened bread. This seventh Sabbath immediately preceded Pentecost, which was celebrated the fiftieth day after the second day of unleavened bread. [Our Rubric has something like this, “the first, &c. Sunday after Easter—after Trinity,” &c.]

day before; for, as it was forbid to make a fire, to bake bread, or to dress victuals, on the Sabbath-day, they provided on the Friday, every thing needful for their sustenance on the Sabbath.

SABBATH transferred to Sunday. The obligation of devoting a portion of our time to God, to be employed in his worship and service, is founded on natural right and reason. The law had fixed this to the seventh day, i. e. the Sabbath, for the nation of the Jews. The apostles of Jesus Christ, to honour the day of his resurrection, also determined it to every seventh day, and fixed it on the Sunday, i. e. the first day of the week among the Hebrews; and the day dedicated to the sun among the pagans.—This day, among Christians, is known by the name of the Lord's-Day.

[The change of the day of public devotion from the Sabbath-day of the Jews (Saturday) to the Lord's-day of the Christians (Sunday) is rather to be gathered from the practice of apostolic times, than is clearly enjoined in the New Testament. It appears that believers came together on this day to break bread, that collections for the poor were made on this day, and put into the general treasury of the church (as I understand 1 Cor. xvi. 2.); that on this day exhortations, and discourses were made to the people; and, in short, we have the various parts of public worship noted, as being performed on this day. It will follow, that we may safely imitate those examples which the apostles and primitive Christians have left us: and whatever obligations the Jews might lie under to the observance of the Saturday Sabbath, they do not bind Christians; because, those obligations were national, not general; and were commemorative in some degree of Israelitish events, in which others have no interest: whereas, the resurrection Sabbath commemorates an event in which all Christians throughout the world are interested, and for which no equal mode of commemoration can be devised. We have then good example and strong propriety in behalf of our observation of the Lord's Day, and the same principles influenced the Christians of early ages.

More particularly, we are informed by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. lib. iv. cap. 23. that from the beginning the Christians assembled on the first day of the week, called by them the Lord's Day, for the purposes of religious worship, “to read the Scriptures, to preach, and to celebrate the Lord's Supper:” and Justin Martyr, Apol. ii. observes, “that on the Lord's Day, all Christians in the city, or country, meet together, because that is the day of our Lord's resurrection, and and then we read the writings of the apostles and prophets; this being done, the president makes an oration to the assembly, to exhort them to imitate, and to practice the things they have heard; then we all join in prayer, and after that we celebrate the Sacrament. Then they who are able, and willing, give what they think proper, and what is collected is laid up in the hands of the president, who distributes it to orphans and widows, and other necessitous Christians, as their wants require." Vide 1 Cor. xvi. 20. A very honourable conduct, and worship! would to God it was more prevalent among us; with the spirit and piety of primitive Christianity!]

It is mentioned, Rev. i. 10. "I was in the spirit on the Lord's Day." From the very beginning the day of the resurrection of our Saviour, i. e. the day after the Sabbath, was honoured very particularly. To preserve the remembrance of this day, so glorious to Jesus Christ, and so beneficial to his church, the apostles thought fit to transfer to the Lord's Day, that rest which had been observed by the Jews on their Sabbath. Barnabas in his Epistle says, p. 56. that we joyfully celebrate the eighth day, in memory of the resurrection of our Saviour, because it was on this day he rose again, and ascended into heaven. Ignatius the martyr, in his letter to the Magnesians, would have us honour this day of the Lord, this day of the resurrection, as the first and most excellent of days. Justin Martyr, Apolog. ii. ad finem, says, that the Christians assemble together on this day; because it was the day of the creation of the world, and of the resurrection of Jesus Christ. The same may be seen in Irenæus, apud Author. Resp. ad Orthodox, Tertullian, Apologet. et de Anima, Origen, Homil. 6. in Exod. and in the Constitutions ascribed to the Apostles.

[Beside this, it is thought the Jews at the giving of the law missed the true Sabbath day, and that the true day, from the creation, is recovered by the resurrection of Christ: so that we now keep the correct creation Sabbath as well as the resurrection Sabbath: but the arguments in support of this opinion are too long for this place; and the reasons already given are sufficient: and less liable to controversy.]

Sabbatical year was to be celebrated among the Jews from seven years to seven years, when the land was to rest, and be left without culture. Exod. xxiii. 10. Lev. xxv. 2, 3, &c. They were to set slaves at liberty, and each was to re-enter on his inheritance that had been alienated.

God appointed the observation of the Sabbatical year, to preserve the remembrance of the creation of the world; to enforce the acknowledgment of his sovereign authority over all things, particularly over the land of Canaan, which he had given to the Hebrews, by delivering up the fruits of their fields to the poor and the stranger. It was a kind of tribute which they paid to the Lord for it. Besides, he intended to inculcate humanity on his people, by commanding that they should resign to the slaves, to the poor, to strangers, and to brutes, the produce of their fields, of their vineyards, and of their gardens. Levit. xxv. 2, 3, 4, &c.

[If the land of Canaan produced that plenty which is ascribed to it, this non-tillage every seven years would be a certain method of consuming the surplus corn, the old stores of the land, &c. so that agriculture would never be overloaded.]

It has been much disputed, at what season of the year the Sabbatical year began. Some have been of opinion, that it began on the first month of the sacred year, i. e. Nisan, or in the spring. Others think it began at the first month of the civil year, or Tizri (September.) Moses does not explain himself on this matter very clearly. He says only, that the land shall not be cultivated, and that there shall be no harvest that year. In Palestine, the time of sowing wheat and barley was in autumn; barley-harvest began at the passover, and wheat-harvest at Pentecost.—Therefore, to enter into the spirit of the law for observing the rest of the Sabbatical year, that the land may not remain two years without cultivation, we must necessarily begin it at autumn, after the crops were gathered: they did not till the land in autumn, and they had no harvest after the winter; but the autumn following they began again to cultivate the land, that they might reap their harvests in the spring and summer following.

In the Sabbatical year all debts were remitted, and slaves were set at liberty, Deut. xv. 12. Exod. xxi. 2. But, were debts absolutely forgiven, or was the payment of them only suspended? Several think, that this remission was absolute, and that all debts were totally extinguished in the Sabbatical year. Hebr. Drusius. Estius, alii. The caution of rich men, noticed by Moses, Deut. xv. 9. who would not lend to their brethren at the approach of the Sabbatical year, seems to prove, that after this year nothing was to be hoped for from their debtors. For if the payment of debts was only suspended till this year was over and past, it would not have been a sufficient motive to hinder them from lending. As there was no lending for interest in the case, which was forbid to the Hebrews toward their brethren, as it could only be a simple loan, the creditor might require it again either before, or after, the Sabbatical year, on the supposition of those who think that the remission was not absolute. Cajet. Burg. Piscat. in Deut. xv. Basnage, Antiquities of the Jews, tom. i. p. 29.

Others, as the Rabbins, and Grotius, distinguish between debts mortgaged on security, (the contracts of which included a clause of perpetual debt) and simple contracts: these last were for ever acquitted on the Sabbatical year, but not the others. Menochius also thinks, that the remission of debts was general and absolute, but not of loans or deposits. This regarded only the natural Hebrews, or proselytes to Judaism, but not strangers.

It is also inquired, whether debts were remitted, and slaves set at liberty, at the beginning, or at the end, of the Sabbatical year. The Hebrew says, Deut. xv. 1. מִקֵּץ שָׁבַע שָׁנִים. LXX. Δὲ ἐπὶ τὰ ἑπτὰ ἔτη: "At the end of every seven years thou shalt make a release." This has given occasion to some to think, that debts were not remitted, nor slaves set at liberty, till the end of the Sabbatical year. But most are of the contrary opinion, that it was at the beginning of the Sabbatical year. The original text explains it very naturally at the end of the week of the year; after which came the Sabbatical year, with which it concludes.

[But debts of various kinds might be contracted in the Sabbatical year itself;—as, for mercantile and commercial purposes, goods bought on credit, &c. Did the observance of this year prevent, or annul, those debts? It is not credible; for then commerce could not be carried on; no merchant could transact business with foreign parts; nor would any caravans from abroad enter the land of Israel. In these cases, and others connected with mercantile agency, brokerage, &c. in which the Jews were always forward and famous, the probability is, that accounts and credits were adjusted, and balanced, and closed, and that fresh accounts were raised, and new credits were given, to the mutual satisfaction and good understanding of both parties. This would effectually prevent long accounts; the intricacy, hazard and vexation of which is sufficiently well known in the commercial world.]

SABBATISMUS, Σαββατισμός, Heb. iv. 9. COMPLETE rest, cessation from work.

SABEANS, שָׁבָא, captivity; from שָׁבַח shabak: or conversion, rest, old age; from שָׁב shub. [But some rather think amethysts, or gems, in which this people dealt.]

SABEANS, Isaiah xlv. 14. "The Sabeans, men of stature." Probably the Sabeans of Arabia Foelix, or of Asia. They submitted to Cyrus.

The Sabeans of Arabia, were descended from Saba: but as there are several of this name, who were all heads of peoples, or of tribes; we must distinguish several kinds of Sabeans.

(1) Those Sabeans who seized the flocks of Job, i. 15. were probably, a people of Arabia Deserta, about Bozra; or, perhaps, a flying troop of Sabeans which infested that country.—We shall hereafter mention Saba, or Sheba, the son of Joktan, who might be the father of these Sabeans.

(2) Sabeans, descendants from Sheba, son of Cush, Gen. x. 7. are probably of Arabia Foelix: they are famous for spices; the poets give them the epithet of soft and effeminate, and say they were governed by women:

Medis, levibusque Sabæis
Imperat hic Sexus.

CLAUD. in Eutrop. lib. ii.

Several are of opinion, that from hence came the queen of Sheba, 1 Kings x. 1, 2. and that of these Sabeans the Psalmist speaks, lxxii. 10. The kings of Arabia and Sheba shall give gifts. And Jeremiah vi. 20. "What are the perfumes of Sheba to me?" And Isaiah, lx. 6. "All who come from Sheba shall offer gold and perfumes."

(3) Sabeans, sons of Shebah, son of Reumah, Gen. x. 7. probably dwelt in Arabia Foelix. I imagine it is of these Ezekiel speaks, xxvii. 22. who came with their merchandise to the fairs of Tyre: and Joel, iii. 8. "I will deliver up your children to the tribe of Judah, who shall sell them to the Sabeans, a very distant nation."

(4) Sabeans, descendants from Joktan, may very well be those mentioned by Ezekiel xxvii. 23. "Saba, Assur, and Chelmad, thy dealers." We believe they inhabited beyond the Euphrates; whence they are connected with Assur and Chelmad. Comp. Gen. x. 28. 1 Chr. i. 22.

(5) Sabeans are also placed in Africa, in the isle of Meroë. Josephus, Antiq. lib. ii. cap. 5. brings the queen of Sheba from hence, and pretends that it had the name of Shebah, or Saba, before that of Meroë. [Mr. BRUCE is of this opinion.]

Sabeans, or Sabians, or Zabians, is a name of the ancient idolaters, or image-worshippers, in Persia. See ZABIANS.

SABEC. In Genesis xxii. 13. אֵל נֶאֱחָז בַּסֶּבֶךְ, LXX. κατεχόμενος ἐν πυρὶ σαβέχ, instead of what we read in the Vulgate, [and the English version,] "Abraham saw a ram entangled by its horns in a thicket," the Septuagint and Theodotion read, he saw a ram caught by its horns in the bush Sabec. Philo, Eucherius, Diodorus, as well as the Septuagint and Theodotion, have taken the Hebrew word Sabec for a particular species species of Shrub. Eusebius of Emesa, thinks, that Sabec signifies a goat, because of its upright horns. But the best interpreters translate this word by, branches of thorns and briars entangled in one another.

SABINUS, Augustus's procurator in Syria. After the death of Herod the Great, and the departure of Archelaus from Rome, he attempted to seize the fortress of Jerusalem, and the treasure that Herod had left: but he found a vigorous resistance from the people. After a great struggle with the Jews, wherein they suffered much, he caused fire to be put to the doors of the sacred treasury, and took away four hundred talents, for his own share; permitting his officers and soldiers to distribute the rest among themselves. This so provoked the people, that they besieged Sabinus in the royal palace, and pressed him so hard, that if he had not speedily sent for succour from Varus, governor of Syria, neither he, nor his soldiers, could have escaped. Varus, with his troops, came to Jerusalem; but Sabinus knowing himself guilty, durst not appear in his presence, but retired toward the seaside, to avoid punishment. A. M. 4001, ante A. D. 3. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 12.

SABTAH, סבתה, windings; from סבב sabab, or סבה sibah. [Going round, or circulation; otherwise, causing: or, from the Syriac, old age. But Simon thinks a blow, or stroke; the terror of the enemy; from the Arabic root, he struck, he was astonished. Gen. x. 7.

Josephus writes, Sabatha begat the Sabathens, whom the Greeks call Astabari: perhaps he means inhabitants of the banks of the Astaboras, a river of Ethiopia, which runs into the Nile. The Arabic reads Zogava: the Chaldee and Jonathan read Samara, which country is mentioned by Abulpharagius, as near Babylonia. Might it be Sabtān, in Arabia?]

SABTAH, or SABATHA, the third son of Cush, Gen. x. 7. He peopled part of Arabia Fœlix, where is a city called Sabta, and a people called Sabatheans.

SABTECHA, סבתכא, that surrounds, or causes wounding; from סבב sabab, to surround: otherwise, from סבה subah, to cause, and נכה nacah, or כאה caah, to strike, to wound: according to the Syriac and Hebrew, wounding of old-age, or old-age beaten.

[Simon thinks the great stroke, or terror to the enemy. Comp. SABTAH: also the names of his parents and his brother. Gen. x. 7. 1 Chr. i. 9.

The Samaritan writes Sabtaceh, and Josephus Sabacten. Jonathan the paraphrast reads Zingitas, probably Zanguebar. Abulpharagius assigns Zingita to the posterity of Ham; the Arabian geographer does the same.

Ptolemy, lib. iv. p. 117, says Zingis is the furthest part of Ethiopia, on the east, which belongs to Egypt—rather, east of Abyssinia.]

SABTECHA, or SABATHACA, fifth son of Cush. He also peopled, as is thought, part of Arabia, or some country toward Assyria, or Armenia, or Caramania. For in all these regions are found traces of the name Sabtecha. Gen. x. 7.

SACÆ. A people of Asia; and the Sacean feasts are known in Persia. Athenæus, lib. xiv. cap. 10. Strabo, lib. xi. Herodotus says, lib. iii. that the Persians gave the name of Sacæ to the Scythians. We believe Sheshach, Jer. xxv. 26. li. 41. stands for Babylon, and that the Sacean feasts were celebrated in honour to the moon. See SHESHACH; also FRAGS. Nos. DXCVII. DXCVIII.

SACAR, שכר, Zaxàp, drunkenness: or inebriating liquor, salaries, wages; from שכר shakar, or shēcar, by different readings. [perhaps, reward, or wages.] Father of Ahiam, a hero of David's army. 1 Chron. xi. 35.

II. A son of Obed Edom, 1 Chron. xxvi. 4.

SACK. SACK-CLOTH. This is a pure Hebrew word, and has spread into almost all languages. Beside the common signification of it, which is well known, it imports a suit of mourning, worn at the death of a friend or relation.—In great calamities, in penitence, in trouble, they wore sack-cloth about their bodies, 2 Sam. iii. 31. “Gird yourselves with sack-cloth, and mourn for Abner.—“Let us gird ourselves with sack-cloth; and let us go and implore the clemency of the king of Israel,” 1 Kings xx. 31. Ahab rent his clothes, put on a shirt of hair-cloth next to his skin, fasted, and lay upon sack-cloth, 1 Kings xxi. 27.

When Mordecai was informed of the destruction threatened to his nation, he put on sack-cloth, and covered his head with ashes, Esther iv. Job says, that he sewed a sack over his flesh, chap. xvi. 15.

On the contrary, in time of joy, or, on hearing good news, those who were clad in sack-cloth, tore it from their bodies, and cast it from them. Psalm xxx. 11.

The prophets were often clothed in sack-cloth: [and generally in coarse clothing.] The Lord bids Isaiah to put off the sack-cloth from about his body, and to go naked, Isaiah xx. 2. Zechariah says, xiii. 4. that false prophets should no longer prophesy in sack-cloth, to deceive the simple. St. John, Rev. xi. 3. says, that the two prophets of God should prophesy 1260 years, clothed in sack-cloth. Baruch intimates, that that this habit of sack-cloth, was that in which good people clothed themselves when they went to prayers. Baruch iv. 20.

SACKBUT, Sambuca. Vide MUSIC.

SACRAMENT, Μυστήριον, Mysterion. Sacramentum, whence the English word, is taken, in the Latin Vulgate, 1. for a secret: sacramentum regis abscondere bonum est; it is good to keep the king's secret. Tob. xii. 7. And, nescierunt sacramenta Dei; the wicked know not the secrets of God. Wisd. ii. 22. 2. For a mystery; Nebuchadnezzar's mysterious dream, which he had forgot, was revealed to Daniel, with its interpretation: Ut quærerent misericordiam Dei super sacramento isto. Tunc Danieli mysterium per visionem nocte revelatum est, &c. 3. For a sacrament of the new law, and a mystery [see MYSTERY] of our holy religion. All this agrees with the general sense of mystery and secret.

ons, benedictions, consecrations, &c. under the Mosaic institutions. All these were mysterious and figurative, of things to come. 1. in the Christian dispensation; 2. in heaven, and the future world; of which St. Paul has discovered the mystery, in his Epistle to the Hebrews, chap. ix., &c.

The Sacraments of the New Law. These have infinitely the preference before those of the old law. St. Paul says, those of the Jews were weak and beggarly elements, which of themselves had no grace or efficacy: Gal. iv. 9. And that the priesthood and ceremonies of the law were abrogated and annulled, because of their weakness and insufficiency: Heb. vii. 18, 19. "For there is verily a disannulling of the commandment going before, for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof. For the law made nothing perfect." But those of the new law are much fewer in number, more excellent, and more easily practised, than those of Moses. Sacramentis numero paucissimis observatione facillimis, significatione præstantissimis, Christus societatem novi populi colligavit. Aug. Ep. 54. They are more venerable and august in what they represent; more excellent in what they operate; more useful in those supernatural gifts they procure us; more easy in the practice. Virtute majora, utilitate meliora, actu faciliora, numero pauciora, quàm antiqua. Aug. contra Faust. lib. xix. cap. 12.

The sacraments of the new law, are visible signs of an invisible grace; they were instituted by Jesus Christ. The church of Rome reckons seven: 1. Baptism: 2. Confirmation: 3. Penance: 4. The Eucharist: 5. Extreme Unction:

6. Orders: 7. Marriage:—but Protestants reckon only two, Baptism, and the Eucharist.

Baptism became a Christian rite when Jesus Christ, said to his apostles, "Go, teach all nations, baptising them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," Matt. xxviii. 19. Water is the matter of this sacrament; its form, are the words now recited; its effects, are the Christian badge and character, which it communicates to those who receive it; and its hopes are the remission of sins, and purification of the soul, of him who receives it, to a new life, &c. See REGENERATION.

The Eucharist, is the sacrament of the body and blood of Jesus Christ; represented under the elements of bread and wine. Our Saviour instituted this at his last supper, which he ate with his apostles, the evening before his passion, when, taking bread, he said, "Take and eat, this is my body:" and taking the cup, he said, "Take and drink, this is my blood." Matt. xxvi. 26, 27, 28. Mark xiv. 22, 23, &c. Luke xxii. 17, 18. Comp. 1 Cor. xi. 23., &c.

SACRIFICE, an offering made to God on his altar, by the hand of a lawful minister. Sacrifice differs from oblation: in a sacrifice there must be a real change or destruction of the thing offered; whereas an oblation is but a simple offering, or a gift. As men have always been bound to acknowledge the supreme dominion of God over them, and over whatever belongs to them, and as there have always been persons who have conscientiously acquitted themselves of this duty; we may affirm, that there have always been sacrifices in the world. See ADAM.

Adam and his sons, Noah and his descendants, Abraham and his posterity, Job and Melchisedech, before the Mosaic law, offered to God real sacrifices. That law did but ascertain the quality, the number, and other circumstances of sacrifices. Before that, they offered fruits of the earth, the fat, or the milk, of animals; the fleeces of sheep; or the blood, and the flesh, of victims. Every one pursued his own mode of acknowledgment, his zeal, or his devotion: but among the Jews, the law appointed what they were to offer, and in what quantities. Before the law, every one was priest and minister of his own sacrifice; at least, he was at liberty to choose what priest he pleased, should offer his victim. Generally, this honour belonged to the most ancient, or the head of a family, to princes, or to men of the greatest virtue and integrity. But after Moses, this was, among the Jews, confined to the family of Aaron.

It is disputed, whether, at first, there were any other sacrifices than burnt-offerings; or other other, appear in Scripture. The Talmudists assure us, that Abel offered only holocausts, consuming the flesh of the victim by fire; because it was not allowed to eat it. Grotius is of opinion, that this patriarch did not offer a bloody sacrifice. The text of Moses informs us, Gen. iv. 4. מִבְּכֹרֹת צֹאנוּ וּמִחֶלְבֶת, that he offered "of the firstlings of his flocks, and of the fat thereof." But Grotius thought the Hebrew might be translated "of the first-fruits, and the milk."—We are told, that the ancients offered to God only fruits of the earth, herbs, flowers, honey, milk, wheat, wool:

Lacte mero veteres usi narrantur, et herbis,
Sponte sua si quas terra ferebat.

OVID. Fast. lib. iv.

We are told by Servius, on Æneid. xii. (Vide Solin. Polyhistor. cap. 11.) that the ancients put no fire to sacrifices, but obtained it by their prayers; and most of the fathers think, it was thus God accepted the sacrifice of Abel: he consumed it, say they, by fire from heaven; which favour was not vouchsafed to Cain's sacrifice. In the same manner he consumed the sacrifices offered at Aaron's consecration, those offered by Gideon, those offered by Solomon at the dedication of his temple, those of Elijah on Mount Carmel, and those offered by the Maccabees at restoring the worship of the temple, after the profanation by Antiochus Epiphanes.

The Hebrews had properly but three sorts of sacrifices, 1. the burnt-offering, or holocaust; 2. the sacrifice for sin, or sacrifice of expiation; 3. the pacific sacrifice, or sacrifice of thanksgiving. Beside these, were several kinds of offerings, of corn, of meal, of cakes, of wine, of fruits; and one manner of sacrificing, which has no relation to any now mentioned, i. e. the setting at liberty one of the two sparrows offered for the purification of leprous persons, Lev. xiv. 4, 5, &c. also the scape-goat; which was taken to a distant and steep place, from whence it was thrown, Levit. xvi. 10, 26. These animals, thus left to themselves, were esteemed victims of expiation, loaded with the sins of those who offered them.

The holocaust was offered and burnt up, on the altar of burnt-offerings, without any reserve to the person who gave the victim, or to the priest who killed and sacrificed it; only the priest had the skin: for, before the sacrifices were offered to the Lord, their skins were flayed off, and their feet and entrails were washed. Philo de Premiis Sacerdot. also Levit. vii. 8. See HOLocaust, and Lev. i.

The sacrifice for sin, or for expiation, or the purification of a man who had fallen into any offence against the law, was not entirely consumed on the fire of the altar. No part of it returned to him who had given it, but the sacrificing priest had a share of it. If it were the high-priest who had offended through ignorance, he offered a calf without blemish: he brought it to the door of the tabernacle, put his hand on the head of the sacrifice, confessed his sin, asked pardon for it, killed the calf, &c. Vide Lev. chap. iv. v.

If it were the whole people which had offended, they were to offer a calf, in like manner.—The elders shall bring it to the altar of the tabernacle, shall put their hands upon its head, confess their offence, &c.

If it be a prince of the people, who had offended, he shall offer a goat, shall bring it to the door of the tabernacle, shall put his hands upon its head, shall confess his sin, &c. I believe, that though Moses orders a goat, it is understood, that they might offer a ram. See Levit. vii. 1, 2, 3, 4. and compare Levit. v. 6, 7.

If it be a private person who has committed an offence, he shall make an offering of a sheep, or a she-goat without blemish, shall present it to the priest at the door of the tabernacle, shall put his hands upon the head of the sacrifice.—The priest shall sacrifice it, &c. See Levit. chap. iv. v.

But if he is not of ability to offer a sheep, or a she-goat, he shall offer two turtles, or two young pigeons; one for his sin, the other for a burnt-offering. That which is for the burnt-offering, shall be entirely consumed on the fire of the altar. That which is to be offered for his sin, shall be presented to the priest, who shall kill it, &c.

If the person was extremely poor, he might offer the tenth part of an ephah of meal, i. e. a little more than a gallon of meal, without oil or spice. He presented it to the priest, who took a handful of it, and threw it on the fire; the rest was for himself. For other circumstances belonging to this subject, see Leviticus, v. 15, 16. vi. 1, 2, 3. concerning the faults in which, besides the sin-offering and sacrifice of expiation, there is a kind of amends to be made, or obligation of restitution to the Lord, or to the persons offended, according to the nature of the offence: for as to the rest, the ceremonies were always the same.

As to the sacrifice for sin, when a ram was offered, his rump, or tail, was burnt also, which was very fat, along with the rest of the fat. But if it was a goat, the fat only was burnt. Levit. vii. 2, 3. Vide RUMP, also FRAGMENTS, No. CX. and PLATE of SYRIAN ANIMALS.

The peace-offering was offered, to return thanks thanks to God for benefits; or, to solicit favours from him; or, to satisfy private devotion; or, simply, for the honour of God. The Israelites offered this when they pleased, and no law obliged them to it. They were free to choose what animal they would, among such as were allowed to be sacrificed. No distinction was observed, of age, or sex, of the victim, as in the burnt sacrifices, and the sacrifices for sin. Levit. iii. The law only required, that the victim should be without blemish. He who presented it came to the door of the tabernacle, put his hand on the head of the victim, and killed it.—The priest poured out the blood about the altar of burnt sacrifices; he burnt on the fire of the altar the fat of the lower belly, that which covers the kidneys, the liver, and the bowels. And if it were a lamb, or a ram, he added to it the rump of the animal, which, in that country, is very fat.

Before these things were committed to the fire of the altar, the priest put them into the hands of the offerer, then made him lift them up on high, and wave them toward the four quarters of the world, the priest supporting and directing his hands. The breast and the right shoulder of the sacrifice belonged to the priest that performed the service; and it appears, that each of them were put into the hands of him who offered them; though Moses mentions only the breast of the animal. After this, all the rest of the sacrifice belonged to him who presented it, and he might eat it with his family and friends, at his pleasure. Lev. viii. 30, 31, &c.

The sacrifices or offerings of meal, or liquors, which were offered for sin, were in favour of the poorer sort, who could not afford to sacrifice an ox, or goat, or sheep, Levit. vi. 14, 15, &c.—They contented themselves with offering meal or flour, sprinkled with oil, with spice (or frankincense) over it. And the priest taking a handful of this flour, with all the frankincense, sprinkled them on the fire of the altar; and all the rest of the flour was his own: he was to eat it without leaven in the tabernacle, and none but priests were to partake of it.—As to other offerings, fruits, wine, meal, wafers, or any thing else, the priest always cast a part on the altar, the rest belonged to him, and the other priests. These offerings were always accompanied with salt and wine, but without leaven. Levit. ii.

Sacrifices, in which they set at liberty a bird, or a goat, were not properly sacrifices; because, there was no shedding of blood, and the victim remained alive: E. gr. the sparrow offered for the purification of a leper, or of a house spotted with leprosy, Levit. xiv. A couple of sparrows were presented to the priest, or two clean birds, with a bundle of hyssop, tied with a scarlet string. The priest killed one of the birds over running water, which was in a clean and new earthen vessel; afterwards, tying the living sparrow to the bundle of cedar and hyssop, with the tail turned towards the handle of the vessel, he plunged it in the water mingled with the blood of the first sparrow; sprinkled the leper, or the house, with it, and then set the living sparrow at liberty, to go where it pleased.

The other animal set at liberty was a goat; on the day of solemn expiation. The Israelites presented to the high-priest at the door of the tabernacle, two goats for a sin-offering. The high-priest cast lots on them, which should be sacrificed to the Lord, and which should be set at liberty, or be the scape-goat, the Azazel, as the Hebrews call it. That which was determined by lot to be sacrificed was slain, and offered for the sins of the people. That which was to be set at liberty, was brought alive before the Lord. The high-priest said over him certain prayers, laid both his hands on his head, confessed the sins of the whole congregation, loaded therewith the head of the goat, with corresponding imprecations, then sent him into the wilderness by a man appointed to that office. See AZAZEL, and SCAPE-GOAT.

Sacrifices of birds, were offered on three occasions. First, for sin, when the person offering was not rich enough to provide an animal for a victim, Levit. v. 7, 8. Secondly, for purification of a woman after her lying-in, Levit. xii. 6, 7. When she could offer a lamb and a young pigeon, she gave both; the lamb for a burnt-offering, the pigeon for a sin-offering. But if she was not able to offer a lamb, she gave a pair of turtles, or a pair of young pigeons; one for a burnt-offering, the other for a sin-offering. Thirdly, they offered two sparrows for those who were purified from the leprosy: one was a burnt-offering, the other was a scape-sparrow, as above. Levit. xiv. 4, &c. 49, 50, 51.

The perpetual sacrifice, called in Hebrew תמיד thamid: the Lord had appointed, Exod. xxix. 38, 39, 40. Numb. xxviii. 3. a daily offering of two lambs on the altar of burnt-offerings; one in the morning, the other in the evening. They were burnt as holocausts, but by a small fire, that they might continue burning the longer. The lamb of the morning was offered about sun-rise, after the incense was burnt on the golden altar, and before any other sacrifice. That in the evening was offered between the two evenings, i. e. at the decline of day, and before night. With each of these victims was offered fered half a pint of wine, half a pint of the purest oil, and an assarou, or about three pints, of the finest flour.

Such were the sacrifices of the Hebrews: sacrifices, indeed, very imperfect, and altogether incapable, of themselves, to purify the soul! St. Paul has described the sacrifices, and other ceremonies of the law, "as weak and beggarly elements," Gal. iv. 9. They represented grace and purity, but they did not communicate it, says St. Austin. They convinced the sinner of the necessity to purify himself, and make satisfaction to God; but they did not impart holiness to him. Sacrifices were only prophecies and figures of the true sacrifice, which eminently includes all their virtues and qualities; being, at the same time, a holocaust, a sacrifice for sin, and a sacrifice of thanksgiving; containing the whole substance and efficacy, of which the ancient sacrifices were only representations. The paschal lamb, the daily burnt-offerings, the offerings of flour and wine, and all other oblations, of whatever nature, promised and represented the death of Jesus Christ.

The sacrifice of a humble and contrite heart, is that, which, on our part, constitutes the whole merit of all we can offer to God. Psalm li. 17. "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise." The Jews, without these dispositions, could not offer any offering agreeable to God; and God often explains himself on this matter, in the prophets. Psalm xl. 6. Isaiah i. 11, 12, 13, 14. Jer. xxxv. 15. Amos v. 21, 22. Hos. xiv. 2, 3, 4. Joel ii. 12, 13, &c. Psalm. li. 16.

Human sacrifices. The natural notion common to mankind, that whatever we most value, must be offered to God, has prevailed on several nations, so far, as to induce them to offer human sacrifices. It is not agreed, who first introduced this custom. Some ascribe it to Ilus, or Saturn, who, they say, practised it among the Phœnicians. He offered up to the gods his own son Jehoud, whom he had by the nymph Anabreth. Sanchoniat. apud Euseb. Præparat. lib. iv. cap. 16. Philo insinuates, lib. de Abraham, that the custom of offering such sacrifices was known in Canaan before Abraham; and some learned men think, that the example of these people abated much of that horror Abraham would otherwise have had, at the intention of sacrificing his own son. Marsham, Canon. Egypti. Chronol. Le Clerc in Gen. xxii. 2. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CLVI.

But it is much more probable, that Abraham was the first who attempted to sacrifice his own son; and that his example misunderstood, and ill applied, gave rise to this custom. Philo does not deny indeed, that human sacrifices might be offered in Palestine before Abraham; but he maintains, that this patriarch had no intention to imitate these people; whose manners and idolatry he abhorred. What motive could prompt him to this action? Was it fear, hope, vanity, ostentation, desire of praise, or of riches? — Isaac was every thing to him.

Human sacrifices were customary in Palestine, Africa, Gaul, and almost all the world over; it must be owned too, they were very ancient, and that men really were sacrificed to their false gods. I know, some learned men have thought, that among the Canaanites and Moabites, they contented themselves with making their children pass through the flames, or between two fires, which they called, lustrare per ignem; and I doubt not, but sometimes they did so. But often they really consumed them in the flames.

Moses, Lev. xviii. 21. forbids making children to pass through the fire in honour of Moloch: some understand this of a lustration only, like what is mentioned in profane authors,

Moxque per ardentis stipulæ crepitantis acervos,
Trajicias coleri strenua membra pede;
Omnia purgat edax ignis.

OVID. Fast. lib. iv.

Besides, the Scripture mentions a son of king Ahaz, who had been offered to Moloch, and yet reigned after his father. 2 Kings xvi. 3. compared with 2 Kings xviii. 1.

But, there are many other evidences, that children were burned in honour of false gods. Thus Levit. xx. 1, 2, 3. "Whosoever he be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn in Israel, that giveth any of his seed to Moloch; he shall surely be put to death, the people of the land shall stone him with stones. And I will set my face against that man, and will cut him off from among his people: because he hath given of his seed unto Moloch, to defile my sanctuary, and to profane my holy name. And if the people of the land do any ways hide their eyes from the man, when he giveth of his seed unto Moloch, and kill him not, then I will set my face against that man, and against his family, and will cut him off, and all that go a whoring after him, to commit whoredom with Moloch, from among their people." Moses repeats these prohibitions, Deut. xviii. 10. And it appears from Amos v. 26. that notwithstanding these prohibitions, the people did not forbear, even in the desert, to carry with them a tent consecrated to Moloch.

It is beyond all doubt, that the Canaanites put their children to death in honour of their gods, Psalm cvi. 37. Jer. xix. 5. says, "They have built also the high places of Baal, to burn their sons with fire, for burnt-offerings unto Baal." See also chap. xxxii. 35. For these crimes God drove out the Canaanites. See Deut. xviii. 10, 12. Wisdom xii. 5.

The Phœnicians, a remnant of the Canaanites, continued this barbarous custom, which they justified by the example of Ilus or Saturn, as above: they carried this custom with their colonies into Africa, where it long continued.—When Gelo, king of Sicily, conquered the Carthaginians, by the treaty he made with them, he obliged them to renounce this custom of sacrificing their children to Saturn. Plutarch Apop. Justin, lib. xviii. assures us, that Darius imposed the same commands on them by an embassy; to leave off human sacrifices. Notwithstanding this, they continued these practices till the proconsulate of Tiberius, who caused the priests of Saturn to be hanged on trees around their temples. Tertull. Apologet. Diodorus Siculus, apud Euseb. Præpar. lib. iv. cap. 16. gives a description of Saturn, as adored by the Carthaginians: the figure was of brass; the hands of which were turned backward, and bending toward the ground; so that when they put upon his arms a child, to be consecrated to him, he immediately fell into a pan of burning coals beneath; and died miserably at the foot of the statue.

It would be to little purpose to assemble examples of human victims. Porphyry assures us, that the book of Sanchoniathon was full of them. These sacrifices were frequent, not only in Phœnicia, in Palestine, in the countries of Ammon and Moab, in Idumea, in Arabia, and in Egypt, but also in Gaul, among the Scythians, the Thracians, in the islands of Rhodes, Chios and Cyprus; even among the Athenians; and finally, also in America. Porphy. de Abstin. lib. ii. p. 202, et seq.

As to what is affirmed, that Ahaz had the same son for his successor, whom he had caused to pass through the fire in honour to Moloch, no proof can be given of this. It is true, his successor was Hezekiah; but he might have had several other sons. We know another of his sons, whose name was Maaseiah, who was put to death at the command of the king of Israel, 2 Chron. xxviii. 7. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. LI.

[The reader will recollect; that human sacrifices were common in the new world as well as in the old. They were offered in Mexico, before the conquest by the Spaniards; and Capt. Cooke found them in Otaheite, and others of the South Sea Islands. In some places the victims were selected before hand, were fed on delicate food, and were fattened for the slaughter; in others, they were chosen by the momentary impulse of the priest, and were killed directly. On the whole, we may say this horrid rite was practised in all parts of the world, by sage and savage. The river Ganges receives yearly many human sacrifices, and the burning of widows on the funeral piles of their husbands, throughout India, is nothing else.]

SACRILEGE. The action of prophaning holy things; or, of committing outrage against holy things, or holy persons. Theft, or abuse, or profanation of sacred things, is sacrilege. Scripture gives the name of sacrilege to idolatry, and to other crimes which more directly insult the Deity. Also, he is called sacrilegious, who commits an impiety, a profanation of holy things; who usurps sacred offices; who approaches the sacraments unworthily; who plunders or pillages things dedicated to God, &c.

SADOC, Σαδὼκ. See ZADOK.

I. SADOC, son of Azor, and father of Achim, ancestor of Jesus Christ. Matt. i. 14.

II. SADOC, founder of the sect of the Sadducees: this is said by almost all who have treated of this sect; but they inform us little concerning his person. It is said, Sadoc succeeded Antigonus Socchæus, as a disciple succeeds his master, in the tradition of his doctrine; which Antigonus had succeeded Simon the Just, the high-priest. Vide Bartholocci, Bibliot. Rabinnic. tom. i. p. 376. Alios in Thisbi. Author Cozri, Pirke-uvoch. Alios plures. But, Simon the Just died A. M. 3711, ante A. D. 293. So that Sadoc may have lived about A. M. 3740.

Antigonus, master to Sadoc, who was, it is thought, the head of a sect, from excess of spirituality, taught, that we must give to the Lord, a pure and disinterested worship. His disciple Sadoc unable to conform to such disinterested morality, yet unwilling to abandon his master, gave his maxim a quite contrary turn: inferring, that there was no recompence to be hoped for, nor punishment to be feared, after this life; and that good was to be done, and evil to be avoided, without any view either to hope or fear.

Some Rabbins make Sadoc a disciple of Dositheus, and pretend that he withdrew to Samaria; that he made a schism from the other Jews, and worshipped on Mount Gerizim. Vide Epiphan. Hæres. xiv. But this sentiment cannot be supported, since Dositheus the Samaritan lived long after Sadoc, and after Jesus Christ. Others say, that Alexander the Great having permitted the Samaritans to build a temple on mount Gerizim, Sadoc, Boethus, and several other prevaricating Jews, worshipped on Gerizim, and thus separated themselves from Simon the Just, and Antigonus Socchæus, who continued continued steadfast to the temple at Jerusalem. Origen, in Matt. tract. 27. Rab. Abraham Levi, in Cabbala Historica. Lastly, some, without referring to Sadoc at all, think that the word Sadducees comes from the Hebrew Sedec, which signifies justice; and that the sect assumed this name to distinguish themselves; being desirous to pass for great lovers of justice. Epiphanius, Hæres. xv. Jerom in Mat. xxii. Tostat. et Jun. ibidem. Josephus observes, de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 12. that they were very severe in punishing faults.

SADDUCEES, Σαδδουκαῖοι, just, or justified.

SADDUCEES, disciples of Sadoc. They constituted one of the four principal sects of the Jews. They were chiefly distinguished, by their opinion concerning angels, and spirits. They did not deny that man had a reasonable soul; but they maintained that this soul was mortal, Joseph. de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 12; and, by a necessary consequence, they denied the rewards and punishments of another life. They pretended also, that the existence of angels, and a bodily resurrection, are illusions. Acts xxiii. 8. Matt. xxii. 23. Mark xii. 18. Luke xx. 27. Epiphanius, Hær. xiv. and after him St. Austin, Serm. 70. de Verbis Domini, cap. 3. n. 5. advance, that they denied the Holy Ghost. But neither Josephus, nor the evangelists, accuse them of this error. It has been also imputed to them, that they thought God to be corporeal; and that they did not receive the prophets.

It is difficult to conceive how they could deny the existence of angels, yet receive the books of Moses, where frequent mention is made of angels, and of their appearance. The ancients do not acquaint us how they solved this difficulty. It is likely they considered angels, not as individual beings, and subsisting of themselves, but as powers, emanations, or qualities inseparable from the Deity, much as the sun-beams are inseparable from the sun. [This was the opinion of some Jews in the time of Justin. Dialog. cum Tryphone. p. 358. See Grotius on Matth. xxii. 23. and Le Clerc on Acts xxiii. 8.] Or perhaps they held angels to be mortal; as they thought human spirits to be.

[It is very likely that when the Sadducees are charged with denying the existence of angels, we misapply the term; intending by it celestial angels, whereas they meant it of disembodied human spirits. This accounts easily for their reception of the Pentateuch, in which appearances of celestial angels are recorded; and for our Lord's reference to the continued existence of the human spirits of Abraham, &c. His argument is—"the Deity declares himself God of Abraham—therefore, Abraham continues to exist—i. e. in a state of spiritual, separate existence; for, if he were entirely dead, the Deity would be God of a non-existence; which is absurd." The Sadducees were constantly in opposition to the Pharisees, though they could agree when measures important to both were to be taken. For what might be said further, see the Addition to the Article PHARISEES.]

As the Sadducees acknowledged neither punishment nor recompence in another life, they were inexorable in chastising the wicked. Joseph. de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 22. They observed the law themselves, and caused it to be observed by others, with the utmost rigour. They admitted none of the traditions, explications, or modifications of the Pharisees; they kept only to the text of the law; and maintained, that only what was written was to be observed. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 18.

The Sadducees are accused of rejecting all the books of Scripture, except those of Moses; vide Serræ. Trihæres. cap. 21. n. 1. Elian, in Thisbe. Origen, in Matth. tract. 21. Tertul. Præscript. cap. 49. Jerom, in Matth. cap. 22. and to support this opinion it is observed, that our Saviour uses no Scripture against them, but passages out of the Pentateuch. But Scaliger, Elenchus Trihæres. cap. 16. produces good proofs to vindicate them from this. He observes, that they did not appear in Israel till after the number of the holy books was fixed, and that if they had been to choose out of the Canon, the Pentateuch was less favourable to them than any other book; since it often mentions angels and their appearance. Besides, the Sadducees were present in the temple, and at other religious assemblies, where the books of the prophets were read, as well as those of Moses. They held the chief stations of the nation; and many of the priests were Sadducees. Would the Jews have suffered in these employments persons who rejected the greater part of their Scriptures? Manasseh-ben-Israel, de Resurrect. mort. lib. i. cap. 6. says expressly, that indeed they did not reject the prophets; but that they explained them in a sense very different from that of the other Jews.

Josephus assures us, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 9. that they denied destiny, or fate; alleging, that these were only sounds void of sense, and that all the good, or evil, we experience, is in consequence of the good or evil side we have taken, by our free choice: that God was far from doing or from knowing evil; and that man was absolute master of his own actions. This was roundly to deny a Providence, and, on this footing, I know not what could be the religion of the Sadducees; or what influence over terrestrial things they could ascribe to God. However, as it is certain they were not only tolerated, but were admitted to the high-priesthood itself, this shews the then state of religion among the Jews.

John Hyrcanus, high-priest of the nation, separated himself in a signal manner from the sect of the Pharisees, and went over to that of Sadoc. It is said also, Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 18. he strictly commanded all Jews, on pain of death, to receive the maxims of this sect. Aristobulus and Alexander Jannæus, son of Hyrcanus continued to favour the Sadducees. Abraham-ben-dior, Cabbala, and Maimonides assure us, Halac. Sanhedrin, cap. 11. that under the reign of Alexander Jannæus, they possessed all the offices of the Sanhedrim, and that there remained on the party of the Pharisees, only Simon son of Secra. Caiaphas, who condemned Jesus Christ, was a Sadducee, Acts iv. 1. v. 17. as was Ananus the younger, who put to death St. James, brother of our Lord. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 88. p. 698. At this day, the Jews hold as heretics, that small number of Sadducees which are found among them. Vide Serrar. Trihaeres. Manasseh-ben-Israel, lib. i. de Resurrectione mortuorum; Basnage's History of the Jews, lib. iii. cap. 5, 14, &c.

The sect of the Sadducees is not extinguished; it was much reduced by the destruction of Jerusalem, and by the dispersion of the Jews; but it revived afterwards. At the beginning of the third century it was so formidable in Egypt, that Ammonius, Origen's master, thought himself obliged to write against them; or rather against the Jews who tolerated the Sadducees, though they denied the fundamental points of their religion. The emperor Justinian mentions the Sadducees in one of his edicts, banishes them out of his dominions, and condemns them to the severest punishments, as people that maintained atheistical and impious tenets; denying the resurrection, and the last judgment.

Annas, or Ananus, a disciple of Juda, son of Nachman, a famous Rabbin, about A. D. 755, declared himself, it is said, in favour of the Sadducees, and strenuously protected them against their adversaries. They had also a celebrated defender in the twelfth century, in the person of Alpharagius, a Spanish Rabbi. Ganz, Tzemach David. p. 125. This doctor wrote against the Pharisees, the declared enemies of the Sadducees; and maintained that the purity of Judaism was only found among the Sadducees; that the traditions avowed by the Pharisees were useless, and that the ceremonies which they had multiplied without end, were insupportable. Rabbi Abraham-ben-David Itallari replied to Alpharagius, and supported the cause of the Pharisees by two great arguments; that of their universality, and that of their antiquity. He proved their antiquity, by a continued succession from Adam down to A. D. 1167; and their universality, because the Pharisees are spread all the world over, and are in all the synagogues.

There are still Sadducees in Africa, and other places, who deny the immortality of the soul, and the resurrection of the body; but few declare themselves for these opinions. Some have confounded the Sadducees with such as hold the metempsychosis, and with the defenders of the two principles, i. e. the Manichees; but it is certain these sects are different from the Sadducees.

SAFFRON, Crocus; Heb. כרכום, carcos. LXX. Κρόκος, or corcos. A well-known flower: of a blue colour, in the midst of which are small yellow threads, of a very agreeable smell. Solomon, Cant. iv. 14. joins it with other aromatics: nardus et crocus, et fistula, &c. Jeremiah speaks of cloths of a saffron colour. Lament. iv. 5. האמנים עלי תולע, but this passage rather signifies purple or crimson.

SAGAN. סגן, deputy. (The Rabbins call him אב בית הדין, Ab-heth-din, Father of the house of judgment.) The Hebrews thus call the deputy of the high-priest, who supplied his office, and performed its functions, in the absence of the high-priest; or when accident had disabled him from officiating in person; of which we have examples in Josephus. The Jews think this office of Sagan was very ancient. They hold that Moses was Sagan to Aaron. I do not find the word Sagan in this sense in Scripture, but it is frequent in the Rabbins. Vide Selden, de Synedriis, lib. iii. cap. 8. et Authores de Repub. Hebræor.

Sagan is also put for princes, or the chief officers of a kingdom; and it often occurs in this sense, in Ezra, Nehemiah, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel. Sagan is rather Chaldee than Hebrew, and it is very likely that the Hebrews learned it from the Chaldees, to express princes, and great courtiers; magistrates, and men in power, not only among the Babylonians, but also among the Hebrews. Jerom generally translates this word by magistrates, and the LXX. by satraps, princes, nobles, governors.

SAINT, sanctity, to sanctify, &c. These words are used in different senses in Scripture. Vide SANCTIFY, and HOLY, Add.

1. Saint signifies pure, free from defilement and sin, which render a man unfit for approaching holy things. To sanctify, signifies to purify, to put one's self in a condition to appear before the Lord, and to partake of holy things, Exod. xix. 22. "And let the priests also which come come near to the Lord, sanctify themselves, lest the Lord break forth upon them." And verses 10, 11. "And the Lord said unto Moses, Go unto the people, and sanctify them to-day and to-morrow, and let them wash their clothes, and be ready against the third day, to receive the law." Job i. 5. "Job sent and sanctified his children."

2. To sanctify, is put for appointing to any holy use. Gen. ii. 3. "God sanctified the seventh day." Exod. xiii. 2. "He sanctified all the first-born." Chap. xix. 23. "Set bounds about the mount, and sanctify it." Chap. xxviii. 41. "Sanctify them, that they may minister unto me in the priest's office." There were in the temple at Jerusalem, many rich spoils that David and his successors had sanctified to the Lord.

3. To sanctify, is sometimes put for preparation for an action, that does not require extraordinary holiness, Numb. xi. 18. "Sanctify yourselves against to-morrow, and ye shall eat flesh." Josh. iii. 5. "And Joshua said unto the people, sanctify yourselves, for to-morrow the Lord will do wonders among you." Joel ii. 15, 16. "Blow the trumpet in Sion, sanctify a fast, call a solemn assembly, gather the people, sanctify the congregation," i. e. prepare it, or publish a fast, a congregation.

4. Saint, sanctity, sanctification. These epithets in a sovereign manner are ascribed to God, the author of all sanctity and holiness. So cherubim and seraphim cry to him incessantly, "Holy, Holy, Holy." Isaiah vi. 3. He is eminently "the Holy One of Israel," Isaiah x. 20. 2 Kings xix. 22. et alibi passim. All our holiness is before him nothing but pollution, his name is HOLY, THE saint, or rather SANCTITY, itself. We sanctify and hallow his name, and we pray that his name be hallowed, when we praise him, when we acknowledge his Majesty, when we worship him, and when we endeavour to make him known, adored, praised, and beloved, by all who are capable of it.

5. The saint, the sanctum, the holy place, expresses that particular part of the temple, which was between the porch and the sanctuary; in which were the golden candlestick, the altar of incense, and the table of shew-bread.

6. The sanctum, or sancta, is taken for the whole temple, or for heaven. Psalm xx. 6. "He will hear him from his holy heaven." Psalm cii. 19. "For he hath looked down from the height of his sanctuary; from heaven did the Lord behold the earth." Psalm cl. 1. "Praise God in his sanctuary, praise him in the firmament of his power."

7. The Sanctum Sanctorum, Holy of Holies, or the Sanctuary, signifies the most inward and sacred part of the temple, where was the ark of the covenant;—here nobody entered but the high-priest, and that only once a year, on the day of solemn expiation.

8. Saints, is sometimes put for the people of Israel; sometimes for Christians. The faction of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, said to Moses and Aaron; Numb. xvi. 3. "Ye take too much upon you, seeing all the congregation are holy (or saints) every one of them, and the Lord is among them." And in several places of Scripture, the Hebrews are called a holy nation. "Ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation," Exod. xix. 6. 1 Pet. ii. 9. Deut. vii. 6. xiv. 2, 21. Nothing is more frequent in St. Paul, than the name of saints given to Christians. Rom. i. 7. viii. 27, 28. xii. 13. xv. 25, 32. xvi. 2, &c.

[But, it is probably, never given to any, after the promulgation of the Gospel, who had not been baptized. In this acceptation it continued, during the early ages of Christianity; nor was it applied to individuals declared to be saints by any other act of the church, till various corruptions had depraved the primitive principles.—The Church of Rome assumes the power of making saints, or of beatification; i. e. of announcing certain departed spirits as objects of worship, and from which the faithful may solicit favours. A notion worthy of the dark ages in which it originated.]

9. Saints stands for the priests of the Lord. Numb. xvi. 5, 7. "Even to-morrow the Lord will shew who are his, and who is holy; and will cause him to come near unto him, even him whom he hath chosen, will he cause to come near unto him." Aaron is called in Deuteronomy, the holy one, or the saint of God. Deut. xxxiii. 8. "Let thy thummim and thy urim be with thy holy one." And in Psalm cvi. 16. "They envied Moses also in the camp, and Aaron the saint of the Lord."

10. Saints signifies in particular, good men, and the servants of God. Prov. ix. 10. "The knowledge of the holy (or saints) is understanding." Prov. xxx. 3. "I neither learned wisdom, nor have the knowledge of the holy, or saints." Psalm xxxiv. 9. "O fear the Lord, ye his saints, for there is no want to them that fear him." Psalm xvi. 2, 3. "My goodness extendeth not to thee, but to the saints that are in the earth, and to the excellent, in whom is all my delight."

11. Saints is often put for angels. Job v. 1. "To which of the saints wilt thou turn?—[Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DII.]—"And Behold he putteth no trust in his saints, yea, the heavens heavens are not clean in his sight." Job iv. 17, 18. "Shall mortal man be more just than God? Shall a man be more pure than his maker? Behold, he put no trust in his servants, and his angels he charged with folly." Daniel says, iv. 13, 23. "An holy one (or saint) came down from heaven." And Moses, Deut. xxxiii. 2, 3. "The Lord shined forth from mount Paran, and came with ten thousands of saints."

12. Saints and saintesses. The Hebrews give these names, by way of Antiphrasis, to men and women who prostituted themselves in honour (as they thought) of some prophane deity, according to the blind and polluted notions of their false religion. Moses says, Deut. xxiii. 17. לא תהיה קדשה ולא יהיה קדש, "There shall be no whore of the daughters of Israel, nor a sodomite of the sons of Israel." Literally, there shall be no saintess, and no saint. See 1 Kings xiv. 24. xv. 12. xxii. 46. 2 Kings xxiii. 7. Job xxxvi. 14. Hosea iv. 14. [Separated persons, i. e. to the idol; which is the import of kadesh, saint, in this acceptation.]

SALAH, שָׁלַח, Σαλᾶ, mission, sending: otherwise, branches, or dart; from שָׁלַח shalach: according to the Syriac, that spoils, or is spoiled.

SALAH, or SALEH, son of Cainan, and grandson of Arphaxad; rather, by leaving out Cainan, who is not in the Hebrew copies, Salah was born in the thirty-fifth year of his father Arphaxad, A. M. 1693. He begat Eber at thirty years old, A. M. 1723. He died aged 433 years, A. M. 2126, ante A. D. 1878. Gen. xi. 12, &c.

The Orientals have preserved several traditions concerning Salah; but, we read in some Arabian Authors, that this Salah, is more modern than Salah son of Arphaxad.

SALAMIS, Σαλαμίς, Acts xiii. 5. shaken, tost, beaten; from σαλεύω, I beat, I toss.

SALAMIS, a city of the isle of Cyprus. St. Paul came hither with Barnabas, A. D. 44, and here converted Sergius Paulus, Acts xiii. 5. Salamus is now called Famagousta. The body of Barnabas was found here, A. D. 488. He was a native of Cyprus. See BARNABAS.

SALAMPSO, daughter of Herod the Great, and of Marianne the Asmonean. Salampso was first contracted to Pheroras; afterwards she married Phazael, her cousin-german, son of Phazael, her uncle by the father's side, by whom she had three sons, Antipater, Herod, and Alexander; and two daughters, Alexandra and Cyprus. [Vide the PLATE of HEROD'S GENEALOGY.]

SALATHIEL, שָׁלְתִּיאל, I have asked of God, or loan of God; from שָׁאָל shaal. Ezra iii. 2. [Shealtiel, English translation.]

I. SALATHIEL, son of Jeconiah, and father of Zerubbabel, 1 Chron. iii. 17. He died at Babylon during the captivity. Salathiel was also son of Neri, according to Luke, iii. 27. He descended from Solomon by Rehoboam, according to Matthew, i. 12; and from Solomon by Nathan, according to Luke. In Salathiel were united the two branches of this illustrious genealogy; so that Salathiel was son to Jeconiah, according to the flesh, as appears from the Chronicles, which say, that Jeconiah had two sons, Assir and Salathiel, at Babylon. And he might be son of Neri by adoption, or by having married the heiress of Neri's family; or, as issue of the widow of Neri, he being dead without children. In either of these cases he would be son of Neri according to the law. Luke does not tell us in what sense he was son to Neri. Vide FRAGS. Nos. CCCXXXVI. CCCXXXVII.

The Jews pretend, that Salathiel was titular prince of the Jews, during the captivity. That he had successors, of the house of David, called Princes of the Captivity, who were appointed by the kings of the country. They give us a succession of them for several ages; and some Jewish authors maintain, that the heads of the captivity are still in being beyond the Euphrates. Vide Selden, de Synedriis, lib. ii. cap. 7. § 5. Jacob Altung. Shilo, lib. i. cap. 3. All this is in answer to our objection, derived from the prophecy of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 10. that a law-giver should not depart from between the feet of Judah, till the coming of the Messiah. They answer that the sceptre and the law-giver are still in being among them, in the persons of these princes of the captivity.

II. SALATHIEL, of Reuben, son of Simeon; ancestor of Judith. Judith viii. 1. Vulg.

SALCHAH, שָׁלַח, your basket: from שָׁלַח salal: otherwise, that treads you under foot, or thy treading under foot; from שָׁלַח salah, and the pronoun כָּ ka, thee, you.

[A place strongly bound, or well protected.—But Simon conjectures a metathesis for Sace-lah, hope, strong fidelity.]

SALCHAN, SALECHA, or SALCHA, a city of the kingdom of Og, in the country of Bashan, beyond Jordan, toward the northern extremity of the portion of Manasseh, Deut. iii. 10. 1 Chr. v. 11. Josh. xii. 5. xiii. 11.

SALEM, שָׁלֵם, Σαλήμ, complete, perfect; from שָׁלַם shalam: LXX. peace; from shalam.

I. SALEM. This name is given to Jerusalem, Psalm lxxvi. 2. "In Salem also is his tabernacle, and his dwelling place in Zion." The Vulgate reads, Factus est in pace locus ejus. But the Hebrew requires, Factus est in Salem locus ejus. The common opinion is, that Melchisedech, dech, king of Salem, was king of Jerusalem. Gen. xiv. 18. Hebr. vii. 1. 2.

II. SALEM, a city of the Shechemites, where Jacob arrived at his return from Mesopotamia, Gen. xxxiii. 18. Eusebius and Jerom notice this city; but some commentators translate the Hebrew, "Jacob came safe and sound to a city of Shechem." Shalem may signify, safe, in health, in peace, &c.

III. SALEM. Jerom says, (in Salem,) that there was a place near Jerusalem called Salem, westward.

IV. SALEM, otherwise, Salumias, in the country of Scythopolis, eight miles from this city. Jerom, ibid.

V. SALEM, or Salim, where John the Baptist baptized on the Jordan, John iii. 23. Manuscripts are very indifferent as to Salem, or Salim. [It is remarkable enough that no such place, distinguished by an abundance of water, can be discovered at this day: it probably was an assemblage of small streams, in which many persons might perform at the same time, their ablutions previous to baptism.]

VI. SALEM, the city where Melchisedech reigned. Jerom, the author of the Chronicon Paschal, p. 50, and M. Reland, Palæst. lib. iii. think this city was different from Jerusalem. Jerom places it in the territory of Scythopolis, where ruins were seen in his time, of what was said to have been the palace of Melchisedech.

VII. SALEM. The LXX. have sometimes called the city of Shilo by this name. See Jer. xli. 5. xlviii. 5.

[SALIM, vide SALEM V.]

SALIS, or SALLIS, a village of Idumea, whither the Jews retired who had been beaten by the Romans in the plains of Askalon. Joseph. de Bello, lib. iii. cap. 1.

SALISSA, שָׁלִישׁ, three, or the third; from שָׁלוֹשׁ shalosh: otherwise, prince, captain; from שָׁלִישׁ shalish. See BAAL-SHALISHA.

SALISSA, SALISA, BAAL-SALISA, or SHALISHA. Mention is made of Shalisha, 1 Sam. ix. 4. and of Baal-shalisha, 2 Kings iv. 42. It was fifteen miles from Diospolis, in the district of Thamnitica, north of Jerusalem. Eusebius and Jerom in Beth-shalisa.

SALLAI, שָׁלַי, Σηλοῖ, my rising, my way, my basket. Or Celai, of the race of the priests. Neh. xii. 20.

SALLU, שָׁלֹו, Σαλοῦ, σαλῶμ, basket; from שָׁלוֹם shalal: otherwise, contempt, or that treads under foot; from שָׁלוֹם salah: otherwise, elevation; from שָׁלוֹם massul. Or Salo, son of Meshullam, of Benjamin, 1 Chr. ix. 7.

SALMA, שָׁלֹו שָׁלֹו, the same as Salmon, habit; from שָׁלֹו shalmah, 1 Chron. ii. 11.

SALMON, שָׁלֹו, peaceable, perfect: or that rewards; from שָׁלוֹם shalam.

SALMON, SALMONA, or SALMA, son of Nashon; he married Rahab, by whom he had Boaz. A. M. 2553, ante A. D. 1451. 1 Chr. ii. 11, 51, 54. Ruth iv. 20, 21. Matth. i. 4. He is named "the father of Bethlehem;" i. e. his descendants peopled Bethlehem. [or, he greatly improved and adorned it; he was, as we say, "the making of that town:" or, he was the chief man—by office; the Abyssinian Shum of a town.]

SALMONE, or SALMONA, a city and seaport in the isle of Crete, Acts xxvii. 7.

SALOME, Σαλώμη, peaceable, perfect; or that rewards; from שָׁלוֹם shalam. [fem. of Solomon.]

I. SALOME, daughter of Antipater, and sister of Herod the Great; one of the wickedest of women. She first married Joseph, whom she accused of familiarities with Mariamne, wife of Herod. That suspicious prince put Joseph to death, without hearing his defence; having found, by the confession of Mariamne, that Joseph had discovered a secret to her, he inferred the rest. Salome afterwards married Costobarus; but being disgusted with him, she put him away; a licence till then unheard-of among the Jews, whose law (says Josephus) allows men to put away their wives, but does not allow women equal liberty. After this, she accused him of treason against Herod, who put him to death. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 9.

She caused much division and trouble in Herod's family, by her calumnies and mischievous informations; and she may be considered as the chief author of the death of the princes Alexander and Aristobulus, and of their mother Mariamne. Salome conceived a violent passion for an Arabian prince called Sillæus; whom she would have married, against her brother Herod's consent. She used to see him with so little caution, that every body was offended. And when Herod made her marry one Alexas, she still continued her inclination for Sillæus. Salome survived Herod, who left her, by will, the cities of Jamnia, Azoth, and Phasaelis, with 50,000 pieces of money. She favoured Antipas against Archelaus, and died A. D. 9, a little after Archelaus had been banished to Vienne in Dauphiny. A few days before Herod died, he ordered his sister Salome, and Alexas, that, directly as he was dead, they should slay the chief men of Judea, then shut up in Jericho, where he lay sick. But they sent them all away. Salome had five children by Alexas; Berenice, Antipater, Calleas; also a son and a daughter, a daughter, whose names are not mentioned. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 8.

II. SALOME, a daughter of Herod the Great and Elpide. She married one of the sons of Pheroras. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 1.

III. SALOME, the Dancer, daughter of Herodias, and of Herod-Philip. She first married Philip the tetrarch, her uncle; afterwards Aristobulus, son of Herod, king of Chalcis, by whom she had three sons, Herod, Agrippa, and Aristobulus. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 7.

When Herodias left Philip, her daughter Salome accompanied her. As John the Baptist exclaimed against the incestuous marriage of Herodias and Antipas, one day, when this prince was celebrating his birth-day, or the day of his inauguration, Salome came into the banqueting room, and danced before the king, and the nobles, his company. Antipas was so delighted, that he promised to give her whatever she should ask, even to the half of his kingdom. She said, Give me in a dish, the head of John the Baptist. The king sent immediately, and had the head of John the Baptist cut off, and given to Salome. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. L. CLXXXII.

Nicephorus, lib. i. cap. 20. and Metaphrastes relate that Salome accompanied her mother Herodias, and her father-in-law Herod, in their banishment to Vienne in Dauphiny; and that the emperor having obliged them to go into Spain, as she passed over a river that was frozen, the ice broke under her feet, and she sunk in up to her neck; when the ice uniting again, she remained thus suspended by it, and suffered the same punishment she had made John the Baptist undergo. But none of the ancients mention this; and it is contrary to Josephus; who tells us, she first married Philip the tetrarch, son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra, who died about A. D. 33 or 34; and afterwards Aristobulus, son of Herod king of Chalcis, her counsingerman, by whom she had several children. Thus she lived above thirty years after the exile of her father-in-law.

IV. SALOME, mother of the seven brethren Maccabees. The book called The Government of Reason, ascribed to Josephus, does not name her. The Greeks, in their calendar, call her Salome. Ben Gorion calls her Anne: others name her Maccabæa. Erasmus, in his Paraphrase on the Government of Reason, calls her Salome.

V. SALOME, wife of Zebedee, and mother of St. James Major, and St. John the Evangelist. One of those holy women who attended our Saviour in his journies, and ministered to him, Matt. xxvii. 56. She requested of Jesus, that her two sons, James and John, might sit one on his right hand, the other on his left hand, when he should possess his kingdom. Confer. Matt. xxvii. 56, cum. Mark xv. 40. But the Son of God answered, "Ye know not what ye ask; to sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared by my Father."

Salome gave a great proof of her faith, when she followed Jesus Christ to Calvary, and did not forsake him, even at the cross, Mark xv. 40. Matt. xxvii. 55, 56. She was also one of those holy women who brought perfumes to embalm him, and who came, for this purpose, to the sepulchre on Sunday morning early, Mark xvi. 1, 2. Entering into the tomb, they saw an angel, who informed them, that the Saviour was risen. Returning to Jerusalem, Jesus appeared to them on the way, and said to them, "Be not afraid; go tell my brethren, that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see me." This is what the Scripture informs us of Salome, the mother of the sons of Zebedee.

Some give her the name of Mary Salome; but there is no good proof of her being called Mary: and what some frivolous histories relate of the three Marys, Mary, the mother of Jesus, Mary, the mother of James, and Mary Salome, deserves no consideration. Others make her the daughter of Joseph. Epiphan. Hæres. lxxviii. cap. 8. Græci recent. Auctuar. Bibl. PP. 3. 481. 1. Menæ. 8. Maii. The Latin martyrologies place her feast October 22. The Roman martyrology fixes her death at Jerusalem: others say she died in Provence, and that her body is still there.

VI. SALOME, according to some, was the third husband of St. Anne. John Gerson, chancellor of Paris, quotes some verses, which describe him as father to the Salome last mentioned. Vide ANNA. But as this system of genealogy has no foundation in antiquity, we but little regard it.

SALT, Sal; in Greek ἅλς hals; in Hebrew, מֶלַח melach. God appointed salt to season all sacrifices that were offered to him, Lev. ii. 13. Jesus Christ alludes to this, when, speaking of the sufferings of the damned, he says, "Every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt," Mark ix. 49. See also Deut. xxix. 23. "The whole land thereof is brimstone, and salt, and burning."

[There is considerable difficulty in ascertaining the precise allusion of Mark ix. 49. The phrase "salted with fire," is (to us, at least) unusual, especially as it stands in our version. It is probable, that the καὶ should be taken comparatively "as every sacrifice should be salted with salt:" or adversatively, as it often is, "but every every sacrifice shall be salted with salt," to render it acceptable, according to the Divine law. Possibly, a phrase used by Ignatius, in his Epistle to the Magnesians, may afford some light on this passage. "Lay aside therefore the old, and sour, and evil leaven; and be ye changed into the new leaven, which is Jesus Christ. Be ye salted in him, lest any one among you should be corrupted; for by your savour ye shall be judged." It is evident, that the correct doctrines of the gospel, are spoken of, as giving an agreeable savour to the "living sacrifices" of believers, whose good conduct, in consequence, evinces their entire preservation from corruption.

In Syria, where there are Salt Lakes, it is most likely that comparisons, and even proverbs, were taken from the properties of the article they furnished. So we read, "Salt, i. e. in its genuine state, is good, but, if it have lost its saltiness, wherewith will ye season it? how restore to it any relish?—The surface of the salt lakes, also, the thinner crust of salt, next the edges of the lakes, after rains, and especially after long continued rains, loses the saline particles, which are washed away and drained off, yet it retains the form and appearance of salt, like the most perfect. For this reason, those who go to gather salt from the lakes, drive their horses and carts over this worthless matter, (and consequently, trample it into mere mud and dirt) in order to get some distance into the lake, where the salt is better: and often they are obliged to dig away the surface from thence, to obtain the salt, pure and pungent.]

We see from Ezekiel xvi. 4. that anciently they rubbed new-born children with salt:—Quando nata es aquâ non es lota in salutem, nec sale salita. Jerom thought, this was meant to dry up the humidity that abounds in children, and to close the pores. Galen, de Sanit. lib. i. cap. 7. says, that salt hardens the skin of children, and makes them more firm.—Avicenna acquaints us, that they bathed children with water in which salt had been dissolved, to close up the navel, and to harden the skin. Others think, it was to hinder any corruption that might proceed from cutting off the navel-string.

The prophet Elisha being desired to sweeten the waters of the fountain of Jericho, required a new vessel to be brought to him, and salt therein. 2 Kings ii. 21. He threw this salt into the spring, and said; "thus saith the Lord, I have healed these waters; and in future they shall not occasion either death or barrenness." And in reality, the waters became good for drinking.

VOL. II. PART XXV. Edit. IV.

Naturally the salt must have increased the brackishness of this fountain; but the prophet purposely selected a remedy that seemed contrary to the effect he would produce, that the miracle might become the more evident. [Compare FRAGMENTS, No. V.]

The Wiseman reckons salt in the number of things the most necessary for life, Eccclus xxxix. 31. Job asks if any one could eat that which is not relished with salt? [metaphorically, vigour of sentiment, understanding. Vide IV. below.]

II. The Salt of the Earth, is, probably, marl, with which they manure the land in some countries, instead of dung. See our Commentary on Matth. v. 13.

III. Mineral Salt, or salt dug out of mines, in form of a hard stone. It is thought Lot's wife was changed into a statue of such mineral salt; i. e. that she became as a rock, or stone, of salt, Gen. xix. 26. See LOT'S WIFE.

IV. Salt is the symbol of wisdom: "Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt," says St. Paul, Col. iv. 6. And our Saviour says, "Have salt in yourselves, and have peace one with another." [Hence we read of Attic salt, i. e. Attic wit, or sharpness, mental intelligence, &c.]

V. Salt is the symbol of perpetuity, and incorruption. Thus they said of a covenant, "It is a covenant of salt for ever, before the Lord," Numb. xviii. 19. And elsewhere, "The Lord God of Israel gave the kingdom over Israel to David for ever, even to him and to his sons, by a covenant of salt," 2 Chron. xiii. 5. Vide FRAGS. No. CXXX.

VI. Salt is the symbol also of barrenness, and sterility. When Abimelech took the city of Shechem, he destroyed it, and sowed the place with salt, that it might always remain desert, Judg. ix. 45. Zephaniah, ii. 9. threatens the Ammonites and Moabites, from the Lord; "Moab shall be as Sodom, and the children of Ammon as Gomorrha, even the breeding of nettles, salt-pits, and a perpetual desolation." See Job xxxiv. 6. Psalm cvii. 34. Jer. xvii. 6.

VII. Salt is likewise the symbol of hospitality; also of that fidelity due from servants, friends, guests, and officers, to those who maintain them, or who receive them at their tables. The governors of the provinces beyond the Euphrates, writing to king Artaxerxes, tell him, "Because we have maintenance from the king's palace," &c. which, in the Chaldee, is, "Because we are salted with the salt of the palace." Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXX.

The Salt-sea: the Dead-sea, or lake Asphaltites. Scripture and profane writers sometimes call Asphaltus or Bitumen—salt; whence

M div 2

Moses,

Moses, speaking of a burning or parching salt, Deut. xxx. 23. (Vulg. Salis ardore consumuntur,) means asphaltus, bitumen, or pitch. Herodotus also mentions certain lamps in Egypt, into which were put salt, i. e. bitumen, or such like combustible matter to feed the flame.

• The Valley of Salt. Interpreters generally place it south of the Dead-sea, towards Idumea; because it is said, 2 Sam. viii. 13. that Abishai killed there 18,000 Idumeans; that Joab killed there 12,000; 1 Chron. xviii. 12. Psalm lx. title; and long after, Amaziah, king of Judah, killed 10,000, 2 Kings xiv. 7. 2 Chron. xxv. 11. —Galen, de Simpl. Medicam. Facult. lib. iv. cap. 19. informs us, that the salt of the lake Asphaltites was used to season meat; that it was a stronger caustic, and digested much more than other salts; because (says he) it is more boiled. We see also by Macc. xi. 35. x. 29. that the kings of Syria had brine-pits in Judea. Ezekiel, xlvii. 11. says, that the shores and marshes on the Dead-sea should be assigned for the making of salt. Dr. Halifax, in his account of Palmyra, speaks of a great plain covered with salt, from whence the country round about is supplied. This plain is about a league from Palmyra, and extends toward the eastern parts of Idumea, whose capital city was Bozra. David beat the Idumeans in the Valley of Salt, as he returned from Syria of Zobah. It is very probable, that this plain of salt is the Valley of Salt of Scripture.

SALU, סָלוּ, סַלֹּו, basket, or treading of feet, or elevation; from סָלוּ salal. Father of Zimri, of Simeon. Numb. xxv. 14. 1 Macc. ii. 26. calls him Saloni. [Highly esteemed?]

SALUMIAS, or SALOMIAS, a village in the country about Scythopolis. The same as Salem, where, says Jerom, were seen ruins of the palace of Melchisedec. See SALEM VI.

SALVATION, salus. This word is taken in several senses in Scripture.

I. for Eternal happiness and salvation, the object of our hopes and desires. Thus it is said, "To give knowledge of salvation to his people." Luke i. 77. "The gospel of your salvation." Eph. i. 13. "Godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation," 2 Cor. vii. 10. i. e. which leads to eternal life.

II. Salus is put for life, Gen. xlii. 15, 16. Vulg. Per salutem Pharaonis; by the life of Pharaoh. Gen. xlvii. 25. Salus nostra in manu tua est; our life is in your hands. [WELFARE.]

III. For deliverance, or victory. 1 Sam. xi. 9. Vulg. Cras erit vobis salus, cum incaluerit sol: you shall be relieved to-morrow, ere the sun be hot, 1 Sam. xiv. 45. "Shall Jonathan die, who hath wrought this great salvation in Israel?"

2 Kings xiii. 17. Sagitta salutis Domini contra Syriam; the arrow of victory, or deliverance.

IV. Salvation is put for praise and benediction given to God. "Alleluiah, salvation, and glory, and honour, and power unto the Lord our God. . . . Salvation to our God which sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb," Rev. vii. 10. xix. 1.

V. Salus, is put for salutation given to persons whom we salute, or to whom we write; a salutation of civility and friendship: James i. 1. "To the twelve tribes that are scattered abroad, greeting," or health. 1 Macc. x. 18. "King Alexander to his brother Jonathan sendeth greeting," or wisheth health.

The Hebrews rarely use concrete terms, as they are called, but often abstract. Thus, instead of saying, God saves them, and protects them; they say, God is their salvation. Thus, Vox salutis, gaudium salutis, rupes salutis, scutum salutis, sagitta salutis, veritas salutis, cornu salutis, verbum salutis, arx salutis, &c. is equivalent to a voice declaring deliverance; the joy that attends escape from a great danger; a rock where any one takes refuge, and is in safety; a buckler that secures from the attack of an enemy; an arrow that procures safety and liberty to a people; a truth that saves us; a horn or ray of glory, of happiness and salvation; the glory that attends deliverance from some great danger, &c.

Thus, to work great salvation in Israel, signifies, to deliver Israel from some imminent danger, to obtain a great victory over enemies. Psalm xviii. 50. Fieri, or, esse in salutem, is to save, to protect any one. Magnificans salutes Regis, Psalm cvi. 4. to bring a very powerful succour to the king. Psalm cxlix. 4. Visita nos in salutari tuo; visit us and save us. Exaltabit mansuetos in salutem; he will replenish them with glory, and bring them out of danger. Psalm xliii. 5. Salutare vultus mei; the salvation of the face of the Lord; i. e. his favour done us, in beholding us with a kind aspect, or, a merciful countenance; or rather, "the salvation of my face," the salvation which is before me, in which I hope, which I wait for. Psalm xlv. 4. Qui mandas salutes Jacob; who commandest with authority, and sayest, Let Jacob be safe; thou who savest him, and protectest him. Psalm xxii. 1. מִשְׁעֶתִּי דְּבַרִּי שָׁמַעַתִּי. Longè à salute meâ verba delictorum meorum; my sins cry against me, and prevent my salvation. The Hebrew says, "Thou art far from my salvation, and from the words of my crying;" thou refusest to succour me, and to deliver me, or even to hear me. A victim or sacrifice for salvation; these were pacific sacrifices offered to God, God, either to return thanks for his benefits, or to ask favours, protection, or assistance from him. Psalm xxxiii. 17. Fallax equus ad salutem; it is in vain that you put your confidence in horses; they cannot save you from danger, without the assistance of God. I preferred wisdom before safety or beauty: Wisd. vii. 10. Super salutem et speciem dilexi eam: before life, health, and beauty. Divitiæ salutis, sapientia et scientia; the treasures of salvation; or, according to the Hebrew, the strength of safeties, wisdom and knowledge, shall adorn the Messiah. He shall save, protect, defend, and deliver his elect, by his infinite power: he shall enrich them with the gifts of wisdom, knowledge, &c.

The Lord hath clothed me with the garments of salvation; Isaiah lxi. 10. These garments of salvation, may signify the habits of joy and festivity, worn on festival days, and after receiving a signal favour from God; after deliverance from great danger. Erit tibi anima tua in salutem. Jer. xxxix. 18. xlv. 5. The Hebrew says literally, Erit tibi anima tua in spoliū; you shall escape danger, and shall save your life, but not without difficulty: your life shall be saved, but as a part of the prey is rescued; or it shall be your part of the booty. Happy, that you are delivered, even on these terms! You shall lose every thing but your life. Ezekiel says, xiv. 4. Aquā non est lota in salutem. He speaks of a new-born child, not washed, nor salted, and whose naval-string had not been cut. Probably, they imagined this contributed to health, ad salutem. The Hebrew reads; "You have not been washed with water, for solacing, for refreshing, and cleaning you. See SALT.

SAMAEŁ. This name the Rabbins, in their mystical commentaries on the Pentateuch, Rabboth, in Deuter. cap. ult. fol. 303. give to the prince of the devils, who expected, with great impatience, the hour of Moses's departure, that he might seize him, and carry him to the place where the dead are detained. But the angel Michael reproved him, and said to him; O wretch! shouldst thou be joyful, while I shed tears? He quotes Micah vii. 8. "Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy: when I fall, I shall arise; when I sit in darkness, the Lord shall be a light unto me." He added; I fell when Moses died; but I rose again when Joshua succeeded him, and led the Hebrews into the Land of Promise. Probably this Samael is the same as—

SAMMAEL, an evil angel, of whom the Rabbins say, he deceived Eve, mounted on the old serpent; that he is the angel of the dead, the prince of the air, the chief of the demons. Other Rabbins look on him as the prince of the angels, and believe he is to preside at the last judgment; for which reason, they make him offerings on the day of solemn expiation, to appease his anger. Buxtorf, Lexicon. Rabbinic. in Samael. Comp. SATAN.

SAMARIA, שֶׁמֶרֶן, Shomeron, Σομερων. His lees, his prison, his guard, his thorn, or his diamond; from שָׁמַר shamar, &c. and the pronoun an, his. [Strictly guarded?]]

SAMARIA, the capital city of the kingdom of Samaria, i. e. of the ten tribes. It was built by Omri king of Israel, who began to reign A. M. 3079, and died 3086, 1 Kings xvi. 24. He bought the hill Samaria of Shemer, or Shomeron, for two talents of silver [£684.]: It took the name of Samaria, from Shemer. Some think there were already beginnings of a city, because before the reign of Omri mention is made of Samaria, 1 Kings xiii. 32. A. M. 3030, ante A. D. 974, and consequently, 49 years before the reign of Omri. Others take this for a prolepsis, or anticipation, in the discourse of the man of God, who speaks of Samaria under the reign of Jeroboam.

However, Samaria was not considerable, nor the capital of the kingdom of Israel till after the reign of Omri. Before him the kings of Israel dwelt at Shechem, or at Tirzah. Samaria was built on an agreeable and fruitful hill, in an advantageous situation, twelve miles from Dothaim, twelve from Merrom, and four from Atharoth. Euseb. in Dothaim. Merro, et Atharo. Josephus says, it was a day's journey from Jerusalem. Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 11. Besides, though built on an eminence, yet it must have had water in abundance; since we find medals struck in this city, whereon is represented the goddess Astarte, at whose feet is a river. [Comp. PLATES, MEDALS, passim.] Josephus, Ant. lib. xiii. cap. 18, observes, that when it was taken by John Hircanus, prince of the Jews, he entirely demolished it, and even caused the brook to flow over its ruins, to obliterate all traces of it.

The kings of Samaria omitted nothing to render this city the strongest, the finest, and the richest, possible. Ahab built here a palace of ivory, 1 Kings xxii. 39. Amos, iii. 15. iv. 1; 2. describes Samaria under Jeroboam II. as a city sunk in excess of luxury and effeminacy:—"I will smite (says he) the winter-house with the summer-house, and the houses of ivory shall perish, and the great houses shall have an end, says the Lord. Hear this word, ye king of Bashan, that are in the mountain of Samaria, which oppress the poor, which crush the needy; which say to their masters, Bring, and let us drink," &c.

Ben-hadad, king of Syria, built public places or streets in Samaria, probably, for traffic, where his people dwelt, to promote commerce, 1 Kings xx. 34. Vide FRAGS. NO. XLII.; also PLATES, MEDALS OF PTOLEMAIS.—His son Ben-hadad besieged this place, under the reign of Ahab, A. M. 3103, ante A. D. 901, but was defeated by a handful of young men.

What is very remarkable, and yet very common, is, that the king of Syria's flatterers would ascribe the shame of their defeat, not to the pride and drunkenness of their king, but to the interposition of the gods of the Jews: "their gods are gods of the hills, (say they) therefore they were stronger than we; but let us fight against them in the plain, and surely we shall be stronger than they."

The following year Ben-hadad brought an army into the field, probably with design to march against Samaria; but his army was again destroyed. 1 Kings xx. 26, 27. Some years after this, 2 Kings vi. 24. vii. 1, 2, 3, 4. A. M. 3119, ante A. D. 885, Ben-hadad came again before Samaria, and reduced it to such extremities by famine, that a mother was forced to eat her own child: but the city was relieved by a striking interposition of divine Providence. It was besieged by Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, in the ninth year of Hoshea king of Israel, which was the fourth of Hezekiah, king of Judah, A. M. 3280. It was taken three years after, A. M. 3283, ante A. D. 724. 2 Kings xvii. 6, 7, &c. The prophet Hosea, x. 4, 8, 9. xiv. 1. speaks of the cruelties exercised by Shalmaneser; and Micah says, i. 6. this city was reduced to a heap of stones. The Cuthites sent by Esar-haddon to inhabit the country of Samaria, did not think it worth their while to repair the ruins of this city; they dwelt at Shechem, which they made their capital. They were on this footing, when Alexander the Great came into Phœnicia and Judea.

However, the Cuthites rebuilt some part of Samaria, since Ezra speaks of the inhabitants of Samaria, Ezra iv. 17. Neh. iv. 2. The Samaritans being jealous of the favours Alexander the Great conferred on the Jews, revolted from him, while he was in Egypt, and burnt alive Andromachus, whom he had left governor. Q. Curtius, lib. iv. cap. 21. Alexander took Samaria, and settled Macedonians to inhabit it, (Euseb. Chronic. Cedrenus,) giving the country around it to the Jews, and to encourage them to cultivate it, he granted them exemption from tribute. The kings of Egypt and Syria, who succeeded Alexander, deprived them of this country. Hecataeus, apud Joseph. lib. ii. cont. Appion.

But Alexander Balas, king of Syria, restored to Jonathan Maccabæus the cities of Lydda, Ephrem, and Ramatha, which he separated from the country of Samaria. And the Jews resumed the full possession of it under John Hyrcanus, who took Samaria, and ruined it, according to Josephus, so that the river ran through its ruins. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 18. A. M. 3995, ante A. D. 109. It so continued to A. M. 3947, when Aulus Gabinius, proconsul of Syria, rebuilt it, and named it Gabiniana. But it was very inconsiderable, till Herod the Great restored it to its ancient lustre, and gave it the Greek name of Sebaste, (in Latin Augusta) in honour of the emperor Augustus, who had given him the propriety of this place. Syncell. Chronic. p. 308. Usher. ad An. 3979, ante A. D. 25. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 11.

The New Testament speaks but little of Samaria; and when it does mention it, it is rather in respect of the country, than of the city. When it is said, Luke xvii. 11. John iv. 4. He passed through the midst of Samaria; the meaning is, through the midst of the country of Samaria.—And again, "Then cometh he to a city of Samaria called Sychar." Here Jesus had a conversation with a woman of Samaria, i. e. with a Samaritan woman of the city of Sychar. After the death of Stephen, when the disciples were dispersed through the towns of Judea and Samaria, Philip the deacon withdrew into the city of Samaria, where he made converts. Acts viii. 1, 2, 3. When the Apostles heard that this city had received the word of God, they sent Peter and John thither, to communicate the Holy Ghost. Here Simon Magus offered money to those apostles, in hopes of buying this power of communicating the Holy Ghost. Samaria is never called Sebaste in the New Testament, though strangers hardly knew it by any other name. Jerom says, in Abdiam, 1. it was thought Obadiah was buried at Samaria. They also shewed there the tombs of Elisha and of John the Baptist. There are many ancient medals, struck at Sebaste or Samaria; and some bishops of this city subscribed the Acts of ancient councils.

Kings of Samaria. See KINGS, and CHRONOLOGICAL TABLES.

[The country of Samaria lies between Judea and Galilee. It begins, says Josephus, at a town called Ginea, in the great plain, and ends at the toparchy of Acrabatene. Samaria, under the first temple, was the name of a city; under the second of a country. Rabbi Benjamin of Tudela says, "Sebaste is Samaria, where the palace of Ahab, king of Israel, is still known.—Now that city was on a mountain, and well fortified, had springs, well watered land, gardens, paradises, vine-yards and olive-yards. Distant eight miles is Neapolis, i. e. Sychem, in Mount Ephraim. It is seated in a valley between the mountains mountains Gerizim and Ebal; in it are about a hundred Cuthians, observing the law of Moses only: they are called Samaritans; and have priests of the seed of Aaron. They sacrifice in the temple on Mount Gerizim on the day of the Passover, and on feast days on the altar built there of the stones set up by the children of Israel, when they passed over Jordan. Mount Ebal is dry, rocky, and stoney.

Josephus says, the inhabitants of Neapolis called their city Maabarthā. The temple flourished about 200 years. He also says, that Herod built in the land of Sebaste a city, with a very fine wall of twenty furlongs; and brought into it six thousand inhabitants: in the middle he erected a very great temple to Cæsar, and made a grove about it of three half furlongs: and called the city Sebaste: i. e. in Latin, Augusta.

The following is the account of this city, as given by D'Arvieux, vol. ii. p. 78.

"Napoli of Samaria is certainly taken for the ancient Sichem. This city is situated partly on the declivity of a mountain, and partly on a plain. It has been so often ruined and rebuilt, that the attempt to discover any of its ancient buildings would be fruitless. It is the only city in this province, and of course is the residence of the governor. One thing very remarkable in the mountain on which it is situated is, that half of its surface is covered with trees, shrubs, and verdure, while the other half is arid and waste. There would be nothing extraordinary in this, if the bare division had a northern aspect; many others have that peculiarity; but these two distinctions of this mountain divide the northern aspect equally between them, without any other visible distinction.

"There are gardens all round the city; not on the mountain, but in the plain. These are watered by a little river, and by a number of rivulets, which render this plain of an admirable fertility. The orange-trees, lemon-trees, fig-trees, pear and apple-trees, are in perfection, and produce excellent fruits.

"About a quarter of a league from the city is a fountain, which falls into a basin of white marble. About five hundred paces from the city, toward Jerusalem, is a well, at which, some say, Jacob watered the flocks of Rachel: others say, that at which our Lord met the Samaritan woman. The Christians venerate it, and keep it covered with great stones. On lifting up these stones, we descend into a vaulted cave, wherein is the mouth of the well. It appears to be of great antiquity, is well built, and may be thirty to forty feet to the surface of the water.

Tradition affirms that the land around is that which Jacob gave to his son Joseph." Comp. FRAGS. Nos. DLXVII. DLXVIII. et seq.]

SAMARITANS, סַמְרִיטִי, people of Samaria, Σαμαριτῶν. Luke ix. 52. See SAMARIA.

SAMARITANS. See Cuthites. The Samaritans are the inhabitants of the city of Samaria; and of that province, of which Samaria was the capital. In this sense it should seem, that we might give the name of Samaritans only to those stranger people, the Cuthites, whom the kings of Assyria sent from beyond the Euphrates, to people the kingdom of Samaria, when they carried captive the Israelites who inhabited there before. Thus we may fix the epoch of the Samaritans, at the taking of Samaria by Shalmaneser. A. M. 3283.

After Shalmaneser, Esar-haddon being informed, that the people sent to Samaria, were infested by lions, which he imputed to their ignorance of the manner of worshipping the god of the country, he sent a priest of the god of Israel, to teach them the rites of the Hebrews.—They thought they might blend this religion with that they professed before; so they continued to worship their idols in conjunction with the God of Israel, not perceiving how incompatible these two religions were.

It is not known how long they so continued: but at the Jews' return from the captivity of Babylon, it appears they had quitted the worship of Idols; and when they asked permission of the Israelites to assist in rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem, they affirmed, that from the time that Esar-haddon had brought them into this country, they had always worshipped the Lord, Esr. iv. 1, 2, 3. And, indeed, after the return from the captivity, Scripture does not reproach them with idolatrous worship, though it does not dissemble either their jealousy against the Jews, or the ill offices they did them at the court of Persia, by their calumnies, or the stratagems they contrived to hinder the repairing of the walls of Jerusalem. See Neh. ii. 10, 19. iv. 2, 7, &c. vi. 1, 2, &c.

It does not appear there was any temple in Samaria, common to all those people who came from beyond the Euphrates, before Alexander the Great invaded Judæa. Every one had been left to his own discretion, and worshipped where he thought fit. But they presently comprehended, from the books of Moses which they had in their hands, and from the example of the Jews, their neighbours, that God was to be worshipped in that place only which he had chose. Therefore, since they could not go to the temple of Jerusalem, from which the Jews forbade them, they thought of building a temple of their own on mount Gerizim, near Shechem, then then their capital. Therefore Sanballat, governor of the Samaritans, applied to Alexander, and told him he had a son-in-law, called Manasseh, son to Jaddus the high-priest of the Jews, who had retired to Samaria with many other persons of his own nation; that he desired to build a temple in his province, where he might exercise the high-priesthood; that this would be advantageous to the king's affairs, because hereby the nation of the Jews, a turbulent and seditious people, would be divided, and by division would be weaker, &c. See MANASSEH. IV.

Alexander readily consented to Sanballat, and the Samaritans presently began the temple of Gerizim, which from that time they have always frequented, and still frequent, as the place where the Lord intended to receive the adoration of his people. Of this mountain, and of this temple, the Samaritan woman of Sychar said to our Saviour, John iv. 20. "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain, and ye say that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship." See GERIZIM.

The Samaritans revolted from Alexander the very next year; Alexander drove them out of Samaria, put Macedonians in their room, and gave the province of Samaria to the Jews. This contributed not a little to increase the hatred and animosity between these two people. When any Israelite had deserved punishment, for the violation of some important point of the law, he presently took refuge in Samaria or Shechem, and worshipped at the temple of Gerizim.—When the Jews' affairs were prosperous, the Samaritans did not fail to call themselves Hebrews, and of the race of Abraham. But, were the Jews in discredit or persecution, the Samaritans immediately disowned them, and acknowledged themselves to be Phœnicians, originally, or descended from Joseph, by Manasseh his son. This was their practice in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 7. A. M. 3836, ante A. D. 168.

When this prince would have compelled the Jews to renounce their religion, they withstood him with great resolution. But the Samaritans wrote in another strain to Antiochus; that being "originally Sidonians" or Phœnicians, and being now settled at Shechem, they found themselves under the necessity, by reason of many misfortunes, to conform to certain customs and usages of the Jews (as the observation of the Sabbath); that they had built a temple on mount Gerizim, which had not been dedicated to any particular deity; (literally, that it was dedicated to the god without a name; or rather, that the temple was without a name, ἱδρυσάμενοι ἀνόνομον ἱερὸν) that since he had thought fit to chastise the Jews for their wickedness, they besought him not to confound them with that people; as they were ready to obey his commands, and to consecrate their temple to the Grecian Jupiter. Antiochus admitted their plea, and wrote to the governors of Samaria, to give the Samaritans no disturbance on account of their religion.

Alexander the Great carried with him into Egypt six thousand Samaritans, which Sanballat had sent him from Tyre, as auxiliary troops. He appointed them lands in the Thebais, and trusted them with the security of that province. These Samaritans retained their ancient antipathy against the Jews, maintaining that mount Gerizim was the true place where God should be worshipped: as the Jews, on the contrary, maintained that it was the temple of Jerusalem. This dispute was supported with so much heat, that it became a kind of sedition, and king Philometor himself examined the affair. It was argued in his presence; and the contending parties agreed that no proofs should be admitted but from the books of the law; and that the advocates who lost the cause should be put to death. Sabæus and Theodorus defended the Samaritans; and Andronicus, son of Messalami, was advocate for the Jews. The Jews gained their suit, and the king condemned to death the advocates of the Samaritans.

We do not warrant the truth of this fact; though it is affirmed by Josephus, in a very circumstantial manner. But we give still less credit to what the Samaritans relate to their own advantage in their Chronicon, which was composed since Constantine's time, and under the Christian emperors. Liber Jeshue, seu Chronic. Samarit. apud Hottinger. exercit. Antimorin.

They affirm that Joshua caused a temple to be built on Gerizim, and appointed Rus, one of the house of Aaron, to perform divine service. They produce a succession of high-priests, who, say they, officiated here, quite from the time of Joshua, to the present, without interruption.—They will not admit that Jeroboam son of Nebat, was the first author of their schism; nor do they own the transplantation of the Israelites by Tiglath-pileser and Shalmaneser. They tell us that the kings of Syria in confederacy with the king of Jerusalem, revolted against Bachtnezer, king of the Persians (for so they call Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon.) This prince brought an army, took Jerusalem, passed from thence to Shechem, gave the inhabitants but seven days to quit the country; and threatened with the severest punishment those who should dare to continue in it beyond that time.

Then he sent other people into Samaria and Judea,

Judea, to inhabit the cities thus forsaken. But these new inhabitants could not live there, because the fruits, which otherwise appeared fair, contained a poison, mortal to all who ate of them. When Bachtnezer was informed of this, he consulted the original inhabitants; who declared this evil would not be remedied, till the Hebrews were returned, who had been unjustly driven away. They obtained an edict authorizing them to assemble at one place, and depart all together for their own country. Then arose a dispute among the Samaritans, sons of Joseph and Aaron, and the Jews, whether they should return to Jerusalem, and rebuild the temple of mount Sion; or to Shechem, to rebuild that of mount Gerizim. Zerubbabel, on the part of the Jews, maintained that Jerusalem was the place expressed in the writings of the prophets. Sanballat, for Gerizim, alleged, that those writings had been corrupted. The determination of this difference was referred to the fire: the copy of Zerubbabel was consumed in an instant; whereas that of Sanballat resisted the fire in three trials. For this reason the king honoured Sanballat, made him presents, and sent him back at the head of the ten tribes to take possession of mount Gerizim and Samaria.

We give ourselves no trouble to refute this history, which is inconsistent with itself. The histories of the Kings, the Chronicles, the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, with the writings of the prophets, record the time, the cause, the circumstances of the coming of the Cuthites into Samaria; the reason why, and the manner in which they embraced the law of the Jews. Josephus has acquainted us with the history and origin of the temple of Gerizim. The documents produced by the Samaritans are too modern, they have too much the appearance of fiction, and are contradicted by accounts of undoubted authority.

The Rabbins have added to the history of Nehemiah, circumstances much to the disadvantage of the Samaritans. They affirm that these people, to the number of 180,000 men, going to beset Jerusalem; Ezra and Nehemiah assembled three hundred priests, who excommunicated them, according to the greater excommunication. These priests were attended by three hundred young boys, each carrying a copy of the law in one hand, and a trumpet in the other.—They sounded the trumpet, while the Cuthites were excommunicated by the priests. They cursed whoever should eat bread with them, with as heavy a curse as if they should eat pork. They besought God, to deprive them of all part in the future resurrection, and that they might never be allowed to become proselytes. This so terrified the Cuthites, that they all betook themselves to flight.

The Samaritans having received the Pentateuch, or the five books of Moses, from the priest sent by Esar-haddon, have preserved it to this day, in the same language and character as it was then written in, i. e. the old Hebrew or Phœnician; which we call the Samaritan, to distinguish it from the modern Hebrew character, now used in the books of the Jews: which it is wrong to call the Hebrew character; for that belongs properly, only to the Samaritan text. Critics have noticed some variations between the Pentateuch of the Jews and that of the Samaritans; but these chiefly regard the word Gerizim, which the Samaritans seem to have introduced, to favour their pretensions, that mount Gerizim was the place in which the Lord was to be adored. The other various readings are of small importance.

The religion of this people was at first Pagan. Each worshipped the deity he had been used to in his own country, 2 Kings xvii. 25. The Babylonians worshipped Succoth-benoth; the Cuthites, Nergal; the Hamathites, Ashimah; the Avites, Nibhaz and Tartak; the Sepharvites, Adrammelech and Anammelech. If we would enumerate all the false gods, to whom the Samaritans paid a sacrilegious worship, we should have enough to do. This matter is sufficiently perplexed, on account of the different names by which they were adored among different nations; insomuch, that it would be almost impossible to clear up the whole. We content ourselves with mentioning those only which are recorded in Scripture, and of which we find something in ancient monuments. 2 Kings xvii. 30, 31, et alibi. Vide their Articles: also FRAGMENTS, Nos. CCXII. CCXIII. and others.

All the gods worshipped by the Samaritans, are included in these four verses:

Numina, quæ Samaria colat, vis scire? tuere,
Semi-hominemque Asinum, semi-hominemque Canem,
En Capriceps, Gallina, Pavo, saxumque Trigonum, Et sidus cœli: Numinis illa loco.

Afterwards, to this profane worship the Samaritans added that of Jehovah, the God of Israel. 2 Kings xvii. 29, 30, 31, 32. but evinced their little regard to his worship, when under Antiochus Epiphanes, they consecrated their temple at Gerizim to Jupiter. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xi. cap. ult. In the time of Alexander the Great, they celebrated the Sabbatical year, and consequently the year of Jubilee, also: but we do not know whether they did this at the same time with the Jews. Under the kings of Syria they followed the epoch of the Greeks, or that of the Selucidæ, as other people did who were under the government of the Selucidæ. Petit. Eccl. Chronol. lib. ii. cap. 4. After Herod had re-established Samaria, and had given it the name of Sebaste, the inhabitants, in their medals, and public acts, took the date of this new establishment. But the greater part of these being Pagans or Jews, were no rule to the other Samaritans, who probably reckoned their years according to the reigns of the emperors they were subject to, till they submitted to the arms of the Mahometans, under whom they live at this day; and they reckon their years by the Hegira, or, as they speak, according to the reign of Ishmael, or the Ishmaelites.

Some of the ancients, as Epiphanius, Hæres. ix. and St. Austin, lib. de Hæres. have ranked the Samaritans as heretics; but they were rather schismatics in respect to the Jews. They have no more relation to the Christian religion than the Jews have, since they do not acknowledge Jesus Christ as the Messiah, but expect another. It is objected to them, that they receive only the Pentateuch, and reject all the other books of Scripture, especially the prophets, who have more expressly declared the coming of the Messiah. However, they say, in their letter to Ludolph, that they admit the book of Joshua; but probably, by this name they mean their own Chronicon. They have also been accused of believing God to be corporeal, of denying the Holy Ghost, and the resurrection of the dead. Epiphanius, Hæres. ix. Greg. Mag. Moral. in Job, lib. i. cap. 6. ii. 19, &c. Jesus Christ reproaches them with worshipping what they know not, John iv. 22. Epiphanius says, they worshipped the teraphim that Rachel stole from Laban, and which Jacob hid under ground. Lastly, it is said, they paid a superstitious worship to a pigeon, or to the representation of one, and that they even gave circumcision in the name of a pigeon. Ita. Rabb. quidam in Talmud. Ganz, Tzemach David. p. 106. Reland, in his letter to M. Basnage, maintains, that they deny the existence of angels; and Leontius among the ancients, asserted, that they denied angels, and the immortality of the soul. [Comp. SADUCEES. Add.]

The Samaritan woman, John iv. 25. is sufficient testimony that the Samaritans expected a Messiah, who, they hoped, would dissipate all doubts. Several of the inhabitants of Shechem believed at the preaching of Jesus Christ, and many Samaritans believed at that of Philip; but it is said, they soon fell back to their former errors, being perverted by Simon Magus: Vide Lightfoot on Matt. x. 5.

A. D. 96. that a certain impostor having persuaded the Samaritans, that he would make a discovery of some sacred vessels which Moses [this is a gross error, because Moses never entered the Land of Promise; the Chronicon of the Samaritans says, that Oziz, the fifth high-priest from Aaron, concealed some sacred vessels.] hid in a hollow place of the mountain; the credulous people followed him, and in a pretty large town called Tirataba, staid for the rest of the nation, who were to be spectators of this discovery. But Pilate, jealous of some intended insurrection, sent troops against them, and the ringleaders of this assembly were punished with death.

As to the present Samaritans, we may see by their letters written to their pretended brethren of England, and to Scaliger, that they believe in God, in his servant Moses, the holy law, the mountain Gerizim, the house of God, the day of vengeance and of peace; that they value themselves on observing the law of Moses, in many points, more rigidly than the Jews. They keep the Sabbath with the utmost strictness; never stirring from the place they are in, but to the synagogue. They go not out of the city, and they abstain from marriage, on that day.— They never delay circumcision beyond the eighth day. They still sacrifice in a temple on mount Gerizim, and give to the priest the dues enjoined by the law. They do not marry their own nieces, as the Jews do, nor allow themselves a plurality of wives.

Their hatred for the Jews may be seen throughout Josephus, and in several places of the New Testament. The Jewish historian informs us, Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 3. that under the government of Coponius, one passover-night, when the gates of the temple were opened, some Samaritans scattered the bones of dead men there, to insult the Jews, and to interrupt the devotion of the festival. The evangelists shew sufficiently that the Jews and Samaritans held no intercourse, John iv. 9. And the Samaritan woman of Sychar was much surprized, that Jesus talked with her, and asked drink of her. When our Saviour sent his apostles to preach in Judea, he forbade them from entering Samaritan cities, Matt. x. 5. One day when he sent his disciples to provide him a lodging in a Samaritan town, they would not entertain him, "because his face was as though he would go to Jerusalem," Luke ix. 52, 53. And when the Jews were provoked at Jesus Christ, they called him a Samaritan, thinking they could call him nothing worse, and connecting this with demoniacal possession. John viii. 48. Josephus relates, that some Samaritans having killed several veral Jews who were going to a festival at Jerusalem, this occasioned a kind of war between them. The Samaritans continued their fealty to the Romans, when the Jews revolted; yet they did not escape some of the calamities of their neighbours. See Josephus, de Bello, lib. iii. cap. 22.

The Chronicon Samaritanum, apud Hotting. p. 116, says, that the emperor Adrian having razed Jerusalem, passed on to Naplouse, otherwise Shechem, and took all their books from them, not leaving so much as their genealogies and histories. They were forbid to circumcise their children; but they sent them directly as they were born, into the caverns of the earth, where they received the sign of the covenant, and they did not return till they were cured.—The Romans mingled swine's flesh in the feasts of the Samaritans, who were forced to use great industry to avoid eating of it. They placed a pigeon on mount Gerizim, to hinder them from going thither to worship; and they posted troops at the foot of the mountain, to stop those who attempted to elude the prohibition. Some of them were bold enough to attempt going up, and cunning enough to escape the watch; but the bird discovered them, and cried out, The Hebrews! The guards at this awoke, and slew those who were coming up.

This calamity continued till Babar-raba sent one of his nephews, called Levi, to follow his studies at Constantinople. This young man made so great a progress in learning, that he became patriarch, and obtained of the emperor the liberty of returning to Gerizim. His design was to deliver his nation from the yoke of the Romans, and to restore its former liberty. We are not told what became of him afterwards, for here ends the Chronicon of the Samaritans.—What it says of the city of Constantinople, is a sufficient proof that this Chronicon cannot be ancient. Justin Martyr assures us, that when the emperor Antoninus Pius granted the Jews liberty to circumcise their children, he excepted the Samaritans. This holy man being himself of Shechem, might be well informed of this fact. Symmachus, the famous translator of the holy Scriptures out of the Hebrew into Greek, was a Samaritan. He left his country, and became a Jew; and for this purpose received a second circumcision.

Under the empire of Zeno, the Samaritans elected a king in the city of Naplouse, and killed many Christians. But Zeno punished them severely, and put their king to death. They revolted again under the empire of Justinian, burnt the churches of the Holy Land, and massacred many Christians; among others the bishop of Naplouse. Justinian was forced to send regular troops against them, who destroyed most of the rebels.

The Chronicon of the Samaritans, called Tarik Sumari, intimates that the Samaritans separated from the ancient Jews after the death of Samson, under the pontificate of Eli; because, they say, at that time, the presence and favour of the Lord, which they call Red-hat, and Red-honan, departed from them; darkness expelled the light, and involved all in Palestine, except those who then withdrew to mount Gerizim, where they have constantly had priests since that time, and kings of their own. D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 753.

There are at this day Samaritans at Shechem, otherwise Naplouse. They have priests, who say, they are of the family of Aaron. The high-priest at Shechem, or at Gerizim, offers sacrifices there; and announces the feast of the passover, and all other feasts, to the dispersed Samaritans. Some are found at Gaza, some at Damascus, and some at Grand Cairo. Scaliger received a letter from the Samaritans of Shechem, printed in 1676. They have also written since to their pretended brethren in England, and M. Ludolf printed a letter in 1688, which he received from them.

SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH. The five books of Moses written in Samaritan characters, or Hebrew characters used before the captivity of Babylon. See PENTATEUCH, and SAMARITAN. Copies of the Samaritan Pentateuch were unknown in Europe till the sixteenth century. The famous archbishop Usher was the first, or at least one of the first, who procured it out of Syria. This learned man having observed, that Eusebius of Cæsarea, Diodorus of Tarsus, Jerom [of Bethlehem] Cyril of Alexandria, Procopius of Gaza, Georgius Syncellus, and others, had quoted the Samaritan Pentateuch; he could not rest till he had procured five or six copies out of Syria or Palestine. By examining these copies carefully, he thought he could discover that they had been corrupted by one Dositheus, mentioned by Origen in his first book against Celsus: an opinion in which the learned do not agree with him.

Pietro della Valle bought a very neat copy at Damascus, A. D. 1616, for M. de Sanci, then ambassador of France at Constantinople, and afterwards bishop of St. Maloes. This book was presented to the Fathers of the Oratory, Rue St. Honoré, where it is preserved. From this copy Father Morinus printed the Samaritan Pentateuch in 1632, which is in M. le Jay's Polyglot, which was the first printed copy. It has been since printed more correctly in Walton's Polyglot, glot, from three Samaritan manuscripts that belonged to Usher.
N div. 2 glot,

Critics are much divided about the Samaritan Pentateuch. Father Simon in his Critical History of the Old Testament, lib. i. cap. 10. is of opinion, that the priest sent by Esar-haddon, to the Cuthites, did not carry with him the books of the law of Moses, which would have been useless to a people that did not understand Hebrew, and to himself also, since without this book, he could practise the ceremonies of the law, to which he had been inured from his infancy. Therefore, it was long after this, viz. when Manasseh undertook to build a temple on mount Gerizim, that they carried thither the copy of the law, as edited by Esdras, and which the Jews read in their temple at Jerusalem.

M. Vandale maintains, Epist. ad Morin. in tract. de Idolatr. that we must distinguish between the law and the Pentateuch. The volume of the law, contained only such ordinances, the observation of which was necessary for securing the people from the anger of God; but the Pentateuch comprehended the history of the creation of the world, of the bondage of the Jews in Egypt, of their deliverance, of their wanderings in the wilderness, with the rituals compiled by Moses. The priest sent by Esar-haddon, brought to the Samaritans only that law which was necessary for the observation of the rites of the Hebrews; but the Pentateuch that was lost or buried under the ruins of Jerusalem, was restored and reformed by Esdras, and could not be communicated to the Samaritans till a long time afterwards.

Another critic (understood to be Le Clerc) thinks, that he has discovered in the Pentateuch of the Jews and the Samaritans, traces of an author who had lived beyond the Euphrates, who was acquainted with that country, and who mentions some particulars of it, which Moses could not know. He therefore imagines, that the Pentateuch was composed by the priest sent to the Cuthites or Samaritans. This man, who came from Chaldea to instruct those idolaters, thought proper to write them a history of the creation of the world, and of Hebrew affairs, till the delivery of the law: to establish the doctrine of one God. As he wrote this in the eighteenth year of Josiah, in which the copy of the law was found in the temple, he inserted this piece into his own work, as being very essential to it. He wrote the whole in Hebrew, because he had not had time to learn the Chaldee. The Jews made no difficulty of receiving this work; because the author was not suspected by them, and because the book contained only their history and their law. Surely this is choosing difficulties, in order to avoid supposed inconveniences!

—The generality of divines believe, that the Samaritan Pentateuch, and that of the Jews, are but the same work, written in the same language, but in different characters; and, that the variations between them proceed only from the copiers; or from the affectation of the Samaritans, who have added some things favourable to their own pretensions; that the additions were inserted afterwards; but that, originally, these two copies were the same. According to this opinion, it may be said, that the Pentateuch of the Jews is preferable to that of the Samaritans, because exempt from the alterations made in the latter. But, on the contrary, others prefer the Samaritan Pentateuch, as an original, preserved in the same character, and the same condition, in which Moses composed it.

Dr. Prideaux, Connect. tom. ii. lib. vi. ante A. D. 409. who espouses M. Simon's system, maintains, that the Pentateuch of the Samaritans, is only a copy, in other characters, from the text revised by Esdras; that even this copy has been altered by variations, transpositions, and remarkable additions. To prove that the Samaritan code is only a copy, he says (1) It has all the interpretations of the edition of Esdras; which it would not have, if it were more ancient. (2) There are several variations in the Samaritan Pentateuch, which evidently proceed from mistaking one Hebrew letter for another which is like it; though, in the Samaritan alphabet, those two letters have no resemblance. This incontestably proves, says he, that it was Manasseh, son-in-law of Sanballat, who brought the Pentateuch with him, when he took refuge among the Samaritans. And as the Samaritans were then accustomed to the Phœnician letters, the Pentateuch was written in those characters, for their use.

As to the variations, the additions, and transpositions found in the Samaritan Pentateuch, when compared with the Hebrew, they are all carefully collected, with the utmost exactness, in the book written by Hottinger against Father Morinus, and in the confronting of the two texts, which are inserted in the last volume of the English Polyglot. Of these interpolations, some are insertions for the better understanding of the text; others are a kind of paraphrase, expressing more distinctly what was only hinted at in the original: others are such changes as the Samaritans have purposely made, to favour their pretensions against the Jews; as when, for example, they put Gerizim instead of Ebal.—Other variations are pure lapses of transcribers.

Beside the Hebrew Pentateuch in Phœnician characters, of which we have been speaking, the Samaritans Samaritans have another, in the language which they spoke at the time when Manasseh took shelter among them. This language is a mixture of the Chaldee, the Syrian, and the Hebrew, or Phœnician. And, just as the Jews were obliged, in favour of those who did not understand the pure Hebrew, to make versions or paraphrases in Chaldee; so the Samaritans had their Pentateuch in the vulgar Samaritan tongue. This is called the Samaritan Version, which differs from the Jewish paraphrases, they being glosses and explications; whereas the Samaritan Version is literal, and expresses the text word for word: it is printed with the Samaritan text in the Polyglot of Paris, and also in that of London; and because of its great conformity with the text, they have only given one Latin version for both.

[Where such evident marks of determined hostility exist, as between the Jews and Samaritans, it is difficult to know what to receive as unmingled truth. It is likely that the schism occasioned by the idolatry of Jeroboam, son of Nebat, may be justly considered as the most ancient origin of this animosity, the transplantation of the Cuthites may be a later cause, by which the former was not only continued, but invigorated; then followed the various favours conferred on the Samaritans by later princes, whose jealousy of Jewish revolutionary principles was seldom completely tranquillized.—While therefore, each party appears resolved to say all that is bad of the other, we cannot confide our credence to either. But, this must be admitted,—that, as the Lord had prophets in Israel, it is likely that country was not wholly destitute of copies of the law before the days of Ezra;—that pious individuals, also, would study it, for their conformity,—and not the less for its being prohibited, if it were so, which does not appear: and certainly copies of any writing in the characters of that writing, are much less liable to error than if transcribed into a different character. Subsequent insertions prove but little. But the chief argument, in favour of the Samaritan copy is derived from the medals and coins of the Jewish community under the government of the Maccabees. What could induce these priests to adopt Samaritan characters on these public tokens, unless much of antiquity, and somewhat of sanctity, too, were attached to them? It must also have been coincident with the feelings, or prejudices, of the people, at large. And moreover, it is possible, that other public inscriptions were in this character: perhaps all referring to the priesthood; as the names on the high-priest's pectoral; the inscription on his mitre, &c. We have but very imperfect accounts of the ritual of the present Samaritans, as no traveller has resided a whole year among them to observe their feasts and ceremonies; and they have communicated very little respecting themselves, by writing. They have been noticed (as by Mr. MAUNDRELL, and a few others,) but their confidence has not been obtained by any. Notwithstanding the destruction of their books, by Adrian, their colonies in Damascus, and other foreign cities, might preserve some, not unworthy of attention. See further in Dr. ADAM CLARKE's edition of the Abbé FLEURY's Manners of the antient Israelites, pp. 351—365. Manchester, 1805.]

SAMEGA, a city of Judea, taken by Hyrcanus. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 17. He calls it Samæa, de Bello, lib. i. cap. 2. Perhaps it is the Shema, Josh. xv. 26. שמש Shemesh.

SAMLAH, שמלה, Σμαδ, raiment; from שמלה simlah: otherwise, his left-hand; from שמאל shemel: otherwise, his name, his astonishment, or what has been put to him; from שם shem, a name, or שמו shamam, astonishment, or שום shum, to put, to place, and the preposition ל l, to, and the pronoun ה ah, his.

SAMLAH, or SEMLA, king of Masrekah, in Idumea. Gen. xxxvi. 36.

SAMOS, Σάμος, sand; from ἄμμος, sand.

SAMOS, an island of the Archipelago, on the coast of Asia Minor. The Romans wrote to the governor of Samos in favour of the Jews, in the time of Simon Maccabæus, A. M. 3865, ante A. D. 139. 1 Macc. xv. 23. St. Paul went ashore in this island, when going to Jerusalem, A. D. 58. Acts xx. 15. Isaiah, xlv. 9. speaks of the vessels of clay of Samos; according to the Vulgate, Væ qui contradicit fictori suo, testa de Samiis terræ; Woe to the man who disputes against him that has formed him, man, who is but a potsherd of an earthen vessel of Samos. But the Hebrew reads, a vessel of clay in the midst of vessels of clay SAMOTHRACIA, Σαμοθράκη, an island in the Egean sea; so called because it was peopled by Samians and Thracians. St. Paul, departing from Troas, for Macedonia, arrived first at Samothracia, Acts xvi. 11.

SAMSON, שמשון, his [bright] sun; from שמש shemesh, the sun, and the pronoun ה an, his: according to the Syriac, his service, or his ministry; from שמש shemesh. [but, according to Josephus, Antiq. lib. v. cap. 10. the robust; the Arabic has a similar signification, a strong and bold man. See Goliath, Arab. Lex.]

SAMSON, son of Manaoth, of the tribe of Dan, and of a mother whose name is not recorded in Scripture, Judg. xiii. 2, 3, 4, &c. A. M. 2848, ante A. D. 1156. This woman had been long barren; when an angel of the Lord appeared to her, telling her she should have a son; but she must take care, not to drink intoxicating liquor, or to eat any impure food: that she must use the same care, with regard to her son: and must consecrate him to God from his infancy, as a Nazarite, and not let a razor come upon his head; for, says the angel, he shall begin to deliver Israel from the hands of the Philistines.

Samson was born the year following; and the spirit of God gave him extraordinary strength of body. One day as Samson went to Timnath, a Philistine city, he saw a young woman, whom he desired his father and mother to obtain for his wife. They remonstrated—that she was not of their own nation; but he persevered; and the young woman was contracted to him.

When going to Timnath, he saw a young lion, which he seized, and tore in pieces, as if he had been a kid. Some time after, returning thither, to celebrate his marriage, he stepped aside to see the carcase of the lion. He found it dried up, and a swarm of bees lodged in it, which had there formed a honey-comb, of which he took a part. At his wedding-feast, the inhabitants of Timnath provided thirty young men as companions for Samson, to do him honour. To these he proposed a riddle, to this effect:

And savage strength now offers luscious sweet."]

They continued to the seventh day, lost in conjecturing the meaning of his riddle. Then, partly by threats, partly by entreaties, they urged the bride to get the secret from her husband; which she told again to them. Before sun-set on this day, they came to Samson, saying,

["What sweeter flows than honey o'er the tongue?
Whose strength exceeds a lion's, wild and young?"]

He told them, that if they had not ploughed with his heifer, they could never have expounded his riddle. Meaning, that they had abused him, by too intimate familiarity with his wife, and that she had been unfaithful to him. [Comp. MARIAMNE, for a similar instance of jealousy, the consequence of a secret obtained.] We have a similar phraseology in the poets,

Ἐχθαίρω . . . ἄνδρατε μαργόν,
Ὅς τὴν ἀλλοτρίην βελεῖ ἄρῳραν ἄρῳν.

THEOCENID. Sent. 58.

Milo domi non est, peregrè ac Milone prefecto,
Arva vacant, uxor non minus inde parit.

MARTIAL, lib. vii.

He paid the fine expected on account of the riddle, but left his wife, and returned to his father. Some time after, the woman married the principal bride-man, who had been Samson's companion, at his wedding. Samson's anger being subsided, he returned to see his wife, bringing a kid with him, as a present. But her father would not admit him, saying, I thought you had hated her, and therefore I have given her to another. Thus refused, he went and caught three hundred foxes (Jackalls, vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCIX.) which he tied tail to tail, and between each pair he put a fire-brand: to these he set fire, and turned them into the corn-fields of the Philistines; the flames made a great havoc, not sparing even the vines and the olive-trees. When the Philistines knew it was Samson who had done this, to revenge the affront received from his father-in-law at Timnath, they burned that man and his daughter.

In a combat Samson slew a great number of Philistines. The Heb. says, יָד אֹתָם שֹׁק עַל יָד. He beat them, the thigh upon the leg. As we say, hip and thigh, or back and belly. The Vulgate says, "He made so great a slaughter of them, that putting the leg upon the thigh, they remained quite slain." Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXLIII. He then retired into the rock Etam, in Judah. The Philistines hearing this, came in great numbers into the land of Judah; and the people of Judah bound him, and brought him by his sufferance, to the Philistines. No sooner did they see him thus bound, but they set up loud shouts, and were about to seize him. But the spirit of the Lord animating Samson, he snapt the cords which bound him, and happening to find the jaw-bone of an ass, he, with this weapon, slew a thousand Philistines.—Throwing away the jaw-bone, he gave that place the name of Ramath-lehi, i. e. the lifting up of the jaw-bone. Being overcome with extreme thirst; and crying to the Lord, the Lord opened a rock which was in that place (called Maktesh, i. e. the jaw-tooth) from whence water gushed out to assuage his thirst. Vide LEHI, and MAKTESH: also FRAGS. No. CCCXLIV.

After this Samson went to Gaza, a city of the Philistines: having there seen a harlot, or a woman who kept a public house, he went to lodge with her. The Philistines set a guard about this house, and another at the gates of the city, to kill him as he went out in the morning. But Samson rising at midnight, went off, and took away the two gates of the city, and the gate-posts, gate-posts, bar and chain, and carried them up the hill which is towards Hebron. See PLATES, MEDALS of GAZA.

Some time afterwards, he fell in love with a woman called Dalilah, who dwelt in the valley of Sorek. Many of the ancients thought, that Samson took her as his wife; but most maintain, that she was never married to Samson, but was a public woman. The Philistines bribed this woman, to discover in what his extraordinary strength consisted. He amused her for a considerable time, pretending his strength consisted sometimes in one thing, and sometimes in another; and when the Philistines were ready to seize him, he burst his bonds asunder. At last his mistress teized him so much, that he told her his strength lay in his hair, which had never been shorn, because he was a Nazarite from his mother's womb. Dalilah then cut off his hair as he lay sleeping in her lap; and the Philistines instantly seizing him, bound him, and put out his eyes. They took him to Gaza, shut him up in prison, and made him grind at the mill, as a base and contemptible slave. Some take the word here rendered grinding, in an obscene sense; as also in Job xxxi. 10. and Lam. v. 13. Vide Jerom, in Isai. xlvii. also, FRAGS. No. CIX.

It is inquired, whether Samson's hair was the natural and physical cause of his strength; or only the moral cause, and, as it were, a pledge of the assistance of the Holy Spirit, who thought fit to endue him with this prodigious strength, as a permanent quality, so long as he should observe the laws of Nazariteship, and should keep his hair untouched, which was the visible token of it. This last opinion, seems to be the most probable: for though a strong and thick head of hair, may be a token of natural strength, yet that strength will not be the less after the hair is cut off. But it was not so with Samson; therefore his hair was neither the cause, nor the natural sign, of his great strength; his strength was supernatural and miraculous, and God thought fit to connect it with Samson's hair; or with his due observance of the Nazariteship that had been enjoined him.

violated by Samson: he had lost the visible pledge of it on his part, and had now nothing to shew in proof of his obedience, or to allege, as any reason to expect, or cause to hope, wherefore that gift should be continued to him.]

Samson continued in prison at Gaza about a year. His hair growing again, [Judg. xvi. 22. the Hebrew says literally, "The hairs of his head began to put forth as they were shaved:" which some explain, as if they were restored to the same condition they were in before. Vat. Jun.] God restored to him his strength. The princes of the Philistines met in a general assembly, in the temple of their god Dagon, to return him thanks for having delivered to them this their formidable enemy. After they had ended their feast, they ordered Samson to be brought that they might make sport with him; when they had insulted him as long as they thought fit, he desired his guide, to let him rest himself against the pillars that supported the temple; which was then full of people, both above and below the galleries. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCIV. Samson calling on the name of the Lord, and laying hold of the two pillars, by which the temple was supported, one in his right-hand and the other in his left, he said; let me also die with the Philistines. Then violently shaking the pillars, the temple fell on the princes and people, and killed about three thousand persons. He lived in the whole about thirty-eight years; and was judge of Israel about twenty years. Judg. xvi. 20. A. M. 2867 to 2887.

Ought Samson to have put himself to death? And should he have sought revenge for the loss of his eyes? St. Bernard maintains, that if he had not a particular inspiration of the Holy Ghost to actuate him, he could not without sin be the author of his own death. St. Austin also, does not excuse him, but on the supposition, that he was urged by the inward motions of him, who is master of life and death. Others maintain, that this action of Samson might be vindicated from his office, as being judge and defender of Israel; and therefore, without considering the danger he exposed himself to, he might have nothing in view but the deliverance of his people. St. Paul places him among those whose faith was commended and recompensed, Heb. xi. 32.

SAMUEL, שמואל. See SHEMUEL.

SAMUEL, son of Elkanah, and of Hannah, of the tribe of Levi, and of the family of Kohath; he was a prophet and judge of Israel for many years, 1 Sam. i. 1, 2, 3, &c. 1 Chron. vi. 23. His father dwelt at Ramathaim-Zophim, or or the city of Ramatha, inhabited by Levites of the family of Zophai or Zuph, a descendant of Kohath. Samuel dwelt there himself the greater part of his time. See RAMATH. It is disputed whether he was a priest or no. Some of the ancients believed, he was of the race of Aaron, and exercised the function of high-priest. He wore the ephod, 1 Sam. ii. 18.; he consecrated two kings, Saul and David; he offered sacrifices, and that out of the tabernacle. The Psalmist, xcix. 6. places him in the rank of priests; "Moses and Aaron among his priests, and Samuel among them that call upon his name." Josephus, Antiq. lib. vii. cap. 15. says, that Samuel appeared to Saul in a sacerdotal habit. We find no one of the family of the high-priest Eli, after the death of Hophni and Phinehas, who could exercise the high-priest's office. It is therefore very probable, that Samuel performed the duties of this office, till the grandsons of Eli were of age to take it.

It is replied, that Samuel not being of the race of Aaron, it is unlikely he should have been high-priest. His wearing an ephod, his anointing kings, and even his sacrificing in extraordinary cases, will not prove him to be a priest.—David wore the ephod; Gideon and Saul sacrificed; some of the prophets consecrated kings; Samuel is put in the number of those who call upon the Lord, i. e. the Levites.—As to the age of the children of Hophni and Phinehas, we have nothing certain; and if any deputy was employed to perform the functions of the high-priest, they chose rather a priest than a mere Levite. On the whole, therefore, it is best to consider Samuel as an extraordinary prophet, but not as intruding into an office which did not appertain to him.

Elkanah, father of Samuel, had two wives, Peninnah, and Hannah. Peninnah had children; but Hannah was barren. Elkanah loved Hannah tenderly, and was much concerned that she had no children. One day when he went with his family to Shiloh, where the ark of the Lord then was, he there offered peace-offerings, and made an entertainment for his wives and children. Hannah seeing herself alone, while Peninnah was surrounded with a troop of children, began to weep; rising from table, she went to the tabernacle, where she poured out her heart before the Lord, and made a vow, that if God would give her a son, she would dedicate him to his service all his life; that she would make him a Nazarite, and would suffer no razor to come on his head.

Hannah had a son, whom she named Samuel, saying: "Because I have asked him of the Lord." [Samuel is put for Saul-me-el: שמואל שאל asked of the Lord.] When the child was somewhat grown, she brought him to Shiloh, to the house of the Lord, with an offering, &c. See HANNAH. Young Samuel officiated in the temple, and was clothed with a linen ephod, 1 Sam. ii. 18, 19, 20.

The high-priest Eli was very old, and his eyesight was so dim, that he could hardly see. He had heard of the irregularities of his two sons Hophni and Phinehas, but had not courage to restrain them, nor power to remove the scandal they caused in Israel. One night, very early, when Samuel was in bed, near the tabernacle of the Lord, he heard a voice, calling him by his name. Thinking it was Eli, he ran to him, and said, "here am I." Eli bid him return, and lie down to sleep, for he had not called him. The same thing happened three times. The third time Eli, judging there must be something extraordinary in the incident, directed him, if called any more, to say; "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth."

Samuel obeyed: and received a threatening prophecy against Eli, and his house. When day was come, Eli called Samuel, and obliged him to disclose what the Lord had said: to which Eli answered, it is the Lord, let him do what is pleasing in his own eyes.

The battle in which the ark of the Lord was taken by the Philistines; the death of the high-priest Eli, and of his two sons Hophni and Phinehas; the manner in which the ark was sent back to Beth-shemesh, and from thence to Kirjath-jearim: may be seen at length in the first book of Samuel, chap. iv. v. vi. Vide also the articles ELI, HOPHNI, and PHINEHAS, ARK, DAGON, and BETHSHEMESH.

After the death of Eli the high-priest, Samuel was acknowledged as judge and governor by all Israel. He insisted on the reformation of the people; and they renounced their strange gods, and applied themselves wholly to serve the God of their fathers. Afterwards, Samuel convened another assembly at Mizpeh, where the people met in arms. Samuel prayed for them; they fasted and prayed, poured out water before the Lord; confessed their sins, and Samuel judged them. The Philistines hearing that Israel was assembled at Mizpeh, took the alarm, and came into the field against them, but were defeated so signally, that for a long time they durst not appear on the frontiers of Israel; but were obliged to restore such cities as they had taken.

Samuel was about forty years of age when he began to judge Israel. He judged them all his life; for under the reign of Saul he preserved a great great share of authority, as well in respect of Saul himself, as of the whole people. He went yearly to Bethel, to Gilgal, and to Mizpeh; whence he returned to his house at Ramah, and so distributed justice to all Israel. He also built an altar at Ramah, as well for his private devotion, as for that of the people, who flocked to him from all parts, to consult him, and to have their causes decided. When he grew old, he appointed his sons judges over Israel, and they discharged this office in Beer-sheba, a city lying on the southern limits of the land of Canaan. But, instead of walking in the steps of their father, they suffered themselves to be corrupted by bribery.

Then the elders of Israel came to Samuel, and said, "set a king over us, as all other nations have, who may judge us." This proposal was painful to Samuel, and he addressed himself to God by prayer. The Lord answered; hear the voice of the people, and give them what they ask for; for it is not you, but me, they have rejected, that I may not reign over them. But declare to them what they may expect under a king; that they may commit this folly after full information.

A little while after, Saul, son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin, being sent by his father to seek some asses, which had strayed, came to advise with Samuel about them; the prophet told him, that God had appointed him king over his people; and he gave Saul the royal unction. Vide SAUL. After which Samuel held an assembly of the people at Mizpeh, that they might elect a king. The lot was cast, and fell on Saul, son of Kish. He was sought for immediately, but was not to be found: They ran therefore, to where he had hid himself, and brought him forth among the people. Samuel then said, you see the man whom the Lord hath chosen. After this he wrote down the laws and constitutions of his new kingdom, and published them.

A month was scarcely passed after Saul's election, when the Ammonites attacked the city of Jabesh, in Gilead. Saul, with all Israel, marched against the Ammonites, and relieved Jabesh. At their return from this expedition, Samuel incited the people to go to Gilgal, and confirm the election of the king. They did so; offered peace-offerings, and made great rejoicings. Then Samuel addressing the assembly, asked them, whether they had any fault to find with his conduct? The people answered, no. He proceeded to say, the Lord is therefore my witness to day, and so is also the king he has appointed, that you have nothing to reproach me with. To which the people answered, they are witnesses. Samuel then exhorted them to loyalty and obedience. To which he added, is it not now wheat-harvest? (A season in which rain is very rare in Palestine)—yet I shall call on the Lord, and he will send out his thunder, and shower down his rain, that you may know how great an evil you have committed in the eyes of the Lord, in presuming to ask for a king. After this tempest every one returned to his own house.

In the second year after his election, Saul being in arms against the Philistines, waited at Gilgal six days, expecting Samuel, but seeing he did not come, on the seventh day, he had the victims brought to him, and offered a burnt-sacrifice.

Scarcely was his sacrifice ended when Samuel came; and enquired, what have you been doing? Saul replied, that seeing himself pressed by the Philistines, and almost abandoned by his soldiers, he had offered a burnt-offering. Samuel told him, that he had committed folly. If, says he, you had obeyed the commandment of the Lord, the Lord would have confirmed your kingdom over Israel for ever; but now your reign will not long continue." Then Samuel went to Gibeah, and Saul followed him.

After this, Samuel by order from God, sent out Saul to war against the Amalekites. Spare none, says he; they are all devoted to the curse of extirpation, man, woman, and child, even those that suck the breast, oxen, camels, sheep, and asses. Saul therefore marched against Amalek, and ravaged the whole country; but he thought fit to preserve the better part of their goods and cattle. Then God said to Samuel, I repent that I have made Saul king. Samuel was much afflicted at this, and cried to the Lord all night. The day following he visited Saul at Gilgal, where he was offering a sacrifice of the flocks taken from Amalek. Saul saluted him, and told him, he had performed the commands of the Lord. Whence then, says Samuel, is this lowing of oxen, and bleating of sheep, in my ears? Saul answered him, the people brought away the prime, to offer in sacrifice to the Lord. Samuel upbraided him vehemently with his want of obedience.

Saul threw all the blame on the people, and said to Samuel, "I have sinned in having had too great complaisance for the people; but come with me, that we may worship the Lord." Samuel refused, and turned hastily away from him to be gone; and Saul taking hold of Samuel's garment, it was torn in his hands. On which the prophet said to him; "thus has the Lord torn the kingdom out of your hands, to give “give it to another, who is better than you.” Saul replied, “I confess I have sinned, but, however, do me the credit of appearing with me before the elders of the people, and before all Israel: and let us worship the Lord.” Samuel complied, and they returned to the camp at Gilgal. There Samuel caused Agag, king of the Amalekites, whose life had been spared, to be brought out, and hewed to pieces; observing, that as his sword had made many mothers childless, so likewise, should his mother be rendered childless among women. [Vide FRAGMENTS.]—Samuel returned to Ramah; and from this time saw Saul no more; nevertheless, he continually bewailed him.

Some years after this, the Lord said to Samuel, “how long will you mourn for Saul? Arise, and go to Bethlehem, and give the royal unction to one of the sons of Jesse, whom I have chosen to be king over my people.” Samuel answered, Saul will be informed of it, and will put me to death.” The Lord said, “go thither as if to sacrifice; invite Jesse to partake of the sacrifice, and there I will shew you the person whom you are to anoint.” Samuel went therefore to Bethlehem: the elders of the place came to shew their respect to him, and he invited them to the solemnity of the sacrifice. When he went into Jesse’s house, all the sons of this venerable old man came to salute him. Seeing Eliab the eldest, Samuel said within himself, surely this is he whom the Lord hath chosen! But the Lord replied, “have no regard to a good appearance, or an advantageous stature; for this is not he whom I have chosen.” Jesse caused his seven sons, one after another, to pay their respects; but Samuel found that neither of these was chosen. Jesse said, he had still a younger son, but he was keeping the sheep. Send for him, says Samuel, for we will not sit down to table till he comes. The eighth son of Jesse was David, who was fetched out of the field; and when he came in, the Lord said, “anoint him, for this is he.” Samuel poured on his head the oil he had brought with him; and from that time the spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, and rested on David.

Samuel returned to Ramah, and dwelt there the rest of his life, among the prophets, who lived under his conduct in a kind of community. Several years after, when David was in disgrace with Saul, and had with difficulty escaped his vengeance, he took refuge with Samuel at Ramah. He related Saul’s behaviour towards him; and they went together to Naioth. Saul had intelligence of this, and sent a party to surprise David. But the messengers finding Samuel prophesying in the midst of the prophets, they were also seized by the spirit, and began to prophesy among them; i. e. they were surprized with certain irregular motions and agitations, and pronounced certain words, as the prophets were used to do in their fits of enthusiasm.—[Perhaps, rather—finding these prophets at their devotions, they were seized by a spirit of devotion, and united their praises, worship, &c. with those of the prophets.] Saul sent a second, and a third, company of messengers, who were seized in like manner. Lastly, he came himself, and was seized with the spirit of God [rather—of devotion, for the time being], and prophesied among the rest. This delay gave David an opportunity to escape.

Samuel died at the age of ninety-eight, about two years before Saul; A. M. 2947, ante A. D. 1057. All Israel mourned for him, and he was buried at his own house at Ramah, 1 Sam. xxv. 1. The author of Ecclesiasticus, has an eulogy to his memory, chap. xlv. 13, 17, 20.

About two years after the death of Samuel, the Philistines having invaded the territories of Israel with a powerful army, Saul, with his troops, took a position on the eminences of Gilboa. Overcome by consternation at the multitude of his enemies, he resolved to consult some witch or sorceress, to foreknow the event of this war. His servants discovered an enchantress at En-dor, about two or three leagues from Gilboa.—He disguised himself, and visited her, with a small attendance, that the witch might not know him; because, some years before, he had banished all of her profession.

This woman he desired to raise the ghost of Samuel. She had recourse to her charms, and when she saw the ghost appear, she screamed violently, and said, “why have you deceived me, for you are Saul?” Saul encouraged her, and asked her, what she saw? “I see (said she) gods [elohim, in the sense of magistrate, chief, or prince, &c.] coming out of the earth.” He asked her what sort of a man? She said, an old man covered with a mantle. By this description, Saul recognized Samuel, and bowed himself to the earth. Samuel said, why have you disturbed me? Saul answered, that being in great straits, and not knowing whom to address, because God gave him no answer, he found himself necessitated to have recourse to him, by magic. Samuel told him, that the Lord would deal with him as he had already predicted, that the kingdom should be taken from him, and given to David his son-in-law; that Israel should be delivered into the hands of their enemies the Philistines. To which he added, added, to-morrow you shall be with me,—you and your sons,—and the Lord shall abandon Israel to the Philistines.

On this history, a question has been moved, that has divided both ancients and moderns, i. e. whether the ghost of Samuel did really appear to Saul? or, whether this were only a trick of the sorceress, who herself spoke to Saul, and feigned the voice of Samuel? It is asked also, whether it was effected by the power of the devil, by art magic; or, whether God permitted that Samuel should appear, by a miraculous effect of his power. Justin Martyr, Dial. cum Tryphon. Origen, Anastasius of Antioch, believed that demons had some power over the souls of the saints, before Jesus Christ descended into hell, and delivered them out of the hands of the prince of darkness. St. Austin finds no greater inconvenience in saying, that the devil caused the soul of Samuel to appear, than in supposing him to present himself before the Lord among the children of God, Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CLIII. or in supposing him to place our Saviour upon a pinnacle of the temple. [Comp. PINNACLE of the TEMPLE, Add.]

Manasseh-ben-Israel, de Resurrect. Mort. lib. ii. cap. 6. according to the principles of the book Zohar, believes, there are demons which have so much power over the souls of the dead, during the first year after their death, that they do with them almost what they please, and oblige them to take whatever bodies they think fit. However, we cannot agree that this happened the same year as Samuel died, but think it was about two years after his death: and besides, the principles of this Rabbi are by no means supportable. On the other hand, it is hard to oppose the Scripture, which expressly affirms, that Samuel appeared, that he spoke, foretold the death of Saul, &c.

Those who maintain that Samuel did not really appear to Saul, are divided among themselves. Some think that a demon assumed the form of Samuel, and spoke to Saul. *Auth. prince the sentence of his death, and destruction. Vide Aug. lib. xv. de cura pro mort. Ambros. in Luc. cap. 1. Zeno Veron. serm. de Resurrect. D. Thom. 2. 2. q. 174. art. 5. ad 4. alii plures, ad 1 Sam. xxviii. Rabbi Levi-ben-Gerson insists, that all this passed only in the imagination of Saul: He says, that this prince being struck with apprehension of his present danger, and of the threats God had made to him, believed he saw Samuel appear to repeat these threats, and to foretel his approaching destruction.

Of all these opinions, the most probable is, that Samuel really appeared to Saul: not by the magical charms of the sorceress, or by the power of the devil; but by the Almighty power of God, who, to punish Saul, might permit the real Samuel to appear, and discover to him his last and greatest calamity. Consult Allatius, Notes on the Treatise of Eustathius, de Engastrimytho, &c. [The Editor differs from father CALMET: for his reasons, see PYTHONESS OF ENDOR.]

To Samuel are ascribed the book of Judges, that of Ruth, and the first book of Samuel.—There is, indeed, great probability that he was author of the first twenty-four chapters of the first of Samuel, since they contain nothing but what he might have wrote, and in which he was not a principal agent. However, in these chapters, there are some small additions, probably inserted after his death. We read, 1 Chron. ix. 22. that he assisted in regulating the distribution of the Levites made by David for the service of the temple. This may be explained, by saying, that David pursued the order settled by Samuel, during his administration, after the death of the high-priest Eli. [Or, that he left in MS. some plan for such a purpose.] We read also, 1 Chron. xxvi 28. that Samuel enriched the tabernacle of the Lord, by magnificent presents, and by valuable spoils, taken from the enemies of Israel. Also 1 Chron. xxix. 29. that he wrote the history of David, in conjunction with the prophets Nathan and Gad. Probably he might write the beginning of his history, which the other prophets continued and concluded; for Samuel was dead before David came to the throne. The first two books of Kings bear the name of books of Samuel; but, it must be allowed that he could not be the author of the second of these books, which contains transactions after his death. Neither could he write the latter end of the first, since his death is mentioned in chap. xxv. It is said, chap. x. 25. of the first book of Samuel, that this prophet wrote in a book, “the manner of the kingdom,” describing the rights, prerogatives, and revenues of the king, and the extent of his power and authority: a repetition of what he had proposed, vivâ voce, a little before to the people. Rabbi Levi-ben-Gershon affirms, that when he had finished it, he put it into the ark; and Bodin, de Repub. lib. i. cap. 10. assures us, on the credit of the Rabbins, that the kings destroyed and suppressed this book, that they might reign afterwards with less restraint.

Samuel began the chain of the prophets, which was never broken from his time, to that of Zechariah and Malachi. See Acts iii. 24. "All the prophets from Samuel, and those that follow after, as many as have spoken, have likewise foretold of these days." The body of Samuel was transported from Palestine to Constantinople, in the time of the emperor Arcadius.—Jerom says, cont. Vig. they carried the remains of this prophet in a golden vessel, wrapped up in silk: that the bishops and people every-where received them in multitudes, with a joy beyond expression, and with honours almost infinite.—The Roman martyrology places his festival August 20.

Besides the true history of Samuel, there are many traditions concerning this prophet, among the Orientals, D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 735, and 1021. They relate, for example, that Samuel having made his report to God, that the Hebrews were resolved to have a king; God gave him a vessel or horn full of oil, and a staff, revealing to him, that the man in whose presence the oil should boil in the vessel, and whose stature should be equal to that staff, was appointed for their king. No sooner was this determination published among the people, but all the chiefs of the tribes came with great eagerness to measure themselves by the staff, and to try if the oil would boil in their presence; but in vain.

Saul also, otherwise called Sharek, and sur-named Thalout, i. e. the Tall, who was no more than a carrier of water, or dresser of leather, came to the prophet among the rest, and immediately the oil began to boil in the vessel, and he was found just to be the height of the miraculous staff. On these tokens, Samuel declared him king; but the heads of tribes, especially that of Judah, to whom the royal dignity had been promised, expostulated, saying; how can this man be our king, who has no estate? how can he support the expence and dignity of the royal state? Samuel replied, the Lord has chosen him, who disposes of kingdoms without controul, to whomsoever he pleases.

The Israelites would not yet submit, but insisted on having a sign from Samuel, that they might be assured from God, that this was his will. Samuel answered them, this is the miracle that God gives you to confirm this choice, the ark of the Lord, which was taken away by the Philistines, shall be brought back to you by angels.

When therefore, the election of Saul was proclaimed, the Philistines being resolved to conceal the ark of the Lord, which had caused them so many misfortunes by its presence, they hid it in a dunghill. But they were smote with a shameful disease in their secret parts, which determined them to send it back to the confines of the land of Israel. It was no sooner arrived at this place, but the angels of the Lord took it up, and carried it to the tabernacle at Shiloh; and this miracle secured Saul in his kingdom.

It is convenient sometimes even to know such things that deserve neither esteem nor credit, if it were only by that, to obtain a right of contemning them. Vide FRAGS. No. XXXIV.

SANBALLAT, סַנְבַּלַּט, bush in secret; from סֵנֶה sene, a bush, and the preposition בֵּה be, in, לִטְוִי lut, to hide: according to the Hebrew and Syriac, the enemy in secret. This name is foreign from the Hebrew language. [Simon thinks, hatred in secret, i. e. envy; from the Chaldee.]

SANBALLAT, chief, or governor of the Cuthites, or Samaritans; a great enemy to the Jews. He was a native of Horon, or Horonaim, a city beyond Jordan, in the country of Moab. When Nehemiah came from Shushan to Jerusalem, Nehem. ii. 10, 19. A. M. 3550, ante A. D. 454. and began to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem taunted him, and sent to enquire on what authority he undertook this enterprize? whether it was not a revolt against the king? &c. But Nehemiah proceeding with vigour in his undertaking, Sanballat was extremely provoked, and said, What are these poor Jews a-doing? Will the people let them go on? Will they finish their work, and dedicate it one day? Will they build with these stones that the fire has destroyed and reduced to dust?—Nevertheless, at last, the walls of Jerusalem were completed.

Then Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem, sent to Nehemiah, to desire him to meet them in the field, that they might make an alliance, and swear inviolable friendship. A. M. 3550, ante A. D. 454. But Nehemiah perceived this was only a stratagem; and declined it. At last, Sanballat wrote to him, saying, "There is a report spread among the people, and Geshem confidently affirms it, that you and the Jews intend a revolt, &c. Now as all these things are to be represented to the king, it will be convenient for you you to give us a meeting, that we may confer together about them." Sanballat also gained over to his interest a certain false prophet called Shemaiah, who would have intimidated Nehemiah. But Nehemiah, by prudent boldness, avoided the snare.

Nehemiah being obliged to return to king Artaxerxes at Shushan, Neh. xiii. 6, 28. A. M. 3563, ante A. D. 441. in his absence, the high-priest Eliashib married his grandson Manasseh, son of Joiada, to a daughter of Sanballat, and he allowed one Tobiah, a kinsman of Sanballat, an apartment in the temple. But Nehemiah at his return to Jerusalem, (the exact year of which is not known,) drove Tobiah out of the temple, and would not suffer Manasseh, the high-priest's grandson, to continue in the city, nor to perform the functions of the priesthood. Manasseh being thus expelled, retired to his father-in-law Sanballat, who provided him the means of exercising his priestly office on mount Gerizim, on the following occasion. See GERIZIM.

When Alexander the Great came into Phoenicia, and invested Tyre, Sanballat abandoned the interests of Darius king of Persia, and went at the head of 8,000 men, to offer his service to Alexander. This prince readily entertained him, and gave him leave to erect a temple on mount Gerizim, where he constituted his son-in-law Manasseh the high-priest. Sanballat must at this time be very old, for one hundred and twenty years before, A. M. 3550, he was governor of the Samaritans. Indeed, some have been of opinion, that the Sanballat who lived in the time of Alexander, was different from that Sanballat who so eagerly opposed Nehemiah; but we see no absolute necessity of admitting this. However, Josephus makes Sanballat a Cuthite originally, and does not mention him who withstood Nehemiah. The wife of Manasseh he calls by the name of Nicaso, and says, that Sanballat died nine months after he had submitted to Alexander.

[Dr. PRIDEAUX in his Connection of the Histories of the Old and New Testament, rejects the solution of this difficulty, by two Sanballats, and endeavours to reconcile the history to truth and probability, by shewing a mistake in Josephus. This author makes Sanballat to flourish in the time of Darius Codomannus, and to build his temple upon mount Gerizim by licence from Alexander the Great; whereas it was performed by leave from Darius Nothus, in the fifteenth year of his reign. This removes the difficulty arising from the great age of Sanballat, and allows him to be contemporary with Nehemiah, as the Scripture history requires.]

SANCTIFY. To sanctify often signifies to prepare. Thus Joshua says to the people, iii. 5. "Sanctify yourselves, for to-morrow the Lord will do wonders among you." Prepare yourselves to pass over Jordan. In Isaiah xiii. 8. the Lord calls the Medes his sanctified. I have appointed, and, as it were, consecrated them to be the executioners of my vengeance against Babylon. See also Numb. xi. 18. "Sanctify yourselves against to-morrow, and ye shall eat flesh." And Joshua vii. 13. "Up, sanctify the people, and say, sanctify yourselves against to-morrow, for thus says the Lord God of Israel, there is an accursed thing in the midst of thee, O Israel." Jer. vi. 4. "Prepare ye war against her, or sanctify the war against Jerusalem; prepare yourselves to make war against her." And xii. 3. "Pull them out like sheep for the slaughter, and prepare them for the day of slaughter." Heb. sanctify them. And li. 27, 28. "Assemble the troops against Babylon, prepare the nations against her—sanctify them." And Joel i. 14. "Sanctify a fast." Mich. iii. 5. "The false prophets sanctify (or prepare) war against those who will not give them something: they declare war, or denounce evils against them." Zeph. i. 7. "The Lord hath prepared his victims for the day of vengeance, he hath bid his guests:" Heb. sanctified them. Comp. HOLY, Add.

We desire of God, that his name may be sanctified, or hallowed; i. e. honoured, praised, and glorified throughout the world; especially by those who have the happiness of knowing him. Let them sanctify it by their good lives, their fidelity, their submission, to his orders; and they that know him not, that they may obtain the knowledge of him, may hear his word, may become obedient to his instructions, &c. We may apprehend yet better what is meant by sanctifying the name of God, by the opposite to it; i. e. profaning the name of God, by vain swearing, blaspheming, ascribing his name to idols; by furnishing wicked men and infidels with occasion of blaspheming it by our bad lives, and scandalous conversation, &c.

It is said, "I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me," Lev. x. 3. in his priests, when by the terrible and exemplary punishment of Nadab and Abihu, the Lord shewed what purity he required in his servants, what punctual exactness he expected in his service. The Lord complains in another place, that Moses and Aaron did not sanctify him before Israel. "Because ye believed me not, to sanctify me in the eyes of the children of Israel, therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them," Numb. xx. 12. And how did they not sanctify him? By shewing some distrust in his words.—"Because ye believed me not." God sanctified the seventh day, i.e. consecrated it to his service, Gen. ii. 3. He sanctified all the first-born, Exod. xiii. 3. he commands that they should be offered to him; as it were, consecrated to his service. Moses sanctifies the Israelites, and by bathing, by abstinence from the use of the marriage-bed, by the purity of their clothes, he prepares them for appearing before the Lord, for entering into a covenant with him. Exod. xix. 10. xiv. 12.

Those who approach to holy things are sanctified; for example, it is allowed to the priest, only, to offer sacrifices at the altar, Exod. xxix. 37. If one of the laity should approach thereto, he would contract an uncleanness, which must be expiated. So that to sanctify here is equivalent to defile, or to contract a pollution, which would require to be purified by sacrifice, or, at least, by bathing and washing of the clothes. See also Exod. xxx. 29. Levit. vi. 18, 27. Compare Levit. xxii. 15, 16. where God expressly forbids that the laity should eat of the sanctified things. Vide SAINT.

[We have in Haggai, ii. 12, a remarkable instance of the contrariety between the communication of holiness or sanctification, and that of pollution. The prophet is bid to ask the priests concerning the law,—“if one bear holy flesh in the skirt of his garment, and with his skirt do touch bread, or pottage, or wine, or oil, or any meat, shall it be holy?” And the priests answered, No.—But, said Haggai, if any one who is unclean by a dead body, touch any of these, shall it be unclean? They said, it shall be unclean.” So that the principle of pollution was much more readily communicated than that of sanctification;—for instance, to persons and to things which were in the same apartment, or house, with a dead body; though they had not touched it: but, holy flesh did not communicate sanctification, beyond that which it touched: it might sanctify the skirt of the garment that carried it, but it communicated no virtue to any thing beyond it.]

SANCTUARY. By this name was called that part of the temple of Jerusalem, which was the most secret and most retired: in which was the ark of the covenant, and wherein none but the high-priest might enter; and he only once a year, on the day of solemn expiation. The same name was also given to the most sacred part of the tabernacle, set up in the wilderness, which remained till some time after the building of the temple. Vide TABERNACLE, and TEMPLE, also, the PLATES, PLANS, &c.

Sometimes the word sanctuary is used generally for the temple, or the holy place, the structure appointed for public worship of the Lord. It should seem also, that Moses uses it instead of the Holy Land. Exod. xv. 17. “Thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thy inheritance, in the place, O Lord, which thou hast made for Thee to dwell in; in the sanctuary, O Lord, which thy hands have established.”

And Levit. xx. 3. of those who offer their children to Moloch, he says, they “defile my sanctuary, and profane my holy name.” He forbids the high-priest to go out of the temple, to mourn for his relations, Levit. xxi. 12. “Neither shall he go out of the sanctuary, nor profane the sanctuary of his God.” The temple is here denoted by its principal part. It is believed that sanctuary is put for heaven, Deut. xxvi. 15. Look from the dwelling of thy sanctuary, from the high-heaven.

SAND. A similitude taken from the aggregate sand of the sea is often used, to express a very great multitude, or a very great weight; or from a single sand, something very mean and trifling. God promises Abraham and Jacob to multiply their posterity as the stars of heaven, and as the sand of the sea. Gen. xxii. 17. xxxii. 12. Job, vi. 3. compares the weight of his misfortunes to that of the sand of the sea. Solomon says, Prov. xxvii. 3. that though sand and gravel are very heavy things, yet the anger of a fool is much heavier. And Ecclesiasticus says, that a fool is more insupportable than the weight of sand, lead, or iron, Ecclus. xxi. 15.

We have noticed under the article GLASS, that the sand of Palestine was used for making glass. See Deut. xxxiii. 19.

The prophets magnify the omnipotence of God, who has fixed the sand of the shore for the boundaries of the sea, and has said to it; “Hitherto shalt thou come; but here thou shalt break thy foaming waves, and shalt pass no further.” Jer. v. 22.

Our Saviour tells us, Matt. vii. 26. that a fool lays the foundation of his house on the sand; whereas a wise man founds his house on a rock.

Ecclesiasticus says, xviii. 8. that the years of the longest life of man are but as a drop of water, or as a grain of sand. And Wisdom says, vii. 9. That all the gold in the world, compared to wisdom, is but as the smallest grain of sand.

SANDALS. We find sandals in three passages. When Judith went to the camp of Holofernes, she put sandals on her feet, Judith x. 4. And xvi. 9. “Her sandals ravished his eyes.” They were a magnificent kind of buskins, proper only to ladies of condition, and such as dressed themselves for admiration. They had generally slaves to carry their sandals, which were sometimes of gold; and they had often cases or boxes to put them in. These cases in Menander are called sandalotheca; and the slaves that carried the sandals are called Pueri sandali-geruli, or Puella sandali-gerula. Plaut. in Trinum. Act. ii. scen. 1. John the Baptist says of himself, that he was not worthy to be sandali-gerulus to our Saviour, "whose shoes I am not worthy to bear." Matt. iii. 11. Writers say, that when Hercules became slave to Omphale, she used to give him correction with her sandal. Lucian. lib. de scribenda historia. Terent. Eunuch. Act. v. scen. 8.

[This was the most degrading and effeminate kind of correction; so Lucian makes Venus say of Cupid, "Already I have given him some correction; and taking him on my knee, have chastized him with my sandal." Dial. Venus and Luna. But Mr. Morier, in his Second Journey to Persia, p. 8. mentions a servant of the ambassador who was "abundantly beaten on the back with a stick, and on the mouth with a shoe heel," which he further explains, p. 95. The king of Persia examined some of his officers, who not answering as he desired, he exclaimed, "Call the Ferashes, and beat these rogues till they die." The Ferashes came and beat them violently; and when they attempted to say any thing in their own defence, they smote them on the mouth with a shoe, the heel of which was shod with iron." He adds in a note, "This use of the shoe is quite characteristic of the Eastern manners described in Scripture.—The shoe was always considered as vile, and never was allowed to enter sacred or respected places; and to be smitten with it, is to be subjected to the last ignominy. Paul was smitten on the mouth by the orders of Ananias." Acts xxiii. 2.—whether this were with a shoe, may deserve consideration; such ignominy, if that were the case, might well excite Paul's anger, and excuse his threat.]

But there were sandals also belonging to men, and of mean value. Jesus Christ allows the use of them to his disciples, Mark vi. 9. and whole nations wore them, as the Nabatheans: Strabo, Geograph. lib. xvi.

At first sandals were only soles tied to the feet with strings, or thongs; afterwards, they were covered, and at last they called even shoes sandals. In authors that speak of ecclesiastical rites and ornaments, we find the word sandals to signify a valuable kind of shoe, worn by the prelates at solemnities. Benedictus Baudouinus, de Calceo antiquo. M. Du Cange, Glossar.

SANHEDRIM, or Sanhedria, a corrupted word, from the Greek Συνδριον, Synedrion, which signifies an assembly,—such as a parliament, or a sovereign court, where many judges and counsellors meet, to consult on, and to determine, great affairs. The Jews call Sanhedrim, or Beth-din (the house of judgment) a council of seventy senators, who assembled in a hall of the temple at Jerusalem, and there determined the most important affairs of the nation. The chief of this assembly was called נשי, Nasi, or Prince; his deputy was called אב בית דין, Ab-beth-din, Father of the House of Judgment, and the sub-deputy was called חכם, Chacam, the Wise. The rest were called זקנים, Tzekanim, elders, or senators. The room they met in was a rotunda, half of which was built without the temple, and half within; i. e. one semi-circle of the room was within the precincts of the temple, and as it was never allowed to sit down in the temple, they tell us this part was for those who stood up; the other half, or semi-circle, extended without the holy place, and here the judges sat.

The Nasi, or prince, sat on a throne at the end of the hall, his deputy at his right-hand, and sub-deputy at his left. The other senators were ranged in order on each side. This hall was called לשכת חכמים, Lishcath-Haggazith, or the hall paved with stones; and some think it to be the same called Λιθόστρωτος, Lithostrotos, or paved with stones. John xix. 13.—They also suppose, what seems to me very improbable, that when the Jews accused Jesus Christ before Pilate, they would not enter the Prætorium, that they might not be defiled, but prevailed with Pilate to come into the Sanhedrim, there to hear their accusations against our Saviour. Casaubon, in Sueton. lib. i. cap. 46. Selden, de Synedriis, lib. ii. cap. 13, § 4. Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. in Joan.

The Rabbins pretend, that the Sanhedrim subsisted in their nation, constantly, from the time of Moses, to the destruction of the temple by the Romans. They date the establishment of it from what happened in the wilderness, some time after the people departed from Sinai, Num. xi. 16. when seventy men were chosen as judges of lesser matters. The Sanhedrim was composed of seventy counsellors, six out of each tribe, and Moses, as president, made up the number seventy-one. Six senators out of each tribe make in all seventy-two persons, which, with the president, constitute a council of seventy-three; and accordingly, the Sanhedrim consisted of seventy-three counsellors, according to some.

some. To prove the uninterrupted succession of the judges of the Sanhedrim, there is nothing unattempted by the partisans of this opinion. They find a proof where others cannot so much as find any appearance, or shadow, of it. Grotius may be seen in many places of his commentaries, De jure belli et pacis, lib. 1. cap. 3. art. 20. and Selden, de Synedriis veterum Hebræorum.

As to the personal qualifications of the judges of this court; their birth was to be untainted; they were often of the race of the priests or Levites, or of the number of the inferior judges; or from the lesser Sanhedrim, which consisted of twenty-three judges. See JUDGES. They were to be skilful in the law, as well traditional as written. They were obliged to study magic, divination, fortune-telling, physic, astrology, arithmetic, and languages. The Jews say, they were to know to the number of seventy tongues, i. e. they were to know all the tongues, for the Hebrews acknowledged but seventy in all, and perhaps, this is too many. Eunuchs were excluded from the Sanhedrim, usurers, decrepid persons, players at games of chance, those who had any bodily deformity, those who had brought up pigeons to decoy others to their pigeon-houses, and those who made a gain of their fruits in the sabbatical year. Some also exclude the high-priest and the king, because of their too great power; but others insist, that the king always presided in the Sanhedrim, while there was a king in Israel. Lastly, it was required, that the members of the Sanhedrim should be of mature age, rich, of good countenance and body. Such are the notions of the Rabbins: we pretend not to warrant their opinions.

The authority of the great Sanhedrim was very extensive. This council decided causes brought before it by appeal from inferior courts. The king, the high-priest, the prophets, were under its jurisdiction. If the king offended against the law, e. gr. if he married above eighteen wives, if he kept too many horses, if he hoarded up too much gold and silver, the Sanhedrim had him stripped and whipped in their presence. But whipping, they say, among the Hebrews, was not ignominious; and the king bore this correction by way of penance, and himself made choice of the person who was to exercise this discipline. Also, the general affairs of the nation were brought before the Sanhedrim. The right of judging in capital cases belonged to this court; and this sentence could not be pronounced in any other place, but in the hall called Lishcath-haggazith; from whence it came to pass, that the Jews were forced to quit this hall, when the power of life and death was taken out of their hands, forty years before the destruction of their temple, and three years before the death of Jesus Christ.

In the time of Moses this council was held at the door of the tabernacle of the testimony. When the people were in possession of the Land of Promise, the Sanhedrim followed the tabernacle. It was kept successively at Gilgal, at Shiloh, at Kirjath-jearim, at Nob, at Gibeon in the house of Obed-edom; and lastly, at Jerusalem, till the Babylonish captivity. During the captivity it was kept at Babylon. After the return from Babylon, it continued at Jerusalem, to the time of the Sicarii, or Assassins. Then, finding that these profligate wretches, whose number increased daily, sometimes escaped punishment by favour of the president of the judges, it was removed to Hanoth, which were certain abodes situated, say the Rabbins, on the mountain of the temple. From thence they came down into the city of Jerusalem withdrawing themselves by degrees from the temple. Afterwards they removed to Jamnia, thence to Jericho, to Uzzah, to Shepharvaim, to Bethsanim, to Sephoris, last of all to Tiberias, where they continued till their utter extinction. This is the account the Jews give of their Sanhedrim.

But the learned do not agree with them: father Petau, de Doctrin. Temp. lib. ii. cap. 26. fixes the beginning of the Sanhedrim when Gabinius was governor of Judea, who erected tribunals in the five principal cities of Judea; at Jerusalem, at Gadara, at Amathus, at Jericho, at Sephora or Sephoris, a city of Galilee, Joseph. Antiq. lib. xix. cap. 10. de Bello, lib. i. cap. 6. Grotius places the beginning under Moses, as the Rabbins do, but he makes it determine at the beginning of Herod's reign.

M. Basnage, in his history of the Jews, at first thought that the Sanhedrim began under Gabinius; but afterwards he places it under Judas Maccabæus, or his brother Jonathan.—We see indeed, 1 Macc. xii. 6, under Jonathan Maccabæus, A. M. 3860, that the senate with the high-priest sent an embassy to the Romans. The Rabbins say, that Alexander Janneus, king of the Jews, of the race of the Asmoneans, appeared before the Sanhedrim, and claimed a right of sitting there, whether the senators would or no. Josephus informs us, that Herod when governor of Galilee, was summoned before the senate, where he appeared. It must be, therefore, acknowledged, that the Sanhedrim was in being before the reign of Herod: and afterwards, as we find from the gospels, and the Acts. Jesus Christ, in Matt. v. 22. distinguishes two tribunals. "Whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause, shall be in danger of the judgment." i. e. they say, the tribunal of the twenty-three judges. "And whosoever shall say to his brother Raca, shall be in danger of the council:" i. e. of the great Sanhedrim, which had the right of life and death, at least generally, and before this right was taken away by the Romans. Some think that the jurisdiction of the council of twenty-three extended to life and death also; but it is certain that the Sanhedrim was superior to that council. See also Mark xiii. 9. xiv. 55. xv. 1. Luke xxii. 52, 66. John xi. 47. Acts iv. 15, 21, where mention is made of the Synedrion.

From all this it may be concluded, that the origin of the Sanhedrim is not without obscurity; for the council of the seventy elders established by Moses, was not what the Hebrews understood by the name of Sanhedrim. Nor can we perceive this establishment under Joshua, the Judges, or the Kings. We find nothing of it after the captivity, till the time of Jonathan Maccabæus. The tribunals erected by Gabinius were very different from the Sanhedrim.—This was the only court of its kind, and fixed at Jerusalem; whereas, Gabinius established five tribunals at five different cities, which tribunals do not appear to be subordinate one to another. Lastly, it is certain, that this senate was in being in the time of Jesus Christ, and when St. Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John wrote their gospels; since it is mentioned in their writings: But the Jews inform us themselves, that they then had not the power of life and death. John xviii. 31.

SANSANNAH, סנסנה, Σανσαννά, provinces, branches, bush of the bush; [bramble of bramble] from סנה senah, a bush; or, according to the Syriac and the Hebrew, bramble, or bush of the enemy. A city of Judah, Josh. xv. 31.

[Repeated purifications, says Simon, either of the citizens, or of the place. "Very clean town."]

SAOSDUCHINUS. We think him to be the Nebuchodonosar of the book of Judith. He succeeded Esar-haddon, A. M. 3336, ante A. D. 668. He reigned twenty years. His successor was Chinaladanus, or Saracus. Vide NEBUCHADNEZZAR I. and HOLOFERNES.

SAPH, שפ rushes, or sea-moss, end, consumption; from שפ suph: otherwise, vessel, flat, threshold; from שפ saph.

SAPH, or SIPPAT, of the race of the giants: killed by Sibbechai the Hushathite. 2 Sam. xxi. 18. 1 Chron. xx. 4. In Samuel it is said, the battle in which Sippai was killed, was fought at

S A R

Gob: in the Chronicles it is said to be fought at Gezar.

SAPHEC: perhaps it should be APHEK. This city is mentioned in the Greek of 1 Sam. xxx. 29.

SAPHIR. The Greek of Joshua xv. 48. places a city called Saphir in the mountains of Judah: but the Hebrew reads Shamir. Micah, i. 11, speaks also of the inhabitants of Saphir, שפיר ישיב. Pass ye away, into a strange country, thou inhabitant of Saphir. Perhaps the prophet intends the city of Sephoris, or Sephora in Galilee. Eusebius mentions a city named Saphir, between Eleutheropolis and Askalon.—[The name should seem to import fair, lovely, pleasant.]

SAPPHIRA, Σαπφίρα, that relates, or tells: otherwise, that writes or composes books; from ספר sephar, or sepher, according to different readings; otherwise, handsome; from שפר shaphar: or reading it saphora, a hen, a bird; from שפרה.

SAPPHIRA, a Christian woman, wife of Annanias. They having conjointly sold a field, which was their property, brought a part of the price, and laid it at the feet of the apostles, as if it had been the whole price; reserving the rest. For this prevarication they were both struck with sudden death. Acts v. Vide ANNANIAS.

SAPPHIRE, Σάπφειρος, a precious stone.

SAPPHIRE, שפיר, Saphir. Exod. xxviii. 18. xxxix. 11. The Greeks and Latins write it Sapphirus, and it is often mentioned in Scripture. Job says, xxviii. 6. there are places whose stones are Sapphires; i. e. Sapphires are very common in some countries. Pliny says, lib. xxxvii. cap. 9, that the best come out of Media; perhaps out of the country of the Sapires, or from the Mount of Sephar mentioned by Moses. Gen. x. 30. Ezek. i. 26. x. 1. The oriental Sapphire is of a sky blue colour, or a fine azure; hence, the prophets describe the throne of God, as the colour of a Sapphire; i. e. of a celestial blue or azure. Exod. xxiv. 10. Shaphir, in Hebrew, also signifies Beauty.

To express the beauty and value of the tablets of Moses, and of the wonderful rod of this legislator, the Hebrews say they were of Saphir. The orientals had an extraordinary esteem for this stone; those who wore it about them, thought it to be a talisman of happiness and good fortune.

SARABATHA, or ΣΑΒΑΘΑΘΑ. Epiphanius, de Vita et Morte Prophetæ, says, that this was the country of the prophet Zephaniah.

SARAC, otherwise Chinaladanus, succeeded Saosduchinus, Saosduchius, in the kingdom of Assyria, A. M. 3356. ante A. D. 648 : he reigned twenty-two years. His reign is famous in history, because in his time Nabopolassar and Astyages, (the first a Babylonian general of Saracus's army, the latter, son of Cyaxares, king of the Medes) conspired against him, besieged Nineveh, took it, dethroned Saracus, and divided his dominions. Astyages reigned in Media, and Nabopolassar in Assyria. This event is a famous Epocha among chronologers. We place it with Usher, A. M. 3378, ante A. D. 626.

SARAH, שרה, lady, or princess; from שר shar, a prince.

SARAH, שרה, lady of scent; from שרר sharar, to rule, and the Chaldee ריח riac, a scent: otherwise song; from שור shur: otherwise the morning, the morning-star; from the inverted word שחר shacar.

I. SARAH, or SARIA, wife of Abraham, daughter of Terah, father of Abraham, but by another mother; since Abraham asserts, Gen. xii. 13. xx. 12, that she was really his sister, the daughter of his father, but not the daughter of his mother. Terah might have had several wives at once, according to the custom of the country; or he might have married again, after the death of Abraham's mother, by which latter wife he might have had Sarai, Ita Eutyc. Alex. in Chronic. This opinion seems to us better than that which makes Sarah the same as Iscah daughter of Haran, niece of Abraham, and grand-daughter of Terah, Gen. xi. 29. However, this is the opinion of Josephus, Antiq. lib. i. cap. 8. of Jerom, quest. Heb. in Genesin, of Austin, contra Faust, lib. ii. cap. 35. of Tostat, of Genebrard, and of very many commentators.

Sarai was born A. M. 2018, ante A. D. 1986. She married Abraham before this patriarch left Ur; and when they quitted that country, he agreed with Sarah, that she should call herself his sister. For, being a woman of exquisite beauty, he was afraid she should be taken away from him, and that he might be put to death on her account, if she were known to be his wife. During a famine in Canaan, the year after Abraham settled there, he was obliged to withdraw to Egypt, where the famine did not reach, Gen. xii. 10. A. M. 2084, ante A. D. 1920. In that country, Sarah was taken from him, and carried to Pharaoh's palace. But the Lord visited this prince, and his family, with great plagues, because of Sarah: and Pharaoh at length knowing that she was Abraham's wife, reproved him very sharply. He restored her to Abraham, and sent them away.

This conduct of Abraham and Sarah has occasioned many speculations among the learned. Abraham seems to expose Sarah to the danger of adultery; and she seems too easily to consent, by passing for the sister of Abraham, and not his wife. In Abraham, there seems to have been lying, disguise, and too great easiness, in hazarding his wife's chastity; and in her, too great forwardness of compliance. Origen, Homil. 6. in Gen. speaking of what happened to Abraham, in respect of Abimelech King of Gerar, under the same circumstances, says, that this patriarch not only told a lie, but even betrayed and exposed his wife's chastity. Faustus the Manichean, apud August. lib. xxii. cap. 33. contra Faust. calls Abraham an infamous barterer of his wife's modesty, which he sold to two kings, to gratify his own avarice and gluttony. St. Chrysostom, who seriously endeavoured to excuse Abraham and Sarah, acknowledges, however, that this patriarch exposed Sarah to the danger of adultery; and that Sarah consented to this danger, to save the life of her husband. Lastly, Some moderns have very loudly declared their disapprobation of the conduct of Abraham and Sarah.

St. Austin makes an apology for Abraham, saying, 1st, That he did not lie, by describing Sarah as his sister, as indeed she was: He concealed a truth which he was not obliged to discover, by not calling her his wife. 2dly, That being exposed at the same time to two dangers, one of losing his life, the other of having his wife taken from him, and not being able to avoid either, by owning her as his wife, but thinking it at least probable that he should escape death, by acknowledging her for his sister; of two evils he chose what seemed to him the least, depending on Providence for the care of his wife's chastity, and her virtuous disposition. Vide ABRAHAM III.

Sarah, knowing that God had promised a numerous posterity to Abraham, yet finding herself barren, she thought, that, possibly the promises of God were to be accomplished by the medium of some other woman; she therefore desired Abraham to take her servant Hagar, that, by her means, she might see issue from Abraham. He complied, and took Hagar as a wife of the second order. But when Hagar found herself pregnant she despised her mistress; who, in consequence, used her harshly. Hagar fled from her; but returned some time after.

Some years after, God appeared to Abraham, made a covenant with him, instituted circumcision; changed his name; and changed the name of Sarai, or My Princess, into that of Sarah.

Sarah, or Princess; and promised Abraham a son by Sarah. The same year three angels, whom he entertained in his tent, in the form of men, repeated the promise of a son, and assured him, that a full year should not expire, before he saw the completion of this promise. Sarah was behind the door of her tent, and hearing this, began to laugh within herself, saying, "After I am now become old, and my Lord is old also, shall I receive pleasure?" Then the Lord said to Abraham, "Why did Sarah laugh? Is any thing impossible to God? Sarah shall indeed have a son within a year's time." Sarah denied that she had laughed; but the Lord said to her, "It is not so, for you surely did laugh."

Shortly after, Abraham went to dwell at Gerar, a city of the Philistines; and Abimelech, king of this city, took Sarah, who, though now fourscore and ten years old, and then with child of Isaac, was still a handsome woman. But the Lord appeared to Abimelech in a dream, and threatened to punish him, if he detained another man's wife. The next day, early in the morning, this prince came to Abraham, and brought him his wife, reproaching his dissimulation, in pretending she was his sister. Abraham excused himself, by explaining that she was indeed his sister, by the same father, though not by the same mother. Abimelech made great presents to Abraham, and to Sarah, that she might veil herself.

The year following she brought forth a son, whom she named Isaac, i. e. Laughter; in allusion to her laughing, when she overheard the promise, and to express the great joy his birth produced in her: She suckled the child herself; and when it was to be weaned, after three years, as the most probable opinion is, Abraham made a great feast for his friends. Sarah saw Ishmael at play with Isaac, (or, according to St. Paul, Gal. iv. 29. Ishmael then persecuted or teased Isaac,) and she said to Abraham, Cast out this bond slave, with her son, for Ishmael shall not inherit with Isaac. Abraham was vexed at this request, but God ordered him to comply.

Scripture tells us no more of Sarah till her death, Gen. xxiii. 1, 19. which happened some years after the famous trial that God made of Abraham's faith, by commanding him to sacrifice Isaac. Sarah was a hundred and twenty-seven years old when she died: She was then in the valley of Hebron, and Abraham came to Beersheba to mourn for her. We know not the occasion of this absence of Abraham; but Scripture says expressly, he went into this valley to mourn for her; and that after he had paid this last duty to her, he bought a field of Ephron the Ammonite, in which was a cave hewn into the rock, where were new tombs. The Vulgate calls this cave double; but the Hebrew calls it Machpelah, מַכְפֶּלֶת, duplex; which perhaps, might be the name of the field where this cave was. See MACHPELAH, and HEBRON.

Some have thought, that Sarah knew nothing of Abraham's intention of sacrificing his son, nor was acquainted with it till after they returned from Moriah. Others have maintained, that she died with grief, when told that Abraham had really sacrificed Isaac, which was a false report made to terrify her. Josephus says, she died soon after this event: But, according to his calculation, she must have lived twelve years after it;—since, he says, Isaac was five-and-twenty years old, when his father would have sacrificed him, and Sarah was ninety years old when she bore Isaac, and one hundred and twenty-seven when she died. Usher also puts eleven or twelve years between Abraham's trial, and the death of Sarah. The Talmudists and Epiphanius, put Sarah in the catalogue of prophetesses of the Old Testament.

Sarah, according to the Orientals, was daughter of Nahor, and grand-daughter of Terah, consequently she was niece to Abraham. Sarah's mother was another Sarah, daughter of Terah by Tahouiah, his second wife; for his first wife, named Jounah, was mother to Abraham.—D'Herbelot. Bibl. Orient. p. 759.

II. SARAH, daughter of Asher. Numb. xxvi. 46.

III. SARAH, daughter of Raguel and Anna, of the tribe of Napthali, and of the kindred of Tobit. Sarah was an only daughter:—her father had married her to seven husbands, successively; but these all died, before they consummated their marriage. Tob. iii. 7, 8, 9.—About A. M. 3322, ante A. D. 682. It was said, that an evil spirit, called Asmodæus, hindered them from coming near her. One day, when Sarah was reproving one of her maids for some fault, she upbraided Sarah, saying, let us never see either son or daughter from you! you that have murdered your husbands! Sarah went up into a chamber at the top of the house, and there continued in prayer three days and three nights, fasting.

This prayer of Sarah was offered to the Lord at the same time with that of Tobit, whom God had afflicted by the loss of his sight; and the Lord sent the angel Raphael to relieve them both. Vide TOBIT.

Young Tobias being on his journey to Rages, under the conduct of Raphael, in a human shape, arrived at Ecbatana. The angel told him, him, here is a man called Raguel, who is one of your relations; he has an only daughter named Sarah; you being his nearest kinsman, according to the law, ought to marry his daughter: Tobias demanded Sarah in marriage, and obtained her without difficulty. See TOBIAS.

In the evening, Tobias was introduced into the nuptial chamber; expelled the demon Asmodeus, whom the angel Raphael seized, and chained him down in Upper Egypt. Vide ASMODEUS; also FRAGS. No. CCLXXI.

Tobias having taken Sarah to wife, brought her with him to Nineveh, where his father Tobit dwelt: she was there the mother of a numerous posterity; and after the death of old Tobit, Tobias took her back to her kindred at Ecbatana, with all their children and grand-children; because his father Tobit, before his death, had announced the destruction of Nineveh as at hand, and charged them to leave it as soon as possible, that they might not be involved in its calamity. The year of Sarah's death is unknown; but she lived after A. M. 3363, ante A. D. 641.

SARAMEEL, שרמל, Σαραμὲλ. The prince from the Lord. Happiness of the people of God; from אֲשַׁר ashar, to be happy, and אֱלֹהִים om, people, and אֵל el, God: otherwise, footstep of circumcision; from אֲשֹׁר ashor, footstep, and מוֹל mul, to cut off, to circumcise.

SARAMEL, or ASAMAREL. 1 Macc. xiv. 28. We think it to be the Millo of 2 Sam. v. 9. Ashar-millo signifies the court of Millo. Others, as Vatablus and Tirinus, have imagined, that Saramel was put for Jerusalem. Serrarius translates this word the prince of the Lord, or, the prince of the people of the Lord; and he explains it by the high-priest, Simon, who then governed.

SARAPH, Burning. See SERAPH.

SARAPH, the name of a man, 1 Chron. iv. 22. which the Vulgate translates Incendens, Burning; Securus et Incendens, qui fuerunt principes in Moab. The Hebrew says, Joab and Saraph, who have ruled in Moab. It is thought these two persons are the same as Chilion and Mahlon, sons of Elimelech, who married in the country of Moab; one Ruth, and the other Orpah. See Ruth, i. ii. iv.

SARAPH also signifies a kind of serpent, which God sent among the Hebrews, to punish them: Numb. xxi. 6. Vide SERPENT.

SARDANAPALUS, king of Assyria, is not known in Scripture under this name; but there is great probability that it is he who repented at the preaching of Jonah, chap. iii. 6. and who was overcome by Arbaces governor of Media, and Belesus, governor of Babylon. We think that Pul, king of Assyria, who assisted Menahem, king of Israel, 2 Kings xv. 19. 1 Chron. v. 26. was father to Sardanapalus: as if it were said Sardan-pul; see PUL. Belesus governor of Babylon is probably the Baladan of Isaiah xxxix. 1. and 2 Kings xx. 12. in profane authors called Nabonassar. Usher places the first year of the reign of Sardanapalus, A. M. 3237, ante A. D. 767. He reigned twenty years at Nineveh, according to Eusebius and Julius Africanus. The wealth, the luxury, and the effeminacy of this prince were excessive, to a proverb. Being shut up with his women in his palace, he hardly ever appeared in public, but neglected the affairs of his kingdom, says Justin, lib. i. Diodor. Sicul. lib. ii. Ctesias, Athenæus, lib. xii. Two of his nobles, Arbaces and Belesus, ashamed of his weakness, revolted against him, A. M. 3254, ante A. D. 750. They attacked him with 400,000 men, composed of Medes and Persians, Babylonians and Arabians.

This army was beat in three engagements; but in the fourth, the Bactrian troops deserting to their side, it became victorious. Sardanapalus left the command of his army to his brother-in-law Salæmen, and he himself retired to Nineveh. Salæmen was defeated in two battles, and lost almost his whole army. Then the confederates prepared to besiege Sardanapalus in Nineveh. Not caring to trust to the events of war, he sent his three sons and two daughters for safety into Paphlagonia, to Cotta the governor of that province: He made great levies of soldiers, and collected stores of provisions in Nineveh, to sustain a long siege. The city was besieged three years, and might have held out much longer, if the Tigris had not overflowed its banks, being swelled by an extraordinary fall of rain, which overthrew the city wall for twenty stadia: or three thousand five hundred paces.

Sardanapalus finding he could resist no longer, made a funeral pile in the midst of his palace, wherein he gathered his immense riches; then setting fire to the whole palace, he burnt himself, with his concubines, and eunuchs. Thus ended the Assyrian empire. Arbaces was proclaimed king of the Medes; and Belesus, or Nabonassar, or Baladan, was made king of Babylon.

SARDIS, Σαρδεις, prince of joy, or song of joy; from שָׂרַר sharar, to rule, or from שִׁיר a song, and דָּוַס duts, to leap for joy: otherwise, that which remains; from שָׂרַד sharad, to remain: from the Syriac, a pot, a kettle. [curtain? Perhaps, Prince's joy.]

capital of Croesus, king of the Lydians. St. John, Rev. iii. writes in behalf of Jesus Christ, to the angel or bishop of Sardis.

We know not the name of the then bishop at Sardis. Some moderns have thought it was Melito, a famous bishop of this city, and apologist for our religion, who wrote in the time of Marcus Aurelius, about A. D. 170, or 175. If this were correct, we must allow him to have been bishop above seventy-five years; which is not easy to believe: for none of the ancients have said that he was a disciple of the apostles, or that he attained so great an age. We ought not therefore to affirm this without proof; which besides is not very honourable to him, since St. John speaks of the angel of Sardis in terms not at all advantageous.

SARDIUS, or RUBY: Sardius Lapis; Hebrew אֶדֶם, Odem. This word signifies redness; wherefore some translate it by Ruby, or by Pyropus. The Sardius is reddish, approaching to white, as a man's nail. Exod. xxviii. 17. xxxix. 10. Ezek. xxviii. 13. Rev. xxi. 20.

SARDONYX; q. a Sardius united to an Onyx. The Onyx is a precious stone often called Carnelian. The basis of the Carnelian is white, as the nail growing under the flesh. The Hebrew שֹׁהֶם, Shohem, has been translated Sardonichus lapis; which rather signifies an emerald.

[SAREPTA, vide ZAREPHATH.]

SARERA. Epiphanius says, that Ezekiel was of the country of Sarera.

SARGON, שָׂרְגֹן, who takes away protection; from סָר sur, to take away, and גָּן gan, protection: otherwise, that takes away the garden: from גָּן gan: according to the Syriac, nets, snares. This word is not Hebrew. [Rather, a prince, just and clement; from סָר, prince, and the Syriac גֹּנוֹ, gono, justice, clemency.]

SARGON, king of Assyria. We believe him to have been Esar-haddon. Isaiah xx. 1. See ESAR-HADDON.

SARID, שָׂרִיד, refreshed, or rested; from שָׂרַד sharad: otherwise, hand of the prince, or song of the hand; from שָׂרַר sharar to govern, and שֹׁר shur, a song, and יָד jad, the hand. [The residue, or remnant, of a people, or of a city.]

SARID, a boundary city of Zebulun. Josh. xix. 10, 12. We read of Saridim, Joel ii. 32. and Theodotion has taken it for a proper name. But Jerom translates it by relique, a remnant.—He owns, however, that the Jews take it for the name of a place. [Eng. Tr. the remnant.]

SARSECHIM, שָׂרֵשְׁכִים Naβσαρεαχιμ, from שָׂרַר sharar, to rule, and סָךְ sacac, to cover: otherwise, of the perfumes; from סָךְ sac, ointment, or perfume. This word being Babylonish its true etymology is not in the Hebrew. [A chief of eunuchs, or officers of the court; a bowl or jug, being called in Persian, sacas.]

SARSECHIM, a chief of the Babylonian army. This is a name of dignity, and signifies, chief of the cup-bearers; princeps pincernarum. Jer. xxxix. 3.

SARTHAN, צָרְתָן, pain, or tribulation, or chaining, or what is placed; otherwise, figure; from צָרַר tsarar, pain, trouble, snares, chains, and from צָרָה tsurah, to place, to put: or from צֹר tsur, to figure; otherwise, giving, or lying in ambush; from נָתַן nathan, to give, and זֹר zur, ambush.

[The narrow dwelling: of the same import as Zereda. Josh. iii. 16. 1 Kings vii. 46. Written ZARTANAH, 1 Kings iv. 12.]

SARTHAN, or SARTHANA, a city which some place east of Jordan; but it was rather on the west. The waters retired as far as Sarthan, or Zaretan, when Israel passed over Jordan. Josh. iii. 16. Between Succoth and Zarthan king Solomon had the great brazen vessels cast, which were for the temple. 1 Kings vii. 46. Sarthan is the same as Zeredathah, 2 Chron. iv. 17. perhaps also the same as Zereda. 1 Kings xi. 26. the country of Jeroboam, son of Nebat.

SATAN, שָׂטָן, Satanās, Διάβολος, contrary, adversary, a contrary party in a process, an enemy, an accuser.

SATAN. This Hebrew word is often translated adversary, in the Septuagint, and in the Vulgate. 1 Samuel xxix. 4, the princes of the Philistines say to Achish, send back David, "lest in the battle he be an adversary (Satan) to us, and turn his arms against us." And "the Lord stirred up adversaries (Satans) to Solomon, in the persons of Hadad and Rezon." 1 Kings xi. 14, 23, 24.

Sometimes Jerom has preserved the word Satan in the sense of an adversary; as 1 Kings v. 4. non est Sathan, neque occursus malus. I have neither enemy nor misfortune. 2 Sam. xix. 22. Cur efficiamini mihi hodie in Sathan? Ye children of Zeruiah, why are ye become my enemies? At other times Satan is put for the devil; Job i. 6, 7, 11, &c. Satan presented himself among the sons of God. Psalm cix. 6. "Let Satan stand at his right hand." And Zechariah, iii. "Satan standing at his right-hand. And the Lord said unto Satan, the Lord rebuke thee, O Satan."

In the New Testament, the word Satan is taken, both in the sense of an adversary, and for the devil; Jesus Christ says to Peter, "Get thee thee behind me Satan, thou art an offence unto me; Matt. xvi. 23. Mark viii. 33. i. e. begone O my adversary, you that withstand what I most desire." But commonly Satan is taken for the devil. Matt. xii. 26. Mark iii. 23. "If Satan cast out Satan, he is divided against himself." And Revelations, xx. 2. "He laid hold on the dragon that old serpent, which is the devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. CLIII. CCLXXXIII. DII.

The word Satan in Scripture often denotes an accuser, a plaintiff in a suit, and I think this to be the most literal signification of the word. Zechariah says, iii. 1. "he shewed me Joshua the high-priest standing before the angel of the Lord, and Satan standing at his right-hand, to resist him. The Septuagint have translated this word by Diabolus, which also signifies an adversary, a slanderer, an accuser. Satan, or the accuser, stood at the right-hand of Joshua: (also, Psalm cix. 6. "let Satan stand at his right-hand." Heb. Sathan stet à dextris ejus.) Zechariah goes on; "And the Lord said unto Satan, The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan." Let him despise thy accusations, let him condemn and reprove thy malice.

To this passage is referred what is said, Jude 9, "Yet Michael the arch-angel when contending with the devil, he disputed about the body of Moses (which the devil would have discovered to the children of Israel, in order to seduce them to pay it a superstitious worship) durst not bring against him a railing accusation, but said, the Lord rebuke thee." Diabolus in this passage is the same as Satan in Zechariah.

Angel of Satan. See ANGEL VIII. Add.

Kingdom of Satan. In the gospel, Matt. xii. 26. Mark iii. 23. Jesus Christ represents Satan as a monarch, who has subordinate devils obedient to him. If Beelzebub, says he, expells devils, his kingdom is divided against itself; he labours for his own ruin: which is not credible. St. Paul acknowledges, Acts xxvi. 18. that all who are not true subjects of Jesus Christ, are under the empire and power of Satan. St. John in the Revelations says, that after a thousand years Satan should be unbound, should issue from hell, and seduce the nations, Rev. xx. 7.

The Synagogue of Satan, Rev. ii. 9, 13. probably denotes the unbelieving Jews, the false zealots for the law of Moses, who at the beginning were the most eager persecutors of the Christians. They were very numerous at Smyrna, where Polycarp was bishop, to whom St. John writes.

The heights, or the depths of Satan. St. John writing to the Christians of Thyatira, says, Rev. ii. 24. "which have not known the depths of Satan; τὰ βάθη τοῦ Σατάν, i. e. the mysteries of the Nicolaitans, and of the Simonians, who concealed their errors under deep abstruseness; they spoke of certain intelligences which created the world, but were in opposition to the Creator. They taught a profound knowledge of the nature of angels, and their different degrees. They had secret books written in an abstruse and mysterious manner; and these St. John calls Depths of Satan.

To be delivered up to Satan, is to be excommunicated and surrendered to the devil for a season, who visibly possessed people, that had deserved this punishment. St. Paul delivered up to Satan, Hymeneus and Alexander, that they might learn not to blaspheme. 1 Tim. i. 20. He also surrendered up to him the incestuous person of Corinth, "for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord." 1 Cor. v. 5. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CLIII. "of SATAN."

When Jesus Christ sent his disciples to preach in the cities and villages of Judea, they returned back with joy, saying, "Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name." Luke x. 17, 18. Jesus tells them, "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven."—He seems to allude to that passage of Isaiah xiv. 12. "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning!" By which he insinuated, that the kingdom of the devil was coming to a period. [See LUCIFER, and FRAGMENTS, No. DII.] He says, Luke xxii. 31, to Peter, "Satan hath desired to have thee, that he may sift thee as wheat, but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not," shewing thereby what efforts the devil would make to destroy him; as also the church.

We have observed elsewhere, that the Hebrews ascribed to the operations of Satan, great part of bodily distempers. Thus, Luke xiii. 16. "Ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound, lo these eighteen years, to be loosed from this bond on the Sabbath-day?"

By collecting all the passages where Satan (or the devil) is mentioned, it may be observed, that he fell from heaven, with all his company; that God cast him down from thence as a punishment of his pride; that by his envy and malice, death, with all other evils came into the world; that by the permission of God he exercises a sort of government in the world over his subordinates, apostate angels like himself;—that that God makes use of him to prove good men, and to chastise bad ones; that he is a lying spirit in the mouth of false prophets, seducers, and heretics; that he, or some of his, torment, obsess, or possess men, inspire them with evil designs, as he did David, when he suggested to him to number his people, and Judas to betray Jesus Christ, and Ananias and Sapphira to conceal the price of their field. That he roves about full of rage, like a roaring lion, to tempt, to betray, to destroy, and to involve us in guilt and wickedness.

That his power and malice are restrained within certain limits, and controuled by the will of God; that he sometimes appears to men to seduce them; that he can transform himself into an angel of light; that he sometimes assumes the form of a spectre, as he appeared to the Egyptians while they were involved in darkness in the days of Moses; that he inflicts several diseases on men; that he chiefly presides over death, and bears away the souls of the wicked to hell; that at present he is confined to hell, as in a prison, but that he will be unbound and set at liberty in the time of Anti-Christ; that hell-fire is prepared for him and his; that he is to be judged at the last day. But I cannot perceive very clearly from Scripture, that he torments the souls of the wicked in hell, as we generally believe.

SAVARAN, Σαῦρα or Saura. A Greek word, signifying Salamander, a kind of Lizard.

SAVARAN, or SAURA. The surname of Eleazar, brother of Judas Maccabæus. 1 Macc. vi. 43. Ἐλεάζαρ ὁ Σαυράν. Some think that Saura, or Savarán, was the surname of Mattathias father of Eleazar, because the Vulgate reads, Eleazar filius Saura. But the Greek has Eleazar surnamed Savaran; and the Syriac, surnamed Horam. It is not known whence he had the surname of Saura. In Macc. xi. 5. he is surnamed Avaran, Avaron, or Aharon.

SAVIOUR, Σωτήρ, Salvator. This name is appropriated to our Lord Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world, who was prefigured by those to whom the Old Testament gives the name of Saviour, as Joshua, the Judges of Israel, the kings David, Solomon, Josiah, and the great men raised up to deliver the people of God, as Mattathias, Judas Maccabæus, and the rest. The prophets had described Jesus Christ, under the name of Saviour; e. gr. Isaiah xii. 3. "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation, or of the Saviour. The Lord shall send them a Saviour, even a great one, and he shall deliver them." chap. xix. 20.—"I, even I am the Lord, and beside me there is no Saviour." chap. xliii. 11. The apostles and sacred writers of the New Testament, generally give to Jesus Christ the name of THE Saviour, by way of eminence. When the angel foretold his birth, he said he should be called Jesus, i. e. a Saviour; "for he shall save his people from their sins." Matth. i. 21. See also John iv. 42. Acts xiii. 23. Philipp. iii. 20., &c.

[It is worth while to trace, in a few words, the application of this title to the great Mediator. He is announced, Luke ii. 11, as A saviour, who is A Christ, A Lord;" where the absence of the article before all the nouns, deserves notice; and seems to imply that his character was not fully described on this occasion. Much stronger is the expression of the Samaritans, John iv. 42. "We know that this is indeed THE CHRIST, THE Saviour of the world," στος ἐστιν ἀληθῶς Ὁ Σωτήρ τοῦ κόσμου Ὁ Χριστός, where the articles prefixed to the nouns have a special force in them, together with a general import. Perhaps, it is somewhat unhappy that the term prince has been adopted in connexion with Saviour, Acts v. 31. since it suggests the notion of temporal priority, not to say, of temporal authority. It is rendered in the margin author (Vulg. Autorem vitæ, iii. 15.) and seems to denote properly a leader, the first of a company, or body of followers. Him (Jesus) hath God exalted to be leader, precursor of his followers into heaven, also Saviour, by giving repentance to Israel, and remission of sins." Christ is called the saviour of the body," Eph. v. 23. where the comparion is to the head, which is the protector, the guardian of the whole person; that which completes, governs, and superintends the entire man. The Saviour is said to be expected from heaven, Phil. iii. 20. Titus ii. 13. and in short, the title of Saviour is so connected with Deity, that it seems to be impossible to separate them, and to draw the line of distinction between them; Titus i. 3. ii. 10. iii. 4. 2 Pet. i. 1. Jude 35. et al. and this, independent of the late Mr. Granville Sharpe's rule of construction; though strongly corroborated by it.]

SAVIOUR, to save, Salvation. We have noticed several acceptations of the word Salvation under its article. The name Saviour is given to the patriarch Joseph. Pharaoh changed his name, when he took him into his service, and called him in the Egyptian tongue, Saviour of the world. Gen. xli. 45. פַּרְעֹה פִּנְחָס, Zaphnat Phaenach. LXX. Ψονδομ-φανηχ. Sym. Σαφθφανή. The Hebrew reads Zaphnath-phaenah; and these words are rather Hebrew than Egyptian Egyptian [but, q.?]. Jerom acknowledges, in his Hebrew Questions on Genesis, that they signify in Hebrew, he that discovers secrets. But in Egyptian they may have another signification. And those who were consulted by Jerom on this point, might probably tell him, that they signified Saviour of the world. Nevertheless, Philo, Josephus, and others, who thought them to be Egyptian, maintain, that in this language Zaphnath-phaneah signifies, one that discovers secrets, or that interprets dreams. The Syriac or Chaldean paraphrasts, and two or three ancient Greek interpreters, are quoted for this: who explain it in the same sense. See ZAPHNATH-PAANEAH.

God often takes to himself the name of Saviour of Israel, 1 Sam. xiv. 39. David also calls him his strength and his Saviour. 2 Sam. xxii. 3. "There is no Saviour beside me," says the Lord, in the prophet Hosea, xiii. 4. And Isaiah, xvii. 10. "Thou hast forgotten the God of thy Salvation," or thy Saviour. And in truth, God is the Saviour of saviours, the God of gods; without him there is neither salvation, nor deliverance, nor succour. He raises up saviours to his people: he raised them a saviour in the person of Othniel, son of Kenez, against the king of Mesopotamia, who oppressed them: Judges iii. 9. Another in Ehud, son of Gerah, against Eglon, king of the Moabites. Judg. iii. 15. Obadiah, 21, promises that the Lord will send saviours on the mountain of Sion, to judge the mountain of Esau. Probably he means the Maccabees, who subdued the Idumeans.

To save is commonly taken for defending any one when in danger; also for flying. Save yourself (or escape) on this mountain. I cannot save myself (or escape) upon the mountain. Gen. xix. 17, 19. To save is also put for preserving, e. gr. those who have avoided any danger, who have fled from a rout or defeat, those who have escaped the sword of the conqueror. Salvatae sunt reliquiae populi, says Deborah in her song, Judg. v. 13. God has preserved his people, and defended them from the hand of king Jabin. David fled, and was saved. 2 Sam. xvii. 22, xii. 18.

To save one's soul, to save one's life. "The seed of the righteous shall be delivered, or saved." Prov. xi. 21. To save the souls, is to save and preserve the persons. "Thou hast kept me alive (or saved me) that I should not go down to the pit." Psalm xxx. 3. thou hast not suffered me to be reduced to the condition of the dead. "Save me from bloody men;" Psalm lix. 2. deliver me out of their hands. "I will save thee from afar." Jer. xxx. 10. I will bring thee back from a distant country, I will deliver thee out of captivity. "Thou preservest (or savest) man and beast," Psalm xxxvi. 6. Thou givest them their subsistence; thy providence is exerted over both, though after a different manner. "Save thyself. He saved others, himself he cannot save," Matth. xxvii. 40, 42. Thus said the Jews to Jesus Christ. Let him deliver himself out of this danger; let him deliver himself from death, as he has delivered others.

[There is some difficulty in restraining the term save (and salvation) to its primitive import, in certain passages of S. S. When Peter exhorts the Jews, Acts ii. 40, Save yourselves from this untoward generation," he means, from the calamities with which their nation would soon be visited; and this expectation he authorizes by the declaration of the prophet Joel, of the wonders in heaven, &c., who adds, "whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord, shall be saved;" as in fact, all Christians were, by withdrawing from Jerusalem, at the time of its siege. Comp. Matt. x. 22. xxiv. 13. Mark xiii. 13.—Yet St. Paul quotes this passage in a different sense, Rom. x. 13, implying that whoever, whether Jew or Greek, "shall call on the name of the Lord, shall be saved;" certainly not from the miseries of Jerusalem; but from the consequences of sin.

Nor is it less difficult to say in what sense all Israel shall be saved, Rom. xi. 26. It cannot mean all the nation that ever existed; since thousands of them were marked by misery, within a few years from the date of this Epistle; neither can it mean eternal salvation, since not all Israel was worthy of that felicity. Perhaps, it may refer to that happy time, when the Jews, as a nation, shall acknowledge the gracious Deliverer come out of Sion; and shall be brought into a state of grace, leading to salvation, unless frustrated by personal transgression, &c. Comp. chap. ix. 27. "a remnant shall be saved," &c.

When we read, 1 Tim. ii. 15, that women shall be saved in child-bearing," we must take the term in a qualified sense; since all women are not so happy. And when we are told, 1 Cor. iii. 15. that if any man's work be burned—he himself shall be saved;" it is necessary to avoid the sense of certainty in the English term shall, and to consider the expression as importing may be saved, not must be saved. It comes, therefore, all students of the Bible, to examine carefully the intention of the writer, in passages where this term, (or its cognates) occurs; and not to quote at random, as if to be saved always intended eternal salvation, since it may intend only temporal salvation, or a state of of offered salvation, or a state of grace leading to salvation, or salvation begun, but not yet completed, &c. It may refer to personal safety, to spiritual deliverance, to national prosperity, &c. Some may believe to the saving of the soul, Heb. x. 39. others, as Noah, in his ark, may effect the saving, i. e. the preservation of their families. chap. xi. 7.]

SAUL, שָׂאֻל, DEMANDED, or lent; ditch, sepulchre, death, or hell; from שָׂאֻל shaal, or sheol, according to different ways of reading. [So we have among the Roman names Desideratus, Exoratus, Optatus, Rogatus, &c. the Arabic Murad, has the same import. It is written in Greek Σαῦλ, Acts ix. 4. and Σαῦλος, viii. 1.]

I. SAUL, king of Idumea, Gen. xxxvi. 37. This Saul was of Rehoboth, and succeeded Samlah of Masrekah.

II. SAUL, son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin, the first king of the Israelites. Kish having lost certain asses, sent his son Saul to seek them. After he had in vain travelled over a considerable country, and was on the point of returning to Gibeah to his father, a servant who was with him said, Here is a very famous prophet, hard by, let us consult him; so they went to Ramah, where they learned that the prophet Samuel was. Saul asked him where the seer or prophet, lived? Samuel answered, "It is I who am the seer;" he introduced Saul and his servant into the room where a feast was kept, placed them at the head of the table, and by way of distinction, served up to Saul the shoulder of a sacrifice. After supper Samuel conducted Saul to his lodging on the terrace of the house, and on the morrow morning he brought him down, and came with him below the city of Ramah.

Afterwards he anointed him, kissed him, and told him of the kingdom to which he was divinely appointed; of the certainty of which he gave him several signs, which were fulfilled that day; and God changed him into another man. All who saw him, said with wonder, What has happened to the son of Kish? Is Saul among the prophets? and this afterwards became a kind of proverb.

Some time after this, Samuel assembled the people at Mizpeh, to give them a king, as they had desired. He cast lots on all the tribes of Israel, and the lot fell on the tribe of Benjamin. He cast them on all the families of this tribe, and it fell on the family of Matri. Lastly, he cast them on the family of Kish, and the lot fell on the person of Saul. He was immediately sought for, but could not be found: they took him, however, from his concealment, and when he was among the people, he appeared taller than the rest by the whole head. The people shouted, and cried, "God save the king!" and Samuel declared before the assembly, the laws and conditions of the kingdom, and then dismissed the assembly. Saul returned to Gibeah, accompanied by a part of the army, consisting of men whose hearts the Lord had inclined to his interests. Others despised Saul, and said, How shall this man save us? But Saul affected not to hear them.

About a month afterwards, Nahash, king of the Ammonites, besieged the city of Jabesh-Gilead; and messengers were sent from Jabesh to Gibeah, to acquaint the people, that the king of the Ammonites had attacked the city, and threatened to put out every man's right eye, as a reproach to Israel. Saul happening to return from the field with his oxen, at that moment; seeing the people weep, he asked the cause. —Then he took his oxen and cut them in pieces, and sent them throughout Israel, saying, Thus shall it be done to the oxen of whoever will not follow Saul and Samuel. He attacked the Ammonites in three places at once, killed a great number; and so dispersed them, that hardly two could be found together. After this, the people returned to Gilgal where they renewed the inauguration of king Saul. This happened in his first year. 1 Sam. xiii. — The Vulgate has it, Filius unius anni erat Saul cum regnare cœpisset, duobus autem annis regnavit super Israel. But the Hebrew is, "Saul was the son of a year in his kingdom; and he reigned two years over Israel, and he chose," — or, in the second year of his reign over Israel, he chose, — The commentators in loc. may be consulted, for the different senses given to this passage. Vide YEAR.

Two years afterwards Saul chose three thousand men out of Israel, of which he gave one thousand to his son Jonathan, and kept two thousand about his person. Jonathan defeated the Philistines at Gibeah: on the news of which the people took courage, and thought of shaking off their yoke. They assembled in great numbers, in arms, before Saul, in Gilgal. The Philistines having intelligence of this, with a prodigious army, encamped at Michmash, east of Bethel. When the Israelites saw themselves thus inclosed, they began to desert their king, who continued seven days at Gilgal, expecting the arrival of the prophet Samuel: but seeing he did not come, he offered sacrifices to God, which he had barely finished when Samuel arrived, and told him he had done ill: So that, (added he) your reign will not continue long,

Samuel

Samuel and Saul, with six hundred men, went from Gilgal to Gibeah; and the Philistines from Michmash came and encamped at Gibeah. One day as Jonathan and his armour-bearer approached the camp of the Philistines, (Vide JONATHAN,) suddenly that camp was in confusion, and the centinels of Saul saw the ground covered with dead bodies. Saul with his people then began to pursue the enemy; and the Israelites who had deserted, rallying, they killed a great number of the Philistines.

Saul on this day had denounced a malediction, and said, "Cursed be he that shall eat any thing till evening." Now Jonathan being absent, knew nothing of this; but as he went through a wood he found honey, and taking some on the end of his staff, he ate it. In the evening, when the people were gathered together after the victory, Saul discovered that God was offended by some crime committed among them; he ordered the lot to be cast on all the army; and the lot fell on Jonathan. Saul sentenced him to die for his inadvertence; but the people delivered him.

When Saul had strengthened himself in the kingdom, he carried his arms abroad, among the enemies of his nation; against Moab, Ammon, Edom; against the kings of Zobah in Syria, and against the Philistines; and which way soever he turned himself, he remained victorious. The times and circumstances of these wars are not known.

After this, Samuel brought him orders from the Lord, to exterminate the Amalekites; that he should spare neither man nor beast, nor any valuable thing whatever. Saul therefore took the field against the Amalekites, and defeated them; but he saved their king, with the best of the cattle, and of the booty. Afterwards, he returned to Gilgal; but as he passed Mount Carmel, (south of Judah, and very different from Carmel on the Mediterranean) he there erected a triumphal arch. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCXVIII. and 1 Sam. xv. 12. Et exerecit sibi manum. Comp. 2 Kings xviii. 18. Absalom erexit sibi manum. "He set him up a hand, or monument." (Eng. Tr. "He set him up a place.") Samuel coming to Gilgal, Saul went to meet him, and said, I have fulfilled the word of the Lord. Samuel replied, Whence then is this lowing of oxen, and bleating of sheep, that echoes in my ears? Saul answered him, The people have brought of the best of the flocks of Amalek, to offer sacrifices to the Lord. But Samuel told him, It is not sacrifice that the Lord requires, but implicit submission to his commands: Obedience is better than burnt-offerings, &c.

Samuel was about to leave Saul, but Saul, laying hold of his garment, it tore in his hands. Then Samuel said to him, Thus hath the Lord torn away the kingdom from you. "The strength (or victory) of Israel will not lie nor repent." (Some apply these words to Saul; as if Samuel, by a bitter irony, should say, that a prince like him that could erect triumphal arches, was not a man to repent: But it seems most eligible to refer them to God, who would not revoke the sentence pronounced against Saul.) However, Samuel returned with him to Gilgal.

Some years afterwards, Samuel, by order of the Lord, gave the royal unction to David; the spirit of the Lord withdrew from Saul, and God suffered an evil spirit to take occasion from the bad state of the humors of this prince, and his melancholy temperament, to actuate, or possess him. Ita Rabb. et Interpret. plures.—David was called in to attend him, to soothe his distemper by music, in which he excelled. He took an affection for David, and made him his armour-bearer. About eight years afterwards, the Philistines came and encamped between Shocoh and Azekah. Saul with the army of Israel took their station in the vale of Elah.—Now in the army of the Philistines was a giant named Goliath, who came daily to insult Israel, by a challenge. Saul had promised his daughter in marriage to any man who should overcome him. David, who had retired from court, and lived with his father at Bethlehem, being sent by him to the camp about this time, offended at these insults, undertook to fight Goliath; which he did, and slew him. Vide DAVID.

But Saul envied David, because, at his return, the women who sung and danced, before the victorious army, chanted, that Saul had killed his thousands, and David his ten thousands. He several times attempted the life of David. He afterwards gave him the command of a thousand men, and promised him Merab, his eldest daughter;—not intending to fulfil his promise: He only sought occasion of putting him to death by the hand of the Philistines. He afterwards married his daughter Merab to another, but offered him his second daughter, Michal; demanding as a dowry, only a hundred foreskins of the Philistines. David soon performed this condition, and married Michal.

Saul seeing that David acquired reputation every day, resolved on his death. Jonathan at a time averted his purpose; but afterwards, Saul relapsed into his usual melancholy, and attempted again to pierce David with the lance he held in his hand. David escaped this also, and retired to his own house, which Saul ordered to be beset. In the night-time Michal let him him down out of a window, and he withdrew to Samuel at Naioth. Saul sent messengers thither to apprehend him, but they were seized there by a prophetic spirit, and when Saul, at last, came thither himself, he also began to prophesy. Vide SAMUEL.

David then passed to Nob, where he received a sword and refreshments from the high-priest Ahimelech. Saul being informed of this some time afterwards by Doeg the Idumean, who happened to be there at the time, immediately sent to Nob, to fetch all the priests before him; he severely reproached them with having supported his enemy; and had them slaughtered before his face, to the number of fourscore and five persons. He went himself afterwards to Nob, and put all the inhabitants to the sword, man, woman, and child; not so much as sparing infants, or cattle.

Saul afterwards pursued David, who retired into the wilderness of En-gedi, and Saul followed him with troops; but finding himself constrained by a necessity of nature, he entered a cave, where David and his people were hid. David coming softly behind him, cut off the lappet of his coat without his perceiving it. When he went out, and was at a distance, David went after him, shewed him the lappet of his coat, which he had cut off, and told him it had been in his power to have killed him, but that he would never lift his hand against the Lord's anointed. Saul moved with this generosity, could not forbear shedding tears; acknowledging himself to be unjust. After this, he went back to his own house, and David retired into the wilderness of Ziph. When the Ziphites knew it, they presently gave Saul notice, who came with his army on the hill of Hachilah. While he was encamped in this place, David went by night into his camp, and penetrated even into the king's tent, where having found every body asleep, he took the king's lance and cup, and withdrew: and thus he again reproved Saul, whom he forced to justify his integrity.

Some years after this, the Philistines invaded Israel. Saul and his troops took the field also, and encamped on the mountains of Gilboa. But when Saul saw the army of the Philistines, which was very formidable, his heart began to fail. He consulted the Lord by his priests and prophets, but received no answer; in this uncertainty, he found out a witch, or enchantress at Endor.

Some time before, Saul had banished all wizards and magicians out of his dominions; and that he might not be known by this witch, he disguised himself, and went with two servants. He desired her to raise up Samuel:—bid her fear nothing, and asked, who she saw ascending? She answered, I see gods, i. e. a great man, a prince, a judge of Israel. (1 Sam. xxviii. 13. אֱלֹהִים רַאֲתִי. Elohim, which name is given to princes, and great men.) Saul fell down at his feet; and Samuel said to him; The Lord is withdrawn from you, and to-morrow you shall be with me, you and your sons, and the Lord will deliver Israel into the hands of the Philistines. Saul sunk immediately, extended on the earth, for he had eat nothing all that day.

In the next day's battle, Israel was put to flight before the Philistines; and the sons of Saul, Jonathan, Abinadab, and Malchishua, were slain. Saul himself was pressed very hard, the archers shooting at him, and wounding him dangerously. Seeing his state was desperate, he said to his armour-bearer, draw thy sword and kill me: but his armour-bearer refused. He then took his own sword and fell upon it; and his armour-bearer followed his example. Thus died Saul the first king of Israel, after a reign of forty years.

An Amalekite, who by chance was near, took off his crown and bracelet, brought them to David, and reported that he himself had slain Saul, but we think he boasted falsely. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCXIX.

The day after the battle, when the Philistines came to take the spoils of the dead, they found the king and his three sons extended upon the plain. They cut off Saul's head, and took away his armour, which was carried to the temple of Ashtarothe; and they hung his body against the walls of Beth-shan, probably opposite to the chief street, because it is said 2 Sam. xxi. 12. that his body was hung up in the street of this city: and 1 Chron. x. 10. that his head was fastened in the temple of Dagon. When the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead were informed of these indignities, they went by night and took down the bodies, and brought them into their city beyond Jordan, where they burnt the remains of the flesh and buried the bones. They fasted and mourned for the king seven days, in commemoration of the service their city had received from him, at the beginning of his reign. Several years afterwards David had these bones removed from Jabesh, into the sepulchre of Kish the father of Saul, at Gibeah. 2 Sam. xxi. 12, 13, 14. Ish-bosheth, the fourth son of Saul, succeeded him in the kingdom, and reigned at Mahanaim beyond Jordan, over eleven tribes; for David then began to reign over the tribe of Judah.

It has been matter of inquiry, whether Saul, on this occasion, could put himself to death, Q div. 2 without without being guilty of a crime? The Rabbins commend Saul for his submission to the orders of God, and exalt the obedience of this prince, who notwithstanding the terrible denunciations of Samuel, and the certainty of his own and his sons' deaths in the battle, yet did not endeavour to avoid it. They add, that what induced him to put himself to death was, his fear that the name of God should be blasphemed by the Philistines, if the king of his people fell into their hands alive. But, in the last actions of Saul, equally as in the first, there appears no mark of certain and solid repentance. We do not see that he had recourse to God, or any view to his glory, when he put himself to death. St. Paul tells us, that we must not do evil that good may come of it. But self-murder is certainly a very great evil. Besides, Saul by his death could not prevent the blasphemy of the Philistines, since they would equally blaspheme the name of the Lord, whether he fell into their hands dead or alive. Lastly, the Scripture says, "So Saul died for his transgression which he committed against the Lord, even against the word of the Lord, which he kept not; and also for asking counsel of one that had a familiar spirit, to enquire of it: and enquired not of the Lord. Therefore he slew him, and turned the kingdom unto David the son of Jesse." 1 Chron. x. 13, 14. Vide RAZIS; also SAMUEL, DAVID, &c.

II. SAUL, surnamed Paul. See PAUL.

SAW. The punishment of the saw was not unknown among the Hebrews. I imagine this punishment came originally from the Persians, or the Chaldeans. I am assured that it is not unknown among the Switzers, and that they practised it not many years ago, on one of their countrymen, guilty of a great crime, in the plain of Grenelle near Paris. They put him into a kind of coffin, and sawed him at length, beginning at his head, as a piece of wood is sawn. Parisatis, king of Persia, caused Roxana to be sawn in two alive. Ctesias, in Persia. Valerius Maximus says, that the Thracians sometimes subjected living men to this torture. The laws of the twelve tables, which the Romans had borrowed from the Greeks, condemned certain crimes to the punishment of the saw. But the execution of it was so rare, as Aulus Gellius says, Noct. Att. lib. xii. cap. 2. that none remembered to have seen it performed. Herodotus lib. vi. relates, that Sabacus, king of Egypt, received an order in a dream, to cut in two all the priests of Egypt. Caius Caligula the emperor, often condemned people of condition to be sawn in two through the middle; aut medio terrâ discrevit. Sueton. in Caio.

St. Paul, speaking of the calamities suffered by saints of the Old Testament, says, some were "sawn asunder." Heb. xi. 37. (Ἐσφραγίσθησαν. Serrâ secti sunt.) Origen, Justin Martyr, Dial. cum Tryphone, Jerom, in Isai. lib. xv. ad finem, the author of the poem against Marcion, printed under the name of Tertullian, and several other ancients, explained this passage of the death of Isaiah, who is said to have been put to death by king Manasseh, with a wooden saw. This circumstance of a saw of wood is perplexing; for no saws are made of wood; and besides a man could not be cut in two with such a saw.—Our conjecture on this matter is by supposing this saw of wood was a sledge loaded with stones and iron spikes, with which they threshed the ears of corn, to get out the grain. Or might it not be understood more simply of a wood-saw, i. e. a saw for cutting wood, there being saws of several kinds, for stone, for iron, for wood, &c.

Daniel also speaks of the punishment of the saw. Susan. 55. "Even now the angel of God hath received the sentence of God, to cut thee in two." St. Matthew says that the wicked servant shall be cut in two, and thrust among hypocrites. Matt. xxiv. 51. Luke xii. 46. The Old Testament alludes to this custom, when it uses the word, "to cut in two, to divide," for putting to death.

SCANDAL. This word, in ancient Greek authors, according to Pollux, signifies that part of a mouse-trap, which is suspended; or, the bended piece of wood that supports what they call the hammer, according to the scholiast of Aristophanes. In general, according to Hesychius, scandalum signifies a snare, an incumbrance. In Scripture, and in ecclesiastical authors, scandal is put for any thing that a man finds in his way, which may occasion him to trip. Thus Moses, Levit. xix. 14. apud LXX. "forbids to put a stumbling block (or scandal) before the blind; i. e. neither wood, stone, nor any thing else, that may make him stumble or fall. Exod. xxiii. 33. he forbids the Israelites to make a covenant with the Canaanites; for fear they should be perverted to idolatry, which would be a great snare, or scandal to them. Saul gave David his daughter Michal in marriage, hoping this match might prove a snare and scandal to him. 1 Sam. xviii. 21. The Lord shall be the happiness and the sanctification of those that fear him; "but for a stone of stumbling, and for a rock of offence (a scandal) to both the houses of Israel; for a gin, and for a snare to the inhabitants of Jerusalem." Isaiah viii. 14. Jesus Christ replies to St. Peter, who would persuade him against his passion;—

"Get

"Get thee behind me Satan, thou art an offence unto me." Matt. xvi. 23. Lastly, he says of himself; "Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended (scandalized) in me;" Matt. xi. 6. or to whom I shall not be an occasion of scandal; to whom my life, my poverty, my birth, my death, my cross, shall not give or administer scandal.

The Greek word Scandal, Σκάνδαλον, or Πρόσκομμα, or Σκῶλον, answers to the Hebrew מַשְׁכָּל, Mashkul, which signifies fall, ruin, sin, what hinders from walking, and makes one fall: which comes from the root shacal, to fall, to tumble; and in the conjugation Hiphil signifies, to cause to fall, to overthrow, to lay snares, &c.

In a moral sense there is active and passive scandal. The first is that which our words or actions may occasion to others; from their evil tendency, or their pernicious influence. Jesus Christ affirms, "It must needs be that offences come;" or, scandals must of necessity arise.—But he adds, "Woe to that man by whom the offence cometh.—If your hand or foot is a cause of scandal to you, cut it off, and cast it from you; you had much better enter the kingdom of God without hand or foot, than be cast into outer darkness with all your limbs entire." Mark ix. 43. He says, "moreover, have a care of offending (scandalizing) one of these little ones that believe in me; it were better for him who occasions a scandal to such, that a mill-stone were hung about his neck, and he were cast into the sea." Jesus Christ, was to the Jews, a scandal, and a rock of offence, against which they struck; on which they have fallen, against which they are broken.

[There can be no doubt, but what the term scandal signifies that which causes a person who is walking, to fall. So, 1 John ii. 10. He who loveth his brother abideth in the light, and no scandal, no impediment, or obstacle against which he might strike his foot, occurs to him, because he sees and avoids such things: whereas, he who walketh in darkness may strike himself against an impediment, a tree, or a post, or may fall into a ditch, or, at least, may kick his foot against a log of wood, or against a stone, because he does not discern those causes of injury which lie in his way.

Very observable here is the truly humane precept, Lev. xix. 14. "Thou shalt not put a stumbling block (scandal, LXX.) before the blind, but shalt fear thy God," who can dispense a similar affliction to thee, at his pleasure.—Comp. Rom. xiv. 13.

Nevertheless, it should seem as if the notion of a snare, of a net, or of toils, was legitimate in the term scandal. The cautions given by the writer of Ecclesiasticus imply this:—"Meet not with a harlot, lest thou fall into her snares. Frequent not the company of a singing woman, lest thou be taken with her performances. Gaze not on a maid, that thou scandalizest not by her pleasing accomplishments." chap. ix. 4, 5, 6. From the company, and the consequences, cautioned against in this passage, and its connection, it is evident, that to be scandalized, is equivalent to being snares, or taken, or caught at last, as wild animals, birds, fishes, &c. Perhaps both these ideas may meet in a pit-fall, or trap, dug for the purpose of catching wild creatures, as a Wolf-trap, in Europe, an Elephant-trap, in Asia, and others of a like nature.

The reader will observe in the instances quoted, an erroneous self-persuasion of safety, a delusive contempt of danger; hence mistake seems to belong to the term. So Psal. lxxix. 20. Rom. xi. 9. "Let their table—a good thing in their esteem—be made a snare, and a trap, and a scandal to them." So Deut. vii. 16. "Thou shalt not serve their gods—however beneficial such service might seem to thee—lest it become a snare (scandal, LXX.) to thee." When we read, that, the Jews were scandalized at the mean family of Christ, Matt. xiii. 57. Luke viii. 13. it implies mistake, since his family was truly Royal;—at the doctrine of the cross, Gal. v. 11. it implies mistake, since the resurrection had removed that cause of scandal.—at the persecutions suffered by Christians,—since that was really their glory, &c.

The reader will also observe that the natural consequence of detecting delusion, is indignation; hence our Lord says to Peter, thy mistake is a cause of indignation—a scandal, to me. Comp. Rom. xvi. 17. Mark them who mislead their brethren, and thereby cause divisions, and misunderstandings—scandals—mutual indignation, bickerings, among you. Moreover, Christ shall remove out of his kingdom every thing that causeth indignation, scandals, Matt. xiii. 41.

Scandals may be either natural, or fabricated on purpose. So we read Isaiah lvii. 14. "Prepare the way, take up the stumbling-blocks (scandals, LXX.) out of the way of my people." But, Judith v. 1. "Holofernes was informed that the children of Israel had shut up the passages, fortified the hills, and had laid impediments—scandals—in the champaign countries;" they had cut up the roads by deep pits, trenches, ravines, inundations, had felled trees, &c. to render them impassable.

From these passages the reader will easily infer the true import of the word to which our

English word scandal, scandalous, is not always equivalent.]

The Mountain of Scandal, Mons Offensionis, was the Mount of Olives, upon which Solomon built temples and erected altars to his false gods, to please his strange wives, 1 Kings xi. 4. 2 Kings xxiii. 13.

SCEPTRE, Greek, Skeptron, Heb. שֶׁבֶט, Shebet. This word properly signifies,

I. A Rod of command, a staff of authority, a sceptre; it is placed in the hand of gods, of kings, of governors of a province, of the chief of a people. Jacob foretold that "the sceptre should not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet, until Shiloh come, and unto him shall the gathering of the people be." Gen. xlix. 10. And Balaam, foretelling the coming of the Messiah, says, "A sceptre shall rise out of Israel." Numb. xxiv. 17. Baruch speaks of the sceptre put by the Babylonians in the hands of their gods. chap. vi. 13. Sceptrum habet ut homo, sicut Judex regionis. It is given also to scribes, to commissaries, who keep a list of troops. Judges v. 14. The prophets often speak of the sceptre of dominion; Isai. xiv. 5. xix. 11, 14. And Amos represents sovereign power by—him that holds the sceptre. Amos i. 5, 8. Ahasuerus carried in his hand a golden sceptre, &c. Esther viii. 4. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXIII.

II. The sceptre is put for the rod of correction, for the sovereign authority that punishes and humbles. Psalm ii. 9. "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron," i. e. an iron sceptre. The wise man often uses the Hebrew word Shebet, to express the rod with which the disobedient son, and the intractable servant, are disciplined. Prov. xxii. 15.

III. The sceptre is very often taken for a tribe; probably, because the princes of each tribe carried a sceptre, or a wand of command, to mark their dignity. The LXX. and Vulgate, generally translate this Hebrew word by tribe; but sometimes they preserve the word sceptre. LXX. 1 Sam. ix. 21. x. 19, 20, 21. xv. 17. 1 Kings viii. 16. xi. 13, 32, 35. xii. 20, 21.—Vulgate, see Numb. xviii. 2. Jerem. li. 19.

IV. The sceptre, or the Hebrew Shebet, signifies a shepherd's wand, Levit. xxvii. 32. the truncheon of a warrior, or any common staff; 2 Sam. xxiii. 21. the dart, javelin, or lance of a soldier, 2 Sam. xxviii. 14. the rod or staff with which they thresh the smaller grain. Isaiah xxviii. 27.

SCEVA, Σκίβα, disposed, prepared: from σκενάζω, I dispose, I prepare.

SCEVA, chief of the priests; Acts xix. 14,

i. e. chief of the synagogue at Ephesus, according to some, or rather, chief of one of the twenty-four sacerdotal families, who waited each in their turn, in the temple at Jerusalem. 1 Chr. xxiv. 7, 8, &c. Lastly, they gave the name of chief of the priests to a high-priest who had been deposed, although no longer in office. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 15. speaks of the high-priest, Jesus son of Siah, who lived nine or ten years after the birth of Jesus Christ: in another place, (de Vita sua, cap. 1008, 1009, 1020, 1021. et de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 25.) of another priest called Jesus son of Sapha, or Saphia, who had a great share in the affairs of the Jews, during the last war against the Romans. This might be the son of one, or the other, of those priests, who went from city to city, as several Jews did, to exorcise demoniacs. These exorcists being at Ephesus, pretended to invoke the name of Jesus over the possessed; saying, "we conjure thee by Jesus, whom Paul preaches." But the evil spirit answered, "Jesus I know, and Paul I know, but who are ye?" at the same time the possessed person, threw himself upon two of these exorcists, and handled them so rudely, that they were forced to run out of the house naked and wounded.

SCHISM, from Σχίσμα, which signifies rupture, or division. St. Paul exhorts the Corinthians, 1 Cor. i. 10. to live in union together, that there be no schisms—no divisions among you. St. John says, chap. ix. 16. that the Jews were divided among themselves concerning Jesus Christ, some affirming, that he was a true prophet, others, that he was a deceiver; "And there was a division (schism) among them."—When Jeroboam revolted against Rehoboam, and was acknowledged king by the ten tribes, he made a schism, separated from the religion of the Lord, forsook the communion of Judah, and no longer frequented the temple, which was the chosen and appointed place, to offer worship to the Lord. The Cuthites settled in Samaria, who came from beyond the Euphrates, continued in schism. The Jews at this day look on the Caraites as schismatics, because they do not receive their traditions.

We have several schisms in the history of the Christian church. The difference made between schism and heresy, is, that heresy is founded on capital errors, which the heretic maintains obstinately, and in contempt of the censures of the church. Schism, is not merely founded on the errors of him who separates from the church, but on his obstinacy in continuing separate from its communion. [Matt. ix. 16. says, the rent—schism—in an old garment, is made worse by the the insertion of harsh new cloth. It therefore signifies a fissure, or division of any kind: not merely a great and notorious division of opinion, proceeding to the extremes of party spirit, in public bodies; but lesser feelings, contradictions, and controversies about minor matters, and, in short, whatever may produce the unhappy effect of a house—a family—divided against itself.]

SCHOOLS, of the Jews. The Hebrews always diligently taught and studied the laws received from Moses. The father of a family studied, and taught them in his own family: the Rabbins taught them in the temple, in the synagogues, and in the academies. They pretend that even before the deluge there were schools of which the patriarchs had the direction. They place Adam at their head, then Enoch, and then Noah. Melchisedec, say they, kept a school in the city of Kiriath-sepher, otherwise Hebron, in Palestine. Abraham, who had been instructed by Heber, taught in Chaldea and in Egypt. Joseph. Antiq. lib. i. cap. 8. Jacob succeeded Abraham in the office of teaching. In Gen. xxv. 27. we read that he was “a plain man dwelling in tents;” which according to the Chaldee paraphrast, is, “that he was a perfect man, and a minister of the house of doctrine.”

All this indeed, must needs be very precarious. It cannot be doubted, but that Moses, Aaron, and the elders of Israel, instructed the people in the wilderness; and that many good Israelites very diligently instructed their families in the fear of God. But all this does not prove, that there were such schools as we are now enquiring after. Under Joshua we see a kind of academy of the prophets, where the sons of the prophets, i. e. their disciples, lived retired, in study, meditation, and reading the law of God. There were schools of the prophets at Naioth in Ramah. David and Samuel withdrew thither. 1 Sam. xix. 19, 20, &c. Saul sent messengers thither to apprehend David, &c.

We find others also under the prophets Elijah and Elisha at Bethel, 2 Kings ii. 3. and in the plain of Jericho: and a great number in the kingdom of Israel, 2 Kings ii. 5. Some have thought, that Elijah had also a society of them on mount Carmel, 1 Kings xviii. 4, 13. xix. 1. xx. 35, &c. These prophets were consulted on affairs of importance: people went to hear their lessons, as appears from the hostess of Elisha. Her husband asks her, why she went to see the prophet, seeing that day was neither the Sabbath, nor the new-moon? Lightfoot, Centur. p. 661. 2 Kings iv. 23. These schools continued down to the captivity of Babylon; and it should seem, that the captives resorted to such establishments, to hear the prophets, when there were any, in the places where they resided. Ezekiel relates sundry conversations with the elders of Israel, who came to see him, and to consult him. The people also assembled about him, as if to hear him, and to be instructed by him; but they were not very careful to reduce his instructions to practice. Ezekiel viii. xiv. xx.

These schools or societies, of the prophets were succeeded by synagogues. It is doubted whether there were any such before the captivity of Babylon. Yet we read in the Psalms that Nebuchadnezzar burnt all the synagogues of the country. The elders of Israel passed the night in prayer in the place of assembly, Judith vi. 21. 22. intreating the assistance of the Lord against Holofernes. The Greek of Esther, iv. 16. insinuates, that there were also synagogues at Susa, in the time of Esther and Mordecai. We are assured, that they became so numerous in Judea, after the return from the captivity, that in the city of Jerusalem only, there were four hundred. Every trading company had its own, and the strangers had several, also. Vitringa, de Synagog. veter. lib. i. p. 2. cap. 10. Franc. Burman.

It was only after the return from the captivity that there was in Israel that distinction of sects, Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenians, &c. Each sect had its particular school.

The method of teaching in the synagogues and in the schools, is plainly observable in the gospels, and in the Acts. When Jesus Christ was twelve years of age, he was found in the temple, in the midst of the doctors, hearing them, and asking them questions. Luke ii. 46. Entering one day into the synagogue at Nazareth, his own country, they presented to him the volume of the prophet Isaiah. Luke iv. 16, 17. He unrolled and opened it, and having read a passage out of the prophet, he rolled it up again, and sat down to speak. He read it therefore standing, just as we now read the gospel. St. Paul says, Acts xxii. 3. that he had studied at the feet of Gamaliel. Philo, (quod omnis probus liber) relates, that among the Essenes, the children sat at the feet of their masters, who interpreted the law, and explained the figurative and allegorical sense of it, after the manner of the ancient philosophers. The author published under the name of St. Ambrose, on the epistles of Paul, says, on 1 Cor. xiv. that among the Hebrews the Rabbins sat on chairs that were raised, scholars of the greatest proficiency, sat on benches just below their masters, and the younger sort sat on the ground, on hassocks.

But

But the authors of the Talmud, tit. Megillah, teach us, that anciently the masters sat down, and the scholars stood up. But this custom was changed before the destruction of the temple by the Romans; and from that time, the master sat in the first place, and the scholars sat round about him, in chairs on the ground. The master taught either by himself, or by an interpreter. If he used an interpreter, he spoke Hebrew to him, and the interpreter explained it in the vulgar tongue. If the scholars desired to ask any question of the master, they addressed themselves to the interpreter, who proposed it to the Rabbins, and reported his answer to the scholars. [Vide 1 Cor. xiv. 27.]

Jerom, on Isaiah, lib. iii. cap. 8. says, that a little before the birth of Jesus Christ, two famous Rabbins, Shammai and Hillel, the heads of two celebrated schools, formed two parties among the Jews; and were the masters of the Scribes and Pharisees. Akiba succeeded them, and was master to the famous Aquila, the translator of the Scriptures of the Old Testament.—Akiba had Meir for his successor, after whom appeared Johanan, son of Zachai, then Eliezer, afterwards Delphon, Joseph the Galilean, and lastly Joshua, who presided over this school at the taking of Jerusalem. Thus the Jews made out the succession of their doctors in the time of Jerom.

The Rabbins affirm, that after the destruction of Jerusalem, they established a school at Japhne in Galilee, called afterwards Iveline, and another at Lydda, or Diospolis. Akiba first professed at Diospolis, then at Japhne. Gamaliel succeeded him at Diospolis, and he succeeded Gamaliel at Japhne. But the most famous academy, was that of Tiberias in Galilee. There Judah the holy, a disciple of Meir, Chinina, and Johanan, were professors, successively. After some time, Judah withdrew from Tiberias, and opened a school at Sephoris, where he professed for seventeen years. But it is proper to observe, that all this succession of masters and schools is very uncertain. See F. Morin, Exercitationes Biblicæ, lib. ii. Exer. 2. cap. 1, 3.

After the fall of the schools in Palestine, about the middle of the third century, the Jews are constrained to seek the succession of their doctors beyond the Euphrates, at Sora, at Pumbedita, at Nahardea, and at Perutzshibbur; places little known, and whose very situations are doubtful. They think it was the doctors Rab and Samuel, disciples of Judah the holy, who founded them about A. D. 220. They subsisted; they say, 800 years, till about A. D. 1030, when they were destroyed by the Saracens.

On the ruins of these schools were formed those of Egypt and Europe. See RABBINS.

SCOPAS, an Etolian, general of the armies of Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt, Joseph. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 3. Polyb. Hist. lib. xvi. He was sent by the king his master into Judea, and Cæle-Syria, A. M. 3806, ante A. D. 198. to recover the cities and provinces conquered from him, by Antiochus the Great. Scopas had at first the advantage, probably because his expedition was in the winter; but the summer following he was beat by Antiochus near Paneas, about the sources of Jordan. Jerom, on Daniel xi. says, that Scopas retiring into the city of Sidon, was there besieged by Antiochus; that Ptolemy Epiphanes attempted to deliver him, and sent three very experienced captains, Æropus, Menocles, and Damoxenus; but, they being unable to raise the siege, Scopas was forced to surrender, happy enough in saving his life, with the remainder of his troops. He returned into Egypt, but did not long remain quiet; for, two years afterwards, he affected to be made king of Egypt, with the assistance of the Etolians whom he commanded; but his irresolution ruined him. Polyb. lib. xvii. Aristomenes and Polycrates accused him of high treason; and he was become so stupified, that not knowing what defence to make, he was unanimously condemned to die, by all present. The following night Aristomenes put him to death in prison, by poison.

SCOPOS, a place seven furlongs, or eight hundred and seventy-five paces north of Jerusalem, where Titus posted two legions, when he attacked Jerusalem. Joseph. de Bello, lib. vi. cap. 3.

SCORPION. The Scorpion is a small animal which emits a dangerous poison. The head appears to be joined and continued to the breast: it has two eyes in the middle of its head, and two towards its extremity, between which project two arms, like the claws of a lobster. It has eight legs, hairy, proceeding from its breast, each divided into six parts, at the end of which are six pincers. The belly is divided into seven rings, from the last of which the tail proceeds. Some have six eyes, others eight. The tail is long, and formed after the manner of a string of beads (seven) tied end to end, the last bigger than the others, and longer, at the end of which are, sometimes, two stings, which are hollow, and filled with a cold poison, which it ejects into the part which it wounds.

The scorpion is of a blackish colour, like soot; it waddles as it goes, and fixes violently with its snout, and by its feet, on such persons as it seizes, so that it cannot be plucked off without difficulty.. Some have wings like locusts, which fly from one region to another; and are something like bats, say Pliny and Strabo. There are also of several colours: the ancients mention black, yellow, ash-coloured, red, green, white, wine-coloured, and soot-coloured.

They tell us, that in the cold countries scorpions are not venomous; neither are those of a whitish colour. The best and the surest remedy against the bite of a scorpion, is, to squeeze it to pieces on the wound. Moses tells us, that the Hebrews passed through great and terrible wildernesses, where were scorpions; Deut. viii. 15. עקרב, Hakarab. LXX. Σκορπίος; and the serpent called Dipsas. Tertullian, at the beginning of his book called Scorpiacum, has well described the scorpion. From the Hebrew Akrab, are derived Acrabatene, the name of a district in Palestine; also, the ascent of Akrabbim or of the Scorpions.

In Scripture, scorpions are used in a figurative sense, for wicked men; Ezek. ii. 6. "Thou dost dwell among scorpions;" thou livest with wicked and rebellious people. "He that hath hold of her, (an evil wife) is as though he held a scorpion," says Ecclus. xxvi. 7. He runs the hazard of being infected by her poison: she will sting him to death. The same author places scorpions among the instruments of God's vengeance. Ecclus. xxxix. 36. St. John, Rev. ix. 3, 5. well describes the qualities of the scorpion, and the pain that proceeds from its biting.—Comp. FRAGS. and NATURAL HISTORY.

II. SCORPIONS were also a kind of whip armed with points. When the Israelites complained to Rehoboam, of the weight of the yoke wherewith Solomon had loaded them, he replied, 1 Kings xii. 11, 14. 2 Chron. x. 11, 14. "My Father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions;" (בַּעֲקָרְבִים, LXX. ἐν σκορπίοις) i. e. with rods or whips armed with points, or pointed thorns, like the tail of a scorpion. Isidor. Comp. PLATE, SLAVES IN THE EAST, Fig. N.

The mountains called the Scorpions, Akrabbim, were towards the extremity of the Dead Sea, south of Judah. Numbers xxxiv. 4. Josh. xv. 3. For Acrabatene, in Samaria, which took its name from scorpions, or from a place called Akrabbim, see ACRABATENE.

III. SCORPIONS were also machines of war, from which arrows were thrown. 1 Macc. vi. 51. The name of Scorpion was also given to the arrows themselves. This machine is thus described by Tertullian, at the beginning of his book called Scorpiacum: Bellicam machinam, et retractu tela vegetantem, de scorpione nominant.

Id spiculum et fistula est, patula tenuitate in vulnus et virus, quæ figit, effundit. And Vegetius, lib. iv. cap. 22. Scorpiones dicebantur quos nunc manubalistas vocant: idè sic nuncupati, quod parvis subtilibusque spiculis, inferant mortem. See Justus Lipsius, lib. iii. Poliorcetic. Dialog. 4. Vide PLATE of "ANTIENT MILITARY MACHINES."

SCOURGE, or whip. This punishment was very common among the Jews. Moses ordains, Deut. xxv. 1, 2, 3. That "if there be a controversy between men, and they come unto judgment, that the judges may judge them. And if the wicked man be worthy to be beaten, the judge shall cause him to lie down, and to be beaten before his face, according to his fault, by a certain number. Forty stripes he may give him, and not exceed; lest if he should exceed, and beat him above these with many stripes, then thy brother should seem vile unto thee."—There were two ways of giving the lash; one with thongs or whips, made of rope-ends, or straps of leather; the other, with rods, twigs, or branches of some tree.

The Rabbins think, that ordinary faults committed against the law, and scourged, were punished not with blows from a rod, but from a whip. They reckon up one hundred and sixty-eight faults liable to this penalty; Vide, si lubet, Selden, lib. ii. cap. 15. de Synedriis, et Schikard, de Jure Reg. cap. 2. Theor. 7. And they hold that all punishable faults, to which the law has not annexed the penalty of death, must be punished by the scourge. The offender was stripped from his shoulders to his middle, then tied by his arms to a pretty low pillar, that he might lean forward, and the executioner might more easily strike his back. Some maintain that they never gave more or less than thirty-nine strokes, but that in greater faults they struck with proportionate violence. Others think, that when the fault and circumstances required it, they might increase the number of blows. St. Paul informs us, 2 Cor. xi. 24. that at five different times he received thirty-nine stripes from the Jews; which should infer, that this was a fixed number, not to be exceeded.

The same apostle clearly shews in the same place, that correction with rods, was different from that with a whip; for he says, thrice was I beaten with rods. And when he was seized by the Jews in the temple, the tribune of the Roman soldiers ran, and took him out of their hands; and desiring to know the reason of the tumult, he ordered him to be tied and stretched, on the ground, to put him to the question, by beating him with rods; Acts xxii. 24, 25. for so, commonly, commonly, the Romans put to the question. —The bastinado, was sometimes given on the back, and at this day, among the eastern people, it is given on the soles of the feet raised aloft, while the sufferer lies on his belly; this punishment differs from that of the scourge, or the whip.

The Rabbins teach, that punishment by the scourge was not ignominious; and that it could not be objected as a disgrace to those who had suffered it. They pretend, that no Israelite, not even the king, or high-priest, was exempt from this law; but this must be understood of the punishment of whipping inflicted in their synagogues, which was rather a legal and particular penalty, than a public and shameful correction. Philo, in Flacc. et de Specialibus Legib. speaking of the manner in which Flaccus treated the Jews of Alexandria, says, he made them suffer the punishment of the whip, which (says he) is not less insupportable to a free-man, than death itself. Our Saviour, speaking of the pains and ignominy of his passion, commonly puts his scourging in the second place. Matt. xx. 19. Mark x. 34. Luke xviii. 32.

SCRIBE, סֵפֶר, Sepher; LXX. Γραμματεὺς, Grammateus. The word scribe is very common in Scripture, and has several significations.

I. A clerk, writer, or secretary. This was an important employment in the court of the kings of Judah, in which Scripture often mentions the secretaries, as officers of the crown. Seraiah was scribe or secretary to king David, 2 Sam. viii. 17. Shevah and Shemaiah exercised the same office under the same prince. 1 Chron. xxiv. 6. In 1 Kings iv. 3. in Solomon's time we find Elihoreph and Ahiah secretaries to the king: Shebna under Hezekiah, 2 Kings xix. 2. and Shaphan under Josiah, 2 Kings xxii. 8, 9, 10. As few in those times could write well, the employment of a scribe, or writer, was very considerable. [It is so still.]

II. A SCRIBE, is put for a commissary or muster-master of an army, who reviews the troops, keeps the list or roll, and calls them over. It is said, Judg. v. 14. that in the war of Barak against Sisera, "Out of Machir came down governors, and out of Zebulun they that handle the pen of the writer." In the reign of Uzziah king of Judah, is found Jeil the scribe, who had under his hand the king's armies. 2 Chron. xxvi. 11. Jeremiah speaks of a scribe, as prince or chief of the soldiers, who superintended the military exercises of the newly-raised troops. Jer. lii. 25. 2 Kings xxv. 19. Heb. the scribe, prince of the army, who made the people of the country go to war. In the books of the Maccabees, Judas directs the scribes, to stand on the banks of a brook that the army was to cross, to let no one remain beyond the water, but to cause all to pass over, to the war. 1 Macc. v. 42.

III. SCRIBE, is put for an able and skilful man, a doctor of the law, a man of learning, one who understands affairs. Jonathan, David's uncle by the father's side, was "a counsellor, a wise man, and a scribe." 1 Chron. xxvii. 32. Baruch the disciple and secretary of Jeremiah, is called a scribe; so is Gemariah, son of Shaphan; and Jonathan, who lived under the reign of Josiah. Jer. xxxvi. 10, 12, 20, 26. Jesus son of Sirach says, Eccus. x. 5. "In the hand of God is the prosperity of man, and upon the person of the scribe shall be lay his honour." Great commendation is given in Scripture to Ezra, who is celebrated as a skilful scribe, "a ready scribe in the law of Moses." Ezra vii. 6. The scribes of the people, frequently mentioned in the gospels, were public writers, and professed doctors of the law, which they read, and explained, to the people.

Some place the origin of scribes under Moses; but the name does not appear till under the Judges, Judg. v. 14. Others think that David first instituted them, when he established the several classes of the priests and Levites. 1 Chr. xxiv. 6. Epiphanius places their origin at the same time with the sect of the Sadducees. Mention is made in Acts xxiii. 9. of scribes that were of the party of the Pharisees; which has made some believe, that all scribes were Pharisees. But they did not compose any particular sect, there were some of all sects.

Scribes and doctors of the law, in Scripture-phrases, mean the same thing. He that is called a doctor of the law in Matthew xxii. 35. is named a scribe, or one of the scribes, in Mark xii. 28. As the knowledge of the Jews, at that time, chiefly consisted in pharisaical traditions, and in applying them to explain Scripture, the greater number of doctors of the law, or scribes, were Pharisees; and we almost always find them united in Scripture. They all valued themselves on their knowledge of the law, on their studying and teaching it: they had the key of knowledge, and sat in Moses's chair. Luke xi. 52. Matt. xxiii. 2. Epiphanius, and the author of the Recognitions, imputed to St. Clement, reckons the scribes among the sects of the Jews; but it is certain, they constituted no separate sect; they were only distinguished by their study of the law.

SCRIPTURE, or Writing. There is great diversity of opinions concerning the first inventor of letters, and writing. Some maintain, that this this art was practised before the Deluge, and was invented by Adam. Others, that Moses is the first author of whom we have any writings, and that before him there were no written documents. Through the whole lives of the Patriarchs, we see no traces of writing. Moses does not quote any writing extant before his own; for the book of the wars of the Lord, Num. xxi. 14. may be a passage added to the text of Moses: or that book might be composed in his time. Some talk of a book indited by Adam, another by Enoch; and certain other writings are ascribed to the first man, and to Enoch. Josephus also, Antiq. lib. i. speaks of pillars with inscriptions made before the Deluge; they mention also, writings the work of Abraham: but all this is fabulous and apocryphal. [Vide Gen. xxiii. 17.]

There is nothing extant, either more ancient, or more authentic, than the books of Moses; but it will not follow, that there was no writing before him. It appears, on the contrary, by his own account, that writing was common, at that time, in Egypt, which the Hebrews had just quitted, and also among the Hebrews. 'This people seem prepared, and accustomed, to express their thoughts and sentiments by this means. The chief of the nation, without doubt, read the tables of the law. Moses had been instructed in all the knowledge of the Egyptians, and doubtless, in their manner of writing. See LETTERS. PENTATEUCH, Add.—FRAGMENTS, No. XIX. also SEIRATH.

The word Scripture taken absolutely, generally stands for the sacred books of the Old and New Testament. "Did ye never read in the Scripture?" Matt. xxi. 42. "How then shall the Scriptures be fulfilled?" Ibid. xxvi. 54. "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." 2 Tim. iii. 16.

SCRIPTURES CANONICAL. See BIBLE, BOOKS, and CANON OF SCRIPTURE. The forming of the Canon of the sacred books of the Old Testament, is generally ascribed to Esdras, who ranged them in a convenient order. First, the Law: secondly, the Prophets: thirdly, the Ketubim, or Hagiographa, i. e. sacred writings.

Our Saviour seems to have had regard to this old division, when he says; Luke xxiv. 44. "All things must be fulfilled which were written in (1) the Law of Moses, and (2) in the Prophets, and (3) in the Psalms, concerning me." The Psalms are at the head of the Hagiographa. Josephus, against Appion, lib. i. acknowledges the same distribution. "We have (says he) two and twenty books that are of divine authority, of which five are of Moses; the prophets that succeeded Moses composed thirteen of them; the other four are hymns to the honour of God, and rules for the conduct of life."

We must however observe, that the Jews have varied in their division of the holy books; and at this day, instead of twenty-two they reckon twenty-four. But this difference is only in name; and when it is said, that the canon was fixed by Esdras, we must understand it with some restriction; for he could not insert Malachi in it, nor Esther, nor even Nehemiah, where are mentioned the high-priest Jaddus, and Darius Codomannus, king of Persia, who lived after Esdras.

[The reception of the books of the N. T. into the Canon of Scripture, is an article of at least as much importance to us, as Christians, as the admission of any book into the O. T. could be to the Jews. It should be well understood, that the primitive Christians were extremely scrupulous on this; and the rather, because at that time a great number of spurious writings, purporting to possess Apostolic authority, and to enjoin Gospel precepts, were in circulation. Among the various sects, also, which either sprung up as rivals to Christianity, or branched off from it, many writings were received and obeyed, which were corrupt, either in whole, or in part. They were deficient, by the abstraction of parts unfavourable to the views of the leaders of those sects; or they were redundant, by the addition of sentiments not in harmony with those of the genuine documents.

Moreover, as the pieces which compose the N. T. were published at divers times, and were written in places very distant from one another [in languages, also, not mutually intelligible to the inhabitants of these distant countries] we cannot wonder that some should be slow in making their way to general reception; or that, some were never generally received. Those published in the west, were, for a time, little known in the east; and vice versa. In like manner, those written in the Syriac language, could be understood by the Greeks, only by means of an accurate literal translation; nor could the Syrians understand those written in Greek, without similar assistance. It will follow, that the non-acquaintance of either party, or even the non-admission by either party, is not in itself, a sufficient reason for rejecting a tract, that was generally acknowledged, where it was better known.

But among the early Fathers, and by men the most competent to investigate the subject, and the most worthy of our confidence, the books of the present Canon were not all esteemed equally authentic. By Eusebius of Cesarea, before any Canon was established by authority, they are divided into three classes. 1. Those universally received; as,—the four Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, thirteen Epistles of Paul, one Epistle of Peter, one of John. 2. Those doubted of by some, as the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the Revelations; 3. Those doubted of by many, or contradicted by most; as—the Epistle of James, the second Epistle of Peter, that of Jude, and the second and third of John. To this third class, Eusebius seems, in another passage, to refer the Revelations. It was, certainly, doubted of by many; it has continued to be doubted of; and Luther in the preface to his translation strongly questions its canonical authority.

The rule of the Church seems to have been—to admit no book into the N. T. that was not the work of an Apostle, or derived from an Apostle; hence the Gospels of Mark and Luke were said to be derived from the Apostles Peter and Paul: (though some suppose, that being historical, only, not dogmatical, they formed an exception to the rule.) The Epistle of James was doubted of, because some questioned whether it were written by James the Apostle, or by another James. That of Jude was long excluded; and even of late, Michaelis rather negatives its canonical authority; proof of its composition by an Apostle being very deficient. The second and third Epistles of John, being written to private persons, were but little known, in early ages: and we cannot wonder that they long continued not generally acknowledged.—The Epistle to the Hebrews does not claim St. Paul as its author; and the style of it is so different from his, that the most favourable conjecture assigns the thoughts and materials to him, but the composition and diction to another.

On the whole, the scrupulous diligence and judgment of the early Christians in selecting that series of books which afterwards formed the Canon of the N. T. must give us equal satisfaction and pleasure. Succeeding ages have gradually received what formerly was deemed questionable; and our present Canon is certainly more complete than that of the first Christians, not only because of their hesitation, but because the difficulty of procuring copies of the N. T. entire, was very great; while they existed in manuscript only.]

SCYTHIANS, Σκύθαι, tanners, or leather-dressers; from σκύρις. Others translate it drinkers; from σκύρος, a kind of pot, or glass.

Some derive it from the Hebrew קנא cush, or קנח chuth, or קנח chuthah. Col. iii. 11.

SCYTHOPOLITÆ, Σκυθοπολῖται, that inhabit the city of the tanners, or of the Scythians; from the Greek scytha, and polis, a city.

SCYTHOPOLIS, see the article BETH-SHAN, and 2 Macc. xii. 29, 30.

SEA, Hebrew ים, Jam; Greek, Θάλασσα, Thalasse; Latin, Mare.—The Hebrews give the name of Sea to any great collection of water, to a lake, or a pool. The sea of Galilee, or of Tiberias, or of Cinereth, is the lake of Tiberias, or Geneareth, in Galilee. The Dead Sea, the Sea of the Wilderness, the Sea of the East, the Sea of Sodom, the Salt-sea, the Sea Asphaltites, or of Bitumen, is the lake Asphaltites, or the lake of Sodom. The Sea of Semechon is the lake of that name. The Sea of Jazer is the lake near the city Jazer, beyond Jordan. The Sea of Suph, or Zuph, is the Red-sea. The western Sea, or the great Sea, or hindermost Sea, is the Mediterranean.

The Arabians, and Orientals, sometimes give the name of Sea to great rivers, as the Nile, the Euphrates, the Tigris, &c. which by their magnitude, or by the extent of their overflowings, seem little Seas, or great lakes, d'Herbelot, Bib. Orient. p. 672. There are several passages in Scripture, whose explication would be almost impossible without this principle. Isaiah xi. 15. says, "the Lord shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian Sea, and with his mighty wind shall he shake his hand over the river, and shall smite it in the seven streams, and make men go over dry-shod." The Nile is here called the Egyptian Sea: and the whole description marks that river, with its seven mouths: Septemplicis ostia Nili.

The same prophet denotes the Nile by the name of Sea. Isaiah xviii. 1, 2. "Woe to the land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the rivers of Ethiopia." (He calls the Red-sea by the name of the rivers of Ethiopia, or of Cush, because the people of Cush inhabited the eastern shore of this Sea.) "That sendeth ambassadors by the Sea, even in vessels of bulrushes upon the waters." Here he means the Nile by the word Sea. These vessels of bulrushes were peculiar to Egypt, as Pliny observes, lib. vi. cap. 22. Ex ipso papyro navigia texunt, et ex libro vela. Isaiah goes on to address those ambassadors, who sailed on the Nile in vessels of bulrushes. "Go, ye swift messengers to a nation scattered and peeled, to a people terrible from their beginning hitherto; a nation meted out and trodden down, whose land the rivers have spoiled." This description could only agree agree to Egypt, which was then torn in pieces by intestine divisions. Egypt is known to be wasted by the inundations of the Nile; it is a country meted out and trodden down, because the mud being often spread over the land, and concealing the bounds and limits, they are obliged to measure it yearly, &c. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CCCXXII. et seq.

Babylonia, which was watered by the Euphrates, is called by the same prophet, "the desert of the Sea," Isaiah xxi. 1. Whether because of that solitude and devastation to which it was to be reduced; or by way of irony, or antiphrasis, because Babylon was then a much frequented and populous city: q. This city situated on great waters, on the Sea, and which is the habitation of such a multitude of people. Jeremiah, li. 36, 40, speaks of it in the same manner; "The Sea is come up upon Babylon, she is covered with the multitude of the waves thereof." And, a little before; "I will dry up her Sea, and make her springs dry." Also, Isaiah, xxvii. 1. speaking of the king of Babylon, calls him Leviathan, or "the dragon that is in the Sea." Ezekiel gives this name to the king of Egypt, chap. xxxii. 2. "Thou art as a whale in the Seas," because his habitation was on the banks of the Nile. Comp. FRAGS. Nos. DXCI—DXCVIII.

Daniel, xi. 45, speaking of Antiochus, who carried his army beyond the Euphrates, and encamped on the plains of Mesopotamia, says he encamped at Padan, between the Seas, i. e. between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates. Hosea, xi. 10. (Vulgate) calls the Babylonians and Egyptians, "children of the Sea." Nahum, iii. 8. speaking of the city of No, or No-Ammon, which many think to be Thebes, or Diospolis, says, the Sea is its treasure, and the waters serve it for a rampart. This Sea and these waters, certainly can mean nothing but the Nile. Comp. FRAGS. Nos. DXLVII. DXLVIII.

The great Sea, or the western Sea, the hindermost Sea, the Sea of the Philistines, generally expresses the Mediterranean, which lay west of the Land of Promise, and was considered as behind a man who was looking toward the sun rising, having his left-hand to the north, and his right-hand to the south. The Sea is often put for the west, as the right is put for the south. Gen. xii. 8. xiii. 14. et passim. On the Mediterranean Jonah embarked, and on this Sea they floated the timber cut down from mount Libanus, which was brought to Joppa, for building the temple, &c.

The Sea of Suph or Zuph; i. e. the Sea of reeds, is what we call the Red-sea. It is called the Sea of Suph, because of the great quantity of reeds or Sea-wrack found at its bottom, and on its shores. It is still called Bahr Suf, and the weed that grows there is called Sufo. Diodorus Siculus says, Bibl. lib. iii. that it appears all green, because of the weeds that grow beneath its waters. Those who have sailed on this Sea tell us, that it appears red in some places, because of a red sand at the bottom. In other places the water seems to be white, because of white sand: but it appears green where the Sea-wrack grows. But this is only observed in places where the water is low; and the colour of the sand or weeds appears through the water, only because it is very clear and transparent. Don John de Castro, viceroy of the Indies for the king of Portugal, believes, that it was named the Red-sea, because there is a great quantity of coral found in this Sea. Certain it is, that the Old Testament never names this the Red-sea, but the Sea of Zuph. Pliny says, that it obtained the name of the Red-sea, in Greek Erythrea, from a king called Erythros, who reigned in Arabia, and whose tomb was seen in the island Tyrene or Agyris.

Several learned men believe, that this king Erythros is Esau, or Edom. Edom, in Hebrew, signifies red or ruddy, as Erythros does in Greek. But I cannot be persuaded that Edom ever dwelt, either on the shore of the Red-sea, or on the Persian Gulph, which is sometimes called the Red-sea. His dwelling was east of Canaan, towards Bozra. Those who have observed the reddish parts of this Sea tell us, that there were none at the place where the Israelites passed, nor much lower. That is, there were none from Tor, over-against mount Sinai, to Suez, the northern extremity of this Sea. So that I am inclined to believe, that the name of the Red sea was not given it till after the Idumeans, descended from Edom, had spread themselves westward as far as the Red-sea. Then it might receive the name of the Sea of Edom, which the Greeks rendered Thalassa Erythrea, or the Red-sea. I find the Sea of Suph in the land of Edom, which may be thought to favour this conjecture, 1 Kings ix. 26. 2 Chro. viii. 17.

Every one knows the famous miracle of the passage over the Red-sea, when the Lord opened its waters, and made the Israelites pass it, dry-shod, to the number of 600,000.—The Rabbins, and many of the ancient fathers, relying on Psalm cxxxvi. 13. "To him which divided the Red-sea into parts." Qui divisit Mare Rubrum in divisiones, have maintained, that the Red-sea was divided into twelve sections; that each of the twelve tribes adopted a different passage a-cross. Others have advanced, that Moses who lived long near the Red-sea, in Midian, had observed its regular ebbing and flowing, like the ocean; so taking advantage of the time of the ebb, he led the Hebrews over; while the Egyptians, ignorant of this particular, and rashly entering it just before the return of the tide, were all swallowed up and drowned, as Moses relates. Thus the priests of Memphis explained it, according to Artapanus, apud Euseb. Præpar. lib. iv. cap. 17. alii quidam ex Christian. This opinion has been adopted by a great number of moderns. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XXXIX.

Josephus, Antiq. lib. ii. cap. ult. having related the history of the passage through the Red-sea, as told by Moses, adds, that this ought not to be looked on as impossible, since God might as well open a passage for the Israelites through the waters, as long afterwards he opened one for Alexander and his Macedonians, through the Sea of Pamphilia. But historians, Strabo, lib. xiv. Arrian, lib. i. de expedit. Alex. who have mentioned this passage of the Macedonians, assure us, that they coasted the shore where the water was not deep; so that the soldiers marched all day in the water, which was not above their middle. Arrian says, that this place is impassable when the south winds blow; but the wind having changed suddenly, gave the soldiers an opportunity of passing without danger. Perhaps this reflection of Josephus gave occasion to some ancients to think, that the Israelites did not cross over the Red-sea from shore to shore, but only coasted it, and during the time of the reflux ascended a little from the place they left toward the shore upon the higher ground; so that they made a kind of semi-circle in the Sea.—This opinion is espoused by Thomas Aquinas, Tostat, Paul of Burgos, Grotius, Genebrard, Vatablus, and some Rabbins.

But not to open a nice discussion of all these opinions, nor to deny that the Red-sea has its ebbing and flowing; we need only allege the text of Moses and other sacred authors, who have mentioned this miraculous passage: we may see plainly that no other account is supportable, but that which supposes the Hebrews to cross over the Sea from shore to shore, on a vast space of dry ground, which was left void by the waters at their retiring. Exod. xiv. 16, 17, &c.

Isaiah says, lxiii. 11, &c. the Lord divided the waves before his people, and conducted them through the bottom of the abyss, as a horse is led through the midst of a field. Habakkuk says, iii. 15. that the Lord made himself a road to drive his chariot and horses across the Sea, across the mass of great waters. Lastly, Wisdom says, xix. 7, 8. x. 17, 18. that the dry land appeared suddenly in a place where water was before: that a free passage was opened in a moment through the midst of the Red-sea; and that a green field was seen in the midst of the abyss, &c. It is thought the place where the Hebrews passed the Red-sea, is two or three leagues below its northern point, at Kolsum, or Clysmā.

[This term, Red-sea, appears to be very improperly adopted in Numb. xxi. 14. and Deut. i. 1. In the first passage we read, "What he did in the Red-sea, and in the brooks of Arnon." It should be "in Suphah;" for there is no Sea in the original. In the latter passage also it should be in the plain over-against Suph."—Here our translators confess, by their italics, that they have inserted the word Sea—between Paran, Tophel, &c. By this insertion the geography is sadly confused.

The proper rendering of this name, and the dismissing of all reference to the Red-sea, is of great consequence to the ancient geography of the place: as that station which was in any tolerable sense over-against the Red-sea, could not possibly be near to Paran, nor to Hazereth: neither could it be "eleven days' journey from Horeb, by the way of Mount Seir:" i. e. at Kadesh Barnea. Comp. SHINAR. ad fin.]

"It was understood that the Arabs occasionally got water at Mulonimil; and as the old charts mark a river there, I sent to examine it. Several strong water courses were found, near the beach; and, on digging, we came to a loamy soil, and water immediately rose, as good and as fresh as possible. Five wells were dug, and there was a sufficient supply to water two transports at a time. I imagine about thirty ton a day might be procured without difficulty."

"There are several good wells in Tor, and when they are not too much drained they supply good water. Fruit may also be had; but stock is very scarce. The northerly wind prevails in the harbour, and sometimes blows very strong; but, as you anchor in good holding ground, ships seldom drive. We had no instance of its blowing hard from the southward in the harbour: but when it blew strong from the Sea of Suez in that quarter, there were light variable winds in Tor."

"The harbour of Suez is spacious and safe. From October to May the climate is temperate. Fahrenheit's thermometer falling sometimes to 46 in December and January. The hot winds begin to set in at the end of June, when it becomes advisable to move into Adaga bay, where it is much cooler, and you avoid the sand drifts, which come off in the sudden land gusts. In February, March, and April, the wind is often southerly; and there are squalls from that quarter, but not of long duration, when the wind veers round to the westward, and generally blows off the land. The tide runs strongest and fairest on the eastern shore. The tide flows full and change days $11\frac{1}{2}$ hours; and rises seven feet, on the springs. In December and January, there can be no doubt of making very short passages up to Suez."

"The water is very brackish at Moses's wells."

Cosseir "is the principal port of Upper Egypt; from whence the corn of that country is exported to Arabia. Passengers from India have taken this route when they have been too late in the season to reach Suez: but vessels may always get to Tor by a little perseverance, and from thence the camels travel with ease to Suez in three days, and from Suez to Cairo in three more."

"A passage may be always made to Tor, and from thence to Suez, by profiting of occasional intermissions: as was fully proved in June and July, 1802. In January, February, March, and April, the southerly winds have been known to blow through the straits of Jubal, and up the Sea of Suez."

"The monsoons change at Mocha roads in May and October: from the end of October, the southerly winds blow so strong, that the cruizers have frequently been from fourteen to twenty-one days reaching Aden: and in June and July, ships have been still longer going from Aden to Mocha; and many obliged to return, and wait for the fair monsoon."

The port of Aden. "In the easterly monsoon (from November to February) it is not safe to lie in the front bay of Aden, as there is generally a very heavy sea: but the back bay is perfectly secure, particularly for vessels not drawing more than twenty feet. Refreshments of every kind are to be procured: fish in abundance; oysters, lobsters, &c." This account, by one of our distinguished seamen, may contribute to our better acquaintance with the track pursued by the navy of Solomon in its trade to Ophir.—These remarks of a practical man, himself in command of a British fleet, must be thought more appropriate than any hypothetical speculations can be.]

The Dead-sea, Salt-sea, Eastern-sea, Sea of Sodom, Sea of the Wilderness, or of the Plain.

—This is the lake Asphaltites, to which Josephus allows 590 furlongs in length, and 150 furlongs in breadth, i. e. about twenty-five leagues long, and five or six broad. The Jordan falls into the Dead-sea, and it is affirmed, that the salt and bitumen, with which the waters are impregnated, render them so pungent and briny, that no fish can live in them. This Sea has taken possession of the country formerly occupied by the cities of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim. This Sea is properly a lake, having no communication with any other waters, or any out-let. See ASPHALTITES.

The name of Dead-sea is not in the text of Scripture; it is probable this name was given to it, because nothing can long continue in it alive. [This is now doubted: Dr. E. D. Clarke, and M. Chateaubriand found reason to conclude that the Dead-sea was not wholly void of living inhabitants.]

The name of Salt-sea is of the same signification as Asphaltites; for under the word SALT the Hebrews comprehend Asphaltus, Bitumen and Nitre. The name of the Eastern-sea is given it because of its situation, being opposite to the Western-sea, or the Mediterranean. Lastly, the name of the Sea of the Wilderness, or of the Plain, in Hebrew Arabah, comes from Araboth, desert plains beyond Jordan, west and north of that Sea.

The Sea of Jazer; is only a lake or pool near this city. See JAZER.

The Sea of Egypt, Isaiah xi. 15. means that part of the Mediterranean which washes the coasts of Egypt.

The Tongue of the Sea. The Hebrews and Arabians call that a tongue of the Sea which runs into the land; as we call that a tongue, or neck of land, which advances into the Sea. See Joshua xv. 5. xviii. 19. Isaiah xi. 15.

II. SEA was also the name given to a very large brazen basin, that Solomon caused to be made for the temple, for the use of the priests, who therein washed the feet and bowels of the sacrifices, also, the sacrificial instruments.

The Brazen, or Molten Sea made by Solomon for the temple, was ten cubits in diameter, and therefore about thirty cubits in circumference. Taking the Hebrew cubit at twenty inches and a half, the ten cubits make seventeen feet and an inch; and the thirty cubits make fifty-one feet and three inches. This vessel was round, and in depth five cubits. The brim was adorned with an edging, and embellished with lilies and knobs, and ox's heads in demi-relief. It contained three thousand baths, according to 2 Chron.

2 Chron. iv. 5. or two thousand baths, according to 1 Kings vii. 26. This may be reconciled, by saying, that the cup or bowl contained two thousand baths, and the foot being hollow, contained a thousand more. Thus this great vessel was but of one capacity within, though it seemed without to be double. This Sea stood on its foot now mentioned, which was a kind of hollow column; besides which it was supported by twelve oxen of brass, disposed into four groups, three in a group; leaving four passages between them, by which the priests went to draw water, by three cocks fixed in the foot of this vessel. SEAH, סֵאָה. LXX. Σάρον, Satum, or Μέτρον, Metron, Mensura, or Οἶφί, Ephi. A Hebrew measure, containing about two gallons and a half, liquid measure; or about a peck, dry measure.

SEAL, sigillum, signum, signaculum. The ancient Hebrews wore their seals, or signets, in rings on their fingers; or in bracelets on their arms. [As is now the custom in the East.] Haman sealed the decree of king Ahasuerus against the Jews, with the king's seal, Esth. iii. 12. The priests of Bel desired the king to seal the door of their temple with his own seal. The spouse in the Canticles, viii. 6. desires that his spouse would wear him as a signet on her arm. Comp. ARRANGEMENT of SOLOMON'S SONG. also, FRAGMENTS, No. CCLXIV.

Pliny observes, lib. xxxiii. cap. 1. that the use of seals, or signets, was rare at the time of the Trojan war, when the practice was, to close their letters with several knots. But among the Hebrews they are much more ancient. Judah left his seal as a pledge with Tamar. Gen. xxxviii. 25. Moses says, Deut. xxxii. 34. that God keeps sealed up in his treasures, under his own seal, the instruments of his vengeance. Job says, ix. 7. that he keeps the stars as if under his seal; and allows them to appear only when he thinks proper. He says also, "My transgression is sealed up in a bag." chap. xiv. 7.

When they intended to seal up a letter, or a book, they wrapped it round with flax, or thread, then applied the wax, and impressed on it the seal. The Lord commanded Isaiah to tie up or wrap up the book wherein his prophecies were written, and to seal them till the time he should bid him publish them. Isaiah viii. 16, 17. He gives the same command to Daniel, xii. 4. —The book shewn to St. John, Rev. v. 1. vi. 1, 2, &c. was sealed with seven seals. It was a rare thing to put such a number of seals; but that insinuated the great importance and secrecy of the matter. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. LXXIII. et seq. on ANCIENT BOOKS.

In civil contracts they generally made two originals, one continued open, and was kept by him for whose interest the contract was made: the other was sealed, and deposited in some public office. It was sealed up to prevent fraud or falsification. Jeremiah, xxxii. 10, 11, 14, &c. bought a field in his country of Anathoth, of Hananeel; he himself wrote the contract, called witnesses, and sealed it up: he put it into the hands of his disciple Baruch, and said, "take these evidences, this evidence of the purchase, which is sealed,—and this evidence which is open, and put them in an earthen vessel, that they may continue many days." The Grecians did in the same manner with their writings: they preserved the originals of their contracts, and other documents of consequence in vessels of brass or of earth. See the Scholiasts on Aristophanes, in Vespis, on the word Echinus. Vide FRAGS. No. LXXX.

SEAT. The Seat of Moses, on which the scribes and pharisees sat, expresses the authority of the doctors of the law, and their office of teaching. Our Lord commanded that they should be heard, and respected; but he forbade that their actions should be made precedents, or themselves taken for examples.

The seat of the scorner, or the pestilent, mentioned in the first Psalm, alludes to the abominable discourse, the licentious manners, of libertines, who corrupt equally by their scandalous example and conduct, as by their loose principles. Instead of pestilent, the Hebrew says scorners, revilers, those pretended free-thinkers, who deride the simplicity of plain and honest minds. Solomon often speaks of them in his Proverbs; and carefully guards his pupil against their dangerous tongues. Proverbs i. 22. iii. 34. ix. 7, 8, 12. xiii. 1. xiv. 6. xv. 12. xix. 25. xx. 1, &c.

The seat of honours, Eccclus. vii. 4. the chief places in the synagogues, which the pharisees assumed, Matt. xxiii. 6. the seat prepared for Job in the assemblies, Job xxix. 7. the seat or throne of the king, and that of God, are clear enough. The throne belongs to God, and to the king; the seat of honour to the friends of the king, and to great men. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. XII.

SEBA, סֶבָּא, drunkard; from סָבָא saba; or that turns, or surrounds; from סָבַב sabab: old-man, according to the Syriac. [But some think, elation, the joyful increase of the family.]

SECACAH, סַכַּח, Σοχολὰ, shade, covering, [veil] protection; from סַכַּח sacac: otherwise, unction, from סָך soc, to anoint: speculation, sight, look, according to the Syriac.

[Some think, a partition, or lurking place, a cot, or lodge, covered over, and hidden.

Others think, a division, or separation, as shek and mesucah signifies; perhaps it was an enclosure, near the edge of the wilderness, just sufficient to resist straggling Arabs.]

SECACAH, SECHACHA, or SACHACHA, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 61. at the southern limit of this tribe; in the desert.

[SECHU, a watch-tower, from the Chaldee root, to notice, to observe.

[SECRET, vide MYSTERY.]

SECT. This Latin word has the same signification as the Greek word Hæresis, though the sound be not so odious to us. Among the Jews were four sects, distinguished by their practices and opinions, yet united in communion with each other, and with the body of their nation, viz. the Pharisees, the Sadducees, the Essenians, and the Herodians. At the beginning of Christianity the religion of Jesus Christ was considered as a new sect of Judaism. Tertullus the advocate for the Jews, accusing St. Paul before Fœlix, says, that he was chief of the seditious sect of the Nazarenes, Acts xxiv. 5. and the Jews of Rome said to St. Paul, when he arrived in this city, that "as to this sect, it was every where spoken against." Acts xxviii. 22. St. Peter, 2 Epist. ii. 1—10, foretels to the faithful, that false teachers should arise among them, "who privily shall bring in damnable heresies (or sects) even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction." He adds, that these people being great lovers of themselves, are not afraid to introduce new sects; here the word sect is taken in the same sense as heresy.

Among the Greeks, the philosophers were divided into different sects: the Academics, the Stoics, the Peripatetics, the Cynics, the Epicureans, &c. The Jews, in imitation of the Greeks, began to divide themselves into sects, about the time of the Maccabees. It seems as if the Corinthians had a mind to introduce something like this into Christianity, when they boasted, I am a disciple of Peter,—I of Paul,—I of Apollos. 1 Cor. i. 12. iii. 22, &c. Even at this day the Christian church, has reason to complain of sects in philosophy, and in divinity; in philosophy Peripatetics, Scotists, Nominals, Cartesians, Gassendists, &c. and in divinity, the sects are infinite; Thomists, Augustinians, Scotists, Molinists, Congruists, &c. among Catholics; with a multitude of others, the very names of which compose volumes, among Protestants, also.

SECUNDUS, a disciple of St. Paul, Acts xx. 4. We know no particulars of his life. He was of Thessalonica, and followed the apostle from Greece into Asia, A. D. 58. The Spaniards acknowledge a St. Secundus, sent, as they pretend, into their country, by the apostles Peter and Paul. Bolland. 15 Mai.

[SEED, the prolific principle of future life; taken in Scripture for posterity, whether of man, beast, trees, &c. all of which are said to be sown and to fructify, as the means of producing a succeeding generation. Jer. xxxi. 27. Hence seed denotes an individual, as Seth, in the stead of Abel, Gen. iv. 25. et al freq. and the whole line of descent; as seed of Abraham, of Jacob, &c. the seed-royal, &c. much in the same acceptance as CHILDREN.

The seed of Abraham, denotes not only those who descend from him, by natural issue, but those who imitate his character, Rom. iv. 16. for, if he be "the father of the faithful," then the faithful are his seed—by character, independent of natural descent: and hence the Messiah is said to see his seed, though in fact Jesus left no children by descent, but by grace (conversion) only, Isaiah liii. 10. This is occasionally restricted to one chief, or principal seed, one who by excellence is THE seed: as, THE seed of the woman. Gen. iii. 15. Gal. iii. 16. THE seed of Abraham, THE seed of David, meaning the most excellent descendant of the woman, of Abraham, of David. Or, understand by the seed of the woman, the offspring of the female sex, only; as verified in the supernatural conception of Jesus, Matt. i. 18, &c. Luke i. 26, &c. and of which the birth of Abraham's seed (Isaac) was a figure.

Seed is taken figuratively for the word of God, Luke viii. 5. 1 Peter i. 23. for a disposition becoming a divine origin, 1 John iii. 9. for truly pious persons, Matt. xiii. 38.]

SEEING, to See. This is said, not only of the sense of vision, by which we perceive external objects; but also of inward perception, of the knowledge of spiritual things, and even of of the supernatural sight of hidden things ; of prophecy, of visions, of ecstasies. Whence it is that they were formerly called Seers, who afterwards were called Nabi, or prophets : and that prophecies were called visions.

The verb to see, is used to express all kinds of sensations. It is said Exod. xx. 18. that the Israelites saw voices, thunder, lightnings, the sound of the trumpet, and the whole mountain of Sinai covered with clouds, or smoke. And St. Austin observes, Ep. 167. that the verb to see, is imputed to all the five natural senses ; to see, to hear, to smell, to taste, to touch : he says, non enim tantum dicimus, vide quid luceat, sed etiam, vide quid sonat, vide quid oleat, vide quid sapiat, vide quid caleat.

To see good, or goods, is, to enjoy them : " I believed to see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living," Psalm xxvii. 13. I hope that God will bring me back into my own country, into the land of Judea, where I shall live in peace and prosperity. Job says, vii. 7. " I shall die, and see no more ; I shall no longer enjoy the good things of this world." And the Psalmist says, Psalm. iv. 6. " There be many that say, who will shew us any good ?" i. e. to enjoy any happiness in this life ?

To see the face of the king, is to be of his council, his household, to approach him. The kings of Persia, to maintain their respect and majesty, seldom permitted their subjects to see them, and hardly ever shewed themselves in public : none but their most intimate friends, or their familiar domestics, had the advantage of beholding their faces. Esth. i. 10, 14. Frequent allusion is made to this custom in Scripture, which mentions the seven principal angels that see the face of the Lord, and appear in his presence. Tobit xii. 15. SEGUB, שגוב, Σεγυβ, fortified, or raised ; from שגב shagab.

I. SEGUB, son of Hezron, father of Jair, 1 Chron. ii. 21, 22.

II. SEGUB. Hiel of Bethel having undertaken to rebuild Jericho, God, punished him for it, by the death of Abiram, his first born son, who died as he was laying the foundation ; and by the death of Segub his younger son, when he hung up the gates of the city, 1 Kings xvi. 34. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. V.

SEIR, שיר, hairy, goat, demon, tempest ; from שיר shahar, or שיר shehir : otherwise, barley ; [barley-like, i. e. bearded] from שיר sheorah.

I. SEIR, or SEIRI, the Horite, whose dwelling was east and south of the Dead-sea, in the mountains of Seir, where at first reigned the descendants of Seir the Horite. Gen. xxxvi. 21—30. 1 Chron. 38, &c.

The posterity of Esau afterwards possessed the mountains of Seir, and Esau himself dwelt there when Jacob returned from Mesopotamia. Gen. xxxii. 3. xxxiii. 14. xxxvi. 8, 9. Moses acquaints us, Deut. ii. 12. that Esau made war with the Horites, and destroyed them : but we know no particulars. Seir, father of the Horites, must needs be very ancient, since his children were already a powerful and numerous people in the time of Abraham, before the birth of Isaac, when Chedorlaomer, and his confederates came to make war against the kings of Pentapolis. Gen. xiv. 6. It is without good reason, what some have advanced, that Esau himself had borne the name of Seir, or the hairy, Joseph. Antiq. lib. i. cap. 18, 19 ; for he was never known by this name, though his country is often called the country of Seir, because of its original inhabitants.

II. SEIR, or, the mountains of Seir ; were east and south of the Dead-sea. Moses tells us, there were eleven days' journey between Horeb and Kadesh-barnea, by the way of Seir ; or rather, going round the mountains of Seir, Deut. i. 2, 4, 5, 8, &c. Deborah says, the Lord is come forth from Seir, Judges v. 4. Moses affirms, that the Lord appeared to his people at Seir, at Sinai, and at Paran, Deut. xxxiii. 2.—This proves, that the mountains of Seir were south of the Dead-sea, inclining towards Elath and Esiongeber, on the Red-sea. [Compare BURCKHARDT's letter, FRAGS. No. DLXI. also DLXII. also DLVII.]

Jacob, at his return from Mesopotamia, Gen. xxxii. 3. xxxiii. 16. fearing that Esau should injure his company, sent to him at Seir ; and Esau came to meet him, between Peniel and Jordan, and returned the same day to Seir. Therefore he must have lived not far off, in the mountains east of the Dead-sea. Joshua, xi. 17. xii. 7. seems to say, that they stretched out still farther north, since he relates his conquest of all the country, from Seir, to Baal-gad, at the foot of Libanus, and of mount Hermon ; and his distribution of this country among the children of Israel. But it is known, that the Israelites had no possessions beyond the country of Moab east, or south. 2 Chron. xx. 10, 22, 23. Ezek. xxv. 8. Lastly, Moab and mount Seir are frequently mentioned together ; but Moab inhabited east of the Dead-sea. See IDUMEA.

[As mount Halak is thought to signify bare, bald, naked, uncovered, so Seir is thought to denote on the contrary, rough with trees or bushes, well well clothed with tall vegetables, as an animal with bristles. I understand, that a part, at least, of this district, is extremely productive of palm-trees. As Esau was a hunter, might this district abound with gazelles, &c. of which the name of some, importing hairy, might be given to this mountain? Five hundred Simeonites settled in Mount Seir, 1 Chron. iv. 42, 43. Is there any allusion to this in the Seir of Isaiah xxi. 11?]

III. SEIR, a mountain on the frontiers of Judah, and Dan. Josh. xv. 10.

SEIRATH, סַיִרָא, Σειράθ, hairy, elevated. [a kid; otherwise, weather, or barley.]

We have hinted on Seir, that possibly the name of some kind of quadruped, game, gave name to that mountain. Simon thinks, that this name denotes a goat, and he brings several instances of other places named from the same animal; as Gangra, a city of Paphlagonia; Aigion, in Achaia: Aigos Potamos, on the Hellespont, &c. He adds, that this name may import horror; perhaps, in the sense of making the hair stand on end, like bristles. We have supposed, elsewhere, that the "quarries," verse 19, mentioned with Seirath, was a place of commemoration, or stones set up by way of memorial. Was Seirath a consecrated grove, or plantation? or more than one? If so, this would agree with one of the proposed derivations of Mount Seir, and with a very frequent accompaniment to places of worship, such as Gilgal was.]

SEIRATH. After Ehud had killed Eglon, king of Moab, who oppressed Israel, Judges iii. 26. he went to Seirath, which probably was towards Bethel or Gilgal, near a place where were images or idols: פֶּסִילִים pesilim, sculptura. Pertransivit locum idolorum, undè reversus fuerat, venitque in Seirath. [Our translation reads; "and Ehud escaped while they tarried, and passed beyond the quarries, and escaped unto Seirath."] There is some likelihood, that these engravings or inscriptions at Seirath, are those Josephus hints at, when he says, Antiq. lib. i. cap. 2. that in Syria there were pillars full of inscriptions, which had been there from before the time of the Deluge, which had been made by the children of Seth. This conjecture is proposed and admitted by several learned men.

This is what Josephus relates, concerning the pillars set up in this place: "The posterity of Seth, having heard that Adam had foretold, that the world should at one time be destroyed by a deluge of water, and at another time by fire; they resolved to preserve the discoveries they had made in astronomy, and in the knowledge of heavenly things: therefore they erected two columns, one of stone and the other of brick, that if the deluge should destroy that of brick, at least that of stone might remain, to inform mankind of what they would transmit to posterity. And it is said, adds Josephus, that the column of stone which they erected is still in being in Seirath, or Syrias."

This relation of Josephus is confirmed by Manetho, apud Euseb. et Syncell. in Συριαδικῇ γῇ, who says, that the second Mercury, king of Egypt, surnamed Trismegistus, translated, or rather transcribed into the ordinary letters, what the first Mercury, or Thoth, had formerly caused to be engraved in hieroglyphic characters, upon columns, that he had erected in Syriad. If Josephus took what he relates from Manetho, he has plainly corrupted it, since both the Thoths, or Mercuries, are much later than the Deluge; but he might have had this tradition by some other channel. M. de Valois, in his notes on Ammianus Marcellinus, lib. xxiii. conjectures, that instead of Syriadike ge, as read in Manetho, it ought to be read Syringice, the same as in Ammianus Marcellinus, who says, that the ancients, foreseeing the approaching deluge, and fearing that the knowledge of their ceremonies would thereby be lost, dug subterraneous places which they called Syringas, with vast labour, and in different places; and, upon the rocks of these cavities they engraved figures of animals, which they called hieroglyphical letters. Pausanias says, that there were Syringas, or subterraneous caverns, at Thebes in Egypt, not far from that statue of Memnon, which sounded at sun-rising.

From all these passages combined, and compared one with another, it is a very hard matter to obtain a distinct knowledge of these ancient hieroglyphic inscriptions, mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus and Manetho, which one places in Syrias, the other in the Syringas of the Thebais. The invention of letters, and particularly of the hieroglyphics in Egypt, is doubtless posterior to the deluge; the two Thoths also lived after that famous event; but what Josephus relates, must have happened before the deluge. And if it be true, that the stone pillars he mentions were in Palestine, and the Seirath of S. S. they must be different from those of Manetho.

[The Syringas of Pausanias being still extant in Egypt, justify his relation respecting them: and whoever recollects the historical, or emblematical, or hieroglyphical basso-relievos, in the temple at Elephantia, and in many other places of India, can be at no loss to understand the

Syringice

Syringice of Ammianus Marcellinus. As to the pillars of Josephus, they are probably partly of the same nature, partly different; and more resembling those ascribed to Thoth in Sanchoniatho. Where Seirath was, may be doubted:—was it the name of a country? or of a place? or was it descriptive of a class of places, called Seirath? or, of tablets of stone prepared for receiving sculptures, images, and inscriptions? Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DXXIV.]

SELAH, סֶלָה, LXX. Διάψαλμα, a rest, or pause. This Hebrew word is found seventy times in the Psalms, and thrice in Habakkuk.—The LXX. read it still oftener, since they put Diapsalma in places where we do not find Selah in the Hebrew. Symmachus, and Theodotion, generally translate Selah by Diapsalma, which signifies a rest or pause in singing; Diapsalma interpositum in canendo silentium, says St. Austin: or, a change of tone, according to Theodoret, Præf. in Psalm. and to Suidas, also, Μέλος ἐναλλαγή. Others insist, that it marks the beginning of a new sense, or a new measure of verses: Quidam Diapsalma dixerunt esse commutationem metri, alii pausationem spiritus, nonnulli alterius sensus exordium, sunt qui rythmi distinctionem, says Jerom, ad Marcellam. He adds, that Selah joins what follows to what goes before, and expresses also that this passage deserves to be always remembered: Ex quo animadvertimus hoc verbum superiora pariter et inferiora connectere, aut certè dicere sempiterna esse quæ dicta sunt. He follows Aquila, in the fifth and sixth edition, in translating Selah by for ever.

Some ancients, as Euseb. in Psalm. iv. p. 28. Præf. in Psalm. p. 8. Quidam apud Theodoret. Præf. in Psalm. thought, that Selah shewed the intermission or cessation of the actual inspiration of the Psalmist, or of the internal motions of his devotion. Nyssem. Præfat. in Psalm. Hilary and Cassiodorus think, Præf. in Psalm. that Diapsalma denotes a change of the voice, the person, or the tune, in the Psalms. Some moderns pretend, vide Geier. Ham. Forster, Buxtorf, that Selah has no signification, but is a note of the ancient music, whose use is now lost. And indeed, Selah may be taken away from all the places where it is found, without interrupting the sense of the Psalm: it rather perplexes the text. Others say, as Kimchi, Muis, Grot. Genebr. Mariana, &c. it was a note directing the elevation of the voice of the reader in these places. Abenezra teaches, that it is like the conclusion of a prayer, and answers nearly to Amen, or, So be it. At the end of their epitaphs, and books, the Jews generally put Selah, Finis, So be it.

We make no doubt but Selah intimates an end, or a pause, and that this is its proper signification: but, as we do not always find it at the end of the sense, or at the end of a canticle, we guess that the ancient musicians sometimes put the word Selah in the margin of their Psalters, to mark where a musical pause should be made, and where the tune ended. Just as in the old books of the gospels, (see M. Simon's Critical History of the New Testament, chap. xxxiii.) which were read solemnly in the church, they wrote on the margin, either at length, or a contraction, the Greek word telos, or the Latin word finis, to shew the place where the deacon was to end the lesson: for at that time the text was written at length, without division of chapters and verses. Or, the Hebrews sung as the Arabians do at this day, (M. D'Arvieux's Customs of the Arabians, p. 59, 60.) with great pauses, ending all at once, and beginning all at once. For this reason, it was necessary, in public services, to mark in the margin of the Psalm the place of the pause, and of an end, that the whole might suspend their voices, or recommence their singing, at the same time.

SELED, סֶלֶד, affliction; according to the Syriac, burning, or heat. This word is found but once in the Bible, in the form of a verb; and signifies, to be burnt, to be hot: otherwise, to strengthen, to be strong. [perhaps, warm entreaty, supplication. Son of Nadab, I Chron. ii. 30.]

SELENE, Σελήνη, the moon.

SELEUCIA, Σελεύκεια, soaken, or beaten by the waves, or that runs as a river; from σαλεύω. fem. of Seleucus.

I. SELEUCIA. This name king Seleucus gave to the city of Gadara, situate beyond and east of the city of Tiberias. Stephan. in Gadara. See GADARA.

II. SELEUCIA, a city of Gaulanitis, lying on the lake Semechon. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. 23. xviii. 3. de Bello, lib. iv. cap. 25.

III. SELEUCIA, a city of Syria, on the Mediterranean, near where the river Orontes falls into this sea. Paul and Barnabas embarked at Seleucia, for Cyprus, Acts xiii. 4. This is the Seleusia, of 1. Macc. xi. 8.

[From this name of the city the country about it was named Seleucida. Some authors name it Antiochena, from the name of Antioch, which was not far off; but Strabo constantly calls it the Seleucida.

This city was surnamed Pieria, which, according to some, was derived from an adjacent mountain, named Pierius; others think, from a forest named Pieria, and which gave name to the the territory : whence we read, "Seleucia in Pieria."

It was built by Seleucus Nicator, who took an augury from thunder, and had it consecrated, and worshipped as a deity, with hymns and sacred ceremonies : in consequence, thunder was the tutelar deity of the city, and was symbolized on almost all its coins. However, it did not confine itself to this deity, but worshipped others also ; among whom Jupiter Cassius is conspicuous, and was represented under the image of a rocky mountain. It is thought there was a Mount Cassius in the neighbourhood.—The coins of this city are remarkable for exhibiting four different eras : first, that of the Selucidæ, in the year of Rome, 442 ; that of its being governed by its own laws, 645 of Rome, under the reign of Antiochus VIII. : that of Pompey, in the year of Rome 690 : and that of Augustus, in the year of Rome, 723. See on the PLATE of CAUCASUS the Coins Nos. 3, 4, &c.]

SELEUCUS, king of Syria, surnamed Nicator, chief of the race of the Selucidæ. He began to reign 3682, one year after Alexander the Great, and reigned forty-two years, dying A. M. 3724, ante A. D. 280. In his time Judea was under the jurisdiction of Ptolemy son of Lagus, king of Egypt. Yet Josephus says, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 3. that he shewed great favour to the Jews in his territory, granted them freedom in such cities as he built, and particularly in Antioch, the capital of Syria. See ANTIOCH.

II. SELEUCUS, surnamed Callinicus, or Pogon (bearded) ; reigned twenty years, A. M. 3759, to 3779

III. SELEUCUS, surnamed Ceraunos, or Thunder ; reigned three years, A. M. 3779, to 3781.

IV. SELEUCUS, Philopator, or Soter, son of Antiochus the Great ; reigned twelve years, A. M. 3816, to 3828, ante A. D. 176. He sent Heliodorus to Jerusalem, to take away the treasures of the temple. Vide HELIODORUS : and 2 Macc. iii. 3, &c. where it is said, that under the reign of this prince Judea enjoyed profound peace, insomuch that Seleucus himself furnished the sacrifices of the temple at his own cost.

V. SELEUCUS, son of Demetrius Nicanor ; reigned one year, A. M. 3880. His successor was Antiochus Gryphus.

VI. SELEUCUS, son of Antiochus Gryphus : made war against his uncle Antiochus Cyzicenus, took him prisoner in battle, and put him to death. Some time after, Antiochus, surnamed Pius, son of Antiochus Cyzicenus, came to Aradus, assumed the diadem, defeated Seleucus, and drove him out of Syria. Seleucus retired to Cilicia, where, endeavouring to raise large tributes from the people, they revolted against him, and burned him and all his followers in his palace.—Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 21. A. M. 3910, ante A. D. 94.

SELLING. The Hebrews might sell their own liberty ; fathers might sell that of their children, Lev. xxv. 39. If your brother sells himself to you because of his poverty, you shall not oppress him, nor sell him again as a slave : he shall abide with you only as a workman for hire. Maimonides says, that a Hebrew could not sell his liberty, but in extreme necessity. Exod. xxi. 7. "If a man sell his daughter to be a maid-servant, she shall not go out as the men-servants do." Her master shall not dismiss her, as a man slave is dismissed at the Sabbatical year. He shall take her as his wife, or shall marry her to his son. If he cares to do neither of these, he shall set her at liberty."

They sold also insolvent debtors, and their children, as we find, Matt. xviii. 25, and 2 Kings iv. 1. Sometimes they sold free-men for slaves, as Joseph was sold by his brethren. This crime is called Plagium ; the law punished it with death, Exod. xxi. 16. Deut. xxiv. 7. The Jews confine this to the theft of a man of their own nation. Esau sold his birth-right ; and for this, it appears St. Paul calls him profane, Heb. xii. 16. It is said in the prophets, that the Lord had sold his people to their enemies ; as a master parts with a vicious slave, to punish him.

"Thou hast sold thyself to work evil in the sight of the Lord," said the prophet Elijah to Ahab, 1 Kings xxi. 20, 25. And the wicked Israelites mentioned in the Maccabees, i. 16. They sold themselves as slaves to sin, being subject to their evil inclinations, as slaves are to their masters. These expressions were familiar to the Hebrews. See Judith vii. 13.

St. Paul, speaking of himself, or rather of mankind in his own person, says, Rom. vii. 14. I am carnal, sold under sin ; the slave of concupiscence and of sin by nature, but set at liberty by the grace of Jesus Christ. [But observe, Ahab sold himself, i. e. freely, voluntarily ; whereas St. Paul was sold, i. e. against his will, by force, by constraint of circumstances, not of choice.]

SEMACHIAH, סמכיהו, Σαμαχια, that adheres, or unites with the Lord ; from סמך samack, to unite, to join, to support, and יה jah, the Lord. [heard by the Lord ?]

SEMACHIAH, or SAMACHIAS, son of She-maiah, a Levite, a porter belonging to the temple, 1 Chron. xxvi. 7.

SEMECHON, or SAMECHON, a lake through which the Jordan passes; it is sixty furlongs long, and thirty broad. Some think this lake is called, Joshua xi. 5, 7. the Waters of Merom, or the Upper Waters; and Judges v. 18. the Canton of Merome. [Eng. translation, the high places of the Field.] But we think Merom to be near Dothaim, and far enough from Semechon. It is not known, whence the name Semechon is taken; some derive it from Samach, in Arabic, a fish; others, from the Chaldee, samak, red, as if the waters were reddish and turbid.—Certain it is, that there was marshy ground about this lake, Joseph. de Bello, lib. iii. cap. 18. The city of Hazor, where Jabin, a king of the Canaanites reigned, was on the side of the lake Semechon; afterwards the city of Seleucia was built here. Joseph. Antiq. lib. v. cap. 6.

The lake Semechon must be near the city of Dan, and the fountains of Jordan, 120 furlongs from the lake of Tiberias, north. Josephus says, de Bello, lib. iv. cap. 1. that the marshes of this lake extended even to Daphne. But there is great probability, that, instead of Daphne, it should be read Dane; for he says, in the same place, that the waters of Jordan fall into this pool, below the temple of the Golden Calf. Now the temple of the Golden Calf was at Dan. It is extraordinary that this lake should never be mentioned in Scripture, that we know of. It is thought Pliny intended this lake, when he mentions a lake 150 furlongs distant from the Mediterranean, not far from Libanus, where the sweet-scented reed grows, Pliny, lib. xii. 24. See CALAMUS AROMATICUS, and CALAMUS SCRIPTORIUS.

SEMIRAMIS, daughter of Dercetis, or the Syrian Venus, a famous queen of Assyria, wife of Ninus, who long governed the empire of Assyria, during the minority of her son Ninias. She undertook several wars, which she conducted very fortunately, and executed many great works at Babylon, and elsewhere. Herodotus, lib. i. cap. 184, speaks of several ramparts and moles constructed by her near Babylon. Diodorus Siculus, lib. i. Biblioth. Trogus seu Justin, Strabo, Geograph. lib. ii. 16; and others, ascribe to her the honour of building the walls of Babylon; but more exact chronologers believe, that Semiramis did nothing at Babylon; and it is very probable, that her other actions have been extravagantly exaggerated. She began to reign at Nineveh, A. M. 2789, ante A. D. 1215, about the beginning of the high-priest Eli's administration; and reigned 42 years.

SENAAH, סנא, bush [bramble]; from סנח sench; or enemy, according to the Syriac.

[The Arabic root imports to radiate, to shine, to be exalted; whence this feminine word is thought to signify illustrious, sublime, conspicuous: in which it does not essentially differ from Sench.]

SENAAH, or SENA: the inhabitants of Senaah, to the number of 3690, contributed very much to the rebuilding of Jerusalem, after the return from captivity, Ezra ii. 35.

SENECA: Lucius Annaeus Seneca, a native of Corduba, preceptor to Nero, and famous for his writings, would have no place here, but on account of certain letters, which bear the title of St. Paul to Seneca, and of Seneca to St. Paul. Jerom mentions them, in Catal. Scrip. Eccles. St. Austiu also mentions them, Ep. 153. and several modern authors after him. [They are printed in Jones's Apocryphal Canon.] James le Fevre, of Estaples, thought them genuine, published them with those of St. Paul, and wrote a comment on them. Sixtus Sinensis, in his Bibliotheca Sacra, has defended them, as also Antonius Possevinus, Alphonsus Salmeron, Franciscus Bivarius, Jacobus Pamelius, Margarin de la Bigue. Others, as Lips. de Vita Senec. cap. 10. Tillemont, Hist. des Emper. tom. i. p. 560. have suspected, that perhaps anciently there might have been true Epistles of St. Paul to Seneca, and of Seneca to St. Paul, which were known to Jerom and Austin; but, those being lost, some impostor has composed others in their place, which are what we now have. But as no proof is given of this conjecture, we readily admit that the Epistles we now have, are the same that were known to the ancients; however, they are not the better for that; nor do they deserve any consideration, [being utterly unworthy both of Paul and of Seneca.]

SENEH, סנה, סנא, bush. See SENAH.

[Rather, a height, from the Arabic root. 'This was a rock, probably shooting up high, like what we call a needle. 1 Sam. xiv. 4.]

SENNACHERIB, סנחריב, bush of the destruction of the sword, of solitude, of drought; from סנח sene, bush, and ריב charab, to destroy, to dry up, to make desolate, desert; or sword: otherwise, according to the Hebrew and Syriac, the sword, or the destruction of the enemy. This word is foreign to the Hebrew.

[Perhaps, the destroying, or wasting enemy; from the Chaldee סנא, an enemy, and ריב, to destroy: so the famous Tamerlane was proudly called destroyer of the world: but Vitrunga on Isaiah xxxvi. 1. thinks it imports from the Arabic roots, a directly contrary sense;—the enemy of destruction; a foe to war.]

SENNACHERIB,

SENNACHERIB, king of Assyria, son and successor of Shalmaneser; he began to reign A. M. 3290, ante A. D. 714. He reigned but four years, being killed by his own sons, A. M. 3294. Hezekiah, king of Judah, having shaken off the yoke of the Assyrians, by which king Ahaz, his father, had suffered under Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria; Sennacherib marched an army against him, and took all the strong cities of Judah. Hezekiah seeing he had nothing left but Jerusalem, which, perhaps he found difficulty enough to preserve, sent ambassadors to Sennacherib, then at the siege of Lachish, saying, "I have committed a fault; but withdraw your army out of my territories, and I will bear whatever you shall impose upon me." Sennacherib demanded three hundred talents of silver, and thirty talents of gold; which Hezekiah remitted to him soon after; yet the king of Assyria would not leave his dominions.

He sent from Lachish to Jerusalem three of his chief officers, Tartan, Rab-saris, and Rab-shakeh, to summon Hezekiah: Rab-shakeh uttered many blasphemies against God, and many insults against Hezekiah. (See RAB-SHAKEH and HEZEKIAH.) In the mean time Sennacherib quitted the siege of Lachish, and went in person to that of Libnah. Rab-shakeh having reported what he had said to Hezekiah, and that he returned no answer, Sennacherib wrote to Hezekiah, urging him to return to his duty, and to follow the example of so many other nations that had submitted. At the same time he moved with all his army to meet Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, who was marching towards him. But the Lord sent a destroying angel against the Assyrian army, who slew in one night 185,000 men, 2 Kings xix. 35. Sennacherib was forced to return with all speed to Nineveh; where, while he was paying adorations to his god Nis-roch, in his temple, his two sons Adrammelech and Sharezer slew him with their swords, and fled into Armenia. Esar-haddon his son reigned in his stead, A. M. 3294, ante A. D. 710. 2 Chron. xxxii. 21.

Tobit, i. 21. acquaints us, that when Sennacherib returned to Nineveh, he began to persecute the captive Israelites, whom he considered as the cause of his disgrace. But after forty-five days, according to the Latin text, or fifty-five according to the Greek, this prince was slain by his own sons. The Rabbins think, that what determined Sennacherib's sons to kill him, was a resolution he had made, as they were informed, of sacrificing them to his idol; wherefore they thought it best to prevent him.

As to the defeat of his army by the destroying angel, the Rabbins believe, that fire fell upon them from heaven, and reduced their bodies to ashes, without doing any harm to their clothes, which became the property of the Israelites, as they pretend. They found this tradition on Isaiah x. 16. "therefore shall the Lord, the Lord of hosts, send among his fat ones leanness, and under his glory he shall kindle a burning, like the burning of a fire." By glory, they say, is meant their magnificent habits. Other Hebrews told Jerom, that the angel Gabriel was sent among the Assyrians to destroy them. Some fancy it was the plague, or some internal distemper, that killed them all in one night, Beros. apud Joseph. Antiq. lib. x. cap. 2. Vid. Tost. et Salian. Others conclude, that this vast army was disturbed by a tempest, that being seized by a panic fear, and mistaking each other for enemies, they turned their arms against themselves, and killed one another.

Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 141. speaking of Sennacherib, relates his disaster in a very different manner. He quotes the Egyptian priests, who said that Sethon, king of Egypt, and priest of Vulcan, being attacked by Sennacherib, king of the Arabians and the Assyrians, and seeing himself deserted by his own soldiers, begged of Vulcan some speedy assistance. Vulcan appeared to him the night following, and promised help. Sethon therefore marching with a few troops, advanced to Pelusium. The same night a body of field-rats came into the camp of the Assyrians, and gnawed the thongs of their bucklers, and the strings of their bows; so that, next morning they found themselves in no condition to use their arms; but fled.

Most commentators are of opinion, that the army of Sennacherib was destroyed before Jerusalem, preparing for the siege of this city. But it appears plainly from Isaiah x. 24, 25, 26. that Sennacherib did not form the siege of Jerusalem; but, that in his march against Tirhakah, this calamity befel him. Berossus, apud Joseph. Antiq. lib. x. cap. 1. tells us, that Sennacherib had carried the war into Egypt, and had subdued all Asia. Josephus relates that this prince, having spent a long time in the siege of Pelusium, when his works were advanced, and he was on the point of becoming master of the place, he was obliged to raise the siege, lest the king of Ethiopia should surprize him, who came with a vast army to assist the Egyptians. The Rabbins pretend, that the angel which destroyed the Assyrians, cut off the hair and beard of Sennacherib himself, and sent him home into his own country loaded with ignominy and disgrace, Author. Tradit. in Reg. et Paral. They found this this tradition on these words of Isaiah, vii. 20. "In the same day shall the Lord shave with a razor that is hired, namely, by them beyond the river, by the king of Assyria, the head and the hair of the feet, and it shall also consume the beard."

The Babylonian Talmud affirms, that the army of Sennacherib was destroyed by lightning. The Targums, or Chaldee paraphrases, are quoted, as asserting the same thing. Others believe, that they perished by means of a hot wind, which God caused to blow against them: a wind very common in those parts, (Thevenot, Voyage, Part i. lib. ii. 20. Part ii. lib. i. 20. ii. 16.) and which makes great ravages, stifling thousands of persons in a moment, as often happens to those great caravans of Mahometans, which go pilgrimages to Mecca. Jeremiah, li. 1. calls this wind a destroying wind. The threatening by Isaiah, xxxvii. 7. to Sennacherib; "behold I will send a blast upon him, and he shall hear a rumour," seems also to allude to this wind. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. IV.

SENSE OF SCRIPTURE. These five senses may be distinguished in Scripture.

I. THE GRAMMATICAL SENSE.

II. THE HISTORICAL, OR LITERAL SENSE.

III. THE ALLEGORICAL, OR FIGURATIVE SENSE.

IV. THE ANAGOGICAL SENSE.

V. THE TROPOLOGICAL, OR MORAL SENSE.

I. The Grammatical Sense, is what the words of the text present, according to their proper and usual signification. Thus when it is said that God repents, is angry, ascends, or descends, has his eyes open, or his ears attentive, &c. the grammatical sense of these expressions might suggest, that God is corporeal, and subject to the same weaknesses as ourselves. But, as just reason and sound faith assure us, that he has none of our infirmities and imperfections; on such passages we are not to abide by the grammatical sense.

II. The Literal and Historical Sense, is what belongs to the history, or fact, to the sense which the rehearsal and terms of the Scripture immediately present to the mind. Thus when it is said, that Abraham married Hagar; that he afterwards sent her away; that Isaac was born of Sarah; that he received circumcision: these facts, in the historical and literal sense, mean simply what is expressed in the history; i. e. the conjugal marriage of Abraham with Hagar, the natural birth of Isaac, &c.

III. The Allegorical and Figurative Sense, includes what may be concealed under the terms, or under the events of a history. Thus the marriage of Abraham with Hagar, who was afterwards repudiated because of her insolence, and that of her son; is a figure, or representation [PRE-figuration] of the synagogue, which was only a slave, and was divorced and rejected because of its infidelity and ingratitude. Sarah is the figure of the Christian church; and Isaac of the people chosen by God, &c.

IV. The Anagogical Sense, or sense of analogy and agreement, refers certain expressions of Scripture to eternal life and happiness; because of the conformity, or similitude between the terms used to express something happening in this world, and what shall happen hereafter in heaven. For example, on occasion of the Sabbath, or seventh-day's rest, enjoined on the people of God, a transition may be made to that repose, or rest, which the saints enjoy in heaven. On occasion of the Israelites entering the land of Promise, we naturally advert to the entering of the elect into the land of the promised heaven, &c.

V. The Moral, or Tropological Sense, deduces moral reflections for the conduct of life, and manners, from what is related historically and literally in Scripture. So from those words, Deut. xxv. 4. "thou shalt not muzzle the ox, when he treadeth out the corn," St. Paul infers, that preachers, and instructors, ought to be supplied with the necessities of life, 1 Cor. ix. 10.

The objects of the literal sense are facts and history; of the allegorical, what we believe, or mysteries of our faith; of the anagogical, eternal happiness, and what relateth thereto; of the moral or tropological, the regulation of our manners;

Litera gesta docet, quid credas Allegoria,
Moralis quid agas, quò tendas Anagogia.

These five senses may be observed in this one word, Jerusalem. In the grammatical sense, it signifies the vision of peace; in the literal and historical sense, the capital city of Judea; in the allegorical sense, the church militant; in the anagogical sense, the church triumphant; in the moral sense, a faithful soul, of which Jerusalem is a kind of figure.

SENUA, סֵנְוָא, bush, from סֵנָה senah: otherwise, enemy, according to the Syriac. [from the Arabic light, splendor, (joy of the parents) Neh. xi. 9.]

SEORIM, סֵוּרִים, barley, goats' hair, whirlwinds, estimations, tempests; from שׁוּר shohar, or shahar, according to different readings; otherwise, goats, demons, hairy men; from שׁוּר shahir:

shahir : otherwise, barley ; from שָׁחַד. [Perhaps, a name derived from being born in the time of barley-harvest ; so the Greek Stachys, Rom. xii. 9. imports an ear of bread corn ; possibly, from such a circumstance.]

SEORIM. The family of Seorim was the fourth in order of the twenty-four sacerdotal families. 1 Chron. xxiv. 8.

Hiller thinks it means the great ascent, a tower on a hill in Judah.]

[SIPHMOETH, rather SHEPHAMOTH, 1 Sam. xxx. 28. may import two heights, or ascents ; and so of other names derived from the same root. As Judea abounded in hills, this etymology is natural.]

SEPHAR, סֵפֶר, Σωφηρὰ, book, letter, or scribe, narration, or enumeration ; from סָפַר saphar, or sepher, according to different readings. Gen. x. 30.

SEPHER, or SHAPHER, is the name of a mount, Numb. xxxiii. 23. Simon thinks it means fair ; and that Shiphrah, the name of the Egyptian midwife, Exod. i. 15. is Fair, q. Pulcheria. But it is certain, that if this mount was formerly fair, it was sufficiently different from its present appearance. We take it for the Mount Cassius between Syria and Egypt.]

SEPHAR, a mountain of the east, probably about Armenia. The sons of Joktan had their dwelling "from Mesha, as thou goest unto Sephar, a mount of the east," Gen. x. 30. We believe these mountains to have been the dwelling of the Sepharvaim, (See that Article below), and of the Saspires, of whom geographers speak. [Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DXXVI.]

SEPHARAD. Vide BOSPHORUS, and OBADIAH. [i. 20. a separated district, or shore.]

SEPHARVAIM, סֵפֶרַיִם, Σεφάραιμ, the two books, or the two scribes ; [otherwise, narration, or numbers, or the book, or numbers of his sea ; otherwise, from the Hebrew and Syriac, gate of the sea. 2 Kings xvii. 24. xviii. 34. xix. 13. Isaiah xxxvi. 19.

Hiller divides this word into two, Sepher, of the Parvaim : i. e. Mount Sepher, adjacent to the regions of Arabia, called the Parvaim.

We have rather considered it as denoting an assemblage of learning, or a kind of university. Perhaps a river might divide the town into two parts.]

SEPHARVAIM. When Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, carried away Israel from Samaria to beyond the Euphrates, he sent other people in their stead into Palestine, among whom were the Sepharvaim, 2 Kings xvii. 24, 31. A. M. 3283, ante A. D. 1721. The place of their former habitation is not exactly known : some pretend they inhabited the city of Siphera, on the Euphrates. We think their dwelling to have been in the mountains of Sephar, Gen. x. 30. and that the Saspires, who, according to Herodotus, lib. i. 103. iii. 94. vii. 79. were the only people that inhabited between the Colchians and the Medes, are the Sepharvaim. Strabo, lib. x. places the Sarapares in Armenia. In Ezra. iv. 10. the transportation of the nations is imputed to "the great and noble Asnappar," probably Esarhaddon. But in the enumeration there made of those nations, we do not find the Sepharvaim, or Sepharvaites ; except they are expressed by the name of the Tarpelites, which may be put for the Tapyres, or Sapyres, according to the Chaldean pronunciation.

Scripture speaks of the city of Sepharvaim, which probably was the capital of this people ; and the king of Sepharvaim is, the god of these people. This appears pretty plainly from comparing these passages, 2 Kings xviii. 34.—"Where are the gods of Hamath and of Arpad? Where are the gods of Sepharvaim, Hena, and Ivah?" with Isaiah xxxvii. 13. 2 Kings xix. 13. "Where is the king of Hamath, and the king of Arpad, and the king of the city of Sepharvaim, of Hena, and Ivah?" Lastly, 2 Kings xvii. 31. "the Sepharvites burnt their children in the fire to Adrammelech and Anammelech, the gods of Sepharvaim." There is therefore great probability that Hena and Iva are the same as Anammelech and Adrammelech, the gods of the Sepharvites. But Anammelech apparently stands for the moon, and Adrammelech for the sun. Vide their Articles ; [and FRAGS. No. CVIII.—For Melek, king, should we not read Moloch, in the places quoted?]

SEPHORIS, by the Jews was written סֵפֶרִיס, Zipporis, as if from Zippor, a bird ; perched on the mountain. Talmud. Megil. fol. 6. col. 1.

SEPHORIS, a famous city of Zebulun, and the capital of Galilee : afterwards named Dio-cæsarea. The Jews place it eighteen miles from Tiberias, though others say but ten miles. Rabb. in Echa Rabbati, fol. 75. 2. It was not far from Tabor, and the great plain. I do not find it in Joshua, or in the sacred authors ; but Josephus often speaks of it. He says, Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 10. that Gabinius placed here one of his five tribunals ; that Sephoris was in the midst.

midst of Judea; that it was the largest and best city in this country, and that it became the capital of it, after Nero had given Galilee to the younger Agrippa; that mount Asamon is pretty near Sephoris, which is as it were the centre of Galilee. The first city of Galilee that one came to from Ptolemais, was Sephoris. de Bello, lib. ii. 23. iii. 1.

[Dr. E. D. CLARKE is the latest traveller who has given a distinct account of this once flourishing city. He says, "As we proceeded across the delightful plain of Zabulon, a castle, once the acropolis of the city of SAPPHURA, appeared on a hill, distant from Shefhamer about seven miles. Its name is still preserved in the appellation of a miserable village called Sephoury. An ancient aqueduct which conveyed water to the city, now serves to supply several small mills. —We were invited to visit the house of St. Anne, [mother of the Virgin Mary.] It proved to be the ruins of one of the most stately Gothic edifices in the Holy Land; having lofty arches of stone, and a stone roof." He found among the rubbish an ancient picture. This building is still venerable in its ruins; yet has been only slightly noticed by modern travellers. Sephoury is five miles from Nazareth. Travels, Vol. ii. p. 407.]

SEPTUAGINT, or Seventy Interpreters.—By this name are generally understood the seventy, or rather, seventy-two interpreters, who, it has been thought translated from Hebrew into Greek, the books of the Old Testament; or, at least, the Pentateuch, if we believe Jerom, in Ezek. v. in Mich. ii. and others.

This is the history of this translation; as Aristæus relates it. Demetrius Phalareus, librarian to Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, having used his utmost industry to collect books in the library at Alexandria, king Philadelphus asked him, one day, how many books he had? Demetrius answered 200,000; but he hoped in a short time to have 500,000; and says he, I have been informed, that the laws of the Jews well deserve a place here, but they ought to be first translated out of Hebrew into Greek. The king replied, he would write to the high-priest of the Jews about it.

Then Aristæus, author of this narration, who was present, and who had the honour of being of the life guard to this prince, thought of a matter which he had had a good while in his mind, and which he had communicated to Sosibius of Tarentum, and to Andreas, two of his friends, chief officers in the king's guards; which was, to procure the liberty of a great number of Jews, whom king Ptolemy, father of Ptolemy Philadelphus had brought captive into Egypt. Aristæus, Sosibius, and Andreas took therefore this opportunity to tell the king, that since he desired a translation of the sacred books of the Jews, it would become his liberality and magnificence, to free from servitude a great number of Jews now in his territories, that the whole nation being obliged by this favour, might the more readily send him the books he desired.

The king asking how many these captives might be? was answered, about one hundred thousand. This large number did not discourage Philadelphus, and he promised them liberty. At the same time he gave orders, that twenty drachmas a head should be distributed to all persons who had Jewish slaves, who were forthwith to be made free. He published an edict in their favour, in which he restored to liberty, not only all the Jews which his father or himself, had brought into Egypt, but all others who might happen to be in servitude there on any account. The king's expence on this occasion was above six hundred talents, 136,875*l.* taking the talent to be the Egyptian, Attic, or Eubœan talent of silver, of 228 $\frac{1}{8}$ pounds.

After this Philadelphus wrote to the high-priest Eleazar, desiring the books of the law, with translators capable of rendering them out of Hebrew into Greek. This letter was carried by ambassadors, with rich presents; and Andreas and Aristæus were of the number. Eleazar readily complied with the king's request, and sent him the book of the law, with seventy-two Jews, skilful in the Greek and Hebrew tongues, to translate those sacred books. He wrote also to the king, with thanks for his rich presents, and to commend his piety towards God, and his generosity to the Jews in his dominions.

Philadelphus received Eleazar's commissioners with great humanity, expressed much respect for the holy books, they had brought; worshipped them, and bowed himself before them seven times; admired the beauty of the vellum, and the writing in golden letters; also the variety of the colours, and embellishments, of the leaves. He assured these deputies, that he should always look on the day of their arrival as a festival. And as this day fell on the same on which this prince had overcome Antigonus in a sea-fight, he did them the honour of making them eat with him. At dinner he put several questions to them, to which they returned answers entirely to his satisfaction. And the king was so pleased with their conversation, that he treated them seven days together, that he might hear them all one after another.

Three days after this, Demetrius Phalareus took these seventy-two Hebrews into the isle of Pharos, to a very fine house, at the northern point of the island, on the sea-shore, far from any noise, that they might with the greater tranquillity apply themselves to the translation of the holy books. They began therefore their work, and discussing among themselves what difficulties they might meet with, when they had fixed on any thing, and brought it to a condition of being entered fair, they reported it to Demetrius, who had it fairly written down by his copiers. They laboured thus from morning to the ninth hour, i. e. till three hours before the sun-set; then they returned into the city, where they were plentifully furnished with necessaries. This they continued for seventy, or rather seventy-two days together. Aristæas, apud Joseph. ex Versione Rufini. Euseb. Cyrill. Alexand. Cedren.

When the work was finished, they put it into the hands of Demetrius, who read it in an assembly of the Jews at Alexandria, that they might judge of its agreement with the original. They were much pleased with it, and greatly extolled, as well Demetrius who had procured this version, as the interpreters who had made it. After which they pronounced an anathema against whoever should make any alteration in this version, in any manner. The king being informed of what had passed, expressed much satisfaction. He had the law of Moses read to him, and greatly admired the wisdom of it. He asked Demetrius, why no historian, or poet, had made any mention of so divine a work? Demetrius replied, it was from that respect which had always been paid to this divine book. That Theopompus having inserted something of it in his history, had been struck with a disease, which deprived him of his understanding; and that Theodotus, a tragic poet, endeavouring to put something of it in his poems, had been struck with blindness; but that both had been miraculously cured, after having confessed the fault.

Philadelphus therefore received the work of the interpreters with great veneration, and caused it to be laid up in his library, to be kept with the utmost care. He greatly caressed the seventy translators, invited them to come often to see him, and sent them back into Judea with ample rewards, and rich presents for Eleazar.

This is the substance of the history of Aristæas, which this author addresses to his brother Philocrates; to whom he relates all this, as an eye-witness, and one who was perfectly well informed of every thing that passed. The same story we read in Josephus, Antiq. lib. xii. 2. who has taken it out of Aristæas. Philo also, speaks of the Version of the Septuagint, as having been performed by inspired writers; but he makes no mention either of Aristæas, or Demetrius Phalareus. Philo, de Vit. Mos. lib. ii.

Justin Martyr's account is very different, Exhort. ad Græcos. He says that Ptolemy, king of Egypt, being informed that the Jews had ancient histories written in Hebrew, he sent for seventy men from Jerusalem to translate these works into Greek. He placed these men in the isle of Pharos, in seventy different cells, that they might study without interruption, and without communicating with each other; so that he might be the more secure of the faithfulness of their translation. God himself ordered it so, that they should translate in so uniform a manner, as not only to use the same words, but also in the same number. This caused in the king so vast admiration, that he gave them great rewards, and sent them back with honour into their own country. Justin adds, that when he was at Alexandria, they shewed him in the isle of Pharos, the ruins of those cells in which these interpreters had been shut up.

The same Justin, in his second Apology, relates this in another manner; he says, that Ptolemy designing to collect a very ample library, wrote to Herod, king of the Jews, to send him the books of the prophets. Herod sent them; but as these books were written in Hebrew, Ptolemy sent again to Herod, requesting him to send some who were able to translate them into Greek: this being done, the books were put into the king of Egypt's library, where they are at present, says Justin, in the hands of all the Jews. —St. Irenæus, St. Cyril of Jerusalem, St. Chrysostom, and St. Austin, speak also of the seventy-two interpreters, Iren. contr. Adv. Hæres. lib. iii. cap. 25. seu 21. nov. edit. Cyrill. Jerosol. Cathech. iv. p. 36, 37; but Epiphanius allows but thirty-six: Thus he relates the story, de Ponderibus et Mensuris, n. 9, 10, 11. —

He says, that Aristæas, in his history of the seventy interpreters, informs us, that Ptolemy Philadelphus erected a library at Alexandria, in the place called Bruchium, and committed the care of it to Demetrius Phalareus. One day, the king asking Demetrius how many books he had, Demetrius answered about 54,800, but that there might easily be a much greater number, if translations were made of such books as were among the Ethiopians, the Indians, the Persians, the Elamites, the Babylonians, the Assyrians, the Chaldeans, the Romans, the Phœnicians, nicians, the Syrians, and those that inhabited Greece, says he, formerly called Latins, and not Romans. (In all appearance he meant the Greeks of Italy, or great Greece.) He added, that in Judea, and at Jerusalem, there were several divine books written by prophets, which might be obtained if they were desired of the Jews.

The king wrote therefore a letter to the Jews, which is to be seen in Epiphanius, by which he requested these books. The Jews sent him the two and twenty books of the Old Testament, written in golden letters; as also seventy-two Apocryphal books. But these works being in Hebrew, the king desired them to send him interpreters, to render them into Greek. They sent him seventy-two chosen men, six out of each tribe; and in order that the translation might be as exact as possible, and that the interpreters might have no communication with each other, the king caused to be built, in the isle of Pharos, thirty-six cells, in each of which he shut up two translators, that they might study together;—he allowed them servants to attend them, and transcribers to write down in notes or short-hand, what should be dictated. These cells had no windows; but each had a sky-light. Each two interpreters had a book given them, and when they had translated it, it passed through the hands of those in the next cell, and so on till all the books were translated thirty-six times.

They laboured thus from morning to evening, and at night were fetched away in thirty-six boats, and brought to the palace, where they ate with the king. Then they were put into six and thirty chambers, where they lay two in a chamber. The day following, early in the morning, they were carried back in the like manner to their cells. When the whole work was finished, the king sat upon his throne, and had the work read to him. Thirty-six readers held the thirty-six copies of the translation, and a thirty-seventh held the Hebrew original. In confronting all these versions, it was found, they were so perfectly alike, that what one had added or retrenched, had also been added, or retrenched by every one; and that what was retrenched was really useless and superfluous. This convinced all the assembly that the interpreters had been inspired by the Holy Ghost. The king laid up the translation in the library called Bruchium, which was as the mother of the second library, called Serapæum.

The Talmuds of Jerusalem and Babylon say, that king Ptolemy having made the seventy-two elders come to him, without informing them what he wanted of them, he shut them up in seventy-two cells. Then he told them he would have them translate the Holy Books into Greek. They complied with the king's desire, and with such success, and God so happily directed them, that they all translated in the same manner.

The Samaritans have also laid claim to the honour of this translation; they relate, that the king of Egypt having caused the high-priest of the Samaritans to come to him, and also that of the Jews, with other assistants on both sides, to translate the Holy Scriptures into Greek; the translation of the Samaritans was preferred before that of the Jews, and laid up in the library of Alexandria.

Philo, de vit. Mos. lib. ii. relates, that the Jews of Egypt were so transported on this translation of the law into Greek, that they appointed an annual feast to perpetuate the memory of it. They went every year into the isle of Pharos, accompanied by such strangers, as came thither out of devotion, as well as themselves; they refreshed themselves with entertainments of piety, some under tents, others on the shore, and on the sand, being filled with respect for a place which had been sanctioned by the presence of the seventy interpreters. The Hebraizing Jews, on the contrary, conceived so much contempt and abhorrence for this version, that they instituted a fast on the eighth day of Thebet (December). Scaliger, Notis in Chronic. Euseb. ad An. 1134. p. 134. To shew how much they disapprove the liberty the Hellenistical Jews had taken in translating the law into a foreign and impure language, they say, in Massechet Sopherim, that the day on which this translation was made, was as fatal to Israel, as that on which Jeroboam, son of Nebat, made the golden calves; and that then the heavens were covered with darkness for three days together.

Many of the ancient fathers of the church had so great a respect for this version of the Septuagint, that they looked on it as infallible and inspired; St. Austin even thinks that in those passages where the Septuagint differs from the Hebrew, we ought to believe that the Holy Ghost, who inspired them, as well as he inspired the first authors, conducted their pen; so that each of them presents nothing but what is absolutely certain, though sometimes they appear contrary to each other. Thus he preserves the authority of the Septuagint, without violating that of the original. St. Hilary, in Psalms cxxxi. n. 24. insists, that where different interpreters vary from each other, on any passage of the Old Testament, we ought to adhere to the Septuagint as the most antient version, and most authorized by use in the church.

inspiration of the Septuagint, was founded on that surprizing agreement among the several copies of those interpreters, though shut up separately in thirty-six, or in seventy-two cells.—But as this fact itself is very doubtful, it could not serve as a foundation for an article of such consequence. Therefore the church has never admitted the inspiration of these interpreters; and Jerom, Præfat. in Pentateuc. ad Desiderium, says Nescio quis primus Autor Septuaginta Alexandria mendacio suo extruxerit, and he very much inveighs against the first who invented the fable of the seventy cells. He maintains, that these interpreters conferred together, and assisted each other in their translations. In a word, that they were mere translators, and not prophets. In una Basilica congregatos contutisse, non prophetasse; aliud est enim esse Vatem, aliud Interpretem. He shews there are many faults in their translation, and he thinks that they did not translate the whole Scripture, but only the five books of Moses. He says, that Josephus and Philo, with the whole school of the Hebrews, affirm the same; and Aristæus, who is the first author of the story of the version of the seventy, says only, that they read to the king the books of the law. Jerom, in Ezech. v. Mich. ii.

The greater part of modern critics expose the falsity of what has been said, concerning the manner in which the version of the Septuagint was made; and it must be owned, that their reasons have great appearance of truth. They shew, First, the diversity of opinions, in this matter. Secondly, Aristæus, said to be the author of the oldest account extant of this matter, ill supports the part he acts. He would pass for a Pagan, yet speaks and acts like a zealous Jew. Thirdly, he speaks of Ptolemy Philadelphus, as of a wise and religious prince, full of respect for the true God, for his temple, and his Scriptures; yet it is known from history that he was a very corrupt and wicked prince.—Fourthly, he tells us, that Demetrius Phalareus was friend, and library-keeper, to king Philadelphus; whereas it is known, (Hermippus, apud Laert. lib. v. in Demetrio. Suidas) that Demetrius having advised Ptolemy, son of Lagus, to exclude his son Ptolemy Philadelphus from the kingdom, Philadelphus was so provoked at this advice, that when he came to the throne, he exiled Demetrius, till he should determine farther about him: but Demetrius finding himself unable to bear the tedium of this banishment, put himself to death by the bite of an asp. Fifthly, they observe the same style, and that a style full of Hebraisms, throughout the history of the pretended Aristæus; in the letters of Philadelphus to the high-priest Eleazar; in those of Eleazar to the king; and in the petition of Demetrius to Philadelphus. Other remarks are made on the history of Aristæus, which render it very suspicious; and induce us to consider it as the work of a Jew, who has borrowed the name of Aristæus, the better to disguise the forgery. Vide also PRIDEAUX, Connect. Part. 2.

What then are we to think of the ancient Greek version of the Bible, that we have in our hands, under the name of the Septuagint? It is agreed, that this must be an ancient version, and it might well have been made in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus; at least the five books of Moses, the translation of which is more faithful, and exact, than that of the other books; but we do not know precisely, either the time or the authors of it. The translations of the other books seem to have been done by later hands, which are as much unknown as the former, and the authors might live at different times. The diversity of style, the different manner in which the same word is translated, indicate that they were done by several hands. Neither can it be known whether it proceeds from the translators, or the copiers, that so many variations are found in the Greek, from the Hebrew original; as the alterations in Genesis, concerning the ages of the patriarchs who lived before and after the flood, to the building of Babel. These changes and additions could not be the effect of chance, they are so numerous; especially in Job, in the Proverbs, in the greater prophets, in the books of Samuel, and in the Kings.

The critics who have expressly handled this matter, are Scaliger, Usher, Walton, Frassen, du Pin, Vandale, Hoddy, Owen, &c.

[Whatever opinion may be formed on the romantic history of Aristæus, the general fact it relates is credible enough, as we learn from other authority. Aristobulus, a Jewish commentator on the Law of Moses, before A. D. (quoted by Eusebius, Præp. Evan. lib. viii. cap. 9. and by Clemens. Alex. Strom. p. 505.) says, “the whole and complete translation of what relates to our Law, was made, at the earnest request of Ptolemy, surnamed Philadelphus, one of your royal progenitors, under the care and superintendence of Demetrius Phalareus, to whom the ordering and conducting the same was chiefly committed.” This apparently refers to “what relates to the law;” but leaves uncertain what relates to the History, the Poetry, &c. of the Hebrew writings: by which the work was completed.

The labours of Origen strongly affected the subsequent subsequent copies of the Septuagint. When he compiled his Hexapla [See HEXAPLA.] he corrected his copy of this translation by additions, and by marks denoting omissions, with improvements taken from other versions: later copyists desiring to possess this superior edition, the original Septuagint became obsolete; and the present text rests on the authority of Origen, without our being able to determine critically how far his corrections were judicious. We know not whether his Hebrew copy (to which he inclined to conform his Septuagint) were, itself, correct; or, whether it were not greatly inferior to the copies used by the Septuagint translators. Beside this, in no long while afterwards, three editions, all claiming to be taken from the Hexapla, yet varying from each other, were current—one at Antioch, a second in Palestine, and a third in Egypt. From one or other of these every copy now extant deduces its origin. But, if these parent editions differed among themselves, how greatly were those differences multiplied in the hands of later transcribers, down to the era of Printing!

It is to the immortal honour of Britain that Dr. Kennicott's Collation of Hebrew MSS. was undertaken and executed here. The completion of that laborious performance gave occasion to wishes among the learned, for a similar collation of the Greek MSS. of the Septuagint. Dr. Holmes was stimulated to lay proposals for this purpose, before the Delegates of the Clarendon Press, March 4, 1788. Subscriptions were raised, the work was proceeded on, MSS. and Editions, the Fathers, &c. were examined in all places, by the most learned men in Europe; and the books were published as they could be completed: Genesis, 1798. Exodus, 1801. Levit. 1802. Numb. 1803. Deut. 1804, and the book of Daniel by itself, a few months before the death of the editor, in November, 1805. Under the same patronage, however, the work was continued, and Dr. Parsons was appointed to succeed Dr. Holmes. Joshua was published in 1810. Judges and Ruth 1812, and the six remaining historical books in the five years following, and thus the second Volume was completed. This important undertaking still proceeds: that it is voluminous beyond all precedent, cannot be denied, nor can it but be expensive; and perhaps, our island is the only place where, during the troublesome times we have witnessed, a work could have been carried on, worthy to accompany the Hebrew labours of Dr. Kennicott, and proper to stand with the fac simile copies of Beza's (the Cambridge) MS. and of the Alexandrian, now executing under national patronage. See BIBLE.

We have thought so much, at least, was due to the literary honour of our country; and we close, by observing, that the importance of this edition is enhanced by considering, 1. That this translation was the means of spreading the knowledge of the true God, in the heathen world, before the coming of Christ, "preparing his way before him." 2. That this version is quoted generally in the N. T. and that it is of importance to verify those quotations. 3. That the Hebrew text of the O. T. could not have been properly understood by us, without the assistance of this version: which has preserved the import of many words, not otherwise to be attained, with several entire sentences, &c. 4. That it is the origin of many versions extant in neighbouring nations; and therefore, that a correct edition of it may prove extremely useful to them. 5. That when this edition is complete, there can be no doubt but what many editions, in every country, for popular use, will be grafted on its principal readings; and thus a more accurate copy will prevail among all the learned of Christendom.]

SEPULCHRE. The Hebrews were always very careful about the burial of their dead. Many of their Sepulchres were hewn in rocks; as, that bought by Abraham for the burying of Sarah, Gen. xxiii. 4, 6; those of the kings of Judah and Israel; and that wherein our Saviour was laid on Mount Calvary. Comp. FRAGS. No. CCX. seq. Sometimes also, their graves were dug in the ground; and commonly without their towns, in burying-places set apart. Generally, they put some hewn stone, or other preservative, over a grave, to shew it was a burying-place, that passengers might be warned to avoid it, lest they should be polluted.

Jesus Christ, Matt. xxiii. 27. says, that the Pharisees were like whited sepulchres, which appeared fine without, but inwardly were full of rottenness and corruption. Lightfoot shews, that every year, on the fifteenth of February, they whitened them anew. In Luke xi. 44. our Saviour compares the Pharisees to "graves which appear not, and men walk over them not aware of them;" not knowing that these places are unclean; so that they contract an involuntary impurity. Sepulchre of Moses. After the death of this famous famous law-giver, the arch-angel Michael, Jude 2. disputed with the devil about his body. What was the subject of this dispute has been much contested. Some have thought, that the devil withstood the burial of Moses, maintaining, that he had not deserved this honour, having unjustly killed an Egyptian in Egypt. Œcum. in Ep. Juda, ex antiquor. traditione. Glycas, Parte 2 Annal. &c. Others have maintained, that Moses was buried by the hands of angels, without letting the Hebrews know where, for fear they should be tempted to pay him divine honours after his death, Philo, de Vita Mos. ad fin. Epiphan. Hæres. ix. lxxxiv., &c.

Others pretend, that the devil would have had him buried with public solemnity, that the people might thence take occasion of frequenting his tomb, and worshipping him as a god. Some think he did not die like other men, but was translated out of this world into paradise. Clem Alex. lib. i Strom. Hil. in Mat. xx. Vide et Ambros. in lib. i. de Cain et Abel. cap. 1. Jerom, in Amos viii.

The text of Deuteronomy xxxiv. 6. says expressly, that no one knows the place of his burial to this day. Yet, for all this, it is related that in October 1655, as some Maronite shepherds were feeding their goats in the mountains of Nebo and Abarim, they discovered it. Vide Horn. *Hist. Eccles. Sepulchre of Elisha. This is distinguished by a very remarkable circumstance, 2 Kings xiii. 20, 21. In the year of the death and burial of this prophet, several parties of Moabites invaded the territories of Israel;—it happened that some Israelites being engaged in burying a man, threw him hastily into the tomb of this prophet, that they might escape with more expedition. But the corpse had no sooner touched the dead body of Elisha, 'ere the man revived. It is not agreed where the tomb of this prophet was: Jerom, in Epitaph. Paulæ, Epiphan. seu alius, Vita Prophet. Isidor. Dorothe. and others, have told us, that it was at Samaria, or thereabouts, concluding, that as he, probably, died at Samaria, it may be presumed he was also buried there. Others will have him to have been buried at Abel-mehola, his own country; others, on mount Carmel. See ELISHA.

Sepulchre of David. This is a magnificent edifice, now without the walls of Jerusalem, but probably, antiently within the walls. You first enter a large court, about twenty-six feet square, cut out of the rock, which is marble. On the left-hand is a gallery, cut out of the rock likewise, as also the pillars that support it. At the end of the gallery is a little opening, through which you pass, by creeping on the ground, into a large chamber of about twenty-four feet square, round about which are other smaller chambers, which communicate one with the other, by doors of stone. The ceiling, the doors, as well as the rest, their hinges, their posts, their frames, &c. are all cut out of the same rock.—In the sides of the small chambers are several niches, within which the bodies of the kings were deposited in stone coffins. This work is perhaps, the only real one that now remains of ancient Jerusalem. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXXVI. and Plate.

Sepulchre, or tomb, of our Lord Jesus Christ. This was on mount Calvary, north-west of Jerusalem, and was hewn out of a rock, as John xix. 41. informs us. It is a kind of small chamber, almost square within; its height from bottom to top eight feet one inch, its length six feet one inch, its breadth fifteen feet ten inches. The entrance which looks towards the east is but four feet high, and two feet four inches wide: this door was shut up by a stone of the same rock: to this stone the chief priests affixed their seals, Mark xvi. 3. and on this stone the angel sat, after Jesus Christ was come out of the tomb, Matthew xxviii. 2. The place where the body of our Saviour was laid, takes up one side of this cave; it is raised from the ground to the height of two feet four inches; its length is five feet eleven inches, and its breadth two feet eight inches, placed lengthwise from east to west. It is incrustated with white marble. Paul Lucas, Voyage in Asia Minor, t. 2. p. 12. Vide FRAGS. No. CXXXVIII. and Plates; also Nos. DLXXV. to DLXXXII..

Sepulchre of the Holy Virgin. There are two traditions concerning the burial of the Holy Virgin, as there are two concerning the place of her death. Those who affirm, that she followed St. John the Evangelist to Ephesus, and died there, pretend that her tomb was to be seen there, A. D. 431, when the council of Ephesus was held; and this opinion is expressly noticed in a letter of this council. Concil. t. 3. p. 561, 574. According to another opinion, she died at Jerusalem, where her tomb is to be seen; which opinion is as much followed as the other. Juvenal, bishop of Jerusalem, who could not be ignorant of what had passed at the council of Ephesus, Ephesus, since he himself was present at it, wrote to the empress Pulcheria, and to the emperor Marcian, that her tomb was shewn at Gethsemane near Jerusalem, but that it was empty. Niceph. Hist. lib. ii. 32. xv. 14.

Yet since that time they have not desisted from shewing the tomb of the Virgin at Jerusalem. Adamnan. de Locis Sanctis, says, it was in the valley of Jehoshaphat near this city. Bede, de loc. SS. lib. iii. cap. 3. testifies, that it might be seen at Jerusalem in his time, but empty. Travellers assure us, that it is still extant in the valley of Jehoshaphat, on the other side the Kedron, over-against Gethsemane and the mount of Olives; that the part of the monument which appears above ground is very little raised; that they descend into the Sepulchre by fifty steps; that it is made in the form of a cell, or small grotto, where is seen something like an altar of stone, upon which the coffin, or the body, might have been placed; that both the cell and the altar are hewn out of the rock: but this is not authority enough to convince us, that this is the real Sepulchre of the Holy Virgin. SERAIAH, שֵׂרַיָה, Σαραϊά, Σαραϊάς, prince of the Lord, or the Lord is my prince: or song of the Lord; from שָׁרַר shurar, to govern, and שִׁיר shur, a song, and יְיָ jah, the Lord.

I. SERAIAH, or SARIAH, king David's secretary. 2 Sam. viii. 17.

II. SERAIAH, father of Joab, of Judah, 1 Chron. iv. 14.

III. SERAIAH, son of Asiel, and father of Josiah. 1 Chron. iv. 35.

IV. SERAIAH, high-priest of the Jews, successor of Azariah, and father of Jehozadak; the last high-priest before the captivity of Babylon. Being taken by Nebuzar-adan, he was carried to king Nebuchadnezzar, then at Riblah, where he was put to death, with seventy others, chief men of Jerusalem, A. M. 3416, ante A. D. 588. Jehozadak, son to Seraiah, was carried captive to Babylon. Jer. lii. 24—27. 2 Kings xxv. 18, 21.

V. SERAIAH, a chief among the Jews, who returned from Babylon. Ezra ii. 2. Nehem. x. 2. xii. 1.

VI. SERAIAH, son of Tanhumeth, a native of Netophah. 2 Kings xxv. 23.

VII. SERAIAH, son of Neriah, and brother of Baruch, the companion and secretary of Jeremiah. Baruch i. 1. Jer. xxxii. 12. Seraiah was sent to Nebuchadnezzar at Babylon, in the fourth year of the reign of Zedekiah, A. M. 3409, ante A. D. 595. He was head of the prophecy, שֵׂרַיָה הַמְּנַחֵם Princeps Prophetia, or chief of the embassy, appointed to carry the denunciations against Babylon. The Hebrew reads, prince of Menucha; which may be understood of a city or district of Benjamin; 1 Chr. ii. 52, 54. viii. 6. or prince of rest, guard of the king's chamber, or bed; or prince of the presents, distributor of the king's liberalities, his almoner, or intendant of his offerings made to the temple; or rather, in this deputation Seraiah was charged with the tributes or presents, sent by Zedekiah to Nebuchadnezzar; and this acceptance of the words returns to that of the Vulgate, Princeps Prophetia, head of the embassy, or deputation.

When Seraiah was sent to Babylon, by king Zedekiah, Jer. li. 59. the Vulgate insinuates, that Zedekiah went himself to Babylon, and that Seraiah only accompanied him; but the Hebrew will admit of another sense, which is followed by several good interpreters. "Seraiah went to Babylon on the behalf of Zedekiah:" מֵאֵת צִדְקִיָּהוּ, as if it had been מֵאֵת צִדְקִיָּהוּ. We know מֵאֵת is sometimes put for מֵאֵת. See Gen. iv. 1. xlv. 4. xlix. 25. Exod. ix. 29, &c. Jeremiah sent by him a letter, which was to be read to the captives there. This letter contained a prophecy of the fall of Babylon; and after it was read, Seraiah was ordered to tie it to a stone, and to throw it into the Euphrates, saying, "thus shall Babylon sink, and shall not rise, from the evil that I will bring upon her." Baruch accompanied his brother Seraiah.

SERAPHIM, שֵׂרָפִים, burning, full of fire; from שָׂרַף sharaph, to burn: or flying serpent.

SERAPHIM, or ZERAPHIM. From the Hebrew Zaraph, which signifies to burn, to melt metal, to purify. Vide FRAGMENTS, and Plate "of TERAPHIM."

I. ZERAPHIM, צֵרָפִים, is used to signify goldsmiths or founders: Aurifices, Conflatores.

II. SERAPHIM, or Saraphim, is the name given to those fiery serpents, which destroyed the Israelites in the desert, Num. xxi. 6. Vide SARAPH, and SERPENTS.

III. SERAPHIM, Isaiah vi. 2. שֵׂרָפִים Seraphim, denotes a kind of angels, around the throne of the Lord: each had six wings; with two of which he covered his face, with two he covered his feet, and flew with the two others. They cried to one another, and said; "Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of Hosts! the whole earth is full of his glory!" The word Seraphim, in in this place, is written with ש shin; but the signification is the same as if it had been written with צ tzade. In the distinction of angels, Seraphim is put first; above Cherubim.

SERED, סרד suppression of government; from סור sur, to disperse, and רדד radah, power; or, cutting off the descent; from ירד jarad.

SERED, or SARED, eldest son of Zebulun; head of a family. Gen. xlv. 14. Num. xxvi. 26.

SERGIUS, Σέργιος. The etymology of it is unknown.

SERGIUS PAULUS, proconsul, or governor, of the island of Cyprus, converted by St. Paul, A. D. 44, or 45. Acts xiii. 7. This proconsul was a man of prudence; but he had a magician about him, whom he considered as wonderfully favoured by God. Having heard of the arrival of Paul and Barnabas in the island, he sent for them, and desired to hear the word of God. Elymas did what he could to hinder him from receiving it: but was struck by Paul with blindness; when Sergius Paulus beheld this, he embraced the Christian faith. Vide PAUL.

SERON, Σήρων, prince of grief, or song of sorrow: otherwise, plain, or champain: from שרר sharar, to govern, or שור shur, to sing, or ישור ishor, or מישור mishor, plain.

SERON, general of the army of Antiochus Epiphanes. 1 Macc. iii. 14, 23. Having heard of the defeat of Apollonius, and that Judas Maccabæus had gathered an army, he fancied that he saw a favourable opportunity of acquiring great glory by fighting with Judas; but he was defeated, A. M. 3838, ante A. D. 166.

SERPENT; נחש, Nachash. ὄφης, Ophis.

Interpreters have extensively speculated concerning the nature of that serpent which tempted Eve. Some have thought, that then the serpent had feet. But there is no probability that this creature was otherwise than it is now. And it cannot be doubted, but that by the serpent, (Nachash) we are to understand the devil, who made use of a real serpent to seduce the first woman, Gen. iii. 13. In the curse of God on the serpent, Nachash, he told him, that the seed of the woman should bruise his head, (Rosh); because, the serpent having his heart under his throat, and near his head, the readiest way to kill him, is to crush, or cut off his head. Many have supposed that his chief subtilty, or wisdom, as the gospel calls it, consists in this, that he chooses to expose his whole body to danger, rather than his head. Matt. x. 16. Vide Epiphan. Hæres. xxxvii. et Physiolog. Chrysost. in Psal. cxiv. Isidor. Hispan. Orig. lib. xii. cap. 4. Pelusiot. lib. i. Ep. 126. alii.

Jesus, son of Sirach, says, Ecclus. xxv. 15. "There is no head above the head of a serpent;" but by the word head, in this place, we should understand venom: for the Hebrew Rosh, which signifies head, signifies also the venom of a serpent. See Deut. xxxii. 33. Scripture expresses itself, sometimes, as supposing the gall of the serpent to be its venom, Job. xx. 14. "His meat in his bowels is turned; it is the gall of asps within him." David, Psalm cxl. 3. seems to place it in the tongue, "They have sharpened their tongues like a serpent;" and Solomon in the teeth, Proverbs xxiii. 32. "At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder." Vide FRAGMENTS, "Of the Serpent's Head," &c. and PLATES.

Another part of God's curse on the serpent was, it should feed on dust. "Dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life," Gen. iii. 14. Isaiah says also, lvi. 25. "Dust shall be the serpent's meat." And Micah, vii. 37. "They shall lick the dust like a serpent." It is true, however, that serpents eat flesh, birds, frogs, fish, fruits, grass, &c. But as they continually creep on the earth it is impossible but that their food must often be defiled with dust and dirt. Some may really eat earth, out of necessity; or earthworms, which they cannot swallow without much dirt with them. Nicander, Theriac. v. 372. et Phil. cap. 59. Vide Bochart, de Animal. Sacr. P. 1. lib. i. cap. 4.

The craft, the wisdom, the subtilty of the serpent, are insisted on in Scripture, as qualities especially distinguishing this creature. Moses, intending to prepare the mind of his reader for his relation of Eve's temptation, begins with affirming, Gen. iii. 1. "Now the serpent (Nachash) was more subtil than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made." And Jesus Christ recommends to his apostles, the wisdom of the serpent, Matt. x. 16. Some bring several proofs of this subtilty of the serpent: they tell us, that the Cerastes hides himself in the sand, in order to bite the horse's foot, that he may throw his rider. Jacob alludes to this in the blessing of Dan, Gen. xlix. 17.

Epiphanius, Physiolog. brings four proofs of the wisdom of the serpent. 1. When he is old, he has the secret of growing young again, and of stripping off his old skin, or slough, by squeezing himself between two rocks. 2. He assaults a man if he sees him naked, but flees if he finds him clothed. (But it is probable there is a fault in this passage of Epiphanius, and that he intends the contrary: for it is generally affirmed, that the serpent is afraid of a naked man, but attacks him if clothed.) Eustath. in Hexæmer.

Jerom, seu alius, Ep. ad Præsidium. Isidor. lib. xii. cap. 4. Origen, &c.) 3. When he is assaulted, his chief care is to secure his head. This is attested by a great number of writers. 4. When he goes to drink at a fountain, he first vomits up all his poison, for fear of poisoning himself as he is drinking. This observation is not generally assented to.

They relate other instances of the serpent's subtilty; E. gr. it stops up its ears that it may not hear the voice of the charmer, or enchanter. The Psalmist notices this, Psalm, lviii. 4. "Like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear, which will not hearken to the voice of the charmer, charming never so wisely." It is said it applies one of its ears closely to the ground, and stops up the other with the end of its tail. Vide Asp. See Bochart, de Animal. Sacr. Par. 2. lib. iii. cap. 6. Others say, the subtilty of the serpent consists in its agility and suppleness; or in a secret it has of recovering its sight by the juice of fennel. But, every one proposes his own conjecture in this matter. [which is but mere conjecture, after all.]

There were eleven kinds of serpents known among the Hebrews. See their respective Articles, and the NATURAL HISTORY.

1. ΕΡΠΕ, ארפח the viper.
2. CHEPHIR, כפר a sort of aspick, or a lion.
3. ACSHUB, עכשוב the aspick.
4. PETHEN, פתן the aspick.
5. TZFBOA, צבוע a speckled serpent, called Hyena by the Greeks and Egyptians.
6. TZIMMAON, צמאון (according to Jerom.)
7. TZEPHA, צפא or צפוני TZIPHONI, a basilisk: (not the fabulous cockatrice, but a serpent, like others.)
8. KIPPOS, קפס, which the LXX. Jerom, and the Chaldee understand of the urchin, or hedge-hog; but Bochart thinks it to be the serpent called by the Greeks Acontias, the dart, because it darts itself far and high, after its prey.
9. SHEPHIPHON, שפפון, which Jerom has translated Cerastes, Gen. xlix. 17. This serpent is of the colour of sand, in which it hides itself, and where it watches for prey. It has the name Cerastes from a sort of fleshy horns, like grains of barley over its eyes.
10. SHACHAL, שחל, LXX. Ασπις. Psalm xci. 13. "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder; the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet." The LXX. Syriac, and Arabic understand a serpent here; Bochart supports their opinion, and shews, that the name of black, (the signification of shachal) agrees to several serpents, particularly to the aspic, the dipeas, the hydra, &c. But the greater part of the best informed interpreters, are of opinion, that the word shachal, in this place, signifies a lion, and not a serpent. And this sentiment seems much more probable. It is certain that this Hebrew word generally signifies a black lion.

11. The SARAPH, שרף, is a flying serpent, and the only serpent said to have wings. The word sardph properly signifies to burn, and it is thought this name was given it, either because of its colour, or because of the heat and thirst created by its bite. Herodotus, who had seen these serpents, says, lib. ii. cap. 75, 76. they had great resemblance to those which the Greeks and Latins called Hydræ. Bochart endeavours to prove they were real hydræ. Herodotus further says, he went on purpose to the city of Butus, to see those flying serpents of which he had heard. He saw near this city great heaps of bones, the spines of those creatures, which had been killed and devoured by the Ibis. The place, says he, is a narrow neck of ground that widens towards Egypt. When therefore, at the beginning of spring, these serpents come out of Arabia into Egypt, the Ibis attacks them, and destroys great numbers of them. The wings of these serpents are not feathers, like the wings of birds, but membranes rather like those of bats.

He says, lib. iii. cap. 107, 108, 109, 110. that these serpents are not large; they are speckled, or of several colours; and are in such great numbers in Arabia, that the inhabitants could not subsist for them, if Providence had allowed them to multiply according to the usual laws of nature. But the Arabians affirm, that the female puts the male to death when they engender; and that the young ones at their birth kill their mother. They love sweet smells, and frequent such trees as bear spices, and the marshes where the aromatic reed (or cassia) grows. The Arabians drive them from the trees by the smoke of styrax; and when they gather the reed (or cassia) they clothe themselves with skins, and cover their heads, all but their eyes; then they go into these marshes, from whence they drive the winged serpents, whose flight has something terrible, and whose bite is very dangerous.

We have a little enlarged on these serpents, (called saraph, Numb. xxi. 9. Isaiah xiv. 29. xxx. 6.) because, they made so great a destruction among the Israelites in the desert. Vide infra. Bochart de Animal. Sacr. P. 2. lib. iii. cap. 13. Cicero, lib. i. de Natura Deorum; Mela, lib. iii. cap. 9. Lucan, lib. vi. Solinus, cap. 32. Atamianus Marcellinus, cap. 22. Ælian, lib. ii. cap. 38. and the moderns, quoted by Bochart, who speak of these flying serpents,

Brazen

Brazen serpent, Num. xxi. 9. This was a figure of the serpent, seraph, which Moses elevated on the top of a pike, promising the Hebrews, that all who were bitten by serpents, and who looked toward this image, should be healed: as the event proved. Our Saviour, John iii. 14. informs us, that this serpent, so elevated, was typical of his crucifixion. This brazen serpent was preserved in Israel to the time of Hezekiah, who being informed that the people paid a superstitious worship to it, had it broken in pieces, and in contempt, gave it the name of Nechush-tan, [a play on the word Nachash] a brazen bawble, or trifle, 2 Kings xviii. 4. See NEHUSH-TAN.

The Arrow serpent, in Greek Acontias, is a flying serpent, known to the Turks by the name of Ocilan, Bibl. Orient. p. 684. They are often seen in the Archipelago, and chiefly in the island of Meteline; they fight with one another in the air, it is said, but do men no harm.—A learned Englishman pretends, (Abp. Tennison, Discourse of Idolatry, cap. 14.) that the activity and splendor of these creatures, may serve for an emblem to express the zeal and purity of those angels, whom Scripture calls Seraphim; which name the Hebrews gave to these serpents. He thinks that the angels, when they appeared to men, assumed the form of seraphs, or flying serpents; that the devil spoke to Eve under this appearance; that this deceived her, imagining him to be a seraph, or angel.

In the church of St. Ambrose at Milan, they keep a brazen serpent, which they shew for that of Moses; but every one may believe of this as he pleases. The serpent that is always represented with Esculapius; with the goddess Salus; and with the Egyptian deities; is a symbol of healing, or health, perhaps derived from the brazen serpent of Moses. [rather, as the serpent by casting its skin, seems to start into new life, so is restoration to health and vigour after sickness.]

The worship of the serpent is observed through all Pagan antiquity. The devil, who tempted the first woman under the shape of a serpent, takes a pleasure to deify this creature, as a trophy of his victory over mankind. The Babylonians in Daniel's time, worshipped a dragon, which was demolished by this prophet. Bel and Dragon. It is well known, that worship was paid to the serpent at Epidaurus; also the manner in which they pretended he was brought to Rome. The Egyptians sometimes represented their gods with the bodies of serpents; and they paid an idolatrous worship to those odious and dangerous creatures. They called them their good genius's. [See PLATES, MEDALS OF EGYPT, 20, 21.] They regarded them as symbols of medicine, of the sun, of Apollo. They were committed to the charge of Ceres and Proserpine. Herodotus says, lib. ii. cap. 74. that in his time, near Thebes, were to be seen tame serpents consecrated to Jupiter. They did nobody any harm, and after their death they were buried in Jupiter's temple. They were but small, of the Cerastes kind, and had two horns.

Elian, de Anim. lib. xi. cap. 22. speaks of a sacred dragon, kept in Phrygia, in a wood dedicated to Diana. He also speaks of domestic serpents, in the houses of the Egyptians, which were fed, and looked on as household gods; and lib. xi. cap. 17. of another serpent worshipped in a tower at Melitus in Egypt. He had a priest and officers to attend him. He was served every day on a table, or altar, with meal kneaded with honey, which the next day was found to be eaten up. At this day serpents are honoured in Calicut; the kings and the Bramins, look on them as sacred animals, created by God to afflict men, and to punish them for their sins.

[This veneration for serpents, even of the most venomous kinds, is well known to be prevalent throughout India; to the great terror of all newly-arrived Europeans. In many parts of Africa, the worship of serpents is carried to the most degrading excess.]

The Ophites took their name from Ophis, which, in Greek, signifies a serpent. These ancient heretics worshipped the serpent that betrayed Eve, and ascribed all sorts of knowledge to these creatures, of which they thought them to be masters and inventors: (Epiphanius, de Hæres. xxxvii. Irenæus, lib. i. cap. 34. Origen, lib. vi. contra Cels. Tertullian, de Præscript. cap. 47.) In a word, they believed the serpent that tempted Eve was the Christ, which afterwards came down, and was incarnate in the person of Jesus. That it was Jesus, but not the Christ that suffered. For which reason they made all proselytes to their sect renounce Jesus. When their priests celebrated their mysteries, they attracted one of these creatures out of his hole, and after he had rolled himself on the things that were to be sacrificed, they said that Jesus Christ had sanctified them; and then they gave them to the people to be worshipped.

Serpent crossing like a bar; Vulgate, serpens vectis. This serpent is noticed in two passages of Scripture: Isaiah xxvii. 1. In die illa visitabit Dominus in gladio suo—super Leviathan serpentem vectem, [Eng. translation, the piercing serpent.] et super Leviathan serpentem tortuosum. Hebr. נחש ברח, Nachash beriach, and Nachash aktalon.

oktalon. Job, xxvi. 13, speaks of the same serpent; but Jerom has translated it by serpentem tortuosum. Some render נחש ברך, Nachash be-riach, by flying serpent, or shutting serpent, as a bar that shuts a door. Bochart, de Animal. Sacr. P. ii. lib. v. cap. 13, thinks this serpens vectis is the Baratell, a fish known in Oppian, Elian, Galen, Suidas, under the name of Zygæna. Its head is neither round nor high, nor flat, nor pointed, but on the two sides stretching out transversely like a bar: [the HAMMER-HEADED Shark.] The Hebrews reckoned fishes in the tribe of reptiles, and serpents; also the crocodile, or leviathan.

Serpent is also taken for the devil. The invisible serpent which tempted Eve by the organs of the sensible serpent, was the devil, as Scripture and commentators allow. Some also explain of the devil what Job says of the crooked serpent, and what Isaiah says of the serpent like a bar: as above. St. John, Rev. xii. 9, 14, observes plainly, that the old serpent is the devil and Satan; "which deceiveth the whole world." The Jews also call the devil, the old serpent. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCCXCV. seq. and PLATES.

SERUG, or SARUG, son of Reu, and father of Nahor, Gen. xi. 20, 21, 22. 1 Chron. i. 26.

It is pretended that Serug was the first after the Deluge, who began to worship creatures.—Clem. Alex. Euseb. Epiph. Theodor. In his time men formed a multitude of idols, by which the devil performed many prodigies. Serug thought he might adore the images of men, who had distinguished themselves by their virtues, and by their good deeds performed for mankind. This introduced the worship of the dead, and by consequence, idolatry and polytheism.

SERVANT. This word generally signifies a slave: because, formerly among the Hebrews, and the neighbouring nations, the greater part of servants were slaves; they belonged absolutely to their masters, who had a right to dispose of their persons, their bodies, goods, and even of their lives, in some cases. See SLAVES.

II. SERVANT. The Hebrews had two sorts of servants, or slaves. Levit. xxv. 44, 45. Some were strangers, bought, or taken in war, and their masters kept them, exchanged them, or sold them; as their property. The others were Hebrew slaves, who being poor, sold themselves, or were sold to pay their debts; or were delivered for slaves by their parents, in extreme cases.—This sort of Hebrew slaves continued in slavery only to the year of Jubilee; when they might return to liberty, and their masters could not detain them against their wills. If they desired to continue with their masters, they were brought before the Judges; here they made a declaration, that for this time they disclaimed the privilege of the law, and had their ears bored with an awl against the door-posts of their master's house; after which they had no longer any power of recovering their liberty, till the next year of Jubilee, after nine and forty years. Exod. xxi. 2, 5, &c.

III. SERVANT, a man who dedicates himself to the service of another, by his own choice, will, and inclination. Thus, Joshua was the servant of Moses, Elisha of Elijah, Gehazi of Elisha, St. Peter, St. Andrew, St. Philip, &c. were servants of Jesus Christ.

IV. SERVANT, the subjects [rather the officers] of a prince. The servants of Pharaoh, the servants of Saul, of David, i. e. their subjects in general; and their domestics in particular. In like manner, the Philistines, the Syrians, and other nations, were servants of David; i. e. they obeyed him, they paid him tribute.

V. SERVANTS of God, servants of the Lord, the priests, the prophets, those who make profession of a particular piety. The name Man of God, and servant of God, is often given to Moses by way of eminence; and St. Paul often takes the same character. He gives excellent rules of morality to Christian slaves. 1 Cor. vii. 21, 22. Ephes. vi. 5, 6, 7. Col. iii. 22. 2 Tim. ii. 9.

VI. SERVANTS, or slaves, as opposed to those who are free, and to the children of the Promises, denote the Jews, in contradistinction from the Christians. The Jews were the slaves, represented by Hagar and Ishmael; Christians are the children of liberty, represented by Sarah and by Isaac. Vide the Epistle to the Galatians.

SESOSTRIS, king of Egypt. We should not have mentioned this prince, but that several have pretended he is the Shishak, or Sesac, who invaded Rehoboam, son of Solomon king of Judah. Herodotus says, lib. ii. that from Mæris to Sesostris, there was no king whose actions deserved notice. When this prince had reduced the people beyond the Gulf of Arabia, or the Red-sea, he turned his arms against the nations on the continent of Asia, and subjected them. Those whom he found warlike, who valiantly fought for their liberties, he distinguished by honourable inscriptions, set up in their countries, which mentioned their valour and brave resistance; those on the contrary, who did not gallantly defend themselves, he marked with infamy famy, by erecting monuments in their country, which shewed they had behaved like women.— And this was expressed on the monuments not only by letters, but also by figures engraven thereon: [i. e. the sexual parts; which among the Egyptians were expressed by an upright triangle: Δ .] Herodotus assures us, that in Palestine he had seen these inscriptions and monuments.

Herodotus thinks, that from thence he passed into the country of the Colchians; of which he has no certain proof, except that the Colchians, as well as the Egyptians, practised circumcision; that their language is the same, and that they make linen after the same manner.

This is the substance of what Herodotus relates concerning Sesostris, wherein he mentions but one word about the conquests of this prince in Palestine; yet this is all the foundation for making Shishak to be Sesostris.

SESTERTIUS, a Roman money. Its name is not in Scripture. Its value was about three half-pence; ten Sestertii made one shilling and five pence; one hundred Sestertii made fourteen shillings and three-pence; and a thousand Sestertii made seven pounds, two shillings and six-pence.

The Roman Sestertius, according to Dr. Arbuthnot, was in value something more than is determined by our author. He makes it one penny three farthings, and three-quarters of a farthing, of our money.

A great Sestertius, unum Sestertium, was a thousand small Sestertii.

SETH, שֵׁט, put, or who puts; from שָׁט, shuth, to put. [in place of another.]

SETH, son of Adam and Eve, born A. M. 130. Gen. v. 3, 6, 10, 11. Seth at the age of one hundred and five years begat Enos, A. M. 235. He lived after this eight hundred and seven years; in all nine hundred and twelve years: and died A. M. 1042, ante A. D. 2962. Seth was the chief of the race of the saints, and of "the Children of God," as Scripture calls them, Gen. vi. 2, who preserved the true religion and piety, which the descendants of Cain had abandoned.

An apocryphal book, called the Lesser Genesis, pretends, that when Seth was forty years of age, he was rapt up into heaven by angels, and was there told of the crime the watchers, or angels, should commit; the deluge that should drown the world; and the coming of the Saviour into the world: of which events he informed his parents Adam and Eve. That the posterity of Seth continued for a thousand years after the creation of the world, in the country just above

Eden, where they lived in profound peace and quiet; but the Devil being envious of their happiness and innocence, seduced them by the charms and beauty of the daughters of men: or as Moses says, "The sons of God saw the daughters of men, that they were fair; and they took them wives of all which they chose." Lastly, the same book tells us, that Seth at the age of one hundred and ninety-one years, took to wife his own sister called Azura. Epiphanius calls her Orea; and Irenæus, or rather the Gnostics in Irenæus, call her Norea. Iren. lib. i. cap. 34, ex Gnost. Syncell. Chronic. p. 10, ex parva Genesi.

The heretics called Sethians, believed, that Seth was the Christ, and that Jesus Christ was this patriarch, who after having been transported out of the world, at length returned into it again in a miraculous manner, and was named Jesus. They did not acknowledge his birth of the Virgin Mary. They said he had the name of God given him before the deluge; for it was of his sons it was said, that "The sons of God saw the daughters of men." Theodoret, qu. 47. in Genes. Suidas, in Seth. And this was either because of his eminent piety, or because he invented the use of letters and writing, also the names of the stars and planets. An ancient chronicle says, (vide Rador. Animadvers. in Chronic. Alex. p. 18.) that this patriarch being caught up into heaven, as we have said before, his face ever after appeared luminous, like Moses's face after he had conversed with the Lord on Mount Sinai.

Several impertinent books have been ascribed to the patriarch Seth. Josephus refers to two columns erected before the deluge by the children of Seth; one of brick, to withstand the fire; the other of stone to withstand the water: on which they inscribed their discoveries in astronomy. Vide SEIRATH. Lambecius cites a manuscript in the emperor's library, called, The Astronomy delivered by an angel to the patriarch Seth. The author of the imperfect work on St. Matthew, speaks of a book that bore the name of Seth, which mentioned the star that appeared to the Magi, and the presents they made to our Saviour. Epiphanius says, Hæres. xxviii. Gnostic. cap. 8. xxxix. cap. 5. that the Gnostics and Sethians had several books that bore the name of Seth. The Mahometans assure us, that God sent Seth not less than fifty volumes, which angels brought him from heaven. The Arabians, the Ethiopians, and the Samaritans pretend also to have books of this antient patriarch. See Fabricius, Apocrypha. V. T. Art. SETH.

The Mussulmen hold a fabulous tradition, that those who are called in Scripture, "children of God," were of a peculiar species, between men and angels. They made a continual war with the Dives, or giants, which were the children of Cain. The patriarch Seth made a law, which was contained in a book called, the book of Seth, wherein were the pretended revelations he had received to confirm his mission; and his descendants usually swore, "by the true law of the prophet Seth." The same Mussulmen believe, that when this patriarch had visited the sepulchre of Adam, which was in the midst of the earth, in the place where afterwards was built Jerusalem, and the temple; he came into Arabia Fœlix, and there built the city Medinat-al-Scheith, the city of Seth; and Medinat-al-Jemen, the capital city of Jemen: they still bear those names.

SETHON, king of Egypt, reigned at the time Sennacherib invaded Hezekiah king of Judah. Herodotus, lib. ii. says, Sethon succeeded king Amasis, who was blind. Sethon committed a great fault in government, by neglecting warlike men, as useless, disgracing them on all occasions, and taking from them those estates that had been given them by the kings his predecessors. For this reason, in the war declared against him by Sennacherib king of Assyria and Arabia, they refused to obey him. In this perplexity Sethon addressed himself to his god, and wept, and laid before him the danger he was in. After prayer he fell asleep, and while he slept his god commanded him in a dream, to march out boldly to meet his enemy, and he would supply him with auxiliary troops. He therefore took with him what soldiers he had, and encamped at Pelusium, which is, as it were, the key of Egypt. His little army consisted only of citizens and tradesmen, men without experience in war; for those who had made war their profession would not follow him. The same night that he arrived at Pelusium, a multitude of field rats invaded the camp of the enemy, gnawed their bows and quivers, and the thongs of their bucklers; so that the day following, finding themselves unable for war, they betook themselves to flight, after losing many of their men. To preserve the memory of this event, they represented the statue of Sethon in the temple of Vulcan, holding a rat in his hand, with this inscription; "Those who look upon me, let them remember to be pious." This figure was to be seen in Herodotus's time.

SETHUR, שֶׁחַר, that hides, that destroys;

[refuge, protection, of the parents] from שֶׁחַר sathar, to hide, to destroy. Numb. xiii. 18.

SEVEN. This number is consecrated, as it were, in the holy books, and in the religion of the Jews, by a great number of events, and mysterious circumstances. God created the world in seven days, and consecrated the seventh day to repose. This rest of the seventh day, according to St. Paul, Heb. iv. 4. intimates eternal rest.—Not only the seventh day was honoured among the Jews, by the repose of the sabbath, but every seventh year was also consecrated to the rest of the earth, as a sabbatical year; also the seven times seventh year, or after forty-nine years, as the year of Jubilee. In the prophetic style, a week, i. e. seven days, often signifies seven years. Dan. ix. 24, 25, 26. Jacob served his father-in-law Laban seven years for each of his daughters. Pharaoh's mysterious dreams represented to his imagination seven fat oxen, and seven lean ones; seven full ears of corn, and seven empty and shrivelled. These denoted seven years of plenty, and seven of scarcity. The number of seven days is observed in the octaves of the great solemnities—of the Passover;—of the feast of Tabernacles; of the dedication of the Temple; observe also, the seven branches of the golden candlestick; the number of seven sacrifices, appointed on several occasions; Numb. xxviii. 11. xxix. 17, 21, &c. seven trumpets, seven priests who sounded them; seven days to surround the walls of Jericho, Josh. vi. 4, 6, 8. In the Revelations,—the seven churches, seven candlesticks, seven spirits, seven stars, seven lamps, seven seals, seven angels, seven phials, seven plagues, &c. In a word, we may say we find the number seven throughout Scripture.

The number seven is sometimes put for many, a great number. Isaiah says, iv. 1. seven women shall lay hold on one man, to ask him to marry them. Hannah, the mother of Samuel says, she who was barren, had borne seven children, 1 Sam. ii. 5. (Peperit plurimos, Vulgate.) Jeremiah, xv. 9. uses the same expression. God threatens his people to smite them seven times for their transgressions, Lev. xxvi. 24, i. e. several times.

The Psalmist speaking of very pure silver, says it is purified seven times, Psalm xii. 6. And Psalm lxxix. 12, "Render unto our neighbours sevenfold into their bosom." Punish them severely. The slayer of Cain was to be punished seven times; but the slayer of Lamech seventy times seven times, Gen. iv. 15, 24. The wise man says, Eccclus. vii. 3, "Sow not upon the furrows of unrighteousness, and thou shalt not reap them sevenfold;" i. e. many times. The slothful slothful man thinks himself wiser than seven men, that set forth Proverbs: many wise men. Prov. xxvi. 16. St. Peter asks our Saviour, Matt. xvii. 21, 22, "How many times shall I forgive my neighbour? seven times?" Christ answers him, not only seven times, but seventy times seven times. Amos often repeats, I will not pardon the seven—i. e. the numerous—sins of Damascus, of Edom, of Gaza, of Tyre, of Ammon, &c. but I will punish them with rigour. Amos i. 3, 6, 9. ii. 13.

See WEEK, SABBATH, SABBATICAL YEAR, JUBILEE, &c.

The seventy weeks of Daniel. Vide WEEK. Dr. PRIDEAUX, Connexion, tom. i. p. 13, 14, &c. begins them from the seventh year of king Artaxerxes Longimanus; the year of his decree in favour of Esdras, for his returning to Jerusalem.

SEVENTY Interpreters. See SEPTUAGINT.

SEVENTY Disciples. This name is given to those seventy-two disciples who were chosen by Jesus Christ, and sent to preach before him. Luke x. 1, 17. See DISCIPLE.

SEXTARIUS, a Roman measure for liquids. It contained two Heminae, or ten Roman ounces, according to Fannius, Heminas recipit geminas Sextarius unus.

Budeus, de Asse, lib. v. thinks the Sextarius was nearly the same as the pint of Paris. Jerom, on Ezekiel, says, that a man may be supported, by only drinking two Sextarii a-day.

SHAALABBIM, שַׁאֲלַבִּים, that beholds the heart; from שָׁחַח shahah, to see, and לֵב lebab, the heart: otherwise, fist, or hand, or fox of the sea; from שָׁחַח shoal, the hand, or שָׁחַח shual, a fox, the preposition ב beth, in, and יָם jam, the sea. Judges i. 35. Gr. κυναλωπήκων. Or,

SHAALABIN, שַׁאֲלַבִּין, understanding of the fox; from שָׁחַח shual, a fox, and בִּן bun, understanding.

[Much more probably, "the haunts of the shuals," or jackalls, of which there were, and are, abundance in Judea.

The same place appears to be called SHAALBIN, Jud. i. 35. 1 Kings iv. 9. A town in Dan.

SHAALABBIN, with the Chaldee termination, Josh. xix. 42. The same, perhaps, as is also called SHAALIM, 1 Sam. ix. 4. as Cellarius thinks, Geog. Ant. tom. ii. p. 607.]

SHAALABBIN, SHAALABIN, SALEBIM, or SELEBIN. A city of Dan, Josh. xix. 42. adjoining to Ajalon and Heres, Judg. i. 35. and near the cities of Makas, and Bethshemesh: which circumstances pretty nearly shew its situation. The present Hebrew reads Shaalabim. Eusebius, in locis Hebr. calls it Salaba, and places it in Samaria. Jerom calls it Salebi, and joins it to Ajalon and to Emmaus. The LXX. call it Salamin, or Talamin. Jerom, Con. in Ezek. xlviii. LXX. in Græc.

SHAALBON, שַׁאֲלָבֹן, Σαλαβώνιτης, the understanding, the son, or the building, of the fox, of the fist, or of the path; from בִּן bun, the understanding, בֶּן ben, a son, or בִּנָּה banah, a building, and שָׁחַח shual, the hand, the fist, or שָׁחַח shual, a fox, or from שָׁחַח.

SHAALBON, or SALABON, the name of a place in Judea. We read of Elishba of Shalbon, one of the heroes of David's army. 2 Sam. xxiii. 32. 1 Chron. xi. 33. Shaulbon is doubtless the same as Selbon beyond Jordan. This must have been a considerable place, since Josephus notices it as giving name to the district Selbenite, which limits Perea east, with Philadelphia and Gerar. Joseph. de Bello, lib. iii. 2.

SHAAPH, שָׂפָה, that thinks; from שָׂפָה shaph: or that flies away; from שָׂפָה huph, to fly, a bird. Son of Jahdai, 1 Chron. ii. 47. [See SHEPHO: sweet, pleasant, as balsam.]

II. Son of Caleb, by Maachah. 1 Chr. v. 49.

SHAARAIM, שַׁאֲרַיִם, Σαρῆιμ. [two] gates, valuations, barley, tempests, goats, hairy, demons; from שָׁחַח shahar, or שָׁחַח shahir, or שָׁחַח shorah, according to different readings.

SHAARAIM, or SAARIM, a city of Simeon, 1 Chron. iv. 31. apparently the Sharaim, or Saraim, of Judah, Josh. xv. 36. Several cities of Judah were afterwards transferred to Simeon.

SHADDAI, SADAİ, or SADDAD, שֵׁדַי, Ego Dominus Omnipotens. This is one of the Hebrew names of God, which the LXX. and Jerom generally translate Almighty. It is most commonly put alone, as Num. xxiv. 4, 16. "Who saw the vision of the Almighty (Shadai)." Ruth i. 21. "The Almighty (Shadai) hath afflicted me." Job vi. 4. "The arrows of the Almighty (Shadai) are within me." Job more frequently uses this word, than any other of the sacred writers. It is not found in the books of Solomon. Sometimes it is joined with El, which is another name of God, El-Shadai, God-Almighty. Gen. xvii. 1.

It should seem that Sadai, or Shadai, is from the Hebrew Sadad, or Shadad, which signifies to ravage, to ruin, to pillage; q. God the destroyer, the God of devastation; it may be rendered the God of the fields, or the God of nipples: [rather the God of bounty: the shedding God.]

SHAASHGAZ, שַׁאשְׁגַּז, he that presses the fleece; from שָׁחַח hahash, to squeeze, and גַּז gazaz, a fleece:

fleece: otherwise, he that performs the shearing of the sheep: from חָשַׁק hahash, to perform, to make, and גָּזַז gazazi, the sheep-shearing. This word is Persian or Medish, its true etymology cannot be had from the Hebrew. [The keeper of the fleeces; an officer belonging to the king. Esth. ii. 14.]

SHABBETHAI, שַׁבְּתַי, Σαββαθαῖος, my Sabbath, my rest: from שַׁבָּת shabath, repose, and the pronoun 'my'. Neh. xi. 16.

SHACHIA, שָׁכִיָּה, protection, inclosure, branch of the Lord: from שָׁחַ shuc: otherwise, rest of the Lord: from שָׁכַח shacac, to rest, and יָהּ jah, the Lord. Son of Shabaraim. 1 Chron. viii. 13.

[SHADOW, the privation of light, by an object interposed between a luminary and the surface on which the shadow appears. But it is credible that what we call spots in the sun are alluded to 1 John i. 5. under the term shadows, or darkness: such defects, says the apostle, may be in the sun; but there are none in God.

For the retrogradation of the shadow on the dial of Ahaz, vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. II. CII. &c. with the PLATES, DIALS.

A shadow falling on a plane follows the course of the body which causes it; hence it is often extremely swift, as that of a bird flying, which very rapidly indeed instantly appears, and disappears from observation: human life is compared to this, 1 Chr. xxix. 15.

As the shadow of a man, &c. when it falls on the ground, is of different lengths at different times of the day, and as the time of the day was originally estimated by this, the first sun-dial, so it is very natural that the hireling who wished his day of labour ended, should desire the shadow, Job vii. 2. meaning, the long shadow falling on the ground, and issuing in the shadow of night itself. Indeed, it seems to have been customary in later ages, to estimate the time of the day by the length of the shadow: so we have in Aristophanes, Concion. "When the letter of the alphabet denoted the shadow to be ten feet long, it was time to think of dressing and going to supper," i. e. the sun began to grow low; for twelve feet was the full length of the shadow.—Comp. Psalm cii. 11. Jer. vi. 4.

An Arab when relating the history of his day's march, says, "We started at day-break, we rested at noon, near the water, we set out again, when a man's shadow was equal to his length, and after sun-set we alighted and slept, in such or such a place." This is still the Eastern phraseology, as remarked by Burckhardt, Trav. Vol. I. p. 480.

Shadow is also taken for unsubstantial, so

Job says, "my members are a shadow," xvii. 7. i. e. they are diminished to a total, or comparative, privation of substance. Hence, the Mosaic œconomy is called a shadow, a very obscure representation of things, which in the gospel are clearly revealed. But it is thought that this word, Heb. x. 1. alludes to the sketch of an artist or painter, who first forms (with chalk) on his canvas the rude outlines of his subject, a just visible, rough, merely indicative representation, of what is to be afterwards finished correctly and carefully. To this is strongly opposed the complete image, the beautiful statue exhibited in the gospel; yet this statue, be it remembered, is not living, not animated; the full perfection of life, motion, sensibility, and happiness, is reserved for the world of bliss and glory, the celestial state.

Shadow is taken for the obscurity of night, for the total absence of light in a night of clouds, &c. pitch-darkness: and hence "the shadow of death;" intense darkness: to which add, the horror which naturally attends the tomb, and the unexplored regions of death: the valley of the shadow of death; glooms and dismal terrors, terrors fatal and perpetual.

Shadow is also taken in a sense directly contrary to the foregoing, because in countries near the tropics, every spot exposed to the burning heat of the sun, is dangerous to health, therefore nothing is more acceptable than shade, nothing is more refreshing, or more salutary: hence the shadow of a great rock is desirable in a land of weariness, Isaiah xxxii. 10. hence shadow signifies protection, Isaiah xxx. 2. Vide Dan. iv. 12. Hosea iv. 13. hence the shadow of wings in a bird is protection also, and hence the shadow, i. e. protection of God, Psalms xvii. 8. lxiii. 7. xci. 1. Isaiah xlix. 2. Perhaps the word SHADE in these places, might be preferable to shadow, and would preserve a distinction.]

SHADRACH, שָׁדְרַךְ, tender nipple, or field soft and tender; from שָׁד shod, nipple, or שָׂדֶה shadah, field, and רַךְ racac, tender. This is a Babylonian word, whose etymology is hardly to be found in the Hebrew. [assiduous, diligent, from the Chaldee.]

SHADRACH, or SIDRACH: the Chaldean name given to Ananias, a companion of Daniel, at the court of king Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. i. 7. See ANANIAS.

SHAGE, שָׂגַע, Sagal, that is ignorant, or in error; from שָׂגַג shagag: otherwise, that increases and multiplies; from שָׂגָה shaga. [wanderer; so Peregrine, a child born while the parents were in foreign parts.]

SHAGE, or SAGE, father of Jonathan, a hero hero of David's army, 1 Chron. xi. 34, Jonathan son of Shage, the Hararite. 2 Sam. xxiii. 33, reads Jonathan, Shunmah, the Hararite.

SHAHARAIM, שַׁחַרְיָא, blacks, troubles, or that rise early; from שַׁחַר shachar. [day dawn.]

SHAHARAIM, or SAHARAIM, son of Uzah, and father of Jobab, Zibia, Mesha, &c. of Benjamin. 1 Chron. viii. 8.

SHAHAZIMAH, שַׁחַצִּימָה, humiliations of the fast; from שַׁחַח shachach, to be humble; otherwise, pit of the fast; from שַׁחַח shechuth; or meditation of the fast; from שַׁחַח shuach, and צִיּוּם tsum, fast: otherwise, pride of the sea; from שַׁחַח shachats, pride, and יָם jam, the sea. A city, Josh. xix. 22.

SHALIM, שַׁלְיָם, fox, or fist; from שַׁלַּח shaal: or a path; from מִשְׁחָל mishol. [perhaps, many lions. Josh. xix. 22.]

SHALIM, or SALIM. See SALEM, and 1 Sam. ix. 4, where Shalem may stand for Jerusalem.

SHALISHA, שַׁלִּישָׁה, three, or the third; from שַׁלֹּשׁ shalosh: or prince, captain; from שַׁלִּישׁ. [triple, or of the principal: otherwise, the ternary, or of the princess, or duchess.]

SHALISHA, or SALISSA, or BAAL-SALISA. Shalisha is mentioned, 1 Sam. ix. 4. and Baulsalisha, 2 Kings iv. 42. Shalisha was fifteen miles from Diospolis, in the canton Thamnitica, north of Jerusalem. See Eusebius, and Jerom, in Beth-schalisha. See BAAL.

SHALLUM, שַׁלְלֹם, perfect, pacific; from שַׁלָּם shalum, peace.

I. SHALLUM, SHILLEM, SALOM, SELLEM, or SELLUM, of Naphtali, chief of a family, Num. xxvi. 49.

II. SHALLUM, son of Jabesh, or, perhaps a native of Jabesh. He treacherously killed Zechariah, king of Israel, and usurped his kingdom, but held it only one month. Menahem son of Gadi, killed him in Samaria. Scripture says, that Shallum was the executioner of the threatenings of the Lord, against the house of Jehu. 2 Kings xv. 10. A. M. 3232, ante A. D. 772.

III. SHALLUM, son of Tikvah, or Tickvath: or native of Tikvah, husband of the prophetess Huldah, who lived under Josiah, king of Judah, 2 Kings xxii. 14.

IV. SHALLUM, son of Sisami, and father of Jekamiah, of Judah. 1 Chron. ii. 40.

V. SHALLUM, son of Shaul, and father of Mibsam, of Simeon, 1 Chron. iv. 25.

VI. SHALLUM, fourth son of Josiah, king of Judah, 1 Chron. iii. 15. Jer. xxii. 11. The same as Jehoahaz; made king after the death of Josiah; the king of Egypt carried him prisoner into Egypt, 2 Kings xxiii. 30, 31, 34. See JEHOAHAZ.

VII. SHALLUM, son of the high-priest Zadok, and father of Hilkiah the high-priest, 1 Chr. vi. 12, 13. Shallum is called Meshallum, 1 Chr. ix. 11. He lived in the time of Hezekiah, or of Ahaz; and was the father of Azariah, but only uncle to Hilkiah. He seems to be the Salom of Baruch, i. 7.

VIII. SHALLUM, son of Korah, 1 Chron. ix. 19. 31. He was spared in the desert, when the earth opened and swallowed up his father. Num. xxxi. 11. The descendants of Shallum had an office in the temple, which was to take care of the cakes that were fried there.

IX. SHALLUM, son of Colhoseh, chief of the town of Mizpah; he rebuilt, at his own charge, the fountain-gate at Jerusalem, after the return from Babylon. Nehem. iii. 15.

SHALMAI, שַׁלְמַי, my garment; from שַׁלְמָה shalmah, a garment, and the pronoun i, my.—Father of Hagaba, Numb. vii. 48.

SHALMAN, שַׁלְמָן, peaceable, perfect, or that rewards; from שַׁלָּם shalam. Hosea, x. 14. See SALMA, or SALMON.

SHALMANESER, שַׁלְמַנְאֶסֶר, peace, tied, or chained, or perfection and retribution, or peace taken away, or that withdraws; from שַׁלָּם shalam, peace, perfection, and retribution, and אָסַר asar, to tie, or יָסַר jasar. [Perfection of the prince; but Vitranga thinks, peace of the prince: a perfect, or a peaceful sovereign.]

SHALMANESER, or SHALMANASAR, king of Assyria, succeeded Tiglath-pileser, and had Sennacherib for his successor. He ascended the throne A. M. 3276, reigned fourteen years, and died A. M. 3290, 2 Kings xvii. 3. It is very probable he is called Enmessar, in the Greek of Tobit, i. 2. and Shalman, in Hosea x. 14. Scripture reports of Shalmaneser, that he came into Palestine, subdued Samaria, and obliged Hoshea, son of Elah, to pay him tribute; but in the third year, being weary of this exaction, Hoshea combined secretly, with So, king of Egypt, to remove this subjection. Shalmaneser brought an army against him, ravaged Samaria, besieged Hoshea in his capital city; and notwithstanding his long resistance, (for he held out three years, 2 Kings xvii. xviii. 9, 10.) he took the city, put Hoshea into bonds, carried away the people beyond the Euphrates; and thus ruined the city and kingdom of Samaria, which had subsisted two hundred and fifty-four years, from A. M. 3030, to 3283, ante A. D. 721. Tobit was among the captives carried away by Shalmaneser, but afterwards acquired the good graces of this prince, who gave him liberty of actions and residence. According to the Greek, he even made him his purveyor, an officer officer who furnished provisions to the king's household.

Profane authors tell us, that this prince made war against the Tyrians. Menander, apud Joseph. Antiq. lib. ix. cap. 14. et cont. Appion, lib. i. Eleleus, king of Tyre, seeing the Philistines were much weakened by their war with Hezekiah, king of Judah, took this opportunity of recovering to his obedience, the city of Gath, which had revolted from him. The Gathites fearing the power of the king of Tyre, had recourse to Shalmaneser, who marched with all his forces against the Tyrians. At his approach, the city of Sidon, Ace, afterwards Ptolemais, (now Acre,) and the other maritime cities of Phenicia submitted to him.

But the Tyrians, with only twelve ships, having in a sea-fight defeated the united fleet of the Assyrians and Phenicians, acquired by this victory so great a reputation at sea, and became so formidable, that Shalmaneser durst no more engage them by sea. He withdrew therefore into his own dominions, but left a great part of his army to besiege Tyre. The besiegers made but a slow progress, by reason of the brave resistance of the besieged; the troops of Shalmaneser stopped up the aqueducts, and cut the pipes that brought the water into the city, which reduced the Tyrians to the last extremity, but the Tyrians dug wells in their city, and by this means held out five years longer. In the mean time, Shalmaneser dying, they were delivered from the siege. Usher places this siege A. M. 3287, ante A. D. 717.

SHAMA, שָׁמָא, שָׁמָא, that hears, or obeys; from שָׁמַע, to hear. 1 Chron. ii. 43.

SHAMA, or SAMMA, son of Hothan the Aroerite, 1 Chron. xi. 44. called Shammah the Harodite, 2 Sam. xxiii. 25. and Shammoth the Harorite, 1 Chron. xi. 27.

SHAMARIAH, שָׁמַרְיָה. See SHAMER, and יְיָ jah, the Lord. Son of Rehoboam. 2 Chron. xi. 19.

SHAME, Ignominia. To uncover the shame, ignominy, or nakedness of a person, are synonymous terms. Lev. xviii. 15, 17, &c. Isaiah, xx. 4. threatens the Egyptians, that they should be led away captive, stark naked, without any thing to cover their shame, or nakedness. The golden calf worshipped by the Israelites in the wilderness, is called by Moses, Exod. xxxii. 25. a filthy shame, an idol of dross and filth. St. Paul, Rom. i. 26. calls shameful, or vile affections, those ignominious and brutish passions, which were indulged by the carnal pagans.—Prov. iii. 35. “Shame shall be the promotion of fools.” The promotion of fools shall be their own shame, and the disgrace of those who promote them. [Perhaps, as wise men are promoted to greater honour, fools shall be promoted to greater shame:—the contrast to that glory which is bestowed on the wise.] Prov. ix. 7. “He that reproveth a scorner, getteth to himself shame: he loses his labour, and shall only get discredit or calumny, abuse, and disgrace; a retort neither courteous nor considerate. Psalm lxxxiii. 16. “Fill their faces with shame:” reprove them, O Lord, and then let them fall into disgrace. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCCV. When the Syrians took king Joash captive, they executed shameful judgments against him; they treated him shamefully, made him suffer corrections that were shameful, not befitting the dignity of a king. 2 Chron. xxiv. 24.

[SHAME, a bashfulness arising from a self-conviction of guilt; an affliction of mind, occasioned by a sense of impropriety: whether of conduct, or of appearance. This is the natural consequence of proper reflection on past misconduct, behaviour, or turpitude of any kind.—Shame in this sense is an expression of uneasiness.

Shame is also an expression of contempt from others, a charge of misconduct, of impropriety, from some who endeavour to bring to shame, to render ashamed, the subject of their charge; whether such charge be true or false.

Shame denotes an idol; a thing which will make ashamed those who trust in it; and of which they ought to be ashamed even while they worship it. For the import of that shame, see BAAL-PEOR, and FRAGS. No. DIII. et al.]

SHAMED, שָׁמָה, that breaks and destroys.

SHAMED, or SAMAD, son of Elpaal, of Benjamin, 1 Chron. viii. 12.

SHAMER, שָׁמַר, guardian, diamond, dregs, bush, thorn; from שָׁמַר shamur.

SHAMGAR, שָׁמְגָר, named a stranger; from שָׁמַע shem, a name, and גָּר ger, a stranger: otherwise, he is here a stranger; from שָׁמ sham, here, there, and גָּר ger, a pilgrim, a stranger: otherwise, rumination, or desolation of the name; from גָּר garar, to ruminate, to lay desolate, and שָׁמ shem, a name: otherwise, surprise, astonishment of the stranger; from שָׁמַם shamam, to make desolate, to be astonished, and גָּר ger, a stranger. [a strict keeper.]

SHAMGAR, or SAMGAR, son of Anath, the third judge of Israel; after Ehud, and before Barak. Judg. iii. 31. Scripture only says that he defended Israel, and killed six hundred Philistines with an ox goad. From the peace obtained by him, A. M. 2679, whom Shamgar succeeded succeeded, till the servitude under the Canaanites, A. M. 2099, are twenty years.

SHAMGAR-NEBO, שַׁמְגָר נֶבֹו perfume, or odour of the stranger; from שֶׁם sam, oil, or perfume, and נָגַר, a stranger; otherwise, perfume, of him that ruminates, or that fights; from נָגַר garar, to ruminates, or from נָגַר garah, to fight. [a strict keeper of the deity Nebo; or, perhaps, one who is carefully protected by the deity Nebo. See NEBO.]

SHAMGAR-NEBO, or SEMEGAR-NABU, a great man, or general officer of Nebuchadnezzar's army. Jer. xxxix. 3.

SHAMHUTH, שַׁמְחֻת, desolation, destruction; ASTONISHMENT: from שֶׁם shamam: or, desolation of iniquity; from the same שֶׁם shamam, and חַוָּה havah, iniquity.

SHAMHUTH, or SAMAOth, of Israh, a general of David and Solomon; who commanded 24,000 men, 1 Chron. xxvii. 8.

SHAMIR, שָׁמִיר, prison, bush, &c. See SAMARIA. [well kept, or guarded.]

I. SHAMIR, or SAMIR, son of Micah, a Levite. 1 Chron. xxiv. 24.

II. SHAMIR, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 48. Some copies of the LXX. read Saphir instead of Shamir.

III. SHAMIR, a city of Ephraim, in the mountains of this tribe, where dwelt Tola judge of Israel, Judg. x. 1.

IV. SHAMIR: שָׁמִיר, shamir. Spina, adamas, lapis smiris. This word is found in several places of the Hebrew text, and signifies, sometimes thorns, briars, Isaiah v. 6. vii. 23, 24, 25. ix. 18. x. 17. xxvii. 4. xxxii. 13. or, the place where they grow: and sometimes a stone, Jer. xvii. 1. Ezek. iii. 9. Zech. vii. 12, or an instrument of extraordinary hardness, proper to polish precious stones; whence it is sometimes translated diamond. The Rabbins have amused themselves about the marvellous properties of the Shamir.

Bochart having examined what is said of the Shamir, has proved that it was neither a worm nor a rock, nor a diamond, but a stone, so hard, that lapidaries commonly used it to polish their precious stones. de Animal. Sacr. P. 2, lib. vi. cap. 1. This author shows, against the opinion of Cardan, that the ancients knew it, and applied it to this use. Hesychius says, it was a kind of sand; but this is, because it is reduced to powder, which powder is used in polishing gems. [q. Emerald, frit, or &c.] named, or put; from שָׁם sham, or shem, here, there, or named, according to different readings.

SHAMLAI, שָׁמְלַי, my garment. [Ezra ii. 46. apparently the same as by transposition of letters is called Shalmal, Neh. vii. 48.]

I. SHAMMAH, SAMMA, or SEMMA, son of Reuel, and grandson of Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 13.

II. SHAMMAH, son of Jesse, and brother of David, 1 Sam. xvi. 9.

III. SHAMMAH, the Harorite, son of Agee, a hero of David's army, 2 Sam. xxiii. 11.

SHAMMAI, שָׁמַי, my loss, or my desolation, or my astonishment; from שֶׁם shamam, and the pronoun i, my: otherwise, the heavens: from שָׁמַי shamaim.

SHAMMAI, SAMMAI, or SAMEAS, son of Rekem, and father of Maon, 1 Chron. ii. 44. Rekem is Petra, the capital of Arabia Petraea. Maon is a city of the same district, near Bethshur, on the south of Judah. These genealogies of cities, shew the people that first inhabited them.

SHAMMOTH, שְׁמוֹת, names, desolations, &c. from שֶׁם shamam. 1 Chron. xi. 27.

SHAMMUA, שָׁמוּעַ, Sams, he that is heard [of God.] or obeyed; from שָׁמוּעַ shamah.

I. SHAMMUA, SAMMUA, SIMMAA, or SAMUA, son of Zaccur, of Reuben, Numb. xiii. 4. One deputed to view the Land of Promise.

II. SHAMMUA, or Shimea, son of David and Bathsheba, 1 Chron. iii. 5. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCCXXXIII.

SHAMSHERAI, שָׁמְשֵׁרַי, the name of him that sings, or the name of my prince; from שָׁם shem, to name, and שָׁר shur, to sing: otherwise, here is he that governs, or sings; from שָׁם sham, here, or there, and שָׁר shur, to sing, or שָׁרָר sharar, to rule. [Perhaps from two roots, שָׁמְשֵׁרַי, one who is carefully kept by God. Son of Jeroham, 1 Chron. viii. 26.]

SHAPHAM, שָׁפָם, Sapham. Vulgate, Sapham, beard, whiskers; from שָׁפָם shapham: otherwise, their beard, their lip, their brink: from שָׁפָה shaphah: or their breaking, their retreat; from שָׁפַח shuph, to break, to hide, and שָׁם shem, theirs. [Sorrow, great anxiety.]

I. SHAPHAM, SHAPHAN, or SAPHAN, son of Azariah, secretary of the temple in the time of king Josiah. 2 Kings xxii. 12. 2 Chr. xxxiv. 20. Jer. xxix. 3. xxxvi. 1. Ezek. viii. 11. Shapham informed that prince of the discovery of the book of the law of the Lord in the temple. We find several sons of Shapham, viz. Abikim, Elasa, Gamariah, and Jezoniah; but we cannot say, they are all sons of the same Shapham.

SHAPHAN, שָׁפָן, rabbit, or wild rat; from שָׁפָן shaphan: otherwise, their brink, their lip, their breaking; from שָׁפָה shaphah, or שָׁפַח shuph, and שָׁם shem, theirs.

I. SHAPHAN, an animal often mentioned X div. 2 in in Scripture, sometimes translated by Chorogrillus, at other times by Lepusculus, or Herinacium. Moses declares it unclean, though a ruminating animal, because it does not divide the hoof. Lev. xi. 5. Vulg. Prov. xxx. 26. Psal. civ. 18. Deut. xiv. 7. [In all the texts here quoted, the English translation renders Shaphan by Coney.] Solomon, in his Proverbs, says, the Shaphan keeps among rocks; and he insinuates, that it is gregarious. Bochart thinks it to be a kind of great rat common in Arabia, and edible, called Aliarbuho, [al-Jerboa.] It is not so large as a squirrel; is of a greyish colour, with the fore-feet and tail of a rat: the end of its tail, the eyes, and the head, are like those of a rabbit: its hind-legs are longer than those before: it chews the cud, loves to be among the rocks, and they herd together in flocks. These qualities agree with the Shaphan. [Mr. BRUCE thinks it is his Ashkoko, which is rather a rabbit than a rat. Comp. FRAGMENTS, and Plate CONEY.]

II. SHAPHAN, son of Gad, who dwelt in Basan. 1 Chron. v. 12.

SHAPHAT, שפח, that judges.

I. SHAPHAT, or SAPHAT, son of Hori, of Simeon, one deputed to view the land of Canaan, Numb. xiii. 5.

II. SHAPHAT, of Abel-meholah: father of the prophet Elisha, 1 Kings xix. 16. 2 Kings iii. 11.

III. SHAPHAT son of Shemaiah, 1 Chron. iii. 22. of the royal family of David, by Jecho-niah.

IV. SHAPHAT, son of Adlai, who had the chief care of David's cattle in Basan, 1 Chron. xxvii. 29.

SHAPHER, שפר, Ἀρσάφης, beauty; trumpet, from שפר shaphar, or shophar, by different readings. [fair, fem. Shiphrah, the name of the Hebrew midwife, Exod. i. 15. so Pulcheria, &c.]

SHAPHAR, or SEPHIR. Numb. xxxiii. 23. An encampment of Israel in the desert, between Kibalathah and Haradah. [See Plate, TRAVELS of ISRAEL.]

SHARAI, שרע, Σαρὰ, my lord, my prince; or, my song; from שרע sharar, to govern, or שור shur, a song, and י, my. One who, after the captivity, dismissed his wife, Ezra x. 40.

SHARAIM, שרע, Σαραιμ, gates, estimations, &c. See SHAAIRIM. [Otherwise, hairy, or barley, or seasons, or demons, or goats.]

SHARAIM, or SARAIM, a city of Judah, afterwards given to Simeon. Josh. xv. 36. 1 Sam. xvii. 32. 1 Chron. ii. 64. Dimidium requietionis Sarai. Vide Joseph, Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 8. See ZORA.

SHARAR, שרר, navel, or lord; from שרר sharar, or sarar, according to different readings:

otherwise, thought, consideration, song; from שור shur. [establishment of the family. Father of Abiram, 2 Sam. xxiii. 33. called Sacar, 1 Chr. xi. 35. reward, wages.]

SHARESER, שרצר, Σαραζαρ, prince of the treasure; from שר shur, a prince, and צר atsar, treasure.

I. SHAREZER, or SARASAR, second son of king Sennacherib; he assassinated his father while worshipping his god Nisroch. 2 Kings xix. 37. Tob. i. 21.

II. SHARESER, or SERESER, or SAR-EZER, a lieutenant, or officer of Nebuchadnezzar. Jer. xxxix. 3. Probably he had the care of the king's treasures.

SHAREZER, שרצר, overseer of the treasury, of the store-house; from שרר sharar, that rules, or governs; and from צר atsar, treasury, or store-house: or the treasure of him that sings; from שור shur, to sing: otherwise, that sees the ambushes; from שרר sharar, to see, and צר tsar, ambush: or, according to the Hebrew and Syriac, encampment of him that besieges. This name is Assyrian, and its etymology cannot be had from the Hebrew.

SHAREZER, and Regem-melech, Jews of Babylon, who consulted the prophet Zechariah concerning the fast of the fifth month, Zech. vii. 2. See REGEM-MELECH.

SHARON, שרון, his plain, his song; from שור shur, a song, or שרון tsurah, a plain, and י an, his.

SHARON, or SARON, or SARONA. There are three districts of Palestine known by this name: which was almost proverbial, to express a place of extraordinary beauty and fruitfulness. See Isaiah xxxiii. 9. xxxv. 2.

I. SHARON, a district between mount Tabor and the sea of Tiberias, E. Euseb. Jeron. in Saron. [Extending to Caesarea and Joppa. It was extremely fat and fertile. Josh. xii. 18. Cant. ii. 1. 1 Chron. xxvii. 29. Isaiah xxxiii. 9. xxxv. 2. lxv. 10. Acts ix. 35. Gr. Saron.]

"The great plain," compare Bochart, Hieraz. Part. i. col. 307, 533.

II. SHARON, a district between Caesarea of Palestine and Joppa, along the coast.

III. SHARON, a district beyond Jordan, in the country of Basan, and in the tribe of Gad, 1 Chron. v. 16. Reland maintains, that there was no Sharon beyond Jordan; and that the tribe of Gad came to feed their flocks as far as Joppa, Caesarea, and Lydda: which to us seems incredible, because of the distance of the places: besides, the country of Basan itself was very fine and fruitful. Reland, Palast. lib. i. cap. 55. lib. iii.

IV. SHARON. Modern travellers give this name name to the plain between Ecdippe and Ptolemais.

V. SHANON, or LASHARON, a city whose king was slain by Joshua, Josh. xii. 18. St. Luke, ix. 35. seems to notice a city by the name of Sharon or Saron; and 1 Chron. xlvii. 29. we find one called Shitrai the Shoronite: but these passages may well enough be supposed to denote a country, and not a city.

SHARUHEN, שרן, prince of grace, or grace of the prince; from שרר sharar, to govern, and חן chen, grace; or song of grace; from שור shur.

[“The free gift of munificence,” from the Arabic root, liberality, generosity; from the Chaldee, this name would imply, “the fort of strength;” or the habitation of the strong.]

SHARUHEN, or SAROHEN, a city of Simeon; Josh. xix. 6. probably Saharem.

SHASHAK, ששק, bag of linen; from שש shak, a bag, and שש shesh, linen: otherwise, the sixth bag; from שש sheesh, six, and שש shak, bag, or sack: [Simon thinks, for ששקש, vehemently desired by his parents.]

SHASHAK, or SESAC, of the posterity of Benjamin, who dwelt at Jerusalem with his children, 1 Chron. viii. 23.

SHAVEH, שוה, plain: or that puts, or that makes equal; from שוה shavah.

SHAVEH, or SAVE, the valley of Shaveh, otherwise, “valley of the king,” Gen. xiv. 17. was probably pretty near Jerusalem, because Melchisedeck king of this city, with the king of Gomorrah, came to meet Abraham at his return from the defeat of the five kings, as far as the valley of Shaveh. Vide FRAGMENT, “on Melchisedeck.”

SHAVEH-KIRIATHAIM. See KIRIATHAIM.

SHAVEH-KIRIATHAIM. The Emim, an ancient people beyond Jordan, dwelt at Kiriathaim. Gen. xiv. 5. Chedorlaomer and his confederates defeated them, when they attacked the five kings of Pentapolis. Afterwards, the Moabites drove out the Emim, and destroyed them Deut. ii. 10. Shaveh-Kiriathaim is probably a plain near Kiriathaim, a city beyond Jordan, ten miles from Medaba west, as Eusebius says, in locis. It was given to the tribe of Reuben; but was afterwards possessed by the Moabites, Numb. xxxii. 37. Josh. xiii. 19. See Ezek. xxv. 9.

SHAVING. The practice of shaving the beard and hair, and sometimes the whole body, was common among the Hebrews, Numb. viii. 7. Lev. xiv. 8, 9. The Levites on the day of their consecration, the lepers at their purification, shaved all the hair off their bodies. A woman taken prisoner in war, when she married a Jew, shaved the hair off her head, Deut. xxi. 12. The Hebrews, and nations bordering on Palestine, shaved themselves when they mourned, and in times of great calamity, whether public or private, Isai. vii. 20. xv. 2. Jer. xli. 5. xlviii. 37. Baruch vi. 30. God commanded the priests not to cut their hair, or beards, in their mournings, Lev. xxi. 5. The Nazarites also did not cut their hair during the whole time of their Nazariteship, Numb. vi. 9, 18. But if it happened that, during this time, any man should die in their presence, they were to shave their hair, and begin their exercises of Nazariteship anew. The strength of Samson was in his hair, which he wore without cutting, in the manner of a Nazarite; but, no sooner was he shaved than he became feeble.

To shave the whole beard, and all the hair, or but half the beard and hair, was an insult and mockery, 2 Sam. x. 4. 1 Chron. xix. 4. Hannun, king of the Ammonites, having thus treated David's ambassadors, David attacked and conquered the Ammonites. God said, he would use a hired razor, to shave off all the hair from the body of his people: i. e. he would take vengeance on Judah, by the sword of a people inhabiting beyond the Euphrates. In mourning, sometimes, they suffered their beards to grow long, 2 Sam. xix. 24. Mephibosheth did not shave his beard during the whole time king David was expelled from Jerusalem by Absalom. Jeremiah, ix. 26, describes the Arabians bordering on Judea, by their manner of shaving their heads: they cut their hair in a circle, in honour of their deity. God prohibits the Israelites from imitating them, Levit. xix. 27. [Comp. RAZOR, FRAGMENTS, No. XCIII.—In addition to what has been said under the article RAZOR, it may be proper to observe, that among the most degrading of punishments for women, is the loss of their hair; and the Apostle hints at this. 1 Cor. xi. 6. “if it be a shame for a woman to be shorn, or shaven,” &c. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CLX.]

SHAUL, or SAUL, son of Simeon, and grandson of Jacob, Numb. xxvi. 13.

SHAVSHA, ששש, joy, or elevation; from שש shush, joy. One of David's secretaries. 1 Chron. xviii. 16.

SHEAF, Levit. xxiii. 10, 11, 12. The day after the feast of the Passover, they brought into the temple a sheaf of corn, as the first-fruits of the barley-harvest; with these ceremonies. On the fifteenth of Nisan, in the evening, when the feast of the first day of the Passover was ended, and the second day was begun, which was a working day; the house of judgment deputed three men to go in solemnity, and gather the sheaf of barley. The inhabitants of the neighbouring cities, assembled to witness the ceremony. The barley was gathered in the territory of Jerusalem. The deputies demanded, three times, if the sun were set? They were as often answered, it is: Afterwards, they demanded three times, if they might have leave to cut the sheaf? Leave was as often granted. They reaped it out of three different fields, with three different sickles, and put the ears into three boxes, to carry them to the temple.

The sheaf, or rather the three sheaves, being arrived in the temple, were threshed in the court; and they took a full omer, i. e. about three pints of the grain: after it had been well winnowed, parched, and bruised, they sprinkled over it a log of oil, i. e. near a pint.

To this they added a handful of incense; and the priest who received this offering waved it before the Lord, toward the four quarters of the world, cross-wise; he cast part of it on the altar, and the rest was his own. After this every one might begin his harvest. Cod. Menachot. vi. 3. Vide Maimonid. in Temidim et Mosaphim.

SHEAL, שְׂאֵל, that asks, that prays: otherwise, low and subterraneous places, hell; from שְׂאֵל shaal, or sheol, according to different readings.

SHEAL, or SAAL, son of Bani: one who quitted his foreign wife, Ezra x. 29.

SHEALTIEL, שְׂאֵלְתִּיֵּל, I have asked of God; from שְׂאֵלְתִּי, I have asked, and אֵל el, God.

SHEALTIEL. See SALATHIEL.

[SHEAR-JASHUB, the remnant shall return, an allegorical name given by the prophet Isaiah to one of his sons: q. had he another name of a more common nature? Vide MAHER-SHALHASHEBAZ.]

SHEARIAH, שְׂרָאִיָּה, hairs, or gate of the Lord; from שְׂרָא shahar, gate, [opening, i. e. liberation] hair, and שְׂרָא jah, the Lord; or from שְׂרָא shahir, a goat: otherwise, tempest of the Lord. 1 Chron. viii. 38. ix. 44.

SHEBA, שֶׁבָּא, captivity; from שֶׁבָּא shabah: otherwise, conversion, repose, old-age; from שֶׁבָּא shub.

I. SHEBA, son of Raamah, Gen. x. 7. It is thought he inhabited Arabia Felix; where his father Raamah dwelt.

II. SHEBA, son of Joktan, Gen. x. 28. Bochart places him in Arabia Felix; but we rather think he should be placed in Persia or Armenia: where are traces of his name; and his father Joktan, with his other children, had settlements about these countries.

III. SHEBA, son of Jackshan, Gen. xxi. 3. Probably he dwelt in Arabia Deserta, or theabouts. We think, with Bochart, that they were the descendants of this Sheba, which took away Job's cattle.

IV. SHEBA, QUEEN OF, 1 Kings x. 2. Chr. ix. called Queen of the South, Matt. xii. 42. Luke xi. 31. was, according to some, a queen of Arabia, (Raban, Hugo. Dionys. Tost. Jansen. Maldon. Cornel. alii;) according to others a queen of Ethiopia, (Jerom, in Isai. lx. Theodor. et Præcop. in 3 Reg. Vatab. Sanct. al.) Josephus says, that Sheba was the ancient name of the city of Meroë, and that the queen of whom we are speaking, came from thence. This opinion has much prevailed. The Ethiopians at this day claim this princess as their sovereign, and say, that her posterity reigned there for a long time. See Ludolph, and Jerom Almeida, and Hist. of Ethiopia, [and Bavon.] They preserve the catalogue of these princes, their names, and succession. The eunuch of queen Candace, who was converted and baptized by St. Philip, Acts viii. 27. was an officer belonging to a princess of the same country. The ancients acknowledge, that women used to govern in this country. Strabo, lib. xvi. cap. 17. Pliny, lib. vi. cap. 26. The isle of Meroë is sometimes comprehended in Ethiopia; south of Egypt, and far south of Palestine.

Those who think this princess came from Arabia, rely, first, on the general consent, that there are Sabæans and Cushim, or Ethiopians, in Arabia. This princess was queen of Shaba, or of Cush, and Ethiopia. Secondly, Arabia is south of Judea. Thirdly, Arabia Felix may well be placed at the uttermost parts of the earth, Matth. xii. 42. because it borders on the southern ocean, and formerly they knew no land beyond it: Terra finesque, quæ ad orientem vergunt, Arabiâ terminantur, says Tacitus, lib. v. Fourthly, Arabia abounds in gold, silver, spices, and precious stones, which are the presents this princess made to Solomon; which cannot be conveniently said of the island of Meroë. Lastly, several understand of the Sabæans in Arabia Felix, these verses of Claudian, where he says, the women are used to govern:

Madia, levibusque Sabeis
Imperat hic sexus, Regina antequam sub armis
Barbaris pars magna jacet.

CLAUDIAN in Europ. lib. xi.

And if popular tradition be entitled to any reliance, that of the Arabians may be produced, who think that queen Balkis came from the city of Sheba, otherwise called Marib or March, in Yemen. Candaule

Candace is the name that Josephus, and several others give to the queen of Sheba. She came to see Solomon about A. M. 3012, ante A. D. 992.

[Mr. BRUCE has given us the history of the queen of Sheba, and her descendants, from the Abyssinian historians: but, he thinks the eunuch of Candace (Chandake) was an officer of the queen Endagui, whose territories lie beyond the great desert, south of Syene, in Upper Egypt. It is probable, at least, that the Sheba of Solomon's visitor, and the Ethiopia of the Acts, are distinct places: and Sheba the furthest off; which adds to the force of our Lord's comparison, as probably this visitor travelled from the greatest distance, &c. of any that ever came to Jerusalem. But, what if the Ethiopians, i. e. Abyssinians, at that time ruled in Arabia, also? then she might come from Arabia, yet be queen of Ethiopia, which is only across the Red-sea; and this seems to have been the fact.

The Chaldee, in Gen. x. 7. Job i. 15. vi. 19. put Smaragdus for Sheba, as if supposing that Sheba was the region of emeralds, which Smaragdus signifies: and it is by no means unlikely that the islands in the Red-sea, which are called by the Arabs Zemroud, should mark the district whereabouts they placed Sheba. This is no opportunity for discussing the character of emeralds: but perhaps, formerly, there might be mines of these stones in this latitude, which might anciently yield specimens of great value and excellence. On the opposite territory of Egypt, there are traces of ancient mines for this production: and it is likely, that the territory of Sheba might extend to that country. Indeed, it is very probable that Saba, in Arabia, should be one of the Shebas, and Assaba, in Africa, be the other; but it should seem, by the narrative of Mr. Bruce, that both of them had been, at times, under the government of the same dominion: so that it might be the same people, sometimes in two divisions, sometimes united: but this will not vacate the idea that each division might have a capital of a name approaching to Saba, or Assaba, or Sheba.

Perhaps, instead of there having been real mines of emeralds in any island of the Red-sea, this island, and the opposite shores of Africa, might take their name from Sheba, (i. e. emerald) son of Cush, and retain the appellation of Emerald's Island, q. Emerald's property, to this day. That the Cushites extended their settlements to these parts we have already found reason to conclude.

It should be noticed, however, that, very lately, the ancient Emerald mines, on the African shores of the Red-sea, the galleries and works of which still exist, have been visited by Europeans; some of whom have had the address to persuade the Pacha of Egypt to open and work them: whether this undertaking has been productive of any profit, we do not know; but, as a geographical mark, it distinguishes the district intended by the Chaldee paraphrast.]

SHEBA, or SHABO, שָׁבָו, seven, or the seventh; fulness, or oath; from שָׁבָו shabab, or shibab, according to different readings.

I. SHEBA, or SHABO, a city of Simeon, Josh. xix. 2.

[Was this the same place with Beer-sheba?—By both being named in the same verse, this should appear to be extremely doubtful: but it is not unlikely that some settlement might take place near to the well of the oath, Beer-sheba, yet distinct from it. The passage may be read, as in our translation, "Beersheba, and Sheba;" or "Beersheba, i. e. Sheba:"—it may be worth while to observe, that we have Bath-sheba, daughter of the oath, or, &c. 2 Sam. xi. 3. called Bath-shua, 1 Chron. iii. 5. also, Bersabas, son of the oath, or, &c. Acts xv. 22. The LXX. seem to call Sheba, Samad, in this passage; or else they took it for another place, distinct from Beersheba: this variation has its weight.]

II. SHEBA, perhaps Shema, Josh. xv. 26.

III. SHEBA, son of Abihail, of Gad, who dwelt in Bashan, 1 Chron. v. 13.

IV. SHEBA, son of Bichri, of Benjamin, a turbulent fellow, who was near engaging Israel in a civil war. After the defeat of Absalom, when the tribe of Judah came to king David, and brought him over the river Jordan, on his way to Jerusalem; the other tribes resented the little notice taken of them: there was provoking language given on both sides; insomuch that Sheba, son of Bichri, sounded a trumpet, and proclaimed; "We have no share in David." Thus Israel forsook David, and followed Sheba. 2 Sam. xx. 1, 2, 3, &c.

When David came to Jerusalem, he sent Abishai, with what troops were at hand, in pursuit of this traitor. Joab also took soldiers, and crossing the country north of Jerusalem, he arrived at Abel-beth-maacha, a city at the entrance of the pass between Libanus and Anti-libanus, whither Sheba was retired. Joab besieged the place; when a discreet woman inhabiting the city, persuaded the people to cut off Sheba's head, and to throw it over the wall; on which Joab and his army retired.

SHEBAM, שָׁבָמ, conversion, return, captivity, city, old age, rest: from שָׁבַח shabach, or שָׁב shub. [Perhaps transposed from Beshamah, sweetness, i. e. of wine; for such is the import of the Chaldean root. A city of Reuben, which produced wine. Numb. xxxii. 3. In like manner Sibmah for Beshmah, verse 38. Josh. xiii. 19. Isaiah xvi. 8, 9. Jer. xlviii. 32. This is Simon's idea. Vide SHIBMAN.]

SHEBAM, or SEBAMA, a city of Reuben, beyond Jordan. Numb. xxxii. 3.

SHEBAN, שֶׁבַן, Σαβανα, that holds them captive, or their captivity; from שָׁבַח shabach, and בָּנָם am, theirs. A city of Reuben, Numb. xxxii. 3. Perhaps the same as SHEBAM.

SHEBANIAH, שְׁבַנְיָה, Vulgate, Sabaniah, the Lord that converts, or that recalls from captivity, or that captivates; from שָׁבַח shabach: otherwise, that understands, that builds, that produces filiation; from בָּנָה banah, or בֵּן bun, or בֶּן ben, and יְהוָה jah, the Lord: otherwise, that understands the Lord, or to whom the Lord gives attention. [The Lord's building up.]

I. SHEBANIAH, SABANIA, or SEBENIAS, a priest in the time of David: he assisted at the bringing of the ark, 1 Chron. xv. 24.

II. SHEBANIAH, a priest who returned from the captivity, with Zerubbabel, Neh. xii. 14.

III. SHEBANIAH, a principal Jew, Nehem. xi. 4.

SHEBARIM, שְׁבָרִים, ruptures, breakings, hopes; from שָׁבַר shabar, or שִׁבְבֵר. Josh. vii. 7.

SHEBARIM, שְׁבָרִים, surrounding, or about the high places; from שְׁבָר sabab, circuit, and רָמָם ramam, eminences. According to the Syriac, opinions, hopes. Ezek. xlvii. 16.

SHEBARIM, or SABARIM, a place about Ai and Bethel. The inhabitants of Ai pursued the Israelites to Shebarim, עַד הַשְּׁבָרִים. Josh. vii. 5. Some take Shebarim in an appellative sense. They pursued them till they had entirely routed them. LXX. ἕως συμπεράσαι αὐτοὺς.

[Malvendus, Gusset, and others, think the place was named from breaches in the rocks; Junius and Hiller think from breaches made on the enemy by the Israelites in battle. Josh. vii. 5.

Thus appears to be a place not far from Ai; probably as Ai stood on a hill, these breakings were divisions of the rocks, or &c. or even of the ways leading to the city, as it is said the people were smitten "in going down."]

SHEBAT, שֶׁבַת, Vulgate, Sabbath; twig, sceptre, tribe. Zech. i. 7.

SHEBAT, SEBAT, SEBET, or SHEBET, the fifth month of the civil year of the Hebrews; the eleventh of the ecclesiastical year. It answers to our month of January O. S. The Jews began by Shebet, to number the years of the trees they planted, the fruits of which were esteemed impure till the fourth year.

The tenth of Shebet was a fast for the death of the elders, who succeeded Joshua, Judges ii. 7, 10.

The twenty-third of Shebet, a fast in memory of the resolution taken by the Israelites, to war against Benjamin, Judg. xix. 20.

The thirteenth of Shebet Simon Maccabeus was assassinated by Ptolemy, son of Abubus, his son-in-law, 1 Mac. xvi. 14, 15, 16.

SHEBER, שֶׁבֶר. See SHEBARIM.

SHEBER, or SABER, son of Caleb and of Maacah his concubine. 1 Chron. ii. 48.

SHEBNAH, שְׁבְנָה, Σωβνάς, or SOBNAS, who rests himself, or who is now captive; from שָׁב shub, or שָׁבַח shabach, and נָא na, now.

SHEBNAH, or SEBNAH: secretary under king Hezekiah, 2 Kings xviii. 18. This prince sent Shebna, Joah, and Asaph, to hear the proposals of Rab-shakeh. Some have pretended, that Shebna had been high-priest; but Scripture only calls him treasurer, or Præpositus Templi, which is very different from high-priest, Isaiah xxii. 15. "Go (says the Lord) get thee unto this treasurer (Sochen) even unto Shebna, who is over the house," or the temple. (The word Sochen, signifies one that has the oversight of the king's magazines, a treasurer.) "What hast thou here; that thou hast hewed thee out a sepulchre here? Behold the Lord will carry thee away with a mighty captivity, (as a cock with the feet tied together, says Jerom) and will surely cover thee." [Hebr. "The Lord will translate you elsewhere, O mighty man, powerful warrior," &c. יִחַד מְסַלֵּךְ גִּבֹּר. In rendering this passage, Jerom has followed the sense that Gibbar ought to have here, according to the opinion of the Jew that taught him Hebrew. Elsewhere it signifies a stout man—a hero; but here he pretended it signified a cock.] Or, he will fall upon you, as a bird of prey falls upon his game. "He will surely violently turn and toss thee, like a ball, into a large country," It is thought this happened to Shebna, under the reign of Manasseh, and that he was carried captive with this prince to Babylon, A. M. 3328, ante A. D. 676. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCX.

SHEBUEL, שְׁבּוּעַל, conversion, return, rest, or captivity of God; from שָׁב shub, conversion, rest, or שָׁבַח shabach, captivity, and אֱלֹהִים el, God.

SHEBUEL, or SUBAEL, eldest son of Gershon, son of Moses, 1 Chron. xxiii. 16. had the care of the treasures of the temple, chap. xxvi. 24. The last mentioned must be only a descendant from Shebuel, grandson of Moses.

SHECANIAH, שְׁכַנְיָה, the Lord is near: otherwise, otherwise, house, or habitation of the Lord; from שכן shaken, near, or tent, habitation, and יהוה jah, the Lord.

SHECANIAH, son of Arah; under Nehemiah, Neh. vi. 18.

I. SHECANIAH, son of Obadiah, of the race royal of Judah, 1 Chron. iii. 21.

II. SHECANIAH, a priest, head of the tenth family of the priests, 1 Chron. xxiv. 11. Ezra viii. 8, 5.

SHECHEM, שכם, Συχήμ, Συχέμ, Acts vii. 16. Σίχημα, Eccus. i. 26. part, portion, the back, shoulders, early in the morning; [the approach of dawning day.] from שכם shekem, according to different readings.

I. SHECHEM, son of Hamor, prince of the Shechemites: he seduced Dinah the daughter of Jacob, as she went to see a festival of the Shechemites. Gen. xxxiv. A. M. 2265, ante A. D. 1739. Afterwards, asking her in marriage, he obtained her, on condition, that he, and all the men of Shechem, should be circumcised. This was agreed to; but on the third day, when the wounds of the circumcision were at the sorest, Simeon and Levi, the two brothers of Dinah by the same mother, entered Shechem, and slew all the males. After which, the other sons of Jacob, and their domestics, plundered the city. It is probable, that this prince gave name to

II. SHECHEM, שכם, Νεάπολις, Neapolis, Σίχημα, Sichima, Σικάρ, Sichar, Sychem, Acts vii. 16. Μάβάρθα, Mabartha, Joseph. de Bello, lib. v. cap. 4. Flavia Neapolis. Josephus says, the people of the country called it Mabartha; perhaps, because of the vale of Moreh, hard by. Joshua, xvii. 7. xx. 7. appoints this city to Benjamin: it was in the mountains of this tribe. Jacob bought a field in the neighbourhood of this city, which by way of overplus he gave to his son Joseph, who was buried here, Gen. xlviii. 22. Near the same city was Jacob's well or fountain, at which Jesus Christ discoursed with the woman of Samaria, John iv. 5. See FRAGMENTS, No. DLXIX. After the ruin of Samaria by Shalmaneser, Shechem was the capital of the Samaritans; and Josephus says, Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 8. it was so in the time of Alexander the Great. It was ten miles from Shiloh, Euseb. et Jerom, in locis; forty from Jerusalem, and fifty-two from Jericho. Vide Reland, in Sichem. Jerom says, that Paula visited the church built over Jacob's fountain. Antoninus Martyr, Adamnanus, and Villibaldus, who wrote in the eighth century, speak of this church. Phocas, who wrote in the twelfth century, makes no mention of it.

III. SHECHEM, son of Gilead, and chief of a family. Numb. xxvi. 31.

SHEDEI, 'Ασδαι, all-mighty; from שדד shaddai: or destroyer, or breast; from שדד shad, or שדד shadad: otherwise, camp, or field. Vide SHADDAI. Father of Zedekiah. Baruch i. 1.

SHEDEUR, שדדור, field, pap, all-mighty, or destroyer of fire, or of light; from שדד shaddai, all-mighty, and שדד shad, fire, or light. [light of Shaddai.] Father of Elizur, of Reuben. Numb. i. 5.

SHEEP. The sheep, or lamb, was the common sacrifice of the old law. When Moses speaks of this victim, he never omits to appoint, that the rump be laid whole on the fire of the altar. This was the most delicate part of the animal. In the East there are sheep, whose tails or rumps are all fat, and weigh sometimes, twenty-five pounds, or more. Those of Tartary, according to John Kinson, weigh sometimes eighty pounds. Those of Indostan have also tails large, heavy, and their wool very short and fine. The tails of the Madagascar sheep weigh fifteen or sixteen pounds. Herodotus says, lib. iii. cap. 113. that in Arabia are two sorts of sheep; some have tails three cubits in length; which, were they suffered to be drawn along the ground, would be bruised. Therefore the shepherds of that country make little carriages, on which they lay the tails of these sheep, which thus draw them about. The other sheep have tails two cubits long, or about three feet. Busbequius tells us in his voyage, Ep. iii. that some of this sort are found in Asia Minor. In eam aliquando magnitudinem accrescit ut duas rotulas cum media tabella subijci necesse sit. Vide FRAGS. No. CXLVIII. and PLATE, SYRIAN ANIMALS.

When Jacob was employed in Mesopotamia, in feeding the sheep of his father-in-law Laban, Gen. xxxi. 12, 13, 14, the angel of the Lord appeared to him, and said: "See, all the rams which leap upon the cattle are ring-streaked, speckled, and grised." At the same time he discovered to him a mode of causing the ewes to produce lambs of different colours, by means of branches of trees, half peeled; which were to be placed near the troughs at which the sheep drank. This requires consideration; 1st. whether the artifice of Jacob were natural or miraculous. 2ndly. in what Jacob's request consisted, for the text does not clearly explain it. 3rdly. whether this artifice may be esteemed fair, and allowable.

First, it is agreed, that the females of all animals, have a great power of communicating to their offspring certain inclinations, antipathies, figures, marks, or colours. We have evidence of this every day; it cannot be doubted: women experience it; and we see it in domestic animals animals, which are more subject than others to receive impressions, from objects presented to their view. Horses, dogs, cats, pigeons, fowls, tame rabbits, are often of different colours, and their young generally take a colour from what most forcibly strikes the imagination of the dam at the time of conception. This is observed both by ancient and modern philosophers; Aristot. prob. sect. x. Pliny, lib. vii. cap. 12. Oppian, de Venal. lib. i. and this Jerom, quæst. Hebr. in Genes. and St. Austin, qu. 93. in Genes. et lib. xiii. cap. 5. de Civ. Dei. with the greater part of the commentators, acknowledge on the present question. Therefore, there was nothing miraculous in the action of Jacob; but the miracle consisted in the appearance of the angel, who suggested to him in a dream, a natural method of propagating sheep of different colours.

As to the second difficulty, we think that Jacob required of Laban, 1st. Every youngling which should be born spotted, and of several colours, whether sheep or goat. 2ndly. Those quite black, or with some white spots. He left to Laban whatever should be quite white, both sheep and goats. After this, Laban and he separated whatever was wholly white, goats and sheep, and Laban left all these animals to Jacob, expecting that the offspring of these sheep or goats, would be only of one colour. This was, to Jacob, the least favourable condition possible, and would certainly have proved so, had he not counteracted it. The party-coloured branches of trees, laid at the watering-places, had a similar effect on the imaginations of the sheep, and goats, as party-coloured sheep and goats themselves would have had. As to Laban, he took under his own care all the animals of different colours, that might naturally be expected to produce young of different colours.

A second artifice of Jacob was, not to expose the party-coloured branches at all times, nor to all sorts of sheep, or goats; but only in the spring, that he might have his young in autumn; and, to let nature proceed in her ordinary course in autumn, that Laban might have the lambs yearned in the spring. According to Bochart, de Animal. Sacris, he exposed his branches only to the best and strongest ewes in the flock. Besides, it is thought, that when the number of lambs and kids of several colours was sufficient, instead of the striped branches he exposed these lambs and kids, which would produce the same effect.

As to the third difficulty, it is objected, that Jacob used a kind of trick to out-wit Laban.—No doubt but Laban understood the bargain between him and Jacob in the most obvious and natural sense, in which Jacob was to yield to him all lambs and kids, produced white, and reserve to himself only the black ones, or the party-coloured; yet instead of honestly pursuing this intention, he adopts an artifice unknown to Laban, and of which he had no suspicion, to make the greater part of the young fall to his own share. This appears directly contrary to the rules of honesty. It signifies nothing to say, that Jacob had a right to do himself justice against the encroachments and iniquity of Laban, who during so many years had made him no recompence for the services he had done him; because, according to true morality, no-body is to make himself judge in his own cause, nor to assume the office of doing himself justice. Besides, in strictness, what did Laban owe to Jacob? Had he not obliged himself to serve fourteen years for his two daughters? After this term was ended, Jacob might withdraw. The best argument in Jacob's vindication is, that God himself approved his conduct, and suggested this method to him by an angel. This Judge, infinitely just, saw Laban's injustice, and intimated to Jacob a sure (but not obvious) method of enriching himself, without giving Laban just cause of complaint, if he considered the matter justly. Is not every one allowed to use his own industry, and to advance his interests by good management, especially when he has to deal with persons of Laban's character?

By the name of sheep, Scripture often understands the people. Psalm lxxix. 13. "We are thy people, and the sheep of thy pasture;" also, "O shepherd of Israel, thou that leddest Joseph like a flock." Jesus Christ says, that he was sent only to the lost sheep of Israel, Matt. xv. 24. The righteous are often compared to sheep exposed to the violence of the wicked, to the fury of wolves: to slaughter. Psalm xlv. 22. At the last judgment, the just, (represented by sheep.) shall be at the right hand of the sovereign judge, and put in possession of heaven. Our Saviour describes deceivers, as wolves in sheep's clothing. Matt. vii. 15.

SHEHARIAH, שְׁהַרְיָה, morning of the Lord, or visit of the Lord; from שָׁחַר, morning, and יְיָ, the Lord. 1 Chr. viii. 26.

SHEKEL, שֶׁקֶל, from שָׁקַל, to weigh. A Hebrew weight and money. Exod. xxx. 23, 24. 2 Sam. xiv. 26. Shekel is used to denote the weight of any thing, as iron, hair, spices, &c. Among the different opinions, concerning the weight and value of the Shekel, we shall adhere to that of M. le Pellitier of Bohan, who says it weighs half an ounce, or the Roman drachme :

mar. i. e. nine penny-weights, three grains; and that the Shekel of silver was worth two shillings threepence farthing and a half. Moses and Ezekiel say, it was worth twenty Oboli, or twenty Gerah. Numb. xviii. 16. Ezek. xlv. 12. See the TABLES OF WEIGHTS and MEASURES; also, the PLATES OF JEWISH COINS, with their explanations, in FRAGMENTS, No. CCII.

The Shekel of Gold was half the weight of the Shekel of silver; and was worth eighteen shillings and three-pence, English.

The Shekel of the Sanctuary, according to several interpreters, was double the common Shekel; but this opinion wants proof. We think it was the same as the common Shekel, and the words of the sanctuary, are added to express a just and exact weight, according to the standard kept in the temple or tabernacle.

SHEKINAH, שְׁכִינָה, Divine presence, [tabernacled; effulgent glory.]

SHEKINAH. Nothing is more frequently mentioned in the writings of the Jews, than the Shekinah, by which they understand the presence of the Holy Spirit. In the Targums, or Chaldee paraphrases, we find the names Jehovah, or God; Memar, or the Word; and Shekinah, or the Holy Ghost. They suppose the Holy Spirit, speaking and communicating itself to men by revelation; 1st. in the prophets; 2nd. in the Urim and Thummim, of the high-priest's breast-plate; 3rd. in what the Hebrews call Bath col, or the daughter of the voice. The Shekinah is the presence of the Holy Ghost, which resided in the temple of Jerusalem; and which, say the rabbins, drove from thence the princes of the air, and communicated a particular sanctity to it. See Basnage, Hist. of the Jews. lib. vi. cap. 5. art. 19.

They say also, that it rests on the mild and the humble, but flies from the fierce and passionate. It resides with him, whose house is open to the stranger; and is found in the midst of two or three persons who meet to study the law. Echa Rab. fol. 59. 1. They say, that the Shekinah has ten times changed its dwelling; and at last, going on the Mount of Olives, it continued there three years and a half, addressing the Israelites; "Return to me, my children, and I will return to you." But seeing they would not be converted, it retired. This last circumstance seems to hint at our Saviour's preaching among the Jews, and his ascension from the Mount of Olives.

The Shekinah was the most sensible token of the presence of God among the Hebrews: it rested over the propitiatory, or over the golden cherubim, which adhered to the propitiatory, the covering of the ark. Here the Shekinah abode in a cloud; from hence God gave his oracles, vocally, as some think, when consulted by the high-priest on account of his people. Hence Scripture often says, God sits on the cherubim, or between the cherubim; i. e. he gives the most evident tokens of his divine presence, by answering from hence the inquiries of Israel. The Rabbins affirm, that the Shekinah first resided in the tabernacle prepared by Moses, in the wilderness, into which it descended on the day of its consecration, in the figure of a cloud. It passed from thence into the sanctuary of Solomon's temple, on the day of its dedication by this prince; where it continued till the destruction of Jerusalem, and the temple, by the Chaldeans, and was not afterwards seen there.

[The reader will pay attention to what is said above on the manifestation of the presence of the Holy Ghost by the appearance of the Shekinah; because it is frequently referred to in N. T. and it enters much into the arguments of FRAGMENT, No. DCXXII. The Shekinah appeared at the baptism of Jesus; at his transfiguration; and is called the excellent glory, by Peter, 2 Epist. ii. 10. by the Evangelists a bright cloud: and the idea of a radiance, or glory, a mild effulgence, seems to be always annexed to it. It may be "the glory of the Lord," 2 Cor. iii. 18. where it is spoken of, under the allusion of being distributed to believers; as it really was at the time of the descent of the "cloven tongues like as of fire," which sat on each of the hundred and twenty, Acts ii. and on the assembly at Cornelius's, Acts x. 44. xi. 15. It might also be "the glory of the Lord," Luke ii. 9. and "the tabernacle of God with men," Rev. xxi. 3. In short, we find it frequently; but always gentle, and, as it were, lambent; not fierce or vindictive; as exemplified at the burning bush, Exod. iii. wherein the whole was enveloped, but nothing was consumed.]

SHELAH, שֵׁלַח, שֵׁלַח, שֵׁלַח, that breaks, that unties, that undresses; from שֵׁלַח shalach, to send, to reject, to unbind, [solicited?]

SHELAH, son of Judah, by Tamar, Gen. xxxviii. 11. Vide TAMAR, or JUDAH. Chief of a family. Numb. xxvi. 20.

SHELEMLAH, שְׁלֵמָה. God is my happiness, my perfection, my peace, or the peace or perfection of the Lord; from שְׁלָמָה shalam, peace, or perfection, and יְיָ jah, the Lord.

SHELEMLAH, שְׁלֵמָה. See above.

SHELEMLAH. One who put away his foreign wife. Ezra x. 41.

I. SHELEMLAH, of the race of the priests. Neh. xiii. 13. was appointed by Nehemiah to inspect inspect the first fruits and tenths, belonging to the temple.

SHELEPH, שֶׁלֶף, who draws out. [or is drawn out, selected.] Second son of Joktan. Gen. x. 26.

SHELESH, שלש, three; from שלש shalosh: prince, captain; from שליש shalish. [Tertius.]

SHELESH, or SELLES, son of Helem, of Asher. 1 Chron. vii. 35.

SHELOMI, שלמי, peaceable, perfect, or that rewards; from שלם shalam. Father of Ahihud, of Asher. Ahihud was a commissioner for dividing the land. Num. xxxiv. 27.

SHELOMITH, שלמי, my peace, my happiness, my recompence; from שלם shalam.

I. SHELOMITH, SALOMITH, or SALUMITH, daughter of Dibri, of the tribe of Dan, was mother of that blasphemer, who having blasphemed the name of the Lord in the camp, was condemned to be stoned. Lev. xxiv. 10, 11. Scripture tells us that Shelomith had this blasphemer by an Egyptian; which should be naturally understood of an Egyptian who had married her: but the Rabbins explain it otherwise. They say, Shelomith was a very handsome and virtuous woman, who having in vain been solicited and tempted to criminal conversation by an Egyptian overseer of the Hebrews' labours, he at last found an opportunity by night, of slipping into the house and bed of Shelomith, in the absence of her husband, and abused her simplicity.

The day following, when this woman discovered the injury, she bitterly complained of it to her husband, when he returned. He at first thought of putting her away, but kept her some time, to see if she should prove with child by the Egyptian. After some months her pregnancy becoming evident, he sent her away, and with words he assaulted the officer, who had done this outrage. The Egyptian abused him more violently, both by words and blows. Moses coming hither by chance, and hearing of this injury done by the Egyptian to the Israelite, he took up his defence, killed the Egyptian, and buried him.

The brethren of Shelomith seeing their sister put away like an adulteress, pretended to call her husband to account for it, and to make him take her again. He refused; and they came to blows. Moses happened to be there again, and wished to reconcile them; but the husband of Shelomith asked him, What he had to do in the matter? Who had made him a judge over them? and, Whether he had a mind to kill him also, as yesterday he killed the Egyptian? Moses hearing this, fled from Egypt, into Midian.

The blasphemer stoned in the wilderness, was, say the Jews, the son of Shelomith and this Egyptian. The officer who inspected the Hebrews' labour, is he who is mentioned, Exod. ii. 11, 12. And the husband of Shelomith, is intimated in the following verses, 13, 14. Thus the Jews corrupt the Scripture, by supplying the text, and refining on its narrations.

II. SHELOMITH, daughter of Zerubbabel, prince of Judah, 1 Chron. iii. 19.

III. SHELOMITH, son of Shimei, a Levite of the family of Gershom. 1 Chron. xxiii. 9.

IV. SHELOMITH, son of Izhar, a Levite, of the family of Gershom. 1 Chron. xxiii. 18.

V. SHELOMITH, daughter of Rehoboam, king of Judah; and of Maachah, daughter of Absalom. 2 Chron. xi. 20.

VI. SHELOMITH, son of Zichri, a descendant of Eliezar, son of Moses; keeper of the treasures of the temple. 1 Chron. xxvi. 26.

SHELOMOTH, שלמה, Σαλομή, perfect, peaceable; from שלם shalam. Son of Izhari, and father of Jahath. 1 Chron. xxiv. 22. perhaps the same as Shelomith IV. [Shelomith, Eng. Tr.]

SHELUMIEL, שלמיה, peace of God; or God is my happiness, retribution, or perfection of God; from שלם shalam, peace, &c. and של, God.

SHELUMIEL, or SALAMIEL, son of Zurishaddai, prince of Simeon. He came out of Egypt at the head of 50,000 men, who carried arms; and made his offering to the tabernacle, in his order, as head of his tribe. Numb. i. 6. vii. 36. x. 19.

SHEM, שם, name, renown; or he that puts, or places, or who is put or placed.

SHEM, or SEM, son of Noah, Gen. vi. 10. born A. M. 1558, before the deluge 98 years, ante A. D. 2446. We think he was younger than Japheth, and older than Ham. [Vide JAPHETH.] He entered the ark with Noah his father. Afterwards, when the good old man was overtaken with wine, and exposed in his tent, Shem and Japheth covered him, nor would see in him any thing indecent. When Noah awoke, he predicted blessings on Shem, saying, The Lord God of Shem be blessed, [He shall dwell in the tents of Shem], and let Canaan be the slave of Shem. The great prerogatives of Shem, were, that from his race was to proceed the Messiah, and that the worship of the true God was to be preserved among his posterity. Being a hundred years of age he begat Arphaxad, and died aged six hundred years, A. M. 2158, ante A. D. 1846. Shem obtained for his portion the best provinces of Asia.

The Jews ascribe to Shem the theological tradition tradition of what Noah had learned from the first of men. Shem communicated this to his children, and by his means the true religion was preserved. The Rabbins think also, that Shem instituted an academy, or school of religion, on mount Tabor. They say that Shem is Melchisedeck; that he, himself, had been at the school of Methuselah, before the deluge, for seventy-eight years; that he gave Abraham the whole tradition, the ceremonies of the sacrifice, of religion, &c. according to which this patriarch afterwards offered his sacrifices. Lastly, the Hebrews think that he taught men the law of justice, the calculation of months and years, with the intercalations of months and days. They pretend, that God gave him the spirit of prophecy a hundred years after the deluge, and that he prophesied four hundred years, though with little success, because men were become corrupt. Methodius says, that he dwelt in the island of the Sun, that he invented astronomy, and was the first king that governed on the earth. They ascribe to him the foundation of Septa, a maritime city of Africa, of Salernum, in Italy, and of Salem, in Judea. Those who confound him with Melchisedeck, suppose he wrote Psalm cx. "The Lord said unto my Lord," &c. also, a Hebrew book of physic, MS. in the library of the Elector of Bavaria. See P. Scipio Sgambat. Archiv. Vet. Testament, lib. i. p. 165.

Shem had five sons, Elam, Asher, Arphaxad, Lud, and Aram, who peopled the finest provinces of the East. See their Articles. The principal design of Moses being, to give the history and the laws of the Jews: he has carried the genealogy of Shem farther than those of the other sons of Noah, who were not his immediate subject. It is pretended that Noah committed to Shem the body of Adam, which he buried on Calvary. It is said also, that he deposited his will with him, by which he distributed the whole earth among his three sons. Among the heathen gods, Ham is Jupiter; Japheth is Neptune; and Shem is Pluto. See Bochart, Phaleg. lib. i. cap. 1. Comp. Melchizedeck, and FRAGMENTS.

SHEMA, שָׁמָע, that is heard, that hears, that obeys; from שָׁמָע shamah. [Fame, renown, that which is heard of; a celebrated place. "Fame-town."]

I. SHEMA, שָׁמָא, or שָׁמָמָא, a city of Judah. Josh. xv. 26.

II. SHEMA, fourth son of Hebron, and father of Rahan. 1 Chron. iv. 42, 43.

III. SHEMA, son of Joel, and father of Azaz, of Reuben. 1 Chron. v. 8.

SHAMAAH, שָׁמָא, Σαμαά, from Shem.

SHAMAAH, שָׁמָא, named, or placed; from שָׁמָע shem, name, or שָׁמָע sham, to place: otherwise, lost, desolate; from שָׁמָע shamam: otherwise, renown, report, rumour, from shem.

SHEMAAH, or SAMAA, father of Joash, of Benjamin; he joined David at Gibeah. 1 Chr. xii. 3.

SHEMAIAH, שָׁמָע, that hears, or that obeys the Lord; from שָׁמָע shamah, that hears, and שָׁמָע, the Lord. Father of Shimri, of Simeon. 1 Chron. iv. 37.

II. SHEMAIAH, son of Joel, of Reuben, 1 Chron. v. 4.

III. SHEMAIAH, a prophet sent to Rehoboam king of Judah, with a message from God, to forbid his war against Israel. 1 Chron. xi. 2.

Some years after this, Shishak, king of Egypt, came in hostile array into Judea, against Rehoboam, and took the best places of his kingdom. The prophet Shemaiah told Rehoboam, and the princes of Judah, who had retired into Jerusalem, that they had forsaken the Lord, and now he in his turn would forsake them, and deliver them into the hands of Shishak. The king and the princes being in a consternation, answered "The Lord is just;" but, they humbling themselves, God moderated his anger, and their sufferings. Vide REHOBAM. Shemaiah wrote the history of king Rehoboam. 2 Chron. xii. 15.

IV. SHEMAIAH, son of Shecaniah, of the royal family of Judah. 1 Chr. iii. 22

V. SHEMAIAH, son of Hasshub, a Levite. 1 Chr. ix. 14.

VI. SHEMAIAH, of the race of Elizaphan, a Levite; he officiated in the tabernacle at the head of two hundred of his brethren. 1 Chron. xv. 8, 11.

VII. SHEMAIAH, son of Galal, and grandson of Jeduthun. 1 Chr. ix. 16.

VIII. SHEMAIAH, son of Nathaniel, secretary of the temple. 1 Chr. xxiv. 6. I imagine him to be the same as Shemaiah, descendant of Elizaphan, No. VI. 1 Chr. xv. 8, 11. xxv. 17.

IX. SHEMAIAH, son of Obed-edom, a Levite and porter of the temple. 1 Chr. xxvi. 4, 7.

X. SHEMAIAH, a Levite, who in the time of king Jehoshaphat, was sent with others, by this prince to instruct the people of Judah. 2 Chr. xvii. 8.

XI. SHEMAIAH, a Levite of the race of Jeduthun, in the time of king Hezekiah. 2 Chron. xxix. 14.

XII. SHEMAIAH, a priest in the time of Hezekiah. 2 Chr. xxxi. 15.

XIII. SHEMAIAH, prince of the Levites, in the time of king Josiah. 2 Chron. xxxv. 9.

XIV. SHEMAIAH a principal Israelite, who returned from the captivity with Ezra. Ezra Y 2
viii. 16.

viii. 16. x. 21, 31. and perhaps Nehem. viii. 4.

XV. SHEMAIAH, son of Dalaiah, a false prophet in the time of Nehemiah, who being corrupted by Sanballat, and the other enemies of Nehemiah, would have persuaded him to retire into the temple. Neh. vi. 10.

XVI. SHEMAIAH, the Nehelamite, a false prophet who lived at Babylon while Jeremiah was in Jerusalem, Jer. xxix. 24, 25,—31, 32. Jeremiah having sent prophecies to the captive Jews at Babylon, Shemaiah wrote back to the people of Jerusalem, to decry the prophet; and to Zephaniah, prince of the priests, and to the rest of the priests, to reproach them for not seizing and imprisoning Jeremiah, as an impostor. Jeremiah in his turn wrote back to the Jews in captivity. "The Lord says, against Shemaiah the Nehelamite, and against his posterity;—none of his race shall ever sit in the midst of the people, and he shall not share in the happiness of my people."

XVII. SHEMAIAH, father of Delaiah, a prince of Judah, in the time of Jehoiakim. Jer. xxxvi. 12.

SHEMARIAH, שמריה, Σαμαρειὰς, or Samarias, God is my guard, or the guard of the Lord, diamond, dregs, thorn, or bush of the Lord; from שמר shamar, and יה jah, the Lord.

I. SHEMARIAH, a stout man who repaired to David at Ziklag. 1 Chron. xii. 5.

II. SHEMARIAH, one who had married strange wives, and divorced them. Ezra x. 32.

SHEMEBER, שמעבר, Συμὸρ, name of force, or fame of the strong, or of the wing; from שם shem, name, &c. and אבר abbar, or eber, strong, or winged, according to different readings: otherwise, that destroys the strong, or the winged.

SHEMEBER, king of Zebouim; one of the five kings defeated by Chedorlaomer and his allies, Gen. xiv. A. M. 2092, ante A. D. 1912.

SHEMER, שמר, Σεμμήρ, Vulgate, Somer, guardian, thorn; from שמר shamar, &c.

SHEMER, SEMER, or SOMER. This is the name of him who sold the mount of Somer to Omri king of Israel, upon which he built the city of Samaria. The name of Semer or Somer is also given to the mountain itself. See SAMARIA, and FRAGMENTS, No. DLXVII.

Shemer or Shomeron, was a very agreeable and fruitful mountain, advantageously situated about twelve miles from Dothaim, twelve from Merrom, and four from Atharoth. Euseb. in Dothaim, in Merro, et in Atharo. Before that time this mountain was famous for the battle between Abijah, king of Judah, and Jeroboam, king of Israel. 2 Chron. xiii.

SHEM-HAMPHORASH, or SCHEM-

HAMPHORASH, שְׁמוֹתָיִךְ, Shem-hamporash, שְׁמוֹתָיִךְ Jehovah, that is, the name manifested, or the name distinguished; the name Jehovah, the incommunicable name, which the Jews never pronounce, and do not so much as know the true pronunciation of it. See Jehovah.

SHEMIDA, שְׂמִידָה, name of knowledge; or that puts knowledge: from שָׂם to name, to put, and ידָה judah, science, or knowledge: otherwise, knowledge of desolation, or of astonishment: from שָׂם shamam, to make desolate, to astonish, and ידָה judah, science: otherwise, the science of the heavens; from ידָה judah, and שָׂם shammaim, the heavens. Son of Gilead, of Manasseh; head of a family. Numb. xxvi. 32. 1 Chron. vii. 19. [It is most likely, that the word Shem, when used as an appellation, has some reference to the Divine name, as the most honourable. Comp. Lev. xxiv. 11, 16. Deut. xxviii. 58. where the Samaritan text has Jehovah: in which case, this name, Shemida, would import the name of invocation, or, of Divine, or heavenly knowledge.]

SHEMINITH, שְׁמִינִית, the eighth. This Hebrew word is found before some of the Psalms, and is generally translated by Octava. But it signifies, either an instrument of eight strings, or the eighth band of the musicians of the temple.

SHEMIRAMOTH, שְׁמִירָמוֹת, height of the heavens; from שָׂם shammaim, the heavens, and רָמוֹת ramam, height, elevation: or elevation of the name; from ramam, height, and שָׂם shem, a name. A Levite, a porter of the temple. 1 Chron. xv. 18. [Exaltation of the Divine name; on the suggestion noticed in a foregoing article.]

SHEMUEL, שְׁמוּאֵל, placed, or put of God; from שָׂם shum, to place, to put, to be: otherwise, his name, which he has received of God; from שָׂם shem, to name, the pronoun יו, his, and אֵל el, God: otherwise, who is of God; from שִׁין, who, and the preposition מִן mo, for מִן min, from, and אֵל el, God. [Heard of God: from שָׁמַע. Son of Ammihud, prince of Simeon. Numb. xxxiv. 20. Also, a son of Thola, 1 Chr. vii. 2.]

SHEN, שֵׁן, Παλαιά, tooth, ivory; from שֵׁן shen: otherwise, change; from שָׁנָה shanah: otherwise, he that sleeps; from שָׁן jashan.

SHEN, or SEN, signifies also a sharp rock, naked and projecting as a tooth. [Perhaps, what we call a peak.] 1 Sam. vii. 12. Samuel erected a stone between Mishpat and Sen, as a monument of the victory of the Hebrews over the Philistines, and this stone he named, the stone of assistance: Aben Ezer.

SHENE,

SHENE, or SENE ; שֵׁנִי, this word is plural, and signifies teeth, or rocks. Jonathan and his armour-bearer penetrated into the camp of the Philistines, by passing between two rocks, one called Bozez, the other Seneh. 1 Sam. xiv. 4.

SHENAZAR, שֵׁנָזָר, Σαναζαρ, treasure of the tooth, or of the ivory; from שֵׁן shen, a tooth, ivory, and אֶצֶר atsar, treasure: otherwise, treasure of him that sleeps; from atsar, treasure, and שָׁן jashan, to sleep: or change of anguish, or distress; from שָׁן change, and אֶצֶר tsarar, to be in pain, or in bonds. This name is rather Babylonian than Hebrew. Son of Jecomiah, king of Judah. 1 Chron. iii. 18. [From the Arabic this would signify clear light; the great joy of his parents: or lively, sprightly, sparkling, bright.]

SHENIR, שֵׁנִיר, Sirion, by transposition; or Hermion, Deut. iii. 9. Lantern, or light, that sleeps; from נֹר nur, lamp, or light, and שָׁן jashan, to sleep. Otherwise, renewing of the lamp, or he that shews; from שָׁן shanah, and נֹר nur. [a coat of mail, according to the Arabic. Deut. iii. 9. 1 Chron. v. 23. Ezek. xxvii. 5.]

SHEPHAM, שֵׁפָם, or SHEPHAMAH, his brink, his lip, his beard, his breaking; from שֵׁפָה shupha, or שֵׁפֶה shuph, and the pronoun אֲנִי am, theirs.

SHEPHAM, or SEPHAMA, a city of Syria, the eastern limit of the Land of Promise. Num. xxxiv. 10, 11. This might be Apamea. Vide APAMEA.

SHEPHATIAH, שֵׁפְתִיָּה, or SAPHATIAS, the Lord that judges, the judgment of the Lord, or God is my judge; from שֵׁפֶת shaphat, judgment, and יְיָ jah, the Lord.

I. SHEPHATIAH, SAPHATIA, or SEPHATIA, son of David and Abital, 2 Sam. iii. 4. 1 Chr. iii. 3.

II. SHEPHATIAH, son of Reuel, and father of Meshullam, 1 Chron. ix. 8.

III. SHEPHATIAH, a mighty man who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Chron. xii. 5.

IV. SHEPHATIAH, son of Maachah. Chief of Simeon, in the time of David, 1 Chron. xxvii. 16.

V. SHEPHATIAH, son of king Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. xxi. 2.

VI. SHEPHATIAH, son of Hattil: his posterity returned into Judea, after the captivity of Babylon, in number 372. Ezra ii. 57. Neh. vii. 9.

VII. SHEPHATIAH, son of Mahalaleel, of the race of Pharez.

VIII. SHEPHATIAH, son of Mattan; one who accused Jeremiah of intimidating the people by his doleful predictions, Jer. xxxviii. 1.

SHEPHLAH, Σεφλά, low places, vales, or plains; from שֵׁפֶלָה shaphaleh. — LXX. τὸ πεδίου, or τὰ ταπεινά, or τὴν πεδινὴν, Sym. Κοιλάδα. This Hebrew word signifies an open field, or plain. The Greek and Latin interpreters generally translate it by a plain; but the LXX. have sometimes preserved the word Sephela. Eusebius and Jerom inform us, that in their time, the whole flat country, north and west about Eleutheropolis, was called Sephela; in Onomast. in Sephela. Simon Maccabæus fortified the city of Adida in Sephela, or in this plain. 1 Macc. xii. 38.

SHEPHERDS, or PASTORS. [Vide PASTOR.] When the patriarch Joseph invited his father and brethren to settle in Egypt, he bid them tell Pharaoh, they were shepherds, or breeders of sheep, that they might have the land of Goshen assigned for their habitation; because, says Joseph, the Egyptians hold shepherds in abomination. It is inquired, wherefore had the Egyptians such abhorrence to shepherds?

There are two reasons generally assigned for this: 1st. because the Hebrews, who bred sheep, also killed and ate them, or sacrificed them to their god. Whereas, the Egyptians worshipped sheep and goats, and thought it a great crime to kill, or sacrifice them. Diodorus Siculus, lib. i. says, that sheep were in great veneration throughout Egypt. And Strabo, lib. xvii. assures us, that they sacrificed them only in the Nome, or province, of Nitria; or in that of Mendese, according to Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 42.

Tacitus observes, Hist. lib. v. that the Israelites sacrificed sheep and lambs, as if it were to insult Jupiter Ammon, the deity of Egypt; and that they killed oxen without scruple, to affront the ox Apis. Cæso ariete velut in contumeliam Ammonis; bos quoque immolatur, quem Ægyptii Apim colunt. But this does not prove, that the employment of ox-keepers, or neat-herds, was of itself, odious to the Egyptians, as Scripture insinuates: on the contrary, this office would have recommended them to the esteem of the people, if they had not killed these animals; as in the nome of Mendese, the keepers of goats were honoured, because the goat was the favourite deity of that district.

We must therefore seek another cause of Egyptian aversion from shepherds. In Joseph. cont. App. lib. i. Manetho relates, that an army of strangers from the coast of Arabia, or from the east, invaded Egypt, subdued it, and established a succession of kings in Lower Egypt, for about five hundred and eleven years. After which, the kings of Thebais, and of Upper Egypt, after a long war, at last drove them out of of the country. These princes were called Hic-sos, i. e. king-shepherds. Some, says Manetho, affirm they were Arabians; but we find in other books, that they were not kings but captives. For in Egyptian, the word hic, when pronounced hoc, signifies a captive. This reason of the hatred of the Egyptians against shepherds appears to be plausible. [But query what was its date? See EXODUS, and FRAGMENTS, No. DXLI.]

Abel was a keeper of sheep, Gen. iv. 2. as were the greater number of the antient patriarchs. When men began to multiply, and to follow different employments, Jabal, son of Lamech bigamus, and his wife Adah, was acknowledged as father, i. e. founder of shepherds and nomades; Gen. iv. 20. He was the father of such as dwell in tents, and of such as have cattle. God sometimes takes the name of shepherd of Israel, Isaiah xl. 11. and kings, both in scripture, and ancient writers, are distinguished by the title of shepherds of the people. And the people forsaken, are compared to a flock without a shepherd. Isaiah says, that the Messiah shall feed his flock. God calls Cyrus his shepherd. The prophets often inveigh against the shepherds of Israel, against the kings, who feed themselves, and neglect their flocks; who distress them, treat them ill, seduce them, and lead them astray. See Ezekiel xxxiv. 23. Numbers xxvii. 17. 1 Kings xxii. 17. Isa. xl. 11. xlv. 28. Judith xi. 15.

The Lord says, Isaiah lxiii. 11. that he brought his people through the Red-sea, with their shepherds; i. e. Moses, Aaron, and the chief of the people, at their head. Micah says, v. 5. that the Lord shall raise seven shepherds over his people, and an eighth over the land of Assyria, to bring from thence the people of Israel. We take these seven, or eight shepherds, to be the seven princes confederate with Darius, son of Hystaspes, who killed Smerdis the Magian, who had seized the empire of Persia, after the death of Cambyses.

Zechariah, xi. 8. mentions three shepherds whom the Lord had cut off in one month. These were Aaron, Moses, and Miriam, who died in the wilderness; not indeed within the space of one month, but who all had the sentence of death passed on them in a month, and died at a little distance of time from one another. This is the explication of the Rabbins. Others think these three shepherds were David, Adonijah, and Joab, who all died in the space of one month. Others are of opinion, they were the three brethren Maccabees, Judas, Jonathan, and Simeon, who died within a month of years, i. e. within thirty years. We think it may be understood of the three Roman emperors who succeeded Nero, i. e. Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, who were slain by their own subjects within the space of a year and some days. Afterwards, in the prophet, God speaks in this manner; And I took my staff, even beauty, and cut it asunder. This rupture happened when the Jews revolted against the Romans; which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem, the Temple, and the Jewish nation.

The same Zechariah received order from the Lord, saying, take unto thee yet the instruments of a foolish shepherd; for, says the Lord, I will raise up a shepherd in the land, which shall not visit those that be cut off, &c. Zech. xi. 14, 15. The shepherds having forsaken Jesus Christ, their lawful shepherd, (we have no king, say they, but Cæsar, Tiberius) were delivered up to foolish shepherds, who plunged them into calamities: these are the Roman emperors, successors of Tiberius. Caligula succeeded Tiberius, Claudius succeeded Caligula; and Nero succeeded Claudius. Every one knows the character of these princes; that they were truly foolish shepherds, mad, wicked, and cruel.

The Messiah is often called a shepherd. I will set up shepherds over them, which shall feed them. Jer. xxiii. 4. 5. Isaiah, xl. 11. speaks in the same manner; He shall feed his flock like a shepherd, he shall gather the lambs with his arms, and gently lead those that are with young. And Zechariah, xiii. 7. says, Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, against the man that is my fellow, saith the Lord of Hosts. Smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered, and I will turn mine hand upon the little ones. Jesus Christ refers this passage to his passion. Matt. xxvi. 31. He takes on himself the title of the good shepherd, who gives his life for his sheep. John x. 11, 14, 15. St Paul calls him the great shepherd of the sheep, Heb. xiii. 20.; and St. Peter gives him the appellation of prince of shepherds. 1 Epist. v. 4.

God gave to his ministers the tythe of oxen, of sheep and of goats, which passed under the crook of the shepherd, i. e. are under his care, Lev. xxvii. 32. Or he alludes to what was done when the tythe was given to the priest: the shepherd standing with his hook at the entrance of the sheep-fold, as the young kids, or lambs, came out of the fold, he counted them, and retained every tenth for the priest, or the Levite.

Amos says, i. 2. that the beauty of shepherds is in mourning, during a dry season; literally the huts, or abodes, of the shepherds are in mourning. These are what are called, 2 Kings x. 12. Camere mera pastorum, or habitacula pastorum. Jerom, speaking of the city and desert of Tekoah, says, that one cannot so much as see there the hovel of the shepherds, being like subterraneous ovens, which the Africans call by the name of Mapalia. Jerom, pref. in Amos.

Our Saviour in his description of a good shepherd, John x. 11, 12, &c. says, that he lays down his life for his sheep; that he knows them, and they know him; that they hear his voice, and follow him; that he goes before them; that no one shall force them out of his hands, and that he calls them by their name; [these are all incidents taken from the custom of the country: they are by no means so striking to us as they must have been to those who heard our Lord; and who every day were witness to such methods of conducting this domesticated animal,] whereas the hireling, or bad shepherd, forsakes the sheep; and the thief enters not by the door of the sheepfold, but climbs in another way.

SHEPHI, שפִּי, Σαφεί, brink, solitude, lip, breaking. See Shepham. Son of Shobal, of the race of Seir. 1 Chron. i. 38. Gen. xxxvi. 23. An antient king of Idumea.

SHEPHUPHAN, שפּוּפָן, Σαφάμ, the ceras-tes, a kind of serpent; from שפּה shaphaph; שפּוּפָן shaphiphon. See SERPENT.

SHEPHUPHAN, or SEPHUPHAN, or SHUPHAM, son of Bela, and grandson of Benjamin, 1 Chron. viii. 5.

SHERAH, שָׂרָה, Σαρά, flesh, kindred, leaven, or remain; from שָׂרָה shaar, sheer, or sheor, according to different readings. 1 Chr. vii. 24.

SHEREBIAH, שְׂרֵבִיָּה, or Sarabias, dryness of the Lord, from שָׂרָה sharah, dryness, and יָה jah, the Lord: otherwise, that prevails with the Lord; from שָׂרָר sharar, to rule, and the conjunction בֵּי beth, in or with: otherwise, that sings in the Lord, from שָׂרָר shur, to sing. [delivered by the Lord; i. e. from captivity: hence we find it the name of several Levites. Ezra viii. 18, 24. Neh. viii. 7. ix. 4. x. 13. xii. 8, 24.]

SHERESH, שֶׁרֶשׁ, Σάρος, root, or little chains. Son of Peresh, and of Machir. 1 Chron. vii. 16.

SHEREZER, see SHAREZER.

SHESH, שֶׁשׁ, flax.

SHESH, COTTON, and LINEN. This is a pure Hebrew word, generally translated by flax. Vide Buxsus.

SHESHACH, שֶׁשַׁח, Σισάκ, bag of linen; from שֶׁשׁ shak, a bag, and שֶׁשׁ shesh, flax, or linen; otherwise, the sixth bag; from שֶׁשׁ shesh, six, and שֶׁשׁ shak, a bag.

[In FRAGMENTS, No. DXCVI. the reader may see a conjecture that this name denotes a palace, or country seat, of the king of Babylon, perhaps, called his Desire: so Fr. Delices, Mon plaisir, &c. but Simon thinks it imports, from the Syriac, quiet, tranquillity; which may well be applied to a palace distant from the city, implying retirement, Mon repos, Sans souci, &c.]

SHESHACH, or SESACH; by this name Jeremiah xxv. 26. li. 41. hints at Babylon. That prophet was to cause all nations to drink of the cup of the Lord's fury, and the king of Sheshach shall drink after them. And elsewhere, How is Sheshach taken, and how is the praise of the whole earth surprised! How is Babylon an astonishment among the nations! But how comes it that he gives the name to Babylon? Jerom thinks he does it out of caution, not to provoke Nebuchadnezzar, who then was besieging Jerusalem. in Jer. xxv. Vide Jarchi, et Kimchi. We take Sheshach to be a pagan deity, chiefly worshipped at Babylon. He gives this city the name of its tutelar deity, as he says, chap. l. 2. Babylon is taken; Bel is confounded; Merodach is broken in pieces. Bel and Merodach were gods of the country. Sheshach was probably the moon. At Babylon they celebrated feasts called Sacæa, which greatly resembled the Roman Saturnalia. The servants then acted the part of masters. Athenæus, lib. xiv. cap. 10. ex Beroso et Ctesia. Strabo, lib. xi. says they were celebrated in honour of Anais, which is Diana, or the moon. See Vossius, de Orig. et Prog. Idol. lib. ii. 22. See TARTAK.

SHESHAİ, SESAI, or SASAI, a giant, a son, or descendant, of Anak, driven from Hebron, with his brethren Ahiman and Talmai, by Caleb son of Jephunneh. Josh. xv. 14.

SHESHAZZAR, שֶׁשִׁבָּצָר, joy in tribulation; from שֶׁשׁ shush, joy, the preposition בֵּי beth, in, and צָרָר tzarar, tribulation, pain; otherwise, production, or defence of joy; from צָר tsur, defence: otherwise, joy of the vintage: from צָר batzar, and שֶׁשׁ shush, joy. A Chaldee word, in which it seems that Sace is included, which was a deity of the Babylonians. See SHESHACH. [free splendor; i. e. of the Sun; the sun at liberty, in reference to the Chaldee deity. Comp. DANIEL, &c.]

SHESHAZZAR. When king Cyrus restored to the Jews the sacred vessels of the temple of Jerusalem, which had been carried to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, Ezra i. 8.; he had an account taken of them, and committed them to Sheshbazzar, prince of Judah. The greater part part of interpreters think, Sheshbazzar is Zerubbabel; and that he bore the name of Sheshbazzar among the Babylonians, as Daniel did that of Belshazzar. Scripture says, that Zerubbabel laid the foundation of the temple, and it says the same of Sheshbazzar, Zech. iv. 9. Ezra. v. 16. Others will have Sheshbazzar to be a Persian officer, sent to govern the Jews. It is not very certain that Zerubbabel had this government conferred on him. The Grecians give to Sheshbazzar, or (as they call him) Sammanaser, the quality of governor of Judea. 3 Esdras ii. Προεστῶτη τῆς Ἰουδαίας.

SHE'THAR, שֶׁתָּר, that rots; from the Chaldee שְׁחִיחָה shechitha, rottenness. This word is Persian, or Medish; and it is difficult to find its true root in the Hebrew. A principal officer of the court of king Ahasuerus. Esth. i. 14.—[A star; but which of the stars is not known: or whether a star, in general: from the Persian.]

SHE'THAR-BOZNAI, שֶׁתָּר-בִּזְנַי, that makes to rot or corrupt, or that seeks and examines those who despise me; from בָּזָה bazah, to despise, and the pronoun 'i, me, and תִּרָּא thur, to seek, to examine. This a Medish or Persian word, and its root not in the Hebrew. An officer of the king of Persia, beyond the Euphrates, who wrote to court against the Jews, Ezra v. 6.—[The star of light, perhaps, the morning star, or Phosphorus.]

SHEVA, שָׁוָא, Σῆσά, vanity; from שָׁוָא shova: otherwise, elevation, fame; from שָׁחָה shaah: otherwise, tumult; from שָׁחָה shoah. Secretary to king David, 2 Sam. xx. 25.

SHEW BREAD. Heb. לֶחֶם פָּנִים, Ἀρτος ἐνώπιος, literally, bread of faces, or of the face. They thus called the loaves of bread, which the priest of the week placed every Sabbath-day on the golden table in the Sanctum, before the Lord. Exod. xxv. 30.

These loaves were square, and had four faces, as the Rabbins say: they were covered with leaves of gold: they were twelve in number, and represented the twelve tribes of Israel. Each loaf was of considerable size, since they used two tenth-deals of flour for each, which are about six pints, Lev. xxiv. 5, 6, 7. They placed them hot on the Sabbath-day in the presence of the Lord; when they also took away those which had been exposed the whole week, and which could not be lawfully eaten but by the priests. This offering was accompanied with frankincense and salt. Some commentators think wine was added to it also, Villalpand, de Templo, lib. iv. cap. 57. The frankincense was burnt on the golden table every Saturday, when they set on fresh loaves.

All are not agreed as to the manner in which the loaves of shew-bread were ranged on the altar of the Sanctum. Some think they were in three piles, four loaves in each. Others say two piles, six loaves in each; and it is hard to conceive how it could be otherwise, or how a table two cubits in length, and one in breadth, could allow room enough for twelve loaves, each containing six pints of flour. The Rabbins say, that between every two loaves were two golden pipes, supported by forks of the same metal, whose ends rested on the ground, to convey air between the loaves, to hinder them from growing mouldy. Vide FRAGS. No. CCXXIX.

Moses seems to say, Lev. xxiv. 8. that the Israelites furnished the loaves presented before the Lord; but this ought to be understood only, as they paid the first-fruits and tenths to the priests, (which was the chief of their income.) And of these tenths and first-fruits the priests took wherewith to make the shew-bread, and whatever else it was their duty to furnish, in the service of the temple. In the time of David, 1 Chron. ix. 32. the Levites of the family of Kohath had the care of the shew-bread, or as it is called in the Chronicles, "the Bread of Ordering." Probably, the Levites baked and prepared it; but the priests offered it before the Lord, as said in another place, 1 Chron. xxiii. 28. Vulg. Jerom on Mal. i. However, Jerom says, from a tradition of the Jews, that the priests sowed, reaped, ground, kneaded, and baked the shew-bread: panes propositionis, quos juxta traditiones Hebraicas, ipsi serere, ipsi demetere, ipsi molere, ipsi coquere debeatis.

There are several Rabbinical remarks about these loaves, which commentators take care to glean: they were placed six in a pile, one on another, on a salver of gold; and above they were covered with another golden salver, on which stood a golden cup full of pure incense. They were made without leaven, and kneaded with oil. Tostatus says, that they were baked on a baking-pan of gold. Others maintain, that they were baked in an ordinary oven, but one kept for this use only; and that the wood used on this occasion was chosen on purpose, the soundest and closest that could be got. Beside these loaves stood a vessel full of excellent wine; this vessel was close stopped, that the wine might not grow sour, and it held the fourth part of a hin; something above two pints.

When the loaves were changed, the wine was poured out as a libation before the Lord. The vessel, or cup, that was filled with salt near these loaves, was of gold, and covered, as well as the vessel of incense, that no dust, &c. should defile it.

it.—These loaves were eaten in the temple by the priests of the week; to take them out of the temple to eat them at home, was not allowed.

SHIBBOLETH, שבלת, Vulgate, SCIBBOLETH; Judg. xii. 6. Burden, ear of corn; from סבל : or current of water.

After Jephthah had beaten the Ammonites, the men of Ephraim were jealous of this advantage obtained by the tribes beyond Jordan, and complained heavily that they had not been called to that expedition. Jephthah answered with much moderation; but that did not prevent the Ephraimites from using contemptuous words toward the men of Gilead, telling them, they were only fugitives from Ephraim and Manasseh, a kind of bastards that belonged to neither of the two tribes: (This reproach was false, since Machir, the father of Gilead, was Manasseh's own son, Numb. xxvi. 29.) [but vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCCXXIX.] To fighting they went; and the men of Gilead killed a great number of Ephraim. After which they set guards at all the passes of Jordan; and when an Ephraimite who had escaped, came to the river-side, and desired to pass over, they asked him, if he was not an Ephraimite? If he said, No; they bid him pronounce Shibboleth; but he pronouncing it Sibboleth, according to the diction of the Ephraimites, and not well pronouncing the first letter, they killed him on the spot: on this occasion, there fell forty-two thousand Ephraimites.

[This incident should not be passed over without observing that it affords proof of dialectical variations among the tribes of the same nation, and speaking the same language, in those early days: there can be no wonder, therefore, if we find in later ages the same word written different ways, according to the pronunciation of different tribes, or of different colonies, or residents of the Hebrew people: whence various pointings, &c. That this continued, is evident from the peculiarities of the Galilean dialect, by which Peter was discovered to be of Galilee, &c. As to the import of the term Shibboleth, it probably, signified the passes over the water, the fords, or ferries; as it is likely that the Ephraimites were made to repeat their request for passage, &c. several times, and were detected by the variations they uttered. SHIBMAH, שבמה, conversion, return, captivity, old-age, rest; from שבה shabah, or שב shub. [street, i. e. wine; from the Chaldee.]

mah, which were cut down by the enemies of the Moabites: for that people had taken the city of Shibmah, Jer. xlviii. 32. and others of Reuben, after this tribe was carried into captivity, by Tiglath-pilneser, 1 Chron. v. 26. 2 Kings xv. 29. Jerom says, in Isai. xvi. that between Heshbon and Sibmah there was hardly the distance of five hundred paces.

SHICRON, שכרונה, drunkenness: or his gift, or his wages; from שכר, sachar, and the pronoun נו eno, his.

[Perhaps rather the cause of drunkenness—strong wine, intoxicating liquor, as the term is used, Jer. xiii. 13. It was the modern boundary of Judah, near the valley of Sorek, the renown of the grapes of which was extensive. Query, “the great one, or Aun, in a state of satiety with strong liquor?”—Compare Gen. ix. 21. or, the Aun who invented strong liquor: Bacchus?]

SHICRON, or SECHRONA, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 11. thought to have been yielded up to Simeon.

SHIELD. In Scripture, God is often called the shield of his people, Gen. xv. 1. “I am thy shield,” says God to Abraham. The Psalmist says, Psalm v. 12. “Thou, Lord, wilt bless the righteous; with favour wilt thou compass him, as with a shield.” Princes and great men are also called shields of the people. 2 Sam. i. 21. Saul is called the shield of Israel. “The shields of the earth belong unto God, or are in his dependance, Psalm xlvii. 9. The LXX. have it;—the strong gods of the earth have greatly exalted themselves.

They hung their shields around the towers for ornament, and to use on occasion. The tower of David was adorned with a thousand shields, hung round about it: there were deposited arms of all kinds: Cant. iv. 4. The Maccabees adorned the front of the temple with shields which they hung thereon, 1 Macc. iv. 57. They took them down from thence to march against the enemy: Ezekiel, xxvii. 10. says, that the Persians, the Lydians, and the Lybians hung up their shields in Tyre, as ornaments to that city. Vide FRAGS. No. CCXVII.

The common materials of a shield were wood, covered with leather, with plates of gold, or of brass. Sometimes they were wholly of gold, or of brass. Solomon made some of massy gold, which Shishak king of Egypt took away; and Rehoboam made others of brass to serve in their stead, 1 Sam. xvii. 45. Goliath's shield was of brass. Nahum, ii. 3. describes the shields of the Chaldeans as bright and resplendent. The Psalmist says, that God shall cause peace to reign among his people, and that they shall throw their shields into the fire : Psalm xli. 9. These shields therefore were of wood.

SHIGGAION, שִׁגְיוֹן, a song of trouble, or of comfort [after trouble.]

SHIGGAION, SHIGIONOTH, or SIGAION. This word occurs in the Hebrew, Psalm vii. title, and Habakkuk iii. 1. שִׁגְיוֹן לַי. Vulg. pro Ignorantiis. Theodot. Ὑπὲρ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν. Pro voluntariis, (supple) peccatis. The LXX. have translated it by Psalm, or Cantic; but Aquila and Symmachus, have rendered it by ignorance, or sins of ignorance. Theodotion, in Habakkuk, has it "for voluntary sins:" but there is reason to doubt whether his text be very intire. Some think Shiggaion is an instrument of music; others, a certain air, or tune, to which this Psalm was sung. Others translate it, "the error of David; the secret of David; the delight of David; the disquiet of David." We think it ought to be translated, "a song of trouble," or "a song of consolation of David." The Arabic word Schaga, signifies to be in trouble; and the Hebrew word Schagah, or Shagah, to rejoice, to be comforted [after trouble.]

SHIHON, שִׁחֹן, his sound; from שִׁחַן shaah. [otherwise, of strength, or of grief. Josh. xix. 19.

Simon says, "the great ruins:" the place wholly laid waste: perhaps so called, from its being restored after utter destruction. Since, however, Shian, (Sion) has a totally different meaning, this explanation appears very dubious.

Taking Aun for a person, as we have often done, this epithet would mean "the Aun of compensation," or, a person (or principle) who returns according to the value of benefits, or honours, honorary gifts, received by him.]

SHIHON, or SEON, a city of Issachar, Josh. xix. 19. Heb. reads שִׁחֹן, Shion, or Sion. Eusebius says, that in his time there was a place called Seon, at the foot of mount Tabor. Onomast. in Seon.

SHILHI, שִׁלְחִי, שלי, mission, messenger: otherwise, branches, or dart, javelin; from שִׁלַּח shalach, or shelach, according to different readings: from the Syriac, that spoils, or is spoiled. Father of Azubah, the mother of king Jehoshaphat. 1 Kings xxii. 42.

SHILHIM, שִׁלְחִים, messengers, suckers, branches, darts; from שִׁלַּח shalach: or that spoil: according to the Syriac.

[But some think, a gift, or present, (a custom alluded to Mich. i. 14.) so, Pharaoh gave Gaser as a gift to his daughter, 1 Kings ix. 16. (Comp. Judg. xii. 9.) The ground on which the town stood might have been originally a gift.]

SHILHIM, or SELAM, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 32.

SHILLEM, or SALLEM, or SELLEM, or SHALLUM, fourth son of Naphtali, Gen. xli. 24. head of a great family. Num. xxvi. 49.

SHILOH, or SILO, שִׁלֹּה, שִׁלְוָה, שלוה, [great] peace, or abundance; from שִׁלַּח shalach: otherwise, that deceives, or mocks, according to the Syriac. [A city of Ephraim. Josh. xvi. 6. xviii. 1. xix. 5. xxi. 2. xxii. 9, 12. Judges xxi. 19. 1 Sam. i. 24. ii. 14. Psalm lxxviii. 60. Jer. xvi. 6, &c. See II. SHILOH, infra.]

SHILO, שִׁלֹּה, sent; from שִׁלַּח shalach.

SHILOH. This term is famous among interpreters and commentators on Scripture. It is used, Gen. xlix. 10. to denote the Messiah.—The patriarch Jacob foretels his coming, in these words: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet, until Shiloh come, and unto him shall the gathering of the people be." שִׁלֹּה בֵּן יִצְחָק, Donec veniat Shilo. Christian commentators agree, that this word ought to be understood of the Messiah, of Jesus Christ; but all are not agreed about its literal and grammatical signification. Jerom, who translates it by Qui mittendus est, manifestly read Shiloach, sent, instead of Shilo. The LXX. translate ἕως ἀνέλθῃ τὰ ἀποκείμενα αὐτῷ. Or, ἕως ἀνέλθῃ ὃ ἀπόκειται. As if they had read שִׁלֹּה instead of שִׁלֹּה. "Until the coming of him to whom it is reserved;" or, "till we see arrive that which is reserved for him."

It must be owned that the signification of the word Shiloh is not well ascertained. Some translate, The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, till he comes to whom it belongs, שִׁלֹּה, or שִׁלְוָה, instead of שִׁלֹּה. Others, till the coming of the peace-maker, or, the pacific, or, of prosperity, שִׁלֹּה, prosperatus est. Shalah signifies, to be in peace, to be in prosperity. Others, till the birth of him who shall be born of a woman, without the knowledge of man. שִׁלֹּה, or שִׁלְוָה, secundina, fluxus, Arab. Lud. de Dieu. Otherwise, the sceptre shall not depart from Judah, till its end, its ruin; till the downfall of the kingdom of the Jews. Some Rabbins have taken the name Silo, or Shilo, for a city of this name in Palestine. The sceptre shall not be taken from Judah, till it comes to Shiloh, שִׁלֹּה, or שִׁלְוָה. "It has ceased, it has finished," says Le Clerc, in Gen. till it be taken from him, to be given to Saul, at Shiloh. But where is it said, that Saul was acknowledged king, or consecrated, at Shiloh? If we would understand it of Jeroboam, son of Nebat, the matter is equally uncertain. Scripture mentions no assembly at Shiloh, that admitted him king. A modern author, Gousset, Comment. Ling. Heb. p. 415. derives derives Shiloh from Shalah, שָׁלוֹחַ, fatigare,—which sometimes signifies to be weary, to suffer; till his labours, his sufferings, his passion, shall happen. Vide FRAGS., Nos. CCCXXXII. —CCCXXXV. also, CXXIII.

[In FRAGMENTS, No. CCCXXXV. the reader will find a question, whether this ancient root may not be one remaining of the primitive language of mankind? This may now be connected with the discovery of several Sanscrit words, retained in the western languages; and in the early books of Holy Writ, as stated in Nos. DXXXVI. to DXL. If the history of the Fall retains such words and such reference, there can be no harm in supposing that the prediction of Restoration by the Messiah, should contain a similar reference. This accounts for the difficulty of adequately expressing the meaning of this word; and the variations proposed by different interpreters, with intention to express its spirit. Some have even supposed that it was a kind of acrostic, the three letters which compose it being taken from three ancient Hebrew words. More probably, it came from the east of Kedem, and was retained in the Abrahamic family, being then well understood by the Patriarchs and their descendants.]

So much for the grammatical signification of Shiloh; it is sufficient, that the ancient Jews, in this matter, agreed with the Christians, that this word stands for Messiah the king: so the paraphrasts Onkelos and Jonathan, the ancient Hebrew commentaries on Genesis, and the Talmudists themselves explain it. The sceptre continued among the Jews; they had kings of their own nation, in the persons of the Herods; but soon afterwards, the sceptre was entirely taken away from them, and has never been restored to them since.

The Jews seek in vain to put forced meanings on this prophecy of Jacob; saying, for example, that the sceptre intimates the dominion of strangers, to which they have been in subjection; or, indulging the hope of seeing one day, the sceptre, or supreme power, settled again among their nation. It is easy to perceive, that this is contrived, to deliver themselves out of perplexity. In vain, likewise, they take refuge in certain princes of the captivity, who, they pretend, subsist beyond the Euphrates, exercising an authority over their nation, little short of absolute; and being of the race of David. This pretended succession of princes is perfectly chimerical; and though at certain times they could shew a succession, it never continued long; and their authority was too obscure, and too limited, to be the object of a prophecy so remarkable as this.

II. SHILOH, or SILLO, a famous city of Ephraim, Josh. xviii. xix. xxi. twelve miles from Shechem, according to Eusebius; ten miles, according to Jerom: it was in Acrabattene, according to both. In Jerom's time Shiloh was ruined, in Sophon. 1. et in Epitaph. Paula. and nothing remarkable was extant there, but the foundation of the altar of burnt-offerings, which had been erected when the tabernacle stood there. At Shiloh Joshua assembled the people, to make the second distribution of the Land of Promise. Josh. xviii. Here the tabernacle of the Lord was set up, when the people were settled in the country, Josh. xix. 51. The ark and the tabernacle continued at Shiloh, from A. M. 2560, when it was set up by Joshua, to A. M. 2888, ante A. D. 1116. when it was taken by the Philistines, under the administration of the high-priest Eli. At Shiloh Samuel began to prophecy, 1 Sam. iv. 4. Here the prophet Ahijah dwelt, 1 Kings xiv. 2. Jeremiah foretold, that the temple of Jerusalem should be reduced to the same condition as Shiloh was, Jer. vii. 12, 14. xxvi. 6. After the return of the ark out of the country of the Philistines, instead of returning it to Shiloh, it was taken to Kirjath-jearim, 1 Sam. vi. 21.

M. Reland conjectures, that from the name Shiloh, Pausanias, lib. vi. cap. 24. took occasion to say, that Silenus the companion of Bacchus, was buried in Palestine. Benjamin of Tudela affirms, that the tomb of Samuel was to be seen here. On the medals of Shechem, or Neapolis, we see Silenus represented; which should make us think, that it was rather at Shechem than at Shiloh, they might expect to find the tomb of this demi-god.

SHILONITES, שִׁלֹנִי, that abides; from שָׁלוֹחַ shalah: otherwise, peace and abundance; from the same shalah, or שְׁלִי sheli: or, according to the Syriac, that deceives, or mocks.

SHILONITES, or SILONI, 1 Chron. ix. 5. This is taken by some, for the name of a man, father of Asaiah, of Judah. Others derive it from the city of Shiloh, or from Selah, son of Judah.

SHILSHAH, שָׁלֹשׁ, three, or the third, or prince, or chief; from שָׁלוֹשׁ shalosh, or שְׁלִישׁ shlish. Son of Zophar, of Asher, 1 Chron. vii. 37. See SHALISHA.

SHIMEA, שִׁמְעָא, Σαμὲα, that hears, or obeys, [or, is heard]: from שָׁמַע shamah. 1 Chron. iii. 5.

I. SHIMEA, a Levite, son of Michael, and father of Berachiah, 1 Chron. vi. 39.

II. SHIMEA, son of Uzra, and father of Haggia, a Levite, 1 Chron. vi. 30.

III. SHIMEA, or SHAMMUA, son of David and Bathsheba, 1 Chron. iii. 5. Vide FRAGS. No. CCCXXXIII.

SHIMEAH, שמע, that hears, that obeys; from שמע shamah. 2 Sam. xii. 3. xvi. 21.

I. SHIMEAH, SAMAA, SEMMAA, or SIMMAA, prince of a family of Benjamin, and son of Mikloth, 1 Chron. viii. 32.

II. SHIMEAH, brother of David, and father of Jonathan and Jonadab. Jonadab was a subtle man. Jonathan was a hero of David's army, 2 Sam. xxi. 21.

There were others of this name, of whom nothing particular is known.

SHIMEAM, שמעם, Σαμαμ, Vulg. SAMMAAN, fame, reputation of the mother, or of the nation; from שמע shem, to name, and אמ am, a mother; or from אום om, a nation: otherwise, name of fear; from שמע shem, to name, and אום am, terror, fear. [astonishing, wonderful, 1 Chron. ix. 38. comp. viii. 32. Son of Mikloth.]

SHIMEATH, שמעת, that hears, [or, is heard] or that obeys; from שמע shamah: or fame, reputation; from שמעה shamaah, to hear. 2 Kings xii. 21.

SHIMEI, שמעי, that hears, [or, is heard.] or obeys; from שמע shamah: or name of the heap; from שמע shem, a name, and יי hi, a heap: or that destroys the heap; from שמע shamam, to destroy, to lay waste, and יי hi, a heap: otherwise, my reputation, my fame; from שמע shem, name, renown, and יי i, my.

I. SHIMEI, and REI, 1 Kings i. 8. See REI.

II. SHIMEI, son of Gog, father of Micah, of Reuben, 1 Chr. v. 4.

III. SHIMEI, son of Zachur, of Simeon, 1 Chr. iv. 27. He had sixteen sons, and six daughters.

IV. SHIMEI, son of Libni, a descendant of Kohath. 1 Chr. vi. 29.

V. SHIMEI, son of Gera, a kinsman of Saul, who when David was obliged to retire from Jerusalem, began to curse him, to throw stones, &c. 2 Sam. xvi. 5.

But when David returned to Jerusalem, after the defeat and death of Absalom, Shimei hastened with the men of Judah, and with a thousand men of Benjamin, to come before David: he threw himself at his feet, desiring him to forget and to forgive his fault. Abishai son of Zeruiah, expostulated in an angry manner; but David disapproved Abishai's zeal, and promised Shimei, with an oath, that he would not put him to death. And in truth, he suffered him to live in peace while he himself lived; but before his death, he recommended to Solomon, not to let Shimei go entirely unpunished, but to exercise his discretion upon him.

Therefore, when Solomon ascended the throne, he confined Shimei to Jerusalem, where he dwelt three years, when some of his slaves ran away from him, and took sanctuary with Achish king of Gath. Shimei went after them, and brought them to Jerusalem. The king being informed of this, caused Shimei to come before him, and said to him; did not I assure you, that the day you quitted your confinement, you should be put to death? So he gave orders to Benaiah son of Jehoiada to kill him. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CCC.

VI. SHIMEI, of Romanthi: had the superintendence of king David's wine cellars. 1 Chr. xxvii. 27.

SHIMI, שמי, my name; from שמע shem, a name: otherwise, my loss, or my desolation, my astonishment; from שמע shamam, desolation, &c. and the pronoun יי i, my: otherwise, the heavens; from שמע shamaim. [astonishing.]

SHIMI, or SEMEI, second son of Gershon, and grandson of Levi, Exod. vi. 17. Head of a family, Numb. iii. 21.

SHIMON, שמון, that puts, or is put; from שום shum: otherwise, oil, perfume; from שמן shemen. [astonishing.]

SHIMON, or SIMON, of the race of Judah, father of Ammon, Rinnah, &c. 1 Chr. iv. 20.

SHIMRATH, שמרת, dregs, or prison; from שמר shamar, or shemer; or, bush, thorn, or diamond; from שמיר shamir. [kept, guarded.]

SHIMRATH, or SAMARATH, son of Shimhi, or Shema, of Benjamin. 1 Chr. viii. 21.

SHIMRI, שמרי, Σαυβρι, that keeps, or imprisons; [or, is kept, or guarded, &c. by the Lord.] dregs, a bush, or diamond. See SAMARIA.

SHIMRI, or SEMRI, son of Shemaiah, and father of Jedaiah, of Simeon, 1 Chr. iv. 37.

SHIMRITH, שמרת, who is kept: or wholly of diamond, thorn, or dregs; from שמיר shamir, or shemer, according to different readings.—Mother of Jehozabad, 2 Chron. xxiv. 26.

SHIMRON, שמרון, Σουβρων, Vulgate, Semron, his guardian, his diamond, his bush, or his dregs: from שמר shamar, or שמיר shamir, and און aven, or on, force, iniquity.

I. SHIMRON, SIMERON, SEMERON, or SEMRAM: a city of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 15. See SIMONIAS. This name is also given to the mountain Somer, on which stood Samaria.

II. SHIMRON, son of Issachar. Numb. xxvi. 24. Father of the Shimronites. 1 Chron. vii. 1. [Gen. xvi. 13. Shimron.]

SHIMSHAI, שמשאי, Σαμσαϊ, my sun; from שמש

שמש shemesh, the sun, and יי, my. [Sun of the Lord, or the Lord Sun.]

SHIMSHAI, or SAMSAI, a secretary or scribe, who, with Rehum the chancellor, wrote to king Artaxerxes against the Jews, lately returned from captivity, Ezr. iv. 8. A. M. 3470, ante A. D. 534. See ARTAXERXES.

SHINAB, שנתב, tooth of the father, or change of the father, or sleep of the father; from שן shen, a tooth, or שנה shanah, change, or ישן yashan, sleep, and אב ab, a father. [Light, i. e. joy of the father; from the Arabic.]

SHINAB, or SENNAAB, king of Admah, one of the four cities burned by fire from heaven, because of the crimes of its inhabitants, Gen. xix. 24. Shinab, with the other kings of Pentapolis, were overcome by Amraphel, and his allies. chap. xiv. 2.

SHINAR, שניר, watch of him that sleeps; from עור hur, watch, and ישן yashan, to sleep: otherwise, spoil of the tooth; from ערה harah, spoil, and שן shen, a tooth; or change of the city, from שנה shanah, change, and עיר hir, a city.—These explications are neither natural nor certain, because the word is not Hebrew.

[The foregoing etymologies will hardly satisfy the intelligent reader. Possibly this name might be derived from the repeated flittings of those who at length took up their abode in this plain. The Hebrew root nar, appears to denote shaken out, Job xxxviii. 13. the Chaldee, to migrate from place to place; the Arabic, to be expelled from a place; the Ethiopic, to be sent away from a dwelling. If we suppose, as appears from the history, that this name was given to the place before the dispersion, then it will import simply the settlement after repeated flittings, or removals; or, the place settled by repeated hordes of men, here taking up their abode. But if it be supposed that this name was imposed after the dispersion, then it may be taken in the bad sense, shaken out, expelled, scattered: though, indeed, it was rather the place whence men were expelled, than that into which they were driven.

SHINAR was certainly a considerable extent of level country; it included Babylon, and probably further south; but how much, we cannot very well tell. It is extremely probable, that the city Singara marks some part of this province; in which case Babylon would be a part of the land of Shinar, rather than the land of Shinar a part of Babylonia; and indeed, this would lead us to consider the land of Shinar as that extent between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, which was afterwards called Mesopotamia. To this agrees the opinion of Michaelis, who extends Shinar so far north as to include Nisibis and Edessa. Shinar might be the original name of this whole extent, which might afterwards be divided into Padan Aram, and other parts, like as Mesopotamia was, under the Roman government.

Josephus reports, Antiq. lib. i. cap. 4. that Histæus describes the plain of Senaar as being in the levels of Babylonia: but, after the splendor to which Babylon was raised, this may easily be explained, by saying, that it was under the Babylonian government.

There is a very remarkable variation in the Samaritan, which reads the land of Sopha; and with this agrees the Arabic of Castellus's Heptaglot, which reads Aram Supha: this leads us to some part of Mesopotamia called Aram.—Suph signifies a tower, and this compound appellative would import Aram of the Tower, i. e. as distinct from Padan Aram: Aram Supha being Southern Mesopotamia, Padan Aram being Northern Mesopotamia. The land of the Tower is frequently used among the Jews for Babylonia.

This will remind the reader of Suph. Comp. SEA, RED.]

SHINAR, or SENNAAR, a province of Babylonia, wherein the tower of Babel was built. Gen. xi. 2. Calneh was built in the same country. Gen. x. 10. Amraphel, king of Shinar, was a potent prince in the time of Abraham. Gen. xiv. 1. Daniel says, i. 2. that Nebuchadnezzar carried away the sacred vessels of the temple of Jerusalem, and put them in the temple of his god, in the land of Shinar. There is a great probability that the mountains of Singares, or Zagras, as well as the city and river of Singare, take their name from Shinar, Sennaar, or Sengar.

SHIPHI, שפעי, Σωπεῖ, inundation, or multitude [CROWD]; from שפע shephah: or knife; from שפי shephi. Of Simeon. 1 Chr. iv. 29.

SHIPHMITTE, שפמי, lip, or margin, or shore; from שף shuph, to break, and מימ mim, waters. A town of Judah. 1 Chron. xxviii. 27.

SHIPHRAH, שפרה, handsome, or trumpet; from שפר shaphar, or shepherd, according to different readings: or that does good; or chicken, little bird, according to the Syriac. [FAIR.]

SHIPHRAH, or SEPHORAH, one of the midwives of Egypt, who preserved the Hebrew children. Exod. i. 15. Some think she was an Egyptian, but it is more likely she was an Israelite. See PUAH.

SHIPTAN, שפטן, judge, or that judges [very justly]; from שפט shaphet.

SHIPTAN,

SHIPTAN, or SEPHTAM, father of Kemuel, of Ephraim. Numb. xxxiv. 24.

SHISHA, שִׁשָּׁה, six, the sixth; from שִׁשָּׁה shishah: otherwise, marble; from שִׁשָּׁה shaish: otherwise, lifting up of the gift; from שִׁשָּׁה shi, present, or gift, and שִׁשָּׁה nashah, to lift up. [From the Syriac and Arabic, dwelling, residence, i. e. of the Lord. A secretary of David, 2 Sam. xv. 25. called Shavsha, 1 Chron. xviii. 16. of the same import.] Also Father of Ahiah, secretary to king Solomon. 1 Kings iv. 3.

SHISHAK, שִׁשָּׁק, present of the bag, of the pot, of the thigh; from שִׁשָּׁק shak, a bag, and שִׁשָּׁק shok, a thigh: otherwise, of the kiss; from שִׁשָּׁק nashak. This word is Egyptian, nor is it possible to find its etymology from the Hebrew. [See SHESHACH. This king is called Sasiges, by Diodorus Siculus. We cannot tell the exact meaning of this name; but Hiller thinks it may resemble the Arabic, by which it would import like a bank, i. e. of the Nile: fresh, verdant, prolific, bountiful.]

SHISHAK, or SESAC, king of Egypt; he declared war against Rehoboam king of Judah, in the fifth year of Rehoboam. The king of Egypt had twelve thousand war chariots, and sixty thousand horse, with an innumerable multitude of people, out of Egypt, the countries of Lubim, of Suchim, and of Cush. He entered Judea, and captured the strongest places in the country, advancing to Jerusalem. Then the prophet Shemaiah came to Rehoboam and the princes of Judah, in Jerusalem, and said, thus saith the Lord, "as you have forsaken me, so have I delivered you into the hands of king Shishak." But they acknowledging their fault, God seeing their humiliation, said, "since they have humbled themselves, I will not destroy them."

Shishak entered Jerusalem, but soon withdrew, taking away the treasures of the Lord's house, and of the king's palace; also the golden bucklers that Solomon had made. The Rabbins are of opinion, that the chief motive of this prince's war against Rehoboam, was because he coveted to possess the ivory throne of Solomon, with which he was charmed. To this prince Jeroboam fled, toward the end of Solomon's reign: and when Shishak came into Judea, he did no harm to Jeroboam's territories. 2 Chron. xii. 1 Kings xiv. 25, 26. A. M. 3033, ante A. D. 971. Perhaps Jeroboam might invite him to invade Rehoboam's country. Till the time of Shishak Scripture mentions the kings of Egypt by the general name of Pharaoh; Shishak is the first whose proper name is mentioned. Chronologists are not agreed as to the correct order of Shishak in the Egyptian dynasties. Some think him to be Sesonchis; others Sesostriis, or Sethosis. Marsham, Canon. Chronolog. secul. xiv. lib. iii. Usher thinks him to be Sesouchis, and places the beginning of his reign A. M. 3026, ante A. D. 978.

This Shishak or Sesac, according to Sir Isaac Newton, in his Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms amended, was the greatest conqueror, and the most celebrated hero of all antiquity, being the son of Ammon, or the Egyptian Jupiter, and known to the Greeks by the name of Bacchus, Osiris, and Hercules; he was the Belus of the Chaldeans, the Mars or Mavors of the Thracians, &c. He made great conquests in India, Assyria, Media, Scythia, Phœnicia, Syria, Judæa, &c. His army was at last routed in Greece by Perseus; which disgrace, together with the attempts of his brother Danaus, to usurp his kingdom in his absence, obliged him to return into Egypt, in the ninth year of his expedition. From hence he drove his brother Danaus, who took refuge in Greece, and was there celebrated by the name of Neptune, Japetus, Typhon, Python, &c.

[The venerable name of Sir Isaac Newton must not be allowed to mislead the reader: the "Chronology" of that great man is not thought to be demonstrative, in every part. It may be doubted whether he ever finished it, as he kept it private many years; and it was published at last in consequence of a surreptitious copy, which had been obtained by a breach of confidence. It must, therefore, be consulted with caution.]

SHITRAI, שִׁטְרַי, Sarpai, steward, head, or judge; from שִׁטְרַי shoter: according to the Syriac, obligation, or contract. A Sharonite, superintendant of king David's shepherds, and flocks. 1 Chr. xxviii. 29.

SHITTIM, שִׁטִּים, Sarrêlv, that turn away, or divert; from שִׁטִּים shatah, or sita: otherwise, scourges, rods, or thorns; from שִׁטִּים shut.

[Undoubtedly, the Acacia tree: or a place abounding in that vegetable, The name of a city, (Beth-shitta) Judg. vii. 22. but more frequently the name of a station of the Israelites in the desert, where trees of this kind grew. Abel-Shittim, Numb. xxxiii. 49. "Abel of the Acacia trees."]

SHITTIM, or SETHIM, לֶחָיִים, ἄσπρτα, Ligna imputribilia: incorruptible wood. A valuable kind of wood, of which Moses made the greater part of the tables, altars, and planks, belonging to the tabernacle. Jerom generally keeps the Hebrew word Shittim, in his translation. He says, in Joel iii. ad finem, that the shittim shittim wood grows in the deserts of Arabia, that it is like white thorn in its colour and leaves, but not in its size; for the tree is so large, that it affords very long planks. The wood is hard, tough, smooth, without knots, and extremely beautiful; so that the rich and curious make screws of it for their presses. This kind of wood does not grow in cultivated places, nor in any other places of the Roman empire, but only in the deserts of Arabia. He says, likewise, in Mich. vi. 5. and in Isaiah xli. 19. that shittim wood resembles white thorn, and is of admirable beauty, solidity, strength, and smoothness. It is thought he means the black Acacia, which is (they say) the only tree found in the deserts of Arabia. Vide Bellon, Observat. lib. ii. cap. 56, 80. Ætius, lib. iv. cap. 11. It is so hard and solid, as to become almost incorruptible. When cut it is of the colour of a Lotos tree, and planks are taken from it, twelve cubits long. Its branches do not rise up in height; its leaves are round and large, like those of a pear tree; soot colour underneath, and green above.

Prosper Alpinus, apud Authores notarum in Theophrast. lib. iv. says, that the Acacia is called Sant by the Egyptians; that it is found in Egypt, in places distant from the sea; is very common about Mount Sinai, on the mountains which border on the Red-sea; that it grows about as tall as a mulberry-tree; its trunk is of the thickness of a plum-tree, its bark is black, rough, and covered with very sharp thorns. Its leaves are oblong, small, and very short. It bears a pale, yellowish, or whitish flower. The male bears no fruit, but is close set with thorns. The female bears fruit twice a year, and has much fewer thorns. This, they say, is the true description of the Acacia of Arabia. Thevenot, Voyage to the Levant, Part ii. cap. 36. speaking of the Acacia of Arabia, says, that it is not thicker, or higher, than our willows, but its leaves are very fine; that it is very thorny, and a gum is taken from it, which the Arabians call Akakia. But it is plain from Jerom's description of the shittim wood, that it cannot be this Acacia of Prosper Alpinus and Thevenot. Yet very credible authors affirm, that no other tree grows in the deserts of Arabia.

SHIZA, שִׁיזָא, this present; from מִן this, that, and שִׁי present: otherwise, present that expands; from שִׁי, and נָזַח to water, to spread. [From the Arabic, elation, i. e. joy of the family. 1 Chr. xi. 42.]

SHOBAB, שׁוֹבָב, returned, turned back; from שׁוֹב shub; otherwise, spark, according to the Syriac. [retribution, repayment?] Son of David and Bathsheba. 2 Sam. v. 14.

SHOBACH, שׁוֹבַח, your bonds, your chains, your nets, your gins; from שָׁבַח shabach, and the affix י ec: otherwise, his captivity; from the same shabach: or your conversion, your return; from שׁוֹב shub, to return, and from the pronoun י ec, your: a dove-house, according to the Syriac. General of the army of Hadadezar, king of Syria. David obtained a complete victory over him at Helam. 2 Sam. x. 16, 18, &c.— [Progressive augmentation, both in length and breadth; perhaps, in honours.]

SHOBAL, שׁוֹבָל, captivity; from שָׁבַח shabach, that sits down, that rests, or turns back; [or, is returned, i. e. by the Lord.] from שׁוֹב jashab.

SHOBAL, or SOBAL, of the race of the priests: returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel. Ezra ii. 42.

SHOBAL, שׁוֹבָל, way, ear of corn, thigh; from שׁוֹבֵל shobel: otherwise, old age, vain; from בָּלָה balah, to grow old, and שׁוֹאָה shovah, vain. [Increase. Son of Seir, Gen. xxxvi. 20. xxiv. 29.—A son of Caleb. 1 Chron. ii. 52.]

SHOBEL, שׁוֹבֵל, equalled to the vanity, or placed with the void; from שָׁוָה shavah, to place, to equal, and בֹּקֶן buk, void: otherwise, vain dissipation; from שׁוֹאָה shovah, vanity, and בֹּקֶן buk, dissipation. [forsaken. Neh. x. 25.]

SHOBI, שׁוֹבִי, conversion, captivity, rest. See SHOBAL.

SHOBI, or SOBI, son of Nahash, of the city of Rabbah, otherwise, Philadelphia. He came with Barzillai to meet David when he fled from Absalom, and brought him refreshments. 2 Sam. xvii. 27.

SHOES, vide SANDALS. Pythagoras would have his disciples wear shoes made of the bark of trees; probably, that they might not wear what were made of the skins of animals; as they refrained from the use of every thing that had life. The ancients had shoes which wholly covered their feet, like ours; and others which only defended the soles of their feet, with leather bands above, that left a part of the foot uncovered. The first sort was called Calceus, Mulleus, Pero, Phacassium; the latter were called Caliga, Solea, Crepida, Baxea, Sandaleum. Among the Romans their shoes were generally of crude, or untanned leather. None but those who had discharged the office of Edile, were allowed to wear the Mulleus, which was of leather dressed with allum, and of a red colour, [red-morocco.] It is said that the Roman senators also wore shoes of dressed leather, of a black colour. The Roman women wore shoes pretty much like those of the men. Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. vii. cap. 11. Juvenal, Sat. vii. speaks of the moon, or or Luxula, which was worn upon black shoes,

Adpositum nigro Lanam subtexit alato. 191.

[It was, originally, the numerical letter C. the mark of a hundred patricians, first established by Romulus.]

Isaiah, iii. 18, speaks also of the moons which the Jewish women wore on their shoes. The emperor Aurelian (Vopisc. in Aureliano, ad finem.) forbade the wearing of red, yellow, white, or green shoes by men, and allowed them to women only. Heliogabalus, by a proclamation, regulated what women should be permitted to wear gold, and precious stones, in their shoes. Among the Hebrews, women of fashion, and substance, wore very valuable shoes. [of which the instance of Judith affords proof, ch. xvi. 9.] But we know nothing of their particular ornaments.

The military dress, or shoe, for the feet, we see from Moses, was sometimes of metal. Thy shoes shall be iron and brass, says he, speaking of Asher, Dent. xxxiii. 25. And in the description of the armour of Goliath, we find he had boots of brass, 1 Sam. xvii. 6. Homer likewise gives them to his heroes; some had boots of brass, others of copper; and those of Hercules were of tinsel. Vegetius says, that the Romans wore iron shoes. The Roman soldiers also put nails under their shoes; very sharp, and in great numbers. Isidor. Origen, lib. xix. cap. ult. Festus calls them clavata calceamenta. Josephus, de Bello, lib. vii. cap. 3. speaks of a Roman soldier of such extraordinary boldness, as to let himself fall along the walls of the temple, because the nails he had under his shoes, which the rest of his comrades had also, would make him slide down. In the army of Antiochus the Great, luxury was so great, that most of the soldiers had golden nails under their shoes. Valer. Maxim. We are assured, that in the East, at this day, all the people, rich and poor, even the wives of the great Turk himself, and of his bashaws, wear iron plates at the heels, and toes of their shoes. Bellon. Observat. lib. iii. cap. 44.

SHOHAM, שֹׁהָם, an emerald, or other precious stone; from שֹׁהֵם shohem. Daughter of Merari, 1 Chr. xxiv. 27.

SHOPHAC, שֹׁפָח, who scatters, or is scattered; from שֹׁפַח shaphac. 1 Chr. xix. 16.

SHOPHAN, שֹׁפָן, rabbit, or wild rat; from שֹׁפָן shaphan: otherwise, that loosens, that breaks; from שֹׁפֵךְ shuph.

SHOPHAN, or SOPHAN, ZAPHON, or ZAPHAN, a city of Gad Numb. xxxii. 35. Josh.

xiii. 27. The Jews say, it was afterwards called Amath.

SHOPHETIM, שֹׁפְטִים, Judges; from שֹׁפֵט shaphat, to judge. The LXX. translate it by Kpetai, Judges. See JUDGES, Book of.

[The Phenicians and their colonies, gave to their supreme magistrates the title of Suffetes, which was most probably, analogous to the Shophetim of the Hebrew. But, the office of supreme magistrate implied, also, the power of directing the public force: hence some would render this term generals; or rather, champions, implying the personal prowess, or strength of the party; in which sense Samson, Jephthah, and others, judged, i. e. vindicated, delivered Israel: as men of valour they were looked up to, and consulted, rather than as legal Judges.—Comp. Gideon, Barak, &c.]

SHOSHANNIM, or SOSANIM; שֹׁשָׁנִים, Aquil. ἐπὶ τοῖς κρίνοις. Sym. ἐπὶ τῶν Ἀνθῶν. This title is before Psalms lxix. lxxx. The LXX. translate, those that shall be changed; Jerom and Aquila, the lilies; Symmachus, the flowers. We think Soshannim, from שֹׁשֶׁן shesh, to signify an instrument of six strings; or, a song of rejoicing.

SHOULDER. To give or lend his shoulder, for bearing a burden, signifies to submit to servitude. Gen. xlix. 15. "Issachar bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute." The Preacher advises his pupil to submit his shoulder to the yoke of wisdom. Eccles. vi. 26. The Messiah has delivered his people from the rod, or from the yoke to which they were subject, Isaiah ix. 4. Baruch ii. 21, advises the captive Jews at Babylon to submit their shoulders to king Nebuchadnezzar, that they might live more comfortably under his government. In a contrary sense, Scripture calls that a rebellious shoulder, Neh. ix. 29, which will not submit to the yoke; and those who bear the yoke with joint consent, servientes humero uno. Zeph. iii. 9.

Marks of honour and command were worn on the shoulder. Job, xxxi. 36, desires of God to decide his cause; "Surely I would take it upon my shoulder, and bind it as a crown to me." Isaiah, ix. 6. says that the Messiah shall bear the insignia of his government on his shoulder. God promises Eliakim son of Hilkiah, to give him "the key of the house of David, and to lay it upon his shoulder."

To be borne upon shoulders, sometimes stands for a kind of honour and distinction. God says, that when he shall bring back his people from the captivity of Babylon, he will give a signal to the people, "and they shall bring thy sons in their their arms, and thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders." Isaiah xlix. 22. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CLXI.

Sometimes on the contrary, this denotes great weakness, great disgrace. God commanded Ezekiel to make a breach in the wall, and carry out his goods thereby, on his shoulder, in the night-time; to represent the taking of Jerusalem, and the captivity of the king, and people. Ezek. xii. 6, 7. Isaiah, xiv. 25, and Baruch, vi. 3. to shew the impotence of idols, say, that men are obliged to carry them upon their shoulders.

[The respect paid by offering the shoulder of animals to God, and to men of distinction, as the most delicate part, should not be overlooked. So the shoulder of the heave offering at the consecration of priests was to be sanctified, Exod. xxix. 27, and the shoulder of the Nazirites' offering was to be waved, Numb. vi. 19. So Samuel shewed a mark of the greatest respect to Saul, by reserving the shoulder for his eating, 1 Sam. ix. 24. He treated him as king elect. It is likely, that the right shoulder had the pre-eminence; and this became the property of the priest who officiated. Comp. Lev. vii. 32, 34. viii. 35. ix. 21.—It might be eaten by the priest and his family in a clean place, Lev. x. 14.]

SHUAH, שׁוֹאֵה, Σοβέ, Σὺέ. See SHUAH infra.

II. SHUAH, sixth son of Abraham and Keturah. Gen. xxv. 2.

SHUAH, שׁוֹאֵה Σαὐά, that cries, that prays; from שׁוֹאֵה shuah: otherwise, rich, magnificent; from the same: otherwise, that beholds; from שׁוֹאֵה shahah.

[Shuah seems to be allied to Jehoshua, help, or helper; hence we have Malchi-shuah, son of Saul, q. King's-help: 1 Chron. viii. 33. ix. 39. 1 Sam. xiv. 49. Of the same import may be the feminine שׁוֹאֵה, SHUAH, of Asher, daughter to Heber. 1 Chron. vii. 32.

Simon thinks that Shuah, שׁוֹאֵה, has a directly reverse meaning, and signifies depression, prostration, especially of the father; from a root which has this import, Prov. xii. 25. Psalm xxxviii. 7. xlii. 6. el al. but, this seems to be contrary to the notion of a son, in the east; which is, certainly, the parent's joy.]

III. SHUAH, daughter of Hirah the Adullamite, and wife to the patriarch Judah. She was mother of Er, Onan, and Shelah. Gen. xxxviii. 2. The Jews have a tradition, that Shuah inspired into her sons the detestable resolution, of preventing Tamar from becoming a mother by them. See TAMAR and ER. The "Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs" calls this woman Bath-shuah, daughter of Barshan, king of Adullam.

VOL. II. PART XXVII. Edit. IV.

SHUAH, שׁוֹאֵה, Σοά, pit, or that swims; from שׁוֹאֵה shechath: otherwise, humiliation, meditation; or word; from שׁוֹאֵה shuach, or שׁוֹאֵה shachah.

SHUAH, brother of Caleb. 1 Chron. iv. 11.

SHUAL, שׁוֹאֵל, fox, hand, fist; from שׁוֹאֵל shahal, or שׁוֹאֵל, according to different readings: otherwise, traces, way; from שׁוֹאֵל meshol. [JACKALL.]

SHUAL, or SUAL, a country in Israel, which the Philistines invaded in the time of Saul. 1 Sam. xiii. 17. The situation of it is not known.

SHUBAEL, שׁוֹבֵאֵל, conversion, return, rest, or captivity of God; from שׁוֹב shub, conversion, rest, or שׁוֹב shabah, captivity, and אֵל el, God. [great retribution, in the sense of reward.]

SHUBAEL, or SUBAEL, son of Amram, and father of Jehdeiah. 1 Chron. xxiv. 20. Shubael, with his twelve sons, were the thirteenth in order among the twenty-four families of the Levites. 1 Chron. xxv. 20.

SHUHAM, שׁוֹחָם, Σαυή, their word, their meditation, their humiliation; from שׁוֹחָם shuach, or שׁוֹחָם shachach: otherwise, their ditch; from שׁוֹחָם shichah. [hasty: over-hasty: born prematurely]]

SHUHAM, or SUHAM, son of Hushim, Gen. xli. 23. and grandson of Dan: head of a family. Numb. xxvi. 42.

SHUHITE, or SUITE. Bildad the Shuhite, the friend of Job. Job ii. 11, was probably a descendant from Shuah, son of Abraham and Keturah. The Hebrew reads שׁוֹחִי, Shuchite, or son of Shuach, which is the same as Shuah, according to our way of reading.

SHULAMITE, שׁוֹלֵמִית, pacific, perfect, that recompenses; from שׁוֹלֵם shalam.

SHULAMITE, or SULAMITE. This name is given to the spouse in the Canticles, in allusion to the name of Solomon; Salomon, Sulomith, Sulamite, or Shulamite, i. e. spouse of Solomon. Cant. vi. 13. [A feminine word, of which Solomon is the masculine.] The Hebrew text, and the best Latin editions, read Sulamitis; but the greater part of the old books have Sunamitis, q. a native of Sunam, or Shunem.

SHUMATHITES, שׁוֹמָתִי, Σαμαθί, inhabitants of Shema, Josh. xv. 26. Also sons of Shabal, 1 Chron. ii. 53. Named, or put; from שׁוֹמָתִי shem: otherwise, desolate, or astonished; from שׁוֹמָתִי shamam. One of the six families or colonies from Kirjath-jearim.

SHUNAM, שׁוֹנָם, their change, their repeating; from שׁוֹנָם shanah: otherwise, their second; from שׁוֹנָם sheni, and the pronoun is am, theirs: or, sleep; from שׁוֹנָם sham, to sleep.

SHUNAMITE, or SUNAMITE, a female native of Shunem. This surname was given to 2 A div. 2 Abishag,

Abishag, the spouse of David, married in his old age to keep him warm, 1 Kings i. 2, 15. ii. 17, 21, 22. Also, to the hostess of Elisha, who entertained that prophet when he came to Shunem. 2 Kings iv. 12, 25, 36. It is given to the spouse in Canticles vi. 13. by a corrupt reading, of Sulamitis, instead of Sulamitis. See SHULAMITE.

SHUNEM, שֻׁנֶם, see SHUNAM.

SHUNEM, or SUNAM, a city of Issachar. Josh. xix. 18. The Philistines encamped at Shunem, in the great field or plain; 1 Sam. xxviii. 4. and king Saul encamped at Gilboa. Eusebius places Shunem, or Sulem, five miles from Tabor, south. Elsewhere he mentions a place called Sanim, in Acrabatene, in the neighbourhood of Sebaste, or Samaria.

SHUNI, שֻׁנִי, Σανίς, my change, my second, my repetition. See SHUNAM. [STILL.]

SHUNI, or SUNI, third son of Gad, head of a family. Gen. xlii. 16. Numb. xxvi. 15.

SHUPHAM, שֻׁפָּחַם, Σοφάρ, beard; from שֻׁפָּה shapham: otherwise, their lip, their brink; from שֻׁפָּחַם shuphak: otherwise, that breaks them; from שֻׁפָּה shuph, that breaks, and שֻׁפָּחַם am, theirs. Son of Bela, and grandson of Benjamin. 1 Chron. viii. 5. [Shephuphan, but in Numb. xxvi. 39. Shuphan.]

SHUPPIM, שֻׁפִּים, beard, mustachoes: otherwise, their lips, or their brims; from שֻׁפָּה shaphah, lip, brim: otherwise, their breaking; from שֻׁפָּה shuph, to break, and שֻׁפָּחַם am, theirs. [Son of Ir, 1 Chron. vii. 12.]

SHUR, שֹׁר, wall, or, or that beholds; from שֹׁר shur, or shor, according to different readings.

SHUR, or SUR, a city in Arabia Petraea, which gave name to the desert of Shur. Gen. xvi. 7. Exod. xv. 22. 1 Sam. xv. 7. xxvii. 8. Ptolemy speaks of the city of Suratte, in Arabia Petraea.

SHUSHAN, שֻׁשָׁן, Σουσῶν, a city, Dan. viii. 2. Vulgate, Susa.—Lily, or rose; from שֻׁשָׁן shoshan: otherwise, joy, from שֻׁשָׁן shush.

I. SHUSHAN, or SUSAN: Hebrew שֻׁשָׁן, It is read before Psalm lx.—We think Shushan to be the name of a musical instrument of six strings. The Vulgate reads, Pro his qui immutabuntur.

II. SHUSHAN, Susan, or Suses, the capital city of Susiana, or the country of Elam, i. e. Persia; Dan. viii. 2. Daniel always calls it the palace. "I was at Shushan in the palace:" [q. Shushan royal?] because the kings of Chaldaea had here a royal palace. After Cyrus, the kings of Persia usually passed the winter here, and the summer at Ecbatana. Vide Strabo, lib. xv. Xenophon, Cyrus, lib. viii. Athen. lib. vii. &c. The winter was very moderate at Shushan, but the heat of the summer was so great, that the very lizards and serpents if surprised by it in the streets, were even burned up by the heat of the sun. Strabo, lib. xv. This city stands on the river Uai. Here Daniel had the vision of the ram with two horns, and the goat with one horn, &c. in the third year of Belshazzar. Dan. viii. A. M. 3447, ante A. D. 557.

Also, in this city of Shushan, the history of Esther happened. Here Ahasuerus, or Darius, son of Hystaspes, generally resided and reigned. Esth. i. Pliny, lib. vi. cap. 27. says, he rebuilt Shushan, enlarged, and adorned it. Nehemiah was also at Shushan, when he obtained from king Artaxerxes permission to return into Judea, and to repair the walls of Jerusalem. Neh. i. 1. Benjamin of Tudela, and Abulfarage, place the tomb of Daniel at Chuzestan, which is the ancient city of Shushan, the capital of the province of Elam. See FRAGS., No. DLXXXVII.

This city at this day, among the Persians, is named Touster or Shouther, and is the capital of Chusistan. King Sapor caused a bank of prodigious height to be formed here, to raise the water of the river Choaspes. D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 464, 829, 896. The Tarikmontekes says, that the tomb of the prophet Daniel was still to be seen here in his time. Some Persian historians ascribe the foundation of this city to Huschenk, son of Siamech, the second prince of the first dynasty of Persia.

[Shouster, says Mr. Kinneir, Mem. Persia, p. 97. is generally believed to be the ancient Susa; but, he rather thinks the ruins about thirty-five miles west of Shouster, are those of that ancient residence of royalty,—“stretching not less, perhaps, than twelve miles, from one extremity to the other.”—[the original MS. says, “I am sure, upwards of twelve miles.”] They occupy an immense space between the rivers Kerali and Abzal; and like the ruins of Cteziphon, Babylon, and Kusa, consist of hillocks of earth and rubbish, covered with broken pieces of brick and coloured tile. The largest is a mile in circumference, and nearly one hundred feet in height: another, not quite so high, is double the circuit. They are formed of clay and pieces of tile, with irregular layers of brick and mortar, five or six feet in thickness, to serve, as it should seem, as a kind of prop to the mass. Large blocks of marble, covered with hieroglyphics, are not unfrequently here discovered by the Arabs, when digging in search of hidden treasure; and at the foot of the most elevated of the pyramids (ruins) stands the tomb of Daniel, a small, and apparently a modern building, erected on the spot where the relics of that prophet are believed to rest.” Major Rennell coincides in the opinion that these ruins represent the ancient Shusa; but Dr. Vincent held to Shouster. Shusa signifies in the old Persian dialect, pleasing or agreeable; Shouster signifies more pleasing, more agreeable. This comparison seems to imply a later origin; and, in fact, the building of Shouster is ascribed to the Roman emperor Valerian, and his troops, when captive. "The site of Shusa is now a gloomy wilderness, infested by lions, hyenas, and other beasts of prey. The dread of these furious animals compelled Mr. Monteith and myself, (says Mr. K.) to take shelter for the night, within the walls that encompass Daniel's Tomb."]

Lightfoot says, de Templo, cap. 3. that the outward gate of the eastern wall of the temple, was called the gate of Shushan; and that on this gate was carved the figure of the city of Shushan, in acknowledgement of the decree granted at Shushan, by Darius son of Hystaspes, which permitted the rebuilding of the temple. [As I can hardly bring myself to admit the representation of a city—a heathen city—carved on, or about, the temple—Query—Whether this was not the arms, or insignia, of the city Shushan?—as, for instance, three lilies, proper.]

SHUTHELAH, שְׁתִּילָה, plant, or verdure; from שִׁטְלָה shuth, and לָחֶלֶק lach, verdure: otherwise, moist pot; from שְׁתִּילָה shuthah, to drink, or drinking-pot, and לָחֶלֶק lach, moist. Son of Ephraim, and father of Bared. Head of a family. Numb. xxvi. 35.

SHAH, שָׁחָה, motion; from שָׁחָה shahah: or, according to the Syriac, help, or assistance; from שָׁחָה siha. A Nethinim. Ezra ii. 44.

SIBBECHAI, or SOBAICHAI, of the city of Hushathi, a hero of David's army. He killed the giant Saph in the battle at Gob, otherwise, Gazer. 2 Sam. xxi. 18. [dreaded.]

SIBBOLETH, see SHIBBOLETH.

SIBRAIM, or SABARIM; a place which terminated the land of promise, north. Ezekiel says, xlvii. 16, that this city was between the confines of Hamath and Damascus. I imagine it to be that which Ismael Abulfeda calls Hovvarin, a village of the country of Ems, or Hamath, south-east of that city.

SIBYLS. Scripture no where mentions the Sibyls; and all that is said of them has so little certainty, that we ought not to spend much time about them. The word Sibyl is Greek, (Σίβυλλα, quasi Σάδς βάλη, Jovis consilium; Σέβη pro Δίος, Lacanicè, according to most etymologists;) and signifies the counsel of God. The Sibyls among the pagans were, they say, what prophets and prophetesses, were among the Hebrews. They foretold future events; and revealed important truths to the people. They are generally reckoned ten; the Cumæan, the Cumæan, the Persian, the Hellespontian, the Lybian, the Samian, the Delphian, the Phrygian, the Tiburtine, and the Erythrean.

Clement Alexandrinus, Strom. lib. vi. quotes these words as from St. Paul; "take the Greek books in your hands, read the Sibyls, and see what they say of the unity of God, and how they foretel what is to come, and you will there clearly find the Son of God." Several of the ancient fathers cited verses ascribed to the Sibyls, and drew from them arguments in favour of the Christian religion. But the more skilful critics of our days, are persuaded, that these verses were composed afterwards, and were never known to the Sibyls. See Blondel on the Sibyls, Causabon against Baronius, Exercit. i. sec. 10. cap. 11. Erasm. Schmith, Dissert. de Sibyllis. M. du Pin, Proleg. to the Bible. Servat. Gallæus, Sibyllina Oracula. Amstelod. 1689. Item Dissertationes in Sibyllis, Amstelod. 1688.

Plato, in Phædro. Aristotle, de Admirandis. Varro, Dionysius Halycarnassæus, Cicero, Livy, speak honourably of the Sibyls. Virgil without doubt took from the Sibylline verses, what he says concerning the birth of the Messiah: for one can hardly apply to any other birth, these verses of his fourth eclogue.

Ultima Cumæi venit jam carminis ætas,
Magnus ab integro sæclorum nascitur ordo,
Jam redit et Virgo, redeunt Saturnia regna,
Jam nova progenies cœlo dimittitur alto, &c.

From the same source Suetonius derived what he says, "That in the time of Vespasian there was a constant and general opinion propagated throughout the East, that the Fates had decreed, that about that time should come forth out of Judea, those who should obtain the empire of the world." Vide FRAGS. No. CCCXXXII. Josephus, who lived in the time of Vespasian, quotes in his history, a passage from the Sibyls, referring to the deluge. Antiq. lib. i. cap. 5. Justin Martyr, Athenagoras, Theophilus of Antioch, Tertullian, Lactantius, Eusebius, Jerom, Austin, and others, made good, and frequent, use of them against the pagans; which occasioned the name of Sibyllists to be applied to them. Vide Orig. lib. vii. contra Celsum.

This is more than enough to justify us, for inserting a short account of these famous and ancient prophetesses. Their lives and times are not well known. The most famous, was the Erythrean, so named by the Greeks, because she was born at Erythra in Ionia; and, because she left her country, and came to settle at Cuma in Italy, the Latins named her Cumana. Justin Martyr, cohortatio ad Græcos, says, "it was pretended that she was by extraction of Babylonia, and daughter to Berosus the Chaldean historian. Coming, it is not known how, into Campania, she there gave forth her oracles, at a city called Cuma, about six miles from Baia. I have seen the place, (adds he)—it is a large oratory cut out of a rock, which must have cost much labour to make; for it is very well worked, and very capacious. There this Sibyl gave her responses, as I was informed by the inhabitants of the place, who preserve the tradition from father to son. In the middle of the grotto they shewed me three hollow places, which were also cut out of the rock, where they said she used to bathe herself, when they were filled with water. After she had dressed herself, she withdrew into the most remote apartment of the grotto, which was a kind of cell, cut also out of the rock, and there placing herself upon an elevated seat, which projected into the middle of the cell, she pronounced her oracles"

We are assured by Onuphrius, lib. de Sibyllis, et carminibus Sibyllinis, that this cave was in the same condition till A. D. 1539, at which time a great earthquake shook the whole country of Campania, and at Puteoli threw up from the bottom of the sea great masses of sand, gravel, and bituminous matter, which overwhelmed the cave of the Sibyl. If this, of whom we are speaking, were daughter to Berosus the Babylonian she must have lived after Alexander the Great. Virgil places her at the time of the siege of Troy, since he makes Æneas consult her at his coming into Italy. Others place her in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus, the last king of Rome. [This Sibyl's grotto was not so utterly ruined in 1539 but what it is shewn to modern tourists, and answers the description of Justin; as well as the reports of tradition.]

Dionysius Halicarnassensis, lib. iv. Aulus Gellius, Noct. Attic. lib. i. cap. 19. Lactantius, de falsu Relig. lib. i. cap. 6, &c. relate, that under the reign of the last Tarquin, there came a strange woman to Rome, who offered the king nine volumes of Sibylline oracles, for which she asked three hundred pieces of gold. Tarquin refused to give her this sum, on which she instantly burned three of the nine volumes, and for the remaining six demanded the same sum. Tarquin continuing to refuse her, with great derision, she burnt three more of them in his presence, and still insisted on having the three hundred pieces of gold for the remaining three volumes. A proceeding so extraordinary made Tarquin suspect some mystery in it. He therefore sent to inquire of the augurs, their opinion about it. They answered him, that what he had so despised was a present sent him from the gods; that it was great pity he had not bought the whole nine volumes, and urged him to give the woman what she asked, for the remaining three. He did so, the woman delivered him the books, and advised that they might be carefully preserved, as containing the future destiny of Rome.

After these words, she withdrew, and none knew what became of her. Tarquin caused these three books to be enclosed in a kind of stone chest, and to be placed in a subterraneous vault in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and committed to the care of two persons of the first quality in Rome; who were charged to let nobody read them, or copy them, without express orders from the king. After the abolition of kingly government at Rome, they continued the same regard for these books as before, and they became one of the greatest secrets of policy; the rulers making the people believe, that whatever they judged proper was taken out of these books; which were never consulted, or opened, but by express order from the senate.

While the civil war raged between Marius and Sylla, (Plutarch, in Sylla. Dionys. Halicarn. lib. iv. Appian. de Bell. Civil. lib. i. Tacit. Histor. lib. iii. cap. 72.) an accidental fire destroyed the capitol, and consumed the Sibylline books. After some years, when the capitol was rebuilt, Scribonius Curio, the consul, proposed to the senate to restore the verses of the Sibyls. Some verses of the Erythrean Sibyl were reported to be extant in the city of Erythra, the place of her nativity. Three senators were deputed to go thither, who there collected about a thousand Greek verses, which passed for her prophecies. These they brought to Rome; and at the same time made other collections from other places. The whole was laid up in the capitol, instead of those which the fire had consumed. Lactant. de falsa Relig. lib. vi. et de ira Dei, c. 22. et de falsa Sapient. c. 17.

But several copies of these verses being in circulation, and their proprietors making such additions to copies as they thought fit; to preserve the credit of these books, the Romans forbade private persons, on pain of death, from keeping copies. These orders were but ill observed, and Augustus at the commencement of his office of Pontifex Maximus, (Tacit. Annal. vi. Justin Martyr, Apolog. ii.) renewed the former prohibitions, and made diligent search after those copies, examined them strictly, and caused all to be burned which were judged to have been corrupted; the others he deposited in the capitol, with those that were there before. Afterwards, Tiberius made a new review of them, them, and condemned several volumes to the flames. And these Sibylline oracles were in vogue till about A. D. 399, when they were entirely destroyed.

What occasioned their destruction was this: some time previous a prophecy was handed about in Rome, says Aug. de Civit. Dei. lib. xviii. cap. 53, 54. taken, as was pretended, from the books of the Sibyls, which foretold, that the Christian religion being founded on the sorceries of Peter, should not continue above 365 years. This period fell on A. D. 398, which is 368 years from the ascension of Jesus Christ. Yet the Christian religion continued as prosperous as ever. The emperor Honorius therefore, taking occasion from this piece of Pagan malice, ordered Stilico, the year following, to cause all the books of the Sibyls to be burned, which was executed in 399: and they pulled down the temple of Apollo to its very foundations, wherein these pretended prophecies had been kept.

Yet this has not prevented the appearing of a collection of Greek verses, in eight books, under the title of "Oracles of the Sibyls." But this is neither the old book of the Sibyls, known at Rome from the time of Tarquin; nor the collection made after the civil wars of Marius and Sylla; nor that reformed and purified by Augustus. It may include a part of the Sibylline oracles, as in the time of Augustus, and afterwards; but the rest is a rhapsody put together by some Christian, with so little wit and discretion, that the imposture stares one in the face every moment. He makes the Sibyl say, for instance, that she was wife to one of the three sons of Noah, and that she had lived with him in the ark during the whole of the deluge. lib. iii. in fine. The author shews himself a Christian, in a passage which begins with these words; Nos igitur Christi de stirpe creati. lib. viii. He speaks of the incarnation, of the birth, of the circumcision, of the resurrection, of the ascension of Jesus Christ, with as much accuracy as the Evangelists. He describes the reign of Jesus Christ upon earth, according to the millenaries. lib. ii. iii. He gives a succession of the Roman emperors, in their order, from Julius Cæsar to Antoninus Pius, and to the adoption of Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus. lib. v. All which proves, that these books, in the state in which we now have them, were composed about the middle of the second century.

[Dr. Lardner has a judicious article on the Sibyls' books, as now extant. It may be thought, that since the time when they were quoted by the Fathers, considerable additions have been made to them. But, it is now impossible to separate the later from the earlier; and the most early are certainly no more related to the ancient Sibylline oracles, than the Mother Shipton's prophecies among ourselves are, to genuine English History. It is possible, that the originals were collections from Oriental sources; from which, certainly, Virgil drew, though distantly. The intercourse of the East with the West was much more frequent than the learned in general allow, or imagine.]

SICAMINUM, otherwise, ΕΡΦΑ, or ΚΕΡΦΑ, or CAIPHA, a city at the foot of mount Carmel, on the Mediterranean sea, over against Ptolemais, which is distant from it only the extent of its harbour. See CAIPHA.

SICERA, שכר, Σικέρα, whatever can intoxicate. Heb. Shechar. Deut. xxix. 6. This word denotes, in particular, the wine of the palm-tree.

SICHAR, Σιχαρ. Jerom pretends this is the fault of the copiers, who read Sichar instead of Sichem. From שכר shicar, drunkenness.

SICHAR, or SHECHEM, now NAPLOUSE, a city of Samaria. See SHECHEM, SAMARIA.

The Hebrews gave the name of Sichar, (i. e. drunkenness) to the city of Shechem, by way of mockery. Isaiah, xxviii. 1. calls the Israelites of Ephraim, Sicchorim, i. e. drunkards. This gave occasion to the Jews to change the name of Shechem into Sichar, [or, was, at least, analogous to that change.]

SICYON, Σικυών. Some Greek copies have Σικυόνη, Sicyone, a place where cucumbers grow; from σίκυος, a cucumber.

SICYON, a city of Peloponnesus, or of Achaia, to which the Romans wrote in favour of the Jews. 1 Macc. xv. 23.

SIDE, Latus. The evangelist John tells us, xix. 34. that when Jesus Christ was upon the cross, his side was pierced by a soldier with his spear, or lance, from which wound proceeded water and blood: This soldier is generally called Longinus, and they make a saint of him. Comp. LONGINUS. St. John does not acquaint us which of his two sides was pierced. The Arabic and Ethiopic versions, and the Gospel of the Infancy, translated from the Arabic, with some of the ancients, read the right side; apud Creniam, Parte ii. Animadvers. p. 165. But others think, that he was pierced on his left side; Luc. Brugens. Franc. Collins, alii. The poet Prudentius says, that he was pierced from side to side; Per utrumque Latus!

SIDE, Σίδη, hunting, nets, ambush; from טד טדאד tsadah: otherwise, viaticum, provision, nourishment; from טד טדא tsud. The Greek σίδη, signifies a pomegranate, or the pomegranate tree.

SIDE, a city of Pamphilia. The senate of Rome wrote to the inhabitants of Side, in favour of the Jews. 1 Macc. xv. 23.

SIDON,

SIDON, ציד, hunting, fishing, venison; from ציד ציד, or ציד צידה. [abundant prey, whether of fish, or game.]

I. SIDON, or TZIDON, the eldest son of Canaan, Gen. x. 15, founder of Sidon.

II. SIDON, or Zidon, a very ancient and famous city of Phenicia, Strabo, lib. xvi. places Sidon four hundred stadia from Berytus, and two hundred from Tyre.

The name Sidon is commonly derived from the Hebrew or Tyrian word ציד Zada, which signifies to fish. Joshua, xi. 8, calls it Sidon the Great, by way of eminence. Hence some have thought, that in his time there were two Sidons, a greater and a lesser. But no geographer has mentioned any other Sidon, than Sidon the Great. Joshua assigned Sidon to the tribe of Asher, chap. xix. 28. but Asher could never get possession of it, Judg. i. 31. It is situated on the Mediterranean, in a fine country, one day's journey from Ptolemais, or from the fountains of Jordan: Joseph. Antiq. lib. v. cap. 2. It has a fine harbour. Abulfeda places it sixty-six miles from Damascus. This city has always been famous for its great trade, and navigation. At present it is called Zaidè. There are extant ancient medals of Sidon, whereon are seen the old Phenician characters, which are the same as the Hebrew characters before the captivity of Babylon. The principal deities of the Sidonians were Baal, and Astarte; or, the sun, and moon: also Hercules. The Hebrews often fell into the idolatry of the Phenicians, especially after Ahab, king of Israel, married Jezebel, daughter of Eshbaal, king of the Zidonians. 1 Kings xvi. 31. There is frequent mention of this city in the Scriptures. Comp. PLATE, MEDALS of SIDON.

[It deserves notice that Sidon was the master of Tyre, Isaiah xxiii. 12. consequently the more ancient city; and Homer who often mentions Sidon, says nothing of Tyre.]

MEARAH of the SIDONIANS, Josh. xiii. 4. a city probably very near Sidon. Others think it was a cavern, as מצוה, Mearah, may signify.

SIGIONOTH. See SHIGGAION.

SIGN: whatever serves to express, or represent, another thing; as, when the Lord gave to Noah the rainbow, as a sign of his covenant, Gen. ix. 12, 13.—When he appointed circumcision to Abraham, as the seal of the covenant made with him, and his posterity, Gen. xvii. 11. The sun and the moon are appointed by God for signs, and seasons. Gen. i. 14. [Often rendered token, Eng. Tr.]

2. SIGN is put for a miracle: Thou shalt do these signs, and wonders, in the midst of Egypt, says the Lord to Moses; Exod. iv. 7, 8, 9. and, if the Egyptians do not believe the first sign, they will believe the second, &c. The word is very frequent in this sense, in Scripture.

3. SIGN, or token, is often put for the proof, or evidence of a thing: So Exod. iii. 18. "This shall be a token (or sign) unto thee, that I have sent thee." Judg. vi. 17. "Shew me a sign, that thou talkest with me," i. e. a proof. 2 Kings xx. 8. "What shall be the sign (or evidence) that the Lord will heal me?" This acceptation agrees with the first mentioned; also Gen. iv. 15. "And the Lord set a mark (a sign) upon Cain;" he put a token upon him that he might be known, [rather, he gave him a sign of security to ease his mind: says SMUCKFORD.] but vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCCXII.

4. SIGNS of Heaven; SIGNS of the Magicians; phenomena of the heavens; impostures of magicians, employed to deceive the unwary. The Lord "frustrateth the tokens (or signs) of the liars, and maketh diviners mad." Isaiah xlv. 25. And Jer. x. 2. "Be not dismayed at the signs of Heaven, for the heathen are dismayed at them."

5. SIGN. Isaiah, viii. 18. "Behold, I and the children whom the Lord hath given me, are for signs and for wonders in Israel;" i. e. what shall happen to me, becomes a prophetic similitude of what shall happen to the people. See also Ezek. iv. 3. The Lord pours down his vengeance upon sinners, and makes them a sign, a public and evident proof of his wrath. Ezek. xiv. 8.

SIGNAL, or sign, set up on the mountains in time of danger. See POSTS; also, OLIVES, Mount of. Add.

SIHON, שִׁחֹן, rooting out; from שִׁחַן nasach, otherwise, conclusion.

SIHON, or SEHON, king of the Amorites, not only refusing passage to the Hebrews, but coming to attack them, was himself slain, and his army routed. Numb. xvi. 21, 22. Deut. i. 4, 11, 24, 26, 30. Psalm cxxxv. 11. cxxxvi. 19. Heshbon his capital city was taken, and his dominions were distributed among Israel. This happened in the last year of Moses's life; some months before the Israelites entered the Land of Promise; A. M. 2558, ante A. D. 1451. Moses observes, that Si-hon had conquered from the Moabites, the best part of the country he then possessed, and had settled himself in their place. On this account, in the time of Jephthah, the Ammonites and Moabites demanded that country which Israel had formerly conquered from Si-hon, pretending it belonged to them. Judges x. 18. But Jephthah answered, that Moses and the Hebrews having taken it from Si-hon, Sihon, who was then in peaceable possession of it; and having conquered it in open war, it belonged to Israel; and that neither Moab nor Ammon had any right to it.

SIHOR, שִׁחֹר, שִׁחֹר, black, trouble, or early in the morning; from שִׁחֹר shachar

I. SIHOR, or SICHOR, a name of the Nile, Josh. xiii. 3. a fluvio turbido. Heb. a fluvio Sichor, שִׁחֹר. Vide Jer. ii. 18. The water of the Nile is generally turbid. See NILE.

II. SIHOR. This is thought to be a city in the western part of the tribe of Asher. It cannot be far from Carmel. M. Reland imagines, (Palastin. lib. iii. p. 780.) that this may be the city, or the river of Crocodiles, which Pliny, lib. v. cap. 19. and Strabo, lib. xvi. place in this country. Strabo says, it is between Ptolemais and the tower of Straton, or Caesarea of Palestine. The Hebrew reads שִׁחֹר-לִבְנָת, Shihor-libnath. Josh. xix. 26. and we think Libnah to be "the white promontory," between Ecdippe and Tyre, Pliny, lib. v. cap. 19. and that Sihor is a rivulet of this neighbourhood.

SILAS, ΣΙΛΑΣ, the third; from שָׁלַשׁ shalash, three, or the third: thought to be the same as Silvanus; which signifies one that loves the woods or forests.

SILAS, was, according to St. Luke, Acts xv. 22. one of the chief men among the brethren; which leads us to judge, that he was of the number of the seventy. On occasion of a dispute at Antioch, about observance of the legal ceremonies, Paul, and Barnabas, were chosen to go to Jerusalem, to advise with the apostles on this question: and returned with Judas and Silas. He is believed by Jerom, Grot. Fromond. to be the Silas mentioned by the name of Sylvanus, in the two Epistles of St. Paul to the Thessalonians. St. Peter sent his first Epistle by him, wherein he styles him "a faithful brother." Silas joined himself to St. Paul; and after Paul and Barnabas had parted, Acts xv. 37-41. A. D. 51. Silas accompanied St. Paul, to visit the churches of Syria and Cilicia. Thence they passed into Lycaonia, Phrygia, and Galatia; and lastly, into Macedonia. Vide PAUL.

At Philippi, they found a woman who was possessed with a spirit of Python, which the apostle dispossessed from her. Hereupon her masters seized Paul and Silas, dragged them before the [strategoi, military officers.] magistrates, and accused them of introducing customs, contrary to those of the Romans. They ordered Paul and Silas to be publicly whipped, and imprisoned. In the night there was a great earthquake; and the jailer was converted, and received baptism with his whole family. The day following orders were brought to liberate Paul and Silas; but Paul replied, that Roman citizens were not to be so treated; and that they themselves should come and liberate them. These words seem to infer that Silas also was a freeman of Rome.

From Philippi they went to Thessalonica and Berea. St. Paul proceeding to Athens, he sent for Silas thither, who however did not join him again till they met at Corinth, A. D. 52. Here they wrote the two Epistles to the Thessalonians. Silas was very useful in preaching the Gospel, 2 Cor. i. 19. The Roman Martyrology places the feast of St. Silas July 13. Ado says, he died in Macedonia, and seems to hint, by martyrdom. The Greeks improperly distinguish between Silas and Sylvanus; and put both their feasts, July 30. Some refer to Silas, what St. Paul says to the Corinthians; 2 Cor. viii. 18, 19. "And we have sent with him the brother, whose praise is in the gospel, throughout all the churches: And not that only, but who was also chosen of the churches to travel with us, with this grace which is administered by us, to the glory of the same Lord," &c. [Some have thought Silas was the same as the evangelist St. Luke: Silas referring to woods, and Lucus to groves, but, this is very unlikely.]

SILAS and CARPUS. It is pretended, that these were the two disciples sent by John the Baptist to Jesus to enquire whether he were the Christ? Matth. xi. Not that he doubted it, but to give these two disciples an opportunity of knowing our Saviour, of being instructed by him, and of being satisfied who he was. See Gerhard. Comment. ad Matth. xi. et Baron. not. in Martyrol. Rom. Jul. 18. et Octob. 13.

SILENCE. This word does not only signify ordinary silence, or not speaking; but also in the style of the Hebrews, "to be quiet, to remain immoveable." Exod. xv. 16. כָּחַל כָּחַל, "as still as a stone." Vulgate, Fiant immobiles quasi lapis. Lam. ii. 18. "Give thyself no rest; let not the apple of thine eye cease," i. e. to shed tears. Josh. x. 12, 13. "Sun, stand thou still (Heb. be silent) upon Gibeon. And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed," or were silent. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CLIV.

II. SILENCE is taken for an entire ruin and destruction, for a total subjection, Isai. xv. 1. נִדְּמָה עַד. "Ar of Moab is laid waste, and brought to silence," i. e. utterly destroyed. "The Lord our God hath put us to silence, or, has brought great calamities upon us. Jer. viii. 14.

III. SILENCE is taken for death and the grave: Psalm xciv. 17. "Unless the Lord had been been my help, my soul had almost dwelt in silence.

[SILENCE imports something more than mere endurance; so, "Aaron held his peace," under the dreadful privation of his sons, Lev. x. 3. he acquiesced in the propriety of the judgment, as well as supported himself against what he could not help. The word used imports a continuation of silence; no complaint, no after-murmuring.

There is a remarkably poetic instance of silence, Job iv. 18.

A matter was suggested to me—by stealth, as it were,
My ear received a mere particle of it.
Amid the reveries which precede nocturnal dreams,
'Ere sleep to utter insensibility falls on man;
A palpitation and shivering crept over me,
And all my bones thrilled with agitation.
A spirit glided before my face,
(Every hair of my head stood erect!)
It fixed motionless—(yet I could not discern a lineament of it—)
Its phantom form, direct before my eyes—
Silence was hush'd,—I heard the gentlest whisper (saying)
"Shall mortal man be more just than God?
Shall a man be more pure than his Maker," &c.

The preparation for this vision—the succession of ideas—the varied uniformity of expression—the breaks, are all grand, and masterly: in its original language its effect must have been wonderfully fine.

A silence, of a character directly opposite, occurs in the Revelations; under the sixth seal—"a great multitude which no man could number, of all nations, and kindred, and peoples, and tongues, cried with a loud voice Salvation to our God! &c. He opened the seventh seal—and silence was in heaven."—The contrast is uncommonly grand; but must have been most strongly felt by those accustomed to the hymns, &c. attending sacrifices. Comp. Milton's Paradise Lost, book vii.]

SILK, Sericum, is not mentioned in the Latin text, except in three places. (1) Esth. viii. 15. Mordecai being promoted to Haman's place, was clothed in a mantle of silk, [Eng. trans. "In royal apparel of blue and white, and with a great crown of gold, and with a garment of fine linen and purple."] (2) Ezekiel, xxvii. 16. places silk among the merchandise brought to Tyre. (3) St. John, Rev. xviii. 12. speaking of the downfall of Rome, says, that no longer any silk shall be seen there, nor other rich merchandize. But the Hebrew רִבְּוֹ, buz, which in Esther is translated Sericum, signifies rather the true Byssus. Vide Byssus. Ramoth, רָמֹת, which in the Vulgate is rendered by Sericum, according to the Chaldee signifies precious stones; according to Aquila works of silk; according to modern interpreters, Coral.

But it is generally thought, that the Hebrew מֶשֶׁה Meshi, Ezek. xvi. 10. which Jerom has translated by subtilia, fine linen, signifies silk. [מֶשֶׁה, Meshi. Vulgate, Subtilibus.—Kimchi, Jarchi, Abenezra, Abravanel, Jun. Munst. Pagn. Mont. Grot. Fuller, alii, Sericum, silk.] LXX. Τρικανρον Trichapton, which some understand of a web wove with hair, worn by women on their heads, [as the caul of] a kind of peruke; others of a web of silk, which women wore over their hair [a net-work.] Symmachus translated Meshi by Ὀπένδυμα, a head-dress; Aquila, by Ἀνθεμον, flourished work; the Syriac, a woman's dress. All which shew, that the ancients were not satisfied that meshi signified silk; and that it is very doubtful whether Ezekiel intended it, or whether Scripture has mentioned it; unless in Isaiah xix. 9. עֲבֵרִי פֶשְׁתִּים שְׂרִיקוֹת. LXX. ἄλνον χιτῶν. Sym. ἄλνον κεντρίων. Here we find in the Hebrew, Sherikoth, which Jerom has translated by subtilia; and which others translate by silk, or fine flax, or crude flax, of a yellow or whitish colour; LXX. divided flax; Symmachus, carded flax. One might trace the word sericum, silk, from sorek, which signifies yellow, Isaiah v. 7. the natural colour of raw silk generally. But, what is meant by "they that work in fine flax"? Sherikoth probably signifies the colour of the flax, Isaiah xix. 9.

The ancient Greeks and Romans had but little knowledge of the nature of silk; they imagined it came from the country of the Seres, a people of Scythia; that a kind of spider spun it out of its own bowels, wound it with its feet about little rods, or branches of trees, and that these threads of silk were unravelled again by sprinkling it with water. Seres lanificio sylvarum nobiles, perfusam aquâ depertentes sylvarum canitiem, says Pliny, cap. 17. The Seres sold their silk to the Persians, from whom it passed to the Greeks, and from them to the Romans. But the Persians and Orientals for a long time kept the secret of manufacturing it, among themselves. It is still unknown by what means it came, and how it was worked up in Pliny's time. Its first appearance in Europe was after the conquests of Alexander the Great: when it was usually sold for its weight in gold. About the beginning of the reign of Tiberius, the use of silk garments was prohibited to men, by law; Ne vestis serica viros fœdaret: Tacit. Annal. lib. ii. cap. 33. None might wear it but women of prime quality. Vopiscus assures us, that the emperor Aurelian refused his empress a silk gown, which she very earnestly desired of him.

The emperor Justinian, being curious to know the true method of making silk, about A. D. 555,

A. D. 555, sent two monks into the Indies, to inspect the silk manufacture.—These monks, at their return, reported, that it was impossible to transport the silk-worms so far alive; but, that their eggs might be brought safely. The emperor sent them a second time, to procure some. This they did; and the managing of them succeeded so well at Constantinople, that it soon spread over Europe. Manufactures for silk were set up at Athens, at Thebes, and at Corinth. Vide Salmasius, notes on Solinus, Tertulian, and the Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores.

ADDITION.

[The question whether silk were known to the ancients, may seem, at first sight, to have little relation to Biblical enquiry; but, in fact, it leads to matters of some importance. For, when we read in the Acts, of Lydia, a seller of purple, we are naturally led to enquire what was the subject of that colour? was it woollen, or linen, or cotton? It should not be linen, because the same writer mentions a "rich man who was clothed in purple AND fine linen." Were silken garments among the "soft clothing" of those who resided in royal palaces? To answer these questions properly, demands some previous enquiry.

It is certain that silk was imported into Europe, ages before the silk-worm that produces it: and it much resembled the hanks, known at present, in form, colour, and substance. In this state it was called holoserica, or whole silk; and a method was discovered of separating the threads, and working them up afresh, in a thinner state, so that when woven, the web resembled the modern gauze. Pliny, Nat. Hist. lib. xi. cap. 26. It should appear that Pamphila, a woman of Coa, first practised this art; and that the Coan vests, which were so transparent as to be called by a poet "woven air," were of this manufacture. Comp. Seneca, de Beneficiis, lib. vii. cap. 9. [though it is possible, that they might originally be of cotton, fine muslin.] Silk was manufactured at Tyre and Berytus: as well singly, as intermixed with other materials. If so, it might easily form dresses for the use of the rich man in the parable, who wore purple:—But, this leads to enquiry whether purple were silk?

It is well known that the dress of the Roman nobility was purple: but, Ammianus Marcellinus complains, lib. xxiii. that "the celebrated silk of the Seres anciently composed the dress of the Roman nobility, but was, in his days, the extravagant and indiscriminate clothing of the lower ranks." Here the silk is synonymous with purple; or it is stained with purple; as in the Hippolytus of Seneca, Act. ii. sc. 1.

VOL. II. PART XXVII. Edit. IV.

Removete famulæ purpura
. . . . procul sit muricis Tyrii rubor;
Quæ fila ramis ultimi Seres legunt.

Juvenal says, Sat. viii. 101. that formerly the provinces were not plundered of their property, of conchyliæ Coæ, the purple dyed at Coa;—vestes Coæ conchyliatæ, i. e. purpura infectæ, says a commentator. These, as we have seen, might be of silk. It may well be thought, that silk in different states would receive different appellations; in its entire state holosericum, in another state byssus, in its thinnest and dyed state hysginum, or bombycinum: which certainly, was a state of extreme thinness; whence we find Martial alluding to its transparency, viii. 68.

Femineum lucet sic per bombycina corpus.

And Apuleius, Metam. x. notices the same.—Qualis fuit Venus, cum fuit virgo, nudo et in-tecto corpore perfectam formositatem professa; nisi quod tenui pallio bombycina inumbrabat spectabilem pubem.—Isidorus in his Glossary, explains Bombycinare, by "to make purple:" Bombycinatores, by "those who dye purple." Suidas also says, "Byssus is dyed purple:" and Hesychius explains Byssinon by porphyron, purple. It is true, that these authorities are mostly later than St. Luke; yet, if we may rely on them, they prove sufficiently that the "purple" of that sacred writer might be silk.

If these notions be correct, they illustrate the extreme effeminacy of the rich man in the parable; they add to our acquaintance with the history of Lydia: they shew the prodigality of the Mother of Harlots, Rev. xvii. 4. who was clad in purple and scarlet; silk of the most costly and gaudy colours—the favourite dress of public prostitutes;—nor less the cause of the lamentations of the merchants, who had lost her custom for "purple and silk, and scarlet:" chap. xviii. 12. that is to say, for silk in its thinner and dyed state, the bombycina already described; also silk in its more solid texture, and perhaps, tissue, or brocade; or rather, enriched with gold, silver, and pearls, as Mr. Morier describes the dress of the queen of Persia—rendered so cumbersome by the quantity of jewels embroidered on it, that she could scarcely move under its weight. Her trowsers, in particular, were so engrafted with pearl, that they looked more like a piece of mosaic than wearing apparel." Trav. Vol. ii. p. 61.

That silk is expressly mentioned in this passage of the Revelations under the term sericum, is clear;—also, that the royal dress of Herod Agrippa, which reflected the rays of light in such a manner as to give him the appearance of a deity, though covered with gold, was of silk, is not improbable. Further evidence that silk was known, and in fact, was common, though costly, among the ancients, might be deduced from the Herculaneum pictures; the changing and interwoven colours of certain dresses,—transparent dresses—worn by the women dancers, exceed what may be thought possible in cotton.

Further, our translators have supposed that silk was used by the Hebrews: they render Prov. xxxi. 22. "She maketh herself coverings of tapestry [brocaded, suppose] her clothing is silk and purple." Not purple, in the sense of bombycina or gauze, perhaps, (unless any suppose this gauze was a transparency over the silk-petticoat, as the term rendered "clothing," denotes) but, referring to the Tyrian dye, the colour. If asked, was silk known in the days of Solomon? It seems difficult to deny that if his ships sailed to India they might import specimens of silk: but how far the article could be used by "virtuous women" generally, may be questioned; however closely such good housewives might resemble "merchant ships which bring their lading from afar."

Yet, if silk were known in Judea in the days of Solomon, it might with much certainty, be supposed to be known to Ezekiel, chap. xvi. 10, 13. or, it might be known to Ezekiel in Persia, although of great rarity in Judea; [for Aristotle describes silk as an Assyrian manufacture, τὸν ἐν Ἀσσυρία βομβύκων] but our translators have with great judgment restricted to the margin of Gen. xli. 42. "Pharaoh arrayed Joseph in vestures of silk." It is more probable that "fine linen," as in the text, (or calico muslin, of modern days) is the article there intended. Perhaps, in those early days the production of silk was restricted to China.

It remains to observe, that silk in the form of bombycina (gauze) being described by Aristotle as an Assyrian commodity, it contributes to justify what we have elsewhere said on the contest between Minerva and Arachne (the city of Erech) in spinning; with the metamorphosis of that damsel into a spider, on account of her fine and slender web: many writers of antiquity compare the thread of the silk-worm to that of the spider, on account of its tenuity.

To conclude, we may adopt the words of Tertullian, de Cultu Femin, cap. 13. in direct opposition to the intention with which the Harlot of Babylon had attired herself—Vestite vos serico

Probitatis, byssino Sanctitatis, purpura Pudicitiae: Clothe yourselves with the silk of probity, the fine linen of sanctity, the purple of modesty:—the silk of probity, or sincerity, that your character may not demand concealment—the fine linen, pure, white, the emblem of chastity, holiness—the purple of modesty, the blush of bashfulness and reserve. The purple of the ancients was a deep crimson. See more under the Article SIN, i. e. China.]

SILLA, סִּלָּה, estimation; from סָלָה sala: otherwise, elevation, lifting up; from סָלַל salal: or contempt, to be trod underfoot; from סָלַח salah, or silah, according to different readings: basket, according to the Syriac.

SILLA, or SELLA. Joash king of Judah was assassinated in or near Jerusalem, in Beth-millo, or the "house of Millo, which goeth down to Silla," 2 Kings xii. 20. It is not exactly known where this Millo was.

SILOAM, סִּלְוָה, Σιλωάμ, or SHILOAH, sent, or who sends: otherwise, dart, branch, or whatever is sent; from סָלַח shalach: otherwise, according to the Syriac, that spoils, or is spoiled.

SILOAM, SHILOAH, SILOE, or SILOA, a fountain, under the walls of Jerusalem, east, between that city and the brook Kidron. Epiphanius writes (de Vita et Morte Prophet. p. 248.) that God gave this fountain at the intercession of the prophet Isaiah. But it was in being long before this prophet; and there is great likelihood, that it is the same as En-rogel, the fuller's fountain, Josh. xv. 7. xviii. 16. 2 Sam. xvii. 17. 1 Kings i. 9. The situation of En-rogel east of, and below, the walls of Jerusalem, the same as the fountain of Siloam, convinces us that it must be the same; for there was but one fountain on this side. Josephus often speaks of the waters of Siloe, or Siloam; he says, that when Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem, this fountain increased its waters; and that the same happened when Titus besieged the city. So that whereas before, water could hardly be bought for money, during the siege it abundantly supplied the Roman army, and furnished enough beside for watering the gardens. Joseph. de Bello, lib. v. cap. 26. Vide MAP of JERUSALEM.

Isaiah, viii. 6. insinuates, that its waters flowed gently and without noise: "forasmuch as this people refuseth the waters of Shiloah that go softly," &c. Jerom, on Jer. xiv. says that Jerusalem has only the fountain of Siloam, from whence to draw water; nor did this spring run always: Uno fonte Siloe, et hoc non perpetuo, utitur civitas. But anciently it was not so, at least Scripture does not thus describe it. Monconys says, Travels to the Holy Land, Part 2. p. 38.

p. 38, that the water of this fountain is a little brackish, and has not a good taste. The Rabbins relate, Rab. Nathan, in Aboth. cap. 35. that the priests drank of the water of Siloam, when they had eaten too much flesh, to assist their digestion. The saltness that Monconys mentions might contribute to this.

St. John speaks of the pool of Siloam. Our Saviour sent the man that was born blind, to wash his eyes in the pool of Siloam, John ix. 7. Vide FRAGS. No. CXL.

The Tower of Siloam, Luke xiii. 4. fell upon eighteen men, and buried them in its ruins. It is thought this tower was near the fountain of Siloam.

SILVANUS, Σιλβανός, who loves woods, or forests; from the Latin Silva, a wood. See SILAS. 1 Cor. i. 19. 1 Thess. i. 1. 2 Thess. i. 1. 1 Pet. v. 12.

SILVER. This metal does not appear to have been used before the deluge; at least, Moses says nothing of it; he speaks only of brass and iron, Gen. iv. 22. but in Abraham's time it was become common, and used in traffic. Gen. xiii. 2. Scripture observes, that this patriarch was rich in gold and silver; that he bought a sepulchre for his wife Sarah for four hundred shekels of silver. Gen. xxiii. 15. This silver (apparently) was not coined, but was in bars or ingots; in commerce it was always weighed. See MONEY, and FRAGMENTS, No. XXVIII.

SIMALCUE, Ἐιμαλκσαί, Elmalchuel, God is his king: from מֶלֶךְ melek, a king, and אֵל el, God: otherwise, sent of God; from מַלְאֵךְ malak, to send. A chief Arabian, 1 Macc. xi. 39.

SIMEON, שִׁמְעוֹן, that hears, that obeys, or is heard; from שָׁמַע shamah.

I. SIMEON, son of Jacob and Leah: born A. M. 2247, ante A. D. 1757. Gen. xxix. 33. He was brother to Dinah by the same mother: and when Shechem, son of Hamor had defiled Dinah, Simeon and Levi revenged the affront, assaulted Shechem, killed all the men they found, and brought away their sister. Gen. xxxiv. 25. A. M. 2265, ante A. D. 1739. It is thought Simeon was one who shewed most inhumanity to his brother Joseph: and advised his brothers to kill him, Gen. xxxvii. 20. This conjecture is founded on Joseph's keeping him prisoner in Egypt, Gen. xlii. 24, and treating him with more rigour than the rest of his brethren. Jacob on his death-bed, shewed his indignation against Simeon and Levi,—"cursed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath for it was cruel: I will divide them in Jacob and scatter them in Israel." Gen. xlix. 5.

In effect, the tribes of Simeon, and Levi, were scattered, and dispersed, in Israel: Levi had no compact lot, or portion; and Simeon received for his portion only a district dismembered from the tribe of Judah, Josh. xix. with some other lands they over-run in the mountains of Seir, and in the desert of Gedor. 1 Chron. iv. 24, 39, 42. The Targum of Jerusalem, and the Rabbins, followed by some ancient fathers, believe, that the greater part of the Scribes, and men learned in the law, were of this tribe: and as these were dispersed throughout Israel, we see herein the accomplishment of Jacob's prophecy. [It is likely that Jacob meant the dispersion of Simeon and Levi as an evil, a degradation, but Providence over-ruled it to be an honour: so Levi had the priesthood, and Simeon had the learning---or writing-authority, of Israel, whereby both these tribes were honourably dispersed among the nation.] Judith, ix. 2. seems to vindicate this action of Simeon; but she approved only his zeal, and not the other circumstances of the action.

The Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs intimates, that Simeon died at the age of one hundred and twenty years; that he was a man of an intrepid, implacable, and severe temper.

The sons of Simeon were Jemuel, Jamin, Ohad, Jachin, Zohar, and Shaul. Exod. vi. 15. Their descendants amounted to 59,300 men, at the Exodus, Num. i. 22, but only 22,200 entered the Land of Promise, the rest dying in the desert, because of their murmurings, and impiety. Num. xxvi. 14. The portion of Simeon was west and south of that of Judah; having the tribe of Dan, and the Philistines north, the Mediterranean west, and Arabia Petraea south. Josh. xix. 1--9.

II. SIMEON, uncle of Mattathias, father of the Maccabees, of the race of the priests, and of the posterity of Phinehas, 1 Macc. ii. 1.

III. SIMEON, an Israelite who put away his foreign wife after the captivity, Ezra x. 31.

IV. SIMEON, a holy old man at Jerusalem, full of the Holy Ghost, who was expecting the redemption of Israel, Luke ii. 25, 26, &c. The Holy Ghost had assured him, that he should not die, before he had seen the Christ of the Lord: he therefore came into the temple, prompted by inspiration, just at the time when Joseph and Mary presented Jesus Christ there, in obedience to the law. Simeon took the child in his arms, gave thanks to God, &c.: after which, he blessed Joseph and Mary. It is believed with good reason, that he died soon after he had given this testimony.

An ancient author called Celsus, who wrote a preface concerning the dispute between John and Papiscus, (inter Opera Cypriani) which is lost, says, that Simeon was blind; but on taking Christ into his arms, he immediately recovered his sight, and gave testimony to our Saviour, in the presence of the people. Others think, vide Baron. anno J. C. 1. § 40. that Simeon was the officiating priest, and that, as such, he took our Saviour into his arms, as a first-born that belonged to the Lord; and afterwards returned him, according to the law. And indeed, several of the ancients maintain that he was a priest, (Method. Patar. Cyril. Jerosol. Orat. de occursu Domini. Athanas. lib. de Essentia communi, &c. Epiphan. de PP. V. T. Leon. Imperat. Orat. de Purificat. B. M. V. Sophron. Jerosolym Dionys. Carthus. Franc. Luc. Lyr. Tolet. Cajet. alii plures, apud Allatium, de Simeonibus, p. 3.) but others deny it, with great reason. Phot. Euthym. Theophylact. Jansen. Barrad. Tillemont, not. 6. sup. J. C. tom. i. p. 448. The silence of Scripture alone is a sufficient proof, since it would hardly have omitted that circumstance.
2 B 2 and

Leo Allatius, in his Dissertation on the writings of the Simeons, relates several particulars which happened, they say, when Simeon came into the temple to see the Messiah. Among the several mothers who brought their children into the temple, he observed the Holy Virgin shining with rays of light. Then putting aside the multitude, he went directly to her, gave her his blessing, took the child Jesus into his arms, &c. Nicephorus relates, that Simeon died as soon as he had returned the child Jesus to his mother. Epiphanius adds, de Vita et Morte Prophetarum, that the Hebrew priests refused him burial, because he had spoken so honourably of our Saviour. It is easily understood, that traditions of this kind are not much to be relied on, [they are often no more than figurative expressions grossly misunderstood.]

It has been pretended, that Simeon who received Jesus Christ into his arms, was the same as Simeon the Just, son of Hillel, and master of Gamaliel, whose disciple St. Paul was. It is also said, that as Simeon one day was explaining that passage of Isaiah, "A Virgin shall conceive, and bring forth a son," &c.—not being able to penetrate this mystery, it was revealed to him, that he should not die before he had seen the accomplishment of it. Vide Nicephor. Hist. Eccl. lib. i. cap. 12.

The most ancient martyrologists place the feast of St. Simeon, January 5. others, February 2 or 4. Usuard and Ado place it October 8, which has been followed by the Roman martyrology. The Menologia published by Canisius, unite his feast with that of the Purification of the Virgin. Those of Venice and Hughellus fix it on the day following. His tomb was heretofore seen in the valley of Jehoshaphat, near Jerusalem. His relics, they say, were transported from Constantinople to Venice, about A. D. 1220. See M. de Tillemont, Not. 6. on Jesus Christ.

V. SIMEON, son of Judah, and father of Levi; an ancestor of Christ, Luke iii. 30.

VI. SIMEON, or Simon, cousin-german to Jesus Christ, bishop of Jerusalem, son of Cleophas, and of Mary, sister of the Holy Virgin; probably the same whom St. Mark names Simon, chap. vi. 3. It is very likely that Simeon was among the first disciples of Jesus Christ. Epiphanius says, Hæres. lxxviii. cap. 14. that when the Jews massacred James minor, his brother Simeon reproached them with that cruelty. After the death of James, A. D. 62, the apostles, the disciples, and the kindred of Jesus Christ assembled, to nominate a successor in the see of Jerusalem, and unanimously elected Simeon, Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 32. Probably he withdrew with the rest of the faithful to Pella, beyond Jordan, during the war of the Jews against the Romans. After the destruction of Jerusalem, they returned into this city, Epiphan. de Mensur. cap. 15. Euseb. Demonstr. lib. iii. cap. 5. and the church of Christ appeared there with new splendor, by a great number of miracles, that God wrought by their means. When the emperor Trajan made strict enquiry for all who were of the race of David, St. Simeon was accused before Atticus the governor of Palestine. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 32. He endured several tortures for many days together, to the great astonishment of every body, and particularly of Atticus himself; for he was then one hundred and twenty years of age. At last he was crucified, about A. D. 107. Euseb. Chronic. He had governed the church of Jerusalem about forty-three years. The Latins place his feast February 18. the Greeks, April 27. St. Justus was his successor in the bishoprick of Jerusalem. See M. Tillemont, Hist. Eccl. tom. ii. p. 202, &c.

SIMON, Σίμων, that hears, or obeys: from שָׁמַע shammah, to hear, to obey.

I. SIMON, surnamed the Just, high-priest of the Jews, promoted to this dignity A. M. 3702, or 3703, and died A. M. 3711, before A. D. 293. He was son and successor of Onias I. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 2. Onias left a son, Onias II. who being but a child at the death of his father, and incapable of exercising the sovereign priesthood, it was committed to Eleazar, Eleazar, his uncle by the father's side, who dying left it to his great uncle Manasseh, brother of Jaddus, to whom Onias II. son of Simon the Just succeeded, A. M. 3771. Several refer to Simon the Just the character that Jesus son of Sirach gives to Simon, son of Onias : Eccus. li. but we rather think it should be referred to Simon II. son of Onias II. of whom we shall speak in the next article.

The Jews tell us very extraordinary things of this high-priest.

1. It is said in the Talmud of Jerusalem, vide Mishnah. in Joma, et Maimon. in Jom. Haccipurim. that during the whole of his pontificate, azazel, the scape-goat, was dashed to pieces, before he could fall half way down the precipice over which he was thrown. Whereas, after the death of this great man, the goat escaped into the desert, where he was caught and eaten by the Saracens ; which was considered as a great misfortune.

2. During his whole life, when, on the day of solemn expiation, the high-priest drew lots on the two goats, that which he drew with his right-hand, had always the inscription, pray to God ; and that which he drew with his left-hand was always, for the azazel, or scape-goat ; whereas after his death this varied, and the high-priest sometimes drew the lot, for azazel, with his right-hand : which was taken for an evil omen.

3. The scarlet ribbon which was tied to the head of the goat azazel, (this was not appointed in Scripture ; but however, custom had given it authority,) always appeared white during the pontificate of Simon the Just ; which was taken as a proof of remission of the sins of the people ; according to those words, Isai. i. 18. " Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow." But after the death of Simon, this also varied, and the scarlet ribbon appeared sometimes red, and sometimes white.

4. While he lived, the western lamp of the golden candlestick was always burning ; but after his death it sometimes went out.

5. While he lived the fire of the altar burned clear ; and after a billet, or two, was put on it in the morning, there was no occasion for any more wood the whole day ; but when he was dead, the fire languished, and required a continual supply to keep it in.

6. While he lived, the blessing of God, multiplied the two loaves of first-fruits, offered on the day of Pentecost ; and the twelve loaves of shew-bread set upon the golden altar in the Sanctum, and which were left there the whole week till the sabbath following, when others were put there in their stead. These loaves, they say, were multiplied so, that when they were distributed to all the priests that waited in the temple, as a kind of blessing, each had, at least, a piece as big as an olive, which was enough for their refreshment ; and some had to spare. But when he was dead, this blessing ceased, and the shares distributed among the priests were so small, that the more modest returned their thanks, and the others still held out their hands.

II. SIMON, high-priest of the Jews, son of Onias II. advanced to the high-priesthood, A. M. 3785, died A. M. 3805, ante A. D. 199. In his time, A. M. 3787, Ptolemy Philopator came to Jerusalem, and attempted to enter the interior of the temple, where none but the high-priest should enter. Simon, with the other priests, opposed him, and God struck the king of Egypt, and prevented his design. See the third book of the Maccabees. We think it is to this Simon, the high-priest, that the book of Ecclesiasticus gives a high encomium, chap. li.

That author represents the high-priest Simon in all the splendor of his dignity, in his priestly habit, surrounded by his priests, and offering a solemn sacrifice of thanksgiving. It is thought, that Jesus son of Sirach intended to describe the sacrifice offered by the high-priest Simon II. in the presence of Ptolemy Philopator, as a thanksgiving for his victory over Antiochus the Great, near Raphia. Simon II. had for successor Onias III.

III. SIMON MACCABRUS, surnamed Thassi, son of Mattathias, and brother of Judas and Jonathan. He was chief, prince, and pontiff, of the Jews, from A. M. 3860 to 3869, ante A. D. 135. His successor was John Hircanus his son. Mattathias the father of the Maccabees, just before his death, said to his other sons, " I know that your brother Simon is a man of counsel ; give ear unto him always, he shall be a father unto you." He gave proofs of his valour in the battle between Judas Maccabeus and Nicanor, 2 Macc. viii. 22, 23. On another occasion, 2 Macc. xiv. 17. Simon was sent into Galilee, to succour the Jews, who were threatened with destruction, by the inhabitants of Tyre, Sidon, and Ptolemais. Simon obtained a great booty, brought into Judea the Israelites that were in Galilee, and returned triumphant. He again signalized his valour in the battle between his brother Jonathan and Apollonius, the governor of Cælo Syria, whom they defeated, and killed above eight thousand of his men. Simon was made governor of the whole coast of the Mediterranean sea, from Tyre to the frontiers of Egypt, by the young king Antiochus Theos.

He

He also took Bethsura, and Joppa, and built Adida in the plain called Sephela. All these things he did while his brother Jonathan was chief, and high-priest of the Jews. 1 Macc. x. 82. xii. 33, 48, &c.

But Jonathan being surprized by Tryphon, and a report being spread that he was put to death, Simon came to Jerusalem, and having assembled the people, they chose him as their chief: Then Simon had the walls of Jerusalem repaired; and knowing that Tryphon was coming into Judea with a great army, he marched out, resolving to give him battle.

When Tryphon came to Bascama, he there slew Jonathan and his two sons, and then returned into Syria. Simon fetched the bones of his brother, and buried them honourably, at Modin, in the sepulchre of his fathers; which he adorned with pillars, pyramids, and trophies of sculpture.

Tryphon coming into Syria, there killed the young king Antiochus, and usurped his kingdom. Simon Maccabeus would not acknowledge him, but his competitor, Demetrius Nicator, as king of Syria; to whom he applied for confirming the ancient franchises of Judea, and for freedom from tribute. Demetrius granted Simon more than he asked; so that this year, which was the hundred and seventieth of the Greeks, he began to write on the tables and public registers; "The first year, under Simon sovereign pontiff, chief, and prince of the Jews." After this he took Gaza; and the Syrians who were in the citadel of Jerusalem capitulated to him. He appointed an annual festival in commemoration of the reduction of this fortress; which had been so long in the hands of foreigners.

All Israel beheld with pleasure the prudent administration of this great man. His whole study was to advance the happiness of his nation, and to render it prosperous and secure. He took Joppa, and made a harbour of it, to improve the trade of the Jews; and every way extended the limits of his country.

He renewed the alliance of the Jews with the Romans, and with the Lacedemonians. The whole Jewish nation concurred in registering a public act, by which they acknowledged their obligations to Simon, and to his family, and recognized him, and his children, as perpetual prince and pontiff of their nation, till a faithful prophet should arise from among them. They ordered, that he should be obeyed in all things, that all public acts should pass in his name, that he should be clothed in purple, and adorned with gold. This declaration was written on a table of brass, and placed in the galleries of the temple.

Antiochus Sidetes, king of Syria, son of Demetrius Soter, and brother to Demetrius Nicator, being informed that Demetrius Nicator was taken by the Parthians, wrote to Simon from Rhodes, to engage him on his side against Tryphon. He confirmed to him whatever had been granted by Demetrius Nicator, allowed him the privilege of coining money, remitted to him all debts owing to the kings of Syria, and declared Jerusalem to be a free, and a holy city. Simon sent him men and money to assist him in the reduction of Dora, in which Tryphon had shut himself up. But Antiochus would not receive them, nor would he confirm the articles of his treaty with Simon. He even sent Athenobius to him, to demand the surrender of several places, or a thousand talents of silver; threatening, in case of refusal, to enter Judea with troops, and to treat him as an enemy. Simon, not discouraged by his threats, answered that he had usurped nothing from him, but had only taken possession of the inheritance of his fathers. He offered a hundred talents for the cities of Joppa and Gazara, of which he had made himself master, because they had caused great calamities to his country.

Antiochus sent Cendebeus with an army on the coasts of the Mediterranean; but Cendebeus was defeated by John Hircanus, son of Simon. Three years afterwards, Simon visited the cities of Judea, and came to the castle of Docus, or Dagon, where his son-in-law Ptolemy, son of Ambubus, resided. Ptolemy made him a great entertainment; but in the midst of it caused him to be massacred, with his two sons Mattathias and Judas, hoping by this to make himself master of Jerusalem, and the whole country. But John Hircanus was beforehand with him, and came first to Jerusalem. Vide HIRCANUS, and PTOLEMY.

IV. SIMON, of the tribe of Benjamin, superintendant of the temple. 2 Macc. iii. 4, 5. A. M. 3828, ante A. D. 176. He attempted to perform some unjust enterprize in the city; but not succeeding, because of the opposition of the high-priest Onias III.; he told Apollonius, son of Thraseas, then governor of Cælo-Syria, that there were great riches in the temple of Jerusalem, which might easily be seized for Seleucus, king of Syria. He prevailed so far, that the king sent Heliodorus to Jerusalem, to fetch away those treasures: but God prevented him. See HELIODORUS.

Simon seeing his wicked design baffled, published every where, that Onias himself had discovered covered to the king the treasures of the temple ; and the friends of the high-priest opposing these calumnies, murders were committed by the partisans of Simon, supported by Apollonius, governor of Phenicia. This obliged Onias, the high-priest, to vindicate himself to king Seleucus, at Antioch.

While this matter was in agitation, king Seleucus died. Antiochus Epiphanes succeeding him, Jason, brother of Onias III. bought the high-priesthood of this prince ; and some years after, he sent Menelaus, brother to Simon now mentioned, to carry to the king, at Antioch, some of the money. Menelaus took this opportunity to buy the high-priesthood for himself, and to cheat Jason of his money and bargain.— This circumstance gives reason to suspect, that neither Simon, nor his brother Menelaus, were of the tribe of Benjamin, since it is known that tribe could have nothing to do with the priest-hood ; and consequently Simon could not, regularly, be governor, or captain, of the temple : much less could Menelaus be high-priest. They might, however, pretend to be of the sacerdotal line. Or, perhaps, the word Benjamin is a corruption of the text. Scripture does not acquaint us what became of Simon.

V. SIMON, son of Boethus, high-priest of the Jews. Raised to the high-priesthood, A. M. 3981, deposed in 3999 one year before the birth of Jesus Christ, and four years before A. D. Simon was originally of Alexandria, and Herod the Great promoted him to the dignity of high-priest, that he might with the better grace marry his sister Mariamne. But this pontiff being suspected of partaking in the conspiracy of Pheroras and Antipater against Herod, he deprived him of the priesthood, and substituted Matthias, son of Theophilus.

VI. SIMON, son of Camithus, high-priest of the Jews, succeeded Eleazar, son of Ananus, A. M. 4028. He held this office but one year, being removed from it by Gratus, governor of Judea, in 4029. His successor was Joseph, surnamed Caiaphas. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 3.

VII. SIMON, surnamed Canthara, son of Simon Boethus, high-priest of the Jews ; succeeded Theophilus, son of Jonathan, Joseph. Antiq. lib. xix. cap. 5. lib. vi. A. M. 4044, and had for successor Matthias, son of Ananus, A. M. 4045, A. D. 42. He was again advanced to this dignity in 4048, by Herod, king of Colchis. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 1. This second time he succeeded Elioneus ; and had for successor Joseph, son of Caneus.

VIII. SIMON, the Galilean. He maintained that the Jews ought not to pay tribute to the Romans, nor to acknowledge them as masters of God's people. Joseph. de Bello, l. ii. c. 12. The Latin calls him Simon, but the Greek Judas, which was his true name. Compare Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 2. But Judas had a son called Simon, who was crucified in the time of Claudius. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 3.

IX. SIMON, the Cyrenean. When Jesus Christ was going to Calvary, and unable to bear the weight of his cross, the soldiers met a man, a native of Cyrene in Lybia, named Simon, (father of Alexander and Rufus,) whom they compelled to carry the cross after Jesus ; i. e. to carry it whole and entire, according to some ; according to others, to carry one end of it with Jesus, [according to others, to carry the cross-beam.] Matth. xxvii. 32. Mark xv. 21. It is asked whether Simon were a Jew, or a Pagan ? Several fathers thought him a Gentile, and considered him as a type of that idolatrous people, which afterwards should be called by profession of the Gospel, to carry the cross after Christ. Ambros. in Luc. x. Hilar. in Matth. xxvii. Leo. Mag. Serm. viii. de passione. Bede, Druthmar, &c. Others hold that he was a Jew. Maldon. Grot. Brug. Jansen. The Latin of St. Mark intimates, that he was coming from a farm near Jerusalem. Many Jews dwelt at Cyrene, in Lybia, of which place he was ; and if he were the same as Simeon, surnamed Niger, Acts xiii. 1. we must readily acknowledge him to have been a Jew. Some believe he was bishop of Bostra, in Arabia, and that he ended his life by martyrdom ; being burned alive by the Pagans. For his sons Alexander and Rufus, see their Articles.

X. SIMON, the Canaanite, or Simon Zelotes, an apostle of Jesus Christ. It is doubtful whether the name Canaanite were derived to him from the city Cana, in Galilee, or whether it might not be written Chananean, from כנעני Chenani, Chananean, or Canaanite : or, whether it should not be taken according to its signification in Hebrew, from the root כנע, Kana, from which comes כני or כנני Kani or Kanani ; to be zealous. St. Luke gives him the surname of Zelotes, the zealot. Luke vi. 15. Acts i. 13. which seems to be a translation of the surname Canaanite, given him by the other evangelists. Matth. x. 4. Mark iii. 18. Some fathers say, he was of Cana, of the tribe of Zebulun, or of Naphtali. Theodoret, on Psalm lxvii. 18. Jerom, on Matth. x. The learned are divided about the signification of Zelotes ; some take it only to denote his zeal in embracing the gospel of Jesus Christ ; others think he was of a sect called called Zealots, mentioned in Josephus, de Bello, lib. iv. cap. 2. lib. vi. cap. 1.

The particulars of his life are unknown ; nor does it appear where he preached, or where he died. Nicephorus and the modern Greeks say, that he travelled through Egypt, Cyrenaica, and Africa : that he preached in Mauritania, and Lybia ; that he carried the Gospel even into the isles of Britain, and that after an infinite number of miracles, and sufferings, he was crowned with martyrdom, by the death of the cross, which he endured with incredible courage. Others, Fortunat. Pictav. Carmin. lib. viii. cap. 4. Bede, Retract. in Acta. cap. 1, 5, 13. Abdias, lib. vi. insist, that he suffered martyrdom in the city of Sumir, in Persia ; and the ancient martyrology given by Florentinus, sets it down so, October 28, on which the Latin church celebrates his festival. It puts his martyrdom July 1, on which day Abdias says he was massacred, in a tumult raised by the idol-priests against him and St. Jude, whose feast is kept on that day. The Greeks honour him June 1, and say he was Nathanael, the bridegroom, at the marriage of Cana. Menæa. Jun.

XI. SIMON, brother of our Lord, i. e. his cousin-german, son of Mary, sister of the Holy Virgin. Matth. xiii. 55. Mark vi. 3. We believe him to be the same as St. Simeon, bishop of Jerusalem, and son of Cleophas. Vide SIMON VI.

XII. SIMON the Pharisee, with whom Jesus dined, after he had raised the child of the widow of Nain, Luke vii. 36, 37, &c. A. D. 31. While he was at table with Simon, a woman noted for her ill life, entered the room, poured perfume on the feet of Jesus, wiped them with her hair, washed them with her tears, &c. Simon seeing this, was astonished at it, but was reproved by Jesus : who forgave the sinner, but condemned the unforgiving Pharisee by a similitude.

XIII. SIMON the Leper ; he dwelt at Bethany, near Jerusalem. Matth. xxvi. 6. Mark xiv. 3. John xi. xii. Jesus coming thither a few days before his passion, was invited by Simon the Leper to eat with him. Lazarus, whom our Saviour had raised from the dead some time before, was at table with them. Martha, his sister, was very busy in attending on them ; and Mary, his other sister, to shew her love and respect for our Saviour, brought a box of perfumes, which she poured on his feet. This entertainment is very different from that at which our Saviour had been about two years before, in the house of Simon the Pharisee ; as Mary the sister of Lazarus was a different person from the sinner-woman of Nain.

XIV. SIMON, son of John, or Jona, surnamed Cephas, or Peter. See PETER.

XV. SIMON, father of Judas Iscariot, John vi. 71. is known only by the misfortune of having such a son.

XVI. SIMON NIGER, the black. Acts xiii. 1. About A. D. 44. He was among the prophets and teachers of the Christian church at Antioch ; and one who laid his hands on St. Paul and St. Barnabas, for the office to which the Holy Ghost had appointed them. Some think he was Simon the Cyrenean ; but there is no other proof of this, than the similitude of names ; nor is this a very good one, since St. Luke always calls Simon the Cyrenean by the name of Simon ; but Simon Niger, by the name of Simeon. Epiphanius, Hæres. xx. cap. 4. reckons one Niger among the seventy disciples. The church makes no mention of Simon Niger.

[If CALMET thought Simon IX. to be the same as Simeon bishop of Jerusalem, it could require no great exertion to infer the identity of Simon the Cyrenean with Simon Niger. It is certain, that St. Luke who calls Simon Peter by the name of Simon, also calls him Simeon, in reporting the speech of James, Acts xv. 14. if then Simon and Simeon denote the same person in this instance, why may they not, in the instance of Simon the Cyrenean and Simon Niger? Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DCXXXVI.]

XVII. SIMON the Tanner. St. Peter lodged several days at Joppa, with Simon the Tanner, and was in his house when the messengers from Cornelius the Centurion came to him. Acts x.

XVIII. SIMON Magus, or the Sorcerer : he was, they say, of the village of Gitton in the country of Samaria. Epiphanius, Hæres. xxi. Justin, Apolog. ii. p. 69. Philip the deacon coming to preach at Samaria, Acts viii. 5—13. converted many ; among others this Simon also, believed, and was baptized. The apostles Peter and John visiting Samaria, communicated the Holy Ghost to those baptized by Philip ; at which Simon, full of admiration, offered money to the apostles, saying, "Give me also this power." But Peter said to him with great indignation, "Thy money perish with thee, . . . thou art in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity." Simon made answer ; "Pray ye to the Lord for me," &c.

St. Luke adds, Acts viii. 9, 10, 11. that Simon had addicted himself to magic, before Philip came to Samaria, and by his impostures and enchantments, had seduced the people of this city, who said, "This man is the great power of God."

But after St. Peter had rejected, with horror, his proposal of selling the power of imparting the the Holy Ghost; Simon fell into much greater errors and abominations; applying himself to magic more than ever, taking pride in withstanding the apostles, and infecting a great number of persons with his impious errors. Irenæus, lib. i. cap. 20. For this purpose it is said he left Samaria, Theodoret, Hæret. fabul. lib. i. cap. 1. and travelled through several provinces; seeking places where the Gospel had not yet reached, that he might prejudice the minds of men against it.

At Tyre, in Phenicia, says Theodoret, Hæres. Justin, Apol. ii. Iren. lib. i. cap. 20. Tertull. de Anim. cap. 34. he bought a public prostitute, called Selene, or Helene, and carried her with him, committing crimes in secret with her. Having run through several provinces, and made himself admired by vast numbers of persons, for his false miracles and impostures; he came to Rome in the time of the emperor Claudius, about A. D. 41.

It is said, by Justin, Irenæus, Tertull. Euseb. Cyrill. August. Theodoret, that he was honoured as a deity, by the Romans, and by the senate itself, who decreed a statue to him, in the isle of Tiber, with this inscription,—To Simon, the holy God. Simoni Deo sancto. This fact however is disputed by able critics, who think Justin mistook a statue dedicated to Semo Sancus, a pagan deity, for one erected Simoni sancto. And indeed there has been found a statue in the isle of Tiber, with this inscription, (nearly approaching to that mentioned by Justin.) Semoni Sanco Deo Fideo Sacrum Sext. Pompeius Sp. F. Mutianus—donum dedit. [But, N. B. It does not appear to have been erected by the senate, which Justin says. The inscription is also, so much longer than that noticed by Justin, and is so particular, that no man of ordinary information could confound the two inscriptions, as if they were the same.] On this difficulty, vide Baronius, ann. 44 § 55. Salmasius, notes on Spartian, p. 39. F. Halloix, Life of Justin, M. du Pin, M. de Tillemont, not, 1. on Simon Magus, tom. ii.

When St. Peter came to Rome, Euseb. lib. ii. cap. 14. Hist. Eccl. Jerom, de Viris Illust. c. 1. Theodoret, Hæret. fab. lib. i. cap. 1.) some time after the arrival of Simon Magus, he counteracted all that this impostor had been doing. Simon, however, did not quit this great city, where was so much room for spreading his errors. Under the reign of Nero, he acquired great reputation by his enchantments. He pretended to prove that he was the Christ, (Arnob. lib. ii. Maxim. Tyrius, Homil. liv. Ambros. Hexæmer, lib. iv. Cyril. Catech. vi. &c.) and, as the Son of God, could ascend into heaven: In reality, he caused himself to be raised in the air, in a fiery chariot, by the assistance of two demons. But St. Peter and St. Paul betaking themselves to prayer, the impostor was deserted by his demons, fell to the ground, and broke his legs: being carried to Brindes, for very grief and shame, he threw himself headlong from the top of the house where he lodged. It is reported, he received his fall in the presence of Nero; and to this is referred what is said by Dio Chrysostom, Orat. xxi. that Nero kept a long while at his court, a man who pretended to fly in the air:—also what is said by Suetonius, lib. vi. cap. 12. that in the public games, a man undertook to fly in the air, in the presence of Nero; but, at his first flight he fell down with such violence, that his blood spurted up to the gallery where the emperor was sitting. He died, probably, A. D. 65. [The reader will regard these Apocryphal stories as he pleases.]

As to the heresies of Simon;—beside those imputed to him, Acts viii. 10. the fathers, Iren. lib. i. cap. 10. accuse him of pretending to be the great power of God; of affirming that he came down as the Father in respect of the Samaritans; as the Son in respect of the Jews, and as the Holy Ghost in respect of the Gentiles: but that it is indifferent which of these names he went by. Jerom, on Matth. xxiv. quotes these blasphemous expressions out of one of his books: "I am the word of God; I am the beauty of God; I am the comforter; I am the Almighty; I am the whole Essence of God." He was the inventor of the Eons, (Nazianz. Orat. xxiii. xxiv. Euseb. in Marcion. lib. iv. cap. 9.) which were so many persons, of whom they composed their deity. His Helen, say Iren. lib. i. cap. 20. Epiphan. Hæres. xxi. Aug. de Hæres. lib. i. he called the first intelligence, the mother of all things; he sometimes called her the Holy Ghost, Prunica, or Minerva: He said, that by this first intelligence he had originally a design of creating the angels; but that she, knowing this will of her father, had descended lower, and had produced the angels, and the other spiritual powers, to whom she had given no knowledge of her father: That these angels and powers had afterwards made angels and men: That Helen had passed successively into the bodies of various women; among others, into that of Helen, wife of Menelaus, who occasioned the war of Troy; and at last into the body of this Helen of Tyre.

He did not acknowledge Jesus Christ as son of God, but considered him as a rival, and pretended himself to be the Christ. He believed not

not the resurrection of the body ; but, barely a resurrection of the soul. He taught that men need not trouble themselves about good works, for all actions were indifferent, and that the distinction of actions into good and evil, was only introduced by the angels, to render men subject to them. He rejected the law of Moses, and said he was come to abolish it. He ascribed the Old Testament to the angels ; and though he every where declared himself an enemy to angels, yet he paid them an idolatrous worship, pretending, men could not be saved, without offering to the Supreme Father abominable sacrifices, by means of the principalities that he placed in each heaven. He offered them his sacrifices ; not to obtain assistance from them, but to prevail with them that they might not oppose men. Simon formed a sect of heretics, which were called Simonians. De Tillemont, Hist. Eccl. tom. ii. § 5. [What strange errors opposed the Gospel of Jesus Christ !]

XIX. SIMON, son of Gioras: he headed a number of seditious people, who began to commit depredations, and even murders, in that part of Idumea, called Acrabatene. Ananus sent troops against him, which obliged him to retire into the castle of Massada, from whence he made excursions into Idumea. He advanced towards Jerusalem, which he put into a consternation, by his many cruelties. The zealots fought with him but could not subdue him. Some time after, the people of Jerusalem, driven to extremities by the zealots, and seeking means of screening themselves from their violence, called in Simon son of Gioras, who was received with the acclamations of the people, and attacked John of Giscala, and the zealots, in the temple. He exercised all sorts of cruelties against the inhabitants of Jerusalem, who had called him to their assistance ; and caused the high-priest Mattathias to be killed, who had insisted the most strenuously on his being invited to Jerusalem. Joseph. de Bello, lib. v. cap. 33.

When the Romans had taken the city and the temple, Simon concealed himself under-ground, in the common sewers. He remained hid during some months ; but at last his provisions failing, he was forced to creep out, and appear above-ground, in the place where the temple had been, clothed in white, with a robe of purple ; the Romans were truly surprised at the sight of him, and asked him who he was ? He would not tell his name, but desired to speak with the commanding officer. This was Terentius Rufus, for Titus was gone from Jerusalem. He came to him, and knowing him, sent word to Titus, at Cesarea, of his prisoner. Titus carried him to Rome, where he served to adorn his triumph, and afterwards was publicly executed.

SIMONIANS, or SIMONITES, disciples of Simon Magus. They embraced the principles of their master ; and in their practices, indulged themselves in all sorts of extravagancies ; which exceeded, says Eusebius, whatever can be said of them. Iren. lib. i. cap. 20. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. cap. 13. They acknowledged in their books, that when their more secret mysteries were first revealed to aspirants, they were filled with horror and amazement. Beside shameless filthiness, they abandoned themselves to sorcery and witchcraft ; and though outwardly they professed a sort of Christianity, yet they incorporated with it the worship of Simon and Helena, under the characters of Jupiter and Minerva, to whom they offered victims and libations of wine. They regarded the worship of idols as indifferent ; so that they were not exposed to persecution as the Christians were for refusing to offer incense to idols ; and the heathen let them continue in quiet, while they tortured the Christians.

The sect of the Simonians continued to the fourth century. Justin says, Apol. 2. that in his time, i. e. about A. D. 150, almost all the Samaritans and some few others, in different places, acknowledged Simon as the greatest of the gods. Clemens Alexandrinus says, Strom. lib. ii. that his followers worshipped him, and endeavoured to become as like him as they could. Irenæus says, lib. i. cap. 20. they were called Simonians ; and Origen assures us, cont. Cels. lib. v. that they went also by the name of Helenians, from Helen. He says also lib. i. about the year 249, that the sect of the Simonians was reduced to about thirty persons : elsewhere, lib. v. that they were extinct. But it is known from other testimonies, that the sect existed at the beginning of the fifth century. An author who wrote on baptism against St. Cyprian, about A. D. 256, says, that certain heretics, descended from Simon, introduced fire above the water when they administered baptism. Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. cap. 1. speaks of Simonians, who mingled themselves among the Catholics, and received Catholic baptism ; but who afterwards, spread in secret the venom of their doctrine. Several were discovered, and expelled the church about the beginning of the fourth century. [This appears very strange to us ; but the worship of Venus, still existing among the seclusions of Mount Lebanon, the preservation of that ancient Egyptian superstition the worship of the calf, among the Druses, called Okkals ; the antiquities remaining from the Egyptian Basilideans, together with the impurities still practised at Martabau, &c. near Aleppo, unhappily render the history of the Simonians and their enormities by far too credible.]

SIMONY, is the giving a temporal consideration for a spiritual thing, office, &c. or for something annexed to a spiritual thing.—We do not read, that Simon or his disciples professedly taught, that this kind of trading was lawful: but the example of Simon, who offered money to the apostles, to obtain the power of communicating the Holy Ghost, has caused the name of Simonians to be given to them, who in imitation of Simon, would purchase for money, by favour, or by good offices, or by any other means of remuneration, a spiritual concern, or any thing relating thereto.

SIMONIAS. Josephus speaks of a village, on the frontier of Galilee, called Simonias; in vita sua, p. 1007. Probably the Shimron, or Semeron, of Zebulun, Josh. xix. 15. The LXX. in some copies read Symoon; and the Talmudists expressly say, that these two names denote the same place. Cod. Megil. fol. 70. col. 1. Gemar. Jerosol. But it appears by Josephus, that Simonias was between Tiberias and Ptolemais, about sixty furlongs from Gaba, a city at the foot of Mount Carmel.

1. SIMPLE, Simplex, is sometimes taken in an ill sense. St. Paul, Rom. xvi. 19. would have the Romans “wise unto good, and simple concerning evil; i. e. discerning in their choice of good; but avoiding whatever has the appearance of evil, as children, who, without much reasoning, fly from every thing that does but seem hurtful to them. [Critics differ as to the derivation of this word; but, it seems generally to mean harmless, not harbouring ill intentions, as Matt. x. 16. “harmless as doves.”] We read, Prov. xxiii. 3. “A wise man foreseeth the evil; but the simple [the unthinking, the heedless] pass on and are punished.”

2. SIMPLE, is opposed to deception, to an unjust, or a wicked person. It stands for sincerity, fidelity, innocence, candour. In this sense Jacob is called a plain, or simple man, Gen. xxv. 27. Job is called a perfect and upright man; according to the Vulgate, a simple man, Job i. 1, 8. Wisdom is given to the simple, Prov. i. 4. xxi. 11.

3. SIMPLE, is sometimes taken for liberality. The single, or simple eye, opposed to an evil eye, expresses a liberal disposition, in contradistinction from a covetous one, Matth. vi. 22. Luke xi. 34. St. Paul says, “he that giveth, let him do it with simplicity,” i. e. liberally, frankly, uprightly, Rom. xii. 8.

[SIMPLE, is capable of a good, a bad, or an indifferent meaning. Simplicity of mind is integrity, innocence of intention, &c. Rom. xvi. 19. honesty, candour, xii. 8. Weak simplicity, on the contrary is credulous, easily imposed on, easily deluded. Prov. xix. 15. xx. 3. The simple believe every word, report, rumour: the simple pass on and are punished: they do not look before them, or take proper steps to avoid evil.

Wisdom invites the simple, the uninformed, the unstudied, to learn of her, to partake of her refreshments, and to be revived by her delicacies, Prov. ix. 4. vide also Psalm xix. 7. cxvi. 6. Ezek. xlv. 20. 2 Cor. i. 12. xi. 3.]

SIMRI, or SEMRI, son of Merari, 1 Chron. xxvi. 10. of whom it is stated, that he was not the first born, yet his father made him chief.

SIN, סין, bush; from סנה senah.

SIN, or ZIN, a city and desert south of the Holy Land, in Arabia Petrea: it gave name to the wilderness of Sin. Scripture distinguishes two cities and two deserts of Sin, one is written סין sin, with sameck: the other, זין, tzin, with tzade.

The first was near Egypt and the Red-sea. The Hebrews were no sooner out of this sea, but they were in the wilderness of Sin, which is between Elim and Sinai. Exod. xvi. 1. xvii. 1. Here God rained manna on them.

The second is also south of Palestine, but toward the Dead Sea. Kadesh was in the desert of Zin: Deut. xxxii. 51. from this wilderness they sent out the spies. Here Moses and Aaron offended the Lord, at the waters of strife, Num. xiii. 21. The land of Canaan, and the tribe of Judah, had the desert of Zin, or Zina, for their southern limit. Numb. xxvii. 14. xxxiv. 3. Josh. xv. 3.

[SIN, SINIM, סיני. In FRAGMENTS, No. DC. the reader has seen a conjecture that the land of Sinim (plural) alluded to by the prophet Isaiah, xlix. 12. included a reference to China: and in Nos. DCIII. DCIV. we have brought him acquainted with a colony of Hebrews settled in that country. There is, therefore, to say the least, a possibility, that whenever Providence shall bring the Jews at large from the east and from the west, that China also shall return members of the nation to the centre of consociation.

Dr. HAGAR, in two very learned tracts has lately attempted to prove, that China was well known to the Greeks, in early ages; and that the trade in silk was the life and soul of that intercourse.

tercourse. We are far from saying, that all the Doctor's propositions must be granted him; yet having ventured to come to some of the same conclusions with himself, we may be allowed to support our opinion by abstracts of his arguments.

In his first work, Description des Medailles Chinoises du Cabinet Imperial de France. Paris, 1805. Dr. H. takes occasion to assert that the Greeks visited that country in search of silk; a commodity then valued at its weight in gold; also, that from thence they procured the famous murrhine vases, which were still more highly prized. He observes, very justly, that China is the land of silk; that emperors, princes, mandarins, servants, soldiers, all ranks, men and women, are clothed in silk, and were so, in ages of the most remote antiquity. Eratosthenes, a native of Cyrene, who died in the second century before Christ, speaks of Thina (Θῖναι) as a country at the extreme eastern limits of Asia, toward the sea. Later geographers continue this name, and hint at the course of Grecian caravans from Hierapolis, in Syria, to Thina, by the route of Ecbatana, the capital of Media, passing north of Persia, to Bactria, thence through Tartary to China.

This hypothesis, was too bold to escape objections; and to answer those raised by the learned De Sacy, Dr. H. published a second work, Pantheon Chinois, &c. in which he resumed the subject. He thinks, that the Greeks received silk through Media [this is credible] ages before they visited China; that Alexander the Great was clothed in silk, and before him Alcibiades, Pausanias, Themistocles, and others. —That the Medic dress of the Persian Cyrus was of silk, and that the celebrated golden fleece, was no other than silk in its natural state. He supposes, therefore, that he risks nothing in describing the royal apparel conferred on Moidecai, by king Ahasuerus, of Persia, as a silken dress, [and Jerom's version of the place, amictus pallio serico, agrees with this notion; as does the rendering of the LXX. byssus.] He says, Ezekiel describes the Assyrians as bringing byssus (silk) to Tyre; and Procopius says, that silken dresses were made at Tyre, in very early ages. The women of Sidon worked veils of variegated colours, παμπολικοί, from the time of Homer; and Joseph's "coat of many colours," says the Dr. might be of silk.

If these propositions be founded on fact, or even the rudiments of them, they may be allowed to justify our inference of the acquaintance of the prophets with the extreme east of Asia. And this, in its turn, is justified by the migrations of Jews to those parts. It should, however, be recollected, that the districts of Tartary bordering on China would not always be correctly distinguished from the country further east, by distant strangers. We have hinted at a similar distinction, in No. DCIII. and it seems, that the countries north and south of the great river, presented, as they still do, two races of people; little short of opposite, in most respects. Pe-king signifies the northern court; Nan-king signifies the southern court. If the Sinim (plural) of the Hebrew prophet had any reference to this distinction, it evinces a more correct knowledge of these people, than the learned of Europe possessed, till within a few years past. And this may account for the different names of the Chinese among the classics, the Thina and the Seres. We have thought so much necessary, in illustration of the passage in Isaiah; also, to justify the view we have taken of the subject, in the FRAGMENTS-referred to. Comp. the Article SILK.]

SIN, Peccatum, is any thought, word, desire, action, or omission of action, contrary to the law of God, or defective when compared with it.

The Hebrews have several words for expressing sin. They think, for example, that 1. חַטָּאת, Chataath, Ἀμαρτία, ἁσέβεια, πλημμελεία, ἀνομία, Peccatum, signifies a sin committed against a positive precept; 2. פְּשָׁעַת, Ashamath, Πλημμελεία, ἁμαρτία, ἄγνοια, ἀδικία, ἀνομία, Delictum expresses a sin committed against a negative precept: 3. שְׁגָגָה, Shegaga, LXX. Ἀκσιως, Ignorantia, involuntary, denotes sins of ignorance, forgetfulness, omission, or inadvertency.

But certain it is, that these terms are often used one for the other, and that Scripture seldom observes such a distinction. It often calls very great sins, by the name of ignorance, or folly; at other times it gives the name of sin to faults of inadvertency.

Sin often denotes the sacrifice of expiation, or the sacrifice for sin, [the sin-offering.] Levit. iv. 3, 25, 29. v. 6. vii. 2. Psalm xl. 6. Rom. viii. 3. St. Paul says, for example, that God was pleased that Jesus, who knew no sin, should be our victim of expiation: "for he hath made him to be sin [a sin-offering: sin, by analogy of ideas] for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." 2 Cor. v. 21. [Gen. iv. 7. some, for sin lieth at the door, read, thou shouldst lay a sin-offering.]

God was not the author of sin, or of death the consequence of sin; but sin and death entered the world by the malice of the devil. (Wisd. i. 13, 14. ii. 24.) Adam by his disobedience, rendered all his posterity depraved, guilty before fore God : his sin involved them all in death ; through him we are born children of iniquity, and are inclined to evil from the womb. 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22. Rom. v. 12. vi. 23. Psalm li. 5. Rom. iii. 23. Gen. viii. 21. Jesus Christ by his death, hath restored life for us : his obedience has reconciled us to God ; he has merited for us the character of children of God.

[It is somewhat remarkable that the different kinds of sin, which are distinguished in the Hebrew, should lose this distinction in the Greek of N. T. We read in O. T. of sin, iniquity, transgression, wickedness, faults, &c. intending degrees of guilt, or kinds of misconduct, which under the theocracy were accurately distinguished, because of the nature of the public punishment due to each, as well as the requisite private contrition. Sacrifices for sin are no longer of different kinds, to suit the varieties of transgressions : but, it may be doubted whether the term sin in the N. T. always denotes the same kind, or degree of sin ; there are certainly sins of ignorance, others of determined malignity, or, against better knowledge, there are sins against individuals, and crimes, or sins of great atrocity, against the public, &c. &c. The difference should be carefully observed : lest tender consciences should accuse themselves of delinquencies, of gross sins, of which they are not, cannot be guilty : this were an abuse of language ; an error to be avoided ; an impeachment of the discriminating power and judgment of the Judge Universal. The murderer who describes his sin as a trifle, a mere peccadillo, is not thereby relieved of his crime, and all who hear him condemn him the more ; instead of extenuating his guilt, this misrepresentation, this abuse of terms, augments his sin, and sinfulness. This is an excess on the contrary side ; but it illustrates the argument. It is as necessary to avoid magnifying simple failings, inseparable infirmities, into profligate crimes ; as it is to avoid diminishing sins of the first magnitude by glozing terms and specious misrepresentations. Our Lord says to Pilate, " he who delivered me to thee hath the greater sin : "—allowances may be made for Pilate, which must be refused to Caiaphas. The Roman soldiers, though the actual executioners of Christ, were less culpable than the Jewish Sanhedrim ; which did not drive a nail into his hands or his feet.]

Sin against the Holy Ghost, is differently explained by the fathers and interpreters. Athanasius, Ep. 4. ad Serapion. who wrote expressly on this subject, relates the opinions of Origen, and of Theognostes, who made the sin against the Holy Ghost, to consist in crimes committed after baptism. But Athanasius well observes, that the Pharisees, whom our Saviour upbraided with this crime, had not received baptism, and consequently were not capable of it. As for himself, he thinks it was chargeable on the Pharisees, because they maliciously imputed the works of Jesus Christ to the power of the devil ; though they could not but be convinced in their own minds, that they were effected by a good spirit : also in this, that they denied the Divinity of the Son, which was clearly proved by his works ; works performed by the divine power of the Holy Spirit. St. Hilary, on Matth. xii. 31. n. 5. and Theophilus of Antioch, Comment in Evangel. lib. i. follow the opinion of Athanasius.

St. Austin says, Serm. Domini in Monte, lib. i. cap. 22. that the sin against the Holy Ghost, consists in subverting brotherly charity from motives of envy and malice : in his Recitations, lib. i. cap. 19. he says, that to render this crime really irremissable, the sinner must persevere in it, finally. He says elsewhere, that though several sins may be committed against the Holy Ghost, yet that none are really irremissable, except final impenitence, despair, the perseverance of a hardened sinner, who stands aloof from God during his whole life. St. Chrysostom, Homil. 42. on Matthew, the author of the imperfect work on St. Matthew, St. Isidore of Damietta, Ep. lib. i. lxxix. and others, think, that this sin consisted in ascribing the miraculous works of Jesus Christ to a diabolical power ; and that its irremissableness is not real and absolute, but only relative, because it is very difficult to obtain the pardon of it.

St. Ambrose is not altogether consistent with himself ; on Luke l. x. n. 94. he makes this sin consist in denying the deity of the son ; in the book of the Holy Ghost, cap. 3. he says it consists in denying the divinity of the Holy Ghost, and in imputing his works to the power of the devil. In his book of Repentance, cap. 24. he extends it to heresy and schism. The Apostolical Constitutions, lib. vi. cap. 18. and Philastrius, Hæresi Rhetorii. also, accuse heretics of the sin against the Holy Ghost. But were the Pharisees guilty of heresy, to whom our Saviour imputes this sin ? Hermas says, lib. iii. similit. 6, 8, 9. the sin against the Holy Ghost, is the blaspheming of God : and the author of the " Questions on the Old and New Testament " says, 9, 102, it is a renouncing of God. The Recognitions, imputed to Clement, think the sin against the Holy Ghost, the irremissable sin, to be that of a hardened and insolent sinner. Grotius, on Matth. xii. 31, espouses this opinion, and and gives as examples of this crime, Pharaoh, Korah, Simon Magus, Ananias, and Sapphira.

Catholic commentators are divided: some follow Austin, and place the sin against the Holy Ghost, with its unpardonableness, in final impenitence; others in the wilful malice of those who withstand the evidence of truth, and will not acknowledge the miracles of Jesus Christ to be the finger of God, but, maliciously, and against the conviction of their own consciences, impute them to the prince of darkness. This was certainly the crime of the Pharisees, to whom Jesus Christ directed his discourse; of which those also become guilty, who oppose a known truth: and who impute good actions in good men, to magic, and diabolical confederacy. This is the opinion of St. Chrysostom and St. Jerom, on Matth. xii. and Ep. 149. ad Marcellam.

[It is clear, that the Pharisees imputed good miracles, performed by a good power, emanating from a good spirit, to an evil power, intending evil purposes. This implied, that in their opinion the miraculous power, that was really of God, gave its sanction to doctrines and to deeds which were really of the devil. It is to be hoped, that few, if any, in these days can be so hardened. Some may doubt of the miracles, and may withhold their assent, till complete conviction: but, this is not irremissible, like ascribing to Satan the works and operations of God.]

SIN, Original. The Catholic Church believes that the sin of Adam has tainted all his posterity; and that all are born children of wrath; Ephes. ii. 3. That by his transgression sin came into the world, and death by sin: Rom. v. 12. This original sin, is well described by Job xiv. 1, 4. "Man that is born of a woman, &c. Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Not one." And David says, Psalm li. 5. "Behold, I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me."

But, notwithstanding these texts, several learned men have doubted, whether the Hebrews had a distinct notion of original sin.

Josephus, Philo, and those Christians who admitted the pre-existence of souls, and thought souls to be born good or bad, according to the good or evil they had done in a former life; could not hold original sin. Those among the ancient Jews who believed a kind of Metempsychosis, were still further from it. And if they did not believe that mankind was born corrupt, in the sight of God, they had no need of supposing any remedy for original sin. Accordingly, in the institution of circumcision, they only mention decency, propriety, or distinction of the Jews from other nations.

The greater part of modern Jews, (Manasseh Ben-Israel, conciliat, in Genes. qu. 6. p. 12. et de Creatione, probl. 17. p. 61.) as well as the ancient, maintain the pre-existence of souls with a kind of transmigration; consequently, they cannot be much inclined to admit original sin; they suppose their children, who die before they receive circumcision, to pass into a state of happiness; therefore they do not think that circumcision remits any sin contracted at or before the birth: yet they acknowledge in man a natural propensity to evil, which they call Yetzira raah. Maimonides, More Nevoch. Part i. cap. 39, maintains, that it is not easier to conceive how a man should be born with sin, or with virtue, than how he should be born a skilful master in any art or science. Other Rabbins as formally deny original sin, and confine the effects of Adam's sin to the introduction of death over all his posterity.

However, we must allow, that other Rabbins strongly maintain original sin, which some of them express by saying, that the devil who tempted Eve, cast upon her such a stinking smell, that she communicated it to all her posterity; but they add, that the Israelites alone were free from it. Basnage's Hist. of the Jews, cap. 4. lib. vi. cap. 13. Others acknowledge, that the bad inclinations which we find in ourselves, are an evil: they say with Moses, that it is the foreskin of the flesh, which must be cut off: they call it with David, a defilement; with Solomon, an enemy; with Isaiah, an offence; with Ezekiel, a stone, which God must take away, to give us a heart of flesh: with Joel, a secret thing. They add, that as the fruit is bitter, so children, descended from a corrupt father, must partake of his corruption. It is asked, in the Gemara, titul. Sanhed. cap. xi. sec. 7. whether concupiscence insinuates itself at the moment of conception, or at the time of birth? It is answered, at the birth; for Scripture says, "sin lies at the door." But the number of Rabbins who thus speak of original sin is small.

The Mahometans admit of original sin, as a consequence of the sin of Adam: they call this "the grain of the heart, (or) the black seed of the heart," which Mahomet related that Gabriel the arch-angel pulled out of his heart: they affirm also, that our Lord Jesus Christ, and his mother Mary were the only persons preserved from it. Bibl. Orient. p. 440, 583.

[SIN, SINNER. There is a passage, Eccl. ix. 13, &c. which I think susceptible of a much clearer sense than it receives in our translation.

There

There was a little city, and few men within it ;
 And there came a great king against it, and besieged
 And built great bulwarks against it ; [it,
 Now there was found in it a poor wise man ;
 And he by his wisdom delivered the city ;
 Yet no man remembered that some poor man.
 Then said I, Wisdom is better than strength :
 Nevertheless the poor man's wisdom is despised,
 And his words are not heard.—But
 The words of the wise are heard in quiet ;
 More than the cry (bawlings) of him who ruleth among fools :

Then said I,
 Wisdom is better than weapons of war ;
 But one SINNER destroyeth much good.

Should we understand it thus ?

Excellent is Wisdom above vases of approach ;—of close inspection ; of great elegance :
 But one defect (flaw in such a vase) ruins the whole beauty, elegance, or extent of excellence :
 expressed by the term—much good.

The comparison is, that of a beautiful vase, which seen close, and carefully inspected, is handsome in its proportions, delicate in its ornaments, &c. but, if a crack, or a flaw be turned to the eye, you cry immediately, "it is imperfect"—and dismiss it with disdain : so the wisdom of this poor man was admired on all sides, till his poverty was detected ; and this flaw vi-tiated all his former merits in an instant.

To justify this version, observe, cali (כלי) is a general word for a receptacle, a comprehender, a vase, whether it contain any essence, &c. or not ; and kereb (קרב) signifies to come close to,
 to cause to draw near, i. e. for the purpose (among others) of close inspection. Instead of one sinner, some versions read one sin, and this is more correct, omitting the points, i. e. one imperfection, one defect, one failing (as poverty is a defect, not a crime) ruins "the much good," the excellence, of the most beautiful superficies.

Matter of fact justifies this simile ; and in point of expression it seems to be admirable.
 That it was customary to place such vases in courts and approaches of eastern palaces, vide
Alhambra. Span. Roy. Soc. Swinburne's Trav.
&c.

Since this article was written, a part of the spoils of Tippoo Saib's palace were brought over from India, and sold by public auction ;
 among them were several vases of great dimensions, and ornamented all over with a profusion of elaborate devices, flowers, &c. They had been placed and valued among the most magnificent of his property ; and they appeared to justify this view of Solomon's observation ; while perfect they were admired ; a single crack, or flaw, would have ruined their beauty.—
Query ? the Murrhine vases of antiquity ?

N. B. If the rendering of our version be retained, cali, "weapons of war," yet we must read sin, or failing instead of sinner, in order to justify the comparison intended by the writer.]

SINAI, סִנְיַי, bush ; from סֵנַח senah. According to the Syriac, enmity.

SINAI, or SINA, a famous mountain of Arabia Petræa, on which God gave the law to Moses, Exod. xix. 1. xxiv. 16. xxxi. 18. xxxiv.
 Levit. xxv. 1. xxvi. 46. It stands in a kind of peninsula, formed by the two arms of the Red-sea, one extending north, called the gulph of Kolsum ; the other extending east, called the gulph of Elan. See the PLATE, TRAVELS of ISRAEL in the WILDERNESS. The Arabs give mount Sinai the name of Tor, i. e. the mountain, by way of excellence ; or Gibel Mousa, the mountain of Moses : it is 260 miles from Cairo, which is a journey of ten days. The wilderness of Sinai, where the Israelites continued encamped almost a year, and where Moses erected the tabernacle of the covenant, is considerably elevated above the rest of the country ; the way to it is very craggy, the greater part absolute rock ; then one comes to a large space of ground, or a plain surrounded on all sides by rocks and eminences, whose length is nearly twelve miles. Coppin's Voyage to Egypt. c. 10.
 See PLATES, VIEWS, MAPS, &c. of SINAI.

Toward the extremity of this plain, on the north, two high mountains appear, the highest is called Sinai, the other Horeb. They are of very steep ascent, and do not stand on much ground, in comparison to their extraordinary height. Sinai is at least one third part higher than the other, and its ascent more upright and difficult. The top of the mountain terminates in an uneven and rugged space, which might contain about sixty persons. On this eminence is built a little chapel called St. Catherine's, where it is thought the body of this saint rested for 360 years ; until it was removed into a church at the foot of the mountain. Near this chapel issues a fountain of very good fresh water ; it is looked on as miraculous, it not being conceivable how water can flow from so high and so barren a mountain.

Mount Horeb, stands west of Sinai ; so that at sun-rising the shadow of Sinai covers Horeb.
 Beside the little fountain at the top of Sinai, there is another at the foot of Horeb, which supplies the monastery of St. Catherine. Five or six paces from thence they shew a stone, in height four or five feet ; in breadth about three ;
 this, they say is that from which Moses caused the water to gush out ; its colour is, a spotted grey, and it is, as it were, set in a kind of earth, where no other rock appears. This stone has twelve

twelve holes or channels, about a foot wide, whence they say the water issued for the Israelites. Vide MOSES, and PLATE III. MISCELLANIES, FRAGMENTS, No. CCLXXXIV.

The Arabians reckon among the sons of Israel, one called Tor, or Tour, who gave name to mount Sinai, which they call Tour-Sinai. They also give the name of Tour to a small town or village, west of the mountain, on the shore of the Red-sea. Mahomet begins the chapter in his Alcoran, called the fig, by this oath: "I swear by the fig, by the olive, by mount Sinai, and by the sure and faithful-city." The fig stands for a mountain of Palestine called Tor-lina, the mountain of the fig: the olive stands for the mount of Olives near Jerusalem: mount Sinai is known: the faithful city is Mecca. Sinai is in great veneration among the Mussulmen, because of the law which God gave on this mountain. D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 501.

Below this mountain, is a monastery of Greek monks, who had heretofore only a tower built near the burning bush of Moses. But, finding themselves exposed to the insults of the Arabs, who devoured all their provisions, even to the consecrated bread of the eucharist; they petitioned the emperor Justinian to build them a strong monastery, to secure them from these depredations; the emperor complied; but it is said, he put the architect to death, for pitching on this place for the monastery; which he did because of its nearness to the burning bush, and for the conveniency of the water. It is called the monastery of St. Catherine. See other descriptions in FRAGMENTS, Nos. DLVI. DLVII.

["The bush of the Lord," says Simon, so called from the bush in which the Lord appeared to Moses, Exod. iii. 2. in like manner as Horeb is called the "mount of God," Exod. v. 1. 1 Kings xix. 8. In Greek it is written Sina. Acts vii. 30.]

SINCERITY. Sincerus. 'Ακέραιος, εἰλικρινής, ἀπλῆς, &c. This word properly signifies truth and uprightness, when the heart and tongue agree together. Sincerity is opposed to double-mindedness, to deceit, when the sentiments of the heart are contrary to the language of the lips. The Latin word Sincerus is derived from sine and cera,—without wax; honey separated from the wax, i. e. perfectly pure honey. In Scripture sincere signifies pure, without mixture. Wisd. vii. 25. Sapientia est emanatio quadam claritatis omnipotentis Dei sincera. St. Paul, Phil. i. 10, would have the Philippians to be pure, their behaviour innocent, free from offence. "That ye may be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ." And St. Peter,

2 Epist. iii. 1. exhorts the pure—sincere mind of the faithful; "I stir up your pure [minds]." St. Paul speaks, 1 Cor. v. 8. of sincerity and truth, or of purity and truth, in opposition to the leavened bread of iniquity. He reproaches the false apostles with not preaching Jesus Christ sincerely, purely, with upright and disinterested sentiments. Phil. i. 15.

SINDON. This word properly signifies a shroud, and the evangelists use it, to denote the linen cloth, in which Joseph of Arimathea wrapped the body of Jesus, after he had embalmed it, had winded bandages about it, and had put the napkin upon his head. Matt. xxvii. 59. Mark xv. 46. Luke xxiii. 53. St. John, chap. xx. 7. supplies those circumstances which St. Matthew had omitted. The many holy napkins, or Sudaria, shewn in several places, cannot be every one the true Sindon in which Christ's body was involved, but are imitations of it.

Sindon is also mentioned in the history of Samson. Judg. xiv. 12, 13. He promises the young men that were at his wedding, if they could explain his riddle, Triginta Sindones et totidem tunicas. Hebr. סדינים וחלפות, thirty Sedinim, and thirty changes of raiment. By Sedinim or Sindonem, some understand the tunic, worn next the skin; and by changes of raiment, complete suits of clothes, a tunic and a coat, for that was a complete suit; or only thirty coats which, with thirty tunics, made thirty changes of raiment.

The virtuous woman commended by Solomon, Prov. xxxi. 24. made sindons and girdles, which she sold to the Phenicians. The young women of Jerusalem wore sindons, as appears from Isaiah iii. 23. This was a fashion peculiar to the Sidonians, and Phenicians; and perhaps the name was derived from the city of Sidon. Martial says, that the sindon of Tyre, or Phenicia, covers a man all over, and puts him in a condition to despise rain and wind.

Ridebis ventos, hoc munere tectus, et imbres,
Nec sic in Syriâ Sindone tectus eris.

MART. lib. iv. Ep. 19.

The young man who followed Jesus Christ the night of his passion, Amictus sindone super nudo, was probably, by this defended against the cold, as by a night-gown. Mark xiv. 51.

[The modern shawl, is the nearest representation of the Sindon; and as shawls are originally from the East, Cashmere, &c. it is very probable that the name Sindon has some reference to the river Sind, i. e. the Indus; or to the provinces adjacent to that river. See FRAGMENTS, No. DCII.]

SINEW.

SINEW. The Hebrews do not eat the sinew of the thigh of animals, in memory of the sinew of Jacob's thigh, which the angel touched, and which contracted such a debility that, according to some interpreters, he went lame of it all his life after. This abstinence from the sinew of the thigh of animals, is not commanded to Israel by the law; for they must have abstained from it even before the law, according to the observation, Gen. xxxii. 32. Some interpreters think, this forbearance is only voluntary devotion. In some places they abstain wholly from the hind quarter of animals; in other places they content themselves with taking away the sinew. See JACOB.

[SINGING, has always been a part of public worship. From the earliest ages music was consecrated to devotion, and as vocal music was undoubtedly prior to instrumental, we need not hesitate in regarding the melody of the voice as an original accompaniment of sacred service. It was continued under the Mosaic ritual, was regulated by David, was practised by the primitive Christians, and is with great propriety retained among us: but whether it be duly cultivated among us, might bear a question.

It is much to be regretted, that no traces of the hymns, or odes, used by the primitive Christians, have come down to us; unless those in the Revelations are copies or imitations, of such as were chanted in public worship. That "spiritual songs" of various descriptions were extant, and even popular in the first churches, appears from several passages in the N. T. and that hymns were sung to Christ as to a God, is explicitly stated by Pliny in his famous 97th epistle. The earliest hymn known, is not older than the time of St. Basil; and it may be justly questioned, whether at this time the original form had not been greatly departed from. Whether it has been restored in hymns well known among us, we do not here enquire; but, certainly, not all of them can be correctly placed under the description given by Pliny of the primitive Christian songs, or the primitive mode of singing.]

SINITE, סִינִי, or SINÆUS, bush, enmity.

SINITE. The eighth son of Canaan. Gen. x. 17. The Sinites dwelt near Arce, in mount Libanus. Jerom, quæst. Hebr. in Gen. Strabo mentions the fortress of Sinna in the mountains. By Sinæi, the Arabic means the inhabitants of Tripolis, in Phenicia.

SION, שִׁיֹן, Σιών, noise, tumult; from שִׁיֹן shaon, or שִׁיֹן shauh. [very high?]

SION. שִׁיֹן, SION, or SION. Deut. iv. 48. This is one of the names of mount Hermon: [rather, of a mountain, or of a chain of mountains; the whole called mountains of Hermon: from mount Hermon, the principal.] Probably of this mountain the Psalmist speaks, cxxxiii. 3. "As the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descendeth upon the mountains of Zion." The Hebrew here says, Zion, צִיּוֹן; but it seems to be put for Sion, שִׁיֹן. The union and the good understanding of brethren, is as agreeable as the dew which falls on Hermon and Sion, two contiguous mountains. [Why are these two mountains selected? Did the same kind, or cloud, of dew which covered one cover also the other, at the same time, &c. they being so closely adjacent?] Jesus son of Sirach, speaks also of mount Hermon, under the name of Sion. Ecclus. xxxiv. 17. Quasi Cupressus in monte Sion: in the Greek, in monte Hermon.

VOL. II. PART XXVII. Edit. IV.

[SION, צִיּוֹן, a heap, or hill; otherwise, a prospect place, or dryness, or, the dry height; but, if the י is radical, it may be derived from the Arabic and Ethiopic, in which the same root signifies to guard, to protect, to defend, and so a fortification; which appears to have been the original character of this mountain, where we first read of it, 2 Sam. v. 7. et al.

A mountain near Jerusalem; called also, "the mount of the Lord," and the "holy mountain." See ZION.

In this mountain stood,

1. The king's court and palace, &c.
2. The house of the Asmoneans, and the Xystus, or open gallery, in the further part of the upper city.
3. A bridge, leading from the Xystus to the temple; and joining the temple to Sion.

This bridge, no doubt, was over the valley between the two hills; and it seems to fix this Xystus and the house of the Asmoneans in the situation allotted to Millo, by those who suppose that Millo was a public hall for assemblies of the people; and we read, Joseph. de Bello, l. ii. c. 28. that king Agrippa called the people of Jerusalem together into this Xystus, where he set his sister Berenice before them. See the MAP of JERUSALEM; and consider the repeated desolations to which this once elevated mountain has been subject; also FRAGMENTS, passim.]

SIPHMOETH, שִׁפְמוֹת, the beard, or brims. David sent to Siphmoth the spoils taken from the Amalekites. 1 Sam. xxx. 28. [the steeps?]

SIRAH, סִרָה, cauldrons, pots, thorns; from סִיר sir: or treason, rebellion; from סִרָר sirur.

SIRAH, or SIRA, a well, or ciatera, not far from Hebron. 2 Sam. iii. 26. [Perhaps this well had the shape of a pot.]

SIRAH, Σιράχ, song of the brother; from

2 D div. 2

סִיר

שיר shir, or שור shur, a song, and אחא achah, brother.

SIRACH, father of Jesus who composed the book of Ecclesiasticus; whence he is commonly called, Jesus son of Sirach.

SIRBON. A lake known to the ancient geographers, between Palestine and Egypt, on the coast of the Mediterranean sea, not far from mount Cassius. It had a communication with the Mediterranean sea, by a small arm. Sometimes it is reckoned to Egypt, sometimes to Judea, because it lay between both countries.

SIRION, שריון, called SHENIR, Deut. iii. 9. A breast-plate; from שריון shiriah, or שריון shirion: otherwise, deliverance, or song of the dove; from שרה sharah, to untie, or from שור shur, a song, and יונה jonah, a dove. The Sidonians give this name to mount Hermon. See HERMON.

[Simon thinks it imports the great coat of mail: in conformity with the Arabic root, which signifies the highest part of a thing; so the highest part of several mountains; as we might say, the peak, or summit. Psalm xxix. 6.]

SISAI, שי, Σει, sir, or the sixth, or fine linen, or cotton; from שש shesh, otherwise, joy; from שש shush. [Sheshai. Eng. Tr.]

SISAI, a giant of the Anakim. Num. xiii. 22.

SISAMAI, ססמי, horse, or swallow of the waters; from סוס sus, a horse, &c. and מים mim, waters: or blindness, according to the Syriac. 1 Chron. ii. 40. [Perhaps, dissolution, i. e. weakness, of God; meaning great weakness.]

SISERA, סיסרא, that sees a horse, a swallow; from ראה raah, to see, and סוס sus, a horse, &c. [Perhaps, sharp-sighted as a swallow; or the bird we call a swift.]

SISERA, general of the army of Jabin, king of Hazor. Judg. iv. 2. A. M. 2719, ante A. D. 1285. He was sent by his master against Barak and Deborah, who occupied mount Tabor with an army. Sisera marched with nine hundred chariots armed with scythes, and a great number of infantry; but, entangling himself among broken ground, was attacked by Barak at the head of ten thousand men, and entirely routed. Sisera himself fled; quitted his chariot, and ran on foot towards Harosheth of the Gentiles. Approaching the tent of Heber the Kenite, Jael, wife of Heber, desired him to enter and hide himself. She covered him with a mantle; and gave him milk to drink. Sisera said to her; "Stay at the door of the tent, and if any ask you, who is here? answer Nobody." Jael afterwards returning, and finding him fast asleep, drove a tent nail through his temples with a hammer, and fastened him to the ground. When Barak arrived, she shewed him Sisera weltering in his blood, dead.

SISTER, Soror. In the style of the Hebrews, sister has equal latitude with brother. It is used, not only for a sister by natural relation from the same father and mother; but also for a sister by the same father, only, or by the same mother, only; or a near relation, only. Sarah is called sister to Abraham, Gen. xii. 13. xx. 12. though only his niece, according to some, or sister by the father's side, according to others. In Leviticus, xviii. 18. it is forbid to take to wife the sister of a wife; to marry two sisters. Or, according to some interpreters, to marry a second wife, having one already. Literally, "Thou shalt not take a wife over her sister to afflict her;" as if to forbid polygamy. Those who are called in the Gospel, brothers, and sisters, of Jesus Christ, are his cousins; children of the sisters of the Holy Virgin. Matth. xiii. 56. Mark vi. 3.

In Cant. iv. 9, 10, 12. v. 1, 2. the name of sister is a name of tenderness between the spouses. Sometimes the word sister expresses a resemblance of conditions, and of inclinations. The prophets call Jerusalem the sister of Sodom, and of Samaria; because that city delighted in imitation of their idolatry and iniquity. Jer. iii. 8, 10. Ezek. xvi. 45.

Jesus Christ describes those who keep his commandments, as his brothers and his sisters. Matth. xii. 50. Job exclaims, "I have said to corruption, Thou art my father; to the worm, thou art my mother and my sister." Job xvii. 14. The wise man, Prov. vii. 4. advises his pupil to say to wisdom, "Thou art my sister;" i. e. to love her, and become familiar with her. St. Paul asks, whether it were not as lawful for him as for other apostles, to carry with him in his journies some pious Christian sister, or wife; 1 Cor. ix. 5. As Christians saluted each other by the name of brother, so they called Christian women sisters. St. James says, ii. 15, 16. "If a brother, or a sister be naked, and destitute of daily food," &c. Vide BROTHER, FATHER, MOTHER, SON.

SISTRUM, an instrument of music, anciently common in Egypt:

Isiacos agitant mæcedonica Sistra tumultus.

AUSON. Ep. xxv.

The invention of this instrument is attributed to Isis; and her priests generally used it in her ceremonies:

Jactantem Phariâ tinnula Sistra manu.

OVID. de Ponte.

The

The Sistrum was of an oval figure, with brass wires across, which played in holes wherein they were stopped by their bent heads. It was played by shaking the sistrum in cadence; whereby the brass wires made a shrill and loud noise. Apuleius gives this description of it: Dextrâ quidem gerebat aureum crepitaculum, cujus per angustam laminam, in modum balthei recurvatam, trajecta mediâ pauca virgulæ, crispante brachio trigeminus jactus, reddebant argutum sonum. Metam. lib. xi. Vide MUSIC, Plate I. No. 13.

SISUTHRUS, or XISUTHRUS. It is believed that the Babylonians had a knowledge of the deluge, and that Noah was commemorated by them under the name of Sisuthrus. Vide Alex. Polyhist. apud Syncell. p. 30. Cyrill. Alex. lib. i. in Julian. Euseb. Præp. lib. ix. cap. 12. They say, that Saturn appeared in a dream to Sisuthrus, and informed him, that a flood was about to destroy all mankind. He commanded him to write the origin, the progress, and the completion of all things, and to bury the record thus written, in the earth, in the city of Sipharis,—(probably Kiriath Sepher, or Dabir) to build a capacious vessel; to enter it with his relations and friends, and to launch into the sea. Sisuthrus obeyed this order, laded his vessel with provisions, and took in all sorts of animals. His vessel was, they say, five stadia, or 625 paces long, and two stadia, or 250 paces wide.

The deluge came, and all were drowned who were not with Sisuthrus. When he perceived the waters to abate, he sent out a bird, which finding no food, nor resting-place, returned to him. Shortly after, he sent out others, which returned with their legs daubed with mud. Lastly, after a longer interval, he let others go, which did not return. Then he understood that the earth was dry; he opened his vessel, and quitted it with his wife, his daughter, and the pilot. He went up into a mountain, where he worshipped the earth, erected an altar, and sacrificed to the gods. After this he appeared no longer upon the earth, neither himself, nor those who quitted the ark with him. The others that continued in the vessel, going out likewise, sought every where for Sisuthrus, but in vain. Having called him several times, they heard his voice, recommending to them piety, and the worship of the gods. He also told them, that in future he was to have no conversation with men, but was to live with the gods. It is easily observed, that this has a very great conformity with the history of Noah. [The voice of Sisuthrus heard after his death, is the code of institutions civil and sacred, that he left to his successors among mankind. Comp. FRAGMENTS, Nos. XIX. XX. DIX. et seq. also the PLATES of DAGON; with Nos. 4, 5, 6, on PLATE of NOAH'S ARK.

SIVAN, סִיבָּן Nisbân, bush; from סִיבָּן sene: or thorn; סִיבָּן sin. These etymologies are violent, and uncertain. The name of a Hebrew month. Baruch i. 8. The third month of the holy year; the ninth of the civil year. It answers to the moon of May.

SKINS. Our first parents had no sooner committed sin, 'ere they perceived their nakedness. They made themselves aprons of fig-leaves. Gen. iii. 7, 21. But soon afterwards, God gave them coats of skins for clothing. Vide ADAM. [It is most probable they were the skin (for the word is singular, not plural) of a sacrifice.] By these coats of skins, some ancients understood the barks of trees. Others translate, "He made them coats to cover their skins." The Chaldee, "He made them robes of honour, to cover their flesh."

Moses leaves to the priests the skins of the victims, and this was one of their chief perquisites. Lev. vii. 8. But when a sacrifice was offered for the sins of the priest himself, the skin was burned out of the camp, or the city. Lev. iv. 11. viii. 17. xvi. 27.

Tents were anciently made of skins. Hab. iii. 7. the tents of the Midianites. Cant. i. 4 the tents of king Solomon. The ark of the Lord was lodged under a covering of skins: 2 Sam. vii. 2. The Psalmist compares the heavens to a vast tent of skins. Psal. cii. And Jeremiah says, iv. 20. "suddenly are my tents spoiled, and my curtains in a moment."

Country people were often clothed with skins; and skins are enumerated among the clothing of the people. Lev. xi. 32. xiii. 48. xv. 17. Prophets, and such as professed austerity, wore girdles of leather. Elijah, 2 Kings i. 8. John the Baptist. Matt. iii. 4. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. CCCXIX. CCCXX.

[SLANDER, an evil report not justly founded; or a rumour without fair authority, to the disadvantage of another. This is a much greater sin, and more opposed to the true charities of Christianity, than many, to judge by their unregulated discourses, seem to be aware of. Comp. SCANDAL.]

SLAVES. Men were originally free and equal; slavery entered the world by sin. To punish the affront received from his son, Ham, Noah foretold his slavery, Gen. ix. 25. When Abraham was chosen of God, to become the father of the faithful, he received circumcision, as a sign, which distinguished him, and his people, ple, as the servants of the Lord. His descendants always valued themselves on their liberty. "We have never been servants to any," said the Jews, John viii. 33. And St. Paul magnifies the liberty of the true children of Abraham, as being really free, born of a free mother, in opposition to the race of Ishmael, born of a mother who was a slave. Gal. iv. 31. This regards moral liberty, and moral servitude. But the rabbins maintain, that they have never been in subjection to any one by a servitude which they call intrinsic, and which changes the condition of the person. If they have been reduced to slavery, that does not destroy that state of liberty wherein they were born, say they.

Nevertheless, the Hebrews have in fact, been subject to several princes: to the Egyptians, the Philistines, the Chaldeans, the Grecians, and the Romans. Many have been forced to sell their liberty; others, being taken in war, remained slaves to their conquerors. Moses himself notices two or three sorts of slaves among the Hebrews. They had foreign slaves, obtained by capture, by purchase, or born in the house. Masters had an entire authority over these; they might sell them, exchange them, punish them, judge them, and even put them to death, without public process. Exod. xxi. 20, 21. "If a man smite his servant, or his maid, with a rod, and he die under his hand, he shall be surely punished; notwithstanding, if he continue a day or two, he shall not be punished, for he is his money."

This must be understood, say the Rabbins, (Vide Selden, de jure Nat. et Gent. lib. iv. cap. 1.) of Hebrew slaves, not of foreign slaves, which a master might possess, and might use what severity towards them he pleased, with impunity; for in this case the law of Moses enjoined nothing. They followed the rules common to other nations, among whom masters had absolute power over their slaves. Apud omnes per æquæ nationes animadvertere possumus, dominis in servos vitæ necisque potestatem fuisse. Yet wise men have always disapproved that power which certain masters assumed, of putting their slaves to death. Cato the censor would never put any of his slaves to death, before they had been condemned, and found deserving of death, by his other slaves. Plutarch, in Catone. Job testifies, that he had never declined to enter into judgment with his slaves, on occasion of any dispute between them. Job xxxi. 13, 14, 15.—The Athenians punished with death him who had killed a slave, as much as if he had killed a freeman.

The Samaritan text, in this passage, differs from the Hebrew. It reads: "He that shall strike his man-servant, or his maid-servant, with a rod, if they die under his hand, he shall not be molested, he shall not die; and if the servant survives for two or three days, he shall not be punished, because it is the price of his money." As if all this related only to a Canaanitish, or Gentile slave, which the civil laws allowed the owner to put to death with impunity. [It could not be called impunity, if the master was punished, though short of death: as this reading seems to import.]

The Chaldee paraphrast, some Rabbins, and some commentators, are of the same opinion; that this has no regard to Hebrew slaves; for, say they, it cannot be said of an Israelite slave, that he was the price of his master's money. He was in servitude but for a few years, and the damage his master would suffer by putting him to death, and thereby depriving himself of his services, would not have been punishment enough. Whereas the loss of a foreign slave was a considerable prejudice to an interested master, and he was in some measure, justly punished for his cruelty, by the death of a man who was his own in perpetuity; and who might have left him children of the same condition as himself.

Moreover, it was not the design of the Lord, that the Israelites should be reduced to perpetual slavery by their brethren; or that they should be sold to strangers, to remain slaves for their whole lives. But if a Hebrew sold himself to a stranger living in the country; this Hebrew might redeem his freedom, if he had the means. If not, one of his relations might redeem him, paying to his master the sum he had cost, deducting the service he had done, and reckoning his time of service to the year of jubilee; when he had a right to go out gratis.

In Exodus xxi. Moses enacts regulations concerning Hebrew slaves:—"If thou buy a Hebrew servant, six years he shall serve, and in the seventh he shall go out free for nothing."—The rabbins insist, that a slave was obliged to serve seven years complete; but the generality of commentators think, that he went out free in the sabbatical year, though he had served only two or three years. Moses adds, "He shall have at going out the same clothes he had at coming in, and his wife shall go out with him." The Hebrew has it; "If he came in by himself [with his body] he shall go out by himself: if he were married, then his wife shall go out with him." The Rabbins say, that the master was obliged to maintain the wife and children of a slave, though the husband only was the slave.

"If his master have given him a wife, and she hath hath borne him sons or daughters; the wife and her children shall be her master's, and he shall go out by himself;" [with his body.]—This law is capable of several senses; A master might make a Hebrew slave marry a woman slave of another nation: and as this woman is no Israelite, she could not enjoy the privilege of the sub-batrical year; but her husband might quit her, and enter on his liberty this year. It is asked, Whether the marriage was dissolved by this separation? Interpreters are divided on this question. What appears to us to have the greatest certainty, is, that as there could probably be no marriage among slaves, who had taken one another without choice, and without liberty, so there could be no dissolution of marriage in their separation.

"If the servant shall plainly say, I love my master, my wife, and my children, I will not go out free:" Then his master shall bring him unto the judges [Heb. gods]; he shall also bring him to the door, or unto the door-post, [of his master's house] and his master shall bore his ear through with an awl, and he shall serve him for ever:"—(Deut. xv. 17.)—according to the commentators, till the year of jubilee: for then all slaves, without exception, recovered their liberty. Jerom, on Galat. 1. Grot. Vatab. Tirin, &c.—The rabbins add, that slaves were set free also at the death of their masters, and did not descend to their heirs.

"If a man sell his daughter to be a maid-servant, [or a slave] she shall not go out as the men-servants do." Exod. xxi. 7. The laws now mentioned do not concern her. There is another kind of jurisprudence for Hebrew girls, than for men, or boys. A father could not sell his daughter for a slave, according to the rabbins, till she was at the age of puberty, and unless he was reduced to the utmost indigence. Besides, when a master bought an Israelite girl, it was always with presumption that he, or his son, would take her to wife. Hence Moses adds, "If she please not her master," and he does not think fit to marry her, he shall set her at liberty: or, according to the Hebrew, "he shall let her be redeemed. To sell her unto a strange nation he shall have no power, seeing he hath dealt deceitfully with her," as to the engagement, implied at least, of taking her to wife.

If he hath betrothed her unto his son, he shall deal with her after the manner of daughters." Exod. xxi. 9, 10. He shall take care that his son uses her as his wife, that he does not despise her, or maltreat her. If he make his son marry another wife, he shall give her her dowry, her clothes, and compensation for her virginity;"

or, according to the Hebrew, "If he make his son marry another wife, he shall not diminish the clothes, the maintenance, or the habitation of the former:"—intending, say several commentators, that the master who bought this maid, and made his son marry her, if his son marries a second wife, he shall take care that he treats this first woman as his wife; that he allow her food and raiment, and perform the duties of marriage to her, as to his true wife; if he does not, "then shall she go out free without money."

Otherwise, if the father of a family who has bought an Israelite maid, does not marry her, nor make his son marry her; or if he would dismiss her after he had kept her for some time, he shall be bound to find her a husband, or to sell her to another Hebrew master, on the same conditions that he had taken her himself; giving her a portion, her clothes, and the price of her virginity, agreeable to custom; or as regulated by the judges.

A Hebrew might fall into slavery several ways: 1. If reduced to extreme poverty, he might sell himself. Lev. xxv. 39. 2. A father might sell his children as slaves. Exod. xxi. 7. 3. Insolvent debtors might be delivered to their creditors as slaves. 2 Kings iv. 1. 4. Thieves not able to make restitution for their thefts, or the value, were sold for the benefit of the sufferers. Exod. xxii. 3. 5. They might be taken prisoners in war. 6. They might be stolen, and afterwards sold for slaves, as Joseph was sold by his brethren. 7. A Hebrew slave redeemed from a Gentile by one of his brethren, might be sold by him to another Israelite.

Slavery, servitude, or bondage, in Scripture often expresses the subjection of one people to another. Gen. xxvii. 37. Isaac says to Esau; "Behold, I have made him thy Lord, and all his brethren have I given to him for servants." The Egyptians say to Joseph, "Buy us and our land for bread, and we and our land will be servants to Pharaoh." When Samuel declares to the Hebrews the rights and prerogatives of a king, 1 Sam. viii. 16, 17. he says, "He shall take your slaves, and your maids, and you yourselves shall be subject to him as slaves." And Goliath says to the Israelites, 1 Sam. xvii. 8, 9. "Am not I a Philistine, and you servants to Saul? Choose you a man for you, and let him come down to me. And if he be able to fight with me, and kill me, then will we be your servants. But if I prevail against him, and kill him, then shall ye be our servants, and serve us."

SLEEP, sleeping, slumbering, is taken first, for the natural sleep or repose of the body; secondly, for the moral sleep of the soul, supineness, ness, indolence, stupidity; thirdly, for the sleep of death.

You shall sleep with your fathers," you shall die, as they are dead. Jer. li. 99. Daniel says, xii. 2. Those that sleep in the dust of the grave." John xi. 11. "Lazarus our friend sleepeth; let us go and awake him:" He is dead, let us go and revive him. "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." Ephes. v. 14. He speaks to those dead in sin and infidelity. St. Peter says of the wicked, "their damnation slumbereth not;" 2 Peter ii. 3. God is not asleep; he will not forget to punish them in his own due time. Prov. xxiii. 21. The slumberer shall be clothed with rags; the slothful shall live in poverty.

Isaiah speaks of a superstitious practice among the Pagans, who went to sleep in the temples of their idols, to obtain prophetic dreams; Isai. lxxv. 4. בְּנוֹצֵרִים יָלִינוּ. Qui habitant in sepulchris, et in delubro idolorum dormiunt. He speaks of superstitious and idolatrous Jews, who contemning the prophets and the temple of the Lord, slept in tombs, or in temples of idols, to procure dreams that might discover future events to them. The Pagans for this purpose used to lie on the skins of the sacrificed victims,

Pellibus incubuit stratis, somnosque petivit.

VIRGIL, Æneid, vii.

The Hebrew may be thus translated, "They remained in the sepulchres, and passed the night among the monuments," or in deserted places. Strabo says, lib. xvi. that the Jews slept in their temples, and there expected prophetic dreams, both for themselves and others; but that God sends none but to such only as live in purity and justice. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CCIV. Balaam.

To sleep is also taken for the commerce between the sexes. Gen. xix. 33.

[SLIME, Gen. xi. 3. a bituminous production, procured from pits in the earth, out of which it issues, often in considerable quantities. The slime procured by the builders of Babel, was from a town now called Hit, or Ait, some miles above Babylon, on the river Euphrates. The remains of this cement are visible throughout Babylon, at this day. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DXCL. et seq.

Slime Pits, were pits yielding bitumen, probably of the same nature as the above. Gen. xiv. 10.]

SLING, funda; an instrument of cords, used to throw stones by the arm, with violence. The invention of the sling is ascribed to the Phenicians, Pliny, lib. vii. cap. 56. or to the inhabitants of the islands Baleares, now called Majorca and Minorca. Vegetius, de re Militari, lib. iv. The Hebrews heretofore made great use of this weapon. The tribe of Benjamin had especial skill and dexterity in the sling, and could hit a mark to a hair, Judg. xx. 16. This must be owned to be an exaggeration; but however, it evinces their proficiency in the management of the sling. David obtained great glory when he knocked down by his sling, the giant Goliath, the terror of all Israel. 1 Sam. xvii. 49. Scripture notices, that when David was at Ziklag, there came to him a company of slingers, who could use their left-hands with the same facility as their right. 1 Chron. xii. 2. Uzziab, king of Judah, made great collections of arms in his magazines, particularly of bows and slings for casting stones, 2 Chron. xxvi. 14.

[There is a remarkable simile employed by the royal sage, Prov. xxvi. 8. "As he who bindeth a stone in a sling, so is he who giveth honour to a fool;"—he counteracts his own intention. But the margin reads, perhaps, more correctly, "as he who putteth a precious stone among a heap of stones," i. e. pebbles; so is honour completely overwhelmed by base companions, if a given to a fool.]

SMELL. Jacob said to his sons, after the slaughter of the Shechemites. Gen. xxxiv. 30. "Ye have troubled me, to make me to stink among the inhabitants of the land:" Ye have given me an ill scent, or smell, among this people. The Israelites in like manner complained to Moses and Aaron, Exod. v. 21. "The Lord look upon you, and judge, because you have made our savour to be abhorred in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of his servants." This manner of speaking occurs pretty frequently in the Hebrew. In a contrary sense, St. Paul says, 2 Cor. ii. 15, 16. "We are unto God a sweet savour of Christ, in them that are saved, and in them that perish: To the one we are the savour of death unto death, and to the other the savour of life unto life." [Vide the Rabbins' account of Eve. SIN, ad fin. also, Dr. Mac-knight's version of the passage, in the FRAGMENTS illustrating the early life of St. Paul.]

In the sacrifices of the old law, the smell of the burnt offerings is represented in Scripture, as agreeable to God; Gen. viii. 21. "And thou shalt burn the whole ram upon the altar: it is a burnt-offering unto the Lord; it is a sweet savour, an offering made by fire unto the Lord." The same thing, by analogy, is said of prayer. Psalm cxli. 2. "Let my prayer be set forth before thee as incense; and the lifting up of my hands, hands, as the evening sacrifice." And St. John, [an allusion to this service of the Old Testament] Rev. v. 8. represents the twenty-four elders with "golden phials full of odours, which are the prayers of the saints."

In Daniel iii. 27, Odor ignis, the smell of fire, seems to insinuate, that the clothes of the three young men, thrown into the fiery furnace, were not so much as singed, or had the smell of fire upon them.

SMERDIS, king of Persia, called Artaxerxes, or Artachsarta, Ezra iv. 7. Cyrus the Great, says Xenophon, Cyrop. left two sons, Cambyses, and Tanaoxares, otherwise called Smerdis, or Mergis, according to Justin. . Cambyses took his brother with him in his expedition against Egypt. But when it was found that Smerdis was the only one of his army who could draw the bow that the Ethiopians had sent him, Cambyses conceived such a jealousy against him, that he sent him back into Persia.

Some time after this, having dreamed that Smerdis had assumed the crown of Persia, he sent one of his confidants, named Prexaspes, to put him to death; which he did, privately.

After about three years, Cambyses set out to return from Egypt, to Persia. Herodot. lib. iii. When arrived in Syria, he found a courier dispatched from Persia, with an account, that Smerdis the son of Cyrus, had ascended the throne. And indeed, Pathisites, a chief of the Magi, to whom Cambyses had left the government of Persia, in his absence, had placed his own brother, Smerdis, on the throne. He had great resemblance to Smerdis, the prince of that name, who had been killed by Prexaspes, and whose death was not publicly known.

Cambyses gave orders for the march of his troops with all expedition to punish this usurper: but, as he was mounting his horse with too great precipitation, his sword fell out of the scabbard, and wounded him in the thigh, of which he died soon after: Before his death, he sent for the grandees of Persia, acquainted them with the death of his brother Smerdis, and with the usurpation of the Magian, conjuring them not to submit to the surreptitious authority of this impostor. Herodotus calls him Smerdis; Æschilus, Mardus; Ctesius, Spendates; and Justin, Oropastes.

No sooner was he confirmed in his government by the death of Cambyses, but the Samaritans, always at enmity with the Jews, wrote to him, that the Jews, who were constantly factious and turbulent, were now rebuilding the city and temple of Jerusalem; and when they had completed this undertaking, it was much to be apprehended, they intended to revolt; which might encourage the neighbouring nations of Syria and Palestine to do the same, &c. This letter having been received at court, the archives of the kingdom were inspected, where indeed it was easy to observe, that the Hebrews had long maintained a war against the kings of Assyria and Babylon, and at last had been subdued by king Nebuchadnezzar. Ezra iv. 7.

On this, an order was sent forbidding the Jews to proceed in building Jerusalem, or the temple; and the Samaritans were directed to see this order complied with. Thus was this work interrupted until the second year of Darius, son of Hystaspes, who permitted it to be resumed; but the prohibition of rebuilding the city walls was not taken off until A. D. 3550, by Artaxerxes Longimanus.

Smerdis omitted nothing to secure his possession of the throne of Persia. He married Atossa daughter of Cyrus, and granted his subjects an exemption from taxes, and military service, for three years: and as he had great reason to fear the worst, if it should be known that he was not the true Smerdis, he carefully avoided appearing in public: this was not unusual in Persia, where their kings, to preserve the respect due to majesty, shewed themselves but seldom: yet this exceeding caution rendered him the more suspected. Ozanes, a Persian noble, whose daughter Phedyma was of the number of the king's wives, privately enquired of his daughter whether the king was the true Smerdis or no? She informed him, that having never seen Smerdis the son of Cyrus, she could not judge of this. He wished her to enquire of Atossa the daughter of Cyrus, and sister to Smerdis. But Phedyma informed her father, that the wives of the king had no correspondence with one another, nor were allowed to see one another. At last, Ozanes directed his daughter to observe whether the king had his ears or not; for Cyrus had caused the ears of the counterfeit Smerdis to be cut off, for some crime. Phedyma while the king was sleeping soundly by her, satisfied herself, that he had lost his ears: of which she gave intelligence to her father.

Ozanes opened the matter to six of the principal nobility, who, forming a party, entered the palace without suspicion, attacked the usurper, with his brother Pathisites, the contriver of this intrigue: killed them both, and exposing their heads to the people discovered the whole imposture.——Darius son of Hystaspes succeeded Smerdis. Vide DARIUS.

SMITE. To smite, is often used for to kill. David smote the Philistine: he killed Goliath. The

The Lord smote Nabal; he smote Uzzah; he put them to death. To smite, is also put for to afflict, to strike with fear, with the pestilence, with poverty, with ulcers, with distempers, with wounds. To smite an army, is, to conquer it, to rout it entirely. To smite the camp of the Philistines, is, to disperse it, to obtain a victory over them. To strike, literally, to smite a covenant, is to contract an alliance. God smote the Philistines, in posteriora; with the piles, or hemorrhoids, or other disease of the fundament. To smite with the tongue, is to load with injuries and reproaches; with scandalous reflections. To smite, or strike hands, is sometimes an action of applause and approbation; at other times, is a token of grief, trouble, and astonishment.

To smite the cheek, to smite with the fist, require no explication. Lam. iii. 30. To smite the thigh, denotes indignation, trouble, astonishment. Jer. xxxi. 19. To strike hand against hand, signifies, express your trouble, by smiting your hands. Ezek. xxi. 14. "He shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth," Isaiah xi. 4. God shall destroy them with his breath. To wound [or smite] the weak conscience of a brother," 1 Cor. viii. 12. is, to create unnecessary scruples in his conscience, and to expose him to the commission of sin. To strike or smite one's heart: David smote his heart; he felt remorse, at having cut off the lappet of Saul's garment. 1 Sam. xxiv. 6.

[SMOKE. an exhalation from matter in a state of combustion; but, in Eng. translation sometimes means vapour, or steam, i. e. a condensed mist, rather than smoke. So Psalm xviii. 8. the anger of God is described as seated in his nose [vide NOSE, NOSTRILS] there went up a smoke out of his nostrils—not smoke strictly, but a kind of exhalation, vapour, which accompanies heated breathing—such is the simile; for only as a simile can it be taken. Judgments are likened to smoke, i. e. mists, clouds, fogs, &c. spreading over a country, Isaiah xiv. 31. and in other places a thick vapour is probably intended rather than smoke, Job xli. 40. Isaiah vi. 4. Rev. xv. 8.]

SMYRNA, Σμύρνα, from the Greek word Myrrh.

SMYRNA, a city of Asia Minor, on the Archipelago, having a fine harbour. Jesus Christ, by the mouth of St. John, addresses the angel or bishop of Smyrna. Rev. ii. 8, 9, 10.

It is asked, who was this angel, or bishop? The generality think it was Polycarp, who was made bishop of Smyrna by the apostle John. Iren. lib. iii. cap. 3. Tertull. Præscript. cap. 32. Jerom, de Viris Illust. cap. 32. alii. The commendations given to the angel of Smyrna, agree with St. Polycarp; and it is observable, that here is not one word of reproach. There is some probability that the martyrdom of St. Germanicus and others, of Smyrna, who suffered under Marcus Aurelius, was what St. John had in view, when he says, the devil shall put some of them in prison. [Of all the seven churches of Asia Minor, Smyrna, only, may be said to retain a light in its candlestick; the others are totally dark.]

[SNOW is frozen vapour, the particles uniting in their descent from the higher regions of the air, are formed into flakes by the time they reach the earth. Being extremely white, snow forms an object of comparison in Scripture, frequently. So the leprosy is compared to snow, Exod. iv. 6. Numb. xii. 10. 2 Kings v. 27. Snow is enumerated among the stores in the treasury of God, his atmospherical meteors, &c.

The expression, Prov. xxv. 15. "as the cold of snow in the time of harvest, so is a faithful messenger to them who send him; for he refresheth the soul of his masters"—seems to refer to the cooling effect of snow on the wine drunk in the East; or to what in Italy is termed al-fresco, i. e. snow put into water to cool it, previous to its being drank, which is esteemed extremely refreshing. This takes away the contradiction of this passage with chap. xxvi. 1. As snow, i. e. a fall of snow, in summer, is unnatural, and ill-timed, so honour is not seemly for a fool: but is quite out of character, out of season.]

SNUFFERS, Emunctoria. מלקחיה, Exod. xxv. 38. xxxvii. 23. The snuffers were to snuff the lamps of the great golden candlestick with seven branches, that stood in the sanctuary. They were of gold, and their form was probably like that of our snuffers, used to snuff lamps, or candles. The word comes from a root that signifies, to lay hold of, to pinch, to shut up, to receive.

SO, סו, Seah, Σαῦα, a measure for grain, or dry matters, which the Greeks translate by Σάρον. [As if it were derived from the Modius placed on the head of Serapis, the Egyptian deity. See the PLATES, MEDALS of CÆSAREÆ, No. 10. EGYPT, No. 25, 28. EPHESUS, No. 18. et al.] But it is better to acknowledge, that the true etymology of this Egyptian word is not to be found in the Hebrew tongue. [Simon thinks it is from the Coptic to take up, with which agrees the Ethiopic; so, to raise up, i. e. to dignity: whence a prince, or ruler—in modern language, his highness?]

SO, or SUA, king of Egypt: he made an alliance with Hoshea king of Israel, and promised him assistance, assistance, yet gave him none; nor prevented Shalmaneser king of Assyria from taking Samaria, and subverting the kingdom of Israel, A. M. 3283, ante A. D. 721. 2 Kings xvii. 4.

Usher, and Marsham, think So, otherwise Soos or Sous, is the Sabacon king of Ethiopia, who is taken for the first king of the dynasty of Ethiopians in Egypt. Usher says, he began to reign A. M. 3277, having taken and burnt alive Bocchoris king of this country. He reigned eight years. He had for his successor Sevechus, whom Usher thinks to be the Sethon, of Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 141. Usher, ad A. M. 3279. Can. Egypt. saculo 16. p. 484. Vide FRAGS. No. CCCXXII.

SOBA, צוּבָה, army, or battle; from צוּבָה tsaba: otherwise, swelling, or tumor; from צוּבָה tsabah. [Or, perhaps, declivity, low, sunken, from the Arabic: either, itself hollow, or, abounding in hollows, concavities; whence Cælo (i. e. hollow) Syria.]

SOBA; SYRIA of SOBA, or ARAM of SOBA. We think Soba to be a city which gave name to a part of Syria. But this city having been destroyed, or having changed its name, we cannot certainly say how far Syria of Soba extended. It appears, that it must have been at the northern extremity of Cælo-Syria, from Libanus and Anti-libanus toward Antioch; for it is different from Syria, of Damascus, of Emath, of Rohob, of Maachah, and of Geshur. Soba is called Sobol, or Sobal, in Judith iii. 1, 14. I suppose Soba, or Sobal, might be Hoba, or Hobal or Abyla, between Libanus and Anti-libanus. See Syria of Soba.

SOBAL, שָׁבֵל, way, spike, thigh; from שָׁבֵל shobel; or, old-age, vain; from בָּלָה balah, to grow old, and שָׁוָה shovuh, vain. [increase?]

I. SOBAL, the city of Seir the Horite, Gen. xxxvi. 20.

II. SOBAL, Syria of, see SOBA.

SOBER, Sobriety; is commonly taken for the opposite to intemperance: sometimes also for moderation, modesty, and that virtue which chuses the golden mean. Rom. xii. 3. "For I say, through the grace given unto me to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think; but to think sobriety, according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith." St. Paul, 1 Tim. ii. 9. would have women dress themselves "in modest apparel, with shame-facedness and sobriety," as decency requires. Also the word sobriety is taken for vigilance: 1 Tim. iii. 2. Νηφάλιον, Vigilantem, Pagn. Mont. Erasm. Est. Menoch. Pisc. A Bishop must be vigilant, sober. Elsewhere it imports prudent, moderate: 2 Tim. i. 7. Σωφρονισμος, sobrietas, frug- galitas, modestia, animi tranquillitas, &c. "For God has not given us the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind, or sobriety." When Antiochus Epiphanes was told of the murder of the high-priest Onias, he was so moved at it, that he shed tears; remembering the wisdom and the moderation of the great man: "because of the sobor and modest behaviour of him that was dead." 2 Macc. iv. 37.

[We have no English word that properly expresses the whole meaning of the term rendered in Eng. Tr. sobor. It imports steadiness of mind, prudence, the power of forming a just estimate of things: a sense of what is becoming; which differs, according to time, place, and circumstances; together with a suitable behaviour and conduct.]

SOCOH, סֹכֹחַ, SocETH, tents, tabernacles; from סָךְ sac. See SUCCOTH.

SOCOH, Soco, or Socho, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 35. 1 Sam. xvii. 1. Heber repaired Socoh, 1 Chron. iv. 18. and his family dwelt there. Rehoboam fortified it afterwards: 2 Chron. xi. 7. Eusebius says, there were two cities of Socoh, the higher, and the lower Socoh, nine miles from Eleutheropolis toward Jerusalem. [Shoco, Eng. Tr.]

SODI, סוּדִי, my secret [or, counsel]; from סוּד sod, secret, and the pronoun 'i, my. Numb. xiii. 10.

SODOM, שְׂדֹמָה, their secret, their lime, their cement; from, סוּד sod, secret, and the pronoun הָ ah, theirs; or from שוּד shud, lime: but improperly, for Sodom is written with ד samech.

[Sunon thinks dew, or plentiful waters, as the Arabic root imports; and I the rather incline to this idea, as I conceive that Sodom was surrounded by streams, islets, &c. which were beautiful in the highest degree. Comp. Gen. x. 19. xiii. 10. Ezek. xiii. 46. In the Greek, Matt. xi. 23. called Sodoma.]

SODOM, the capital city of Pentapolis; for some time the dwelling place of Lot, the nephew of Abraham. Gen. xiii. 12, 13. The crimes of this city were so enormous, that God destroyed it by fire from heaven, with three neighbouring cities, Gomorrah, Zeboim, and Admah; which were as wicked as itself. Gen. xix. A. M. 2107, ante A. D. 1897. The plain wherein they stood, was before pleasant and fruitful like an earthly paradise. It was first burned, and was afterwards overflowed by the waters of the Jordan, which formed the present Dead-sea, or lake of Sodom. It is believed Sodom was one of the southern cities that were destroyed; because it was near Zoar, which was beyond the southern point of the Dead-sea.

It is doubted whether it stood within the space of land now possessed by this sea, or only upon its border. The prophets mention the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrhah, or allude to it, and insinuate, that these places shall be desert, and dried up, and uninhabited, Jer. xlix. 18. l. 38.; that they shall be covered with briars and brambles, a land of salt and sulphur, where can be neither planting nor sowing: Deut. xxix. 22. Wisd. ii. 9. Amos iv. 11. Throughout Scripture the ruin of Sodom and Gomorrhah is represented as one of the most signal effects of God's anger. Josephus says, de Bello, lib. v. cap. 5. that around the lake of Sodom, and the cities destroyed by fire from heaven, the land is all burnt up, and the dismal effects of this terrible burning are still visible, as are the remains of those unfortunate cities. The fruits which grow there have a fair outward appearance, and seem good to the sight; but are full of ashes, and, when opened, fly away in dust. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DLX.

It should seem then, that in Josephus's time, the ruins of these five cities were still in being. Strabo, Geograph. lib. xv. also speaks of the ruins of Sodom, which were sixty furlongs in compass, and were to be seen on the shore of the Dead-sea. The Notitia makes express mention of Sodom, as an episcopal city. Severus, a bishop of Sodom, is found among the bishops of Arabia, who subscribed to the first council of Nice. M. Reland cannot persuade himself that Sodom was ever rebuilt; he believes the word Sodom, among the subscriptions to the council of Nice, must be a fault of the copiers; but I cannot be of his opinion. The record is very circumstantial, it puts the episcopal city of Sodom between Thamar and En-geddi. Stephens the geographer, in 'Egyáda, et in Sódoua, puts En-geddi near Sodom. So that I see no cause for doubting whether, subsequently Sodom was rebuilt, either in its former place, or near it: but though it appears to me very probable, that it was not covered by the waters of the Dead-sea, and that it stood on the shore of this sea, yet I would not strenuously oppose the contrary opinion.

[Having elsewhere supposed that this country was overwhelmed by an earthquake, (and volcanic fire,) I shall produce testimonies from Arab writers in confirmation of that opinion.

Ibn Haukal says, "The land of the tribe of Lot is called Aredz al Moukloubah, (the land turned upside down). Neither corn, nor herbage, nor cattle, are found here; the ground is black; and stones are seen scattered about, which one would imagine to be the stones showered down on that wicked race."

The Koran says, (chapter of Hejr) "Wherefore a terrible storm from Heaven assailed them at sun-rise, and we turned the city upside down, and rained on them stones of clay hardened in the fire:"—lava, and other volcanic matters.

The following is Volney's description of the present state of this district. Travels, vol. 1. p. 303.

"The south of Syria, that is, the hollow through which the Jordan flows, is a country of volcanos: the bituminous and sulphureous sources of the lake Asphaltites, the lava, the pumice-stones thrown upon its banks, and the hot-baths of Tabaria, demonstrate that this valley has been the seat of a subterraneous fire, which is not yet extinguished. Clouds of smoke are often observed to issue from the lake, and new crevices to be formed upon its banks. If conjectures in such cases were not too liable to error, we might suspect that the whole valley has been formed only by a violent sinking of a country which formerly poured the Jordan into the Mediterranean. It appears certain, at least, that the catastrophe of five cities destroyed by fire, must have been occasioned by the eruption of a volcano then burning. Strabo expressly says, "that the tradition of the inhabitants of the country (that is of the Jews themselves) was, that formerly the valley of the lake was peopled by thirteen flourishing cities, and that they were swallowed up by a volcano." This account seems to be confirmed by the quantities of ruins still found by travellers on the western border. These eruptions have ceased long since; but earthquakes, which usually succeed them, still continue to be felt at intervals in this country. The coast in general is subject to them, and history gives us many examples of earthquakes, which have changed the face of Antioch, Laodicea, Tripoli, Berytus, Tyre, Sidon, &c. In our time, in the year 1759, there happened one which caused the greatest ravages. It is said to have destroyed, in the valley of Balbec, upwards of twenty thousand persons; a loss which has never been repaired. For three months the shock of it terrified the inhabitants of Lebanon so much, as to make them abandon their houses, and dwell under tents." Comp. ASPHALTUS, ASPHALTITES; and Jude 7.]

SOHEM, or SHOHAM, שֹׁהַם, a sort of precious stone. Jerom and the LXX. generally render this word by the onyx-stone; but we think it signifies an emerald. See Gen. ii. 12. and PRECIOUS STONES. In the history of the East, we find several princes called by the name Soheme; from this Hebrew word.

SOLOMON, שְׁלֹמֹה, peaceable, or perfect, or that recompences; from שָׁלוֹם. [perfectly peaceable?]

SOLOMON, or SALOMON, son of David and Bathsheba, born A. M. 2971, ante A. D. 1033. The Lord loved him, and sent the prophet Nathan to give him the name of Jedidiah, i. e. Beloved of the Lord; 2 Sam. xii. 24, 25. This was, probably, when Nathan assured David, that this son should succeed him, and should inherit those promises made him some years before, when he had conceived the design of building a temple to the Lord: for then God told him, by the prophet Nathan, "You shall not build me a house; but I will set one of your children upon the throne after you; he shall build a house to my name," &c. 2 Sam. vii. 5. 1 Kings viii. 17. 1 Chron. xvii. Psalm cxxxii. 11.

From this time David prepared what was necessary for building the temple, and gave Solomon an education proportionate to the great designs God had ordained him to. But, toward the end of David's reign, Adonijah, his eldest son, began to act as if he were successor to the crown; and David did not restrain him. Joab, Abiathar, and several principal men of the court, were in his interest: but Zadok the high-priest informed Bathsheba, the mother of Solomon, of his designs; and by her application to David, procured the King's orders for the immediate coronation of Solomon. Vide BATHSHEBA and DAVID. These orders were obeyed; Solomon was anointed king of Israel; inaugurated amid the acclamations of the people, and placed on the throne of David; who said, "Blessed be the Lord, who has this day permitted me to see with my own eyes my son Solomon sitting on my throne."

Adonijah, and his guests, being alarmed, fled for safety; and were assured of it, by Solomon, to whom they came and pledged allegiance.

David's death being at hand, he earnestly recommended to Solomon a strict fidelity and piety towards God: bid him punish Joab, and Shimei; but favour the sons of Barzillai, who had succoured him in his distress. He put into his hands plans for building the temple, also accounts of his treasures for erecting this edifice: with many other regulations civil and sacred. Lastly, in a general assembly of the people, and of the great men, David delivered to him his gold, silver, and valuable materials, collected for building the temple, and exhorted all present to make each an offering to the Lord, according to his abilities.

Solomon now entered on full possession of the kingdom. Soon after this, his brother Adonijah made interest with Bathsheba, that she would intreat Solomon to give him Abishag [the last wife of David] to wife. Bathsheba did so; but Solomon perceiving Adonijah's evil craftiness, ordered him to be put to death. He also banished the high-priest Abiathar to his country-house, because he had been of Adonijah's party. When Joab heard what had happened, he fled to the tabernacle as a place of refuge. Solomon commanded him to be put to death there. He also ordered Shimei to build a house in Jerusalem, and not to quit that city. Shimei obeyed this order for a time, but transgressing it, Solomon sent Benaiah to kill him. Vide SHIMEI. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CCC.

Solomon being confirmed in his kingdom, contracted an alliance with Pharaoh king of Egypt, and married his daughter. A. M. 2991, ante A. D. 1013. He brought her to Jerusalem, and appointed her apartments in the city of David, till he should build her a palace, which he did some years afterwards, when he had finished the temple. It is thought, that on occasion of this marriage, Solomon composed the Canticles, which are a kind of Epithalamium. To the same is referred Psalm xlv. This marriage has not been generally approved. Scripture speaks of the daughter of Pharaoh, as contributing to pervert Solomon; 1 Kings xi. 1, 2. Neh. xiii. 26. and it is very likely, that if at first this princess might seem converted to the Lord, she afterwards might indulge her private disposition to idolatry, and engage her husband in it.

Solomon, accompanied by his troops, and all Israel, went up to Gibeon where was then the brazen altar, upon which he offered a thousand burnt-offerings. The night following God appeared to him in a dream; and said, "Ask of me what you desire." Solomon begged of God a wise and understanding heart, and such qualities as were necessary for the government of the people committed to him." This request was agreeable to the Lord; and was fully granted. Solomon returned to Jerusalem, where he offered a great number of sacrifices on the altar, before the ark of the Lord, and made a great feast for his servants.

Two women of ill repute came before the king, and complained, "That one of them had stifled her child in her sleep, and having privately conveyed it to her companion, had stolen her living child, and pretended it was her own." As each of these women eagerly claimed the living child, the king ordered to cut this child into two equal parts, that each of the women might have half of it. But the real mother of the child, moved by natural affection, said to the king, "Let not the child be divided; rather let her take the whole child." Solomon, without hesitation, determined that the child should be given to her, for she was the mother of it. All Israel hearing of this decision, were filled with reverence for their king, perceiving his great wisdom, and knowledge of the human heart.

Solomon enjoyed a profound peace throughout his dominions; Judah and Israel lived in security; and his neighbours either paid him tribute, or were his allies: he ruled over all the countries and kingdoms, from the Euphrates to the Nile, and his dominions extended even beyond the Euphrates: he had abundance of horses and chariots of war: he exceeded the Orientals, and the Egyptians, in wisdom and prudence: he was the wisest of mankind, and his reputation spread through all nations. He composed, or collected, three thousand proverbs, and one thousand and five canticles. (LXX. and some interpreters, say five thousand, instead of a thousand and five, as the Hebrew.) He knew the nature of plants and trees, from the cedar on Libanus, to the hyssop on the wall; also of beasts, of birds, of reptiles, of fishes. There was a concourse of strangers from all countries to hear his wisdom; and ambassadors from the most remote princes. He made gold and silver as common in Jerusalem as stones in the street; and cedars as plentiful as the sycamores in the valley.

Hiram, king of Tyre, hearing that Solomon was made king of Israel, sent ambassadors, to congratulate his accession to the crown. Some time afterwards, Solomon desired him to supply wood and workmen, to assist in building a temple to the Lord. Hiram readily complied, and Solomon bound himself to give 20,000 measures of wheat, and 20,000 measures of oil. The Hebrew and Vulgate have only twenty measures of oil; but it is thought it ought to be twenty thousand. Joseph. Ant. lib. viii. cap. 2. adds, wine also; and indeed it is said, 2 Chron. ii. 20. that Solomon gave to Hiram's workmen wheat, barley, wine, and oil.

Josephus says, that in his time were preserved in the archives of Tyre, the letters of Solomon and Hiram to each other. He cites Dion and Menander, who said that these two princes used to send enigmas to one another, in order to be solved.

Solomon began to build the temple in the fourth year of his reign, the second after the death of David; four hundred and eighty years after the Exodus. He employed in this great work seventy thousand proselytes, descendants of the ancient Canaanites, in carrying burthens; four-score thousand in cutting stones out of the quarries; and three thousand six hundred overseers of the works. Besides thirty thousand Israelites in the quarries of Libanus.

The temple was completed in the eleventh year of Solomon; so that he was but seven years in finishing this vast work. The dedication was the year following, A. M. 3001. To render this ceremony the more august, Solomon appointed the eighth day of the seventh month of the holy year, the first of the civil year, (answering to our October.) The ceremony of the dedication lasted seven days, at the end of which began the feast of tabernacles, which continued seven days longer; so that the people continued at Jerusalem fourteen or fifteen days, from the eighth to the twenty-second of the seventh month.

When the ark was placed in the sanctuary, while the priests and Levites were celebrating the praises of the Lord, the temple was filled with a miraculous cloud; so that the priests could no longer continue there, nor perform the functions of their ministry. Solomon, then on his throne, prostrated himself with his face to the ground; rising up, and turning toward the sanctuary, he addressed his prayer to God, and besought him, that the house which he had built might be acceptable to him, that he would bless and sanctify it, and hear the prayers of those who should intreat him from this holy place. He besought him also to fulfil the promises he had made to David his servant, in favour of his family, and of the kings his successors. Then he turned himself to the people, and blessed them. Fire coming down from heaven, consumed the victims and burnt-sacrifices on the altar, and the glory of the Lord filled the whole temple.

On this day the king caused to be sacrificed 22,000 oxen, and 120,000 sheep for peace-offerings. And because the altar of burnt-offerings was not sufficient for all these victims, the king consecrated the court of the people. The Lord appeared a second time to Solomon in a dream; probably in the night that followed the first day of the dedication; and said to him: "I have heard your prayer, and have chosen this temple to be my house of sacrifice. I will bless you, and your posterity, if you are constant in my worship; but if not, I will punish you, and destroy this edifice."

daughter. He was thirteen years in finishing these buildings, and employed therein whatever the most exquisite art or the most profuse riches could furnish. The palace in which he generally resided, was called The House of the Forest of Lebanon; probably because of the great quantity of cedar used therein. He gave Hiram twenty cities in the province of Galilee. See CABUL. Hiram also sent Solomon six-score talents of gold; probably he lent them to Solomon to go on with his buildings. 1 Kings ix. 14.

Solomon also built the walls of Jerusalem, the place called Millo, in this city; he repaired and fortified Hazor, Megiddo, Gezer, the two Bethhorons, upper and lower; Baalath, and Palmyra, in the Desart of Syria. He also fortified the cities where he had magazines of corn, wine, and oil; and those where his chariots and horses were kept. He brought under his government the Hittites, the Hivites, the Amorites, and the Perizites, which remained in the land of Israel. He made them tributaries, and compelled them to work at the public works.

He fitted out a fleet at Ezion-geber, and at Elath, on the Red-sea, to go to Ophir. Hiram, king of Tyre, furnished him mariners, who instructed the subjects of Solomon. They performed this voyage in three years, and brought back gold, ivory, ebony, precious wood, peacocks, apes, and other curiosities. In one voyage they brought Solomon four hundred and fifty talents of gold, 2 Chron. ix. 21. or, only four hundred and twenty. as 1 Kings ix. 28.

About this time the queen of Sheba came to Jerusalem, attracted by the great fame of king Solomon. She brought rich presents of gold, spices, and precious stones. She proposed several enigmas, and hard questions, to which Solomon gave her such satisfactory answers, that she owned, what had been told her of his wisdom and magnificence, was not half what she had found. The king, on his part, made her rich presents,

Solomon was one of the richest, if not the very richest of all princes that have ever lived; and Scripture expressly tells us, he exceeded in wealth and wisdom all the kings of the earth. His annual revenues were six hundred and sixty-six talents of gold, without reckoning tributes from kings and nations, or paid by Israelites, or sums received for customs. The bucklers of his guards, and the throne he sat on, were overlaid with gold. All the vessels of his table, and the utensils of his palaces, were of gold. From all parts he received presents, vessels of gold and silver, precious stuffs, spices, arms, horses, and mules; the whole earth desired to see the face of Solomon, and to hear the wisdom God had put into his heart.

But the later actions of his life inflicted a sad disgrace on his character. Besides Pharaoh's daughter, he married wives from among the Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, Sidonians, and Hittites. He had 700 wives, who were so many queens, besides 300 concubines. These women perverted his heart, in his declining age, so that he worshipped Ashtoreth, goddess of the Sidonians, Moloch, idol of the Ammonites, and Chemosh, god of the Moabites. To these he built temples on the mount of Olives, over against, and east of Jerusalem. Wherefore the Lord said to him in a dream, "Since you have not kept my covenant, nor obeyed my commandments, I will rend and divide your kingdom, and will give it to one of your servants." See REHOBAM. Solomon, before his death, saw the beginnings of revolt, in the troubles raised by Jeroboam; and by Hadad the Idumean.

Solomon died, after he had reigned forty years, A. M. 3029, ante A. D. 1705. We think he might be about fifty-eight years of age; for he was about eighteen when he began to reign. Josephus, Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 3. init. allows him eighty years of reign, and ninety-four years of life; but this is a manifest error. The history of this prince was writ by the prophets Nathan, Ahijah, and Iddo. He was buried in the city of David, and Rehoboam his son reigned in his stead, but not over all Israel.

A famous question is started concerning the salvation of Solomon. Some decide it in his favour; others to his disadvantage: In my opinion, they are wisest who preserve silence.

Several interpreters are of opinion, that the book of Ecclesiastes is a monument of the repentance of Solomon, being composed by him after his fall and recovery.

Of all the ingenious works composed by Solomon, we have nothing remaining but his Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Canticles. Some have ascribed to him the book of Wisdom, and Ecclesiasticus. But we have shewn under their titles, that these opinions are very improbable. The Jews think he was the author of Psalm lxxii. "Give the king thy judgments, O God, and thy righteousness unto the king's son," &c. And Psalm cxxvii. "Except the Lord build the house," &c.

There has also been published, The Psalter of Solomon, containing eighteen Psalms, found in Greek, in the library of Augsburg, by Andrew Schott; which have been translated into Latin, and given to the public, by Father de la Cerda

Cerda. The learned are agreed, that they are none of Solomon's, but of some Hellenistical Jew, much conversant in the sacred authors, who has composed them in imitation of the Psalms of David, of which he has pretty closely imitated the style; and has inserted in them several fragments of the prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel, which he has well enough accommodated to his design.

These eighteen Psalms, were not unknown to the ancients. They were formerly in the famous Alexandrian manuscript, preserved in the British Museum, as may be seen by the index at the end of the New Testament; though the Psalms themselves are lost. Lambecius mentions a manuscript in the emperor's library, wherein these Psalms are found, between the books of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus. But the Hebrews had never any knowledge of this work, nor the Latins neither; and the ancient Greeks, who might have been acquainted with it, have never quoted it as Scripture.

Some of the Orientals ascribe to Solomon, the invention of the Syriac and Arabic letters; and the tradition of the Syrians is, that this prince communicated the Syrian characters to Hiram, king of Tyre; at whose request, he translated the Scriptures into the Syrian language. But these traditions deserve little credit. The origin of the Arabic characters, or the versions of the Scripture into Syriac, are not so ancient as Solomon; and besides, of what use could translations be to a Tyrian prince, who spoke Phenician, i. e. the same language as Solomon.

Eupolemus, in Eusebius, alleges a pretended letter of Solomon to Vaphres, king of Egypt, and Vaphres's answer; also a letter of Solomon to Suram, king of Tyre, Sidon, and Phenicia, together with Suram's answer, (probably he means Hiram, or Hiram.) But these letters are looked on as fictitious, as well as those in Josephus, Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 2. which are nearly of the same taste, but more conformable to what we find in Scripture.

Josephus assures us, that Solomon composed books of enchantments, and several manners of exorcism. Origen speaks of conjurations used by the Jews in his time, to expel devils, by writings they pretended to have received from Solomon. The Orientals think he had the secret of tying up, or chaining demons, and of commanding them to serve him.

The Greeks tell us, that this prince composed several pieces in physic; on the nature and virtues of stones, of vegetables, and simples. But king Hezekiah seeing great abuses made of these works, suppressed them all. Yet this has not hindered, but that since his time there have appeared several books of secrets in magic, medicine, and enchantments, under the name of this prince: with other works; as "The Instruction of Solomon to his son Rehoboam: Solomon's Hygromancy, to the same; The Testament of Solomon; The book of the Throne of Solomon; The Book of Magic, composed by demons, under the name of Solomon: The Clavicula, or Master-Key of Solomon; The Ring of Solomon; The Contradiction of Solomon;" and others. [Some of which are very abominable and infamous; nevertheless, they have been sold for very great prices; especially those which some great name has called genuine, because whoever possesses one of these works, calls all others impostures: as they do not agree together. However, so far as may be judged, whatever the writers and sellers might be, the possessors, and students of them are no Solomons.] Some impute to Solomon the book of Job.

The orientals have entertained such a grand idea of the merit and great qualifications of this prince, that they give the name of Solomon or Soliman, as an honour to their kings. D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 819.

They pretend he was not only king of the Jews, and of the neighbouring nations, but also universal monarch of the earth. His vizier, or prime minister, was Asaph, to whom David addresses several Psalms. And not only all men, but good and evil spirits, the birds, and even the winds, were under his direction. He had, they say, a wonderful ring, which discovered to him not only things present, but also the past, and the future. The form and matter of his throne in magnificence exceeded all description. They add many extravagancies, which only shew their talent for hyperbole, and their application of that talent to Solomon.

SOLYMA. A name given to Jerusalem.

SOLYME, a town beyond Jordan, in the district of Gaulon. Joseph. de vitâ suâ. p. 1013.

SOLYMI. Homer and Chœrilus the poet, (apud Joseph. lib. i. contra Appion,) have mentioned the Solyimi, an ancient and venerable people, who spoke Phenician, who wore their hair cut round, and who dwelt in the Solymean mountains, near a great lake. These marks Josephus and Tacitus, Hist. lib. v. cap. 2. thought described the Jews, because of their capital city Jerusalem: a nation remarkable for the singularity of their laws, and for their actions, speaking Phenician or Hebrew, dwelling in a mountainous country, and near the lake Asphaltites.

Notwithstanding these tokens, many learned men men maintain, that the Solyimi were not Jews. Circumstances which much favour their opinion are, that according to Chœrilus, the Solyimi wore their hair cut round, which was expressly forbid by Moses. Lev. xix. 7. that the Lake Asphaltites, is seven or eight leagues from Jerusalem. The arms which the poet assigns to them, helmets made of the leather of a horse's head dried in the smoke, can hardly agree with the Jews, who had never much to do with horses.

Who then are these Solyimi? Some think them to be Moabites, or Midianites, bordering on the lake Asphaltites, and reckoned among the Arabians, who, say historians, used to cut their hair round. We do not any where find them called Solyimi; but Josephus mentions a town or village so named, beyond Jordan, in the Gaulonitis. Others think, that the Solymean mountains were in Pisidia, near to Lycia; and that here we must seek the Solyimi of Homer and Chœrilus.

[SON, vide CHILDREN, FATHER, DAUGHTER. This word is used in several senses, both in the Old and in the New Testament.

1. SON, the immediate offspring of its parents.

2. GRANDSON: so Laban is called son of Nahor, Gen. xxix. 5. whereas Laban was his grandson, being the son of Bethuel, Gen. xxiv. 29, and Mephibosheth is called son of Saul, though he was the son of Jonathan, son of Saul, 2 Sam. xix. 24.

3. Remote DESCENDANTS, so we have the sons of Israel, &c. many ages after the primitive ancestor.

4. Son-in-law. There is a son born to Naomi, Ruth iv. 17.

5. SON by adoption, as Ephraim and Manasseh, to Jacob, Gen. xlviii. Vide ADOPTION, FRAGMENTS, No. CCCXXIX. &c.

6. SON by nation, sons of the East, i. e. natives of that country, 1 Kings iv. 30. Job i. 3.

7. SON by reference to the human species: as sons of Adam, sons of men, &c. Youths, young men. Prov. vii. 7.

8. SON by education, i. e. a disciple; Eli calls Samuel his son, 1 Sam. iii. 6. Solomon calls his disciple his son, in the Proverbs often; and we read of the sons of the prophets, 1 Kings xx. 35. et al. i. e. those under a course of instruction for ministerial service, &c. in pretty near which sense a convert is called son. 1 Tim. i. 2. Titus i. 4. Philem. 10. 1 Cor. iv. 15. 1 Peter v. 13.

9. SON by disposition and conduct, as sons of Belial, Judg. xix. 22. 1 Sam. ii. 12. unrestrainable persons: Sons of the mighty. Psalm xxix.

1. heroes; Sons of the band, 2 Chron. xxv. 18. soldiers rank and file. Sons of the sorcerers, who study or practise sorcery, Isaiah lvii. 8.

10. SON, in reference to age; son of one year, Exod. xii. 5. i. e. one year old; son of sixty years; &c. the same in reference to a beast, Micah vi. 6.

11. SON, the male offspring of a beast, Lev. i. 5, 14, &c.

12. SONS of oil, Zech. iii. 14. the branches of the olive-tree, bearing fruit, &c.—Son of oil, Isaiah v. 1. a hill producing abundance of olive-trees, and by them yielding oil, &c.

13. SON, a production, or offspring, as it were, from any parent: sons of the burning coal, i. e. sparks, which issue from burning wood, Job v. 7. Son of the bow, i. e. an arrow, Job iv. 19. because an arrow issues from a bow; but an arrow may also issue from a quiver, therefore, son of the quiver, Lam. iii. 13. Son of the floor, threshed corn, Isaiah xxi. 10.

14. SON of beating, i. e. deserving beating, Deut. xxv. 3. Son of death, i. e. deserving death, 2 Sam. xii. 3. Son of perdition, i. e. deserving perdition. John xvii. 12.

15. SON OF GOD, by excellence above all, Jesus THE son of God, Mark i. 1. Luke i. 15. John i. 34. Rom. i. 4. Heb. iv. 14. Rev. ii. 18. The only begotten, and in this he differs from Adam; who was Son of God, by immediate creation. Luke iii. 18.

16. Sons of God, the angels, Job i. 6. xxxviii. 7. perhaps, so called in respect to their possessing power delegated from God; his deputies, his vicegerents, and in that sense, among others, his offspring. Vide Dan. iii. 25.

17. Sons of God, genuine Christians, truly pious persons: perhaps also so called in reference to their possession of principles communicated from God, by the Holy Spirit, which correcting every evil bias, and subduing every perverse propensity, gradually assimilates the party to the temper, disposition, conduct, &c. called the image, likeness, or resemblance of God.—Believers are sons of God, John i. 12. the harmless are sons of God, Phil. ii. 15. vide Rom. viii. 14. 1 John iii. 1.

18. Sons of God. I apprehend that the passage, Gen. vi. 2. which says, “the sons of God saw the daughters of men,” in fact refers only to the grandees, the superior ranks of life, according to the ideas of eastern dignity, not to say, tyranny:—hence the sense is, that polygamy, the institution of seraglios, &c. introduced, extended, and consummated the evils of life, those violencees which one class of men suffered from another: The sons of God, the magistrates, (vide ELONIM, GOD,)

GOD,) the sovereigns who should have done justice, were themselves patrons of injustice, and were purloiners instead of protectors.

19. Son of Man. Ezekiel is thus called in many places of his prophecy, and Daniel uses the same phrase, chap. vii. 13. N. B. These two prophets wrote in Chaldea, and it is probable that this is a Chaldee expression, and that our Lord adopted it, in coincidence with their prophecies, especially those of Daniel: but it might be also a Syriacism, in which language our Lord discoursed. Some think it is equivalent to son of Eve, i. e. the great offspring of the human race, or constitution, the supreme progeny of humanity.

20. Sons of this world. Luke xvi. 8. those who by their overweening attention to the things of this world, demonstrate their principles to be derived from the world: i. e. worldly-minded persons.—Sons of disobedience, Eph. ii. 2. v. 6. persons whose conduct proves that they are sons of Belial, of unrestrainableness—sons of libertinism. Sons of Hell, Matt. xxiii. 5. Sons of the Devil, Acts xiii. 10.

Beside these twenty senses in which the word son is used in S. S. there are others, which shew the extreme looseness of its application. So when we read of sons of the bride-chamber, Matth. ix. 15. Mark ii. 19. it merely indicates the youthful companions of the bridegroom, as in the instance of Samson. And when the Holy Mother was committed to the care of the Apostle John, "Woman, behold thy son," John xix. 36. the term is evidently used with great latitude. The greatest care should be taken in quoting or applying this term; lest false ideas should attend it—ideas contrary to Biblical intention, and therefore perversions, when conveyed in English phraseology.]

[SOOTHSAYER, vide MAGICIAN.]

SOPATER. Vide SOSIPATER.

SOPHA. Epiphanius says, the prophet Malachi was born in the city of Sopha, of Zebulun.

SOPHER, סֹפֵר, Γραμματεὺς, scribe; from סֵפֶר sepher, a book: or he that writes, relates, or tells. See SCRIBE.

SOPHER, or SHOPER, a commander of the army of Zedekiah, king of Judah. 2 Kings xxv. 19. But Sopher may rather be a scribe, secretary, or commissioner, who superintended the army.

SOPHERETH, סֹפֶרֶת, from סֹפֵר shepher, a book. [A female scribe? this is certainly somewhat singular; yet there are a few female names, in which families have originated: and a female scribe is no more extraordinary than a prophetess. Neh. vii. 57.]

SOREK, שֹׁרֵק, vine, hissing, a colour inclining to yellow; from שֹׁרֵק shorek.

SOREK, or SORAC, a brook in the tribe of Dan. A place where dwelt Dalilah, Samson's mistress. Eusebius says, it was not far from Zorah and Eshtaol, Samson's usual abode. Judg. xvi. 4.

Caphar-Sorek, or the camp of Sorek; a town near Zorah, or Saraa, according to Eusebius.

Wine of Sorek, wine made in the vale of Sorek. Some have thought it to be the wine of Askalon, famous among the ancients. The brook Sorek was not far from that city. The rabbins think Sorek to be a particular kind of vine, which bears a great quantity of excellent fruit, at all seasons. Sorek does not only signify the grape, or the wine, of the valley of Sorek, but a kind of wine, probably of the white, or yellowish grape, from which they made their white wines. The Lord says, he planted his vine of Sorek, Isaiah v. 2. Isaiah alludes to the plant of Sorek, at Jazer, beyond Jordan, chap. xvi. 8. The wine of Sorek was excellent; Gen. xlix. 11. and the colour of the Sorek was probably yellow, or white inclining to yellow. Jer. ii. 21. Isaiah, xix. 9. speaks of the flax of Sorek, or colour of Sorek; and Zach. i. 8. describes horses of the same colour. [In the passages here quoted, our translation takes Sorek as an appellation, and not as the proper name of a place.] Some think that the valley of Sorek produced the famous bunch of grapes, which was brought to the Israelites in the desert. Numb. xiii. 23. But this opinion is without foundation.

[The finest kind of grape in all probability was distinguished by this name. Those who think Sorek means whistling, or whizzing, derive the name from the sound, or hissing of the water in passing. A slight fall, perhaps.]

SORROW; this passion contracts the heart, sinks the spirits, and injures the health. Scripture advises against suffering ourselves to be overcome with sorrow. Prov. xxv. 20. Eccles. xiv. 1, 2, 3. xxx. 24, 25, &c. St. Paul distinguishes two sorts of sorrow; one a godly, the other a worldly, sorrow. 2 Cor. vii. 10. "Godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation, not to be repented of; but the sorrow of the world worketh death." He reproves the excessive sorrow of the Thessalonians, at the death of their relations. 1 Thess. iv. 13. The wise man commends a kind of sorrow, which is rather a serious and sober deportment, a banishing of vain joys, than distressing sorrow. Eccles. vii. 3. "Sorrow is better than laughter; for by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better.— 'The heart of the wise is in the house of mourning, but the heart of fools is in the house of mirth.' He means to say, that the grave and serious air of a master who reproves, is more profitable than the laughter and caresses of those who flatter. Jesus Christ upbraids that counterfeit air of sorrow and mortification, which the Pharisees affected, when they fasted: and he cautions his disciples against all such affectation, which proposes to gain the approbation of men; Matth. vi. 16. Isaiah, xlii. 4. describing the qualities of the Messiah, says, he shall not be severe, or violent, "he shall not fail nor be discouraged till he have set judgment in the earth." Hebrew יִרְחַם וְלֹא יִכְרֹחַ, "He shall not quench, and shall not break:" his reign shall be a reign of mildness and mercy. St. James, v. 13. advises those to pray who are in sorrow.

SOSIPATER, Σωσιπᾶτρος, that saves the father, or safety of the father; from σώζω, I preserve, or saviour, and πατήρ, father.

I. SOSIPATER, or SOPATER. Sosipater and Dositheus, two captains of Judas Maccabeus's army, defeated ten thousand men of the army of Timotheus, shut up in a strong hold, 2 Macc. xii. 19.

II. SOSIPATER, mentioned by St. Paul, Rom. xvi. 21. was his kinsman, as some think. "Lucius, and Jason, and Sosipater, my kinsmen, salute you." But this has its difficulty; since Jason was of Thessalonica, Sosipater was of Berea, in Macedonia, very distant from Tarsus, the country of St. Paul. Origen, in Rom. xvi. believes they were originally Gentiles; which is another reason against their being the apostle's kinsmen. In what sense then does he call them kinsmen? Is it, because they were of the same nation, of the same tribe, of the same city, of the same religion, or only allied to him?

I think it may be confidently asserted, that this Sosipater, who was at Rome, A. D. 58, when St. Paul wrote to the Romans, cannot be the Sosipater of Berea; since he accompanied St. Paul, the same year 58, to Jerusalem, and probably accompanied him from Corinth (whence the Epistle to the Romans was written,) to go by way of Macedonia to Jerusalem. See Acts xx. 4, 5, &c. [Sopater, Eng. Tr.]

Sosipater, was of Berea; and very likely St. Paul converted him A. D. 52. when he visited that city. The Latin in Acts xx. 4. and some Greek manuscripts, call him Sosipater Pyrrhus. [which others render Sosipater Son of Pyrrhus] When St. Paul left Corinth, for Jerusalem, he was accompanied by Sosipater, Aristarchus, and others, to Philippi, whence they went to Troas, where they staid for him; he could not therefore have been at this time in Rome. We know not what became of Sosipater afterwards: But the Latins place his feast June 25, and call him a disciple of St. Paul. The Greeks honour him April 28, or 29, with Jason, and call him a kinsman of St. Paul. Thus they confound Sosipater of Berea, with Sosipater of Rome. I know of no commentator who has not done the same.

SOSTHENES, Σωσθένης, saviour, strong and powerful; from the Greek σώζω, I save, and σθένος, strength, force.

SOSTHENES, chief of the synagogue of Corinth. [Vide Chrysost. in Acta, Homil. 39. Oecumen. in Acta, Theodoret, in Cor. i. 1. Sanct. Tromond. Est. et alii.] The Jews of Corinth laying hold of St. Paul, carried him before the tribunal of Gallio, the pro-consul; who sent them away. Then they seized Sosthenes, chief of the synagogue, and began to beat him within sight of the tribunal; but Gallio disregarded it. It is disputed whether they were Jews or Gentiles, who seized Sosthenes, and beat him. The printed Greek of the Acts intimates, they were Gentiles. St. Austin and Bede read in the same manner. They imagined that the Pagans seeing Gallio's ill reception of the Jews, abused this chief of their synagogue; whether out of hatred to the Jews, or out of friendship to St. Paul. This opinion is followed by Cajetan, Lyran, Grotius, and others. Acts xviii. 17.

Others think, that Sosthenes, though head of the synagogue, yet might be a friend and secret disciple of St. Paul; and that the other Jews, seeing themselves neglected by Gallio, might vent their malice on Sosthenes. These also insist, that this is the Sosthenes whose name is joined with that of St. Paul, 1 Cor. i. 1. written from Ephesus, A. D. 56, three years after this scuffle at Corinth. However, it must be owned, that this opinion has not always been universal; since, in the time of Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. 12. it was thought that Sosthenes was one of the seventy-two disciples; and consequently, he could not be chief of a synagogue at Corinth twenty years after the death of Jesus Christ. The Greeks keep his feast, December 8. and call him an apostle, as being one of the seventy. They also make him the first bishop of Colophon. The Latins since the ninth century, honour him as a disciple of St. Paul, June 11, and November 28. See M. de Tillemont, Hist. Eccl. tom. i. Not. 45.

SOSTRATUS, Σωστράτης, that saves the army,
2 F dno. 2

army, or safety of the army; from σωζω, to save, and στρατός, an army.

SOSTRATUS. He commanded the fortress of the Greeks in the upper city of Jerusalem, for Antiochus Epiphanes, 2 Macc. iv. 26, 27. A. M. 3834, ante A. D. 170. Having earnestly pressed, but to little purpose, the high-priest Menelaus to carry the money he owed king Antiochus; he was sent for to Antioch with the same Menelaus; and received the government of the isle of Cyprus. Thus says the Latin text; but the Greek reads, Sostratus left in his place, (in Jerusalem), Cantes who had been (or then was) governor of Cyprus, or commander of the troops of the king of Syria, in that island.

SOTAI, סוטי, who declines, falls, or prevaricates; from סטה to recede. Ezra ii. 55. Nehem. vii. 57.

SOUL. The word soul is very equivocal, in the style of the Hebrews. It is taken,

1. For the soul which animates mankind; for that which animates beasts; for a living person; "Give me the souls," says the king of Sodom to Abraham, "and take the goods to thyself," Gen. xiv. 21. And Gen. xii. 5. "Abraham took Sarai his wife, and Lot, his brother's son, and their substance that they had gathered, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran;" i. e. the slaves they had purchased, or the children there born to them.

2. Soul is also taken for the life; Gen. xxxii. 30. "My life [Heb. soul] is preserved." And Gen. xxvii. 22, "Kill not his soul;" or, put him not to death. "My soul shall live;" or, thou shalt preserve me alive. "Those that sought my soul," or, had a design on my life. "Not to take his soul in vain;" or, not to swear falsely by his life.

3. It is taken sometimes for death. Numb. ix. 6. "Who were defiled by the dead body [soul] of a man." Numb. xix. 11. "He that toucheth the dead body [soul] of any man shall be unclean seven days." [The English word PERSON is the nearest I can think of to answer the Hebrew.]

4. For desire, love, inclination, Gen. xxiii. 8. "If it be your mind;" Hebr. If it please your soul. Numb. xi. 6. "Our soul is dried away," or disgusted at the sight of the manna. "To consume thine eyes, and to grieve thine heart:" [soul.] Lev. xxvi. 16.

5. For the life of a beast, Deut. xii. 23. "Be sure that thou eat not the blood; for the blood is the life," [soul]: Gen. ix. 9, 10. "I establish my covenant with you, and with your seed after you; and with every living creature [soul] that is with you, of the fowl, of the cattle, and of every beast of the earth."—Prov. xii. 10. "A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast;" he compassionates their labours, and comforts them: but the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel. Vide BEAST.

Innumerable questions may be proposed, concerning the soul of man, its nature, or essence, and its creation. Whether all souls were created at the beginning of the world, or, whether God creates them daily? Whether the soul be naturally immortal? Whether it passes from body to body by a transmigration? Whether all souls are equally enlightened and perfect? &c. &c.

When God had formed the body of man out of the dust, Gen. ii. 7. he "breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul,"—a living being. This breath of life, has been considered by some, as the principle of animal life in man, which, say they, is nothing different from that of beasts. God gives to men and to brutes a breath of life, or a vivifying spirit; "all flesh in which is the breath of life died;" Gen. vi. 17. all living animals, sentenced to die by the waters of the deluge. This spirit of life God withdraws at his pleasure, and brings all flesh to corruption, says Job, xxxiv. 14, 15. the Psalmist, civ. 29. speaking of animals, to which God gives existence, says, "thou takest away their breath, they die and return to their dust." So Solomon, Eccl. xii. 7. "then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it." And St. Paul speaking to the philosophers of Athens, says, God "giveth to all life, and breath and all things." Acts xvii. 25

But, beside this spirit, this breath, which is the principle of animal life, common to men and brutes, which is dispersed after death, we must acknowledge, that there is in man a spiritual, a reasonable, and immortal soul, the origin of our thoughts, of our desires, of our reasonings; which distinguishes us from the brute creation, and in which chiefly consists our resemblance to God: Gen. i. 26. This must be spiritual, because it thinks: it must be immortal, because it is spiritual. Some philosophers, as Plato, have been of opinion, that it was a portion of the deity:

Divinae partem auræ. HORAT. lib. ii. Sat. 2.

But how can deity be obnoxious to the evils and weaknesses of our souls: to sin, to desire, to pain, &c.?

It is true, Scripture ascribes both to man and beast, a soul, a spirit, life, and respiration; but it it allows to man alone the privilege of understanding, knowledge of God, wisdom, immortality, hope of future happiness, and of eternal life; it threatens men, only, with punishment in another life, and with the pains of hell.

Are souls merely spiritual, without mixture of matter even most ethereal and subtile? So say Christian philosophers and divines. The ancients were not convinced of this; but rather otherwise. The ancient compiler of the book of Enoch thought angels were corporeal, and consequently, so were human souls: since he supposes souls to be of the same nature as angels. The Greek and Latin Fathers, who read in Genesis, that the angels of God saw the daughters of men, and took them as wives, and from them produced giants; those Fathers, made no doubt of their having bodies, and that they were susceptible of bodily passions.

But as it was very difficult to reconcile this opinion of the materiality of the soul, with its other properties, which can only agree to pure spirit, they persuaded themselves, that the soul was composed of two parts; one purely spiritual, which has the faculty of thinking, and approaches the nature of God; the other subtile, penetrating, and approaching the nature of very fine Ether. The author of the book of Enoch, says, that "the spirits of the souls of men put up their sighs even to heaven." The spirit, or the understanding, is inclosed in the soul, when separated from the body, has still a resemblance to the body which it animated, and is, as it were, the image of it. But the spirit, the intellectual part, has nothing sensible or corporeal. When souls appear to men after death, the soul, not the spirit, returns. The soul of Patroclus appeared to Achilles; it resembled the hero it had animated; it had his stature, his eyes, his voice, and even his clothes. Iliad. xxiii. When Ulysses descended into hell, he there saw the "towering spectre" of Hercules; i. e. his image, his soul; for as to himself, or his spirit, it was with the immortal gods, partaking of their joys. Odys. xi. v. 600.

The Rabbins also ascribe to souls, after their separation from the body, another subtile vehicle which they call the vessel, or scabbard, of the soul. They hold, that immediately after death, the souls of the wicked are invested with a kind of clothing in which they are condemned to suffer: that the souls of saints, on the contrary, are clad magnificently with a splendid body, by means of which they are inured to the brightness and felicity of their happy state. The Apostles made no doubt of the apparition of spirits, and thought these spirits to have the form and appearance, the voice, and the deportment of the persons to whom they belonged.—The giants of old, who groaned under the waters, Job xxvi. 5. and the kings of the nations, who are under the earth, Prov. ix. 18. Isai. xiv. 9. Ezek. xxxi. xxxii. are represented, as having the same ensigns of honour, the same outward forms, as they had on earth. When Jesus Christ appeared to his apostles after his resurrection, St. Thomas, feared it was a mere phantom, or spirit, such as sometimes appeared, according to popular opinion, and from which no conclusion could be drawn that the body was risen: Our Saviour, to remove his scruples, bid him touch him, and lay his hand upon his wounds, to convince himself that he (Jesus) was really risen, bodily. John xx. 25. also, when suddenly he presented himself in the midst of his disciples, he says to them, "why are ye troubled, and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me, and see; for a spirit has not flesh and bones, as ye see me have." Luke xxiv. 38, 39.

Perhaps it will be said, that these sentiments of the Apostles were only remains of judaical prejudice, from which they were afterwards delivered, by the descent of the Holy Ghost: as it may be pretended that the opinions of the Rabbins, are errors derived from the philosophy of Paganism, not illuminated by the light of revelation.

We commonly believe, that God creates souls at the time when bodies are produced, which they are to animate. The Jews, on the contrary, think that God created all souls at the beginning, and that they come to join themselves to bodies; drawn by a certain attraction not easily resisted. Angels, demons, and souls, are of the same nature, says Philo; they differ only in name. As there are good and bad angels, so there are good and bad souls. Angels and souls reside in the purest and highest region of the air, whence they descend into the bodies which they animate, and bring thither their good or bad qualities. The Essenes, says Josephus, hold souls to be immortal, and that, drawn by a certain natural attraction, they come to shut themselves up in human bodies, as in prisons; that after death, those who have lived well, withdraw into delicious places beyond the ocean; and those who have lived ill, are banished to dark places, to suffer punishment. Speaking of the Pharisees, he says, they are persuaded that souls which have lived well, return, after death, to the place whence they came, with a power of returning into other bodies, whereas the souls of the wicked are condemned to eternal punishment.

The Rabbins teach, that the souls of such bodies as have not been buried, cannot enter the place of souls, but wander about till their bodies are laid in their tombs. Bar-Nacham, in Bereschit Rabba cap. 22. Talmud. tract. Sanhedrim, cap. 4. This opinion prevailed among the Greeks and Latins. Homer relates, Iliad, xxiii. v. 70, &c. that Patroclus appeared to Achilles, and said; "bury me quickly that I may enter the gates of the kingdom of Pluto; because the souls, those phantoms of the dead, drive me from thence, and will not suffer me to pass the river; but I wander about the gates of the vast palace of the god of hell." And Virgil says, Aeneid. vi.

Transportare prius, quam sedibus ossa quierunt.*

They were also of opinion, that the souls of the greater part of the Jews remained one year in a kind of purgatory; in an undetermined state: that during this time they frequently visited the bodies they had animated: that they appeared, and might receive assistance from prayers and alms made on their account: that the apparition of Samuel to Saul was some time in the year immediately following his decease; but that after this year, spirits or demons, have no longer any power over the souls of the dead. Manasseli-ben-Israel, de Resurrect. Mort. lib. ii. cap. 6. Justin Martyr, and Origen, thought that souls, even of good men, were after death, not beyond the power of the devil, who made them sometimes appear, at the charms and evocations of magicians. Anastasius of Antioch, in Adeg. qu. 12. strongly supports the sentiments of Origen: and maintains that the souls of the just were in the power of the devil in hell, before Jesus Christ descended thither, and delivered them.

The Talmudists think, says Buxtorf, Synag. Jud. cap. 35. that souls separate from the body, know all that passes on earth, because they are commonly a whole year before they enter heaven: during all this time they go to and fro through the world, and learn whatever is said or done.—They do not enter heaven, till after the body is reduced to dust, according to those words of Solomon, Eccles. xii. 7. "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it." In a conference held in the presence of the Pope, A. D. 1412, the Jews were accused of lighting up wax candles at the feet, or at the head of the dead, that the soul might have light when it came to seek its body. It is certain, that at this day they light up a lamp at the pillow of a dead man's bed, after the body is carried to be buried.

and that this lamp burns there for seven days. Leo of Modena, Ceremonies of the Jews, P. v. cap. 9. but they are not agreed that this is done to light the soul at its return.

The immortality of the soul, is a fundamental doctrine both of the Jewish and Christian religion. The ancient patriarchs lived and died persuaded of this truth. It was in the hope of immortality and of another life, that the patriarchs received the promises. For, what recompence did Abraham receive in this life,—he who lived all his days a stranger, not possessing one foot of land in the country promised him?—When this patriarch died, "and was gathered to his fathers;" this does not import that his body was laid in the same tomb with his fathers: they were of Chaldea; there his fathers were buried; but as to himself, he was buried in the land of Canaan. It must therefore mean, that he was "gathered to his fathers" in another life. The same must be said of Aaron and Moses, who at their deaths were gathered to their fathers; i. e. to the spirits, not to the bodies, of their fathers.

When Balaam desired that his death might be like that of the just, Numb. xxiii. 10. what did he understand, but the hope and expectation of a happy resurrection? For as to other circumstances, the death of the Hebrews did not differ from that of other nations. Death is a tribute that all men alike must pay to nature.

Another decisive proof, that the Israelites believed the immortality of the soul, was their persuasion, that the souls of the dead sometimes appeared after their decease, as already hinted: Samuel to Saul, 1 Sam. xxviii. 13, 14, 15. Jeremiah to Judas Maccabeus, 2 Macc. xv. 14. When the apostles saw Jesus Christ walking on the sea, they took him for an apparition; Matt. xiv. 26. and after his resurrection, he bid them, Luke xxiv. 39. "Handle me, and see me, for a spirit has not flesh, and bones, as ye see me have." They believed also a resurrection, the punishment of the wicked in another life, and Abraham's bosom for the reception of the just; they had in their histories examples of dead men restored to life; as by Elijah and Elisha. Moses had forbid them to consult or inquire of the dead; Deut. xxviii. 11. All this proves that the Jews believed the immortality of the soul.

If the Sadducees denied this immortality, and resurrection; If the Rabbins, Maimonides and Kimchi, who taught the annihilation of the soul, were regarded by their nation as a kind of heretics and innovators: and those of whom Solomon expresses the sentiments, Eccles. iii. 19, 20. "That which befalleth the sons of men, befall-

eth beasts, even one thing befallerh them; as the one dieth, so dieth the other, yea, they have all one breath, so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast; for all is vanity. All go unto one place, all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again." These were the sentiments of impious and wicked people, condemned by good Israelites, and confuted by Solomon himself, who says, Eccles. xii. 7. "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

[This is a difficult word; not so much from its proper import, as from the popular use of it, in several senses. It is sometimes exalted to mean the immortal spirit, and sometimes degraded to express a breathless corpse, and senseless trees. Perhaps, it would be best to treat first of its Hebrew root, נפש, nephesh, which signifies breathing, the breather, that which does breathe, or that which has breathed; and this notion may accompany most senses of the word: yet, we find it—after the manner of men, applied to God, Amos vi. 8. et al. and Mr. David Levi was so impressed with the idea that it signified the rational and intelligent soul, or spirit, that he promised a tract in proof of it. It requires care to distinguish it from רוח, ruach, spirit, which also imports vital breath; that by which animal nature is supported.

The Greek word ψυχή, Psyche, which is rendered soul, as distinct from πνεῦμα pneuma, spirit, is no less ambiguous; so that we can derive little or no assistance from it. Certainly, there are differences between the soul, the mind, the understanding, the spirit, but they are not always observed: this confusion has obtained in all languages. In the English language, the people at large often put soul for spirit, and spirit for soul. They say, "such an one has no spirit;" he has no soul." They speak of a number of souls as being lost in such a ship, or &c. This intermixture of the terms renders accurate discrimination necessary; especially in treating theological subjects. Let it humble the pride of man that we know so little, on what so intimately concerns us: even we ourselves are mysteries to ourselves; we are obliged to make use of bodily terms to denote what properly appertains to our spirits; and some nations have not words to express the relation of one to the other, or to signify spiritual sensations, not even by means of bodily properties, affections, &c. For the three constituent parts of man, compare 1 Thess. v. 23. where they are distinctly enumerated. See SPIRIT.]

[SPAN, vide ZERETH.]

SPAIN, Ἰσπανία. In Greek, rare, or precious.

SPAIN, a part of Europe, almost surrounded by the sea; by the ocean west and north, by the Mediterranean south and east; and by France north. Eusebius, and Bochart, (Phaleg. lib. iii. cap. 7.) think that Tharsis was the father of the Spaniards. St. Paul writes to the Romans, xv 24, 28. that he hopes to see them as he goes to Spain; but it is doubted whether he was ever there. Several Fathers have positively affirmed it: [Epiphan. Hæres. xxvii. Chrysost. Præfat. in Ep. ad Heb. Jerom, in Isai. xi. Theodoret. in 2 Timoth. iv. et in Philip. i. 26. Gregor. in Job. lib. xxxi. cap. 22.] but others speak of it more diffidently. Baionius and Pererius for the affirmative; Scotus and Thomas for the negative. Tillemont, Note 73, on St. Paul.

SPARROW, צפור, tzippor, LXX. Στρουθιον, Lat. Passer. The Hebrew is used not only for a sparrow, but for all sorts of clean birds; or such whose use was not forbid by the law. The Rabbin Kimchi, Pomarius and Aquinas, pretend, that it signifies birds, in general: which is confirmed by Bochart, de Animal. Sacr. P. 2. lib. iii. cap. 21, 22. But he shews also, that it signifies particularly a sparrow. In most of the passages where sparrow is read, we may understand a bird of any kind. Psalm xi. 1. "Flee as a bird to your mountain:" sparrows do not frequent mountains. Psalm cii. 7. "I watch, and am as a sparrow alone upon the house-top." This may suit the owl, that hides itself under the roofs of houses. Psalm civ. 16, 17. Cedri Libani, illic passeris nidificabunt; sparrows do not build in the cedars of Libanus.

There is a famous passage in Leviticus, where Moses appoints the patient, who is declared clean from his leprosy, to bring to the priest at the entry of the tabernacle, two young sparrows alive, such as are allowed to be eaten; rather "two birds alive and clean." For if they must needs be sparrows, wherefore add, such as may be eaten; as if there were two sorts? The LXX. read birds; and the interpreter of Origen reads two hens. The leprous person therefore was at liberty to bring two clean [small] birds, with cedar branches, &c. Vide LEPER.

SPARTANS, Σπαρτιανοί, people of Lacedæmonia. 1 Macc. xiv. 20. That sow; from Σπαρος. See LACEDÆMON.

[SPEAR, vide ARMOUR, Plate: FRAGMENTS, No. CCXVIII.]

SPIKENARD, or NARD. A plant that grows in the Indies, its root is very small and slender. It puts forth a long, small stalk, and has several ears or spikes even with the ground, which has given it the name of spikenard. The nard

nard of the mountains is most odoriferous. All the species of spikenard are hot and drying; they provoke urine, and are binding, when drunk. The Indian nard, commonly called spica nardi, if it be genuine, is of a yellowish colour, inclining to purple, and should have its spikes long, so that the bristles of the spike should be large and odoriferous. The taste should be something sharp and bitter, and dry on the tongue; and afterwards leave the mouth full of a very agreeable savour. It is thought that rosemary, and lavender, are kinds of spikenard. A perfume greatly esteemed is made from the blade, or spike of the nard; and of this Scripture speaks. The spouse in Cant. i. 12. iv. 13, 14. says, "While the king sitteth at his table, my spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof." (Heb. נָרָד, nared. Gr. Nardός.) Mark, xiv. 3. speaks of the perfume of spikenard; John xii. 3. mentions nardus pisticus, by which several understand pure and unsophisticated nard. But there is great probability, that the copiers have put nardi pistici, instead of nardi spicata, or spikenard. The spikenard, as we call it, or the blade of the nard, is the most esteemed for making perfume: that taken from the leaves is less valuable. Cacumina nardi in aristis se spargunt, idio geminâ dote nardi spicas et folia celebrant. Pliny, lib. xii. cap. 12. See FRAGMENTS, and PLATE of INDIAN SPIKENARD.

SPIRIT. Heb. רוּחַ, ruach; Greek, Πνεῦμα, Pneuma; Latin, Spiritus.

1. In Scripture the word Spirit is taken sometimes for the Holy Ghost, the third person of the Holy Trinity, who inspired the prophets, who animates good men, pours his unction into our hearts, imparts to us life and comfort, in whose name we are baptized, as well as in that of the Father and the Son; that enlivening Spirit who proceeds from the Father and the Son. [When the adjective Holy is applied to the term Spirit, we may safely take it generally as here explained: but there are many places where it must be taken in this sense, although the term Holy is omitted.]

2. At other times spirit is taken for breath, expiration, animal life, common to men and animals: this God has given, and this he recalls, when he takes away life. Gen. vii. 15. Numb. xvi. 22. Job. xii. 10.

3. The rational soul which animates us, and preserves its being, after the death of the body. That spiritual, reasoning, and chusing substance, which is capable of eternal happiness.

4. The wind: thus, spiritus procellarum.—spiritus grandis et fortis.—In spiritus vehementi onteres naves Tharsis, &c. In all which places spiritus signifies only a strong wind. Psalm x. 7, 1 Kings xix. 11. Psalm xlviii. 7.

5. Spirit also signifies an angel, a demon, a spectre, a soul separate from the body. It is said, Acts xxiii. 8. that the Sadducees denied the existence of angels and spirits. Jesus Christ appearing to his disciples, said to them, Luke xxiv. 39. "Handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have." Heb. i. 14. good angels are called ministering spirits. It is said, 1 Sam. xvi. 14. xviii. 10. xix. 9. "that the evil spirit from God came upon Saul." And in the gospel the devils are often called, "unclean spirits, evil spirits, spirits of darkness," &c.

6. Spirit is sometimes taken for the disposition of the heart, or of the body; [rather of the mind, or intellect] because it was presumed, that the good or evil inclinations of each of these proceeded from good or bad spirits. So a spirit of jealousy, a spirit of fornication, a spirit of prayer, a spirit of infirmity, a spirit of wisdom and understanding, a spirit of fear of the Lord, &c. Numb. v. 14. Hos. iv. 2. Zech. xii. 10. Luke xiii. 11. Eccles. xv. 5. Isai. xi. 2.

Distinguishing, or discerning, of Spirits. A gift of God, which consisted in discerning, whether a man were really inspired by the spirit of God, or was a false prophet, an impostor, who only followed the impulse of his own spirit, or of the spirit of Satan. St. Paul speaks, 1 Cor. xii. 10. of the discerning of spirits, among miraculous gifts granted by God to the faithful, at the first settlement of Christianity. And St. John, 1st Epistle, iv. 1. "Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits, whether they are of God: because many false prophets are gone out into the world."

[Perhaps, also, a power of detecting hypocritical professors, in general: and truly pious persons, in general. Simon Magus may be an instance of the former; the officers chosen to take charge of churches in their infant state, may be instances of the latter.]

To quench the Spirit. St. Paul cautions the Thessalonians, 1 Thess. v. 19. not to quench the Spirit. The Spirit may be quenched, 1. by forcing, as it were, the Holy Ghost to withdraw from us, by sin, by irregularity of manners, by vanity, by avarice, by negligence, and by other crimes contrary to charity, to truth, to peace, and to his other gifts and qualifications. 2. the Spirit might have been quenched by such actions as caused God to take away his supernatural gifts and favours, such as prophecy, the gift of tongues, the gift of healing, &c. For though these gifts were of mere grace, and God might might communicate them sometimes to doubtful characters, yet he has often granted them to the prayers of the faithful; and has taken them away, to punish their misuse or contempt of them.

To grieve the Spirit. Eph. iv. 30. may also be taken in two ways; either in the sense of an internal grace, habitual or actual: or, in the sense of miraculous gifts, with which God favoured the primitive Christians. We grieve the Spirit of God, by withstanding his holy inspirations, the motions of his grace; or by living in a lukewarm and incautious manner; by despising his gifts, or neglecting them; by abusing his favours, either out of vanity, curiosity, or indifference. In a contrary sense, 2 Tim. i. 6. we stir up the Spirit of God which is in us, by the practice of virtue, by our exactness in complying with his inspirations, by fervour in his service, by renewing our gratitude, &c.

The spirit, as opposed to the flesh, is put for the soul by which we are animated. Gen. vi. 3. "My spirit shall no longer abide in man, because he is but flesh." I will destroy mankind, I will take from them my breath which I gave them, the soul that I infused into them; because they are all carnal, debased by vile inclinations, by brutish passions: because, in a word, "all flesh have corrupted their way upon the earth;" they have, in great measure forgotten that they are reasonable creatures, and have plunged themselves into the state and condition of beasts. [Otherwise, my Spirit shall not strive with man—to correct him, to repel his wickedness; no; but I will chastise him severely: his violent inclinations shall feel no check from the gentle admonitions of my benevolent Spirit, but shall have their own way—his flesh shall not be thwarted, but shall prove his ruin—at least, after such a respite as I have appointed.]

Spirit, in the moral sense, is opposed to the flesh, Rom. vii. 25. "With the mind, or spirit, I myself serve the law of God: but with the flesh the law of sin." And chap. viii. 13. "If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die; but if ye through the spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live." Also, Gal. v. 19, 22. "Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these; adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness," &c. But the fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance."

The spirit of Jesus Christ, which animates true Christians, the children of God, and distinguishes them from the children of darkness, who are animated by the spirit of the world, is the gift of grace, of adoption, the Holy Spirit poured into our hearts, which emboldens us to call God, my Father, my Father, Rom. viii. 5. Those who are influenced by this spirit "have crucified the flesh, with the affections and lusts thereof. If we live in the spirit, let us also walk in the spirit," Gal. v. 24. Rom. viii. 9. "Ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirit, if so be that the spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his." The spirit of Jesus Christ animated the prophets, and inclined them industriously to enquire at what time those events should happen, which they foretold, concerning his passion and glory. 1 Peter i. 11.

[After referring to the article SOUL, it may be proper to suggest, that whatever language describes spiritual existence is particularly obscure; and so must continue to mortals.

Nothing can be less obvious than in what consisted the gift of the Holy Spirit as imparted by the hands of the Apostles. That this power was restricted to them, only, is remarkable, since it might be thought the hundred and twenty were no less qualified to bestow it. That it was given to many, perhaps, to most new converts, inasmuch that many hundreds, not to say, thousands, must have participated in it, is equally remarkable: but, this general reception of it renders many things applicable to the primitive churches and Christians, and justly said of them, which it would be presumptuous to apply to any since their day. And although some of the powers enjoyed by the primitive Christians are enumerated in certain places of the Epistles, yet we are not much enlightened on the subject, though it was so clear and conspicuous anciently. Were any, or all of these powers, in any case imparted to females?

There is a famous text, 1 Peter iii. 18. referring to the spirits in prison—famous on account of its difficulties, which no hypothesis has completely solved.—In the first place, remark, that the apostle distinguishes between spirits, πνεύμασι, and souls, ψυχαι: the souls were saved by the ark; the spirits were shut up in prison. He seems to refer to the same as Job, xxvi. 5. "the giants (Rephaim) groan under the waters." (See the Article GIANTS). "The Giants are in anguish under the waters;"—the mighty men of renown in the old world, who filled the earth with violence, and perished by the deluge." Scott. Admitting this reference, the Apostle points at "the spirits in prison ever since the flood." The difficulty remains, that Christ is said to go—"he went and preached" to those who were afterwards destroyed, because of their unbelief and disobedience. But, whether whether this of necessity means a personal action may be doubted: for it is said of Christ, Eph. ii. 17. He came and preached to you who were afar off"—this is not true of Christ, personally, but he preached by his agents: admit that he also preached by his agents in the days of Noah, by that patriarch, himself, with others, and the passage loses much of its embarrassment.—Christ by his spirit imparted to Noah, &c. endeavoured to reclaim the Antediluvians; but, they persisting in their iniquities, lost their lives in the deluge; their spirits meanwhile being confined in prison, await the great day of judgment. Whereas Noah, believing, and acting on his belief, was saved from the general destruction. Those criminals abused the long-suffering of God; Noah took advantage of it to his salvation.]

SPIRITS. Apparitions of Spirits. The notion, that spirits, angels, demons, the souls of the dead, have appeared to men, has been universal among nations. It is founded on an infinite number of histories, and instances; but chiefly on the authority of the sacred books; which relate several appearances of angels and demons. We may trace the opinion, which supposes the return and appearance of the spirits and souls of the dead, in the story of the raising the ghost of Samuel, 1 Sam. xxvii. 11, 12.—[Comp. PYTHONESS of ENDOR.] in what is said by Jesus Christ to his apostles, Luke xxiv. 39. "Handle me, and see me, for a spirit has not flesh and bones, as ye see me have:"—in what was imagined by the apostles, when they saw Jesus in the night, walking upon the water, Matth. xiv. 26. In Acts xii. 13, 15. when St. Peter stood knocking at the door, they thought it was his angel, because they knew he was committed to prison, and appointed to death. In 2 Macc. xv. 12. the high-priest Onias, and the prophet Jeremiah, appeared in a dream to Judas Maccabeus. Vide SOUL.

SPITHAMA, a measure, in length nearly a foot.

SPITLTE, Saliva. The spittle of him who was troubled with gonorrhæa rendered unclean the person on whom it accidentally fell. He continued unclean till evening, and till he had washed himself and his clothes. Lev. xv. 8. To spit in any one's face was deemed a great outrage; Job xxx. 10. Isai. l. 6. Numb. xii. 14. "If her father had but spit in her face, should she not be ashamed seven days?" The widow of a man who died without children, might spit in the face of his brother, or of his nearest kinsman, that refused to take her to wife, Deut. xxv. 9. The soldiers spit in the face of our Saviour at his passion; Mark x. 34. xiv. 65. xv. 19. Luke xviii. 38. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. LXXVI. CI.

[SPOTS. This word sometimes means blemishes; sometimes merely the distinctive marks of an individual, as in the case of cattle: but Jude 12, "spots in your feasts of charity;" the word is thought to refer to sunken rocks under water, which as they do not openly appear, are so much the more dangerous to unwary mariners. See AGAPÆ.]

[SPOUSE, vide the FRAGMENTS on Solomon's Song.]

SPY. The patriarch Joseph pretended to arrest his brethren, and did secure his brother Simeon in prison, feigning that he took them for spies. According to the rules of war, a spy taken in a camp is destined to be hanged. Moses sent twelve spies to explore the land of Canaan. Vide Numb. xiii. When they returned, they reported, saying, "The country where we have been is indeed a country flowing with milk and honey; but we have seen there giants of the race of Anak."

The people began to murmur: but Caleb, one of the spies, endeavoured to encourage them. The others on the contrary, disparaged the land, and insisted on the great difficulty there would be to conquer it. This terrified the people; who became faint hearted, and were condemned to wander and to die in the wilderness. Mention is made of spies, Joshua ii. 1, 2, 3, &c.

STACHYS, Στάχυς, spike; from στάχυς.

STACHYS, a disciple of St. Paul, by whom he is honourably mentioned, Rom. xvi. 9. We know no particulars of his life that can be relied on. Nicephorus Calistus assures us, lib. ii. cap. 39. that St. Andrew came and preached for some time at Byzantium, afterwards Constantinople; but being obliged to leave it, he ordained Stachys bishop there. The Menæa of the Greeks set down the feast of St. Stachys October 31; they are followed by the Roman martyrology, which calls him bishop of Byzantium, and assures us, that to him St. Paul makes his commendations in the epistle to the Romans, and calls him his well-beloved. The Greeks give him the title of an apostle, and place him among the seventy-two disciples. But we find nothing of this in authors of great antiquity.

STADIUM, a measure of length, a furlong, which consisted of one hundred and twenty-five geometrical paces. Eight furlongs make a mile. See the Table of Measures.

Stadium is also taken for the place in which were performed public exercises of running. St. Paul

Paul alludes to these, 1 Cor. ix. 24. "They which run in a race (in stadio) run all, but one receiveth the prize." These places were called stadia, because they were distinguished into courses, or distances, by certain resting places; so that some of the racers run but one distance, some two or more, each according to his strength.

[STATUTE, is often synonymous with ordinance, or appointment, at least in general import, if not in precise verbal meaning.]

STAR, כוכב, cocab. Ἀστρον, Stella. Under the name of stars, the Hebrews comprehended all constellations, planets, and heavenly bodies, all luminaries, except the sun and moon. Scripture often expresses itself as if it should seem to attribute sense and understanding to the stars. The sun and moon were called, by the idolatrous Israelites, king and queen of heaven; and the stars were (as it were) their army and militia; Deut. xvii. 3. They received honours due only to their Creator. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DII. et seq.

The number of the stars was considered as infinite: the Psalmist, to exalt the power and omniscience of God, says, he numbers the stars, and calls them by their names. He is described as a king taking a review of his army, and knowing the name of every one of his soldiers. Scripture, to express a very extraordinary increase and multiplication, uses the similitude of the stars of heaven, or of the sands of the sea: Gen. xv. 5. xxii. 17. xxvi. 4. Exod. xxxii. 13, &c. Job says, xxv. 5. that in the eyes of God, the stars themselves are impure: that they formed a kind of concert—song—to his honour, at the beginning of the creation, xxxviii. 7, that God locks them up, as with a key, and hinders them from appearing, unless he please, chap. ix. 7.

In times of disgrace and public calamity, it is said, the stars withhold their light; that they are covered with darkness; that they fall from heaven; they disappear. These figurative and emphatic expressions are only weakened and enervated by being explained. [I presume they frequently refer to the governing powers of nations.] Amos says the Israelites in the wilderness carried "the star of your gods, which ye made to yourselves." Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. CVIII. CCXIII. Job speaks of four of the principal constellations known to the ancients; the bear, Orion, the Hyades, and the star of the south. Job ix. 9. xxxviii. 31, 32.

Star of Balaam, and Star of the Magi, vide MAGI and ABRAHAM, ult. also, ad fin.

STARS. To caution the Hebrews against VOL. II. PART XXVII. Edit. IV.

the idolatry that prevailed over almost all the east, of worshipping sun, moon, and stars, Moses informs them, Gen. i. 14, 15, 16. that God gave the stars their being, and separated them from that mass of matter which he created Job, xxviii. 7. describes the stars, as praising the creator at the beginning of the world. And Isaiah, xiv. 13. makes Lucifer say at his rebellion; "I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God." [but who is this Lucifer? See LUCIFER, and FRAGMENTS, No. DII.]

The beauty and splendor that men observed in the stars, the great advantages they derived from them; the wonderful order apparent in their courses; the influence ascribed to their returns, in production and preservation of animals, of fruits, plants, and minerals, have induced almost all people to impute to them life, knowledge, power, and to pay them a sovereign worship and adoration. Moses says, Deut. iv. 19. "Lest thou lift up thine eyes unto heaven, and when thou seest the sun, and the moon, and the stars, even all the host of heaven, thou shouldst be driven to worship them, and serve them, which the Lord thy God hath divided unto all nations under the whole heaven." And Job says, xxxi. 26, 27, 28. "If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness; and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand, (by way of adoration); this also were an iniquity to be punished by the judge; for I should have denied the God that is above." The worship of Baal, of Astarte, of the queen of heaven, of the host of heaven, with which the Jews were often reproached, was worship of the stars, especially of the sun and moon. Stephen, Acts vii. 42. after having spoken of the worship of the golden calf by the Israelites in the wilderness, says, God gave them up to their blindness;—they paid adoration to the host of heaven, and carried the tent of Moloch, and the star of their god Remphan.

The Jews, ancient and modern, ascribe great influence to the stars. Philo, Leg. Allegor. lib. i. p. 41. imputes to them a great part of whatever happens on the earth. He says elsewhere, that the stars are not only animated, but are even most pure spirits; that the air is replete with spirits, continually descending to earth, to animate bodies. He had borrowed these notions from his master Plato. Origen adopted the same mistake, tom. i. in Joan. p. 17. The Rabbins also ascribe intelligence to the heaven, and the stars. Maimonides, Mose-Nebochim, Part 2. cap. 4. &c. Menasseh-ben-Israel, prob. 2 G div. 2 23, &c.

25, &c. They maintain, that they have a knowledge of God; that they know themselves; that God is the object of their desires; that their knowledge and actions are more perfect than those of men.

Maimonides says, that among wise men there is no controversy about the stars: all agree, that they have great influence on the generation and corruption of sublunary bodies. Some impute the direction of affairs rather to the angels, [their chiefs] than to the stars; others say, it is the stars which pour out their influence on the earth: every herb, according to them, has its particular star, whence it receives its virtue; which virtue extends even to the body of man, and to the principal actions of human life. However, this does not abridge the liberty of man: the planets lay him under no moral necessity: their effects are chiefly confined to the body; as health, complexion, &c.

The sacred books seem to ascribe knowledge to the stars: we are told that the stars praised the Lord. Job. xxxviii. 7. The sun, the moon, and the stars are excited to praise the Lord. The moon is said to withdraw her light, to obey the voice of Joshua: while the sun suspended its course at the command of that general of God's people: that the sun rises as a bridegroom, who comes out of his nuptial chamber. Psalm xix. 5. Job says, that the Lord "commandeth the sun, and it riseth not; and sealeth up the stars."

But all these expressions, which are popular, or poetical, are not to be understood literally; for then we must admit, that the earth, the trees, the waters, are animated and intelligent, since we find in Scripture expressions that insinuate as much. All the creatures glorify God, bless the Lord, and obey him, each in its way. If we allow any thing more to the sun, the moon, or the stars, it is because they display greater perfection, and in them the glory and magnificence of God shine forth more eminently, more conspicuously. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DIII.

The Star foretold by Balaam, Numb. xxiv. 17. "There shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel and shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Sheth." According to the modern Jews, this star signifies king David, who conquered the Moabites, and reduced them under his obedience. But, the ancient Jews, the paraphrasts Onkelos and Jonathan, explain it of the Messiah, as the natural sense of the passage. Some have thought that Balaam foretold the appearance of that star, which shone at the time of our Saviour's birth, and guided the Magi into Judea, to worship the person whose birth it declared. But this star did not come out of Jacob; and what is said there cannot be applied to this star, which plainly points at a ruler, a conqueror, a great prince; in a word, the Messiah. The Jews were so well convinced of this, at the time of Jesus Christ, and afterwards, that the famous impostor Bar-chaliba caused himself to be called Bar-cocheba, "son of the star," pretending to be the Messiah; which involved the Jews of Palestine in a revolt, that completed the ruin of their unfortunate nation. Comp. ABRAHAM, ADRIAN, and BARCOCHEBA.

STATER, a piece of money value one shekel. Matt. xvii. 37. Our Saviour sent Peter to fish in the lake of Tiberias: he caught with his angle-rod, a fish which had a Stater in its mouth. This served to pay for Christ and himself, the dues to the temple, which were half a shekel a-piece. In Sam. ix. 8. a quarter of a shekel, is translated by quarta pars Stateris; and in Jeremy, Jerom translates shekel by Stater. See Ezek. iv. 10. v. 1.

STATUE of Salt. Lot's wife was changed into a statue of salt. See LOT'S WIFE.

STATUE of Nebuchadnezzar; rather the statue seen by Nebuchadnezzar in his dream, Dan. ii. 31, &c. It was very large and terrible: its head was of gold, its breast and its arms of silver, the belly and thighs of brass, the legs of iron, and the feet partly of iron and partly of clay. Daniel's explication was,—that the empire of Nebuchadnezzar, i. e. of the Chaldeans, was represented by the head of gold; the empire of the Persians, founded by Cyrus, was represented by the breast and arms of silver; the empire of the Grecians, founded by Alexander the Great, was marked by the belly and thighs of brass; the empire of the Romans by the legs of iron; or rather, this empire being divided into two, is first, that of the Selucidæ in Syria, secondly, that of the Lagidæ in Egypt. The attempts of the kings of Egypt and Syria, to unite their interests by intermarriages, not succeeding, are represented by the feet, being partly of iron, and partly of clay. The little stone that issues from the mountain, and overturns the statue, is the empire of the Romans, under which appeared the Messiah, whose kingdom saw the fall of the Roman Colossus. Comp. PLATE of ARMOUR; the figure of GOLIATH.

Nebuchadnezzar caused a golden statue to be set up, of sixty cubits high, and six cubits thick. Vide the history in Daniel; and Comp. FRAGMENTS No. CL. and PLATE, GOLDEN IMAGE:

It

It is inquired, what this statue was, and who it represented? Some think it was a statue of Nebuchadnezzar himself; others that of his father, whom he had a mind to deify: but it seems most probable, that it was a statue of the god Bel, to whom he designed a particular worship, at the time of playing the instruments; and, in effect, he did not complain of the Jews for refusing to worship him, or his father, but his gods.

STEPHANAS, Στεφανᾶς, crown, or crowned; from the Greek, στεφανῆ, a crown.

STEPHANAS, a principal christian of Corinth, whose family St. Paul baptized; probably about A. D. 52. 1. Cor. i. 16. Stephanas was forward to the service of the church. A. D. 56, he came to St. Paul at Ephesus, 1 Cor. xvi. 15, 17. According to Chrysostom, in 1 Cor. homil. 44. he brought him letters from the church of Corinth, to consult him concerning marriage, continence, and, perhaps, other subjects, to which St. Paul replies in his first epistle to the Corinthians, written from Ephesus, A. D. 56. and sent by Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus. We know no other particulars of Stephanas.

STEPHEN, the first martyr, was probably one of the Hellenistical Jews which believed. Epiphanius, de Christo, cap. 4. p. 50. thinks he was among the seventy-two disciples; but Jesus Christ appointed his seventy-two disciples to teach and preach; whereas it seems that Stephen and his brother deacons, had not that particular designation, but were chosen to serve tables; this was A. D. 35. St. Stephen is always put first; and it is believed he had studied at the feet of Gamaliel. He was full of the Holy Ghost, and of zeal, Acts vi. 5, 6, &c. He performed many wonderful works and miracles. Some of the synagogue of the freed-men, of the Cyrenians, of the Alexandrians, &c. disputing with him, could not withstand his wisdom and spirit.

Then they suborned false witnesses, to testify, that they had heard him blaspheme against Moses, and against God; and they drew him before the Sanhedrim. Stephen appeared in the midst of this assembly, with a countenance like that of an angel. The high-priest asking him, what he had to answer? he denied that he had said any thing against Moses, or the temple,—but he shewed that the Jews had always opposed God and his prophets; he upbraided them with the hardness of their hearts, with their putting the prophets to death, and with slaying the Messiah himself.

At these words they were enraged; but Ste- phen lifting up his eyes to heaven, said; I see the heavens open, and the son of man standing at the right hand of God." Then the Jews cried out, stopped their ears, and falling on him, they drew him out of the city, and stoned him. The witnesses laid down their clothes at the feet of a young man called Saul, then one of the most eager persecutors of the Christians, but afterwards one of the most zealous preachers of Christianity. Stephen called upon the Lord, and said; "Lord, impute not this sin to them." After which he fell asleep in the Lord, and some pious persons took care to bury him, and accompanied his funeral with great mourning. Acts viii. 2.

We are told many particulars of his burial, and afterwards of the discovery of his body, in a work printed at the end of the seventh tome of St. Austin, under the name of Lucian the priest. The devotion paid to him is very ancient in the church.

[STEWART, or superintendant of an extensive household. On the unjust steward, vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCCIII. That the stewards of the Essenes might resemble the deacons, Acts vi. 1, &c. Vide ESSENES.]

STIGMATA. Certain marks and incisions by the heathen in their flesh, in honour of some false deity. These were imprinted, either by a hot iron, or a needle, with which they made punctures, afterwards filled with a fine powder, black, blue, or of some other colour, which incorporated with the flesh, and remained indelible.

The greater part of the Arabian women have Stigmata marked on their arms and cheeks. Lucian, in his book of the Syrian Goddess says, that the Assyrians wore these imprinted characters, some on their hands, others on their necks. Moses warns the Israelites against making any figure, or mark upon their bodies: "Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead, nor print any marks upon you." Levit. xix. 28.

Ptolemy Philopater ordered, that Jews who had forsaken their religion, for that of the Pagans, should be stigmatized with the mark of an ivy-leaf, a tree dedicated to Bacchus. 3 Macc. St. John, Rev. xiii. 16, 17. alludes to this custom, when he says, the beast imprinted his character [cypher?] on her people in their right hand, and on their fore-head; and forbid all to buy or to sell, but those who bore this mark. St. Paul declares, Gal. vi. 17. that he bore in his body the marks of the Lord Jesus; i. e. scars of stripes received for his sake, and in his service, which he regarded as so many Stig- mata, or honourable marks of consecration to his lord. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CVII. et al.

Philo, de Monarch. lib. 14. says, that some imprinted characters on their flesh with hot irons, to devote themselves more solemnly and avowedly to their idols. Procopius, in Isa. xlv. notices an ancient custom among christians, who made marks on their arms and wrists, representing the cross, or the monogram of Jesus Christ: a custom which still continues among the oriental Christians, and those who go in pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Prudentius describes the manner in which the Pagans made their Stigmata in honour to their gods: PRUDENT. Hymn. x.

*Quid cum sacrandus accipit sphragitidas?

STOICKS, heathen philosophers, so named from the Greek στοά, stoa, a porch, or portico, because Zeno, the head of the Stoicks, held his school in a porch of the city of Athens. Diogenes Laertius, and others have treated of these philosophers. Josephus says, that the Pharisees approached very near to the sentiments of the Stoicks. They affected the same stiffness, patience, apathy, austerity, and insensibility. The sect of the Stoicks was considerable at Athens when St. Paul visited that city, where he had conferences with them. Acts xvii. 18. The Stoicks placed the supreme happiness of man in living agreeably to nature and reason. They seem to have looked on God as the soul of the world.

STONES. We have spoken of several precious stones, or gems, mentioned in Scripture. Neither the Jews nor the ancient Greek interpreters, seem to have had correct knowledge of the proper signification of the original terms. Vide Louis de Dieu on Exod. xxviii. 17, &c. and Braupius, de Vestitu Sacerdotum Hebræorum, lib. ii. cap. 8, 9, &c. also Francis de la Rue, de Gemmis.

For the names of the precious stones which were in the high-priest's breast-plate, Exod. xxviii. 17, &c. the reader may see their articles, and PLATE, PECTORAL.

On the two shoulders of the high-priest were two stones, called in Hebrew, Shohem, Vulgate Onyx, LXX. Emeralds. Exodus xxviii. 9. We think this to be the true signification of Shohem.

St. John, Rev. xxi. 19, 20, 21, &c. speaks of the New Jerusalem, the spouse of the lamb, whose foundations were precious stones.—As —1. Jasper; 2. Sapphire; 3. Chalcedony; 4. Emerald; 5. Sardonyx; 6. Sardius; 7. Chrysolyte; 8. Beryl; 9. Topaz; 10. Chrysoprasmus; 11. Jacinth; 12. Amethyst.

To these precious stones may be added the stone of ww skish, sis; or ww ses, or sais, 1 Chr. xxix. 2. and Esth. i. 6. commonly translated white marble.

Stone Gazith, 1. Chron. xxii. 2. I take this to be common marble, sawed, and polished.

Stone of Phuc, פֶּחֻץ. 1 Chron. xxix. 2. Isaiah, liv. 11. Phuc signifies antimony, or Stibium. We see, by Isaiah, that the stone of Phuc was used for pavements. The stone of Stibium, or antimony, is a mineral of a black colour, full of shining veins, like polished iron, and having an intermediate nature, between metal and stone. [Something like black lead ore.]

Corner stone, or head stone of the corner: that put at the angle of a building, whether at the foundation, or on the top of the wall. Jesus Christ, though rejected by the Jews, was the corner stone of the church, Psalm cxviii. 22. and the stone that binds and unites the synagogue and Gentiles in the union of one faith. Acts iv. 11. Isaiah xxviii. 16. Eph. ii. 20. 1 Pet. ii. 6. Matt. xxi. 42. Mark xii. 10. Luke xx. 17.

Stone of Zoheleth, 1 Kings i. 9. as the Rabbins say, was a stone that served for exercise to young people, who tried their strength either in lifting it, casting it, or rolling it; on which they are not agreed. See Zech. xxii. 3. A stone of proof.

The Hebrews sometimes give the name of stone, or rock, to kings, to princes, to God himself. Joseph in Egypt became the stone of Israel. Gen. xlix. 24. [So Cephass, i. e. Peter, in N. T.] They called stones their weights used in commerce. Lev. xix. "Just weights shall ye have:" Heb. "Just stones. Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small." Deut. xxv. 13. Heb. "a stone and a stone." The stone of the king, is the king's weight, 2 Sam. xiv. 26. See also Prov. xiv. 11. xx. 10, 23. Mic. vi. 11. A stone of fraud, is a deceitful weight. [From some such custom, no doubt, is derived our English term a stone weight.]

They call a great shower of hail, hail-stones. Josh. x. 11. Isai. xxx. 30. Ezek. xiii. 12, 13. xxxviii. 22. Vide infra.

Jacob's stone, is that he used for his pillow, when going to Mesopotamia, upon which he poured oil, as a kind of consecration, intending it as a memorial. Gen. xxviii. 18. In effect, he did come hither to pay his vows, and to offer his sacrifices, when he returned from that country. Gen. xxxv. 14. From Jacob's anointing of this this stone, say some, the Pagans took the practice of pouring oil on certain stones which they worshipped. Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. lib. vii. assures us, that they paid a religious worship to these kinds of stones. Arnobius, cont. Gen. lib. i. acknowledges, that he himself had practised this kind of idolatry, before he embraced Christianity: Si quando conspexeram lubricatum lapidem, et ex olivi unguine lubricatum, tanquam inesset vis præsens, adulabar, affabar.

The ancient Phenicians, called by the name of Bethulæa, such stones as were consecrated to religious worship. Euseb. Præpar. lib. i. cap. 10. Sanchoniathon ascribes the invention of them to the god Cœlus; he says, they are living and animated stones. They were long seen about Mount Libanus. Asclepiades, apud Photium, Cod. 242. takes notice of them near Heliopolis, in Syria. They ascribed oracles to them, and the presence of some deity, or of some genius that animated them. Some of these Bethulæa were consecrated to Saturn, others to the sun, or to other deities. Hesychius says, that the poets call the stone which Saturn devoured instead of his son Jupiter, by the name of Bethula. I doubt not but that the word Bethula or Bethulæa, is derived from Bethel, where Jacob anointed a stone in honour of the true God.

The Mahometans think, that Jacob's stone was conveyed to the temple of Jerusalem, and is still preserved in the mosque there, where the temple formerly stood. They call it Al-sakra, or the stone of unction. The cadî Gemaleddin, son of Vallel, writes, that passing through Jerusalem, in his way to Egypt, he saw Christian priests carrying glass phials full of wine over the Sakra, near which the Mussulmen had built their temple, which, for this reason, they call the "temple of the stone." This wine that the Christian priests set upon the stone, was no doubt, designed for the celebration of mass there.

Shower of stones. Joshua, x. 11. speaks of its raining stones upon the Canaanites. "And it came to pass as they fled from before Israel, and were in the going down to Beth-horon, that the Lord cast down great stones from heaven upon them unto Azekah, and they died. They were more that died with hail-stones, than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword." Some pretend, that this was frozen hail, but larger and more violent than usual; others maintain, that Joshua intends literally, a shower of stones. The text seems to be express for this sentiment; and the thing is not impossible. We have several instances of showers of stones.

When Scripture speaks of these events, it speaks of them as of a prodigy. But a shower of hail has nothing of a prodigy in it. Masius, Bonfrere, Grotius, explain it literally of a shower of stones. Moses, Deut. xxviii. 24. speaks of a shower of dust and sand, with which he threatens Israel. Comp. FRAGMENT, No. CLXXII. CLXXIII.

The Romans, who looked on showers of stones as very disastrous, in their annals have noticed many instances of them. Under the reign of Tullus Hostilius, when it was known to the people of Rome, that a shower of stones had fallen on the mountain of Alba, at first it seemed incredible. They sent out proper persons to inquire into this prodigy, who found that stones had fallen after the same manner as a storm of hail driven by the wind. Tit. Liv. Decad. lib. i. xlv. xxx. xxxiv. xxxv. et alibi passim. Some time after the battle of Cannæ, there was seen on the same mountain of Alba, a shower of stones, which continued during two days. In 1538, near a village in Italy, called Tripergola, after some shocks of an earthquake, there was seen a shower of stones and dust, which darkened the air for two days, after which it was observed that a mountain had risen up in the midst of the Lucrine lake. Montfaucon, Diar. Italic. cap. 21. [It is probable the stones mentioned by Livy, came from an eruption of mount Vesuvius, being brought by a tempest: but whence could those come that fell on the Canaanites? The instances of enormous hail-stones are amply sufficient. Exod. ix. 25. Rev. xvi. 21.]

This is not to affirm that there was no miracle here, as there was none in those showers of stones mentioned by Livy; but the miracle consists much less in the thing itself, than in the circumstances of time and place.

Stone of offence. What we meet in our way, which makes us stumble or fall. Isaiah viii. 14. St. Peter and St. Paul have said that Jesus Christ was a stumbling-stone to the Jews who believed not on him. Rom. ix. 33, 34. 1 Peter ii. 8.

Moses says, that God would give the Hebrews a country, whose rocks and stones should supply them with plenty of honey and oil, Deut. xxxii. 13. He made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock." The Psalmist says, (lxxxvi. 16.) speaking of the miracle by which Moses drew water out of the rock; "With honey out of the rock should I have satisfied thee." In Palestine the bees often store up their honey in holes of the rocks: to this the Scripture alludes. Job says, xxix. 6. in the same sense, that in his prosperity, "the rock poured out out rivers of oil," because olive-trees generally grew on stony mountains.

Many people bordering on Palestine, dwelt in the rocks and hollow caves in the mountains. The people inhabiting on the Persian gulph, lived in the same manner. For this reason they were called in Greek Troglodytes; i. e. people who dwell in caves and mountain-grottoes. Those that inhabited the desert about Tekoah, lodged in caverns dug in the earth, says Jerom. The Idumeans had their abodes in clefts of the rocks. Jer. xlviii. 28. "O ye that dwell in Moab, leave the cities and dwell in the rock, and be like the dove that maketh her nest in the sides of the hole's mouth." Hither the Moabites used to retreat, in times of calamity. The Kenites who dwelt south of the Dead-sea, had similar dwellings: "And he looked on the Kenites, and said; Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou puttest thy nest in a rock." Numb. xxiv. 21.—Comp. FRAGS. No. DLIX.

In Isaiah li. 1. God says to the Jews, "Look unto the rock whence ye are hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence ye are digged;" i. e. to Abraham and the patriarchs, your ancestors. Matth. iii. 9. John the Baptist tells the Pharisees: "Think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father; for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham." He can convert the most hardened hearts, and effectually call those at the greatest distance. It is believed, that the Baptist pointed to the stones in the desert, but understood people that were yet infidels and Gentiles.

Knives of stone used by the Jews in circumcision, were not enjoined by the law; but the use was founded, either on custom, convenience, or experience of this kind of instrument, being less dangerous than those of metal. Zipporah used a stone to circumcise her sons. Exod. iv. 25. Joshua did the same, when he caused many of the Israelites to be circumcised at Gilgal. Josh. v. 2. This expression shews, that knives of steel were not in common [ritual] use. The Egyptians used knives of stone to open dead bodies that were to be embalmed, Herodot. lib. ii. cap. 2. Pliny, lib. xxxv. cap. 12. assures us, that the priests of the mother of the gods had sharp stones, with which they cut themselves, which they thought they could not do with any thing else without danger. Catullus, Carm. de. Berecynt. et Athy. observes, that Atys demasculated himself after the same manner:

Deuilit acuto sibi pondera siliis.

It is probable, that knives of flint are the most ancient cutting instruments; and therefore acquired a kind of veneration or sanctity, which lasted long after the introduction of iron, or steel, for domestic purposes.

They used stone knives to make incisions in the tree whence the balm distilled; also, formerly instead of pen-knives, to cut the canes for writing with. Scaliger says, that he had seen at Lyons two of these stone knives. The Africans of Morocco, and some Americans, at this day, have them in common use, for the purposes of knives, lancets, and razors. Julian, lib. vi. Epigram apud. Bonfrer. 1 Jos. v. The oriental Jews commonly use them for the circumcision of their children, being not unlike our flints: but the western Jews use a razor. D. Joh. de Palafox, cap. 12.

Moses forbids the Hebrews to set up in their country any stone that is exalted, or remarkable. Levit. xxvi. 1. אבן משכית. LXX. λίθον σκόπον. The text may be translated by a stone for sight, a land-mark, that stands on an eminence, or in some great road, to be seen from a distance. Strabo, lib. xvii. mentions these stones, on the highways in Egypt. They are raised high, are polished, round, almost spherical; made of a kind of black and hard stone, of which mortars are made in that country. These stones or columns are placed on a larger stone, or base, and sometimes have another lesser stone over them, as a capital. Some stand alone and separate; the greatest are almost twelve feet in length, and generally they are about half as thick; says that writer. He says also, there are several remarkable and eminent stones upon Libanus. The Syrians and Egyptians had such respect for these stones, that they almost adored them. They anointed them with oil, as may be seen in Apuleius; they kissed them, and saluted them. It is likely, that this worship is what Moses intended to prohibit.

[The Druidical stones, not uncommon in our own country, and especially the Rocking stones, will readily occur to the intelligent reader. They certainly were, as the Hebrew words may be rendered, stones of observation; they astonished the multitude; as to this day, the power by which they were adjusted, astonishes the ingenious. Comp. PLATE of GILGAL.]

Solomon says, Proverbs xvi. 8. As he that bindeth a stone in a sling, so is he that giveth honour to a fool. Or, as the Vulgate, He that heaps honours on a fool, acts like one who throws a stone on a heap, raised in honour of Mercury. Statues of Mercury were generally set up at cross-ways, and heaps of stones were cast at the feet of these statues, out of superstitious stitious notions ; pretty much like what is practised in Italy, &c. where superstitious travellers throw stones at the feet of certain crosses set beside the high-way. They pretend, that so many stones cast there, are testimonies of salutation paid. The Pagans used to make heaps of stones at the feet of the statue of Mercury, and to his honour ; and it can hardly be doubted, but that the author of the Vulgate had this custom in View. [Nevertheless, it is a striking variation from the original ; how did the translator obtain his idea ? See SLING.]

But the Hebrew imports ; “ Just as a little stone, (literally, a fragment of a stone) thrown upon a heap of stones ; so is honour conferred upon a fool.” This little stone does not augment the heap, nor is so much as seen upon it ; so honour heaped upon a fool, does not render him more worthy of consideration. Others translate it, to tie a stone in a piece of purple, is to give honour to a fool. As nothing can be so ill placed as a stone in a piece of fine [imperial purple] cloth ; so are honours ill placed upon a fool. Lastly, the Hebrew may be rendered ; To give honours to a fool, is to put a piece of tried silver in a sling. The LXX. translate :—He that gives glory to a fool, is like him who ties a stone in a sling ;—he counteracts his own object.

HEAPS of stones, raised in witness of memorable events, and to preserve the remembrance of matters of great importance, are the most ancient monuments among the Hebrews. In early ages, these were instead of inscriptions, pyramids, medals, or histories. Jacob and Laban raised such a monument on Mount Gilead, in memory of their covenant. Gen. xxxi. 46. Joshua erected one at Gilgal, of stones taken out of the Jordan, to preserve the memorial of his miraculous passage. Josh. iv. 5, 6, 7. The Israelites beyond Jordan, raised one on the banks of that river, as a testimony that they constituted but one nation with their brethren on the other side. Josh. xxii. 10. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXLVI. and PLATE of GILGAL.

Sometimes they marked by such a heap of stones the burying place of odious persons, as Achan, Josh. vii. 26. Absalom, 2 Sam. xviii. 17.

Rough and unformed stones were considered as purer, and fitter for sacred uses, than those that were hewn. Moses directed, Exod. xx. 25. an altar to be raised to the Lord, of rough stones ; not of hewn stones ; for if thou lift up thy tool upon it, thou hast polluted it.” God ordered that an altar of rude stones should be built to him upon Mount Ebal, Deut. xxvii. 5. that it should be covered with mortar, and that the words of the covenant should be written upon it. This was performed by Joshua. Josh. viii. 31, 32. The altar of the temple at Jerusalem, built after the return from the captivity, was of rude stones ; Ezra v. 8. likewise that repaired by Judas Maccabeus, after the profanation of the former by Antiochus Epiphanes. 1 Macc. iv. 46, 47.

Moses speaking of Palestine, says, the stones of that country are iron-stones ; Deut. viii. 9. implying that they might serve to make knives, hatchets, and other instruments, which are commonly made of iron ; or that these stones have the hardness and solidity of iron ; or rather that the mountains of this country abundantly supply mines of iron, i. e. iron-stone.

A heart of stone, may be understood several ways. Job, xli. 24. speaking of the Behemoth, says, his heart is as hard as stone, as impenetrable as an anvil : q. d. he is of a very extraordinary strength, boldness, and courage. The heart of Nabal became as a stone, when he comprehended the danger he had incurred by his imprudence. 1 Sam. xxv. 37. His heart became immoveable like a stone, it was contracted or convulsed, and this convulsion occasioned his death. Ezekiel says, xi. 19. xxxvi. 26. the Lord will take away from his people the heart of stone, and give them a heart of flesh ; he will convert them, and inspire them with milder and more gracious feelings. Pretty nearly in the same sense, John the Baptist said, Matt. iii. 9. God was able to raise up to Abraham, children from the stones of the desert.

A stone is sometimes put for an idol of stone ; “ Wo unto him that saith to the wood, Awake, and to the dumb stone, Arise, it shall teach.” Hab. ii. 19. The Assyrians threw into the fire the gods of the nations ; for they were no gods, they were only wood and stone. Isaiah, xxxvii. 9. And Jer. ii. 27. “ Saying to a stock, Thou art my father, and to a stone, thou hast brought me forth.”

To be reduced to a heap of stones, is said of a city or house which is entirely ruined and demolished ; I will make Samaria “ as a heap of the field, and as plantings of a vineyard [or, as a heap of stones gathered out of a field into a waste corner, when the field is about to be planted as a vineyard.] Mic. i. 6. Isaiah says, xvii. 1. Damascus shall cease to be a city, and shall be reduced to a heap of stones. Thus also our Saviour, speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem, says, one stone shall not remain upon another. Matt. xxiv. 2.

Daniel, speaking of the kingdom of the Messiah, compares it to a small stone loosened from the

the mountain, by no mortal power, that struck upon the feet of the Colossus which Nebuchadnezzar saw in his dream, and afterwards filled the whole earth. Dan. ii. 34.

Ecclesiasticus says, xxii. 1, 2, that the slothful man shall be stoned with stones of dirt, and stones of filth or dung. That is, besides the punishment of being stoned, he shall suffer the shame of contempt. He shall be daubed with dirt, and be hooted at as defiled with dung. The English translation reads; "A slothful man is compared to a filthy stone, and every one will hiss him out to his disgrace. A slothful man is compared to the filth of a dunghill, every man that takes it up will shake his hand."

Ezekiel, xxviii. 14, 16. compares the king of Tyre to the cherubim in the temple, in the midst of the stones of fire, or of burning stones. The cherubim were of gold, the pavement of the sanctuary was of stones and marble, precious and shining. Thus the king of Tyre was clothed with magnificent garments; and precious stones surrounded him on all sides, his apartments were paved with precious marble, &c.

STONING. To stone, to put to death by casting stones. Lapidation was a punishment much in use among the Hebrews, and the rabbins reckon many crimes that were subject to it. These are, in general, all that the law condemns to death, without expressing the particular kind of death.

The rabbins tell us, that when a man was condemned to death, he was led out of the city, an officer going before him with a pike in his hand, at the top of which was a linen cloth, to render it distinguishable from afar, and that those who might have any thing to offer in favour of the criminal, might propose it. If no one offered, he was conducted to the place of execution, and was exhorted to acknowledge and confess his fault; because those who confess their sins, have a part in the life to come. After this he was stoned. But lapidation, say the Rabbins, apud Selden. de Synedriis, lib. 1. cap. 5. ii. 13. was performed after two manners. The first was when stones were thrown upon the guilty person till he died; the witnesses throwing the first stone at him. The second manner was, when the criminal was brought to a steep place, in height exceeding that of two men, whence one of the two witnesses threw him headlong, and the other rolled a large stone upon his body. If he did not die, by his fall from the rock, they dispatched him by throwing stones upon him. [Some suppose a reference to these two manners of stoning, Matt. xxi. 44. It will remind the classical reader of the Tarpeian rock, of the Romans.] We see instances in Scripture of the first manner of stoning; but we have no example of the second; that of Jezebel, thrown out of a window, proves nothing. 2 Kings ix. 33.

What we have said, that the Jews generally stoned criminals out of the city, is true only of regular executions. In some cases they stoned those whom they thought deserved it, wherever they found them:—as blasphemers, adulterers, or idolaters. Thus, when they brought to Jesus a woman surprised in adultery, John viii. 7. he said to her accusers, Let him who is without fault cast the first stone at her. And, when the Jews pretending he blasphemed, took up stones to stone him, even in the temple: John viii. 59. x. 31. On such occasions they did not stay for the usual formalities; but followed the transports of their passion. This they called, the judgment of zeal.

We are told, that after a man had been stoned, they fastened his body to a stake, by tying his hands together, and so left him till sun-set; they then untied him, and buried him in the Vale of Carcasses, [Comp. FRAGS. No. DLXXVIII.] with the stake to which he had been fastened. This they say, was done only to blasphemers and idolaters; but it would be very difficult to prove this by Scripture. [But if this custom really took place it much illustrates the intention of the Sanhedrim in the case of Jesus, as suggested in the FRAGMENT above referred to.]

STORAX. Jacob included Storax in his present to the governor of Egypt, whom he did not know to be his son Joseph. Gen. xliii. 11. Hebr. נֶחֱוֹת, nechoth. LXX. Θυρίαια, perfumes. Aquila Στοπακα, Storax. Jerom has followed Aquila. Storax is a plant in magnitude and form somewhat like a quince-tree. It yields a liquor also called Storax. Its blossom is white, and its fruit hangs by long stalks, covered with a thin skin, round and sharp at the bottom, of the bigness of a large nut, wherein are little kernels, whence the grain is taken. Storax is a fat thick liquor, like balm, which has a disagreeable smell. Some do not distinguish storax from stacte, which see.

It is not certain that Nechoth, signifies storax, Jerom, Gen. xxxvii. 25. 2 Kings xx. 13. and Isaiah xxxix. 2. renders it by aromata, and Gen. xliii. 11. by storax. The LXX. always use aromata. Others think it to be war, rosin, stacte, balm, or something very valuable.

STORK, Ciconia, a bird well known; in Hebrew chased, or chasida, חָסִידָה, חָסִיד, which signifies pity or mercy; probably because of the tenderness it manifests towards its parents, which which it never forsakes; but feeds, and defends. The stork is a bird of passage, Jer. viii. 7. "The stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed times, and the turtle and the crane, and the swallow observe the time of their coming." Jerom and the LXX. sometimes render the Hebrew by Herodius, the heron, sometimes by pelican, or kite: but interpreters are pretty well agreed, that it signifies a stork. Moses places it among unclean birds. Lev. xi. 19. Deut. xiv. 18. The Psalmist says, civ. 17. "As for the stork, the fir-trees are her house." In the climate of Europe, she rather makes her nest on some high tower, or the top of a house; but in Palestine, where the coverings of the houses are flat, she builds in high trees. Profane authors speak much of the piety of the stork, and its gratitude to its parents. St Ambrose says, Hexaemer, lib. v. cap. 16. that for this reason the Romans called it avis pia; and Publius, apud Petron. (Vide Bochart, de Animal. Sacr. tom. 2. lib. ii. cap. 29.) calls it pietatis cultrix:

*Ciconia etiam gruta, peregrina, hospita,
Pietatis-cultrix, gracili-pes, crotalistrus.*

The stork has beak and legs long and red; it feeds on serpents, frogs, and insects: its plumage would be wholly white, but that the extremity of its wings, and some small part of its head and thighs are black: it sits for the space of thirty days, and lays but four eggs. Formerly the stork was not eaten, but at present it is much esteemed, for the delicacy of its flesh.—They visit southern countries in August, and return in spring. Bellonius says, that when they go away, that stork which comes last to the place of rendezvous is killed. Vide MISCELLANIES, PLATE IV. No. 1. a stork's nest at Athens. FRAGMENTS, No. CCLXXXV.

Besides the common stork above described, there is a black one which the Egyptians call Ibis; it is not a bird of passage, but continues in that country, and was a sacred bird. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXVIII. and PLATE.

STRANGE Worship. The Hebrews thus called all idolatry, all superstition, all imitation of the worship of strange nations and idolaters, all sacrilege, all religious worship performed, even to the true God, in place, time, or manner, different from what he had appointed: All this is called strange worship, because not conformable to that of the patriarchs of their nation.

ral such in the genealogy of the kings of Israel; and consequently, in that of Jesus Christ.—Hence we may infer that some of them became sincere and honourable worshippers of the God of Israel.]

STUDIES of the Hebrews. The chief study of the Hebrews, was always the law of the Lord. We see this recommended throughout the Old Testament. Exod. xiii. 9. Deut. vi. 7.

But their study was not confined to the laws, and to the ceremonies, prescribed by Moses: they studied their histories, and genealogies; so that the children of the Jews, according to Jerom, had at their fingers-ends all the genealogies in the Chronicles. From their tenderest infancy, as Josephus affirms, cont. App. lib. i. they were accustomed to study the laws of God, to learn them by heart, to practise them; and they were so addicted to them, that they were ready to die for them.

After they had the writings of the prophets, they endeavoured very earnestly to ascertain the sense of the prophecies, and to study their hidden meaning. This we see by Daniel, who applied himself with great assiduity to unfold the meaning of his own revelations, and those of the prophet Jeremiah, who had fixed the time for the termination of the captivity. Dan. vii. 28. ix. 2, 3, 22, 23, 24. Comp. 1 Pet. i. 11. Jesus, son of Sirach, is described as a man of learning, who, after he had with great diligence studied the law, the prophets, and the other books of his nation, laboured to write something that might be of use to posterity. And the description given by the son of Sirach of a truly learned man, according to the Hebrews, is as follows: "The wise man who addicts himself to study, and who meditates on the law of the Lord, will search out the wisdom of all the ancients, and will make the prophets his study. He will lay up in his heart the discourses of famous men, and at the same time he will penetrate into the mystery of parables. He will enter into the service of great men, and will appear before the governors of provinces. He will travel into the territory of foreign nations, to prove good and evil among men. And if it shall please the sovereign Lord, he will be filled with the spirit of understanding: and will dispense the words of wisdom like rain, &c."

In our Saviour's time it appears, that the main study of the Jewish doctors was the traditions.

tions. Jesus Christ upbraids them frequently with having forsaken the law of God, and its true meaning, by ascribing meanings and explications to it, contrary to its genuine sense, and the intention of the law-giver. St. Paul who had been educated in these principles, exposes the absurdity of them in his epistles, recalling the laws to their original, and true sense. But all this was not able to cure the spirit of the Jews on this article; at this day they are more bigotted to their traditions than ever, and make them the greatest part of their study. See SCHOOLS, SYNAGOGUES, TRADITIONS, RABBINS, &c.

STYLE, to write with. The ancients often used styles, i. e. a kind of bodkin, to write with on tablets coated over with wax. These styles were of iron, brass, or bone, sharp at one end, the other formed like a little spoon, or spatula. The sharp end was used for writing letters, the other end expunged them. The writer could put out, or correct, what he disliked, and yet no erasure appear, and he could write anew as often as he pleased on the same place. On this is founded that advice of Horace, of often turning the style, and blotting out,

Sæpe sty'um ventus iterum quæ digna legi sint Scrip'tus.

Scripture alludes to the same custom; E. gr. 2 Kings xxi. 13. I will blot out Jerusalem as men blot out writing from their writing tablets." I will turn the tablets, and draw the style over the wax, till nothing appear, not the least trace.

Isaiah, viii. 1. received orders from the Lord, to write in a great roll of parchment, with the style of a man, what should be dictated to him.—It is asked, What is meant by this style of a man? It could not be one of these styles of metal: They were not used for writing on parchment. It is probable, that the style of a man, in this place, signifies a manner of writing, which is easy, simple, natural and intelligible. For generally the prophets expressed themselves in a parabolical, enigmatical, and obscure style. Here God intended that Isaiah should not speak as the prophets, but as other men used to do.

Jeremiah says, viii. 8. the style of the doctors of the law, is a style of error, it writes nothing but lies. Literally; "The pen of the scribes is in vain." They have promised you peace, but behold war. He says, "The sin of Judah is written with a pen of iron and with the point of a diamond. It is graven upon the table of their heart;" or, engraven on their heart, as on writing tablets. The Hebrew says, a graver of Shamir. See SHAMIR.

SUAH, that tears up by the roots; from sachah, or from nasach: otherwise, to despise. [lamenting, peevish? or painful to be borne; such being the condition of his mother at his birth. The name of his brother, Harnepher, is also thought to signify restlessness, or even breathlessness, from the same cause. Sous of Zophach. 1 Chr. vii. 36.]

SUCCOTH, סוכות, tents, tabernacles: from סך suc.

I. SUCCOTH, or SOCHOTH, the first encampment of the Israelites, after they left Egypt. Exod. xii. 37. perhaps the Mischenoth, or Cities of Tents, Exod. i. 11. Our translation renders Mischenoth "treasure cities."

II. SUCCOTH, a city beyond Jordan, between the brook Jabok and that river. Jacob on his return from Mesopotamia, passing over the brook Jabok, set up his tents at Succoth, where afterwards a city was built, Gen. xxxiii. 17. Joshua assigned it to the tribe of Gad. Josh. xiii. 27. Solomon cast his large brazen vessels, for the temple, between Succoth and Zarthan. 1 Kings vii. 46. Jerom says, quest. Hebr. in Gen. xxxiii. that Succoth was in the district of Scythopolis. The Jews tell us the name of Darala was some time afterwards given to Succoth; סכות דרעלה, Succoth Darala. Gideon tore the flesh of the principal men of Succoth with thorns and briars, because they returned him a haughty answer when pursuing the Midianites, Judges viii. 5, ante A. D. 1245.

[SUCCOTH. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCVI. Cots, or Booths,

2. Of the Israelites, when preparing to leave Egypt, called by Pliny, Suchæ, lib. vi. cap. 29. Scenas Mandrorum in the Antonine Itinerary, as some suppose. Exod. xii. 37. xiii. 20. Numb. xxxiii. 5. Comp. FRAGS. No. XXXIX.

3. SUCCOTH BENOTH, booths, or tents of the young women, (Wenches' cots) places sacred to Venus Milytta, called Camaras by Herodotus; whence, perhaps, camera, chambers, 2 Kings xxvii. 20. Baruch seems to allude to these, vi. 42, 43. Comp. FRAGS. No. CCXIII.]

SUCCOTH-BENOTH, סכות-בנות, tabernacles of young women, or tents of prostitutes; from סך soc, a tent, a tabernacle; and בת bath, a daughter.

SUCCOTH-BENOTH. 2 Kings xvii. 30. The Babylonians brought from Assyria into Samaria, made there Succoth-benoth. Vide Selden, de Diis Syr. Syntagm. 2. cap. 7. Grotius, ad 2 Reg. xvii. 20. Herodotus says, lib. i. cap. 199. that at Babylon all the young women are obliged, once in their lives, to prostitute themselves to a stranger, in honour of the goddess Milytta, or Venus. The rich present themselves before the temple in covered chariots, attended by a great number of domestics. They go only out of ceremony, and do not abandon themselves to strangers, as others do. But the common sort stand before the temple, having crowns on their head, and being separated, by small cords, which, however, do not hinder strangers from going in, and choosing. They throw money in their laps, saying, "I invoke the goddess Milytta for you." The woman must not refuse this money, be it ever so little, because it is appointed to uses which they call sacred, nor must they reject such persons as offer themselves. These lead them away; after they have accompanied them, they may return to their own houses. Probably, the Babylonians brought with them this abominable custom into Samaria. The Rabbins insist, that Succoth-benoth signifies a hen and chicken. Eusebius and Jerom, in locis, seem to think, it is a city which these people built in Samaria. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCXIII.

SUD, or SODI, Σδὶ, from סוד, sod, secret. Heb. pride. A river of Babylonia, Baruch, chap. iv. We know no river by this name in that country: it might be some stream flowing into the Euphrates.

SUDARIUM. This Latin word, according to several good interpreters, signifies a bandage of cloth, wrapped about the head. [Theophylact, Œcumen. Drus. Hamm. Sanct. Lud. de Dieu. in Act. xix. 2.] Sudarium comes from sudor, sweat. We generally translate sudarium by handkerchief, or napkin; but its proper signification, and use, was to wipe off sweat from the head and face.

The wicked servant, Luke xix. 20. returned his master's money which he had hid in a napkin; in sudario. Acts xix. 12. we read, that the sudaria of linen, which St. Paul had used in wiping himself, restored the sick to health.

Sudarium is chiefly used in ecclesiastical language, to signify the shroud in which the body of our Saviour was wrapped in his sepulchre.

But shrouds are not sudaria properly so called: for, John expressly mentions the sudarium upon the head of Lazarus, brother to Mary and Martha, and upon the head of Jesus Christ, as they lay in their tombs; xi. 44. xx. 7. Beside which they were wrapped in shrouds, &c.

SULPHUR, is distinguished into two sorts; the yellow sulphur, or common sort, which is hard, shining, friable, easily melted, and inflammable. The mines of sulphur which are found at Mount Vesuvius, and other burning mountains, or volcanos, maintain the inflammation of the earth in the bowels of these mountains. The other kind is sulphur vivum, grey, fat, bituminous, inflammable: it furnishes the yellow sulphur.

Scripture speaks of sulphur in several places. The Hebrews call it גופרית gofrith, which resembles the word גפר gopher, used to signify the wood chosen by Noah to build his ark. Moses says, that the Lord rained fire and brimstone upon Sodom and Gomorrah; Gen. xix. 24. i. e. he destroyed those cities by sulphureous and fiery discharges. Deut. xxix. 23. he says, that God consumed them by sulphur and the burning of salt. The Hebrews reckoned as salts, nitre, bitumen, sulphur, and inflammable substances. Vide SODOM and LOT.

Job, or rather Bildad, his friend, Job xviii. 15. says, by way of imprecation on the wicked, "brimstone shall be scattered upon his habitation:" lightning or thunder shall fall on his house, and there leave the fume of sulphur. Or, the wicked shall be driven out of his house, and those who take possession of it, should purify it by sulphur. This was a common fumigation for expelling bad air, and for purifying infected habitations. [Comp. the action of Ulysses in the Odyssey; who purifies the large hall of his palace from the smell of blood, by burning sulphur in it.] The Psalmist allots to the wicked their portion of fire, sulphur, and tempestuous winds;—thunders and storms, Psalm xi. 6. Isaiah, xxx. 33. describing the burning of the Valley of Tophet, defiled by idolatry, says, a great pile is provided for it, which the breath of the Lord should inflame as a torrent of sulphur.

The same prophet, chap. xxxiv. 9. to give a lively idea of that vengeance which God should take on wicked nations, says, that in his presence, rivers should be turned into pitch, the earth into sulphur, and burning pitch; that they should continually burn night and day, and their smoke should ascend to heaven incessantly. What a strength of imagery! Ezekiel threatens the army of Gog with the severest effects of God's wrath, pestilence, blood, violent rains, thunder, fire, sulphur, xxxviii. 22. We have seen a shower of sulphur fall on Sodom, and we often find it in the Revelations.

SUN, שמש, Shemesh. ἥλιος, Helios. Sol. This great luminary God created at the beginning, to govern the day. We think it was the sun which the Phenicians worshipped under the name of Baal, the Moabites under the name of Chemosh, the Ammonites under that of Moloch, the Israelites under that of Baal, and king of the host of heaven. They worshipped him on high places, in groves, on the roofs of their houses.

Moses cautioned the Israelites against this : Deut. iv. 19. "Take ye therefore, good heed unto yourselves,—lest thou lift up thine eyes unto heaven, and when thou seest the sun, the moon, and the stars, even all the host of heaven, thou shouldst be driven to worship and serve them." Deut. xvii. 3. he condemns to death those perverted to worship strange gods, the sun, the moon, &c. Josiah, king of Judah, took from the temple of the Lord, the horses, and burned the chariots, which the kings his predecessors had consecrated to the sun. 2 Kings xxiii. 11. Job says, xxxi. 26, 27, 28, that he looked on it as a very great crime, and as renouncing the God that is above, to kiss his hand in token of adoration, when he beheld the sun in all its beauty and splendor. Ezekiel, viii. 16. saw in the spirit, in the temple of the Lord, five and twenty men of Judah, who turned their backs on the sanctuary, and had their faces towards the east, worshipping the rising sun.

The sun furnishes matter to the greater part of the noble similitudes, used by the sacred authors. To represent great public calamity, they say the sun was obscured, &c. &c. See Isaiah xiii. 10. xxiv. 23. Jer. xv. 9. Ezek. xxxii. 7. Joel ii. 31. Amos viii. 9.

Scripture acquaints us with three very extraordinary and miraculous accidents that happened to the sun. The first was, when it stood still at the command of Joshua. Josh. x. 12, 13. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CLIV. The second, when it [the shadow] returned back in the time of king Hezekiah. 2 Kings xx. 11. Vide Nos. II. CII. CCLXIII. And the third, when it was involved in darkness, though the moon was at full, during the time of our Saviour's crucifixion. Matt. xxvii. 45.

To express a long continuance of any thing glorious and illustrious, in Scripture style it is said, it shall continue as long as the sun. So the reign of the Messiah, Psalm lxxii. 17. And Psalm lxxxix. 36. his throne is as durable as the sun. Under his happy dominion, the light of the moon shall equal that of the sun, and that of the sun shall be seven times more than ordinary. Isaiah xxx. 26. Christ is called the sun of righteousness, Mal. iv. 2.

The compass of the whole earth is described by the expression, from the rising of the sun, to the going down of the same: or rather, from east to west. Psalm l. 1. cvii. 3. cxiii. 3, &c. To be hung on a gibbet in the eye of the sun, to be exposed in the fields to the birds of the air, to the heat of the sun, expresses the utmost degree of ignominy. I have beheld all that is done under the sun, i. e. in the world. "A woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet," is the church, personified. Rev. xii. 1.

SUPERSTITION, and Superstitious. These words occur only in the New Testament. Festus, governor of Judea, informed king Agrippa, that Paul had disputed with the other Jews, concerning matters of their own superstition. Acts xxv. 19. He spoke like a true pagan, equally ignorant of the Christian religion, and of the Jewish. St. Paul, writing to the Colossians, chap. ii. 23. recommends to them, not to regard false teachers, who would persuade them to a compliance with human wisdom, in an affected humility and superstition. Speaking to the Athenians, he says; "I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious, &c. Acts xvii. 22.

The Latin word superstitio, may insinuate, either, 1. that a superstitious person adds something to the appointed worship, quod superstat et superfluit, which is redundant and unnecessary; hence superstitio may stand for a superfluous worship: or, 2. that a superstitious man looks on God and religion as an insupportable yoke: horribili super aspectu mortalibus instans, as Lucretius says, lib. i. The Greeks call it deisidaimonia, Δεισιδαιμονία, inanis terror deorum, terror of the gods [demon-terror.] A superstitious man looks on God as a severe and rigid master, and obeys with fear and trembling. Varro says, the pious man honours and loves God; the superstitious man dreads him, even to terror. Maximus Tyrius observes, that a man truly pious looks on God as a friend full of goodness, whereas the superstitious serves him with base and mean flattery. [Probably, however, the Greek word deisidaimonia is of less offensive import, than our author has stated: as Festus, a governor newly arrived in his province, would not have paid so ill a compliment to Agrippa, a king, of the Jewish religion, as to call his religion superstitious: and when Paul at Athens tells the Arcopagites, ye are too superstitious, I am persuaded he uses a word susceptible of a good, as well as of a bad sense; as it would have been highly indecorous, nor less unnecessary, to calumniate the religious disposition of his judges, whom he was addressing: whereas, if we take this word in the sense of worship, or reverence, Festus may say, "Paul and the Jews differ in respect to certain objects of spiritual reverence;"—and Paul may say, "I perceive ye are greatly attached to objects of spiritual reverence," not only without offence, but as a very graceful introduction to a discourse, which proposed to describe the only proper object of such reverence.]

SUPH,

SUPH, סֹפֶה, Jam Suph, Sea of Rushes, the Red-sea. See Sea of Suph.

[SUPHA, סוּפָה. SUPH is certainly the Red Sea; but the notion of Suph being an appellation belonging to the Red Sea only, has misled our translators into gross errors of geography. We read, Numb. xxi. 14. of the book of the wars of the Lord, what he did in the Red Sea—Supha—and in the brooks of Arnon." But the brooks of Arnon were not near the Red Sea, nor was any transaction there comparable to the passage of the Red Sea by the Israelites. It is more probable, that this Supha is the same as Suph, Deut. i. 1. where Moses repeated his laws; which was eleven days' journey from Horeb, and between Paran, Tophel, &c. on this side Jordan; Eng. Tr. certainly, to say the least, in the neighbourhood of that river, and by the banks of it: very distant from the Red Sea. If the name may be derived from a root that signifies the end, it might be not far from the end of the Dead Sea; and probably, rather a place, or district, than a city. It might have been a field of battle.]

SUR, סוּר, Πύλη τῶν ὁδῶν, that withdraws, or departs. A gate in the temple, 2 Kings xi. 6. called the gate of the foundation, 2 Chron. xxiii. 5.

SUSANCHITES, שושנאי, Vulgate, Sasanechei. Lily, or rose, or joy of the lame, or of those that strike; from שושן shoshan a lily, or rose, or נכח naca, lame, or that beats or strikes. This word is foreign from the holy language.

SUSANCHITES, Susanchai. A people that came from beyond the Euphrates to inhabit Samaria, Neh. iv. 9. Probably their former dwelling was in Susiana, or the city and country of Suses, or Sushan.

SUSANNA, Σωσάννα, lily, or rose, or joy, from שושן shoshan.

1. SUSANNA, daughter of Chelcias, and wife of Joachim, of Judah. The history of Susanna happened about A. M. 3401, ante A. D. 603. She dwelt at Babylon, being carried thither captive with her husband, probably at the same time as Daniel; A. M. 3398, ante A. D. 606. Susanna was a woman of extraordinary beauty, and of equal piety. The captive Jews of Babylon, assembled at her husband Joachim's house, for the determination of their affairs; and annually they appointed two judges, for the decision of difficulties. Every day about noon Susanna walked in her husband's garden. The two Judges, who frequented Joachim's house, conceived a violent passion for her, and having met in the garden, to watch for an opportunity of seeing her, they agreed on means of surprizing her alone in the garden. Having succeeded, they ran to Susanna, and threatened, if she would not consent to gratify them, they would accuse her of meeting a young man in the garden.—Susanna sighed deeply and answered: "I see nothing but danger on both sides. But it is better to fall into your hands and be innocent, than to sin against the Lord." She then began to cry out as loud as she could; and the old men at the same time, cried out against her. The people flocked thither, and the two judges affirmed, that they had surprised Susanna with her gallant who escaped.

The day following, the people being assembled at Joachim's as usual, the judges ordered Susanna before them, who came, accompanied by her father, mother, children, and family. Then standing up, the judges putting their hands on her head, swore, that they had seen her in the garden with a young man, and had surprised them in the very act. Susanna being condemned to death, called on God, to witness her innocence.

The Lord heard her prayers; and as she was led to execution, a young man, named Daniel, cried out, "I am innocent of the blood of this woman." On this the people stopped. Daniel upbraided their credulity: Return, says he, and try her again, for they have borne false witness against her." When returned to Joachim's house, Daniel said; separate the elders, from each other, and let me examine them singly. He asked the first; under what tree did you see them together? he answered, "under a mastic-tree." Daniel said to him; the angel of the Lord shall quickly saw you in two." Then the other elder came, to whom he put the same question. He answered, "under a holm-tree." Daniel told him, the angel of the Lord was ready to cut him asunder in the middle." Then all the people shouted for joy, and inflicted on the elders the penalty they had appointed for Susanna; i. e. stoning.

This history is not extant in the Hebrew of Daniel, but only in the (apochryphal) Greek. Many have disputed its canonicalness. Julius Africanus wrote against the truth of this history; Vide Origen, Epist. ad Jul. Afric. et Tract. 31 in Matth. Jerom, who in some places is not favourable to it, and censures it as a mere fable, in other places says, that not only the Greeks and Latins, but also the Syrians and Egyptians, received it as Scripture. Apolog. Rufin. lib. ii. and Prefat. in Daniel. (There is an argument drawn from the play upon words in reference to the names of the two trees, in verse verse 54. Ὑπὸ σχίνον—ἤδη γὰρ Ἄγγελος τῷ Θεῷ σχίσει σε μέσον. 58. Ὑπὸ πρίνον—τὴν ῥομφαίαν ἔχων πρίσει σε μέσον. These allusions, which only have place in the Greek, have made it (strongly) suspected, that this history was never written in Hebrew. Yet it is not impossible, but that the ancient Greek translator, finding these allusions in the Hebrew, may have imitated them in Greek, substituting one tree for another.) [N. B. This mode of reasoning renders the whole copy uncertain; and it is unwise to admit as canonical Scripture, a work liable to such exceptions.]

Several interpreters have thought, that the two judges, convicted by Daniel, were Ahab and Zedekiah, false prophets of Babylon, whom Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon roasted in the fire, because they committed villany in Israel, and have committed adultery with their neighbours' wives. Jer. xxix. 21, 22. But the history states that Susanna's accusers were put to death, 1. by the people, 2. probably by stoning, as Susanna was to have been.

II. SUSANNA, a holy woman who attended on Jesus Christ, with others, who administered to him and his disciples of their substance, Luke viii. 2, 3. This was commonly practised by pious women among the Jews, and gave no offence. Jerom, ad Matth. xxvii. Beda, Strabo, &c. We know nothing more of this Susanna;
for all that has been said of her arrival at Marseilles, with Lazarus, Martha, and Mary, is very apocryphal.

SUSI, סוסי, horse, or swallow; from סוס sus:
otherwise, moth; from סס sas. Father of Gad-di, of Manasseh, Numb. xiii. 11.

SWALLOW. This bird is mentioned, Isaiah xxxviii. 14. "Like a crane or a swallow, so did I chatter." And Jer. viii. 7. "The stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed times, and the turtle, and the crane, and the swallow observe the time of their coming." It is related in Tobit, ii. 11. that the dung falling from a swallow's nest into his eyes, occasioned his loss of sight. The Hebrew סיס Sis, translated swallow, according to some interpreters, signifies a crane; Pagn. Munster, Buxtorf, Mercer, Rab. Salom. et Kimchi: and that which is joined with it in Isaiah and Jeremiah, חגור hagur, according to them signifies a swallow. The Chaldee and Symmachus translate the words of Isaiah, "I cried as the swallow which is taken."
And Aquila, like the swallow (סוס sus) Agur.

The Septuagint, Vulgate, and Bochart, think that sis signifies a swallow. But the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and Symmachus took hagur for a verb. Bochart thinks it signifies a crane. It is plain from Jeremiah, that these two words signify different birds. The reasons in proof that sis signifies a swallow, are, 1. The antient Greek interpreters took it in this sense. 2. The name sis answers to the cry of the swallow; and the goddess Isis, [the reader will remark the formation of the name.] they say, was changed into this bird. 3. The swallow is a plaintive bird, and of passage, which suits the meaning of Isaiah and Jeremiah. [Some think the name sus is derived from the rapid flight of this bird; and a kind of swallow is called swift, among ourselves. The martins are also reckoned among swallows. The species are very numerous.]

This bird is black, with spots of a dirty black under her belly; is very swift of flight; appears in summer; and departs before winter, probably into hotter climates. It is called Chelidon in Greek, whence comes the name of the herb Chelidone; in English, celandine, or swallowwort, because it is pretended, that with this herb the swallow opens the eyes of her young, though they should be blind.

She is said to breed twice a year; once in each climate. Their chief food is insects. They commonly make their nests in chimneys, and every year return to the same place. Their nests are made of clay or dirt, with little bits of straw or chaff intermixed.

Bellon says, its eye-sight is so quick, that it perceives a fly at the distance of a thousand paces. There are also sea-swallows. I do not find that Moses declares the swallow clean or unclean.

SWINE, an animal well known; forbid as food to the Hebrews, Lev. xi. 7. Deut. xiv. 8.
They held the flesh of this animal in such detestation, that they would not so much as pronounce its name. But instead they said—that beast—that thing. Porphyry affirms, de Abstin.
Animal. that the Hebrews and Phenicians abstained from pork, because there was none in their country. It had been much more congruous to have said, there was none, or but little, because they bred no hogs, so great was their abhorrence: for we know that there were herds of swine in our Saviour's time. Matth. viii. 30, 31. Mark v. 11. Luke viii. 32, 33. xv. 15.—
Some antient authors thought, Plut. Arch. Sympos, lib. iv. that the Jews refrained from the flesh of this animal, because they paid divine honours to it;

Judeus licet et porcinum numen adoret,
Et Cilli summas advocet auriculas.

PETRON. Sat. Frag.

But this calumny is so notorious, as not to deserve deserve confutation. Profane authors rallied them on this abstinence, saying, that the Jews would as soon kill a man as a hog;

Neo distare putant humanâ carne suillam.
JUVEN. Sat. xv.

Augustus said (apud Macrob.) it were "better to be Herod's hog than his son;" because that prince had slain several of his sons, whereas he slew no hogs. Vide HEROD.

Beside the Jews, the Egyptians had such a horror for this animal, that whoever had touched one, though by chance, he plunged himself into the river, clothes and all. They did not allow swine-herds to enter their temples, nor would they have any intercourse with them. Herod. lib. ii. cap. 47. The Arabian Scenites ate no pork: and Solinus assures us, that if hogs were but carried into their country, they would presently die. When Adrian rebuilt Jerusalem, he set up the image of a hog in bas relief on the gates, to inflict the greater contempt on the Jews. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCIII. and JEWISH COINS from Calmet, PLATE II.

Our Saviour, Matt. vii. 6. forbids his disciples to cast their pearls before swine, lest, says he, they should tread them under foot, and turn against you and tear you, q. d. We must not rashly discourse on divine matters, and on certain truths, before an audience ill prepared to receive them. This will only provoke them, and expose truth to insult. The same is enjoined in Ecclesiasticus, xxxii. 6. do not speak, but when you find a hearer disposed to receive your doctrine. On this maxim was founded the practice of the ancient fathers of the church, not to speak of the mysteries of Christianity before pagans. The prodigal son, Luke xv. 15. when in distress, was glad to feed swine! a most degrading office to one of the Jewish nation!

It is said, Prov. xi. 22. "as a jewel of gold in a swine's snout, so is a fair woman which is without discretion." The Jewish and Arabian women wore rings in their nostrils to adorn themselves. But nothing can be more ridiculous than to put a gold ring, or a jewel in a swine's snout. Comp. FRAG. No. DCLXVII.

St. Peter compares sinners that frequently relapse into sin, to a swine that as soon as washed, again wallows in the mire. It is a kind of proverb, the hog loves dirt.

SWORD In the style of the Hebrews, the sword is often used for war. The Lord shall send the sword into the land; i. e. war. The "mouth of the sword," is the edge of the sword. "A man that draws the sword," is a soldier by profession. The sword of the mouth, Job v. 15.

is, pernicious discourse, accusations, slander, calumny. "Their tongue is a two-edged sword," Psalm lvii. 4.: the tongue of the wicked is extremely dangerous. "If he turn not, he will whet his sword:" he will prepare to send war. To lift the sword upon stones, Ex. xx. 25. is to cut them with a chissel, or other sharp iron instrument. "By thy sword shalt thou live," Gen. xxvii. 40. thou shalt support thyself by war and rapine. "Nation shall not lift up sword against nation," Isaiah ii. 4. shall not war, smite, wound, or kill. "They that take the sword shall perish with the sword;" Matt. xxvi. 52. they that employ the sword by their own authority, and would do themselves justice, deserve to be put to death by the sword of authority. Or, this is a kind of proverb: those who take the sword to smite another, generally suffer by it themselves. [Or, the military profession exposes those who follow it to the fortune of war, to wounds, &c.] "The word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword;" Heb. iv. 12. it penetrates even to the bottom of the soul, into the heart and mind. St. Paul exhorts the Ephesians, vi. 17. to arm themselves with the word of God, as with a spiritual sword; to defend themselves against spiritual enemies. Comp. FRAGS. No. DCLIII.

[SYCHAR, a city described in John iv. 5. as being in Samaria, near the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph, but it is not elsewhere mentioned in Scripture. Vide SAMARIA.]

SYCOMORE, a tree called the Egyptian fig-tree; its name is composed of Sychos, a fig-tree; and Moros, a mulberry-tree. It is like the mulberry-tree in its leaves, and the fig-tree in its fruit. This fruit grows from the trunk of the tree. It does not ripen till rubbed with iron combs. Amos alludes to this: "I was no prophet, neither a prophet's son, but I was a herdsman, and a gatherer [dresser] of sycomore fruit." Pliny, lib. xiii. cap. 7. observes, that these figs do not ripen except rubbed with iron; Scalpendo tantum ferreis unguibus, aliter non maturescit. Jerom on Amos says, that without this management the figs cannot be eaten, because of their intolerable bitterness; Sycomori agrestes afferunt ficus, quæ si non vellicentur amarissimas cariculas faciunt. Theophrast. Hist. lib. iv. cap. 2. Dioscor. lib. 1.

To render this tree fruitful, they make chinks and clefts in the bark, through which a kind of milky liquor distils. The figs are sweet, but not good for the stomach; they create a nausea, but they moisten and refresh. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCLX. and PLATE, SYCOMORE. Many of these Sycomores grow in Egypt;
some

some so large that three men can hardly grasp them. See FRAGS. No. LXVII.

SYENE, סֵנֵה, bush; from סֵנֵה senah; or enmity, according to the Syriac.

SYENE, a city on the southern frontiers of Egypt towards Ethiopia, between Thebes and the cataracts of the Nile. Ezekiel, xxix. 10. xxx. 6. places it at the extremity of Egypt, adjoining the land of Cush. But the Hebrew might also be translated from Migdol to Syene, and to [even at] the frontiers of Cush. The land of Cush was Ethiopia proper, which is beyond, i. e. south of Syene, the utmost city of Egypt. Migdol signifies a tower. Ezekiel also puts Migdol and Syene as the two extremities of Egypt.

The city of Syene itself, was well known to the ancients, who speak of it as the farthest city of Egypt towards Ethiopia. Strab. Ptolom. Herod. Plin. Stephan. alii. Pliny says it stands in a peninsula on the eastern shore of the Nile: that it is a mile round, and has a Roman garrison. Strabo, lib. xvii. says, there were three Roman cohorts stationed here, to check the inroads of the Ethiopians. He adds, that in this city was a well, wherein the sun shone direct to the bottom; and that here the sun made no shadow at noon, when in the summer solstice. Pliny also speaks of it; lib. i. cap. 73. Solstitii die medio nullam umbram jaci. And Lucan; Umbras nusquam flectente Syene. Lib. ii. v. 587.

SYENE is small but well peopled. The mountains of Alaki, and of Giannadel, where are the cataracts of the Nile, terminate its territory. The first of these mountains is to the east, the other to the west. D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient.

[Syene, or Assouan, is now so well known among us by the many travellers who have passed to, and beyond it, since the French invasion of Egypt, that we have no occasion to enlarge in describing it. Syene was occupied by the French in 1799; they were expelled by the British in 1801. It is now in the power of the government of Egypt—nominally for the Turks.]

SYLVANUS, that loves the woods; from Sylva, a forest. See SILAS, also No. DCLXV.

SYMBOL, from the Greek Symbolon, a mark or pledge, agreed on as a distinguishing sign. Ex. gr. Persons united by the bands of friendship or of hospitality, when they visited one another, carried their symbols or pledges, to shew they were of such a family, such a society, such a place, or such a religion. Symbolum also signifies what each contributed to a feast or entertainment, made at a common charge, whether money, wine, or provisions: [somewhat analogous to our idea of "clubbing" for payment.] We find the word symbolum in this sense. Prov. xxiii. 20, 21. LXX.

[There were various symbols in use among the primitive Christians, as the fish, the dove, the anchor, the ship, the angler, &c. but, perhaps, the first of them was the Alpha A. and Omega Ω. mentioned in the Revelations. The subject is very curious to the inquisitive.]

In ecclesiastical language, symbol is that which forms the matter of the sacraments, that which is the subject of the senses, and opposed to what is represented by it. In the Eucharist, bread and wine are the symbols of the body and blood of Jesus Christ: and in baptism, water is the symbol of inward purification, new life, &c. Suicer, Thes. Eccle.

SYMMACHUS, a famous translator of the Old Testament, out of Hebrew into Greek. He was a Samaritan by birth, and lived at the end of the second century, under the emperor Severus. Epiphanius, de Ponder. et Mensur. says, that he was in good repute in his own country, and held a considerable rank among the learned of Samaria. But having an ambition of becoming their head and master, and being disgusted at their refusal of this dignity to him, he left Samaria, and settled among the Jews. He even submitted to the reception of a second circumcision from them; for the animosity between the Jews and Samaritans was so great, that they obliged proselytes to be re-circumcised.

After this Symmachus embraced Christianity, among the sect of the Ebionites. Euseb. Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. 17. et Demost. Evang. lib. vii. cap. 1. In defence of these heretics against Catholics, he undertook a new translation of the books of the Old Testament into Greek: wherein he gives to the text the most favourable turn he can, conformably to their notions; who acknowledged Jesus Christ as the Messiah, but not as God; or the son of God. They likewise denied a future judgment; and maintained other errors.

The method of Symmachus in his translation, is very different from that of Aquila, or of Theodotion. Aquila endeavours, in a close and servile manner, to give the literal sense, and signification, of every word of the text, not much regarding the coherence of the discourse; whence his translation is rather a dictionary for the literal signification of the terms, than a translation expressing the sense of the writer. Symmachus, on the contrary, endeavours to express what he thought to be the general meaning of the passage, rather than the power of every word.—

Theodotion

Theodotion keeps the medium between Aquila and Symmachus; his version does not appear to be a paraphrase, like that of Symmachus: nor a dictionary, like that of Aquila. He endeavours to give the sense of the Hebrew text in Greek words answering to the Hebrew, so far as the different idioms of the two languages would allow.

We have only fragments of the versions of these ancient translators, gathered together with great pains by Montfaucon, in two volumes, folio, intitled The Hexapla of Origen.

The ancients have spoken of certain heretics, called Symmachians; whom some think to have been followers of this Symmachus, the translator.

SYMPHONY. This word is taken for the agreement of several voices, for a concert of several instruments, or for a particular sort of instrument. St. Luke, xv. 25. Vulg. takes it in the first sense, when he says, that the brother of the prodigal son, returning out of the field, heard in his father's house a concert of instruments, and voices: Audivit symphoniam et chorum. Daniel, iii. 5, 7, 10, 15. takes it in the second sense, for an instrument of music, a viol, or some instrument approaching thereto. [By what means this Greek word might get into Daniel, which has been made an objection against the authenticity of this book, Vide DULCIMER; also FRAGMENTS, No. CCXXXIII.]

SYNAGOGUE. This Greek word signifies either an assembly, or the place where an assembly meets. In the first sense it is commonly understood of the church of the Jews, compared, or opposed to that of the Christians. St. John, Rev. ii. 9. iii. 9. speaking of heretics, calls them the synagogue of Satan.

The Vulgate gives the name of princes of the synagogue, or of the assembly, principes synagoga, to the leading Jews among the people in the desert. Exod. xxxiv. 31. Numb. iv. 34. xvi. 2, &c. We find also, Synagoga Deorum, Synagoga potentium, Synagoga peccatorum, Synagoga populi, Synagoga superbiorum, for the assembly of the Judges, of great men, of sinners, of the people, &c. Mention is made, 1 Macc. ii. 42. of the synagogue of the Assideans, probably a kind of sect, or order of the Jews, professing the strictest piety. See ASSIDEANS.

Synagogue commonly signifies a building wherein the Jews assembled, to pray, to read, to worship. Christ, and his apostles, frequented and preached in the synagogues. The origin of synagogues is not well known, and many learned men have thought them a late institution. Yet we see hints of them in the time of Elisha. Devout persons assembled in his company on the Sabbath-day, to hear the law read. 2 Kings iv. 23. Judith passed the night in prayer, in a place of prayer at Bethulia, vi. 21. Her history is commonly placed under Manasseh. The Psalmist, lxxiv. 8. describing the havoc made by the army of Nebuchadnezzar in Jerusalem, says, "They have burned up all the synagogues of God in the land." מִקְדָּשֵׁי אֱלֹהִים. The captive Jews beyond the Euphrates assembled at the residence of Ezekiel, to hear the word of the Lord. Ezek. xxxiii. 31. Mordecai made all the Jews of Shushan resort to the place of prayer, to commend to God the undertaking of queen Esther. Esth. iv. 16. The author of the third book of Maccabees, who lived under Ptolemy Philopater, king of Egypt, long before the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, says, that the Jews of Egypt being delivered from their danger, set up a place of prayer near Alexandria. 3 Mac. cap. ult. See PROSEUCHA.

At the time of the Maccabees, synagogues became so frequent in Israel, that they were in almost every country place. Maimonides says, in Tophilla, cap. 11. sect. 1. wherever any Israelites settled, they built a synagogue. It is affirmed, that in the city of Jerusalem alone, were nearly five hundred. Every trading fraternity had one, and even strangers built some for their own nations. Hence, Acts vi. 9. we find synagogues of the Alexandrians, of the Asiatics, of the Cilicians, of the freed-men, of the Cyreneans, &c. for those people, respectively, when at Jerusalem.

A synagogue was a public edifice, within, or without a city, but generally on an elevation. The Jews would have them more eminent than other buildings, or private houses; they were usually covered, and thereby distinguished from the Proseuchas, which were commonly in the outskirts of towns, and open. In the midst of the synagogue was a desk or pulpit, from which the book, or roll, of the law was read very solemnly. Here likewise stood whoever intended to harangue the people. At the highest part of the synagogue, towards the east, and opposite the door, (which is always west, as far as can be,) is the chest or press, wherein the book, or roll, of the law is kept, wrapped up in fine embroidered cloth. The women sit apart from the men, in galleries inclosed with lattices.

Every synagogue has a chief, or perhaps several chiefs and officers, according to circumstances. One is called chazan, who appoints and chants the prayers. Another keeps the keys, and is a kind of church-warden, called sciamas, or servant. Leo of Modena, Ceram. Jews,

Part

Part i. cap. 10. The Archisynagogus, angel of the synagogue, [ruler of the synagogue, Eng. Tr.] or sage, Heb. Chacham, presides in the assemblies, and in judicial affairs, which are sometimes decided here, against those who have occasioned scandal, and transgressed the law in important matters: They inflict on the guilty person thirty-nine strokes with a whip. The same presidents invite those to speak in the synagogue whom they think capable, not excepting strangers. Our Saviour often spoke in these assemblies; and St. Paul, at Antioch of Pisidia, was so invited. Luke iv. 16. Matth. iv. 23. ix. 35. et passim. Acts xiii. 13, 14, 15.

The word Synagoga, as signifying a place of assembly, is used for a Christian church.—James ii. 2. “If there come into your assembly (synagogue) a man with a gold ring,” &c. St. Paul says, Heb. x. 25 “Not forsaking the assembling of yourselves together,” where the Greek reads synagogue.

[In FRAGMENTS, No. DCXXXIV. we have hinted at the possibility that the term synagogue in the epistle of James, may indicate a date prior to the expulsion of the Christians, as a sect, from the Jewish public worship in these meeting-houses. This epistle is addressed “to the twelve tribes scattered abroad,” and it may fairly be presumed that most foreign towns had but one synagogue, to which the Christian converts continued to resort; as the Apostles, &c. did, to the temple at Jerusalem. And if the Apostles continued to resort to the temple, the centre of the Jewish ceremonies, and in a city where separate synagogues were numerous,—[the Rabbins say, there were four hundred and eighty—in Cod. Megilla, f. 73. and Pesichta R. Menahem,]—the writer to the Hebrews, might have in his eye this custom of the Jewish Christians, which he advised should be continued till Providence disposed of the nation and its institutions, an event now fast approaching.

The term, Acts xiii. 43. implies a mixed congregation of Jews and Gentiles; and rather the persons, or assembly, than the place in which they were assembled, as the verse before informs us that the Jews were gone out of the synagogue, out of the building; but, a gathering of Gentiles yet remained, and these formed this synagogue.

It should seem from the use of the article, Acts xvii. 1. ὅπου ἦν ἡ συναγωγή,—where was the synagogue of the Jews, i. e. at Thessalonica, that it was the only one in that province; and doubtless we may accept as certain that the city of Thessalonica contained no other. In

John vi. 59. where we read, These things spake Jesus, ἐν συναγωγῇ, it is thought, from the absence of the article, that this was not in the synagogue at Capernaum, which would have been ἐν τῇ συναγωγῇ, but that this phrase imports merely an assembly, or meeting, of the people. Perhaps, somewhat analogous is intended, Rev. ii. 9. “I know the blasphemy of those who say they are Jews, but are not,” ἀλλὰ συναγωγή τοῦ Σατανᾶ, but a synagogue, or an assembly, of the Satan. Nevertheless, in chap. iii. 9. the article is inserted “the synagogue of the Satan.” If we knew perfectly the history of the churches of Smyrna and Philadelphia, we might discover the occasion of this diversity. Possibly, there might be at that time, no synagogue but only a Proseucha at Smyrna.

Dr. Prideaux has enlarged on the Jewish Synagogues, Connect. P. i. book vi. Comp. Lardner's Credibility, book i. chap. 9.

To us it seems very extraordinary that any place of religious worship should be the scene of punishment, i. e. of scourging: a whipping-post seems to be the more proper place. Yet, that this really was so, appears from many passages in the New Testament, notwithstanding that, in apparent contradiction, it was forbidden to eat, to gossip, or to laugh, in such places; most especially during the hours of sacred service. Origen complains of certain Christians, in his day, who in the less public apartments of the houses in which worship was performing, did not scruple walking and talking: They might have taken a better example from the Jews in the Synagogue.]

Synagogue of the freed-men, Synagoga Libertinorum, Acts vi. 9. was, according to many interpreters, that of those Jews, who having been led captive by Pompey and by Sosius, [Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 7, 8, 28. de Bello, lib. i. cap. 5.] had recovered their liberty, and retired to Jerusalem, when Tiberius drove the Jews from Italy. [Tacit. Annal. lib. ii. Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 36. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvi. cap. 5.]—Others think that St. Luke wrote Lybistinorum, not Libertinorum: and that the Lybistini were people of Libya, in Africa, near Egypt. Libertini is not a Greek word. Lybistini would better suit the tenor of the passage: but the manuscripts are not favourable to this conjecture. See LIBERTINE.

The Jewish authors give this general rule for the construction of synagogues. Wherever there are ten Batelnim, a synagogue ought to be built. Megilla, cap. i. sec. 3. Maimon. in Tephill. Vide Lightfoot, Harm. cap. 17. and in Matt. iv. 23. Buxtorf thinks Batelnim are persons receiving ceiving a stipend for duly assisting at divine service, that there may be always ten persons, at least, assembled together. Lightfoot imagines them to have been ministers and officers of the synagogue. But the most probable opinion is, that they were persons of a mature age, free, and competent to assist constantly at the service, at least, two days in a week, besides the Sabbath. So that always on these days there were present that number of assistants, without which the service would not be performed: i. e. Monday, Friday, and Saturday, not including days of fasting, or solemn festivals.

The Great Synagogue. The Hebrews, David Ganz, Chronic. Buxtorf, Tiberius, cap. 10. give this name to a company of six-score persons, at the head of whom was Ezra, at the return from the Babylonish captivity. This company was chiefly established for two reasons: 1st. Effectually to restore the observation of the law, according to the ancient and approved practice before the captivity. 2. To collect all the sacred books into a body, to compose the canon of Holy Scripture: and to give an exact and correct edition. They pretend, that after Esdras, Daniel, and his companions Shadrach, Meshech, and Abednego, held the chief places; that Simon the Just was at the lower end of the assembly, and that all these were contemporary.

But this cannot be supported by chronology; Simon the Just lived long after Daniel and Esdras. What appears most certain is, that Esdras began the reformation mentioned, which was continued by the wiser and more enlightened Jews, and completed, especially as to the canon of Scripture, under Simon the Just, high-priest, ante A. D. 302.

SYNTYCHE, Συντυχῆ, that speaks, or discourses; from the Greek συντυγχάνω, to converse. [Rather, with fortune, from σύν and τύχη]

SYNTYCHE, mentioned Phil. iv. 2. a woman illustrious for virtue and good works, as it were, at the head of the church at Philippi, with another woman called Euodias. Chrysost. Theod. Est. Zanch. Menoc. &c. in Philipp. iv. —It is thought St. Paul speaks of them when he says, "Help those women which laboured with me in the Gospel." But some difficulties had happened between them, and therefore the apostle exhorts them "to be of the same mind in the Lord." We know no further particulars. Syntychē is set down July 22: the martyrologies insinuate, that her body rests at Philippi, in Macedonia.

SYRACUSE, Συρακῶσαι, that draws violently, from the Greek, σὺρῶ, and ἄρσσω. Capital of Sicily, on the eastern coast. Acts xxviii. 12.

SYRIA, אַרַם, (Aram) Συρία. Syria. Sublime, or that deceives; from רַמָּה ramah.

SYRIA, called Aram, from the patriarch who peopled the chief provinces of it. Vide ARAM. The Arameans, or Syrians, possessed Mesopotamia, Chaldea, and part of Armenia. Syria, properly so called, comprehended between the Euphrates east, the Mediterranean west, Cilicia north, Phenicia, Judea and Arabia Deserta south. The Hebrews were originally Arameans; since they came into Mesopotamia, and therefore it is said, that Jacob was a poor Aramean. Deut. xxvi. 5. It is certain, however, that he was not descended from Aram, but from Arphaxad, another son of Shem. Amos, ix. 7. seems to say, that the Lord brought the Assyrians, or Aram, from Kir, as he had brought the Philistines from Caphtor, i. e. that his posterity came to Syria, from the neighbourhood of the river Cyrus, in Armenia.

Syria of the two Rivers, or Mesopotamia of Syria (Vulgate); or Aram Naharaim (Hebrew); between the two rivers Tigris and Euphrates.

Syria of Damascus, that of which Damascus was the capital, extended eastward along mount Libanus. Its limits varied according to the power of the princes that reigned at Damascus.

Syria of Zobah, or Sobal, probably Cæle-Syria, Syria the hollow. Its capital was Zobah, a city unknown, unless it be Hobah or Hobal, north of Damascus. Gen. xiv. 15. See HOBAL or ABILA.

Syria of Maachah, or Beth-maahah, or Muchati, was also towards Libanus. 2 Sam. x. 6, 8. 1 Kings xiii. 20. 2 Kings xv. 29. It extended beyond Jordan, and was given to Manasseh. Deut. iii. 14. Josh. xiii. 4. See MAACHAH.

Syria of Rehob, or Rehob, was that part of Syria of which Rehob was the capital. But Rohob was near the northern frontier of the Land of Promise, Numb. xiii. 21. on the way, or pass, that leads to Emath, or Hamath. It was given to Asher, and lay contiguous to Aphek, in Libanus. Josh. xix. 28, 30. xxi. 31. Laish, otherwise Dan, situate at the fountains of Jordan, was in the country of Rohob. Judg. i. 31. Hadadezer, king of Syria of Zobah, was son of Rehob or Rohob; or perhaps a native of the city so named. 2 Sam. viii. 3, 12. The Ammonites called to their assistance against David, the Syrians of Rehob, of Zoba, of Maachah, and of Ish-tob. 2 Sam. x. 6, 8.

Syria of Tob, or of Ish-tob, or of the land of Tob, or of the Tubieni, as they are called in the Maccabees, was in the neighbourhood of Libanus, the northern extremity of Palestine

Jud. xi. 3, 5. 1 Macc. vii. 13. 2 Macc. xii. 17. See TOB. When Jephthah was banished by his brethren from Gilead, he withdrew into the land of Tob. See PLATES, MEDALS of TABA, or TOB.

Syria of Emath or Hamath, of which Hamath, on the Orontes, was the capital. See HAMATH.

Syria, without any other appellation, denotes the kingdom of Syria, of which Antioch became the capital, after the reign of the Seleucidae. See PLATES, MEDALS of ANTIOCH.

Cælo-Syria, or Cæle-Syria, or the lower Syria, occurs in several places of the Maccabees. 1 Macc. x. 69. 2 Macc. iii. 5, 8. iv. 4. viii. 8. Strabo lib. xvi. 2. Cæle-Syria, in Greek, signifies Syria cava, Syria the hollow or deep. It may be considered, says Strabo, either in a proper and restricted sense, as only the tract of land between Libanus and Antilibanus; or, in a larger signification, including all the country in obedience to the kings of Syria, from Seleucia to Arabia and Egypt.

Syria of Palestine, is read in some authors, Herodot. lib. iii. cap. 5. ii. 104. Ammian. Marcel. Hist. lib. xiv. Josephus, Antiq. lib. x. cap. 7. also, de Bello, lib. v. cap. 14.—sometimes comprehends Palestine under Syria, because this province was long subject to the kings of Syria.

Syria at first was governed by its own kings, each in his own city, and territories. David subdued them, about ante A. D. 1044. 2 Sam. viii. 16. on occasion of his war against the Ammonites, whom the Syrians had assisted. 2 Sam. x. 6, 8. After the reign of Solomon they shook off the yoke, and were not reduced again, till Jeroboam II. king of Israel, A. M. 3179. Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, having declared war against Ahab, king of Judah; this prince found himself under the necessity of craving aid from Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, who put Rezin to death, took Damascus, and transported the Syrians beyond the Euphrates. Syria now continued in subjection to the kings of Assyria. Afterwards, it came under the Chaldeans; then under the Persians; lastly, it was reduced by Alexander the Great, and followed the subsequent revolutions.

After the death of Alexander, A. M. 3681, ante A. D. 323; his empire was divided between his principal officers, who at first assumed only the title of governors, but at length that of kings.

A. M. 3682 Seleucus I. named Nicator, or Nicanor, head of the family of kings called Seleucidae, took the diadem, and name of king of Syria. He reigned forty-two years.

3724 Antiochus I. surnamed Soter, nineteen years.

3743 Antiochus II. surnamed Theos, fifteen years.

3759 Seleucus II. surnamed Callinicus, or Pogon, i. e. bearded; reigned twenty years.

3778 Seleucus III. surnamed Keraunus, or Thunder, reigned three years.

3781 Antiochus III. surnamed Magnus, [the great.] thirty-six years.

3816 Seleucus IV. surnamed Philopator, twelve years.

3828 Antiochus IV. surnamed Epiphanes, son of Antiochus the Great, and brother of Seleucus IV. reigned eleven years.

3840 Antiochus V. surnamed Eupator, two years.

3842 Demetrius I. surnamed Soter, son of Seleucus IV. reigned twelve years.

3854 Demetrius II. surnamed Nicator, reigned ten years, with much perplexity. Alexander Balas, or Belles, and Antiochus, son of Balas, were his competitors. He died A. M. 3864. Alexander Balas died A. M. 3859. Antiochus Theos, his son, begun to reign under the regency of Tryphon, A. M. 3860, but was slain 3861, and the kingdom was usurped by Tryphon, who was put to death in 3866.

3864 Antiochus VI. surnamed Pius, or Soter, or Sidetes, i. e. the fisher or hunter, brother to Demetrius Nicanor, reigned about ten years, when he was put to death by the Parthians.

3873 Demetrius III. surnamed Nicanor, had a competitor in Alexander Zebina. Demetrius was overcome, and slain in 3878, as was Zebina in 3882.

3878 Seleucus V. son of Demetrius Nicanor, reigned one year in great uneasiness.

3882 Antiochus VII. surnamed Gryphus, or Phlometer, dispossessed Zebina in 3882, and reigned eight years in peace. Antiochus, surnamed Cyzicenus, his brother, overcame him in 3892. They divided the kingdom. Antiochus Gryphus died in 3910, having reigned in all about twenty-nine years. Antiochus Cyzicenus, his brother, was overcome and put to death the same year by Seleucus, son of Gryphus.

3910 Seleucus VI. son of Gryphus, reigned one year. He was deprived of his kingdom A. M. 3911, by Antiochus Eusebes, son of his uncle Antiochus Cyzicenus, and was put to death the same year, at Mopsuesta, in Cilicia.

3911 Antiochus VIII. surnamed Eusebes, reigned in trouble two years. His competitors were Antiochus and Philippus, brothers to his uncle uncle Seleucus, also Demetrius Eucærus, son of Antiochus Gryphus, who forced him to take refuge in Parthia.

3912 Syria was now divided between Philip and Demetrius Eucærus; the latter reigned at Damascus. But the Syrians finding their country almost ruined by the civil wars, a party of them determined to call in their neighbour, king 3921 Mithridates, others were for Ptolomy Lathurus, king of Egypt: at last they agreed on Tigranes, king of Armenia, who governed Syria eighteen years.

3932 to 3939 Antiochus XI. surnamed Asiaticus and his brother, sons of Antiochus Eusebes, who still held possession of that part of Syria which Tigranes had not seized, went to Rome, A. M. 3932, to solicit the kingdom of Egypt from the senate, which they pretended to claim in right of their mother Cleopatra, surnamed Selene. But Tigranes having put Selene to death in 3934, Antiochus Asiaticus lost all hope of obtaining Egypt, and returned into Syria in 3935, where he reigned four years, till Pompey reduced Syria into a Roman province, A. M. 3939; when this monarchy became extinct, having subsisted two hundred and fifty-seven years.

COUNTRY OF SYRIA.

["The present inhabitants, (says Volney, Trav. vol. i. p. 288.) who, according to the constant practice of the Arabs, have not adopted the Greek names, are ignorant of the name of Syria, instead of which they call it Barr el Sham, which signifies "country of the left;" and is the name given to the whole space contained between two lines, drawn, the one from Alexandretta to the Euphrates, and the other from Gaza to the desert of Arabia, bounded on the east by that desert, and on the west by the Mediterranean. This name "country of the left," from its contrast with that of the Yamin, or "country of the right," indicates some intermediate place as a common point, which must be Mecca."

"Geographers, however, sometimes write it Sauria, from the constant change of the Greek upsilon into the Arabic waw."

El-sham is also the name of the city of Damascus, the reputed capital of Syria.

The plains of Acre, Esdraelon, Sour, Havala, and the Lower Bekaa, are justly boasted of for their fertility. Corn, barley, maize, cotton, and sesamum, produce, notwithstanding the imperfection of their culture, twenty and twenty-five for one. The country of Kaisaria possesses a forest of oaks, the only one in Syria. Safad furnishes cottons, which, from their whiteness, are held in as high estimation as those of Cy- prus. The neighbouring mountains of Sour produce as good tobacco as that of Latakia, and in a part of them is made a perfume of cloves, which is reserved exclusively for the use of the Sultan and his women. The country of the Druses abounds in wine and silks; in short, from the situation of the coast, and the number of its creeks, this Pachalic necessarily becomes the emporium of Damascus and all the interior parts of Syria." Volney, vol. ii. p. 180.

INHABITANTS OF SYRIA.

"I do not wish to appear an advocate for those rapid populations, which, from a single man, are made to pour forth, in a few generations, numerous and powerful nations; in these relations there are a multitude of mistakes in words, and errors of copyists; but admitting only what is conformable to experience and nature, there is nothing to contradict the great population of high antiquity: without appealing to the positive testimony of history, there are innumerable monuments which depose in favour of the fact; such are the prodigious quantities of ruins dispersed over the plains, and even in the mountains, at this day deserted. On the most remote parts of Carmel are found wild vines and olive trees, which must have been conveyed thither by the hand of man; and in the Lebanon of the Druzes and Maronites, the rocks, now abandoned to fir-trees and brambles, present us in a thousand places with terraces, which prove they were anciently better cultivated, and consequently much more populous than in our days." Volney, Trav. vol. ii. p. 368.—This has been much confirmed since Volney published his Travels, by the discovery of vast and magnificent ruins, &c. which demonstrate the former existence of great, populous and wealthy cities.

SYRIAN CHURCHES.

It was but natural, that the Gospel, which may be said to be of Syrian origin, should be first of all extensively propagated in Syria; and to this, no doubt, all the Apostles contributed. If we consider this country as comprising, principally, the coast of the Mediterranean, then, the chief seat of its Christianity was Antioch; and the introduction of this religion into that city is recorded in the Acts of the Apostles. Of the interior Syria, Damascus was the capital; and we know that it contained Christian converts very early. Eastward, what may be called Chaldean Syria, was evangelized chiefly by Thomas the Apostle, and his assistants: such is the account given by Syrian writers. See THOMAS.

Those writers reckon the Patriarchates, or principal Sees, in the following order: 1. Jerusalem, saalem, because here the Gospel was first established, and this was the first seat of an Apostle. 2. Antioch. 3. Rome. 4. Alexandria, in Egypt. 5. Babylon, in honour of the Apostles Thomas, and Bartholomew—who also is Na haniel. It may also be taken as probable, that these Apostles, with their attendants, penetrated much further Eastward: into Persia, and possibly, in later ages the doctrine spread from there into China, wherever there were colonies of Jews. See SIN, i. e. China, also FRAGMENTS, No. DCIII. &c.

Antioch, with its neighbouring churches has been so often visited with the calamities of war and the desolations of conquest, that it now can furnish little information on the history of its early Christianity. Subject to Mahometan oppression, the condition of the few adherents to the cross is lamentable: and indeed, the place would be wholly deserted, did not a commerce in the fish of its extensive lake, maintain a thin and impoverished population. The actual state of the church there, is not known; nor of the Syrian churches, in general; but, the Syrian Christians lately discovered, and visited, in India, on the coast of Malabar, have excited great interest among the British.

The Rev. Dr. Kerr, and the Rev. Dr. Buchanan, have given the most favourable reports of the morals of these people, whose numbers may amount to two hundred thousand; and the British Government has since sanctioned various benevolent exertions in their favour. They still use the Syriac language in their public worship; but, probably, the mass of the people have but little acquaintance with it, as the Malabar tongue is vernacular among them. They have preserved copies of the Sacred Books, in the ancient Syriac, of which several specimens, some of high antiquity, were brought over by Dr. Buchanan; and were verified by western copies: Mr. Yeates goes so far as to say, they have “the pure unadulterated Scriptures in the language of the ancient church of Antioch, derived from the very times of the Apostles.” Collation of an Indian Copy of the Pentateuch, &c. Cambridge, 1812.

These Syrians deny the supremacy of the Pope; they condemn image worship, but they respect the cross, without adoring it, nor do they admit crucifixes. They allow priests to marry. They hold with two sacraments, Baptism and the Lord's Supper. They baptise infants, and administer the rite by affusion, mingling warm water with cold. They give the elements in the Lord's Supper, in both kinds, both to clergy and people. They celebrate the ancient Agapæ, or love feasts of the Christians, in the most simple form. They bury their dead with the feet laid eastward, in expectation of the resurrection, and of the second coming of Christ, which shall be from the East. They neither admit purgatory, nor prayers for the dead. They hold the doctrine of the Divine Trinity. They do not worship the Virgin Mary: but, the Portuguese formerly obliged many of them to conform to the rites of the Romish church, and these retain the Latin observances, though by a special dispensation from the Pope, they do not perform their worship in the Latin language. It is to be hoped, that their connection with the British will prove of essential advantage to these Syrians. Their country and their churches, Dr. Buchanan says, reminded him greatly of England. Christian Researches in Asia, Dr. Kerr's Report to the Governor of Madras, &c.

The Syro-Chaldaic churches are neither numerous nor prosperous; yet the whole number of Christians of their various sects is great. We are so little acquainted with them [correctly] that Simon's Account of the Eastern Christians, though it dates a hundred and fifty years ago, has had no superior successor.]

SYRIAC VERSION.

[It might have been hoped, that such books of Holy Writ as were composed originally in the Syriac language, should have been preserved among the Syrians in their primitive form; but this does not appear to be the fact. Of the Old Testament there is a very ancient Syriac version made from the Hebrew, still used by the Syriac churches, and perhaps, little less ancient than the first century. There is also a Syriac version made from the LXX. not so ancient as the other by five or six hundred years. The most ancient is the most accurate; and is thought by the learned to be the most correct of all versions.

The old Syriac version of the New Testament is supposed to have been made before all the books in our present canon had obtained the general sanction of the churches to their authenticity. It omits the Second Epistle of Peter, of which many doubted: also, the Second and Third Epistles of John, which being very short, and written to private persons, were slow in obtaining circulation, and in being thought useful to public bodies, i. e. churches. It omits also the Epistle of Jude: nor is the Apocalypse inserted in all copies. These omissions, while they prove the early date of the version, have been adduced as unfavourable to the authority of the works omitted. But the Syrians

S Y R

Syrians have versions of these works, also, by a later hand. The order of the books is different from that of the Greek copies; but their contents are correct. This language is likely to be more studied among the learned now and hereafter than it has been heretofore, and the collation of copies will, of course, be more attended to. As this is a branch of the Chaldee, which is a sister dialect to the Hebrew, its peculiar terms, phraseology, &c. will repay the labour of the scholar in his endeavours to become acquainted with it.]

SYRO-PHENICIA, is Phœnicia properly so called, of which Sidon, or Zidon was the capital; which having by conquest been united to the kingdom of Syria, added its old name Phœnicia to that of Syria. The Canaanitish woman is called a Syro-phenician, Mark vii. 26. because she was of Phœnicia, then considered as part of Syria. St. Matthew, who wrote in Hebrew or Syriac, calls her a Canaanitish woman, Matt. xv. 22, 24. because that country was really peopled by Canaanites: Sidon being the eldest son of Canaan. TABERAH, or TABEERA, burning. An encampment of Israel in the Desert, Numb. xi. 3. Deut. ix. 22. called burning, because a fire from the tabernacle of the Lord burned a great part of the camp.

TABERNACLE; Hebrew אהל, Ohel: in Greek Σκηνή, scene. The Hebr. properly signifies a [handsome] tent. The patriarchs lived in tents, or Tabernacles.—In the camp of Israel under Moses, were two Tabernacles; the first, Tabernaculum Conventus, the tent of the congregation, wherein the people assembled for dispatch of their ordinary secular affairs. The other was, Tabernaculum Testimonii, the tent of testimony, or the Tabernacle of the Lord, or simply, the Tabernacle. Here they performed religious rites, offered sacrifices, &c.

This Tabernacle was an oblong square, thirty cubits in length; ten in breadth; ten in height. It was divided into two parts. The first was called the Sanctum, or Holy place; twenty cubits long, and ten wide. Herein were placed the table of shew-bread, the golden candlestick, and the golden altar of incense. The second part was the Sanctuary, or Sanctum Sanctorum; in length ten cubits, in breadth the same. Herein was the ark of the covenant. The Sanctuary was divided from the Sanctum by a curtain, or veil, very rich and substantial, which hung on four pillars of shittim wood, covered with plates of gold. The Sanctum was also closed in front by a veil, hung on five pillars of shittim wood, overlaid with plates of gold, their bases being of brass.

On the west, north, and south sides, the Tabernacle was inclosed by boards, or planks, of shittim wood, overlaid with plates of gold, having bases of brass. These boards were eight in number on the west side, but twenty on the north and south sides. All of them were ten cubits high; in breadth a cubit and half. They were let into each other, by two tenons above and below. And as the whole of the Tabernacle was moveable, and might be taken down, these boards were inserted into two bases, wherein were two mortice-holes, by which they were joined together. To support them, each had five golden rings, at proper distances; through which were passed five poles of shittim wood, covered with plates of gold; which compacted the whole.

The Tabernacle had no window. It was covered by several curtains; the first, on the inside, was the colour of hyacinth, striped with purple, scarlet, and crimson. Over this were others of goats' hair, which hindered the rain from penetrating, and preserved the rich curtains. None of these curtains were in front, but only on the sides, and behind; so that at the entrance of the Tabernacle, the first rich curtain before-mentioned, might be seen, which inclosed the whole front. Over these veils of goats' hair were two others; one of sheep-skins dyed red, the other of sheep-skins dyed azure-blue. See PLATES, TABERNACLE.

Around the Tabernacle was an oblong court, in length a hundred cubits, in breadth fifty. This space was encompassed by pillars overlaid with plates of silver, having also capitals of silver, but bases of brass. There were ten pillars on the west, six on the east, twenty on the north, and twenty on the south. On these pillars hung curtains made of twined linen-thread, or network, which surrounded the Tabernacle; except at the entrance of the court, which was closed by another curtain of richer materials, having embroidered work of hyacinth, purple, and scarlet. This entrance was twenty cubits wide; the curtain was of the same length, and was sustained by four pillars overlaid with plates of silver; their capitals and bases being of brass.

In this court, and opposite to the entrance of the Tabernacle or Sanctum, stood the altar of burnt-offerings, on which were burned all the sacrifices. Here was also water for the use of the priests. The laity brought their victims as far as the altar: there they were killed, skinned, and offered to the Lord, according to their several rites and ceremonies.

The entrance of the Tabernacle looked east; the Sanctuary west; and the two sides north and south. This tent was, as it were, the dwelling of the God of Israel, who was considered as residing in the midst of the camp. Round about it were encamped the tribes: Judah, Zebulun, and Issachar, to the east; Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh, to the west; Dan, Asher, and Naphtali, to the north; Reuben, Simeon, and Gad, to the south. The tribe of Levi, being entirely employed in sacred service, was placed all round the tabernacle: Moses and Aaron were to the east, the family of Gershon, west; that of Merari, north; and that of Kohath, south.

The priests entered the Sanctum every morning to offer incense; and to extinguish the lamps; every evening they entered to light them again. Every morning and evening they offered a lamb for a burnt-sacrifice on the brazen altar.

The Tabernacle of the Covenant was erected and consecrated at the foot of mount Sinai, the first day of the first month of the second year after after the coming out of Egypt. A.M. 2514. ante A.D. 1490.

Spencer has endeavoured to prove, (de Legib. Heb. Ritual. Dissert. 1. lib. 3.) that this tabernacle, the ark, the cherubim, &c. were imitations of implements used by the Egyptians and other idolatrous people, in worshipping their gods; and that the Lord appointed them to his people the Hebrews, from pure condescension; designing to check their strong inclination for idolatry, by sanctifying these customs and correcting them; cutting off all such practices as were impious, superstitious, or idolatrous, with which the pagans had polluted them.

He undertakes to prove this opinion by a comparison between these and the portable temples of the heathen, and the tents in which they enclosed what their religion held most sacred and venerable. It is certain that the Gentiles carried their gods with them in their journeys, and in processions, on the shoulders of their priests. Apuleius, Metam. lib. xi. describes the pomp, or procession, of the goddess Isis. Virgil speaks of the Trojan deities carried by Eneas in his travels:

Errantesque Deos, agitataque numina Trojæ.

Spencer founds his opinion on that famous passage, Amos v. 25, 26. Acts vii. 42. "Have ye offered unto me sacrifices and offerings in the wilderness forty years, O house of Israel? But ye have borne the tabernacle of your Moloch, and Chiun your images, the star of your god, which ye made to yourselves." Here, says he, is the tabernacle of Moloch and of Remphan, which the Israelites carried with them in the desert, even before the very face of Moses. Therefore to counteract their violent prepossession towards visible gods and their worship. Moses himself gives them a tabernacle, an ark, with sacrifices and rites;—but purged from idolatry and superstition. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. CCXIII. DCIII.

TABERNACLE, in the sense of a house or dwelling. The old Testament is full of analogous expressions: Israel dwelt in peace in their tabernacles: Israel return to your tabernacles: every one returned to his own tabernacle. And these are to be understood literally in some cases. As when mention is made of the patriarchs, in the land of Canaan, before their going into Egypt: their dwellings were only tents; they built no houses; they inhabited no cities. The same of an army in the field, which abode in tents or tabernacles. But in a multitude of places, by tent, or tabernacle, a house is to be understood. The Hebrews having long dwelt under tents before they went down into Egypt, and afterwards during their pilgrimages in the wilderness, brought this mode of speech into use. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCVI.

This name is also given to the Temple of Solomon, though that was built of very solid materials; perhaps, because in its construction it greatly resembled the tabernacle of Moses. So, David says, Psalm cxxxii. 3, 7. he would not allow himself any rest, till he had built a tabernacle to the Lord. [A modest unassuming appellation.] Psalm lxxiv. complains, that the Chaldeans or Syrians, had defiled the tabernacle of the Lord.

Tabernacle is sometimes put for heaven, for the dwelling-place of the blessed. Psalm xv. 1. Psalm lxi. 4. "I will abide in thy tabernacle for ever." Psalm lxxxiv. 1. "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts!" These passages may be literally explained of the temple at Jerusalem: but it appears from the new testament, that the Jews often understood heaven by such forms of speech. Our Saviour advises to make friends of the Mammon of unrighteousness that they may receive us into everlasting tabernacles. Luke xvi. 9. And St. Paul says to the Hebrews, chap. viii. 2. "Jesus Christ was a minister of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man." Also, chap. ix. 11. "But Christ being come a high-priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building." See Rev. xiii. 6. xxi. 3. St. Paul also speaks of his own body, as of a tent or tabernacle, 2 Cor. v. 4. "For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burthened." And St. Peter also says (2 Epist. i. 13, 14.) "I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up, by putting you in remembrance, knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle." [RESIDENCE.]

The tabernacle of David that God was to raise, Amos ix. 11. Acts xv. 16. is the church of Christ, which is the house of Jesus Christ, the offspring of David, and heir of the promises made to that patriarch.

dwelling in tents by the Israelites during their passage through the wilderness. This was one of the three great solemnities of the Hebrews; wherein all the males were obliged to appear before the Lord. It was celebrated after harvest, on the fifteenth of Tizri; which was the first month of the civil year, and answers to September. At this time they returned thanks to God for the fruits of the earth, then gathered in. Exod. xxiii. 16. The feast continued eight days; but the first day and the last were the most solemn. Lev. xxiii. 34, 35. No labour was allowed on this feast; and particular sacrifices were offered in the course of it.

The first day of the feast they cut down branches of the handsomest trees, with their fruit; branches of palm-trees, or such as were fullest of leaves; also boughs of willow-trees that grew by water-courses. The neatest of these branches they carried in ceremony to the synagogue, where they performed what they called Lulab, i. e. holding in their right hand a branch of a palm-tree, three branches of myrtle, and two of willow, tied together; and having in their left hand, a branch of a citron with its fruit; they brought them together, waving them towards the four quarters of the world, and singing certain songs. These branches were also called Hosanna, because on that occasion they cried Hosanna! not unlike what was done at our Saviour's entry into Jerusalem. Matt. xxi. 8, 9. On the eighth day they performed this ceremony more frequently, and with greater solemnity, than on the other days of the feast: wherefore they called this day Hosanna Rabbah; the great Hosanna. See HOSANNA.

The Jews report, that every Israelite, on the feast day, in the morning, was obliged to bring these branches of trees, on penalty of fasting all that day. Then they made a procession round the altar of burnt-offerings, waving their branches, and singing. At present they carry these branches into the synagogue, and provide themselves with oranges and citrons, in countries where they do not grow. They make it a part of their ceremony to take a turn round the desk in the middle of the synagogue, once a day, at least; and they eat nothing until they have done this.

Psalm cxviii. "O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good—Let Israel now say," &c. seems to have been sung at the feast of tabernacles. The Psalmist makes a plain allusion to it, ver. 25, 26, 27, &c. "Save now, I beseech thee, O Lord: O Lord I beseech thee send now prosperity. Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord," &c. The Hebrew says, Hosan- na Jehovah, &c. These words the Jews sing at this day, when they make a procession about their desk, at the feast of tabernacles. They are the same as were sung at our Saviour's triumphal entry into Jerusalem.

Probably, on occasion of these ceremonies, Plutarch says, Sympos. Prob. 5. that the Hebrews kept this feast in honour of Bacchus. They enter, says he, into their temple, carrying vine-branches and wands in their hands; but what they do there, I know not. He calls these feasts Cladophoria, and Thyrsophoria; and, as in the feast of Bacchus, the heathen carried green branches wrapt about a wand, which the Greeks called Thyrsos, he concluded from thence that probably the Jews by the same ceremony intended honour to Bacchus, in this solemnity. Josephus speaking of this feast, uses the Greek word Eiresione, which signifies a posy, or bundle, composed of a branch of olive wrapt about with wool, on which were hung various fruits; these, a child, whose father and mother were still living, used to lay at the door of Apollo's temple, (for so the Greeks understand Eiresione.) But Josephus explains himself, by saying, that among the Hebrews it was a wreath or posy, of myrtle, willow, and sprigs of the palm-tree, on which citrons were hung. It is observable, that though Moses does not expressly mention myrtle, yet Nehemiah, (viii. 15.) Josephus, the Rabbins, and the Syriac, notice it as employed in this ceremony; and the Jews understand of this tree what Moses says, Lev. xxiii. 40. "Ye shall take on the first day, the boughs of goodly trees, branches of palm-trees, and the boughs of thick trees, and willows of the brook; and ye shall rejoice before the Lord your God seven days."

The first day of the feast, besides the ordinary sacrifices, they offered as a burnt-offering thirteen calves, two rams, and fourteen lambs; with offerings of flour and libations of wine. They offered also a goat for a sin-offering. Numb. xxix. 12, &c.

The second day they offered twelve calves, two rams, and fourteen lambs, for a burnt-offering, with their offerings of flour, oil, and wine. They offered also a goat for a sin-offering; and thus beside the ordinary morning and evening sacrifices, which were never interrupted; nor those offered by the Israelites from private devotion, or for expiation of sin. These now mentioned were offered in the name of the whole people of Israel. On the third, fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh days of the feast were offered the same sacrifices as on the second day; with this difference, that every day they diminished nished from the former by one calf; so that on the third day they offered eleven, on the fourth ten, on the fifth nine, on the sixth eight, and on the seventh but seven. But the eighth day, which was kept with the greatest solemnity, they offered but one calf, one ram, and seven lambs for a burnt-offering; and one goat for a sin-offering; with the other accustomed offerings, and libations.

We are assured, that on the eighth day of the feast the Jews presented at the temple the first fruits of their later crop, i. e. of such things as were the latest in coming to maturity;—that they drew water out of the fountain of Siloam, which was brought into the temple, and, being first mingled with wine, was poured out by the priests at the foot of the altar of burnt-offerings. [I suppose that sometimes “blood and water” might flow together.] The people in the mean time sung those words of the prophet Isaiah, (chap. xii. 3.) “Therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation.” It is said this ceremony was instituted by Haggai and Zechariah, at the return from the captivity; and thought that Jesus Christ alluded to it, John vii. 37, 38. when he cried in the temple, on the last day of the feast of tabernacles, “If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink. He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water;”—meaning, according to St. John’s observation, the Holy Ghost, which should be given to those who believed on him. Some commentators think, that at this feast were rehearsed Psalms viii. lxxxi. and lxxviii. entitled pro torcularibus, “for the presses.” But Leo of Modena says, they rehearsed those Psalms whose titles are Hallelujah, or, “praise God,” i. e. cxi. cxii. cxiii. cxvi. cxvii. cxviii. Ceremonies of the Jews. lib. ii. cap. 7. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCCXVIII.

The same author tells us, that the modern Jews not having the opportunity of going to the temple, nor of performing the ceremonies prescribed by Moses, each makes for himself, in some open place, a bower, or arbour, of branches of trees, hung around, and adorned as handsomely as he can. Here they eat and drink, and some even pass the night; at least, they pass as much time here as they used to pass in their houses, and this during the whole eight days of the festival. Sickness or old age is dispensed with from this ceremony; and when heavy rains fall they retire to their houses: for these bowers are not substantial enough to keep out the weather. Munster, in Levit. xxiii. Leo of Modena adds, that though Moses appointed but eight days for this feast, yet custom and the devotion of the people have added a ninth. On the seventh day of the feast, which they call Hosanna Rabba, they quit their myrtle and palm branches, and take only those of willow, with which they make seven turns round the desk in their synagogue, singing the xxixth Psalm; “Give unto the Lord, O ye mighty,” &c. The ninth and last day, which is an institution of the Rabbins, is called the joy of the law, because on this day they complete the reading of the Pentateuch. See HOSANNA.

TABITHA, טַבִּיָּתָא, Ταβιθά, Gr. Dorcas, the female roe, wild goat, or kid. The Syriac Tabitha, signifies clear-sighted. [bright-eyed?] TABITHA. A Christian widow who lived at Joppa, who abounded in alms-deeds, and other good works. A. D. 34. She fell sick and died. After she had been washed, as was customary, she was laid out in an upper chamber previous to being put into her coffin; and it being known that St. Peter was at Lydda, which was not far from Joppa, he was desired to come over. He soon came, and was conducted to the chamber where the corpse lay: the widows presented themselves to him, weeping, and shewed the clothes that Tabitha had made for them. Peter caused all to go out, betook himself to prayer; and turning to the body said, “Tabitha, arise:” she immediately opened her eyes, and seeing Peter, she sat up. Then he called the saints and widows, and presented Tabitha to them. Acts ix. 36.

TABLES of the Law, given to Moses on mount Sinai; they were written by the finger of God, and contained the ten commandments. Exod. xx.

Many questions have been started about these tables, their matter, their form, their number, their writer, and their contents. Some Oriental authors, says D’Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 649. make them ten in number, others seven; but the Hebrews reckon only two. Some suppose them to have been of wood, others of precious stone. And these are divided, some supposing them to have been of ruby, or of carbuncle; but the greater part are for the carbuncle. Those who think they were wood, suppose it to have been a wood called Sedr, or Sedras, which is a kind of Lotum, with which the Mussulmen suppose their paradise to be planted.

Moses observes, that these tables were written on both sides. Many think they were transparent, so that they might be read through; on one side towards the right, and on the other side towards the left. Others think that the law-giver makes this observation, because generally, in writing tables, they only wrote on one side.—Others translate, “they were written on the two faces that were counterparts to each other:” for this reason, when they were shut, (closing internally,) the two faces on which was the writing folded on each other, so that no writing was visible on the outside. Some think the ten commandments were written on each of the two tables; others, that the ten were divided; five on one table, and five on the other. Some imagine the tables were of ten or twelve cubits in length.

Moses says that the tables were written by the finger of God. These words are diversely explained: some understand them literally, that they were written by the operation of God himself: others understand it to import by the ministry of an angel; others by the spirit of God, which is sometimes called the finger of God. See Exod. viii. 19. Luke xi. 20. Others explain it by an order from God to Moses to write them: this opinion may be maintained from Exod. xxxiv. 27, 28. where, speaking of the second tables which God gave to Moses, he was ordered to write the words of the covenant which God had made with Israel; and a little after, Moses relates that he had written the words of the covenant upon tables. In the same chapter it is said, that he hewed two other tables like the former which he had broken. Hence St. Austin and St. Cyprian concluded, that the second tables were not written by the hand of God, though the first were. But Moses in Deuteronomy, x. 4. repeating what had been said of the second tables which God gave him, expressly notices that God himself wrote them, as he had written the former. Whence it follows that neither was writ by the finger of God, or that both were so written. But it is sufficient that God inspired Moses, and by his spirit enabled him to write them, in order to give authority to his words; and it is needless to have recourse to a new miracle. [Since the Sanscrit language, called by the Brahmins “the language of the gods,” and that Sanscrit character, the Devanagari, which they call “the writing of the gods,” have been known in Europe, some have supposed that Moses by the terms “written by the finger of God,” means to express a character peculiarly sacred: not current, but appropriate solely to Divine subjects and ordinances; like the Devanagari.]

TABLE of Shew-bread. See FRAGMENTS, Nos. CCXXVIII. CCLVII.

TABLE of the Lord. In the O. T. the altar of burnt-offerings: the Lord was considered in his temple, as a monarch in his palace: he was served with bread, wine, salt, &c. as food: lamps were lighted up for him; perfumes were burnt before him. The name of table more particularly belonged to the altar of Shew-bread, because on that was served bread, wine, and salt. Malachi, chap. i. 7, 12. complains that the table of the Lord was contemned; because they offered on the altar of burnt-offerings animals not perfect in the qualities required. In the new testament the table of the Lord is that on which were offered the sacramental signs of the body and blood of the Lord Jesus: Ye cannot partake of the table of the Lord and the table of devils. 1 Cor. x. 21. Christ, (Luke xxii. 30.) represents his kingdom, as a feast, where the elect sit at table; “That ye may eat and drink at my table, in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel.”

TABOR, תבור choice, or purity; from ברר barar; according to the Syriac, bruising, contrition. Tabor, טבור with a ט teth, signifies the navel. [Separate, say some; and certainly mount Tabor stands, as it were, by itself, apart from other mountains.]

I. TABOR, or THABOR; a mountain of Galilee, called by the Greeks, Ithaburius, or Athaburius. Eusebius, in Θαβὺρ, says, it was on the frontiers of Zebulun, in the middle of Galilee, ten miles from Diocæsarea, east; it was also on the confines of Issachar and Napthali. Joshua, xix. 22. connects it with the borders of Issachar. Josephus says, de Bello. lib. iv. cap. 2. seu. 5. in Gr. that the height of Tabor is thirty stadia, and that there is a plain on the top of it, of twenty-six stadia in circumference, surrounded with walls, and inaccessible on the north side. Polybius says, lib. v. cap. 70. there was a city on the top of it; and Josephus intimates the same, when he says, that he caused the top of mount Ithaburius to be inclosed with walls in forty days, the inhabitants of which had none but rain water. He adds, that Tabor is situated between the great plain and Scythopolis; which cannot be understood of the great plain of Jezreel, in the midst of which Tabor stood, but of that of Esdraelon, which stretches out south, east, and north of this mountain. See Reland, Palæstin. lib. 1. cap. 55.

Tabor stands entirely alone, in the midst of a great plain, in which it rises up like a sugar-loaf: Est autem Thabor mons in Galilæa, situs in campatribus, rotundus atque sublimis, et ex omni parte finitus æqualiter, says Jerom, on Hosea v. This is confirmed by travellers, who add, that it makes a very beautiful prospect, being covered with verdure and green trees; and that on its top is a large plain, where was formerly a city.

city, and subsequently, also, a great monastery. This mountain at present is entirely forsaken. The city of Tabor is mentioned, 1 Chron. vi. 77. Sanutus, Secret. fidel. cruc. p. 252. speaks of a river flowing from a spring at the foot of Tabor, east, which ran into the Jordan, at the end of the lake of Genezareth. Tabor was opposite to mount Hermon, which was on the other side of the valley of Jezreel, south. Hermon was desert and barren, but Tabor was inhabited, and covered with trees and verdure. These two mountains are placed in opposition; Psalm lxxxix. 12. "The north and the south thou hast created them; Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name."

[TABOR, Mount, says D'Arvieux, is a single mountain, separate from all others; there are several near it on the north, but they are all smaller than Tabor. Its shape is round, almost conical, like a low sugar-loaf. It appears to be a full mile in height, and half a league in diameter. It is entirely covered with green oaks, and other trees, shrubs, and odoriferous plants. Roads and paths are made on the south side of the mountain, which lead to the top of it by windings; and are sufficiently easy to admit of riding up to it. I chose this mode of ascent, leaving to those more devout, the liberty of walking up the mountain, which they did, while our Arabs took charge of their horses and mules.

To a person standing at the foot of the mountain, it appears to terminate in a point; but when arrived at the top we are astonished to find a plain which has full 3,000 paces in circumference, full of noble trees. In this plain is a great enclosure of ruined walls, with remains of towers, and a ditch, partly filled up, which shew that there has been a considerable castle, in the middle of which was a square place of arms, with cisterns, baths, cellars, &c.; the vaults of which have resisted the injury of time.

There is a small height on the eastern side, which is the place where, according to tradition, our Lord was transfigured. St. Helena built a handsome church in this place, in memory of that event. That building having been ruined, it is replaced by another, which is apparently posterior, and may be of the time of the Croisades. It has three little chapels, beside each other: they appear to be in a grotto or cave, but the whole is encumbered with ruins. We found the door-way filled up, but caused it to be cleared by our Arabs, and we entered a small passage, which led into a little vestibule, composed of four arcades, crossing each other, the first of which was the entry. That in front of the entry was the place where our Lord was, and is called his tabernacle; those on each side of him are called the tabernacles of Moses and Elias. Each of them has an altar, at which the religious who were in our company said mass the following day, while our servants, armed, kept guard at the entry, to prevent surprise from the Arabs, or people of the country, who take care of the flocks of goats which feed on this plain, or who come here in chase after the wild boars which feed on the acorns that fall from the trees. We afterwards walked about this delicious plain; the air was fresh and serene, and perfumed with the fragrance of the aromatic plants growing all around: I should have been sorry had I not performed this journey.]

[Dr. E. D. CLARKE, says, "The top of Tabor was described as a plain of great extent, finely cultivated, and inhabited by numerous Arab tribes. It appears of a conical form, entirely detached from any neighbouring mountain, and stands on one side of the great plain of Esdraelion." Travels, vol. ii. Mr. BUCKINGHAM ascended it very lately, and gives a print of its antiquities; which appear to be not of the earliest times.]

Deborah and Barak assembled their army on Tabor, from which they marched to give battle to Sisera. A. M. 2719, ante A. D. 1285. Judg. iv. 6, &c.

Hosea, chap. v. 1. reproaches the princes of Israel, and the priests of the golden calves,— "ye have been a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor." These snares and nets, were probably idols, or superstitious altars, set up at Mizpah beyond Jordan, and on Tabor in Galilee. [a comparison to such snares.]

When Josephus the historian was governor of Galilee, he strongly fortified the top of Tabor, thinking to make it impregnable. But Vespasian sent Placidus, one of his officers, who by stratagem drew down the Jews from the mountain into the open country, where he cut them to pieces. De Bello. lib. iv. cap. 6. A. D. 67.

It had been the current opinion for several ages, that our Saviour was transfigured on mount Tabor. Matt. xvii. 1. Luke ix. 28, &c. Eusebius expressly says so, on Psalm lxxxix. 12. also Jerom, in the epitaph of St. Paula, and in his seventeenth letter to Marcella. John Damascenus, Homil. de Transfig. affirms the same; and for a long time it was accepted as indisputable. Yet Maldonatus, Lightfoot, Reland and others, have doubted it. The old Itinerary of Bourdeaux reports, that our Saviour was transfigured on the mount of Olives. The ancient fathers who have spoken of the transfiguration, have not named Tabor, as the place where it occurred.

The

The evangelists do not name it, and the journey of our Saviour they allude to as taken for this purpose, does not seem favourable to the opinion that places it on mount Tabor.

II. TABOR, a city on the summit of mount Tabor: assigned to the Levites of the family of Merari, 1 Chron. vi. 77. Polybius and Josephus notice it.

III. TABOR. The Plain of Tabor, or the Oak of Tabor, 1 Sam. x. 3. cannot be near Tabor of Galilee, but must rather be sought between Bethlehem and Bethel. It might be translated, the oak of the hill, or eminence. We find elsewhere the word Tabor in an appellative sense, to signify an eminence or high place. See Judg. ix. 36. Heb.

[Whether this oak were of a species which grew particularly on Mount Tabor, we cannot affirm: or whether, according to the import of the name, it may mean "the lone oak." Mount Tabor at present abounds in oaks, which Doubdan calls terebinthines: and Cotovicus, tall Ilexes. They appear to be of that kind which the Greeks called Platyphillon, broad-leaved.]

Chesloth-Tabor, or Chesulloth Tabor. Josh. xix. 12, 18. called Chasalus, in Eusebius and Jerom, was at the foot of mount Tabor, ten miles from Diocæsarea, east. Comp. ATABYRIUS and AZNOTH TABOR.

[TABRET, vide TIMBREL, and MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, PLATE III. FRAGMENTS, No. CXXXIII.]

TABRIMON מברמן. good pomgranate; from טוב tob, good, and רמון rimmon, a pomgranate: otherwise, goodness raised; from טוב tob, and רמם ramam, elevated: the navel, or middle, prepared, reckoned, given: from טבור tabur, a navel, and מנה manah, to prepare, &c.

TADMOR, תדמיר, a city built by Solomon, in the desert of Syria. See PALMYRA.

[TADMOR, admirable, wonderful, from the Syriac. Hiller thinks it is the Syriac name for the palm-tree; and the Greek name of this city, Palmyra, countenances that supposition. [Might it be a peculiar pronunciation of Tamar?] May we suppose that palms were signals of victory, &c. so early as the days of Solomon; and that this city was magnificently built by him? The ruins extant are among the most beautiful in the world. 2 Chron. viii. 4. and, according to the Keri, 1 Kings ix. 18. but the Ketib has Tamar, the Palm. Palm-trees are still found about Palmyra. We have a large and handsome volume with many plates, shewing the ruins and antiquities of this city, by Messrs. Wood and Dawkins, Lond. 1753, with an historical Introduction evincing much research.

Proselytes were received among the Rabbins from Tadmor, and Rab. Abbu, in the name of Rab. Jochanan, says, "Tradition asserts that the proselytes of Tadmor are fit to enter into the congregation." They also attribute this opinion to Haggai the prophet. Hieros. Jeram. fol. 3. 2. Nevertheless, if these writers may be believed, the inhabitants of Tadmor but ill requited this privilege, for Rab. Jochanan said, "Blessed is he who shall see the destruction of Tadmor: for she communicated in the destruction of the first and second temple. To the destruction of the first she brought 80,000 archers: and so she did in the destruction of the second." Hieros. Taanith, fol. 69. 2. It is probable that this number is by much too high, perhaps it should be 8,000: but if it be correct, we must consider Tadmor as a place of numerous population, as well as of great importance. At the least she must have possessed vast influence, if these troops were not her own inhabitants, but raised and forwarded by her authority and inducement. It will be recollected, that the latter event was under Vespasian and Titus, about A. D. 70.

We have seen, FRAG. No. CCCCLXXXIX. that the customs of the Palmyrenes were very analogous to those of the Jews.

"Remote from every great road, this city seems neither to have been calculated for a considerable mart of commerce, nor for the centre of a great consumption. It overcame, however, every obstacle; and may be adduced as a proof of what popular opinion may effect in the hands of an able legislature, or when favoured by happy circumstances," Volney, Trav. vol. ii. p. 303.

TAHAN, תחן, who prays, or is merciful, or gracious; from חנן chanan; otherwise, to encamp; from חנה chunah. [earnest entreaty.]

I. TAHAN, or THAHEN, son of Ephraim, head of a family. Numb. xxi. 35.

II. TAHAN, or THAAN, son of Telah, and father of Laadan, of Ephraim. 1 Chron. vii. 25.

TAHATH, תחת, under; from תחת tachath; otherwise terror, dread; from חתת chathath; or descent, according to the Syriac. [low.]

I. TAHATH, or THAHAT, an encampment of Israel in the desert. From Makeloth they went to Tahath, and from thence to Tarah. Numb. xxxiii. 26, 27.

II. TAHATH, son of Kohath, and father of Uriel. 1 Chron. vi. 24.

III. TAHATH, son of Bered, and grandson of Ephraim. 1 Chron. vii. 20.

TAHAPANES, תחפננס, or TAPHNIS, secret temptation, hidden flight, covered standard, from חפף chuphaph, covered, hidden, and נס nes, temptation, temptation, flight, standard. This word is Egyptian.

[Kohlreiffius, in Chron. S. P. ii. cap. 7. thinks it is the city of Paneach, i. e. built by Apachnes. The Coptic reads Thebaci; perhaps it should be Thebacni. It is written differently in Jer. xliii. 7, 8, 9. xlv. 1. xlv. 14. where it is in Eng. Tr. Tahpanhes: according to the Keri, it is in chap. ii. 16. Tahapanes; but the Ketib reads Tachpanes. See the following article.

Some seek its import more deeply: Nesi, say they, is a serpent, in Egyptian; Tachep is a gift; whence they think the name denotes, "serpent's gift." We may rather suppose that from hence the Greeks took their Daphne, who was changed into a laurel, when fleeing from Apollo. There was a famous temple and village of Daphne near Antioch.]

TAHAPANES, TAHPANHES, or TAPHNIS, a city of Egypt. Jeremias speaks of it, and we are told he was buried there. chap. ii. 16. xliii. 7, 8, 9. xlv. 14. See also Ezek. xxx. 18. It is thought to be the same as the Greeks called Daphnæ Pelusiæ, (in the Greek of Judith, i. 9. Taphnai,) sixteen miles from Pelusium, south, according to the Itinerary of Antoninus. Jeremias, and the Israelites with him retired to Taphnis; where the Lord revealed to Jeremias that Nebuchadnezzar should take this city, and should set up his throne in the very place where the prophet concealed certain stones. Jer. xliii. 7, 8, 9. This was then a royal city. Herodotus says, lib. ii. cap. 30. that in the time of Psammiticus, king of Egypt, there was a garrison at Daphnæ Pelusiæ against the incursions of the Barbarians. [It appears to have been the very first town in Egypt, that afforded tolerable accommodations to the fugitives. It stood on the edge of the present lake Menzaleh, on marshy ground; and probably enjoyed a considerable commerce with the Mediterranean and with the Red Sea, also; to which, respectively, it forwarded commodities.]

TAHPENES, טַחפֶּנֶס, Τεχέφενης, standard, flight, temptation, secret; from נוס nus, flight, or נסח nasah, to tempt, or נסח nasas, standard, and חָפֵחַ chaphaph, hidden, covered.

TAHPENES, or TAPHNE. Pharaoh, king of Egypt, took such affection to Hadad, son of the king of Idumea, who had sought refuge with him, that he gave him to wife the sister of his queen Tahpenes. 1 Kings xi. 19, 20. [This name certainly has some affinity to that of the foregoing article: it is barely possible that this lady might have given name to that city; but it is probable enough that both names were derived from some female deity of Egypt, whence the Greeks transplanted their story of Apollo and Daphne.]

TALED, a sort of habit worn by the Jews, chiefly when they repeat their prayers in the synagogue: instead of that square garment they wore heretofore, to which Moses commanded them to fasten borders of blue to the four quarters, and fringes, or ribbons, along the edgings. Numb. xv. 38. Deut. xxii. 12. But at present, not to expose themselves to derision, for the too great singularity of their dress, they content themselves with wearing a square piece of cloth underneath their waistcoats, with blue tufts at the four corners; and when they meet in the synagogue to prayers, they cover their heads with a square woollen veil, which has blue tufts at the four corners. This veil they called thaled, or taled. Leo of Modena, Ceremonies of the Jews, Part 1. chap. 5, 11.

TALENT, Hebrew, כִּכָּר, clickar. The Hebrew talent [of silver] was equivalent to 3,000 shekels, Exod. xxxviii. 24, 25, 26. and consequently was in weight 1500 Roman ounces, or twenty-five Roman pounds;—English weight, 114 pounds and 15 penny-weights troy. The weight of the Jewish talent, according to Dr. Arbuthnot, was 118 pounds, 10 ounces, one pennyweight, and 10 2-7ths grains troy weight. Its value in (English) money was 342*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* The talent of gold was of the same weight;—its value was 54,752*l.*

The common Attic talent was in value 2,400*l.*

Several authors have pretended that among the Hebrews there were two sorts of talents, a larger, and a smaller; the talent of the sanctuary, and the common talent: The first, they say, was double the weight, or value, of the other. But I cannot find this distinction in Scripture.

TALENT, ON THE VARIOUS WEIGHTS OF.

[The following thought of Mr. Bruce seems to be worth inquiring into; i. e. that the talents appropriated to different commodities might be of different weights; and, if a talent could be discovered, which, at the mine, was of less weight than the talent of Judea, perhaps we might be justified in estimating the riches in gold of David, or of Solomon, by the weight of that talent.

“David took possession of two ports, Eloth and Ezion-gaber, (1 Kings, ix. 26. 2 Chron. viii. 17.) from which he carried on trade to Ophir and Tarshish, to a very great extent, to the day of his death. We are struck with astonishment, when we reflect on the sum that prince received in so short a time from these mines of Ophir. For what is said to be given by King David.

(1 Chron.

(1 Chron. xxii. 14, 15, 19. xxix. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7. three thousand Hebrew talents of gold, reduced to our money is, twenty-one millions, six hundred thousand pounds, sterling,) and his princes, for the building of the temple of Jerusalem, exceeds in value eight hundred millions of our money, if the talent there spoken of is a Hebrew talent, (The value of a Hebrew talent appears from Exodus, xxxviii. 25, 26. For 603,550 persons being taxed at half a shekel each, they must have paid in the whole 301,774; now that sum is said to amount to 100 talents, 775 shekels only; deduct the two latter sums, and there will remain 300,000, which divided by 100, will leave 3000 shekels for each of these talents.) and not a weight of the same denomination, the value of which was less, and peculiarly reserved for, and used in the traffic of, these precious metals, gold and silver. It was probably an African or Indian weight, proper to the same mine whence was gotten the gold, appropriated to fine commodities only, as is the case with our ounce troy different from the avoirdupois."]]

TALITHA-CUMI, Ταλιθα-κῡμι. Young woman arise; from the Hebrew כּוּמִי, cumi, arise, Dan. vii. 5. and the Syriac, ܬܠܝܬܗܐ talitha, young woman. These words Jesus Christ used when he raised the daughter of Jairus; they are not pure Hebrew, but Syriac, and signify, My daughter arise, Τὸ κοράσιον ἔγειραι. Mark v. 41.

TALMAI, ܬܠܡܝܐ, ܬܠܡܝܐ, my furrow; from ܬܠܡ thelem; otherwise, that suspends the waters; from ܬܠܬ thalah, to hang, or suspend, and ܡܝ maim, waters; or heap of waters; from ܬܠܬ thalal, a heap, and ܡܝ maim, waters.

I. TALMAI, or THOLMAI, son of Anak, of the race of the giants, destroyed by Israel. Numb. xiii. 33. Josh. xv. 14.

II. TALMAI, son of Ammihud, king of Geshur, and father of Maachah, wife of David, the mother of Absalom and Tamar. 2 Sam. iii. 3. After Absalom had slain his brother Amnon, he took refuge with his grandfather at Geshur. 2 Sam. xiii. 37.

TALMON, ܬܠܡܢ, preparation, or present, or enumeration of the dew; from ܬܠܡܢ, manah, and ܬܠܡ tal, dew: according to the Syriac and Hebrew, present, or preparation of the shadow.

TALMON, or TELMON, a levite, a porter of the temple. 1 Chron. ix. 17.

TALMUD, ܬܠܡܢܐ doctrine; from ܬܠܡ lamad, to teach.

TALMUD, or THALMUD. Talmud may be translated by Doctrinale. The work called the Talmud contains the body of doctrine, religion, and morality of the Jews. They have two works under this name; the first, the Talmud of Jerusalem, the other the Talmud of Babylon. The first was compiled by Rabbi Jochanan, who presided in the Academy of Palestine fourscore years, and who finished it, they say, in the 230th year after the ruin of the temple (about A. D. 300,) for the use of the Jews in Judea. This Talmud is shorter and more obscure than that of Babylon; but it is certainly more ancient.

It is composed of two parts, the Mishna, and the Gemara. The Mishna is the work of Rabbi Judah, surnamed "the Holy," who compiled it about the year 120 after the destruction of the temple. A. D. 190. Mishna signifies the second law: the work is a collection of the traditions of the Jewish doctors, which Rabbi Judah gathered into one body, for fear they should be lost and forgotten, because of the dispersion of the Israelites, and the interruption of their schools. About a hundred years afterwards, Rabbi Jochanan composed the Gemara, q. d. completion, or perfection, to complete and finish the Mishna of Rabbi Judah the Holy. And these two works form the body of the Talmud of Jerusalem.

The Talmud of Babylon is composed of the Mishna of Judah the Holy, and of the Gemara composed by Rabbi Asa, who lived at Babylon about a hundred years after Rabbi Jochanan. He kept his school at Sara near Babylon, where, after he had presided forty years, he produced his commentary on the Mishna. He did not finish it himself, but his disciples, or children, completed it after his decease. This collection is called the Talmud of Babylon, because it was compiled at Babylon, and chiefly prevailed among the Jews beyond the Euphrates. The Jews prefer this to that of Jerusalem, because it is clearer and more extensive. It abounds with a multitude of fables and ridiculous stories, of which however they must entertain no doubt, unless they would pass for heretics. They even prefer the authority of the Talmud to that of Scripture. They compare the Bible to water, the Mishna to wine, and the Gemara to hypocras. They believe the traditions and explications contained in this book are derived from God himself: that Moses revealed them to Aaron, to his sons, and to the elders of Israel; that these communicated them to the prophets, and the prophets to the members of the great synagogue; who transmitted them down, till they came to the doctors; who reduced them to the form of the Mishna and the Gemara. The Mishna is written in Hebrew, in a very close and obscure style; and the Gemara is written in in a style composed of Hebrew, Chaldee, and several terms of other languages.

Rabbi Asa being prevented by death from finishing his work, his children, or disciples, who continued it, did not finish it till a considerable time after; i. e. according to Serrarius, Bartolocci, Trigland, and others, till A. D. 500, or 505. Father Morinus proceeds so far as to maintain, that the Mishna could not be composed before A. D. 500, and that the Talmud of Babylon was not finished till towards A. D. 700; and the Talmud of Jerusalem, he thinks is not earlier than the fifth century. And surely if the Mishna itself was not before A. D. 500, the Talmud of Jerusalem must be more modern.

The Talmud of Jerusalem, and the Mishna, after the Chaldee paraphrases of Onkelos, and of Jonathan, are the most ancient books of doctrine the Jews have, except the sacred authors. Lightfoot has derived great assistance and light from them, for explaining many passages of the New Testament, by comparing the expressions of the Mishna with those of the apostles and evangelists. Maimonides has made an epitome, or abridgment, of the Talmud of Babylon, which in the judgment of the best informed, is preferable to the Talmud itself: for he omits what that contains of fabulous, childish, or useless, and collects only the decisions of cases, with which that great work abounds. This work he entitled Judhachazakah, or The Strong Hand. It is a digest of the Jewish laws, the most complete that was ever made; not only in respect of the matter, but the perspicuity of the style, the method, and regular disposition. See RABBINS, MAIMONIDES.

TALMUDISTS, i. e. those who teach the traditions of the Jews contained in the Talmud, have been known by several names in different ages. From the time of the great synagogue to the Mishna, they were called Tannaim, q. Traditioners, from Tanach, which in Chaldee signifies, to give by tradition. After the Mishna to the Talmud, they were called Amoraim, pronouncing, speaking, dictating, because they explained and dictated to their pupils the explications of the Gemara. After the Talmud, they were named Openers. Lastly, they obtained the name of Gaonim, excellent, sublime. At present these pompous names are disused: they are contented with the appellation of Rabbi, or Chacham, of which the first signifies master, the other wise-man.

About A. D. 1235, a Jew of Rochelle, being converted to Christianity, and named Thomas, visited Gregory IX. in the second year of his pontificate, (A. D. 1238,) and reported to him a discovery of the errors of the Talmud. The pope sent them, (in 1239,) in thirty-five articles, to the archbishops of France, with a letter, in which he required them to seize the books of the Jews, and to burn all which contained errors. He wrote in the same terms to the kings of France, England, Arragon, Castile, Leon, Navarre, and Portugal. In consequence of this order, twenty cart-loads of Hebrew books were burnt in France. [This was before the invention of printing, when books were scarce.]

Gregory's successor, Innocent IV. gave commission to his legate, Eudes de Chateau-roux, to examine the Talmud, and other books of the Jews; after he had carefully inspected them, he tolerated them, so far as they were not contrary to the Christian religion, and restored them again: But the legate wrote to the pope, that to tolerate them was the same as to approve them; wherefore, May 15, 1248, he juridically condemned them.

The two Talmuds are in print; that of Jerusalem in one good volume, in folio; and that of Babylon in twelve volumes, in folio, printed at Amsterdam, and also at other places.

TAMAR, תמר, palm, or palm-tree; from תמר tamar, a palm-tree.

I. TAMAR, or THAMAR, daughter-in-law to the patriarch Judah, wife of Er and Onan, and mother to Pharez and Zarah. The book of the Testament of the twelve Patriarchs says, that Tamar was of Mesopotamia, and daughter of Aram, i. e. by descent a Syrian: that Bathshuah, the wife of Judah, could not endure her, because she was of a nation different from her own, and inspired the same hatred of her into her son Er, who, refusing to use Tamar as his wife, was slain by an angel of the Lord, on the third day after his marriage. The Rabbins believe that he was so overweening of the beauty of his wife, that he would not have her become a mother, lest pregnancy should impair it. But Scripture says, only, that Er was very wicked before the Lord, for which the Lord slew him. Gen. xxxviii. 7. [Neither does Scripture say that he was suddenly slain: he might die of consumption or decline, for aught that appears to the contrary.]

Judah then said to Onan, his second son, "Go in unto thy brother's wife, and marry her, and raise up seed unto thy brother." Onan took her, as commanded by his father; but knowing that the children born from this intercourse would not belong to him, but to his brother, he withheld from Tamar the means of becoming a mother: wherefore the Lord slew him also. Judah said then to Tamar, "Continue a widow in thy father's father's house, till my son Shelah shall be of age 'to marry;' for he was afraid that Shelah also might die, as his brothers did. Tamar therefore lived with her father a considerable time, yet did not receive Shelah as her husband. Some years after, when Judah went to a sheep-shearing feast of his friend Hirah, the Adullamite, Tamar being informed of it, disguised herself as a [foreign] harlot, and sat in a place where Judah would pass. Judah had intercourse with her, and gave her as pledges, his ring, his bracelets, and his staff.

After some months her pregnancy began to shew, which Judah being informed of, would have had her burned alive; but when she produced the ring, the bracelets and the staff, and attributed her condition to the owner of those pledges, Judah acknowledged that she was more just than he had been. She bore twins, of which one was called Pharez, the other Zarah. See their articles. This happened about A.M. 2277, ante A.D. 1727.

The author of the Imperfect Work on St. Matthew, says, Homil. 1, that the mother of Er, the son of Judah, being a Canaanitish woman strongly disapproved the marriage of her son with Tamar, who was an Aramean, or Syrian; she therefore advised her son to refrain from his wife, [as intimated, from the Testament of the twelve Patriarchs above.] Er followed this advice, and God struck him dead. His brother Onan then married her, but Tamar still continued a virgin. Judah being much troubled at the death of his two sons, and the disappointment of his daughter-in-law, the cause of which he knew not, continued a long time in tears and penitence. God being moved at his concern, let him know what had passed; and Judah scrupled marrying Tamar himself, though apprized that the marriage of neither of his sons had been consummated.

The Testament of the twelve Patriarchs, intimates, that Onan lived a whole year with Tamar, without intercourse with her. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. LXXXII. CXXV.

II. TAMAR, daughter of Maachah, the wife of David, and [supposed] sister of Absalom. (By courtesy, reckoned among the king's children: 1 Chron. iii. 9. "David's children, besides the concubine's children, and their sister Tamar.") Her extraordinary beauty was the occasion of her nominal brother Amnon's falling desperately in love with her, dishonouring her, then hating her, and forcibly expelling her, Vide AMNON. Tamar strewed ashes on her head, rent her clothes, and covering her face with her hands, went homeward weeping. Absalom met her in this distress, took her home, bid her be quiet, and leave revenge to him:—and in fact, the resentment of this injury he kept so much in his heart, that he killed Amnon some time after. See ABSALOM and AMNON.

III. TAMAR, daughter of Absalom, was of great beauty. 2. Sam. xiv. 27. Some Greek and Latin copies insinuate that she married Rehoboam, king of Judah, and was mother of Abijam, the successor of Rehoboam: but neither the Hebrew nor Vulgate acknowledge this. We read, 2 Chron. xi. 20. that Rehoboam married Maachah, the daughter of Absalom: i. e. probably, the grand-daughter of Absalom by Tamar;—daughter is often put for grand-daughter.

IV. TAMAR, a city of Judea, mentioned Ezekiel xlvii. 19. xlviii. 28. as a southern limit of this country. It must be about the southern point of the Dead Sea. Eusebius says, that Thamara is one day's journey from Malis, or Melisha, going towards Elia, i. e. Jerusalem. He adds, that the Romans kept a garrison there. Ptolemy, and the tables of Peutinger, set down also Thumar or Thamara, in Judea.

[This city is placed on the south, and in company with the Waters of Strife in Kadesh: it cannot therefore be Jericho, as some suppose, because that is called the City of Palms; but it must be further south, and perhaps should be sought for at the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, adjacent to which (southward) palm-trees abound.]

We have also Baal Tamar, "the lord of the palm-tree." Judg. xx. 33. Hazazon Tamar, "palm abounding." Gen. xiv. 7. Palm-trees abounded in some parts of Judea, and at length became an emblem of that country. The Greek name for a palm, Phœnix, was given to many places: Hormuz, or Ormus, in the Gulph of Persia, has the same meaning, in the old Persian language, signifying a palm.]

TAMAR, or PALMYRA. Vide TADMOR.

TAMMUS, Thamus or Thammus, a month of the Jews, answering to June: the fourth month of the holy year, and the tenth of the civil year. It has but twenty-nine days.

On the seventeenth day of Tammus, the Jews fast, in commemoration of the worship of the golden calf, and its punishment. Exod. xxxii. In this month they keep a memorial of what happened to Miriam, sister of Moses, who was struck with a leprosy for murmuring against Moses. Numb. xxii. 1—10.

The Syrians, by this word, express in their calendar the month that answers to July. The Arabians, the Persians, and the Turks, use it to express the hottest part of the summer. The Jewish Jewish astronomers, at this day, call the sun's entrance into the sign Cancer, Tekupha Tammuz, or the Revolution of Thamus.

TAMMUZ, תמוז, abstruse, concealed.

TAMMUZ, or THAMUS, a Pagan deity, thought to be the Grecian Adonis. This deity is mentioned, Ezekiel viii. 14. מִכְּבוֹת אֶת-תַּמּוּז. LXX. Τὸν Θαμμοῦς. Alius Βδελύματα, Abominations. Alius Παροξυσμὸς, Irritationes. Mulieres plangentes Adonidem; Heb. plangentes Tammuz: women weeping for Tammuz. David Kimchi says, that Tammuz was an idol of brass, whose eyes the Pagans used to fill with lead; then making a fire in the hollow parts of the idol, the lead would melt, and the image seem to shed tears.

Jerom has rendered Tammuz by Adonis: and there is great probability that this is its true signification. Manetho, apud Plutarc. de Iside et Osiride. The word Ammuz, which is the same as Tammuz, signifies abstruse or concealed. The construction of the Hebrew text of Ezekiel gives reason to judge, that Tammuz is used in an appellative sense. But nothing can agree better with Adonis than the epithet secret, or hidden, whether we consider that secrecy and obscurity in which his mysteries were involved, or the condition in which he was represented during his festival. He was put into a coffin, and lamented over as if dead. Moses, in some places, Lev. xix. 27, 28. Deut. xiv. 1. (see also Psalm cvi. 28.) calls him the Dead, by way of derision. Lastly, the circumstance of women bewailing Tammuz, has determined the greater part of commentators to explain these passages of Ezekiel by allusion to the feasts of Adonis. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DXXXVIII.

It is thought the Israelitish women who bewailed Tammuz, Ezek. viii. 14. were engaged in worshipping the same sun as was adored by the men, in ver. 15, 16. "And he brought me into the inner court of the Lord's house, and behold, at the door of the temple of the Lord, between the porch and the altar, were about five and twenty men with their backs toward the temple of the Lord, and their faces toward the east; and they worshipped the sun toward the east."

This is not inconsistent with the opinion which takes Tammuz for Adonis, because, in the Pagan theology, Adonis was the sun also. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. CCCXVI. CCCXVII.

TAMNA, THAMNA, or THAMNATHA, a celebrated city in Palestine, on the road from Jerusalem to Diospolis. Euseb. in 'Αττὰρ. It was the capital of the Toparchia Thamnitica, which became famous in the later times of the Jewish republic.

TANACH, תנך, that afflicts thee, that humbles thee, that reproves thee, from תנא hanah, to afflict, &c. and the pronoun ך ec, thee, thou. [Removal, exile. A city built by emigrants.]

TANACH, or THANACH, or T'ANACH, a city of the half tribe of Manasseh, on this side Jordan, (Josh. xii. 21. xxi. 25. Judg. i. 27.) yielded to the Levites. Eusebius, Jerom, and Procopius of Gaza say, that in their time it was a considerable place, three miles from Legio.

[TANATH, descent, depression, a low place, from the Arabic. A station of the Israelites. Numb. xxxiii. 26.]

TANHUMETH, תנחומת, Θανεμαδθ, [self-consolation, or repentance; from תנח נacham; otherwise, bottle, or wall that is given, or of a gift; from תנח chemeth, vessel, or bottle, or תנח chomah, a wall, and תנח mathath: otherwise, the gift of indignation, or of heat; from תנח chamah, anger, wrath, or תנח cham, heat, and mathath: otherwise, the rest of death; from תנח nuah, rest, and תנח muth, death. Father of Seraiah, 2 King^s xxv. 23. Jer. xl. 8.

TANIS, Heb. תַּנִּיִּס, Zoan, motion. It is not known what Zoan signifies in the Egyptian.

[It is supposed to signify the station of exiles, or wanderers; but, as this is derived from the Arabic rather than from the Coptic, it is not free from uncertainty. It is written Tavic in the Greek of Judith, i. 10.]

TANIS, a city of Egypt. Moses affirms that Tanis, or Zoan, is less ancient by seven years than Hebron in Canaan; Numb. xiii. 22. The Psalmist asserts, that Moses performed his miracles in the fields of Tanis. Psalm lxxviii. 12, 43. This city was within the Delta. The prophet Isaiah, xix. 11, 13. xxx. 24. addresses the princes of Tanis, who were highly conceited of their wisdom and prudence. He derides their false politics. It appears that in the time of this prophet, Tanis was the capital of the Lower Egypt. Ezekiel, chap. xxx. 14. speaks of Zoan, but Jerom has translated it by Taphnis, instead of Tanis, which two cities were very different from each other. Tanis was situated on that arm of the Nile which was nearest to that of Damietta, west. Comp. FRAGS. Nos. DXLVI. DXLVII. et seq.

[There are still ruins remaining which mark the site of Zoan; called by the Arabs Saun: but it is thought these works are not of the most remote antiquity; as they have hieroglyphics upon them, extremely well executed, and of a more modern air.]

TANNIM, תנין, great fishes. See FRAGS. and Plate of TANNIM.

TANNIM, or THANNIM, Genesis i. 21. 2 I. 2 תנין

תנין תנין. LXX. Κήν. Vulgate, Cete grandia, signifies generally great fishes, sea-monsters, dragons. When Moses threw down his rod before Pharaoh, it was changed into a dragon, Lieb. Thannim. Exod. vii. 9. And "their poison is as the venom of the Tannim." We think that sometimes it expresses the crocodile; so Psalm lxxiv. 13. "Thou brakest the heads of the dragons in the waters,"—of the Tannim, or Thanninim. The LXX. and even Jerom, sometimes translate Tannim by Syrens, supposing this word to signify sea-monsters, whose figure partakes of a man and a fish. See Job xxx. 29. Isaiah xxxvi. 13. xliii. 20. in LXX. Isaiah xlii. 22. Vulgate. In Lament. iv. 3. Jerom renders Thannim by Lamia, witches, or sorceresses; but the general and better interpretation is dragons, or sea-monsters. [Rather Amphibia, as a distinct class.]

TAPHATH, טפח, little girl; from טפח taphaph, or טפח taph, to take short steps, like children; or, distillation, drop; from נפש nephesh. [Perhaps Stacte, i. e. pearly gum.]

TAPHATH, or TAPHU, daughter of Solomon. She married the son of Abinadab, governor of the province of Dor. 1 Kings iv. 11.

TAPHON, or ΤΗΟΡΟ, a city in Judea, fortified by Bacchides, 1 Macc. ix. 50. See TAPPUAH.

TAPHSAR, טפסר, Βελοπάσεις, army, he that takes away children. This word is foreign to the Hebrew tongue. It occurs, Jer. li. 27. where Jerom has left it, without translating it: in Nahum. iii. 17. he has rendered it by little children, reading Tappapim, instead of Taphsarim. The best interpreters consider this word as a name of dignity; perhaps the same as Achasdrapne, whence Satrapa is formed. Some have thought Taphsar to be the name of a province; but without proof. [A captain, Eng. Tr.]

TAPPUAH, תפוח, Ταρῖφ, apple, or apple-tree; from תפח thuphach; otherwise, breath, swelling: otherwise, that binds and holds in nets; from תפח puach.

I. TAPPUAH, or TAPHUA, a city of Manasseh, but belonging to Ephraim. Josh. xvii. 8. Probably the En-tappuah, of the former verse. Vulgate, [and Heb.] the fountain of Taphua.

II. TAPPUAH, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 34. perhaps the Beth-tappuah, of verse 53. which is also attributed to Judah, and which Eusebius, in Beth-taphu, places beyond Raphia fourteen miles; toward Egypt.

TARAH, or THARE, an encampment of Israel in the desert. [slowness; retardation?] They came hither from Tahath, and went thence to Mithcah, Num. xxxiii. 27. Ptolemy speaks of a city called Thara, in Arabia Petrea; and Josephus mentions a city called Tharabasa, which the Jews took from the Arabians. Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 2.

TARALAH, תרלה, examiner, or turtle of the curse, or of strength, or of the oak: from תר thur, examiner, turtle, and אלה alah, to curse, or oak; or from אל ejal, force. [From the Arabic multiplication, multiplying into itself.] A city of Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 27.

TAREA, תרע, Vulgate, Tharac. House, or chamber of the companion, or of the shepherd, or of malice; from תר tha, bed, or chamber, and רע rohah, companion, or shepherd; or from רע rah, or רוע ruah, malice: otherwise, that cries and laments, or does amiss; from רוע ruah.—[or, that causes lamentation, i. e. of his mother, at a painful birth.] The same as, TAREA, תרע, evil anger; from חרה charah, anger, and רע rah, evil: otherwise, anger of the shepherd, or of the companion; from רע rahah, shepherd, or companion. Son of Micah, and grandson of Jonathan, son of Saul. 1 Chron. viii. 35. Comp. ix. 41.

TARES, Zizanium, Lolium; a plant with a longish rough leaf, not easily distinguished from corn, or other grain, among which it grows. Its stem is smaller than that of wheat; at the top of this stem rises a long ear with little husks, which surround it at equal distances; these contain three or four grains, covered with down or pluff, which are not easily broken. Bread made of corn wherein there are many of these seeds, is very unwholesome; it intoxicates, loads the stomach, and creates heaviness, drowsiness, and head-aches. When the plant is grown up, and ready to blossom, it is easily distinguished from corn. Hence our Saviour, in his parable of the good corn and the tares, bids his reapers wait till the time of harvest, when it would be easy to pluck up these intruders, and to cast them into the fire. Matth. xiii. 26, 27, 28, &c. In the church, tares must be mingled with the wheat, the wicked with the righteous, the reprobate with the elect, till the day of judgment. Sometimes pastors can rake out heretics, schismatics, and scandalous offenders, by excommunication; but they cannot detect and expel all kinds of noxious weeds.

The ear of this plant is a foot long, divided into several parts, ranged alternately, so that each appears to be a little ear, made up of grains smaller than those of wheat, but a little mealy, of a reddish colour. Its blade is very different from that of wheat, but it is chiefly distinguishable when it grows up, and when it begins to blossom. In France it has obtained the name of ivroye, *istroye, or istroye, as they say, because it enidre, i. e. inebriates those who eat bread made of it, or who drink beer, in which any considerable quantity of this grain has been infused. Some botanists think that it is produced from grains of wheat or barley degenerated; and by this they account for certain years, and certain districts, wherein many tares are gathered, though good corn was sown; on the contrary, they assure us, that tares are sometimes changed into wheat, when they happen to meet with good ground. I have seen persons who affirmed, that they had made the experiment of both these things. [The reader will take care not to confound this plant with that generally known in England, and cultivated by farmers, under the name of tares, which is given as food to pigeons, &c. Our Darnel seems to be the nearest representative of the Oriental weed.]*

The word tares is often used in a figurative sense. To sow tares in a family, is to raise discord among its members. The enemy has sown tares, in the field of the church: heretics have spread their errors within it: the devil has propagated divisions among its members, &c.

[Dr. Sibthorp, (Walpole, vol. ii. p. 61.) when in Greece, April 15, 1795, says, "In our evening walk, we observed, among the corn, a quantity of Lolium, which our host called Aira, and added, that the seeds of it, when mixed with the corn, [and ground into flour, and eaten,] occasioned giddiness."

"Lolium Temulentum, Αἶρα. The seeds of this plant are often mixed with the corn, and when eaten, occasion violent giddiness."—Dr. S. in his list of plants found in Greece.

Mr. Walpole adds, in a note—"In the Geoponica we find a similar observation to that of Dr. S. Αἶρα ἀπὸ τοῦ μύγνουμένη σκοροῖ τοὺς ἐσθίουσας. p. 199. This plant is the ZiZάντον of Matthew xiii. the Ziwan of the Arabic botanists; and the Rosch of the Old Testament." See Michaelis, on the Laws of Moses, iii. 357.]

TARGUM, תרגום, explanation, plural, Targumim.

TARGUM. This name is given to the Chaldee paraphrases of the books of the Old Testament. They are called paraphrases or expositions, because they are rather comments and explications, than literal translations into the Chaldee tongue, which, after the captivity of Babylon, was better known among the Jews than the ancient Hebrew. So that when the Hebrew text was read in the synagogue, or in the temple, they generally added an explication in the Chaldee tongue, for the advantage of the people. It is probable, that this custom began about the time of Ezra, since that learned scribe reading the law to the people at Jerusalem, explained it, with the other priests who were with him, that the people might comprehend it. Ezra viii. 8, 9. Possibly they explained it in the Hebrew language, or which appears to us more probable, in the Chaldee or Syriac; for these two languages had then a very great conformity; and were almost the same; even at this day they have a very near agreement.

But, though the custom of making these expositions in the Chaldee language be very ancient, yet they had no written paraphrases, or targumim, before Onkelos and Jonathan, who lived about the time of our Saviour. Jonathan is placed about thirty years before Christ, under the reign of Herod the Great: Onkelos something later. The targum of Onkelos is the most esteemed, and copies are found in which it is inserted verse for verse with the Hebrew. It is so short and so simple, that it cannot be suspected of being corrupted. See ONKELOS.—This paraphrast wrote only on the books of Moses, and his style approaches nearly to the purity of the Chaldee, as found in Daniel and Ezra. This targum is quoted in the Mishna; but was not known to Eusebius, Jerom, or Origen.

The Targum of Jonathan, son of Uziel, is on the greater and lesser prophets. He is much more diffuse than Onkelos, and especially on the lesser prophets, where he takes great liberties, and enlarges in allegories. His style is pure enough, and approaches near to the Chaldee of Onkelos. It is thought that the Jewish doctors who lived above seven hundred years after him, have made additions to him. They ascribe to him a paraphrase on the Pentateuch also; but that is not his.

The Targum of Joseph the Blind, [i. e. having lost one eye—the "one-eyed."] is on the Hagiographa. This author is much more modern, and less esteemed than the former. He wrote on the Psalms, Job, the Proverbs, Canticles, Ecclesiastes, Ruth, and Esther. His style is a very corrupt Chaldee, with a great mixture of foreign words.

The Targum of Jerusalem is only on the Pentateuch; nor is that perfect. There are whole verses wanting, others are transposed, others are mutilated; which has led many to infer that this is only a fragment of some ancient paraphrase, now lost. Consult Walton, Proleg. 12. Father Morinus, Exercitationes Biblicæ, and Father Le Long, Bibliotheca Sacra, cap. 2. sect. 2.

There is no Targum on Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah. One has lately been published on the the Chronicles. The editions of the Chaldee paraphrases in the Polyglots of Complutum, Antwerp, and Paris, and even in the Rabbinical Bibles printed at Venice, are imperfect; those of Basil, and those of the English Polyglot, are more entire.

TARICHEA, a city of Galilee, mentioned by Josephus, in vitâ suâ. page 1010. He says it was thirty stadia from Tiberias: he went on shipboard there to go to Tiberias. De Bello, lib. ii. cap. 16. Pliny places it on the lake of Gennesareth, south of Tiberias.

TARPELITES, תרפלים, ravishers or wearied; from תרפ taraph: otherwise, succession or order of miracles; from תור tur, rank, order, and פלא pala, miracles: otherwise, ruinous order, or rank; from מפלה muphalah, ruin; according to the Syriac and Hebrew, custom, or guardian of the miracle, or of the ruin, or of the leaf of the tree. This word is a stranger to the holy language.

TARPELITES, Tarphelai; a people sent from beyond the Euphrates into Samaria. Ezra iv. 9. Some think them to be the Sapires, or Saspires. (See SEPHAR,) or the Tripolitans, i. e. people of Tripolis.

TARSHISH, תרשיש, contemplation, or examination of the marble, or of the joy: from תור thur, to examine, &c. and שיש shish, marble; or from שוש shush, joy: otherwise, precious stone, the colour of azure: from תרשיש Tharshish, the name of the country where this precious stone was found. [a bruise, i. e. to the enemy, from the Syriac.]

I. TARSHISH, or THARSIS, second son of Javan. Gen. x. iv. We think he founded Tarsus in Cilicia, and gave the name of Tarsis to the province. Vide TARSUS.

II. TARSHISH, a chief noble of Persia. Esth. i. 14.

TARSHISH, or THARSHISH, תרשיש. See TARSHISH, above.

I. THARSHISH, or THARSIS, son of Bāhan, of Benjamin. 1 Chron. vii. 10.

II. THARSHISH. A country named Tharshish, whither Solomon sent his fleets. 1 Kings x. 22. 2 Chron. ix. 21. There is a multitude of opinions concerning this country. Josephus, the Chaldee and Arabic paraphrasts, explain it of Tarsus, a city of Cilicia. The LXX. Jerom, and Theodoret, understand it of Carthage. Eusebius derives the Spaniards from Tharshish: The Arabian geographer thinks it was Tunis in Africa. Bochart makes it Tartessus, an island in the straits of Gades. Le Clerc understands Thassus an island and city in the Aegean sea. Grotius thinks the whole ocean was called Tharshish, because of the famous city of Tartessus, now mentioned. Sanctius believes the sea in general, to be called Tharshish, and that ships of Tharshish are those employed in voyages at sea, in opposition to small vessels used only in rivers. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. LXX. LXXI. CCXVII.

The LXX. sometimes translate Tharshish by the sea; and Scripture gives the name ships of Tharshish, to those fitted out at Ezion-geber, on the Red Sea, and which sailed to the ocean, equally with those fitted out at Joppa, and in the ports of the Mediterranean, (which was usually called the Great Sea.) We cannot apprehend any other way to explain and reconcile all the passages which mention ships of Tharshish. —

For, on one side, we see that Tharshish signifies the city of Tarsus in Cilicia: on the other side we see that they fitted out ships of Tharshish, or ships to go to Tharshish, in places from whence we cannot suppose they went to Tarsus in Cilicia. For example, the book of Judith (chap. ii. 12, 13. Vulgate.) describing the course of Holofernes, says, he went into Cilicia, and destroyed all the children of Tharshish, or Tharsis. Jonah, chap. i. 3. fleeing from the face of the Lord, went on ship-board at Joppa, for Tharshish, probably Tarsus in Cilicia. The prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel, among the merchant ships that came to trade at Tyre, enumerate those of Tharshish. Isaiah xxiii. 1, 14. lx. 19. Ezek. xxvii. 12, 25. xxxviii. 13. Cilicia was altogether within reach from Tyre; and there is but little probability that ships should come from the coast of the ocean to trade there. Lastly, the Psalmist, (lxxii. 10.) associates the kings of Tharshish with those of the isles: "The kings of Tharsis, and of the isles, shall bring presents." But by the isles, or islands, are generally meant those of the Mediterranean, and the maritime places, whither the Hebrews were used to go by sea. [The Archipelago, Sicily, South Italy, Spain, &c.]

From all these passages it seems that the country of Tharshish was on the Mediterranean; and probably it was Cilicia.

Therefore, when we see ships fitted out on the Red Sea, or at Ezion-geber, in order to go to Tharshish, we must conclude, either that there were several countries called Tharshish, — one on the ocean, another on the Mediterranean, — which seems by no means probable; or, that ships of Tharshish, in general, signifies ships able to bear a long voyage: large ships, in opposition to small craft intended for a home-trade in navigable rivers. [Like our "East India-men;" East India ships; which are not ships built in the East Indies, but built on the Thames, in in the most substantial manner, on purpose for a voyage to the East Indies, i. e. ships built in a particular style and manner—Tarshish-built.]

[Ibn Haukal says, "The Mediterranean Sea, or Sea of Roum, coasts to Frank (France,) along the shore to Tarsousah, or the Sea of Andalus; and then, continuing along the coast of Andalus, it at last joins the ocean at Jebel-al-Tarek." (Gibraltar).—In another place he says, "Tarsousa belongs to the land of Andalus."

This is plainly Andalusia in Spain; and, from the place where Jonah took shipping, he must have intended a Tarshish somewhere on the Mediterranean. Was the ship he went on board of going direct to Tarshish, or coasting to other ports? What could be the direct trade between Spain and Joppa?

These questions would occasion but little difficulty, if we might be allowed to suppose that the tin of the British islands was employed in the East in those ancient times. Moses mentions tin. Numb. xxxi. 22. Was it British metal? Tin certainly entered into the composition of mirrors. In the days of Alexander the Great, tin was exported from Europe to India. We know of no extensive tin mines but in Britain. It is probable, that the merchants of Cadiz imported tin from Britain; but sent it, in other vessels, to the Levant. If Cadiz, on the Atlantic Ocean, were the ancient city of Tarshish, then the Atlantic Ocean itself might be the sea of Tarshish: and ships of Tarshish might import vessels fit to navigate the ocean. Festus Avienus says expressly, Cadiz was Tarshish.

*Hic Gadir urbs est dicta Tartessus prius.
Hic sunt columnæ pertinacis Herculis, Abila atque Calpe.*

This agrees perfectly with the statement of Ibn Haukal, who, no doubt, reports the opinion of the Arabian geographers. That Phenecia maintained a direct intercourse with Britain in later ages, see FRAGMENTS, No. DCVI.

This name occurs in several places in SS.

A sea-port, whence the most capital specimens of ship-building were produced; so that ships built after the same manner were called ships of Tarshish, though not actually built there. Isaiah ii. 16. xxiii. 1, 4. Ps. xlviii. 8. This last passage Michaelis, would render, "The kings were troubled at the sight of Jerusalem, as sailors are troubled when they behold ships of Tarshish shaken by a contrary wind."

Silver was the produce of Tarshish, Jer. x. 9. Ezek. xxvii. 12. "Silver from Tarshish, gold from Uphaz." It appears from Ezekiel, that iron, lead, and tin, were brought from Tarshish. [Spain yielded most of these metals.]

It was distant, and westward; since Jonah intended to flee to Tarshish.

The inhabitants were a colony of Greeks. Josephus thought Tarsus in Cilicia was Tarshish: the same thought the writer of the book of Judith, chap ii. 12, 13. who says, Holofernes spoiled the children of Tharsis—in Cilicia. The Chaldee and Pseudo Jonathan understand Tarsus. Jerom thought the same.

But neither silver nor tin were supplied by this Tarsus: and what is said 2 Chron. ix. 21. xx. 36. 1 Kings xxii. 49. of the navigations of Solomon and Jehoshaphat, excludes this from being the Tarshish of those texts: since nobody would build vessels on the Red Sea to navigate to Cilicia: nor would Jonah quit Joppa for Tarsus, with intention of avoiding the road to Nineveh. Many interpreters understand by ships of Tarshish, ships of the main sea; but 1 Kings x. 22. Tarshish seems to be distinguished from the sea in these words: "the king had at sea ships of Tarshish."

Michaelis, also, places Tarshish in Spain. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. LXXI.]

TARSUS, Tapōs, winged, feathered; from the Greek ράπος, wings, feathers. [Having pinions, as we see on the travelling caps of Mercury, Perseus, &c.]

TARSUS, the capital of Cilicia. St Paul was a native of Tarsus in Cilicia. Acts ix. 11. xxi. 39. Some think it obtained the privileges of a Roman colony, by its firm adherence to Julius Cæsar, who made the inhabitants citizens of Rome: whence St. Paul was free of Rome, by being born in Tarsus. Others maintain that Tarsus, though a free city, was not a Roman colony, in the time of St. Paul; and that no trace is found of this on its medals before the reign of Caracalla, or of Heliogabalus: therefore, the privilege of being a citizen of Rome belonged to the apostle, not as a denizen of Tarsus, but by some personal right derived from his father or ancestors. Vide ROMAN, 3. also PAUL, and FRAGMENTS, No. DCLVII.

[If we may not credit the fabulous account of its origin, at least, it proves the great antiquity of Tarsus. Strabo says, that in process of time it received a colony of Argives, and by the institutions they formed and supported for the study of arts and sciences, it became so illustrious, that he gives it the preference in that particular, even over Athens and Alexandria. It was equally renowned for the power and the multitude of its inhabitants. Besides the title of metropolis, which it assumed, it derived surnames from five or six Roman emperors. It also qualifies itself as governed by its own laws.

"Tarsous

"Tarsous is a considerable town, with a double wall of stone. The inhabitants are valiant men and horsemen, and fond of warlike achievements. It is a strong and pleasant place. From it to the borders of Roum are many hills and mountains, of difficult ascent. They say, that in Tarsous there are above a thousand horsemen; and in all the chief cities of Islam, such as Seiestan, and Kirman, and Pars, and Khuzistan, and Irak, and Hejaz, and Egypt, there are inns, or public places, appointed for the people of this town." Ibn Haukal. See the PLATES, MEDALS OF TARSUS; also CAUCASUS, Nos. 1, 2, 3.]

TARTAK, or TERTAK, תרתק, chained, bound, shut up; from תרתק, nirtak. [From the Chaldee, of continued course, i. e. the sun rising and setting daily; advancing and receding annually.]

TARTAK, or THARTAK, a false deity of the Avites. The Rabbins say, he had the shape of an ass. By pronouncing it Sarsac, שרשך, Sharshac, instead of Tartak, תרתק, one might find under this name the god Sesac or Shesac, ששך, of which Jeremiah speaks, (xxv. 26. li. 41.) and whose feasts were known among the Pagans, under the name of Saccæa, or Sacea. Athen. lib. iv. cap. 10. Dio Chrys. Orat. 4 de Regno. Comp. SHISHAK.

TARTAN, תרתן, that searches or examines the gift of the turtle; from תור thur, to examine, or turtle, and תנה, thanah, gift, stipend: otherwise, their law; from תורה thorah, law, and the pronoun ׀ an, their. This word is foreign to the Hebrew tongue. [Extended, lengthened; which some support by Job's description of the Leviathan, chap. iii. 6.]

TARTAN, Thartan, Thanathan, or Thathania, an officer of king Sennacherib, sent with Rabshakeh on a message to king Hezekiah. 2 Kings xviii. 17. תרתן Tartan, ita et Isa. xx. 1. תרתני Tathania. Ezra v. 3, 6. vi. 6, 13. LXX. Ταθαῖαν.

TATNAI, תתני, that gives, or overseer of the gifts, of the presents, of the tributes: an officer of the king of Persia; from נתן nathan, to give. Vide TARTAN, ad fin. Governor of Samaria, and of the provinces on this side Jordan. He opposed the rebuilding of the temple and the walls of Jerusalem: and wrote about it to Darius king of Persia, who gave orders to continue the building. Ezra v. 6. A. M. 3485, ante A. D. 519.

TEBAH, תבח, Taâb, murder, butchery, or guarding of the body, a cook; from תבח tabach. Son of Nabor, and of Raumah, his concubine. Gen. xxi. 24.

TEBALIAH, תבליח, baptism of the Lord, or baptized by the Lord; from תביל tabal, to wash in water; otherwise, goodness of the Lord; from טוב tub, goodness, and the preposition ל l, to, and יה jah, the Lord. 1 Chron. xxvi. 11.

TEBET, תבת, Taβaθ, the Babylonish name of the tenth ecclesiastical month of the Hebrews: it answers partly to December, and partly to January, Esth. ii. 16. We cannot derive its true etymology from the Hebrew.

It had but twenty-nine days. The second day of this month is the last of the octave of the dedication of the temple, after it was purified by Judas Maccabeus. 1 Macc. iv. 59. John x. 22.

On the tenth the Jews fast (three days, as some say,) because of the translation of the law, from Hebrew into Greek, by command of Ptolemy Philadelphus. See SEPTUAGINT.

TEHINNAH, תחנה, Θεῖννα, prayer, favour, mercy; from תחנן chanan. [earnestly requested.]

TEHINNAH, son of Esthon, of the family of Caleb. 1 Chron. iv. 12. Tehinnah was father of the family of Nahash. [of Ir-nahash, Eng. Tr.]

TEKEL, תקל, weight; from the Chaldee תקל thekel, to weigh. Heb. Shekel.

'TEKEL, or Thechel, i. e. he was weighed. One of the words that appeared written on the wall at the sacrilegious feast of king Belshazzar: indicating that this wretched prince had been weighed in the balance, and was found wanting. Dan. v. 25. See BELSHAZZAR and DANIEL. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCV.

TEKOA, תקוע, Θεκῶ, trumpet, or sound of the trumpet; from תקע thakah; otherwise, that is confirmed. [A place of tents; a place where tents might be pitched. But others think, the place where the trumpet sounds: where armies prepare for battle by the sound of trumpet. Comp. Jer vi. 1. Numb. x. 9.]

TEKOA, THECUE, or THECUA, a city of Judah, 2 Chron. xi. 6. It is also in the Greek of Joshua, xv. 60. but not in the Hebrew. Eusebius and Jerom place Tekoa twelve miles from Jerusalem, south. In another place Jerom says, it was six miles from Bethlehem, south: See his Prologue to Amos. It stood on a mountain, and was the farthest place that way, toward the Red Sea. Josephus says, Tekoa was not far from the castle of Herodium. De Bello, lib. v. cap. 7. [Its ruins are now shewn. Vide Le Bruyn, Voy. au Levant. cap. 51. 2. Sam. xiv. 2. 1 Chron. ii. 24. Jer. vi. 1. Amos i. 1. Called Thekoe.

Thekoe, in the Greek, 1 Macc. ix. 33.] The wilderness of Tekoa mentioned, 2 Chron. xx. 20. is not far from the Red Sea.

TEKOITES, תְּקוּיִם, תְּקוּיָה, Θεκωιδίμ, inhabitants of Tekoa, Nehem. iii. 5. Trumpets, or strengthened. 1 Chron. xi. 28. See TEKOA.

[TEL-ABIB, the green hill, or tumulus: whether green with grass, or with corn. The name of a place to which some of Israel were carried captive. Ezekiel iii. 15.]

TELAH, תֵּלָח, Θαλά, humility, or verdure: from תֵּל lach. Son of Resheph, of Ephraim, father to Tahan. 1 Chron. vii. 25.

TELASSER, תֵּלָשֶׁר, תֵּלָשָׁר. Vulgate, Thelassar. A name foreign to the holy language. That fastens up, or hangs the prince; from תֵּלָח thalah, and שָׂרָה sharah, prince: otherwise, tomb, or heap of the song, or of him that sings; from תֵּלָל thalal, heap, and שָׁוַר shur, to sing: or perhaps, the rising [heights] of Ashur, i. e. Assyria.

TELASSER, or THALASSAR, a province of Asia. Rabshaketh tells Hezekiah (Isaiah xxxvii. 12. 2 Kings xix. 12.) that the gods of the nations could not deliver from his master's power the children of Eden, that were at Talassar, or Thelassar. The exact situation of this province is unknown, but it is thought to be towards Armenia and Mesopotamia, and about the sources of the Euphrates and Tigris; because of the children of Eden, who inhabited that country.

TELEM, תֵּלָם, their lamb; from תֵּלָה talah: otherwise, their dew; from תֵּל tal, the dew; and the pronoun מֵם am, theirs. In Chaldee, Syria, and Arabic, to misuse, or abuse.

[Oppression, rapine, what is procured as a prey. A city of Judah, originally seized as a prey, Josh. xv. 24. as Kimchi, Le Clerc, Hiller, and others suppose; elsewhere called also TELAIM; "prey violently taken away," as the Arabic root imports. 1 Sam. xv. 4.]

TEL-HARSA, תֵּל-חֲרָשָׁה, Θελαρησά, heap, tumulus, or suspension of the plough, or of deafness, or of silence: from תֵּלָח thalah, to suspend, or תֵּלָל thalal, heap, and חָרַשׁ charash, to labour, to keep silence, to be deaf: otherwise, suspension of the head; from the same תֵּלָח thalah, to hang up, and חָרַשׁ charash, the head.

[It must be owned, however, that chareh means pottery, shreds of earthenware: and this might be a hill or collection, forming a mount of such rubbish, like the Mons Testaceus, at Rome.]

TEL-HARSA, or THELHARSA, perhaps the same as Telassar. Those who returned with Zerubbabel out of this country, could not prove their genealogies, or shew that they were of the race of Israel. Ezra ii. 59. Neh. vii. 61.

TEL-MELAH, תֵּל-מֶלַח, heap, [or tumulus] of salt, or of mariners; from תֵּלָל thalal, a heap, and the Chaldee מֶלַח melach, salt, or מֶלַחִים melachim, mariners; otherwise, suspension of the salt, or of the mariner; from תֵּלָח thalah, to suspend, &c.

TEL-MELAH, or THELMA. Those who returned from Tel-melah, with Zerubbabel, could not prove themselves to be of Israel. The situation of Tel-melach is unknown. Ezra ii. 59.

TEMA, תֵּמָה, Θεμάν, admiration; from תֵּמָה thamah: otherwise, perfection, or consummation; from תֵּמָם thamam: otherwise, the south; from יָמִין jamin. The LXX. read Theman, [now TEHAMA. Arabia, the level, or the flat country, along the E. of the Red Sea, distinct from the mountains in the interior.]

TEMA, or THEMA, son of Ishmael. Gen. xxv. 15. It is thought he peopled the city of Thema, in Arabia Deserta. Job speaks of the caravans of Tema and Sheba. Job vi. 19. Ptolemy places a city called Themma, or Thamma, in Arabia Deserta, towards the mountains of the Chaldeans.

TEMAN, תֵּמָן, the south, or Africa; from יָמִין jamin, the right hand, &c. otherwise, perfect, consummate; from תֵּמָם thamam. [Whether this country took its name from Teman, son of Eliphaz, Gen. xxxvi. 11, 15. or from its being in a southern extremity, or promontory?]]

TEMAN, or THEMAN, son of Eliphaz, and grandson of Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 15. In ver. 34. we find a king of Idumea, called Itusham, of the country of the Temani. Jeremiah, xlix. 7—20. Ezekiel, xxv. 13. and Amos, i. 12. speak of Teman. Eusebius places Thæman in Arabia Petraea, five miles from Petra, and says there was a Roman garrison there.

TEMENI, תֵּמָנִי, Θεμανί: from TEMAN. Son of Ashur and of Naarah. 1 Chron. iv. 6.

TEMPLE, the House of God, the Sanctuary, the Tabernacle of the Lord, the Palace of the Most High, &c. These terms are often synonymous in Scripture, though, strictly speaking, they import very distinct things. The Sanctuary was but one part of the Tabernacle, or Temple; neither does the word temple describe the tabernacle; nor tabernacle the temple. The Hebrews, before Solomon, could not properly be said to have had a temple, yet they did not scruple by the word temple to describe the tabernacle; as, on the contrary, they sometimes by the tabernacle of the Lord, expressed the temple built by Solomon.

After the Lord had instructed David that Jerusalem

Jerusalem was the place he had chosen, wherein to fix his dwelling, that pious prince began to realize his design of preparing a temple for the Lord, that might be something worthy of his divine Majesty. He opened his mind on this subject to the prophet Nathan, but the Lord did not think fit that David should execute his purpose, however laudable; that honour was reserved for Solomon, his son and successor, who was to be a peaceable prince; whereas David had shed much blood in war. Nevertheless, David applied himself to collect great quantities of gold, silver, brass, iron, and other materials for this undertaking.

Solomon laid the foundations of the temple, A. M. 2992, ante A. D. 1012, and it was finished A. M. 3000, and dedicated in 3001, ante A. D. 1003. The place chosen for erecting this magnificent structure, was Mount Moriah. Its entrance stood toward the east, and the most holy, and most retired part, was toward the west. The first book of Kings, and the second of Chronicles, chiefly describe the temple, properly so called; i. e. the Sanctum, the Sanctuary, and the apartments attached to them; also the vessels, the implements, and ornaments of the temple, giving scarcely any description of the courts, and areas around; which however formed a principal part of the grandeur of this edifice. Ezekiel has supplied this defect, by the exact plan he has described of these necessary parts. Indeed, it must be owned, that the temple, as described by Ezekiel, was never realized after the captivity of Babylon, according to the model and the mensurations of this prophet. But as the measures he sets down for the Sanctum, and the Sanctuary, are within a small matter the same as those of the temple of Solomon; and as this prophet, who was himself a priest, had seen the first temple, it may be supposed the description he gives of the temple of Jerusalem, is that of the temple of Solomon.

After the consecration, or dedication, of the temple, by Solomon, A. M. 3001, this edifice suffered many revolutions; which it is proper to notice here.

A. M. 3033, ante A. D. 971, Shishak, king of Egypt, took Jerusalem, and carried away the treasures of the temple. 1 Kings xiv. 25, &c. 2 Chron. xii.

A. M. 3146, Joash, king of Judah, collected silver to repair the temple; they began the work in earnest A. M. 3148. 2 Kings xiii. 4, 5, &c. 2 Chron. xxiv. 7, 8, &c.

Ahaz, king of Judah, having bought the assistance of Tiglath-Pileser, king of Assyria, against the kings of Israel and Damascus, who were at war with him, robbed the temple of its riches, to give to this foreign king;—[2 Chron. xxviii. 21, 22, &c. A. M. 3264, ante A. D. 740.] not content with that, he profaned this holy place, by setting up therein an altar copied from one he had seen at Damascus, taking away the brazen altar made by Solomon. 2 Kings xvi. 10, 11, 12. He also displaced the brazen sea from off the brazen oxen that supported it, and the brazen lavers from their pedestals, and the king's throne, which was of brass. These he removed, to prevent their being carried off by the king of Assyria. Nor did he stop here, but extended his wickedness so far as to sacrifice to strange gods, and to erect profane altars in every corner of the streets of Jerusalem. 2 Chron. xxviii. 24, 25. He pillaged the temple, broke the sacred vessels, and shut up the house of God. From A. M. 3264, ante A. D. 740, to 3278, ante A. D. 726.

Hezekiah, son and successor of Ahaz, opened again and repaired the gates of the temple, which his father had shut up, and stripped of their ornaments. 2 Chron. xxix. 3, 4, &c. A. M. 3378, ante A. D. 726. He restored the worship of the Lord, and sacrifices, and made new sacred vessels, in the place of those which Ahaz had destroyed. But in the 14th year of his reign, Sennacherib, king of Assyria, coming with an army into the land of Judah, Hezekiah was forced to take the riches of the temple, and even the plates of gold that he himself had put on the gates of the temple, to give them to the king of Assyria. But when Sennacherib was gone back into his own country, no doubt but Hezekiah restored all these things to their former condition, as soon as he could.

Manasseh, son and successor of Hezekiah, profaned the temple of the Lord, by setting up altars and idols, by which he worshipped the host of heaven, even in the courts of the house of the Lord. 2 Kings xxi. 4, 5, 6, 7. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 5, 6, 7. A. M. 3306. God delivered him into the hands of the king of Babylon, who loaded him with chains, and carried him beyond the Euphrates. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11, 12, &c. A. M. 3328, ante A. D. 676. Here he acknowledged God, and repented of his sins: being sent back to his dominions, he redressed the profanations of the temple he had committed, removed the idols, destroyed the profane altars, and restored the altar of burnt-offerings, upon which he offered his sacrifices.

Josiah, king of Judah, laboured with all his might in repairing the edifices of the temple, which had been either neglected, or demolished, by the kings of Judah, his predecessors. He also commanded commanded the priests and Levites to replace the ark of the Lord in the sanctuary; and that it should not be moved from place to place, as it had been during the reigns of the wicked kings his predecessors. 2 Chron. xxxv. 3.

Nebuchadnezzar took away a part of the sacred vessels of the temple of the Lord, and placed them in the temple of his god at Babylon; under the reign of Jehoiakim, king of Judah. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6. A. M. 3398, ante A. D. 706. He also carried away others under the reign of Jeconiah. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 10. A. M. 3505, ante A. D. 599. Lastly, he took the city of Jerusalem, and entirely destroyed the temple, in the eleventh year of Zedekiah. A. M. 3416, ante A. D. 588. 2 Kings xxv. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 18.

The temple continued in ruins fifty-two years, till the first year of Cyrus, at Babylon, A. M. 3468, ante A. D. 536. Then Cyrus permitted the Jews to return to Jerusalem, and to rebuild the temple of the Lord. Ezra i. The following year they laid the foundations of the second temple; but they had hardly worked at it one year, when the king of Persia, or his officers, gained over by the enemies of the Jews, forbade the further prosecution of the work. Ezra iv. 5. A. M. 3470, ante A. D. 534. After the death of Cyrus and Cambyses, it was again forbid by the Magian, who succeeded Cambyses, and whom Scripture calls Artaxerxes. Vide SMERDIS. Ezra iv. 7—17. A. M. 3483, ante A. D. 521. Lastly, these prohibitions being removed under Darius, son of Hystaspes, the temple was finished, and dedicated four years afterwards, A. M. 3489, ante A. D. 515, twenty years after the return from the captivity.

This temple was profaned by order of Antiochus Epiphanes, A. M. 3837. The ordinary sacrifices were discontinued, and the idol of Jupiter Olympius was set up near the altar. It continued in this condition three years. 1 Macc. i. 62. Judas Maccabeus purified it, and restored the sacrifices, with the worship of the Lord. A. M. 3840, ante A. D. 164.

Herod the Great undertook to rebuild the whole temple of Jerusalem, in the eighteenth year of his reign. A. M. 3986. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 14. He began to lay the foundation, A. M. 3984, forty-six years before the first pass-over of Jesus Christ;—as the Jews observed to him, “Forty and six years was this temple in building, and wilt thou rear it up in three days?” This is not saying that Herod had employed forty-six years in building it; for Josephus assures us, that he finished what he proposed in nine years and a half. But long after his time it continued to receive additions; and the same Josephus tells us, that the works were in progress till the beginning of the Jewish war. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 8.

This temple built by Herod did not subsist above seventy-seven years; being destroyed, A. M. 4073, A. D. 70. It was begun by Herod, A. M. 3987; finished in 3996; burnt by the Romans in 4073.

This temple of Herod was very different from that of Solomon, nor was it a repetition of that rebuilt by Zerubbabel, after the captivity. The following is the description Josephus has left us of it, who himself had seen it. [For Plans, &c. of the temple, in different states, and according to the conceptions of different authors, vide the FRAGMENTS, Nos. CCXLII. to CCXLIX. with the PLATES.]

The temple properly so called, was only sixty cubits high, and sixty broad; but there were in the front, two sides like two arms, or shoulders, which advanced twenty cubits on each side; making the whole front, a hundred cubits wide, as well as high. The stones used in this building were white and hard, twenty-five cubits long, eight high, and twelve wide. Joseph. de Bello, lib. vi.

The front of this magnificent building resembled that of a royal palace. The two wings in the front were lower than the middle, which middle was so elevated, that those who approached it from a distance, might see it many furlongs off. [The present mosque is seen, in some directions, at a distance of many miles. Comp. Dr. E. D. CLARKE, vol. ii. p. 524.] The gates were almost of the same height as the temple, and from them hung veils, or tapestry, of several colours, embellished with purple flowers. On each side of the doors were a pillar, or pillars; the capitals of these were adorned with branches of a golden vine, which hung down with its grapes and clusters, so well imitated, that art did not yield to nature. Herod made extensive and high galleries about the temple; suitable to the magnificence of the rest of the building; exceeding in beauty and sumptuousness, all of the kind that had been seen.

The temple was built upon a very uneven mountain, and originally there was hardly plain enough on the top of it for the site of the building and the altar. The rest of it was steep and sloping. But Solomon raised a wall toward the east, to support the earth; and after that side was filled up, he there built a portico, or gallery. At that time, only this face of the area was cased with stone: but, in succeeding ages, the people endeavouring to enlarge this space, and the top of the mountain being much extended, they broke down the wall on the north side, and enclosed a second space as large as the whole original area of the temple. So that at last, contrary to all hope and expectation, this work was so far extended, that the whole mountain was surrounded by a treble wall. For completing of this great work, ages were barely sufficient; and to this were applied all the sacred treasures, brought by the devotion of the people from all parts of the world. In some places these walls were above three hundred cubits high; and the stones used in them were forty cubits long. They were fastened together by cramps of iron and lead, to resist the injuries of time. The level area on which the temple stood was a furlong square; or one hundred and twenty-five paces.

The entrances into the first enclosure, (a square of a furlong on each side,) were by one gate on the eastern side, one on the south side, one on the north side: and on the west side four, one of which went to the palace, another into the city, and the two others into the fields. This enclosure was secured without by a very high and solid wall; and within, all around it on the four sides, were stately porticoes, or galleries, sustained by columns, so thick that three men could hardly grasp them in their arms; for each of them was, in circumference, twenty-seven feet. The number of these columns was one hundred and sixty-two. They supported a roof of cedar, very curiously wrought; and formed three galleries, of which the centre was the highest and widest; being in width forty-five feet, in height a hundred. Those on the two sides were but thirty feet wide, and fifty feet high.

The court, or area, before these galleries, was paved with marble of several colours; and at a little distance from the galleries was a second enclosure, formed by a handsome balustrade of stone, with pillars at equal distances, on which were inscriptions in Greek and in Latin, to warn strangers, and such as were unclean, not to proceed farther on pain of death. This enclosure had only one entrance on the east; but on the north and south, it had three, at equal distances.

The third enclosure, which contained the temple and the altar of burnt-sacrifices, was surrounded by a wall forty cubits high. It was square, as well as the former, and the height of the wall did not appear without so much as it really was; because it was lost behind the steps, by which it was surrounded, and partly concealed. First, there were fourteen steps, above which was a terrace of about ten cubits wide, which went all round the enclosure. From thence was another ascent of five steps, before the platform of the gate; so that the wall was but twenty-five cubits high, within. The entrance into this portico was by one gate toward the east, by four towards the south, and four towards the north. There was no gate on the west side, but a great wall ran all along from north to south. At the entrance of each gate within were large rooms, resembling pavilions, of thirty cubits square, and forty high; each sustained by a pillar of twelve cubits, or eighteen feet in circumference.

Within this enclosure were also double covered galleries, with two rows of pillars to the east, north and south; but none to the west. The women had a gate to themselves on the east side, also one on the south, and one on the north, by which they passed to the place appointed for them, which was distant from that of the men.

The altar of burnt-sacrifices was fifteen cubits high, and forty cubits wide each way: The priests ascended to it by a slope without steps, towards the south. At each of the four corners was a small eminence, or little horn. The whole was built of rough stones, on which no iron had been used, nor a tool of any other metal.

The front of the temple, which was a hundred cubits high, and as many wide, was adorned with sundry rich spoils, dedicated to God, by the Jews, as trophies of their victories: When Herod had finished the temple, he dedicated them anew; he also added others of his own, taken in his wars against the barbarous nations.

The porch of the temple was ninety cubits high, and one hundred in length, from north to south. The door was seventy cubits high, and twenty-five wide. The Sanctum, or sanctuary, and the apartments that ranged along the two sides of the temple, had nothing singular. Josephus observes, that when it was resolved to build the temple and the altar, Herod did not enter the courts of the priests; he being only a layman. He committed to them the care of finishing this work, and they completed it in eighteen months; the rest took up eight years.

Within this inclosure was a wall, one cubit high, which surrounded the temple and the altar of burnt-sacrifices; and separated the priests from the other Israelites. This place was not entered by the laity: they came as far as this wall, to present sacrifices and offerings: but advanced no farther.

Josephus relates a circumstance, which he said he received by tradition from his fathers, that all the time they worked on the temple, there fell no rain in the day time, but only in the night; so that the workmen were not hindered in their work. When the temple was finished, the dedication of it was performed with great solemnity. The people rendered hearty thanks to God, and gave the king much praise and commendation, which he well deserved, for the execution of this great work. Herod offered three hundred oxen in sacrifice; and all the people, with great alacrity, brought victims to this august ceremony. The number of them was so very great that it was not easy to count them. What contributed to make this festival more solemn, was, that it happened on the same day that Herod ascended the throne, which anniversary he always celebrated with much pomp.

In the angle of the northern side of the external inclosure of the temple, was a very strong tower, built by the Asmonean kings, who possessed both the regal state and the priesthood at the same time. Here were kept the sacred ornaments worn by the high-priest, on great public occasions. Herod continued to keep them here; and after Herod, the Romans, till the time of Tiberius. But during his reign, Vitellius coming to Jerusalem as governor of Syria, the inhabitants of that city received him with so much honour, that to shew his acknowledgment, he obtained from Tiberius permission to commit the care of this sacred deposit into their hands. They enjoyed this favour till the death of King Agrippa; when Cassius Longinus, governor of Syria, and Cuspius Fadus, governor of Judea, commanded the Jews to return them to the tower of Antonia, and the custody of the Romans, as before. The Jews sent to desire this favour again from the emperor Claudius; and young king Agrippa being then at Rome, obtained it for himself.

Before that time, the manner of keeping this precious habit was thus:—It was deposited in the tower Antonia, under the seal of the high-priest, and those of the treasurers of the temple. On the eve of any solemn festival, they waited on the Roman commander of the castle; after they had visited and examined the seals, they received the holy vestments from him; and they returned them to him when the festival was over, and sealed them up again as before.

This tower, or castle, was already very strong, but Herod fortified it still more, and called it Antonia, in honour of his patron Anthony. Herod made a passage under ground, from the tower Antonia to the eastern gate of the temple, near which he also built another tower. This was to preserve a communication between the two towers and the temple, that might be serviceable to himself, or to his successors, in case of sedition. Vide ANTONIA.

Father John Baptist Villalpandus, a Spanish Jesuit, who died May 22, 1608, and who was employed by the king of Spain to draw up a description of the temple and city of Jerusalem, has acquired immortal honour by his work on the subject, which is printed in three volumes, in folio.

However, this learned jesuit, though extremely well furnished with profound knowledge in Greek and Roman architecture, was, in the judgment of very able men, too much prejudiced in favour of the temple of Solomon, and imagined, that he could not make it too splendid, too grand, or too magnificent, and therefore exhausted the whole force of his imagination and genius, in describing a temple that should be the most perfect pile of building possible.

He has introduced many embellishments not mentioned in the sacred text, but which ought to have been there, according to the rules of architecture; of which he supposes Solomon could not be ignorant; as if the same taste in architecture must needs prevail among all nations; or, as if Solomon, who lived long before the famous architects of Greece, must needs have known and followed their rules. Villalpandus has multiplied the courts and porticoes; and instead of three courts mentioned in Scripture, he has described eleven.

Villalpandus supposes that all the courts were surrounded with three rows of columns, and that upon these columns were three stories of apartments; which, to me, does not seem to be warranted from Scripture. The Orientals did not commonly build several stories one upon another; and these must have been of a very extraordinary height.

Dr. PRIDEAUX's system, extracted from the Rabbins, is, in general, very commodious in giving extremely plausible explications of whatever is said in Scripture concerning the different parts of the temple, and their uses. We find there whatever is noticed in the gospels; the beautiful gate, Solomon's porch, the chests of the temple, wherein the offerings were placed, the Gazophylacium, or treasury; in short, those who contrived this plan have provided for every thing. There is only one thing wanting: but that is essential, viz. authenticity. The authors of the Talmud, and the Rabbins, have never proved, nor will ever be able to prove, their suppositions, either from Scripture, or from authors who had seen the temple, or had consulted those who had seen it. For neither the Talmudists nor Rabbins are of antiquity or authority sufficient, when the question involves a matter of fact, of which they could not be witnesses, neither themselves, nor those whose testimonies they allege—I mean their fathers, or grandfathers. We know, very certainly, that they were but little conversant in the study of antiquity; and that they have no ancient documents, except the sacred writings and Josephus, which can give them any information on the true form of the temple. How then can they acquaint us with so many particulars, which differ from the Scriptures and Josephus?

Talmudists

If the Rabbins had been satisfied with describing the temple, such as it was when the Romans destroyed it, one might endeavour either to reconcile them with Josephus, (which I think to be impossible,) or we might say, they had some tradition, or private writings, more faithful and exact than Josephus: but to pretend, that the temple they describe to us is the same with that of Solomon or Ezekiel, is indeed utterly insupportable!

What they say, for instance, about the court of the women, is not found in Scripture. The Chel, i. e. the wall that separated the court of the Israelites from that of the Gentiles, was not within, but without the temple. The pillars, Jachin and Boaz, were not standing in the second temple. It is uncertain whether the veil that was rent at our Saviour's crucifixion was that which parted the Sanctum from the Sanctuary; it might be that which separated the Sanctum from the Vestibulum. The width of the Vestibulum of Solomon's temple did not exceed the width of the temple itself: and where shall we find that it was on one of the wings of the temple the Devil placed our Saviour? Matth. iv. 5.—How shall we prove the existence of all those gates, both on the west and south sides of the temple: and of so many small apartments, the uses of which are so minutely determined?

I would not be understood to intend to disparage the pains Dr. PRIDEAUX has taken in these matters; I would only suggest, that the greater part of the things inserted in his plan of the temple, are of but little certainty; that the Jewish authors are guides not to be greatly relied on in these matters; and, that to know the ancient temple of Solomon, we must keep to the text of the book of the Kings, and of Ezekiel. As to the temple of Herod, which was demolished by the Romans, we have no other guide in whom to place confidence, but Josephus. Vide PLATES, PLANS, &c. of the TEMPLE.

TEMPLE. Subsequent History of the,
We are informed by most (or all) of our ecclesiastical historians, who write of Julian, that he sent for some of the chief men of the Jewish nation, and enquired of them, why they did not now sacrifice as the law of Moses directed? They told him, "that they were not to sacrifice at any place, except Jerusalem; and the temple being destroyed, they were obliged to forbear that part of worship." He thereupon promised to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem; and we still have a letter of Julian, inscribed "to the community of the Jews," which, however extraordinary, must be reckoned genuine; for Sozomen expressly says, that "Julian wrote to the patriarchs and rulers of the Jews, and to their whole nation, desiring them to pray for him, and for the prosperity of his reign." That is an exact description of the letter which is so inscribed. It was written in the year 362, as La Bleterie supposeth: in the beginning of that year, say Tillemont and the Bishop of Gloucester. Dr. Lardner.

Julian, in the close of the same letter, adds, "In this also you are deeply interested; that after having happily terminated the Persian war, I may dwell in the holy city of Jerusalem, which you have long desired to see inhabited, and in that, restored by my labours, I may with you glorify the Most High."

Julian did not wait so long before he gave the Jews some proofs of his affection, or rather, of his hatred to the Christians, by the project which he formed of rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem; a project which, as pagan writers themselves witness, was confounded by one of the most astonishing and best attested miracles mentioned in history. La Bleterie.

On this remarkable event, Bishop Warburton, published, in 1750, his discourse, entitled "Julian," &c. (occasioned by Dr. Middleton's Free Inquiry into the Miraculous Powers) written, it is generally thought, with temper and candour, though Mr. Gibbon brands it "with all the peculiarities which are imputed to the Warburtonian school," and charges the author with revealing the secret intentions of Julian, and with the authority of a theologian, prescribing the motives and conduct of the Supreme Being." Dr. Lardner, however, (Testimonies v. 4, 47—71.) doubts the truth of this miracle. His reasons are drawn from Julian's own writings, (the above passage in particular, which intimates his intention of rebuilding Jerusalem after his return from the Persian war, which never happened) the improbability of his allotting money for such an expensive work, when he was just setting out for Persia, the credulity, in other instances, of Ammianus, the incredible miracles, or pretended miracles, miracles, with which the history of this event is loaded by Christian writers, there being no occasion, at that time, for such a miraculous interposition to hinder that undertaking; and the silence of several Christian writers, particularly Jerom, Prudentius, and Orosius. He concludes thus: "Let not any be offended that I hesitate upon this point. I think we ought not too easily to receive accounts of miraculous interpositions, which are not becoming the Divine Being. There are many things said of Julian, which all wise and good men do not believe." But let us hear another excellent writer.

The interposition certainly was as providential as the attempt was impious. There are indeed many witnesses to the fact, whom an able critic (Whitby, General Preface, p. 28.) hath well drawn together, and ranged in this order: "Ammianus Marcellinus, a heathen, Zemus David, a Jew, who confesses that Julian was Divinitus impeditus, hindered by God in this attempt; Nazianzen and Chrysostom among the Greeks, St. Ambrose and Ruffinus among the Latins, who flourished at the very time when this was done; Theodoret and Sozomen, orthodox historians, Philostorgius, an Arian, Socrates, a favourer of the Novatians, who wrote the story within the space of fifty years after the thing was done, and whilst the eye-witnesses of the fact were yet surviving." But the public hath been obliged with the best and fullest account of this whole transaction in Warburton's Julian, where the evidence for the miracle is set in the strongest light, and all objections are clearly refuted, to the triumph of faith and the confusion of infidelity. Bishop Newton.

Whatever incense Julian gave the Jews in the epistles which he wrote to them, he often speaks elsewhere, as if he despised them. In general, what most prejudiced the Pagans against both the Christian and the Jewish religions, was their being exclusive, and admitting no community with any other. But they endured the Jews with less impatience, and contented themselves with despising them, because the latter gained but few proselytes. The barrenness with which the synagogue was struck, made it find grace in the sight of our common enemies; but the fertility of the church alarmed and enraged them. They foresaw that she would at length destroy their altars. Julian, in particular, kept good terms with the Jews, because they entered into his plan: 1. By their implacable hatred to the Christians. 2. From the design which he had formed to restore the nation and the temple, in order to falsify the Scriptures. Besides, the religion of the Jews ordained sacrifices; and in this point of view was agreeable to Julian, who, as may be seen in his life and his works, had a taste for bloody sacrifices, more worthy of a butcher than a philosopher. La Bleterie.

That the attempt really was made, as stated, that some progress also had been accomplished, and that it was suddenly relinquished, ancient remains yet existing on the spot, are decisive evidences, in the opinion of Dr. E. D. CLARKE, who inspected them, in 1801. Comp. FRAGS, No. DLXXIV.

As this particular event may be considered as closing the history of the Jewish temple, we have inserted it at length. The attempt of Julian to ingratiate himself with the Jews, and to render that nation important, had some similarity with the present attempt made in France, by the meeting of the Sanhedrim at Paris, to bring the Jewish nation again into public notice, and to render it subservient to political purposes.

* * * This was written while Napoleon Buonaparte was Emperor of France, as is evident from the allusion. For a particular account of the Transactions of the Parisian Sanhedrim, see Kirwan's Translation of their Reports. 8vo. Lond. 1807.]

Scripture speaks of several other Temples, in, or near, Palestine; as

The temple of Dagon, at Gaza. Judg. xvi. 23. —another at Ashdod, or Azotus. 1 Sam. v. 1, 2, 3. and 1 Macc. x. 84.

The temple of the Samaritans, on Mount Gerizim. 2 Macc. x. 23. vi. 2.

The temple of Ashtaroath, one of the chief temples of the Philistines. 1 Sam. xxxi. 10.

The temple of Baal, built by Ahab, in Samaria. 1 Kings xvi. 32.

The temple of Rimmon, at Damascus. 2 Kings v. 18.

The temple of Nisroch, at Babylon. Isaiah xxxviii. 38.

The temple of Bel, at Babylon. Dan. xiv. 9.

The temple of Babylon, wherein Nebuchadnezzar laid up the sacred vessels captured at Jerusalem. Dan. i. 2.

The temples of Chemosh, and of Moloch, built by Solomon, on the Mount of Olives, over-against the temple of the Lord. 1 Kings xi. 7.

The temple of Nannæa, which Antiochus Epiphanes attempted to plunder. 2 Macc. i. 18.

The temple of the Golden Calf, at Bethel; —another at Dan. Josephus says, that even in his time the temple of the Golden Calf was to be seen at Dan, near the river called the Little Jordan. In his text is read—at Daphne, but it plainly ought to be read—at Dan.

TEMPLE denotes, also, the church of Jesus Christ. Rev. iii. 12. "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God." And St. Paul says, 2 Thess. ii. 4. that Antichrist "as God sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God."

TEMPLE sometimes imports heaven. Psalm xi. 4. "The Lord is in his holy temple: the Lord's throne is in heaven." The martyrs in heaven are said to be "before the throne of God, and to serve him day and night in his temple." Rev. vii. 15.

The TEMPLE of God, in a spiritual sense, is the soul of a righteous man. 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17. "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defileth the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are." And, 1 Cor. vi. 19. "Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost, which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own?" Also, 2 Cor. vi. 16. "What agreement hath the temple of God with idols? For ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people."

TEMPTATION, to tempt, to try, to prove. God tempted Abraham, by commanding to offer up his son Isaac, Gen. xxii. 1. intending to prove his obedience and faith, to confirm and strengthen him by this trial; and to furnish in his person an example, and pattern of perfect obedience, to all succeeding ages. God does not tempt, or try men, in order to ascertain their tempers and dispositions, as if he were ignorant of them; but, to exercise their virtue, to purify it, to render it conspicuous to others, to give them an opportunity of receiving favours from his hands. When we read in Scripture, that God proved his people, whether they would walk in his law, or no, (Exod. xvi. 4.) that he permitted false prophets to arise among them, who prophesied vain things to try them, whether they would seek the Lord with their whole hearts, &c. these expressions should be explained by that of St. James, i. 13. "Let no man say when he is tempted, 'I am tempted of God;' for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man. But every man is tempted when he is drawn away by his own lust, and enticed." Far be it from us to say, that God tempts us to commit what he prohibits, and what he will punish us for committing. Deus non est auctor eorum est ultor. Fulgent. ad Monim. lib. 1.

The devil indeed tempts us to evil, to sin, to distrust, to contempt of God and his laws, to pride, to vanity, &c. He lays snares for us, even in our best actions, endeavouring to deprive us of the benefit of them, by imputing the merit of them to ourselves and not to God. Satan tempted David, and prevailed with him to number the people, out of vain confidence and curiosity. 1 Chron. xxi. 1. He tempted our Saviour in the wilderness, and endeavoured to infuse into him sentiments of pride, ambition, distrust, &c. Matt. iv. 1. Mark i. 13. Luke iv. 2. He tempted Ananias and Sapphira to lie to the Holy Ghost. Acts v. 3. St. Paul recommends to the Corinthians, not to expose themselves to the temptation of incontinence; under pretence of affecting to live in marriage without conjugal intercourse, as a greater degree of perfection. 1 Cor. vii. 5. Lastly, in the prayer that Christ himself hath taught us, we pray God "not to lead us into temptation," Matth. vi. 13. and a little before his death, our Saviour exhorted his disciples to "watch and pray, that they might not enter into temptation." Matth. xxvi. 41. St. Paul says "God will not suffer us to be tempted above what we are able to bear." 1 Cor. x. 13.

Men are said to tempt the Lord, when they unseasonably require proofs of the divine presence, power, or goodness. Without doubt, we are allowed to seek the Lord for his assistance, and to pray him to give us what we need; but it is not allowed us to tempt him, nor (for example) to demand miracles of him, or to expose ourselves to dangers from which we cannot escape, unless by miraculous interposition of his omnipotence. God is not obliged to work miracles in our favour; he requires of us only the performance of such actions as are within the ordinary measures of our strength. The Israelites in the desert repeatedly tempted the Lord, as if they had reason to doubt of his presence among them, or of his goodness, or of his power, after all his appearances and performances in their favour. Exod. xvi. 2, 7, 17. Numb. xx. 12. Psalm lxxviii. 18, 41, &c. God forbids us to tempt him; "Before thou prayest, prepare thyself, and be not as one that tempteth the Lord." Eccclus. xviii. 23.

Men tempt, or try, one another when they would know whether things are really what they seem to be, whether men are such as they are thought, or desired, to be. The queen of Sheba came to prove the wisdom of Solomon, by proposing riddles to him, for him to explain. 1 Kings xi. 1. 2 Chron. ix. 1. Daniel desired of him who had the care of feeding him and his companions to prove them for some days, whether abstinence from food of certain kinds would make them leaner. Dan. i. 12, 14. The scribes and pharisees often tempted our Saviour, in the gospel, and endeavoured to decoy him into their snares. Matt. xvi. 1. xix. 3. xxii. 18. alibi passim.

TEMPTATION, the name of an encampment of Israel, in the wilderness: Exod. xvii. 7. See MASSAH, which in Hebrew signifies temptation. The same encampment is also called Rephidim. Deut. vi. 16. Here Moses brought water out of the rock Horeb. See the Plate, Travels of ISRAEL in the WILDERNESS.

TENT. See TABERNACLE. Vide FRAGMENT, No. CCVI.

TEPHILIM, or TEPILIM, otherwise Totaphot, Frontals, or Phylacteries, which the Jews use at their morning-prayer, and some devotees also at evening-prayer: but, except the chanter, few put them on then. See PHYLACTERIES. They take literally the commandment "to wear the words of the law as a sign upon their foreheads." See TALED: But, that they may not expose themselves to railery, and to preserve the respect due to so sacred a thing, they only wear them at prayer-time. Leo of Modena, Cerem. Jews, cap. 5.

They hold these tephilim, or phylacteries, so sacred, that some enthusiasts persuade themselves that even God himself wears such, at his head and wrists. And this is not one of those allegories under which their doctors conceal a figurative sense; for they maintain, that when God permitted Moses to see him behind, he only intended to shew him the knot of the string that tied the tephilim to his head; whereas, the face, which he refused to discover to that legislator, was properly, truly, and substantially the face of God. Thus they extol the origin and excellence of tephilim!

And they are not wrong in referring the origin of them to God himself, if we must take literally the expressions of Moses, Deut. vi. 8, 9. —"Thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hands, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes; and thou shalt write them upon the posts of thine house, and on thy gates." As the last words are taken literally, which relate to writing the words of the law on the posts of the house; so the command of wearing them on the forehead must not be understood as a mere allegory. It is observed, that as the Pagans wore their phylacteries, or amulets, on several parts of their bodies, so God commanded the Israelites to wear tephilim on their foreheads and their arms; to remind them of the divine law, and to avert from his people the superstitious abuse of the talismans, and phylacteries, of the Pagans. [Such preservatives from evil are universally worn in the East: also in Africa, &c.]

VOL. II. PART XXIX. Edit. IV.

But Jerom maintains, and is followed by several learned commentators, that the words of Moses should be understood figuratively; that the ancient Jews did not otherwise understand them; and that only since the time of the Pharisees they have been taken literally. Jesus Christ did not absolutely condemn the use of tephilim, but he blamed the affectation of the Pharisees, who must needs wear them much larger, and broader, than other men; I mean, than other men who wore them; for it is not probable that all men wore them, or that the use of them was general. See the commentators on Matth. xxiii. 5. Vide Plate of PHYLACTERIES, and FRAGMENTS, No. CCXXXIV.

TERAH, תֵּרַח, to breathe, to scent, to blow; from תִּרִּיחַ rich. [Perhaps slow, from the Chaldee. A station of the Israelites is also called Tarah, possibly from some delay of the people there Numb. xxxiii. 27.]

TERAH, or THARE, son of Nahor, and father of Nahor, Haran, and Abraham. Gen. xi. 24. born A. M. 1878, ante A. D. 2126. He begat Abraham at the age of seventy-two years, A. M. 2008, ante A. D. 1996. He came with Abraham out of Ur, of the Chaldeans, to settle at Haran, in Mesopotamia, A. M. 2082. Gen. xi. 31, 32. He died there the same year, aged two hundred and seventy-five years.

Scripture says plainly, that Terah had fallen into idolatry. Josh. xxiv. 2—14. "Your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood in old times; even Terah, the father of Abraham, and the father of Nahor; and they served other gods."—Some think that Abraham himself, at first, worshipped idols; but that afterwards, God being gracious to him, convinced him of the vanity of this worship, and that he undeceived his father Terah.

The Arabians and Turks say, that Azor was the father of Abraham, and Terah was his grandfather. Biblioth. Orient. p. 12. Justin says, lib. xxxvi. that Adores, Abraham, and Israel, reigned successively at Damascus. Suidas affirms, that Abraham converted his father Terah, who was an idolater; and Georgius Syncellus acquaints us, that he threw his father Terah's idols into the fire, and that Haran endeavouring to rescue them from the flames, was burned with them; that Terah having at first quitted the worship of these false gods, afterwards relapsed into his former idolatry, and continued obstinate in it till his dying day. Chronic. page 99. For a history relating to Terah's idols, vide ABRAHAM.

Several of the Orientals think, that Azor is the same as Terah, Abraham's father. The Persians and the Turks call him Pour-Tirasch; i. e. the carver of idols. For it is a tradition among the Mussulmen, that he was not only an idolater, but also a maker, and vender, of idols; that he had great disputes with his son Abraham on this subject; and that he accused him before Nimrod, who caused him to be cast into a burning furnace, whence Abraham came out safe.
2 N div. 2 and

TERAPHIM, תְּרָפִים, from תָּרַת, an image, an idol. [or from seraph, burning.]

TERAPHIM, or THERAPHIM. We read, Gen. xxxi. 19. that Rachel had stolen the images of her father. Heb. תְּרָפִים, Teraphim. LXX. Εἰδωλα. Aquila, Μορφώματα, Figuræ. Symmac. and Theodot. Θεράφειν. It is enquired what these teraphim were? The LXX. sometimes translate this word by oracle, Hos. iii. 4. Δήλας: Zech. x. ii. Ἀποφθεγγόμενος; and sometimes by vain figures, Κενοταφία. 1 Sam. xix. 13. It appears indeed from all the passages in which this word is used, that the teraphim were idols, or superstitious figures. The Jews say, the teraph was the head of a man separated from the trunk, and embalmed; under the tongue of which was put a plate of gold, with the name of a false deity: that this head was placed in a niche, that candles were lighted before it, and that they pretended to divine by it.

Others think the teraphim were talismans, i. e. metal figures, cast and engraven under certain aspects of the planets, to which extraordinary effects were ascribed, in proportion to the nature of the metal, to the qualities of the planet, and to the figures represented on the talisman. This opinion appears the most probable. All the eastern people are still much addicted to this superstition of talismans. The Persians call them telefin, a name nearly approaching to teraphim. Chardin, Of the science of the Persians. Voy. tom. ii. cap. x. In that country no man is without them, and some are even loaded with them. They impute many virtues to them. They hang them around the necks of animals, and the cages of birds. But those of Rachel must have been gross images, made of some precious metal. See Gen. xxxi. 19. 1 Sam. xv. 23. Ezek. xxi. 21. Zech. x. 2. where the word teraphim is used for an idol, or superstitious figure.

It is asked, Why Rachel stole the teraphim of her father Laban? Some have thought she intended to obtain reparation for wrongs he had done her. Others imagine, that she wished to deprive him of the means of discovering their flight, by taking away his oracles. Others say, that with the teraphim she thought to convey the prosperity of her father's house, and transfer it to her husband. Some, that she wished to remove the occasion of her father's superstitious worship, and to check his idolatry; while others conclude that both she and her sister Leah were addicted to this idolatrous superstition, and designed to continue it in the land of Canaan. But Jacob compelled all his household, without exception, to discard all false deities, the symbols of which he afterwards hid under the oak, near Shechem. Gen. xxxv. 4.

Beside these superstitious teraphim, Scripture speaks of two other kinds. The first are those which Michal put into David's bed, pretending he lay there sick. 1 Sam. xxix. 9. "And Michal took an image [teraphim] and laid it in the bed." Probably a figure of sticks, made up in haste, dressed with clothes like a great baby; or like one of those malkins which countrymen set up in the fields to fright the birds away from their corn. Michal put it into her husband's bed, to make those who were sent by her father, believe David lay there sick. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XXV.

The other teraphim mentioned in Scripture, were those the Jews consulted, without imagining that by this they abandoned the worship of the Lord. Such were the teraphim of Micah, set up in his house, to which he appointed a priest of the race of Levi; by the influence of which he flattered himself that God would bless his house, &c. Judg. xvii. 5. xviii. 14, 17, &c. It was, probably, some hieroglyphical figure, to which the superstitious attributed oracular virtue, the power of prediction. It would be rash to undertake to describe it; but we may imagine, it was not unlike the cherubim: i. e. composed of parts of several animals, a combination not existing in nature; a mere chimera; e. gr. a man with wings, having the feet of an ox, and the head of a bird; or some other figure of a like nature. [Vide CHERUBIM, Plate III. Nos. 8, 9.]

The prophet Hosea, iii. 4, 5. threatening Israel, says, "The children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim:" i. e. that during their captivity they should have no public exercise of their religion. They had indeed before, their altars, ephods, teraphim, while they paid impious adoration to the golden calves; but, after they were led into captivity beyond the Euphrates, they had no longer priests or altars, sacrifices or ephods, teraphim, golden calves, or other superstitious figures, objects of worship; from which they might receive answers, whether true or false.

Spencer

Spencer pretends (Tract. de Urim et Thummim), that the word teraphim is Chaldee, and that it is the same as seraphim, changing the Hebrew שׁ shin into ט tau, i. e. s into t, which is common. He maintains that the images of teraphim are derived originally from the Amorites, the Chaldeans, and the Syrians: He adds, that the god Seraphis of the Egyptians is the same as teraphim. It may be added, that the flying serpent called seraph, might give occasion to the naming those angels seraphim which appeared to the prophets, and which are represented as flying around the throne of God. The heathen gave such kind of likenesses to their superstitious and magical figures. We know that the abraxas, which are real talismans, or teraphim, are adorned with grotesque and compound figures, formed after a thousand manners; sometimes that of a serpent, having a radiating head: sometimes a human figure with a cock's head, the arms terminating in serpents,—which also form feet and legs to the figure. Lastly, the serpent is there represented after several manners. The god Serapis is also almost always accompanied by serpents, which wind about him. There are extant figures of Mithras, or the sun, having four wings, like the seraphim, with the head of a lion, over this is the head of a serpent, the body of which infolds the whole statue. Comp. Plate, MEDALS, &c. of PERSIA. No. 13.

All this, in my opinion, very well exhibits the teraphim. As these superstitious talismans were common to almost all the east, it is natural to think that every person obtained a representation of that deity which he thought most powerful, and favourable. The sun was worshipped by almost all the world; the serpent was one of his symbols. The sun was a beneficent deity, the god of good fortune. The Orientals generally represented him on their talismans, sometimes under one emblem, sometimes under another. The Jews, who had lived long in Egypt, always inclined to worship Egyptian gods, rather than others. Hence the worship of the golden calf, in the wilderness; and in the kingdom of Jeroboam. It is therefore probable that the teraphim of Laban, stolen by Rachel, were hieroglyphical figures and talismans, resembling those of the Syrians; that the teraphim of Micah were nearly approaching to the cherubim of Moses, or to the seraphim described by Isaiah. In a word, that these figures were by no means uniform, no more than the cherubim and seraphim described in Scripture; every one making them, or causing them to be made, according to his own fancy and devotion.

The Rabbins pretend, as R. David Kimchi, that the teraphim were not mere idols, but were idols that gave oracles, and foretold future events. Rabbi David, of Pomire, says, they had a human shape, and that, when they were once set up, and dedicated, they spoke and gave answers at certain hours, and under certain constellations, by the influence of the heavenly bodies; that this influence was communicated to them by the art of him who made them, of a certain metal, with certain characters, and under certain aspects of the stars.

Rabbi Eliezer pretends, ch. xxxvi. that the teraphim spoke. This he confirms by those words of Zechariah, x. 2. "The teraphim speak vain things." To make teraphim, according to this Rabbi, the process was—They killed a first-born child, clove his head open, sprinkled it with salt and oil, and wrote the name of some unclean spirit on a plate of gold, which plate they put under the tongue of the dead child. They set his head in a niche in a wall, where they lighted lamps, prayed to it, and asked it questions, which it answered.

This account of Eliezer has completely the air of a fable; yet Rabbi Tanchuma, and Jonathan the paraphrast, Targum in Gen. xxx. relate it in the same manner. But, as we have said, we must not confine the teraphim to one kind; the name was given to very different things, as well in matter as figure. The teraphim laid in David's bed, to render it credible that he was there himself, must have been large. Those which Hosea speaks of, as consulted by the Israelites, and those of Micah, probably represented either the cherubim of the ark of the covenant, or some superstitious figure; but nevertheless, such as the Israelites thought they might reconcile the worship of, with the worship of the Lord. The greater part of the abraxas, which were certainly a kind of talisman, or teraphim, have the name of God upon them, as Iao, Adonai, Elohim, &c.

Father Kircher, Oedip. Egypt. Synt. iv. cap. 3. and after him Cuneus, in his Republic of the Hebrews, maintain that all idolatry came from Egypt; and that the use of teraphim passed from that country into the east; for that Ham, or his son Mizraim, were the inventors of statues; of which the Egyptians had such great multitudes, that no city, village, high-way, or cross-way, was without them. They ascribed many virtues to them, especially to such as were formed under the aspects of certain stars and constellations. To them was attributed the power of foretelling future events, of revealing things concealed, of preventing evils threatened, and of procuring certain advantages—as, that of pleasing, of being lucky at play, or in trade. The Rabbins own that the word teraphim is foreign from the Hebrew tongue, whence they conclude that it is Egyptian; and the same as Serapis. Abenephius assures us, that when Abraham abode in Egypt, his domestics were tainted with this kind of idolatry, and carried it with them into Canaan; from them it passed into the family of Laban. All this is very precarious and incredible; and it would be very difficult to produce vouchers for it.

A modern author has proposed another conjecture concerning the teraphim. Jurieu, Hist. des Cultes, conceives that the teraphim, stolen by Rachel, might be the Dii Penates, the household gods of Laban. These gods which were set up in the high-ways, were also guardians of the house. Ovid says of Lariunda, mother of the gods Lares and Viales, that she brought forth two sons, who were the tutelar gods of cross-ways and of private houses:

*Fisque gravis, geminæque parit, qui compita servant,
Et vigilant nostrâ semper in æde Lares.*

OVID, Fast. lib. ii.

These lares, gods of the high-ways, were the souls of the heroes of the family, who had been deified, and were worshipped. Thus the teraphim of Laban, according to this author, were images of Noah, the restorer of mankind, and of Shem, the head of Laban's family. This, according to him, was the first institution of domestic gods. There were but two of them, and their worship was introduced quickly after the deluge. Laban does not only complain that gods, or statues, had been stolen from him, in which he put confidence, and to which he paid a religious adoration; but he complains that he was deprived of his gods: i. e. the gods of his family. Gen. xxxi. 30.

But this conjecture is not more satisfactory than the preceding. It is not credible, that the worship of the gods Lares and Penates was known in the time of Laban; and I am much in doubt, whether it were in use among the people of the east for several ages after this patriarch.

Nor is it probable that Laban would adopt as his gods the patriarchs Noah and Shem, who had been dead so little a while before: for Noah died A. M. 2006, and Shem, A. M. 2158; i. e. only 87 years before Jacob came to Laban. [For farther thoughts on the subject, see the Plate of TERAPHIM, with the article it illustrates, among the FRAGMENTS.]

TEREBINTHUS, the Turpentine Tree. Heb. תְּרֵבִינִי, Elah, or Aleh, LXX. Τερβινθος. Vulg. Terebinthus. LXX. aliquando Δρῦς, vel

Βάλανος, Quercus. Others render an oak, an elm, a chesnut tree, or, in general, a tree. Jerom is not more uniform in his translation of this word; for sometimes he renders it by quercus, or ilex, an oak. The terebinthus is a tree, the wood and bark of which resemble the lentisk tree, the leaves are like those of the ash, but a little thicker, and more glutinous. Its flower resembles that of the olive. Its fruit grows in bunches, or clusters; is hard and resinous, the size of juniper berries. A resin, or gum distils from the trunk. This tree was frequent in Judea.

The terebinthus under which Abraham entertained three angels, is very famous in antiquity. Gen. xviii. Josephus says, De Bello, lib. iv. cap. 7. that six furlongs from Hebron they shewed a very large terebinthus, which the inhabitants of the country thought to be as old as the world itself. Eusebius assures us, that in his time the terebinthus of Abraham was still to be seen, and was held in great veneration both by Christians and Gentiles, as well from respect to Abraham, as to the heavenly guests he entertained under it. Jerom says, this terebinthus was two miles from Hebron. Sozomen, Hist. lib. ii. cap. 4. places it fifteen stadia from this city; and an old itinerary puts it at two miles. These varieties might make one doubt whether the terebinthus Josephus speaks of, were the same with that of Eusebius, St. Jerom, and Sozomen.

Some ancients have pretended that this terebinthus was the staff of one of the three angels, entertained by Abraham; who fixing it in the earth, it took root and became a great tree. At the foot of this tree was an altar, on which were offered profane sacrifices; which the Emperor Constantine being informed of, wrote to Eusebius, bishop of Cæsarea, to pull down the altar, and to build an oratory in the place. Vide Socrat. Hist. lib. i. cap. 18. Euseb. de vitâ Constan. lib. iii. cap. 52.

It is said, that when this terebinthus was set on fire, the flame seized it all at once, but after the fire was extinguished, the tree was as whole and sound as before. The concourse of people, who came from all parts to visit this terebinthus, occasioned a fair to be kept here. Jerom, and others tell us, that after the war of the emperor Adrian against the Jews, a great multitude of slaves of that nation were sold here, at very low prices; and that such as could not be put off here, were carried into Egypt, or perished miserably. Sanutus, in Secret. fidel. crucis. p. 248. informs us, that the trunk of this terebinthus was in being in his time; and that some people carried carried away pieces, to which they ascribed great virtues.

The terebinthus of Jacob, where he buried the gods brought by his people from Mesopotamia, Gen. xxxv. 4. was behind the city of Shechem, and far from that where Abraham dwelt, near Hebron; yet they have been very absurdly confounded together. It is thought to be under this same terebinthus (which the Vulgate calls an oak, Josh. xxiv. 26.) that Joshua renewed the covenant with the Lord; and that Abimelech, son of Gideon, was made king by the Shechemites. Judg. ix. 16.

TERESH, תֵּרֶשׁ. See THARRA. Heir, miserable, or banished; from שָׁרַשׁ jarash. This name is Medish, or Persian; and therefore its etymology cannot be found in the Hebrew. [Sharp, severe, or austere?]

TERTIUS, Τέρτιος. A Latin word, the third.

TERTIUS, was St. Paul's amanuensis, in writing his epistle to the Romans, A. D. 58. "I Tertius, who wrote this epistle, salute you in the Lord." Rom. xvi. 22. Some think that Tertius copied this letter from the original written by St. Paul's own hand. Lightfoot, Chorograph. p. 123. conjectures that Tertius is the same as Silas, who accompanied St. Paul in some of his journeys. Silas in Hebrew signifies the same as Tertius in Latin. Some Greek editions instead of Tertius read Terentius. The Greeks keep his feast, November 10, and give him great commendations. They make him successor to Sospater in the bishopric of Iconium.

TERTULLUS, Τέρτυλλος, liar, impostor; from τερατόλογος, a teller of stories; a cheat. [q. was his true appellation Ter-Tullius, "thrice Tully," i. e. extremely eloquent;—varied by Jewish wit into Tertullus?]

TERTULLUS, an advocate who pleaded against St Paul, before Felix, governor of Judea, A. D. 58. Acts xxiv. 1—9. Some have thought Tertullus afterwards became a convert.

TESTAMENT, is commonly taken in Scripture for Covenant, and answers to the Hebrew בְּרִית Berith. The Greeks have rendered it by Διαθήκη, Diatheke. Testamentum signifies an act of the last will of a person who has death in view, who disposes of his estate, and gives orders, to be fulfilled after his decease. The word Testament is no where found in this sense, that I know of, in the Old Testament, but only in the sense of pact, or covenant. But St. Paul, Heb. ix. 15, &c. arguing about the Greek word diatheke, which signifies the testament of one who declares his last will, has these words, "And for this cause he is the mediator of the New Testament, that by means of death, for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first testament, they which are called might receive the promise of eternal inheritance. For where a testament is, there must also of necessity be the death of the testator; for a testament is of force after men are dead, otherwise it is of no strength at all while the testator liveth: whereupon neither the first testament was dedicated without blood."—Here we may observe he speaks of the old and new covenants, as of two testaments, in the sense of a person's last will. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXIX.

St. Paul speaks also of the covenant God made with Abraham, under the notion of an ordinary testament. "Brethren, I speak after the manner of men;—though it be but a man's covenant, (or testament) yet if it be confirmed, no man disannulleth, or addeth thereto." Gal. iii. 15, 17.

But in the Old and New Testament, the word testamentum generally signifies the covenant, the law, the promises. So, Exod. xxx. 26. the ark of the testament, denotes that chest, or coffer, wherein were deposited the tables of the law, of the covenant. Eccus. xlv. 30. Testamentum pacis, the covenant of peace: chap. xlvii. 13. Testamentum regni, the promise by which God engages to give the kingdom. Psalm lxxiv. 20. Respice in testamentum tuum, remember thy promises, thy covenant. Non profunabo testamentum meum, I shall not fail of performing my promises. Isaiah xiv. 13. Sedebo in monte testamenti, I will sit down upon the mountain of the temple, where the ark of the covenant is laid up. [rather on the Indian mount Meru.] Mal. iii. 1. Angelus testamenti, the Son of God, agent to the covenant. Matth. xxvi. 28. Sanguis novi testamenti, the blood that confirms the new covenant. Acts vii. 8. Dedit illi testamentum circumcisionis, God made a covenant with Abraham, enjoining circumcision on himself, and his posterity. Vide COVENANT, ad finem, also FRAGMENTS, Nos. CXXIX. The word testament is sometimes used for the law of God: Psalm xlv. 17. Iniquè non egimus in testamento tuo, we have not transgressed thy laws. And Psalm l. 16. Quare tu assumis testamentum meum per os tuum; why dost thou pronounce the words of my law? also, Psalm lxxviii. 10. Non custodierunt testamentum Dei, et in lege ejus noluerunt ambulare, they have not kept the laws of the Lord, to walk in them. Testamentum inferorum, the covenant of the grave, or that sentence pronounced against man, All must die. Comp. FRAGS. CXXIX. The Greek says, Ecclus. xiv. 12. Διαθήκη ἄδης ἐχ' ὑπεδείχθη σοι. The covenant of the God of the dead has not been shewn to you: Pluto has not informed you how long you have to live. This expression is borrowed from the religion of the Pagans; but it is easy to affix a good idea to it, by substituting the true God instead of Pluto.

Daniel says, xi. 32. that during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, מרשעים ברית יחניף, בחלקות, the wicked would dissemble with the holy covenant: Testamentum simulabunt fraudulentur: the Hebrew says, by his caresses he will induce the prevaricators of the covenant to dissemble or disguise their belief. And indeed many of the Jews renounced their religion; others dissembled, hid, their sentiments. And 2 Macc. vii. 36. Ἀεννάς ζωῆς ὑπὸ διαθήκῃ σου πεπρωκασί. Fratres mei sub testamento eterne vitæ effecti sunt, My brethren are dead in the hope of eternal life: the Greek may be translated, They are dead for the covenant that God gave them, which he has sworn to them of everlasting life.

The Orientals being fruitful in fictions, have trumped up testaments of Adam, of Noah, of Abraham, of Job, of Moses, of Solomon, and of the Twelve Patriarchs, the sons of Jacob. It is obvious how little credit is due to these things: nevertheless, we should supply the reader with some just reasons for despising them. They tell us, say, Elmacim. and Eutych. Alex. apud Fabric Apochryph. V. T. tom. ii. page 35. that Adam, a little before he died, called to him Seth, Enoch, Canan, and Mahalaleel, and bid them take his body after his death, and bury it in the middle of the earth, i. e. on mount Calvary, near Jerusalem. A Mahometan author says, that the first father made his will, and had it wrote and signed by the angel Gabriel, and sixty thousand other angels, and deposited it with the patriarch Seth, his son.

As to Noah's testament, it is pretended, Georg. Syncell. Abulpharag. Dynast. p. 9, 10. Eutych. Annal. tom. i. p. 44. that when he was nine hundred and thirty-four years of age, he made a distribution of the earth to his three sons. He gave to Ham the blacks, to Japhet the ruddy, and to Shem the brown:—[Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XX.—]that he ordered Shem to take Melchisedech with him, and to carry the coffin which contained the body of Adam to such a place as the angel of the Lord should conduct them to; which Shem did not fail to perform.

Lambecius speaks of a Greek manuscript, called The Testament of Abraham; but this is a modern work, and altogether fabulous.

In the catalogue of Apocryphal books condemned by Pope Gelasius, we read of The Testament of Job. But the best copies, instead of Job read Jacob.

St. Athanasius, in his Synopsis of Holy Scripture, with some other ancients, mentions The Testament of Moses, which was an Apocryphal book, composed, probably, by the heretics called Sethians. M. Gilbert Gaulmin quotes, in some places of his notes upon Psellus, a Greek MS. called The Testament of Solomon: but he informs us it is a bad work, fabricated by some modern Greek, who gave it the pompous name of "Solomon's Will," to recommend it.

The Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, is an Apocryphal

Apocryphal work, composed in Greek by some converted Jew, in the first or second century. Origen had seen this work, and found some good sense in it; though the Jews did not admit it into their canon. It was long unknown to the learned of Europe, and even to the Greeks. Robert Grossetête (Great-head) bishop of Lincoln, having received intelligence of it from Johan de Basingstoke, deacon of Legies, who had studied at Athens, sent for a Greek copy into England, and translated it into Latin by the assistance of Master Nicholas, a Grecian by birth, and a clergyman belonging to St. Alban's, about A. D. 1252. Afterwards, it was published in Greek, by Dr. Grabe, in his Spicilegium S. Patrum, and by M. Fabricius, in his Apocryphal books of the Old Testament. This author gives particulars of the life and death of the twelve patriarchs, whom he makes to conceive, to relate, and to foretell, whatever he thinks proper. He speaks of the destruction of Jerusalem, of the coming of the Messiah, of the actions of his life, and even of the writings of the evangelists, in a manner that can agree to none except a Christian; but very probably a convert from Judaism, still possessed with many prejudices of his nation.

TESTIMONY, Testimonium. This word is taken,

1. For the testimony, or witnessing exhibited in a court of justice, by affirming or denying something, about which a person is judicially interrogated. Scripture prohibits false testimony, in several places. Exod. xx. 16. xxiii. 1.

2. TESTIMONY is used for a monument or memorial. So, Gen. xxxi. 47, 48, 52. this heap be witness, or bear testimony. . . Jegar-sahadutha, the heap of testimony. The tribes of Israel that abode beyond Jordan, raised a kind of very high altar on the banks of that river, to serve as a testimony, or monument, of their common origin with their brethren who dwelt on this side Jordan. Josh. xxii. 27.

3. TESTIMONY is often put for the law of the Lord, because when the Lord gave it to the Israelites, he gave testimony of his presence by prodigies performed before them, and he required an oath of them, that they should continue faithful to him. Testimonium, in some sense, is equivalent to Juramentum: thus the ark is called The ark of Testimony, because it contained the tables of the law; so the Tabernacle of Testimony, because in that tent, the tables of the law were kept. In Psalm cxix. testimonies are often put for the law of the Lord, for the wonders he had performed, for the instructions he had given to his people; his statutes, judgments, ordinances, &c.

Jerom often translates the Hebrew מוֹעֵד Mohed by testimony. Thus מוֹעֵד אֱלֹהִים, Ohel mohed, tabernaculum testimonii, the tent of testimony; tabernaculum conventionis, vel cætus. But Mohed signifies more properly assembly, convention; because, at the entrance of this tent or tabernacle, the people assembled; and here Moses declared and promulgated to them the orders he had received from the Lord.

Testimony is sometimes taken, also, in the sense of praise. Acts x. 22. It is said Cornelius the centurion had a good testimony from the whole nation of the Jews, Vir justus et timens Deum, et testimonium habens ab universâ gente Judæorum. And, Acts vi. 3. Men of good testimony, Viros boni testimonii septem: persons to whom every body gives a good character. [GOOD REPORT.]

Sometimes the ark of the covenant is called absolutely, testimonium; because it included the tables of the law, or of testimony. So it is said, Aaron put an omer of manna into the testimony. Exod. xvi. 34. לפני העדות, coram testimonio. The Vulgate reads, in tabernaculo, but the Hebrew, in testimonio. In 2 Kings, xi. 12. the book of the law, or the volume which was used to be put upon the king's head on his coronation-day, is called testimonium:—Produxit filium regis, et posuit super eum diadema et testimonium. Isaiah, vii. 16. calls testimonium a writing he had drawn up by the Lord's command, containing a prophecy he had pronounced, and written in the presence of two witnesses. God bids him seal it up, till the time appointed: Liga Testimonium, signa legem, &c.

In the New Testament, Testimonium is put for that attestation which is given to the probity of any one. John i. 8. John Baptist came to bear testimony to the light; to declare that Christ was come, and to distinguish Jesus the true Messiah. John v. 31. Jesus Christ says, if he gave testimony of himself, on that account his testimony would not be true; q. d. we are not obliged to be determined by one who is judge in his own cause, and who proclaims his own qualifications: it is to be presumed he would extol himself. His heavenly Father, and his miraculous works, as well as (viva voce) John the Baptist, bear sufficient testimony to him; and their testimony ought to be esteemed of irrefragable authority. [WITNESS.]

TETRAGRAMMATON, Τετραγράμματον, Nomen quatuor literatum; or Name of four letters. Thus the name JEHOVAH is often called; which the

the Hebrews, out of respect, never pronounce : they say Adonai, or Elohim ; and when they have occasion to mention this sacred name, they call it Shein-hamphorash, i. e. The name explanatory ; the Greeks chuse rather to say Tetragrammaton, the name of four letters, י jod, ה he, ו vau, ה he ; יהוה :—which we pronounce Jehovah.

TETRAPLA of Origen. Thus Origen called his edition of the Bible ; in which he had placed, in four columns, one against another, the four versions of the Septuagint, of Aquila, of Symmachus, and of Theodotion. Tetrapla in Greek, properly signifies four-fold, or composed of four parts. See HEXAPLA.

TETRARCH, Τετράρχης, strictly taken, according to the force of the Greek, signifies a sovereign who hath a fourth part of a state, province, or kingdom, under his dominion ; without wearing the diadem, or bearing the title of king. Matt xiv. 1. Luke iii. 1, 19. ix. 7. Acts xiii. 1. A title frequent among the descendants of Herod the Great ; to whom the Roman emperors distributed his dominions at their pleasure. But the words tetrarch and tetrarchy ought not to be understood rigourously. They were occasionally given to a prince who possessed, perhaps, a half, or a third part. Often also the name of king was given to him who was but a tetrarch ; and the name of a kingdom was given to a tetrarchy.

TEXT of Scripture, is taken in several senses :

1. By way of opposition to a gloss, comment, or explication : without any respect to the language in which the text is written, whether it be the original, or a translation. For example, the text observes, that God was angry, or God repented ; and the gloss acquaints us, that this must be taken in a figurative sense ; i. e. God acted as though he had been angry, or as if he had repented ; or, it is spoken after the manner of men, &c.

2. The Text of Scripture is put in opposition to translations made from it. Thus, the Hebrew text of the Old Testament, and the Greek text of the New, are the originals, whence all translations are derived. We must have recourse to these originals to understand correctly the sense of translations, or the true import and spirit of a passage.

The original text of all the books of the Old Testament, received into the canon by the Jews, is the Hebrew. The books called Apocryphal, are in Greek : of some, this Greek is the original ; of others, it may be a translation ; but this is uncertain. However, the Greek, being the oldest version extant, is now accounted as the original. We have no certain proof that the book of Wisdom, and the second book of Maccabees, were written originally, either in Syriac, or in Hebrew. [But Dr. Buchanan found Syriac copies of the Maccabees in India : but whether translations from the Greek, deserves examination.]

The original text of the books of the New Testament is the Greek ; it is certain Matthew wrote a gospel in Hebrew. [-Syriac,] and some think Mark wrote his gospel in Latin, and St. Paul his epistle to the Romans in Latin, and his epistle to the Hebrews, in Hebrew. But as the original Hebrew of Matthew is lost, and as there are good proofs that the other books of the New Testament were written in Greek, the Greek passes for the original language of all the New Testament.

For the SAMARITAN text, see SAMARITAN.

Though it cannot be maintained that our copies of the original texts of the Old and New Testaments are at this day entirely free from faults, yet it must be admitted that they are perfectly authentic, and that the errors which by length of time, or by the negligence of transcribers, have crept into the text, are not of such consequence as to cause them to be looked on as corrupted fountains, or abate their authority. These faults are not numerous ; nor of great importance ; nor radical. If, perhaps, some date may be changed, some proper name of a person, or a city, or the like, may be altered and misspelled, these defects may be supplied, either by the assistance of ancient manuscripts, or of old translations, made before such alterations happened in the text. Some of the ancient fathers complained that the Jews had purposely corrupted several passages of the Old Testament, which they thought too favourable to Jesus Christ. But this accusation has not been well supported. The passages which they have been charged with having taken out of the Hebrew text, were probably never in it. See Jerom on Isaiah vi. Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. 10. St. August. de Civitate Dei, lib. xv. cap. 13. Justin, Dialog. cum Tryphone. Tertull. de Habitu Muliere. cap. iii. Origen. Homil. 12. in Jerem. Idem. Epist. ad Jul. Afric. Chrysost. Homil. 5. in Matth. Jerom, Gal. iii.

[It is much to the honour of the present age that a strong disposition to obtain a correct original text of Holy Scripture is very prevalent, and occupies the labours and critical skill of many learned men throughout Christendom. Our own country has its share of this honour :

the volumes of Kennicott, on the Hebrew of the Old Testament, and of Holmes on the Septuagint translation of that part of the Bible; of Mill and others, on the New Testament, are proofs, not only of the importance attached to the subject, by the judicious, but of the liberality of the age, in which works so expensive and laborious were planned and executed. Comp. BIBLE, SEPTUAGINT, &c. Nor should this article close without remark, for the satisfaction of the common reader, that considering the great antiquity of some of the books, the disadvantages of copying in a language no longer spoken, the variety of dialects, and even the similarity of dialects, it may be said, that the text is, on the whole, wonderfully correct; and very creditable to the attention and diligence of former ages.]

THADDEUS, Θαδδαῖος. Mark iii. 18. Matth. x. 3. Lebbeus. Lebbeus signifies a man of a good heart; Thaddeus, one who praises and confesses; from ידָה judah, whence תודה thodah, or thadah.

I. THADDEUS. A surname of Jude the apostle. Vide JUDE. They willingly gave him the name of Thaddeus, to drop the name Judas, and to avoid confounding him with Judas Iscariot, who for his treason was justly detested. To Thaddeus the apostle, has sometimes been imputed what only agrees with Thaddeus the disciple of Jesus Christ, of whom we shall next speak. Jerom on Matth. x. 4.

II. THADDEUS, or TATTEUS, according to Rufinus, was, as is believed, brother of St. Thomas the apostle:—(the edition of Eusebius, at Geneva, 1612, p. 28, and the Latin translation of Musculus, p. 13, read that Thaddeus was brother of St. Thomas; but neither the generality of manuscripts, nor the version of Rufinus, nor Nicephorus, mentions this,)—he was also one of the seventy disciples. Soon after our Saviour's ascension, St. Thomas sent him from Jerusalem to Edessa to king Abgarus. Jesus Christ, they tell us, had written to this prince, promising to send him one of his disciples, who should cure him of a disease he then laboured under. When Thaddeus was come to Edessa, he lodged at first with one Tobiah, where he soon became famous by miracles performed in the name of Jesus Christ. Euseb. Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. 13.

Abgarus being informed of this, concluded Thaddeus must be the same whom our Saviour had promised to send, and had him brought to him by Tobiah. Abgarus fell at his feet, and asked him if he was not the person sent to cure him; to which Thaddeus answered, Yes; that he was come to recompense him for his great faith; asking him, if he believed in Jesus Christ, and in his Father? Abgarus affirmed that he believed with his whole heart; Thaddeus then laid his hands upon him, and perfectly cured him. He did also many other miracles there, and converted the whole city. Abgarus offered him gold, but he refused it, saying, If we have abandoned our own goods, why should we take those of others? It is not known what Thaddeus did after this, nor is his memory much celebrated by the [western] church; because he has not been well distinguished from St. Jude. The Latins honour a St. Thaddeus on May 11, whom they seem to make a martyr in Asia; the Greeks commemorate him August 21: they say he died in peace at Berytus in Phœnicia, after he had there baptized many persons. Vide ABGARUS.

[Thaddeus is famous among the Syrian, and especially among the Chaldean Christians, (the latter, dropping the T, often call him Addeus)—they say he was chief of the seventy, and sent into Mesopotamia by Thomas the apostle, soon after our Lord's ascension; that he was received with great joy at Edessa, by Abgarus, all his household, and the whole city; that he healed Abgarus of his leprosy; that he had with him two disciples, (both, of the seventy,) by whose assistance he disciplined Mesopotamia, Chaldea, and all the region of the east; when grown old, he more than doubled his diligence. St. Thomas visited him, and assembled with him, before his departure for India. Thaddeus having preached twelve years, (more or less,) died May 14, and was buried in the great church at Edessa.

Of his two disciples, Agheus survived his master three years; the other, Marus, after the death of Agheus, presided over the eastern churches thirty-three years, residing chiefly at Seleucia, in Persia. These dates come down to A. D. 82. By Bar-hebræus Agheus is called a martyr; and Marus an exile.

These are the accounts of Syrian Christian historians, collected by Asseman.]

THAHASH, תחת, τόχος, that makes haste; from תחת chush: or, that keeps silence; from תחת chashah; or of the colour of hyacinth; from תחת thachash. This word also signifies an animal, whose skin was dyed of a violet or blue colour; Exod. xxv. 5. Some think it stands for the badger. See FRAGMENTS, No. CCCXCII.

THAHASH, or TACHASH, third son of Nahor and Reuma. Gen. xxii. 24. [Rough?]

THALASSA, Θάλασσα, the sea; Greek, Laosala, Laosala. Acts xxvii. 8. thick, hairy, grassy; from λάσος. A city or haven, in the south of the isle of Crete: called Laosala, or Laos.

2 O div. 2

THALCA,

THALCA, a city of Simeon, Josh. xix. 7. It is not in the Hebrew, but only in the Septuagint. Eusebius and St. Jerom speak of a place called Thala, sixteen miles from Eleutheropolis, south.

THAMAH, תמח, that blots out; or suppresses; from תמח machu: according to the Syriac, that smites. [Joy, laughter; one of the Nethinims, Ezra ii. 53. Neh. vii. 55.]

THANATH. A village ten miles from Shechem, toward the Jordan. Jerom calls it The-nath; Ptolemy also places Thena in Samaria.

[THANKSGIVING], the act of acknowledging the mercies of God. Vide PRAISE. There were various manners under the Old Testament of offering thanksgiving: sometimes it was public, sometimes in the family, or personal connections. It was frequently accompanied by sacrifices, 2 Chron. xxix. 31. and peace-offerings, or offerings of pure devotion, arising from the sentiments of gratitude in the offerer's own mind, Lev. vii. 12, 15. Psalm cvii. 23. cxvi. 7. It is usually connected with praise, joy, gladness, and the voice of melody, Isaiah li. 3. or, as Neh. xi. 17. with singing, and with honour, Rev. vii. 12. but occasionally, if not generally, with supplication, Phil. iv. 6. and with prayer, 1 Tim. ii. 3. Neh. xi. 17. For thanksgiving, we have examples in the best men in all ages, and Christ our Lord. Whoever possesses any good without giving thanks for it, deprives him who bestows that good of his glory, sets a bad example before others, and prepares a recollection severely painful for himself, when he comes in his turn to experience ingratitude. Let only that man withhold thanksgiving, who has no enjoyments for which to give thanks.]

THAPSACUS, a famous city on the Euphrates, where they passed over that river from Mesopotamia into Arabia Deserta, or back again: not far from the mouth of the Chaboras, where it enters the Euphrates. The ancient geographers have repeatedly mentioned it. It appears to us, by the course that the kings of Assyria observed in coming towards Palestine, that they must have passed the Euphrates at Thapsacus.

THARRA, Θάρρα, or THARRA, one of the two eunuchs which conspired against king Ahasuerus, discovered by Mordecai. Esth. xii. 1. [Apoc.]

THASSI, Θασοί, that sleeps, that forgets; from תשנ nashak; or תשנ, boiling; or תשנ thashi, weak, or תשנ fish, goat.

THASSI, or THASI, the surname of Simon Maccabeus. 1 Macc. ii. 3.

THAU, or TAU, ת, LXX. Σιγμα, sign. T. The last letter of the Hebrew alphabet. This, they say, had formerly the figure of X, or a cross †; — Its quidam Judaei ad Christum converti, apud Origen. Hieron. Sanct. Prado, &c. in Ezech. ix. — and indeed this may be observed on the Samaritan medals, and other ancient monuments, (vide Paleograph. Græc. D. Bernard. de Mont-fauc. lib. ii. cap. 1. p. 120, 121.) where the letter thau has very nearly this shape. The greater part of commentators think that Ezekiel, ix. 4. תתנו תימן על חזיתו וקדמו. Signa Thau super frontes virorum gentium, must be understood of the letter thau, or a cross marked on their foreheads. But why thau rather than any other letter? Some say, because this letter is the first of the word תורה, thorah, the law. The LXX. translate barely, Δὲς τὸ σημεῖον ἐπὶ τὰ μέτωπα. (Et ita Aqu. et Sym. apud Hieron. in Ezech.) Set a mark upon the foreheads of the men that sigh. The Chaldee and the Syriac understood it in the same manner. [as does Eng. Tr.]

Origen, in a Fragment printed in the Hexapla, says, Aquila and Theodotion had it thus: Put the mark thau upon the foreheads of those that sigh. But Chrysostom, Theodoret, Eusebius of Cæsarea, and other Greeks, have followed the LXX. and understood it of a particular mark put on the forehead of those persons, that they might not be confounded with the multitude doomed to death. The older Latin fathers read the same as the Septuagint.

The Samaritans were long accused of having expunged three letters out of their alphabet; but this has been cleared up, since their manuscripts have been inspected, with the ancient medals struck in Phœnicia, bordering on their country; they can now only be charged with having changed the shape of the letter thau, which Origen, and other fathers who followed him, assure us resembled a cross. Jerom, who might have seen ancient copies of the Samaritan Pentateuch, likewise informs us, that their thau had the figure of a cross. This letter at this day has quite another shape; but we know by the medals, that the thau really did resemble a cross. Is this change merely the effect of accident? of length of time? or, is it a contrivance of the Samaritans to deprive us of a reference to the prophecy of Ezekiel? I decide nothing: but, it is certain, that such changes are not frequent, except by design. If we compare the ancient Samaritan letters with the modern, there appears a much greater difference between the ancient and modern thau, than between any other letters of the same alphabet. [The learned author here bears harder on the Samaritans than they deserve: all alphabets have sustained sustained variation in the forms of their letters, during the lapse of ages.]

THEATRE, Theatrum, a place where public shows were exhibited. These buildings were in the form of a semicircle, in which the spectators beheld the games represented on the scene or stage before them; the music was placed in the orchestrum. The word theatre is found but once in the Scripture: in the tumult raised by Demetrius, the silversmith at Ephesus, "having caught Gaius and Aristarchus, men of Macedonia, Paul's companions in travel, they rushed with one accord into the theatre." Acts xix. 29. [and verse 31.] A. D. 57.

THEBES, [glittering, shining, from the Arabic.] A very famous city in Higher Egypt; capital of the Thebais. Its name is not in the Vulgate, nor is its ancient Hebrew name known. Bochart, Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 27. pretends it was the city of No-ammon, or No, mentioned Ezekiel xxx. 14. Nahum. iii. 8. Jer. xlv. 25. which has been by some translated Alexandria. But we have endeavoured to prove from Nahum, that No-ammon, rather signifies the city of Disopolis in Lower Egypt.

We shall propose the following reasons for believing that Thebes, the great Thebes, which had a hundred gates, which is celebrated in Homer, is denoted in Scripture by the name No, or Ammon-No, or No-ammon, (Vulgate, Alexandria.) Nahum iii. 8. נֹחַ-אֲמֹן No-ammon. Jer. xlv. 25. אֲמֹן נֹחַ, Ammon de No. Ezek. xxx. 14, 16. It is called only נֹחַ, No. and verse 15. חַמֹּן-נֹחַ, Hammon-No.

Nahum describes the situation of No-Ammon, or of No, the populous, the great; No signifies a habitation, and Hammon a great flock of people, a multitude of inhabitants. I cannot say whether that etymology may be admitted, which derives No-Ammon from Ham, as if it were the habitation of Ham, or Hammon. For in the Hebrew it is never written with cheth, but with aleph, or with he; not חַם Ham, or Cham; but אֲמֹן or חַמֹּן No-Hammon or No-Ammon.

Nahum thus describes the situation of No-Ammon; Art thou better than populous No, that was situate among the rivers, that had the waters round about it, whose rampart was the sea; and her wall was from the sea? Thebes, the capital of Thebais stands on [q. both sides?] of the Nile. This river is often expressed in the plural number, because of the multitude of its arms, inlets, and canals. A city so large as Thebes, having a circumference of four hundred stadia, which make thirteen leagues, with an hundred gates, full of multitudes of people, required to be well watered by canals, since the waters of the Nile could not of their own accord penetrate to all its parts, nor into its fields.

Nahum adds, that the sea was the occasion of its riches. Thebes was at a great distance from the sea; but by means of the Nile it might trade in the Mediterranean; might send merchandise thither, and take advantage of the riches of this sea, by vessels. Besides, by the name of sea the sacred authors often denote great rivers, as the Nile, and the Euphrates. Vide SEA.

Diodorus Siculus, Bibl. lib. i. observes, that the Grecians call Thebes, by the name of Diospolis, i. e. the city of Jupiter. The Septuagint do the same, in Ezekiel xxx. 14, 16. But the name Diospolis is modern, compared with the sacred authors. It was Alexander, after the conquest by the Greeks, who gave it this name. The ancient Thebes was demolished and made desolate according to the predictions of the prophet; but near it was built the city of Diospolis, or new Thebes, which was destroyed and sacked by Cornelius Gallus, see Strabo, lib. xvii. M. d'Herbelot, in his Bibliotheca Orientalis, is of opinion, that the city of Cous, in the Upper Thebais, on the Banks of the Nile, is the ancient and famous Thebes we are now speaking of. Thebais is divided into Upper, Middle, and Lower. The cities of Asouan, otherwise Syenna, that of Esna, of Coos, and of Kipthe, (the ancient Coptos), also Aksur, are in the Upper Thebais. Abdelmoel, an Arabian geographer, says, that after Grand Cairo, Coos is the largest city in Egypt. Vide AMMON-NO, ad fin. [We have thought Ammon-No might be placed near the Pyramids, where part of the rampart, extending from stream to stream of the Nile, (described by Nahum, as being from sea to sea) still exists; consequently it could not be Thebes, which is much further south. Comp. FRAGMENTS, Nos. DXLVII. &c. and Map of MEMPHIS, on Plate of EGYPT, PYRAMIDS.]

THEBET, or THEVET, a month of the Hebrews. It answers to the moon of December; the tenth month of the holy year; the fourth of the civil year. See the CALENDAR.

THEBEZ, תְּבֵז, muddy; from תְּבֵז botz, mud, boggy; or eggs, from תְּבֵז bitz; otherwise, fine linen, or silk, from תְּבֵז butz.

THEBEZ, or THEVES, a city of Ephraim, at the siege of which Abimelech, son of Gideon, was killed. Judg. ix. 50, &c. A. M. 2771, ante A. D. 1233. Eusebius says, there was a village called Thebes, thirteen miles from Shechem, towards Scythopolis.

THEFT, תְּחִיבָה. Among the Hebrews theft was not punished with death: Prov. vi. 30, 31. "Men do not despise a thief, if he steal to satisfy satisfy his soul when he is hungry. But if he be found, he shall restore seven-fold; he shall give all the substance of his house." Vide post. The Mosaic law condemned a common thief to make double restitution. Exod. xxii. 4. If he stole an ox he was to restore five-fold; if a sheep, only four-fold; Exod. xxii. 1. But if the animal stolen was found alive in his house, he only rendered the double of it. If he did not make restitution, they seized and sold his property, his house, and even himself, if he had not wherewithal to make satisfaction. Exod. xxii. 3. In the passage of Proverbs, the Wise Man seems to say, that the thief should restore seven-fold the value stolen: but seven-fold is here put for many-fold. Zaccheus declared he would restore four-fold whatever he had fraudulently acquired in his office of publican, Luke xix. 8. because the civil law condemned receivers of the public money to a four-fold restitution of their unjust gains. See ZACCHEUS.

If a thief were taken, and carried before a magistrate, he was interrogated judicially, and adjured in the name of the Lord, to confess the fact. If he persisted in denying it, and was afterwards convicted of perjury, he was condemned to death: not for the theft, but for the perjury. An accomplice, or receiver of stolen goods, was subject to the same penalty, if he did not discover the truth to the judges, when he was examined, and adjured in the name of the Lord: "If a soul sin, and hear the voice of swearing, and is a witness, whether he hath seen or known of it, if he do not utter it, then he shall bear his iniquity," Lev. v. 1. he shall undergo a capital punishment. And Solomon says, Prov. xxix. 24. "Whoso is partner with a thief, hateth his own soul; he heareth cursings, [adjurations] and betrayeth it not."

The law condemns theft; Exod. xx. 15. But there is no penalty annexed, except restitution; yet, to steal a free man, or a Hebrew, and to reduce him to servitude, was punished with death: Exod. xxi. 16. The Jews do not think that the stealing a man of any other nation deserved death, but only stealing a free Hebrew. If a stranger were stolen, the thief was only condemned to restitution. They found this distinction on Deut. xxiv. 7. which limits the law we are speaking of, Si furatus fuerit hominem de filiis Israel; an exception which the Septuagint and Oukelos have even inserted into the text of Exod. xxi. 16. The Athenian laws punished with death the plagium, i. e. the theft of a free man; and the Roman laws condemned both buyer and seller of a free man to the same punishment, if they knew his condition. Digest. 48. T. 15.

It is thought the theft of an ox was punished the more severely, because this animal is of greater use than others. The law-giver limits this law a little afterwards, saying, "If the thief be certainly found in his hands alive, whether it be ox, or ass, or sheep, he shall restore double." Exod. xxii. 4. Or, according to the Hebrew, if what he has stolen be found in his hands, he shall restore two alive for every one that he has stolen.

The night-robber might be killed with impunity in the fact; but not a thief taken stealing in the day-time. Exod. xxii. 2. It was presumed, that he who attempted to break open a house, and steal by night, had a design on the life of the person molested: and under this presumption he might be prevented and killed. But it was not so with him who stole by day: there was then opportunity of defence against such an attack; and the thief might be prosecuted before the judges, and compelled to make restitution.

The Rabbins acquaint us, that a woman convicted of theft could not be sold. A thief, say they, was never sold, unless his theft exceeded all he was worth; that, if he was worth twenty crowns, he was not sold for the theft of ten crowns: and that, a thief thus sold, was not obliged to continue in slavery longer than till his service amounted to the value stolen by him. As to the double, treble, or quadruple restitution, this was only when he was set at liberty.

It is enquired, whether the crime of theft, besides the penalty of restitution, was not subject to corporal punishment? Some believe that on certain occasions, the thief was put to death, because Jacob says to Laban, Gen. xxxi. 32. "With whomsoever thou findest thy gods, let him not live." Estius thinks, that if he were insolvent, he was corrected with rods; or even hanged, if convicted of thieving several times. But I cannot be of opinion that mere theft was punished among the Hebrews with death, or even with corporal punishment. The law only inflicts the punishment of death on plagiarism, or stealing a free man.

Solomon says, Proverbs xxix. 24. "Whoso is partner with a thief, hateth his own soul:" he subjects himself to a miserable life: not because all sorts of theft were punishable by death, but because in some cases theft was capitally punished; and besides, it exposes a man to the danger of false oaths, and perjury, on account of theft, in which case he would deserve death. Adjuramentum audit, et non indicat, says Solomon. Moses says, Lev. v. 1. "If a soul sin, and hear the voice of swearing, and be a witness, whether he hath seen or known of it; if he do not not utter it, then he shall bear his iniquity :” he shall be punished with the utmost rigour, because of his perjury, and his profanation of the name of God, by which he had been adjured. See also Prov. xxx. 9, “Lest I be poor and steal, and take the name of my God in vain.”

[Query, whether by partner with a thief is not meant a partaker, a receiver, who, as an accessory after the fact, is as bad as the thief himself? Our laws punish both equally.]

It should seem as if mere theft among the Hebrews had no particular mark of infamy annexed to it. The Wise Man, in the Proverbs, says, “Men do not despise a thief if he steal to satisfy his soul when he is hungry :” the law inflicts no peculiar punishment on him, and he is not made to undergo any shameful or ignominious penalty. Solomon adds, “But if he is found, he shall restore seven-fold, he shall give all the substance of his house.” This is the danger he is exposed to, by stealing.

[Will the passage bear this sense?—Successful speculation, if it procure riches, is not despised by the world at large; being dazzled by the success, they overlook the crime: but if he be detected, then the transgressor shall be punished with the greatest severity, even to the loss of all; substance, repute, &c. &c. his whole property. Nevertheless, we must recollect, that theft in Sparta, by the institutions of Lycurgus, was not infamous: though detection was both infamous and punishable. Nor is it now held infamous, in many parts of the East; nothing is more common than the term Haidout, robber, (i. e. formerly) annexed to the name of a soldier in the retinue of a grandee. Nevertheless, though this sense of the passage may be thought forcible enough, yet there seems to be somewhat of inadvertence in it, considering the connexion of the following verses.

I believe the error lies in mis-translating the word rendered despise, “men do not despise a thief,” but, should we rather render overlook—or pass over without punishment, the action of a thief,—then the sentiment will stand thus:—“Men do not overlook the dishonesty of a thief, but bring him to punishment for his action, though he steal when urged by hunger, and to satisfy his craving appetite. . . But whose commits adultery with a woman, has no such extremity to plead, he commits crime, not to save his life, but on the contrary, he destroys his own person,—‘a wound and dishonour shall he get’—by exciting the jealousy of the injured husband, who will not spare, nor be pacified, in the day of his vengeance—though thou givest many gifts.” This antithesis makes the sense of the passage clear and vigorous.]

Many tribes inhabiting around Judæa, made robbery a standing profession. Gen. xxvii. 40: Isaac foretold to Esau, that he should live by his sword; should maintain himself by plunder. Ishmael, son of Abraham, had no other trade than war and rapine; he was ferus homo, and juvenis sagittarius, Gen. xvi. 12, always at war with his neighbours, Gen. xxi. 20. his hand against every man, and every man’s hand against him. His posterity, the Ishmaelites, followed his example, and made no scruple to rob on the high-way. They even gloried in it, and applied to it as a sort of trade, or calling. The modern Arabs do no farther mischief to travellers, when they submit readily, and give up their whole baggage without resistance, and without giving them the trouble to alight from their horses. As soon as they perceive any one on the road, they cover the lower part of their faces, to their eyes, with their turbans, or bustmani, which hang down to their shoulders, that they may not be known. They raise their lances, and ride up full speed, exclaiming, “Deliver, you rascal! your aunt is quite naked!” Manners of the Arabians, by M. d’Arvieux, cap. 13. By these words, your aunt is naked, they mean their own wives, whom it would be ill manners to name, according to their customs; but they call them aunts of those they attack, as imagining that all men are relations. All this time they hold their lance against the breast of the poor traveller, till they have got what they can. Perhaps they may leave him a pair of drawers, or a shirt, if he surrender readily, and intreat earnestly not to be left quite naked. They may leave him his horse’s furniture, besides, because they know not what to do with it, and it may lead to a discovery. However, if the traveller’s horse have a good saddle or harness, they change with him for their own. If a passenger should stand on his defence, and should draw blood of them, they shew him no mercy; and if they cannot be revenged on him, they kill all they meet besides: so truly do they fulfil that prophecy descriptive of Ishmael, the father of the Ishmaelites, or [some tribes of] Arabians! See ARABIANS.

Scripture often speaks of troops of robbers—of Moab, of Syria, of Chaldea, of Ammon, and other nations, who practised rapine and plunder wherever they could with impunity. Jephthah, who became afterwards a general of Israel, was at first the head of such a troop of robbers, Judg. xi. 3. David and his followers, had frequent engagements with such robbers, who were near Palestine.

Palentine. 2 Sam. xii. 22. They were such people as these who pillaged Ziklag, and on whom David avenged himself after his return to that town. 1 Sam. xxx. 8, 22. Ishbosheth, son of Saul, had in his service two captains of robbers, who cut off his head while he was sleeping. 2 Sam. iv. 2. Rezin, afterwards king of Damascus, had been a leader or captain of a gang of thieves. 1 Kings xi. 23, 24. The three bands of Chaldeans who took away Job's camels, were troops of such robbers. Job i. 17.

Among these people theft was neither so odious, nor so scandalous, as among us. This appears from the heroical times, and even afterwards, among the Grecians. They did not come clandestinely when they entered a country to plunder it: it appears from Homer, that they attached a kind of glory to it, as if it were lawful conquest. They enquired coolly when a number of people came into a province, or an island, whether they came to rob, or on any other account?—"Our ancestors," says Josephus, "being content with their own country, which is very fruitful, did not apply themselves to commerce, as did the Phœnicians, who inhabit the coasts of the Mediterranean; nor to travelling, nor to war, in order to make conquests; nor to robbery and plundering, like many others; [by this he probably means the Arabians, and even the more ancient Grecians;] but they made it their business to cultivate their lands, and to breed up their children to the study of their law." Contra Appion. lib. i.

Our Saviour was fixed on the cross between two thieves. St. Luke says, xxiii. 39, 40. "One of the malefactors railed on him, saying, If thou be the Christ, save thyself and us: but the other answering, rebuked him, saying, Dost thou not fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation? and we indeed justly, for we receive the due reward of our deeds; but this man hath done nothing amiss. And he said unto Jesus, Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom; And Jesus said unto him, Verily, I say unto thee, to-day shalt thou be with me in paradise."

St Matthew, xxvii. 44. and St. Mark, xv. 32. say, in the plural number, that the two thieves insulted Jesus Christ. Some explain this by a figure of speech wherein one is spoken of as many. Others think, that both the thieves at first insulted our Saviour; but, that afterwards, the good thief, subdued by the grace and the miracles of Jesus Christ, was converted, and reprov'd his companion.—[More probably, it is a Syriacism, originating in the gospel of Matthew, in its primary state. Comp. Fragments, No. DCXLII.]

The spurious Gospel of the Infancy of Jesus Christ, which is very ancient, relates, that when our Saviour fled into Egypt, the child Jesus, the Virgin Mary, and Joseph, fell among a gang of thieves, who were assassins, except that one of these proposed to murder that holy company, but the other dissuaded him: that then the child Jesus foretold, that one day those two thieves should be fixed to crosses near himself: that one should go to paradise, and the other to hell. The first was called Titus, and the second Damachus. The Gospel of Nicodemus names one Demas, and the other Gertas. A Persian history of the Life of Christ names them Virtimus and Justinus: the author of the Flowers; or Connections, ascribed to Bede, calls them Mathe and Jock. The Oriental Christians call the good thief Laas-al-jemin, the thief on the right hand. St. Hilary, in Matth. also places the good thief on the right-hand of our Saviour, and the wicked on his left-hand. See the account in FRAGS. No. CXXXVIII. with the PLATES.

Several of the fathers have called the good thief a martyr, because of his testimony to the truth, at a time when it was abandoned by all. He was baptized, as it were, in his own blood, he died in the spirit of faith and charity, and received the favour of immediate happiness after death, as Jesus Christ assures him; "To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise." Whether by the word paradise we understand a place of rest, where the souls of the saints await the coming of the Messiah; or heaven, where the blessed enjoy eternal happiness. Several of the fathers understood it in this latter sense. Aug. Ep. 187. nov. edit. n. 5, 6, 7. Cyril. Hierosol. Cathech. 13. Chrysostom. tom. 5. Homil. 32. Encisen. Homil. 23, &c.

Marcion; as Epiphanius reports, expunged these words, "Verily, I say unto thee, to-day shalt thou be with me in paradise:" and Origen observes, that some catholics in their simplicity also obliterated them out of their copies; imagining it was a contradiction to say, that the good thief should be to-day in paradise with Jesus Christ, while the body of our Saviour lay in his tomb. Hesychius of Jerusalem observes, that some put a stop after to-day, in this manner, "Verily, I say unto thee to-day, Thou shalt be with me in paradise." But it is needless to make a change in the text; seeing it may be conveniently explained without any alteration.

The Oriental churches, the Greek, and the Latin, have thought good to pay a public veneration tion to a saint so remarkable. The churches of Syria and Mesopotamia mark his feast in their calendar on the ninth day after the passion-Friday, or Good-Friday; i. e. on the Saturday in Easter-week. Biblioth. Orient. Article Laza.

The Greek church places his festival March 28; and the Latin, March 25, agreeably to an old tradition, which affirmed, that Jesus Christ died on that day. Others have placed his feast April 8, or May 5. In some places chapels have been erected to him, by the name of St. Dimes, or Dymas.

THEFT. THIEVING. When the Israelites were quitting Egypt, they borrowed of their Egyptian neighbours of both sexes, rich garments, vessels of gold, and silver, and carried them with them into the wilderness, Exod. xi. 2, 3. "Let every man borrow of his neighbour, and every woman of her neighbour, jewels of silver, and jewels of gold. And the Lord gave the people favour in the sight of the Egyptians." It is enquired, Whether the Hebrews could lawfully borrow these things of the Egyptians, when they had no intention to restore them? and whether this was not a manifest theft and injustice? It is answered, first, that on this occasion God dispensed with that law, by which he forbade theft; or rather, that being absolute master of every thing, he transferred to the Hebrews that right which the Egyptians had to this property. The Book of Wisdom proposes another reason, which is, that God designing to recompense the Hebrews for their labourings and sufferings in Egypt, allowed them to pay themselves by their own hands, by detaining what they borrowed from the Egyptians. This way of paying one's self cannot be allowed, regularly; but under their circumstances having no other way of doing themselves justice, and being authorized by the command of God, they might have recourse to this delusion of their oppressors.

Others look on this, not as a theft, but as a fair booty, obtained in a just war. The Egyptians were enemies to the Hebrews; they had unjustly persecuted them for a long time; they had taken from them the means of defending themselves, and of recovering their liberty; the Hebrews might therefore lawfully deprive their oppressors of their goods by a wile, and stratagem, pretending to borrow, what they never intended to return.

Peter Lombard, lib. iii. Diss. 37. distinguishes between Israelites who acted in the simplicity of their hearts, and sincerely obeyed the command of God, and those who followed their own covetous desires. The first are excused from sin by the uprightness of their intentions; but, not the second, who were ready enough to rob the Egyptians, if they could with impunity, whether by craft or power, even though God had not allowed them. St. Austin reasons much in the same manner, contra Faust. lib. ii. cap. 71.

Irenæus observes, contra Hæres. lib. iv. cap. 49. that the Egyptians were indebted to the Hebrews, not only for their goods, but for their lives also, on account of benefits received from the patriarch Joseph, when they were under the greatest necessity. The Israelites were unjustly oppressed by a cruel slavery, in Egypt: the Egyptians exercised all kinds of violence against them, and overwhelmed them with calamities; rendering their lives bitter. The Hebrews had built them cities, and had very much improved the riches of their inhuman masters; who, instead of acknowledging these services, intended even to take away their lives. What injustice, therefore, could there be, if the Israelites should re-acquire a small part of that which they had procured for the Egyptians? and if they should receive a small recompense, for so many services? They came poor out of Egypt; whereas they ought to have got much riches, if they had not been reduced into an unjust servitude: and, like as a free man, who had been stolen, and sold for a slave, might, without injustice, set himself at liberty, and pay himself for his labour, by taking from his master a small reward for his service: so the Israelites, at their departure out of Egypt, might receive something as a recompense, since a great deal was due to them. [For a supposed law-suit on this subject, between the Jews and the Egyptians, vide ALEXANDER.]

[After all, this subject might be best understood by knowing who THESE Egyptians were: if it could be proved that they were recent invaders, and conquerors of the country, who by fraud or force, had seized the riches of the original Egyptians, it would appear that they themselves had no right to these riches: so that Israel did but rob a thief. The same argument may be applied to the people of Canaan: when we consider, who were the then occupant Philistines? which we suppose to be of the same race as THESE Egyptians. It was not, most probably, from the original Egyptians, that Israel obtained spoil, or property; but from those new rulers who exercised dominion over the country; the descendants of recent Hindoo tyrants. Comp. FRAGS. Nos. DXLI. DXLV. Had the Spaniards lately borrowed from their invaders, the French, would it have been robbery?

Josephus

Josephus may assist us in understanding this: He says, Antiq. ii. 9. "The Egyptians grew delicate and lazy, as to pains-taking, and gave themselves up to other pleasures, in particular to the love of gain. They also became very ill-affected towards the Hebrews, as touched with envy at their prosperity; for when they saw how the nation of the Israelites flourished, and were become eminent already in plenty of wealth, . . . they thought their increase was their own detriment. And having forgotten the benefits they had received from Joseph, particularly, the crown being now come into another family, they became very abusive to the Israelites, and contrived many ways of afflicting them," &c.; among which, no doubt, was that of impoverishing them; so that the Israelites did but regain that property of which the Egyptians had, by oppression, deprived them. The same writer says, cap. xiv. ad fin. "The Egyptians honoured the Hebrews with gifts; some in order to get them to depart quickly, others on account of their neighbourhood and friendship."]

If any one had stolen an Israelite, whether free, or not, and sold him to another, he was punishable with death: Exod. xxi. 16. Deut. xxiv. 7. The Hebrew imports, he who shall steal a man, and sell him, if he be found in his hands, shall suffer death. But we may thus understand it, with Glassius: he who shall steal a man, whether he have sold him, or he be still in his hands, he shall suffer death.

THELASAR, תלסר, Θελασσα, that unbinds and grants the suspension, or the heap; from שרר sharah, to unbind, &c. and from תלה thalah, to suspend, or from תלה thalal, heap, or mass. As this word is Medish, or Persian, we cannot find its etymology in Hebrew.

[The oath of the prince? See TELASSAR.

A city of Syria, or of Mesopotamia. 2 Kings xix. 12. written Telassar, Isaiah xxxvii. 12. Thought to be the same as Ellassar, Gen. xiv. 1, 9. The Jerusalem paraphrast has in this place Telassar. The reason of this name is unknown.—It is written by the Chaldee paraphrasts, like the Hebrew; and so the Jerusalem Targum: but Jonathan writes without the A, TELSUR.

The name Thelassar is found as a city and region of Assyria, 2 Kings xix. 12. and Isaiah xxxvii. 12. in Kings the A is inserted, in Isaiah it is omitted. Jonathan writes, Gen. xiv. 1. Alsar, without the TEL: whence we might perhaps doubt whether these are not distinct names for distinct places. Under either appellation the country intended is equally unknown, says Michaelis. As to "the children of Eden which dwelt in Telassar," that forms no distinction, as so many places which we know of were named Eden.

The Vulgate, Gen. xiv. 1. understands by Thelassar the kingdom of Pontus. The LXX. in Isaiah, read Theemath; in Kings, Twaathen. The Arabics take the el in Ellassar for an article, and omit it. It is manifest that these four kings, of which one was King of Ellasar, returned homewards by Damascus, says Abulfeda. See the MAP OF CANAAN, adapted to GENESIS.]

THEOCRACY. Θεοκρατία, the government of God.

THEOCRACY. This word is used by Josephus to express the form of government of the Jews. "Among the several nations of the world," says he, "some have chosen monarchical government, others democratical, or the government of the people; but our legislator established a form of government very different from all others, which is a Theocracy, if I may be allowed so to call it, which assigns the whole power to God, with the management of all national affairs; inspiring us with this maxim, that God sees every thing, and is the cause of all good that happens to us."

The government of the Jews, which Josephus calls a theocracy, experienced several changes. We observe, in this nation, the legislator Moses,—his successor Joshua—the Judges—the Kings, and—the High Priests. Under all these revolutions, God was indeed considered as the Monarch of Israel; but he was far from exercising his authority and jurisdiction always in the same manner.

In the time of Moses we may affirm that he governed immediately; for he revealed his will, on all emergencies, to this legislator; which was accordingly put in execution. He dwelt among his people as a king in his palace, or, in the midst of his camp; always ready to give an answer when consulted, to restrain those who transgressed his laws, to instruct those who had difficulties about the sense of his ordinances, to determine those who were in suspense about any important undertaking. This was, properly, the time of the theocracy; in the strictest sense of the term.

It was much the same under Joshua: That great man, full of the spirit of Moses, would do nothing without consulting God; at least, in affairs of consequence; though sometimes, indeed, he followed his own mind, as in the business of the Gibeonites, and that of Ai. In these happy times, when the motions of the general and soldiers were regulated by orders from God, success followed of course.

The

The Judges who succeeded Joshua were heroes, whom God raised up from time to time, for the deliverance of his people. He endued them with extraordinary strength and courage; filled them with his spirit; and often worked miracles by them, in favour of the Hebrews. Sometimes, we find a whole generation without judges, as it happened after Joshua's time;—sometimes, these interruptions were shorter: Sometimes, it was a heroine, as Deborah, whom God raised up to judge, and to deliver, his people; sometimes their valour was limited to the delivering of one tribe out of slavery, and sometimes all Israel was restored to liberty. The servitudes that took place in those times did not always extend over the whole nation. Some were confined to the country east of Jordan; as that from which Jephthah delivered his countrymen; others, to the western side of that river; others, were more general and extensive;—all were just punishments for the iniquities of the people, to whom God shewed the difference between the mildness of a father, or of a merciful God, who governs, and the cruel severity of an insulting conqueror, who enslaves. See the MAP of CANAAN, adapted to the Book of JUDGES.

The first proceedings of the Israelites, when, several years after the death of Joshua, they saw themselves oppressed by the Canaanites, plainly shew the then form of their government. Judg. i. "The children of Israel asked the Lord, saying, Who shall go up for us against the Canaanites first, to fight against them? And the Lord said, Judah shall go up; behold, I have delivered the land into his hand." Here is a true theocracy, and the exercise of the power of God, in the appointment of leaders to govern, and to command the people in his name. All the judges, in like manner, received their authority from him. When the Israelites would have given the sovereignty to Gideon for himself and his successors, he answered, "I will not reign over you, neither myself, nor my son; but the Lord shall rule over you." Judg. viii. 22, 23.

When the Israelites urged Samuel to give them a king, as all other nations round about them had kings, the prophet was exceedingly concerned at the demand; as a kind of outrage and contempt put on the majesty of God, who was their head and king. 1 Sam. viii. 5, 7. Samuel prayed to God in the bitterness of his soul; and the Lord answered him,—Hearken to the importunities of this people, for it is not you, but me, whom they reject.

At the same time he commanded Samuel to lay before them the rights and prerogatives their king would assume. We still perceive the sovereign, or royal authority of God: he grants them a king, he settles his rights; he disposes of him, and he reproves him, in his indignation, when he fails in obedience and submission. God granted them a king in his indignation, and took him away in his fury. Hosea xiii. 11.

In Deut. xvii. 14, 15, &c. Moses says to the people, foreseeing that one day they would have a king; "When thou art come into the land, and shalt say, I will set up a king over me, thou shalt in any wise set him king over thee whom the Lord thy God shall choose; one from among thy brethren shalt thou set king over thee; thou mayest not set a stranger over thee, which is not thy brother. But he shall not multiply horses to himself; neither shall he multiply wives to himself, that his heart turn not away; neither shall he greatly multiply to himself silver and gold; he shall write him a copy of this law in a book, out of that which is before the priests and Levites: And it shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life; that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, to keep all the words of this law, and these statutes, to do them; that his heart be not lifted up above his brethren, and that he turn not aside from the commandment, to the right hand, or to the left; to the end that he may prolong his days in his kingdom; he, and his children, in the midst of Israel."

Such was to be the government of the Hebrews under their kings. They were to be chosen by God, instructed by his priests, submissive to his orders, not to undertake anything of consequence without consulting him; and under such a dependence on his will that he might reject them, as he did Saul, when they neglected their duty. When God promised David to make the crown hereditary in his family, it was a departure from the fundamental maxim of the monarchy, which intended that the kings should be elective, and placed over the people by God.

It must be acknowledged that after David, the kings of Judah and Israel governed according to their own fancy; and after the schism of Rehoboam, few of these princes observed the rules of the theocracy. They would not submit to restraint, but endeavoured to cast off that happy subjection to which the Judges, and the first kings of Israel, had willingly submitted. All kinds of calamities then poured in upon them, and upon their subjects: They were delivered as a prey to their enemies; they had no peace or prosperity, at home or abroad: God visited them with a multitude of troubles, and at last dispersed them into distant countries.

Nevertheless, to remind them of their dependence, and to bring them back to their duty, the Lord sent, from time to time, prophets, full of zeal, power, and courage, who boldly upbraided them with their prevarications and impieties; and who opposed themselves, like a wall of brass, to whatever they committed contrary to the rights of God. These divine men did not only appear in the kingdom of Judah, where the public worship of Jehovah was maintained, but also in the kingdom of Israel, however schismatic and polluted that might be. Therefore we may affirm, that notwithstanding the almost general defection of these two kingdoms, God still maintained his theocracy therein, as well by his vengeance executed against wicked kings, as against that small number of good princes which obeyed his commands; as Hezekiah and Josiah; and by the prophets whom he raised up, from time to time, in the country, till the captivity of Babylon.

During the whole of this captivity, we are not to expect any certain form of government in Israel, or any regular polity. In vain the Jews pretend to find one beyond the Euphrates, either before or since Cyrus's time. We know of none that was well supported even after the return from the captivity, during the time the Hebrews of Palestine were subject to the kings of Persia; and to the Greeks, successors of Alexander. If it be asked, what then was the form of government in the Jewish nation? the reply would be—a kind of aristocracy, subordinate to the monarchy of the Persians, and to that of the Grecians afterwards. The high-priest was at the head of the principal people, whose power being limited by the sovereign authority, only extended to matters relating to the law, and religion. It was a kind of voluntary, or conventional, jurisdiction, to which the people submitted, so far as they pleased, and were countenanced by the kings to whom they were in subjection. The high-priest Jaddus received Alexander at Jerusalem, at the head of the people; but, it was because in this exigence the city was abandoned by the governors of the king of Persia; and the prosperous progress of Alexander made them connive at such a proceeding, which, without doubt, they would not have suffered on another occasion.

The Asmonean princes introduced a fifth period, which presents a new aspect of government. After the Maccabees had supported the religion of their country, with great hazard of their lives, and with extraordinary bravery, had repelled the wicked commands of Antiochus Epiphanes, they at last shook off the yoke of the kings of Syria, and, asserting their liberty, they took the title of princes of the Jews, and of kings. By consent of the people, they united the high-priesthood to the supreme authority.

Under their government we find evident traces of the theocracy; as the supreme governor was invested with the sacerdotal character; so that the kingdom was what Moses calls “a kingdom of priests.” Exod. xix. 6. or, as St. Peter speaks, 1 Epist. ii. 9. “Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood.” The royal power, and the sacerdotal, united, made a singular kind of polity, under princes entirely devoted to the service of God, instructed in his laws from their youth, and interested also by the rules of politics to support them, and to make the people observe them. They could by no possibility endure idolatry, ignorance, impiety; or those gross disorders which had prevailed under the kings. So that the commonwealth of the Jews was never more in earnest to perform the laws of God, or more exempt from those crimes upbraided by the prophets, than under the Asmonean princes. [Might not this be one reason for the suspension of prophecy?]

Under their government the Romans became masters of Judea, and established their dominion in it. They did not meddle with religion: they even left a considerable share of authority to the later princes of the Asmonean race. Herod succeeded, under the protection of the Romans, but he sacrificed every thing to his ambition and politics; and though he made an outward profession of the Jewish religion, yet he gave himself little trouble about practising it, but violated it on very many occasions. However, the priests and people continued firmly attached to it; and when Jesus Christ appeared in Palestine, external religion was in a flourishing condition. His preaching chiefly reproved the Pharisees, who, by their subtle distinctions, and refinements on the law, had obscured the true sense of it, and subverted its real intention. [These were, in a great degree, in possession of the power of the state, so far as it depended on public opinion. The Sadducees held many, if not most, of the higher offices of government.] Our Saviour exposed their hypocrisy, censured and corrected their mistakes, restored primitive piety, and gave the rules of a pure and sincere worship, in mind and in truth. See ALEXANDER, ALEXANDRA, PHARISEES, &c.

THEODOTION.

THEODOTIION. He was, according to Epiphanius, de Ponderib. et Mensur. of Sinope in Pontus; according to Irenæus, de Hæres. lib. iii. cap. 24. and Athanas. Synops. he was of Ephesus. Those who would reconcile these opinions, conceive, that he was born in Sinope, and dwelt in Ephesus. He lived under Commodus, about A. D. 175. He first professed Christianity, and was a disciple of Tatian; then he fell into the heresy of Marcion; afterwards, being at variance with the Marcionites, he took refuge in Judaism. Having learned Hebrew, he translated the Old Testament into Greek, and his translation is the third, with that of the Septuagint; that of Aquila is the second; and that of Symmachus is the fourth. Irenæus quotes Aquila and Theodotion, but says nothing of Symmachus, which gives reason to conclude that his version was not extant at that time.

Theodotion undertook his translation in opposition to the Marcionites, whom he had lately quitted. His method preserves a medium between the Septuagint and Aquila. He does not keep servilely to the words, like Aquila, nor take the latitude assumed by Symmachus, who rather paraphrased, than translated. He adhered chiefly to the LXX. says Jerom, Comment. in Ecclesiast. cap. ii. whose simple manner of translation he imitated. He studied to express the sense of the text in Greek words, answering to those of the Hebrew, as far as the genius of the two languages would allow. His version is preferred by Christians before those of Symmachus and Aquila: but the Jews prefer that of Aquila, so far as they use a Greek version: they prefer it to that of the Septuagint, because it is more literal and verbal. Hence the Talmud frequently mentions this version of Aquila, but not that of the Septuagint.

The esteem of the Hellenistical Jews for this Greek Translation, excited the jealousy of the Hebraizing Jews; who could not observe without concern that their brethren departed so much from the ancient usage of the synagogue, by reading any translation into a foreign language. They pretended that nothing ought to be read there but the Hebrew text, and the ancient Chaldee paraphrases; insomuch that all Greek versions must be excluded.—But as it was not practicable to bring back the Hellenizing Jews to languages they did not understand, this affair produced great divisions among the Jews, so that the emperors were obliged to take cognizance of them. Justinian, Novell. 146. Photii Nomocan. xii. 3. published an ordinance, yet extant among his Constitutions, permitting the Jews to read the Scriptures in their synagogues, in the Greek version of the Septuagint, in that of Aquila, or in what other version they should think fit, according to the countries wherein they dwelt. But the Jewish doctors having mostly determined otherwise, this Constitution of the emperor produced little effect; the Greek versions were excluded; and from that time the reading of the Holy Scripture has been performed in Hebrew and Chaldee; for to this day the Chaldee is retained in some synagogues; as at Franckfort, in Germany.

To return to Theodotion; the ancient Christians had so great a value for his translation, that perceiving the translation of Daniel, by the Septuagint, to be very defective, they substituted that of Theodotion, which has continued ever since. Hieron. præfat. in Version. Daniel. in præfat. ad Com. in eund. For the same reason, when Origen, in his Hexapla, was obliged to supply something that was wanting in the Septuagint, he took it from Theodotion, marking it with asterisks. Hieron. præfat. in Pent. et præfat. ad lib. Paral. et Epist. ad August. Theodotion made two translations, or rather revised his first; but they are both lost; none of it remains entire but the book of Daniel. Fragments of the rest have been collected in the Hexapla of Origen, by F. Montfaucon.

From Theodotion is received the history of Susanna, which is rejected by the Jews; but is read in Christian churches; by the Greeks and Latins, the Syrians and Egyptians. Jerom even informs us, præfat. in Dan. and in Isaiah iii. that the history of Susanna was placed before the prophecies of Daniel in the vulgar editions; Theodotion having inserted it in this order, on account of the time when it happened.

THEODOTUS, Θεόδοτος, given of God, or gift of God; from the Greek Θεός, God, and δοτός, given. A Syrian commissioner sent by Nicanor to treat of peace with Judas Maccabeus, 2 Mac. xiv. 19. A.M. 3843, ante A. D. 161.

THEOPHILUS, Θεόφιλος, friend of God; from Θεός, God, and φίλος, a friend.

THEOPHILUS, to whom the evangelist Luke addresses the books of his Gospel, and the Acts of the Apostles. Luke i. 3. Acts i. 3. It has been doubted whether Theophilus be the proper name of a person, or an appellative, or common name, which, according to its etymology, may denote any good man, or lover of God. Some, as Origen, Homil. 1. in Luc. Ambrose, in Luc. Epiphanius, Hæres. 51. Bede, Cameraarius, Hammond, in Luc. think this name to be generical, and that St. Luke designed to address his work to all who love God: but it is much more probable, that this Theophilus was a Christian, to whom the evangelist dedicated these works. And the epithet most excellent, which is given him, agrees only to a man of quality. Oecumenius concludes that he was [or had been] governor, or intendant of some province, because such had generally the title of most excellent. Others believe Theophilus to have been bishop of Antioch; but at that time, there was none of this name in that city. Grotius conjectures he might be a magistrate of Achaia, converted by St. Luke.

[It appears certain, that Theophilus had been some time a Christian before St. Luke dedicated his labours to him; and it is very possible that to him we owe St. Luke's history of the Gospel, and the Acts of the Apostles. The evangelist writes, that Theophilus "might know the certainty of those things in which he had been instructed." Did he urge St. Luke to this service? Did he employ him in it?

The title, Κρατιστες, "your excellency," though given to Felix, and to Festus, Acts xxiv. 3. xxvi. 26. does not of necessity imply a Roman appellation of honour: nor does the name Theophilus occur in Roman history, as a governor. But, this name is found among the Jewish high-priests, in a son of Annas, who was high-priest in the year when Christ was crucified. Theophilus was nominated to that office instead of his brother Jonathan, deposed by Vitellius. Joseph. Ant. xviii. xix. xx. Michaelis countenances the notion that this was St. Luke's Theophilus. That this person might be living, both at the earlier date of the gospel, and at the later date of the Acts, is possible: but, it is most likely that if this conjecture were valid, we should find a hint of it, either in St. Luke himself, or in some early Christian writer: not to insist on the little interest that could be taken by any but a convert, and of considerable standing, in the history of the propagation of Christianity among the Gentiles. We are, therefore, as much at a loss as ever, to identify this illustrious patron of the evangelist.]

THERAPEUTÆ, Θεραπευταί, servants of God. The name of a sect, described by Philo, in his book of a Contemplative Life. Many of the ancient fathers thought they were Christians; and that Philo, observing their manner of life, wished to give his nation the credit of them. They differed from the Essenes in this,—the Therapeutæ addicted themselves to contemplative life, but the Essenes to activity, though in retirement. We shall give a short account of their way of living, because it served, in a great degree, as a model to the ancient monks, both of the east and of the west.

They relinquished their estates, their parents, and sometimes their country; they fled from cities, and the concourse of men, and dwelt in the country, in separate cells, the better to preserve their solitude: but not at any great distances from one another, in order that they might defend themselves from thieves, and maintain a social intercourse. Their houses or cells were very plain, and contained nothing but what was absolutely necessary: never omitting a little oratory, destined to prayer and to exercises of piety. There were Therapeutæ in several parts, but chiefly in Egypt, about the lake Memis.

Philo describes them to this effect: "They are called Therapeutæ; and such women as adhere to these institutions are called Therapeutidæ. This name perfectly agrees with their character in both its significations, of curing, and of worshipping: For they really are physicians, not of the body, the subject of common medicine, but of the soul; the distempers of which they cure, and these are much more stubborn and difficult than those of the body. These distempers of the soul are, love of pleasure, concupiscence, discontent, fear, covetousness, profusion, injustice, and a multitude of other criminal passions. In the other sense of the word Therapeutæ, they are truly worshippers, and servants of God: that wonderful being, better than good itself, more simple than unity, and older than unity itself! They worship and serve him, according to the rules of nature, and the holy constitutions of the sacred books.

"Those who embrace this institution, do it not out of custom, to follow a fashion; or out of complaisance to those who exhort them to it; but from motives of seraphic and heavenly love, which casts them into a kind of enthusiasm, like that which seized the Bacchanals, and the Corybantes, at the celebration of their mysteries. This enthusiasm keeps possession of them till they arrive at that state of contemplation to which they aspire. Then, considering themselves as dead to the world, and thinking only on a happy immortality, they give up all their goods to their children, or relations; or, if they have none, to their friends and acquaintance. Thus, being disengaged from all incumbrance, they flee without once looking behind them, quitting brethren, children, wives, fathers, mothers, and all relations. They avoid their old friends and countrymen, that nothing may retain them, or induce them to forsake the way of life they have chosen.

"If they leave a city or habitation, it is not to seek another, like slaves who only change their masters, but not their condition. For all cities and and countries, even those governed by the best laws, are to them full of tumult and hurry, things insupportable to those who have once tasted the blessing of true wisdom.

"The greater part of the Therapeutæ reside about Alexandria, and the chief of them mostly retire to an eminence near the lake Moeris, a very secure and convenient place, where the air is salutary. Hither they come from all parts, as to their common country. Their houses here are built with the utmost simplicity; being sufficient only to defend them from cold in winter, and from the heat of the sun in summer. They are not so near each other as in cities; for that would not be agreeable to such as seek solitude; nor so far from one another, but that they may see one another sometimes, and converse about the duties of their condition, and assist one another if robbers assault them, &c.

"Each has his little oratory, which they call Semneion, or Monasterion, for meditation, and the exercises of piety. Nothing enters this sacred place that is not necessary to support the body; no furniture is seen here, except the law, the divine oracles, books of hymns, and instructions, relating to the knowledge of God, and to piety. Their mind is always filled with the presence of God; so that even when asleep their dreams terminate on the perfections and excellencies of God, and their whole discourse and reasoning regards this divine philosophy.

"They constantly pray twice a-day, morning and evening. At sun-rising, they implore the blessing of God for that day; that he would enlighten them, and warm their souls with his heavenly rays: At evening, they pray that their souls may be disengaged from sense and sensual things, that by a complete recollection of themselves they may be prepared for the discovery of truth. They have among them several ANCIENT writings by the heads of their sect; these are the documents of that allegorical knowledge which they study, and which they endeavour to imitate.

"With them temperance was esteemed the foundation of all virtues. They neither ate nor drank till after the sun was set: Some of them ate but once in three days; others once in six days. Their only food was bread, to which those who were more nice added a little salt and hyssop. They drank nothing but water; their clothes were very plain; in winter a thick gown, in summer a thinner habit. They avoided vanity in every thing, as being the daughter of lying. They prayed twice a-day, morning and evening: the rest of their time they employed in reading and meditation. Their reading was only in holy books, which they explained in an allegorical manner. They composed hymns and songs of different measures.

"On the Sabbath-day they assembled in the common oratory, divided into two parts by a wall of two or three cubits high, that the women might be parted from the men, and might hear instruction without being seen. There they sat in order, according to every one's age, with their hands hid, the right hand on the breast; and the left below. The eldest, and most knowing, stood up, and addressed them: His aspect was modest, his voice moderate, his discourse solid, but without ornament: all heard in silence, and shewed their sentiments only by signs of the head and eyes. Their chief festival was Pentecost: when they assembled, all clothed in white, to pray, and to eat together cheerfully. The feast began by prayer, after which they sat at a table, on hassocks of rushes, the women on the left hand, and the men on the right. They kept so strict a silence, that none durst draw his breath with vehemence. In the mean time some one proposed a question out of the Holy Scripture, and explained it at leisure, in a plain manner, but mystically, and allegorically.

"After this they served up their food, which was leavened bread, with salt and hyssop; with cold water for the young and robust, and warm water for the tender and aged. After the repast, they rose up together, in the middle of the room; and formed two choirs, one of men, the other of women; they sung several Canticles to the honour of God; sometimes all together, sometimes alternately; in the mean time, they danced, and seemed as if transported, complying with the sense and words of the song. Lastly, they united in one dance, in imitation of that of the Israelites at their coming out of the Red Sea. Thus they passed the whole night before the Pentecost; in the morning at sun rising, they lifted up their hands to heaven, and intreated the Lord to make known his truth to them. After which each returned into his own cell, and began his usual exercises."

Those authors who have thought the Therapeutæ to be Christians, were influenced chiefly by the following reasons. The Therapeutæ quitted their estates, brothers, children, fathers, and all their relations, to obtain leisure for contemplation, and to unite themselves the more closely to God. They had several books of the elders, and heads of their sect, wherein Scripture was explained allegorically: they were dispersed over several parts of the world: they lived in common; they had priests, deacons, virgins, monasteries, monasteries, or Semneia, a sacred and mystical table; they assembled by night, to sing hymns; they prayed towards the East; they read and explained the sacred books of the Old Testament in an allegorical manner; composed hymns, and sung them by night to the honour of God: they assembled on the seventh day to entertain one another with discourses of piety, and to pay their worship to the Lord, in common. Their churches, or places of assembling, agree with the form of the churches of the ancient Christians: The women were there separated from the men, by a wall of three cubits: they kept the fifty days, from Easter to Pentecost; their life was severe, private, retired, humble; and was passed in fasting and abstinence.

These marks agree to the Christians; and the combination of all these circumstances can agree to no other sect, Jewish, or Pagan. Philo, speaking of their holy table, expresses himself obscurely, because the primitive Christians were studious to conceal that mystery. However, what was served on this table he calls the most holy and most sacred of aliments. He says, presently after, that this holy food was leavened bread, and salt mingled with hyssop. He speaks of the privilege proper to the chief of this feast, to handle and administer these sacred things. The deacons brought the tables. The first Christians used only portable wooden tables, for the celebration of their holy mysteries. This custom subsisted in the time of St. Athanasius; and was continued in many cities and villages of Egypt, down to the fifth century, as Sozomen informs us.

Where can we find a sect, but that of the Christians, which in Philo's time was every where dispersed, as he says of the Therapeutæ? If this sect were different from that of the Christians, what is become of it? How came it to be unknown to the Apostles? If the Therapeutæ were an ancient sect of the Jews, how is it that Philo did not notice their antiquity? and why has not Josephus mentioned them? If Philo, to whom only they were known, has forbore to call them Christians, it was because at that time this name was not familiar in Egypt. The fathers who maintained that they were Christians, only knew it by tradition, or by the characters of resemblance between the doctrines and actions of the Therapeutæ, and those of the first faithful. The word monastery, applied from the beginning to the habitations of the solitary Christians in Egypt, was also known among the Therapeutæ: those cells or monasteries, standing on an eminence beyond the lake

Maris, i. e. on the mountain of Nitria; celebrated in the history of our solitaries, as well as in the description that Philo has given of the Therapeutæ, supply further proof, that the monks are the successors of the Therapeutæ, and that the habitations of these passed to the other by succession. For, is it probable, that the Jews would yield them up to the Christians, or that the Christians, who were persecuted down to the fourth century, should be able to get possession of them, under their persecutions?

Eusebius, Cassian, and the patriarch Methodius, have asserted, that St. Mark built monasteries in Egypt. It must be acknowledged, that the name and profession of monks, such as it now is, was not known in the time of the apostles; but there is reason to believe that when those ancient writers spoke of monasteries, they had in view these habitations of the Therapeutæ, built, or rather instituted, by the advice of St. Mark, bishop of Alexandria. If we should refuse to the Therapeutæ the name of monks, we cannot, however, avoid owning that they forsook all things, according to the advice of Jesus Christ, and lived in common, after the model of the first faithful at Jerusalem. And certain it is, that the monastic life soon followed after this first institution of living in common, of which there were examples before the retirement of St. Anthony, i. e. A. D. 271; because this year, when St. Anthony withdrew into the desert, he there met with an old man who professed the monastic life. Euseb. Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. 17.

Eusebius was the first among the fathers who applied to the Christians what Philo had delivered concerning the Therapeutæ. Jerom, de Scriptoribus Eccles. in Marco, has followed Eusebius: Epiphanius, Hæres. xxix. went still farther, and thought that all which Philo has said, not only of the Therapeutæ, but also of the Essenes, whom he calls, Jesseans, is to be understood of the Christians. Cassian, at the end of his Prologue to the Institutes, lib. ii. cap. 5. affirms, that the monasteries of the Christians in Egypt were founded even in the apostolical times, and by St. Mark himself. Sozomen, lib. ii. cap. 18. believes that the Therapeutæ of Philo were Jews, converted to the faith of Christ, with whom originated that solitary life which afterwards became so much in vogue in Egypt. Photius, 104, 105, acknowledges, that the monasteries of the Therapeutæ, and the life led there, became a pattern to the monks. He takes notice, that some were of opinion that Philo had embraced Christianity, and and that at Rome, becoming acquainted with St. Peter, he wrote the eulogium of the first Christians of Egypt, the disciples of St. Mark, the pupil of that apostle, and his successor in the chair of Alexandria.

Therefore the Christianity of the Therapeutæ is founded on the authority, and testimony, of several of the ancient fathers; on the agreement of times and places; and on the characters, and lives of the Therapeutæ, compared with the manners of the first Christians; and it appears to have been a prevailing opinion in the church, for several ages, though of late it has been questioned.

The following are some of the reasons advanced to the contrary.

It is said, that all authors who have spoken of the Christianity of the Therapeutæ have only copied Eusebius; they have taken his foundation, his testimony and authority, and have had no grounds for what they have advanced, beyond what we read in Philo. But the whole of what Philo has said will not amount to a proof, that the Therapeutæ were Christians. It may be very well understood of some sect of the Jews, more zealous and more pure as to opinions and practices, than the generality of that nation. The austerities, the silence, the retirement, the contempt of riches, that continence which obtained among them, are not indubitable marks of the Christian profession. Among the Heathen some lived retired, disinterested, austere, continent. All the Therapeutæ did not bind themselves to celibacy and virginity: it was only those whose wives and children declined to follow the same state of life. The vespers, the observation of the Sabbath, and of the day of Pentecost; the hymns, and the allegorical explanations, are more in the character of Jews than of Christians. Deacons, or ministers, are found in the Hebrew assemblies, and synagogues. The mystical repast of leavened bread, and of salt mingled with hyssop, cannot be the Eucharist; in which always wine, and never salt, or hyssop, was used. And what Philo adds, that this repast, or table, was instituted as a respectful memorial of the holy table, in the first apartment of the temple, on which only unleavened bread was placed, with pure salt, concurs to prove that this was a mere Jewish ceremony.

The word Monastery, or Semneion, cannot easily impose on any one. The ancient monks might have borrowed this term from the Therapeutæ, as well as many other practices, just as the Christian church has adopted many Jewish terms, and customs; yet we are not to conclude that she has adopted their sentiments also.

To the general reflections, derived from the agreement between the Therapeutæ and the Christians, it may be answered, that they are not sufficient to prove the Therapeutæ to have been Christians: we must discover some character among them peculiar to Christians, and which cannot agree to the description, or practice of any other religion: for example, either the name of Christ, some doctrine, or some opinion, derivable only from Christ; some peculiar practice, which cannot be common with the practices of another religion.

As to what is suggested, that all these marks centering in the Therapeutæ agree only with Christians, this may be disputed. For, though such concurrence of tokens is specious and imposing, yet if each, taken by itself, be doubtful and equivocal, it is impossible that when united they can constitute a decisive proof. Besides, this conformity between Christianity and Therapeutæism becomes insufficient in proof that the Therapeutæ were truly Christians, when it is found that they differ in important articles. For example, the Therapeutæ forsook their country, their estates, and relations, and retired into solitude; certainly this does not agree to Christians generally; not even to the primitive Christians, who lived together in cities, in their own houses, with their kindred, their wives, and their children. The custom of abandoning cities, and retiring into wildernesses, did not obtain among Christians, till long after Philo; and when the Therapeutæ were no more heard of.

Philo says that the Therapeutæ were dispersed into several parts of the earth; but especially that they were numerous in Egypt. Can this describe the Christians, who, as every one knows, were in much greater numbers in Palestine, and in Syria, than in Egypt, in the time Philo? Besides, how could Philo, who was certainly a strict Jew, give such commendations to the Therapeutæ if they had been Christians, seeing that the Christians were every where hated by the Jews?

The Therapeutæ studied the Holy Scriptures, and such writings as their ANCESTORS HAD LEFT THEM, concerning the allegorical manner of explanation. This agrees better to the Jews of Egypt than to the Christians, who in the time of Philo were just beginning, and had no [ANCESTORS, no] ancient books, or allegorical writings; and who never applied themselves to this kind of study; whereas, on the contrary, it was much in fashion among the Jews of Egypt; and Philo himself was a great proficient proficient in it. The dances and motions, with which the Therapeutæ concluded their assemblies, hardly seem agreeable to that simplicity which was a distinguishing character of the first believers in Christ.

From what we have said concerning the Therapeutæ, (which is the substance of the arguments pro and con) we may, I think, fairly conclude, that their Christianity is very doubtful, and problematical. The reader may consult, for his farther satisfaction, Philo, De Vitâ Contemplativâ; Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. 27. Jerom, Of Illustrious Men, cap. 8. Epiphanius, Hæres. xxix. cap. 5. Cassian, Institut. lib. ii. cap. 5. Sozomen, lib. i. cap. 12. F. Montfaucon, in his Observations on Philo's Book Of the Contemplative Life, &c.

[That there were many more sects among the Jews than we read of in the Gospels, is certain, and is confirmed by what we now know of the formation of John the Baptist's disciples as a sect; which is still subsisting. Comp. FRAGS. Nos. DCIX. et seq. To these the Essenes bear considerable resemblance, and the Therapeutæ no less. The differences between them are no more than might be accounted for by considering the difference of country, and allowing for the opinions or prejudices of some leading man, in the first instance, to which his followers conformed. Christianity was certainly thought by the Romans, and others, to be a similar sect: and whether the monastic institutions already extant in Egypt, might not facilitate the establishment of Christian retirements of a like kind, admits of little doubt. Is there any reference to such sects in the words of our Lord, "Whoever is not ready to forsake houses, lands, father, mother, wife, children, &c. (as the Therapeutæ did; whoever cannot equal them in resignation) is not worthy of me?" Matt. x. 37.]

THERMUTHIS. This name Josephus gives to the daughter of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, who took Moses out of the river Nile, and adopted him. Scripture does not record her name: others call her Pharia, Syncell. Chronol. p. 120.

THESSALONICA, Θεσσαλονίκη, victory over the Thessalonians.

THESSALONICA, a famous city in Macedonia, and capital of that kingdom, standing on the Thermaick sea. Stephen of Byzantium says, it was improved and beautified by Philip king of Macedon, and called Thessalonica, in memory of his victory over the Thessalonians. Its more ancient name was Therma: but Strabo, and others affirm, that it was named from Thessalonica the wife of Cassander, and daughter of Philip. Here dwelt a number of Jews, who had established a synagogue, Acts xvii. St. Paul came hither A. D. 52, and here he preached to the congregation out of the Scriptures, three Sabbath days successively. Some Jews were converted; also many Gentiles who feared God, and some women of quality. But the rest of the Jews inflamed by false zeal, raised a tumult and surrounded the house of Jason, intending to seize Paul and Silas, who lodged there, and to take them before the magistrates. But finding neither Paul nor Silas, they laid hold of Jason, and others. However, Jason and the rest, giving bail, were set at liberty; and the same night the brethren conducted Paul and Silas out of the city, towards Berea.

[Thessalonica was not so properly the capital of all Macedonia, as of the second part of Macedonia. The capital of the first part was Amphipolis, of the second part Thessalonica, of the third part Pella, and of the fourth part, Pelagonia. But several changes took place subsequently.

Thessalonica, says Mr. Stuart, (Ruins of Athens, vol. iii. p. 53.) was said to contain 100,000 inhabitants. It is a large and populous city. In the plague which broke out while Mr. Stuart was there, 1751, it was said 30,000 persons perished; and it is remarkable, that Dr. E. D. CLARKE, though intent on exploring this city, because among the earliest visited by the Gospel, was under the necessity of relinquishing his purpose: some parts of it being strongly infected with the pestilence, then raging.]

THESSALONIANS, Christians of Thessalonica. St. Paul being obliged to quit Thessalonica, retired to Berea, where he left Timothy and Silas, to confirm the churches of Macedonia. From thence he went to Athens, and from Athens to Corinth, where, after some months, Silas and Timothy came to him, and reported the state of the church at Thessalonica; which continued in the faith, notwithstanding persecutions and sufferings. They informed him also, of some among them who afflicted themselves too much on account of the death of their relations, and who were not sufficiently instructed concerning the coming of our Lord, and the last judgment. They added, that some among these Christians were vain, inquisitive, and restless.

St. Paul therefore wrote to this church about the end of A. D. 52, or early in A. D. 53, and this first epistle to the Thessalonians is the first in order of time of all St. Paul's epistles. The ancient Greek subscriptions, the Latin inscriptions, the Syriac, the Arabic, the Coptic, Theodoret, and Athanasius, think it was written from from Athens. But, our more skilful critics maintain, and the series of the history of St. Paul's journeys sufficiently shews, that it was sent from Corinth. The apostle instructs them concerning the last judgment, and about the manner, and the measure, wherewith Christians should be afflicted for the death of their relations. He expresses much affection and tenderness for them; with an earnest desire of coming to see them. He reproves them with much mildness and prudence, intermingling strokes of praise, and marks of tenderness, with his reprehensions.

The second Epistle to the Thessalonians was written from Corinth, a little time after the first, about the beginning of A. D. 53. In this St. Paul cautions the Thessalonians against misapprehensions occasioned by a false interpretation of a passage in his former epistle, as if he had said, that the day of the Lord was at hand. He exhorts them to continue steadfast in the doctrine and traditions he had taught them; and to suffer with constancy under persecution. He reproves more vehemently than before, those who lived in idleness and vain curiosity; he directs them to notice such people, and separate from them, that at least they might be ashamed of their trifling; and reform it. He signs the letter with his own hand, and desires them to mark it well, that they might not be imposed on by supposititious letters, written in his name: [by which, perhaps, they had formerly been deceived. See chap. ii. 2. This supposes that they were competently acquainted with his hand-writing. But others think that the mark of authenticity is what follows:—"which is the token in every epistle, so I write The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, be with you all. Amen." Hence it is inferred, that the forged epistles had not this apostolical benediction; and that the reference to this "token in every epistle," implies that the writer had already written several epistles.]

Some ancients thought this epistle to have been sent from Athens; others that it was written from Rome; or from Laodicea; but there is no good proof for any of these opinions. Grotius imagined it to have been written long before the first to the Thessalonians, and that it was directed to Jason the Jew, kinsman to Silas and Timothy, and to other Judaizing Christians, who had withdrawn from Syria and Palestine, after the persecution at the death of Stephen; and were now at Thessalonica. He fixes the epoch of this epistle in the second year of Caius Cæsar. The confutation of this opinion may be seen in Bochart's letter to M. de Sarrau, VOL. II. PART XXIX. Edit. IV.

THEUDAS, Θεῦδας, or THEODAS, given of God, or the gift of God; from Θεός, God; and δίδωμι, I give.

I. THEUDAS, or THEODAS. Gamaliel, Acts v. 36. says, A. D. 33, that one Theudas set himself up some time before for some great person: about four hundred men joined him; but he was killed; all that believed him were dispersed; and the party came to nothing. Usher thinks this Theudas is the same as Judas, who revolted at the death of Herod, mentioned by Josephus. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 12. Anno J.C. 1. ante A. D. 5.

II. THEUDAS, an impostor, who appeared in Judea, in the time of Cuspius Fadus, the governor. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 2. A. D. 45. This man pretended to be a prophet, and inspired. He deceived many Jews, persuading them to forsake all, and to follow him to Jordan: which they should pass over dry-shod, as Joshua had done anciently. Fadus sent some troops of horse after them, who killed and took many, and brought Theudas's head to Jerusalem. This Theudas is much later than he who is mentioned by Gamaliel, Acts v. 36. For that had happened before A. D. 33. whereas the defeat of this Theudas, did not happen till A. D. 45. Notwithstanding this, several have confounded these two Theudases.

[We ought not to pass this, without observing how many assumed the character of Divine agent, and how readily they found followers, about this time.]

THIGH. When Abraham sent his servant Eliezer to seek a wife for his son Isaac, Gen. xxiv. he said to him, "Put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh, and I will make thee swear by the Lord, the God of the heaven, and the God of the earth, that thou shalt not take a wife unto my son of the daughters of the Canaanites among whom I dwell." Jacob, on his death-bed, says the same to his son Joseph, Gen. xlvii. 29. "If now I have found grace in thy sight, put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh, and deal kindly and truly with me, and bury me not, I pray thee, in Egypt." After these instances, we do not perceive that the Jews used this ceremony in their oaths, or abjurations.

We are ignorant of the motives of this ceremony; and the conjectures of commentators are little satisfactory. The Jews think that in this action, the patriarchs intended an oath by their circumcision, which was then the symbol of the true religion. Chaldaei Interpr. & Hebraei 2 Q div. 2 apud apud Hieron. qu. Hebr. in Gen. Others think, they meant to swear by the Messiah, who, according to the language of the Jews, was to proceed out of the thigh, or loins of the patriarchs. Josephus says, Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 24. that this practice was retained in his time; and we are assured that the modern Jews retain this manner of swearing.

"The souls that came out of the loins, or thigh, of Jacob." Gen. xlv. 26. i. e. the persons who proceeded immediately from him, or mediately, by his sons and daughters. This way of expression is very common in Scripture.

The Jews wore their swords on the thigh: "Gird thy sword on thy thigh." Ps. xlv. 3. And Cant. iii. 8. each of them having his sword on his thigh.

To strike upon the thigh was a mark of consternation, of great affliction: After I was instructed, "I smote on my thigh." Jer. xxxi. 19. And Ezekiel xxi. 12. Clama & ulula ——— quia gladio traditi sunt, idcirco plaude super femur.

In Judges, xv. 8. it is observable, that Samson caused so many misfortunes to the Philistines; that they put their leg upon their thigh: Ita ut stupentes suram femori imponent; they remained struck with astonishment, and lost all resolution: holding their legs upon their thighs, or, bringing the calf of their leg against their thigh, they expressed their surprize. The Hebrew has it, he struck their thigh against their leg, or their thigh and leg together; he beat them back and belly, he routed them horse and foot, the run-aways as well as those who resisted, or, he smote them hip and thigh, as we should say in our language; he cut off both legs and arms. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXLIII.

THIMNATHAH, תִּמְנָתָה, or Thamnithica, image, or figure; from תִּמְנָת mun; or, numbering; from מִנָּה monah: or, established, constituted, according to the Syriac. [A City of Dan, Josh. xix. 43. occupied by the Philistines. Judges xiv. 1. It must be distinguished from the Timnath of Judah, Gen. xxxviii. 12. Josh. xv. 10, 57. 2 Chr. xxviii. 18. The name seems to denote a portion cut off; and with the ת, emphatic, a great portion. Comp. Josh. xix. 50. Judges ii. 9.]

[THIRST, is a painful, natural sensation, occasioned by the absence of moistening liquors from the stomach: the seat of this pain is usually in the throat.

Thirst being accompanied by vehement desire, the term is sometimes used in Scripture in a moral sense, for a mental desire; as Jer. ii. 25. "Withhold thy throat from thirst; but thou saidst, I have loved strangers, and after them will I go." In other words, "I desire the commission of sin—I thirst for criminal indulgence." And Matth. v. 6. "Blessed are they who hunger and thirst after righteousness."—Psalm xlii. 2. "My soul thirsteth for God:" The same figure is employed in the discourse of our Lord with the woman of Samaria; "whosoever drinketh of the water which I shall give him shall never thirst," &c. an allusion which the woman mistook as if intended of natural water, drawn from some spring possessing peculiar properties.]

THISBE, the country of Tbbit, Tob. i. 2. Εκ Θισβης. It was to the right-hand, i. e. south of the city of Kadesh, the capital of Naphtali. Some have thought that Elijah the Tishbite, was a native of the city of Thisbe in Galilee, but that he had been for a long time an inhabitant of the country of Gilead: "Elijah the Tishbite, who was of the inhabitants of Gilead." 1 Kings xvii. 1. Reiland, Palæst. tom. ii. p. 1035.

THOMAS, the apostle, Matt. x. 3. called in Greek, Didymus, i. e. a twin. John xx. 24. The Hebrew, תָּמָר Tham, signifies also a twin. Eusebius, lib. i. cap. 13. seems to say that he was also called Jude, when he relates that Jude, otherwise called Thomas, sent Thaddeus, the disciple, to king Abgarus. See THADDEUS. Some editions of Eusebius call this Thaddeus the brother of Thomas. No doubt but St. Thomas was a Galilean, as well as the other apostles; but the place of his birth, and the circumstances of his vocation, are unknown. He was appointed an apostle A. D. 31, Luke vi. 13, 14, 15. and continued to follow our Saviour during the three years of his preaching. We know no particulars of his life, till A. D. 33, a little before the passion of our Saviour; when Jesus intending to go to Judea, to raise Lazarus, Thomas said to the rest, "Let us also go, that we may die with him, John xi. 16. q. d. Let us die with Lazarus; or, Let us die with Jesus Christ; for interpreters take it in both senses. St. Thomas meant, that by going to Judea they should be exposed to certain death; for he knew the hatred and malice of the Jews against his master. Some explain these words, as if he intended to encourage the apostles to this resolution; others understand them as a token of fear. Chrysost. in Joan. Hom. 61. p. 393.

At the Last Supper, John xiv. 5, 6. St. Thomas asked Jesus Christ whither he was going, and what way? Our Saviour answered, "I am the way, and the truth, and the life." After the resurrection, when Christ appeared to his apostles, in the absence of St. Thomas, he so far far expressed his disbelief in what they assured him of, as to tell them, "Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe," John xx. 19—29. Eight days after, Jesus appeared to the apostles,—[Comp. FRAGS. No. DCXXII.] Thomas being with them. Then having both seen and touched him, he no longer doubted, but cried out, "My Lord, and my God." It is the common opinion of the Fathers that he touched him; but the gospel does not mention that circumstance explicitly. Jesus said to him, "Thomas, because thou hast seen, thou hast believed: Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." A few days after, when St. Thomas and some other disciples went a fishing, on the sea of Galilee, Jesus appeared to them, caused them to take a very great draught of fishes, manifested himself to them, and dined with them.

Tradition says, that in the distribution of the apostles to the several parts of the world, to preach the gospel, the country of the Parthians was allotted to St. Thomas. It is added, that he preached to the Medes, the Persians, the Caramanians, the Hircanians, the Bactrians, and to the Magians, people which then composed the empire of the Parthians. The author of the Imperfect Work on St. Matthew, says, that being arrived at the country wherein the Magi were still living, who came to worship Jesus Christ at Bethlehem, he baptized them, and employed them in preaching the gospel. Several of the Fathers, (Greg. Naz. Orat. 25. Jerom, Ep. 148. Ambros. in Psal. xlv. Paulinus, carm. 26. alii plures) inform us, that he preached in the Indies; others, that he preached in Ethiopia. See Chrysost. tom. vi. Append. Homil. 31. [This Ethiopia is the original land of Cush, near the Caspian Sea; Vide CUSH III. and the name of India has been given to the countries adjacent, forming part of the Parthian empire: but see below.]

We have no certain history of St. Thomas and his course of preaching. It was read in some apocryphal books, in great esteem among the Manichees, that this saint having received a blow from a certain person, he cursed him, on which the man was devoured by a lion. This story is read in Abdias, and St. Austin speaks of it in several places, but he rejects it, and the books that contain it, as apocryphal and of no authority. Aug. lib. i. cap. 20. de Serm. Domini in monte. in Adimant. cap. 17. in Faust. lib. xxii. cap. 79. Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. lib. iv. reports, out of Heracleon, a Valentinian heretic, that St. Thomas did not suffer martyrdom; but other Fathers expressly mention, that he died by the hands of infidels. It is thought he died at Calamine, in India, from whence his body was brought to Edessa, where he was always honoured. The Portuguese pretend, that this saint suffered martyrdom at Maliapur in the Indies, and that in this city is an ancient inscription, which says he was pierced by a lance, at the foot of a cross, near this city; that his body was there found in the later ages, and carried to Goa, where he is held in veneration.

To this is opposed the tradition of the Greeks, the esteem shewn by the Edessenians to the body of St. Thomas, the testimonies of the Fathers, and the martyrologies, which have mentioned the body, and remains, of St. Thomas many ages before this pretended discovery at Maliapur in India: lastly, it is maintained, that no good proof can be given that Calamine is the same as Maliapur. The martyrologies notice the death of St. Thomas, or his translation to Edessa, December 21, which is his festival in the west: but the Greeks place it October 6. The Martyrology of Jerom sets down a festival of this saint June 3, and his death February 9.

Several apocryphal works have been imputed to St. Thomas: as, his Acts, his Voyages, his Gospel, an Apocalypse; these have been condemned by Pope Gelasius. Abdias speaks of a book which contained the voyage of St. Thomas to the Indies, and his actions there. We find the Acts of St. Thomas in Greek manuscripts, in several libraries, The spurious gospel of St. Thomas was composed by Thomas a disciple of Manes; Cyrill. Cathech. 6. and this gospel was probably the same as that of the Infancy of Jesus. It is cited out of his Acts, that he baptized not with water, but with oil; i. e. he added unction to water baptism: which was also imitated by the Manichees.

There are Christians in the East Indies, which bear the name of St. Thomas, because they report that St. Thomas preached the gospel there. They dwell in a peninsula of the Indus, on this side the gulph. There are also many in the kingdom of Cranganor, and in neighbouring places; as also at Negapatam, at Meliapur, at Engamar, beyond Cochin, where their archbishop resides, who acknowledges the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Babylon. It is said that the first Christians of the Indies, converted by St. Thomas, relapsed into their former infidelity, and so far forgot the instructions they had received from this apostle, that they did not so much as remember there had ever been any Christians in their country: so that a certain holy man, called Mar-Thome, or lord [rather Mr. or Dr.] Thomas, a Syrian, went to carry them the light of the gospel. He converted a great number of the people, with the assistance of some priests from Syria and Egypt, whom he invited thither. The Christians of St. Thomas are infected with several errors, but chiefly with Nestorianism: and I incline to believe, that they derived the name of Christians of St. Thomas only from this Mar-Thome, their apostle, just mentioned. [We have had accounts from these Syrian Christians by means of Dr. BUCHANAN's visit to them, so lately as 1807. It appears that the number of their churches is about two hundred; that they continued till lately to receive their bishops from Antioch; but, that see being now nearly extinct, a native from among themselves is their present bishop. They use the Syrian language in their public worship, but the Malabar is their vernacular tongue. They have ancient MSS. among them. Some of which have been brought to England. See SYRIAN CHURCHES. Add.]

[The uniform tradition and testimony of the Syrian writers, as collected by Asseman, forms a body of evidence on this subject which it is very difficult to resist; and it may be admitted, on their authority, that much of the East was evangelized by St. Thomas, either in person, or under his direction. He travelled very far east; and it can hardly be supposed that the Syrians would introduce into their public worship, commemorations of St. Thomas, with thanksgivings to God for his zeal and example, unless their ecclesiastics who composed such [ancient?] ritual, thought themselves warranted by facts. There remains, however, the question, what countries they intended by the terms they use? When they speak of China, it does not implicitly follow that they mean the country we now call China; and certainly not in its whole extent. It appears to be prudent to restrict the evangelical labours of this apostle to the peninsula of India; yet, without denying that he might in some excursion, by sea or land, touch on some part of the Chinese empire. Here he might first plant the Gospel; but he returned to his residence in India.

The evidence in behalf of the Malabar Christians, as disciples of St. Thomas, greatly preponderates: it is affirmed, by the eastern writers, without hesitation, or contradiction; and it is no less general and constant among these people themselves. The confusion occasioned by the revival, under a second Thomas, should not be allowed to invalidate the evidence that Many have affirmed, that St. Thomas preached in China. This opinion is founded on the Breviary of the Syrians, where we read, By St. Thomas the error of idolatry was subdued in India; by St. Thomas the Chinese and Æthiopians were converted to the knowledge of the truth: by St. Thomas the kingdom of heaven has taken wing, and penetrated as far as China: [and again, By the blessed St. Thomas the illumination of the life-giving doctrine arose on all the Hindoos. By the blessed St. Thomas, the kingdom of heaven was extended and opened to the Chinese. And again, The Hindoos, the Chinese, the Persians, and other [eastern] regions; they of Syria, Armenia, Greece and Rome, offer memorials of celebration to the sacred name of Thomas.] Assem. vol. iii. P. ii. p. 516. See Yeates's Indian Church History, passim.] Hence they pretend that he went beyond India; where he suffered martyrdom, according to the tradition of the churches of Malabar.

It is certain that the knowledge of the Christian religion is ancient in China. In a collection of canons we find one that speaks of the metropolitans of China. The two Arabians, whose travels have been published, (Ancient Accounts of the Indies, translated from the Arabic. Paris 1718, pages 13, 146.) own that the king of China had some knowledge of Jesus Christ and his apostles. They say, that in their journey they passed through Bezomna, that is to say, the church of St. Thomas. Yet father Couplet has often testified, that the histories of China make no mention of the preaching of Christianity in China.

THOR, TOR, or TOUR, a little town or port on the Red Sea, west of mount Sinai, from which it is distant about fifty miles. Half a league from Thor they shew a garden, wherein are twelve fountains, and several palm-trees: It is thought this is the Elim, of Exod. xv. 27. "where were twelve wells of water, and threescore and ten palm-trees." The twelve wells are there, but they are become bitter; and the threescore and ten palm-trees are multiplied into more than two thousand. I do not know that Thor is mentioned in Scripture. Thor, Al-thor, or Al-tour is the Arabian name of mount Sinai, i. e. the Mountain: by way of excellence. [Is Thor the Shur, or Sar, of Gen. xxv. 10. Exod. xv. 22? its situation is perfectly coincident.]

THORNS. The crown of thorns, with which our Saviour was crowned at his passion, has much exercised learned men. Thomas Bartholine has a dissertation on this subject, printed with his treatise on the cross of our Saviour.

All

All the evangelists expressly notice that our Saviour was crowned with thorns: But they do not say what kind of thorn, nor with what intent he was thus crowned. There is great likelihood that it was to insult him, and to mock his pretended royalty. To add pain to their insult, the soldiers chose thorns, to tear and wound his head. Christus Jesus qualem, oro te, sertum pro utroque sexu subiit? . . . Certe præter figuram contumelia in promptu est, & turpitudine, & dedecoratio, & his amplexa sævitia, quæ tunc Domini tempora & fœdaverunt & laurinauerunt. Tertulian, de Corona Militis.

But what kind of thorn did the soldiers choose for their purposes? It is generally answered, that of the Rubus, which bears a small fruit called sloes; its blossoms are white, and it brings forth thorns with its leaves. Some believe, that, as in Judea, the thorns were in blossom at that season, the soldiers chose those branches on purpose, to make him a garland or crown of flowers, which being full of thorns, might at the same time add pain to insult.

Others observe, that in Palestine, and especially about Jerusalem, the thorns above-mentioned are now not to be found; but only the Rhamnus, or buck-thorn. Therefore, there is great probability that the soldiers took this thorn, which was at hand; and that the evangelists intended nothing else, by the general name of thorn. Bellon, Observat. lib. ii. cap. 88. Vide Jerom, Abacuc. iii. Gretzer, de Cruce, lib. i. cap. 12.

Some are for the Acacia, because this tree is called thorn; in Greek, Acanthe, without any addition.

Others have declared for the white thorn, or hawthorn, which is a common shrub, and has stiff and hard prickles. Its blossoms are white and odoriferous. Marcel, Empiric. cap. 23.

The sea-rush or Juncus Marinus has also had its partizans. Hugo Cardin. in Joan. Tolet. Perrer. alii. Durand. Divin. Offic. lib. vi. cap. 17. It is armed with a very sharp point at the end.

But great numbers are against this opinion, as contrary to the text of the evangelists, who mention thorns, and not the sea-rush; which besides, was not proper for the soldiers' design, because it has but one prickle at its end. Bartholin, Dissert. de Spinea Coronâ, concurs against the Juncus Marinus. He quotes Delrio, who said he often examined the holy crown, which is kept at Paris, and had seen others in other places, both in Spain, Flanders, and elsewhere, which were always the buck-thorn; or, a large round thorn.

It is also disputed, whether our Saviour wore his crown of thorns, when on the cross, or whether it was taken from him with his clothes. Opinions are divided on this, and it is impossible to reconcile them, as the sacred writers have said nothing on the matter. Nor has ancient history informed us of the manner in which the holy crown has been preserved, and handed down to us. It is also very difficult to believe, that ALL the thorns, and ALL the parts, of the holy crown, shewn in different places, can proceed from that one crown which our Saviour wore.

THOSA, תֹּסַי, תֹּסַי, Thosaites, Tizites, dissipation; he that comes out; from תֹּסַי jaitsa. Jediel and Joha, sons of Shimri, were Tizites, or inhabitants of Tiza, or Thosa, 1 Chron. xi. 45. It is unknown where this city stood.

THOUGHT, Thinking. This word is taken, not always for the simple operation of the mind while it thinks, without passing a judgment, or taking any resolution. Thought often includes a formed design of doing something: For example, Jer. xi. 19. "I knew not that they had devised devices [or, thought thoughts] against me, saying, Let us destroy the tree with the fruit thereof." And Gen. xi. 6. speaking of those that built the tower of Babel, "Nothing will be restrained from them which they have imagined [or thought] to do." And the Psalmist says, "The Lord bringeth the counsel of the Heathen to nought; he maketh the devices [or thoughts] of the people of none effect.—The counsel of the Lord standeth for ever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations." In these passages, counsel, designs, devices, thoughts, are equivalent to undertakings and resolutions.

The Hebrews give the title of works of thought to such performances as require industry, and particular genius. Exod. xxxv. 31, 32. "Bezaleel was filled with the spirit of God, with wisdom, and understanding, to think, and to do," &c. Hebr. "to think thoughts [TO STUDY] and to do," &c. verse 33. "in all works of thought." Prov. xiv. 17. "a man of thoughts," is a crafty man; Hebr. "a master of thought." — And Acts xvii. 29. Sculptura artis & cogitationis.

Cogitare and cogitatio are often taken in an ill sense, for contriving and devising mischief. Psal. lvi. 6. "Their thoughts, i. e. their devices, are against me for evil." And Nahum i. 9, 11. "What do you imagine, devise, against the Lord?" Et ex te exhibit cogitans contra Dominum malitiam. See Jer. xviii. 18. Isa. lv. 7.

St. Paul, Rom. ii. 15. says, "Their thoughts the mean while accusing, or else excusing, one another;" their conscience bearing testimony to them, either for good or for evil. Eph. ii. 3. "fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind [or thoughts];" i. e. of their own flesh, of their corrupt mind, their carnal inclinations. And speaking of virgins, 1 Cor. vii. 34. he says, "The unmarried woman careth for [thinketh of] the things of the Lord:" is employed about matters of religion, and is desirous of pleasing God.

[THOUGHT, to take thought: when our translation was made this word included the sense of anxiety, solicitude, apprehension; so that when we are directed to "take no thought for the morrow," the meaning was—no anxiety, no carking carefulness; the same when we are told to take no thought for our life, or living, Matth. vi. 8. for raiment, Luke xii. 26. Which of you, by taking thought, by anxiety, by solicitude, can add one cubit to his stature, or to his age? verse 25. It cannot be supposed that our Lord forbids a proper care, foresight, or provision for future time; but, to restrain immoderate desire, anguish of mind, corroding cares, avarice, &c.]

Thoughts generally imply reasoning, meditation, reflection, operations of conscience, and plans to which the mind alone is privy, or to which it gives entertainment, &c.]

THOUSAND, Hebrew, אֶלֶף Eleph: Greek, Chilion; in Latin Mille; in number ten hundred, but often taken for a very great and indefinite number. So Deut. v. 10. vii. 9. "The Lord sheweth mercy to a thousand generations." Psal. lxxxiv. 10. "A day in thy courts is better than a thousand." And Psal. cv. 8. "He hath remembered his covenant for ever, the word which he commanded to a thousand generations."

[The Hebrew Aleph, rendered thousand, should be taken frequently in the sense of thousander, i. e. commander of a thousand men, or, as we might say, colonel of a regiment. It is so used, Jer. xiii. 21. "for thou hast taught them to be captains, and as chiefs over thee:" אֶלְפֵי שָׂרָא, certainly means superior officers, colonels at thy head, commanders at the head of thy military. So Zech. ix. 7. "And he shall be as a governor [prince, say the Jews] in Judah;" rather, as a leader, in a military sense: which agrees with what follows, "I will encamp about mine house, because of the army."—So, when Gideon says, Judg. vi. 15. "my family, אֶלֶף, is poor in Manasseh."—"The thousand wherein I am numbered is poor; or, as some think, it signifies prince: and from thence conclude, that the father of Gideon was the prince of the thousand:—therefore, say they, Joash had power to protect Gideon in destroying the altar of Baal." David Levi. But, if we take this in the sense of military leader, or colonel, the whole is easy.

The same sense is demanded in various other places. Comp. Zech. xii. 5, 6. the governors of Judah shall say . . . "Jerusalem shall be my strength in the Lord." Gen. xxxvi. the Dukes, military commanders, of Edom. et al.]

St. John, Rev. xx. says, "I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit, and a great chain in his hand; and he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years. And cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled; and after that he must be loosed a little season. And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded, for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection."

From these passages, ill understood, proceeded the opinion of the primitive Millenaries, that Jesus Christ was to reign with his saints, on earth, for a thousand years, before the final judgment. Those who maintained this opinion, were not Heretics, or Schismatics, but some of the ancient fathers of the church, famous for learning, and venerable for sanctity, who in good earnest, and without obstinacy, maintained an opinion, which they thought was clearly delivered in the Scriptures. This came first from the Jews, who expected under the Messiah, a reign of a thousand years, on earth, as appears in 2 Esdras iv. 35, &c. vi. 18. But he who gave most reputation to this hypothesis, was Papias, a disciple of St. John, the Evangelist, who pretended to have received from the apostles and their disciples, the doctrine of the Millenium, or our Saviour's personal reign on earth, for a thousand years. Caius, a priest of the church of Rome, who lived in the second century, treats the opinion of the Millenaries as a fable, invented by Cerinthus. Vide Euseb. Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. 39.

The word Millenium, or Millenary, is not in S. S. St. Austin, de Civit. lib. xx. cap. 7. Gregory the Great, Moral. lib. iv. cap. 12. Andreas Cretensis, Berengaudus, Ribera, and many other learned commentators, understood by a thousand years, not a fixed and determinate number of years, but the whole time from the resurrection resurrection of our Saviour, which is the beginning of his reign over the church, till the end of the world, and the final consummation of all things.

[It is now generally explained of a period in which Christianity shall eminently prevail, in popularity and purity; shall annihilate paganism, idolatry, Mahometism, and all other false religions: and shall triumphantly reign in righteousness over all the earth. This is very different from the personal reign of Christ: and by no means suits the notion of a resurrection of martyrs, &c. who are said to have "lived and reigned with Christ," during this thousand years. In every view of it, this subject has its difficulties.]

THRACE, derived from Tiras,—which see.

THRACIANS, Θράκες, rough, difficult, full of stones; from θράχης. 2 Macc. xii. 35.

THRASEAS. Θρασέα, Vulgate, Thrasæ, audacious, bold; from θρασύς. Father of Apollonius, governor of Cœle-Syria, 2 Mac. iii. 5.

THRONE. Heaven is the throne of God, the earth is his footstool. Isaiah lxvi. 1. Jesus Christ sat down on the right-hand of the throne of God, Acts vii. 42. The ark of the covenant was considered as the throne of God: Psal. lxxxix. 14. xcvi. 2. Justice and judgment are the establishment of the throne of the Lord.

THRONE denotes that magnificent seat whereon princes usually sit, to receive the homage of their subjects, or to give audience to ambassadors; where they appear in pomp and ceremony; whence they dispense justice, &c. The throne, the sceptre, the crown, are ordinary symbols of royalty, and royal authority. Scripture often represents the Lord as sitting on a throne: The Psalmist says, that God had confirmed his throne in heaven from all eternity. Psal. ciii. 19. xciii. 2. xlv. 6. This throne was supported by justice and equity, xcvi. 2. The throne of the Lord which was shewn to Ezekiel, chap. i. was at the same time the most terrible, and yet the most magnificent object, that can be imagined. It was an animated chariot, borne by four Cherubim of an extraordinary figure: The wheels were of inexplicable beauty and magnitude, also animated and conducted by a spirit. The throne of the Lord, which was over the wheels and cherubim, was like glittering crystal, with a seat of sapphire. He who sat on the throne was surrounded with splendor like that of fire, or of metal in fusion; and round him glowed the colours of the rainbow. See also Isa. vi. 2, 3, 4. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CLII.

The cherubim on the ark of the covenant, were also considered as a kind of throne of the Deity: whence it is said in many places, that God sits between the cherubim. 1 Sam. iv. 4. 2 Sam. vi. 2. 2 Kings xix. 15. Psal. xviii. 10. lxxx. 1. xcix. 1. Isaiah xxxvii. 16. whether we consider the cherubim of the ark, or the cherubim which Isaiah and Ezekiel describe as being under, and about, the throne of the almighty: and probably to the same cherubim St. Paul refers by the term thrones. Coloss. i. 16.

The THRONE of Solomon is described in Scripture as the finest and richest in the world. 1 Kings x. 20. It was of ivory, inlaid with gold. The ascent was by seven steps; the back was round, and two arms supported the seat: twelve golden lions, one at each end of every step, made a principal part of its ornaments.

The Jews sometimes swore by the throne of God, or by heaven. Our Saviour forbids such oaths, Matth. v. 34. xxiii. 22: for, says he, whoever swears by heaven, swears by the throne of God, and by him who sitteth upon that throne." There is a passage, Exod. xvii. 16. that might be understood in the sense of an oath, sworn by the throne of God. Quia manus solii Domini, et bellum Domini, erit contra Amalec; the Lord has lifted up his hand from his throne (he has sworn by his throne) that he would make war against Amalek. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCXVIII. Thus in Judith, i. 2. Nebuchadnezzar swears by his throne, that he would make war against all who had rejected his ambassadors.

In Scripture the Son of God is represented as sitting on a throne at the right hand of his father. Psal. cx. 1. Heb. i. 8. Rev. iii. 21. And Jesus assures his apostles, that they should sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, Luke xxii. 30. In the Revelations, we find the twenty-four elders seen in vision, sitting on thrones before the Lord. Rev. iv. 4. And Dan. vii. 9. when God is about to enter into judgment with men, thrones are prepared for judges. The Ancient of days is seated, his throne is as a flame of fire, his wheels are as consuming fire; streams of fire radiate from his face; millions of millions of angels attend upon him, and thousands of thousands are round about him.

THRONES, in the sense of an order of the celestial hierarchy, Col. i. 16. may signify, as above hinted, the cherubim which were considered as the throne of God. St. Paul does not mention thrones among the celestial spirits that compose the angelic hierarchy. Eph. iii. 10. vi. 12. Some moderns pretend, that by thrones, principalities, powers, and dominions, St. Paul means no more than temporal powers, subordinate subordinate one to another. Thus, thrones denote kingly power, principalities governors or princes, and powers judges, magistrates of cities, &c.

THUMMIM, vide URIM.

[THUNDER, is a repercussion of the air violently agitated, among dense clouds, by the lightning or electric flash. As this is the loudest natural noise with which mankind are acquainted, it was, like many other surprising things, expressed by an addition of the name of God: so we have, in Scripture, the terms "fair to God," extremely beautiful; "great cities of God," extremely great cities; "trees of God," extremely tall trees: and hence thunder is called "the voice of God;" i. e. the prodigious sound, noise, or report: "voices of God," Heb. Exod. ix. 28. mighty thunderings, Psalms xxxix. 3, 4. the voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars;—divideth the flames of fire; &c. the Psalmist tells us, verse 3, he means thunder.

THUNDER-BOLT, is certainly a great rarity; what usually does the mischief which is attributed to a thunder-bolt, is the lightning which occasions the thunder; nevertheless, as this notion of a bolt has been common, our translators have not refused to use this word. And the Psalmist seems to adopt the popular phraseology, Psalms lxxviii. 48. "He gave the flocks of the Egyptians to the thunder-bolt." Among the ancients, the thunder-bolt was wielded by the deity Jupiter, and the idea that he struck with it those who deserved punishment, &c. was prevalent. Some nations adored the thunder-bolt; it appears on medals, &c. as a mark of sovereignty and supremacy:—q. the punishing power of the state.

There is a passage, Job xxxvi. 30, 33. which appears to be best explained by this notion of a thunder-bolt: it stands thus in our translation: "Behold, he spreadeth his light upon it, and covereth the bottom of the sea. For by them judgeth he the people; he giveth meat in abundance. With clouds he covereth the light; and commandeth it not to shine by the cloud that cometh betwixt. The noise thereof sheweth concerning it, the cattle also concerning the vapour."

These verses are so obscure, says SCHEUZER, that only the interpretations of critics can be more obscure. Montanus is extremely unintelligible; the LXX. equally so; their lections the same. Cocceius comments on Job—it might be wished Job himself would come and comment on Corceius! The general sentiment of this divine, is, that "God orders the thunder, not to strike the pious, neither his cattle, nor his vegetables." Diodati renders, "He hides the flame in the hollow of his hands, and orders it on whom it shall strike. He declares to it his will, whether it ought to strike cattle, or plants of the ground." I rather incline with Mr. SCOTT, to dismiss the cattle and plants; and to refer the whole to a personal action:

He encloses the lightning in his hands;
Or gives it commission to strike on the precise mark;
His rolling thunder announceth on that very spot, so struck,
His jealousy and anger, upon iniquity.

This certainly makes a simple and perspicuous sense; if it differs from Mr. SCOTT a little, it probably is more strongly attached to the words of the original. The word here rendered a mark, occurs chap. vii. 20. and is so rendered there, in our public version.

Mr. Good has understood the passage to the same effect. He continues the sense into the following chapter; and renders,

"He brandisheth the blaze athwart the concave,
And launcheth his penetrating bolt;
Along with it rusheth his roar,
And fierceness of wrath because of wickedness:
Wrath—at which my heart trembleth
And staggereth in its post."]

THYATIRA, Θυάτειρα, perfume, or sacrifice of labour and contrition; from the Greek θύα, scent, perfume, and τεῖλα, I bruise, I disturb. See Plate MEDALS of THYATIRA.

THYATIRA, a city which some ascribe to Mysia, and others to Lydia, or to the Lesser Asia, because it is on the frontiers of these three provinces. St. John writes to the bishop, or angel of Thyatira. "I know thy works," &c. Rev. ii. 18, 19, &c.

Some think this angel, or bishop, was St. Carpus, or St. Irenæus: but the first is very doubtful, and the latter is without foundation. Epiphanius, Hæres. xli. says, that some heretics doubted the authority of the Revelations, because in their time there was no Christian church at Thyatira; as if that were sufficient proof there had been none. As to the Jezabel there, who pretended to be a prophetess, it is believed that this is only a figurative name, to denote some very wicked woman; but it is not known who she was. Several Greek manuscripts read, Your wife Jezabel; and some of the primitive fathers thought her to be the wife of the bishop of this city. Others believe it stands for the Nicolaitans, who corrupted the manners of the faithful, and seduced them into heresy. But the greater part judge, with good reason, that under the name Jezabel St. John refers refers to some powerful presumptuous woman, who perverted the people, by her vain pretences to prophecy. Comp. PROPHET, Add.

THYRSUS. We read of these rods, or Thirsi, 2 Macc. x. 7. The Jews carried them at the feast of tabernacles; and they still carry something like them in their Hosanna. They are branches of willow, myrtle, and palm-tree; tied together, with citrons or oranges hanging from them, which are waved in a religious manner towards the four quarters of the world. See HOSANNA. FEAST OF TABERNACLES.

TIARA. This name is often given to the high-priest's mitre.

TIBERIAS, Τιβεριὰς, good vision; from טוב tub, good, and ראה ruah, vision; otherwise, the navel; from תבור thabur: otherwise bruising; from תבר thabar.

TIBERIAS, a famous city of Galilee, near the southern extremity, on the western shore, of the lake of Genesareth: otherwise the sea of Tiberias. It is thought its ancient name was Cinnereth, or Hammath, or Emath, or Rakkath, or Recchath: but, M. Reland, Palest. lib. ii. p. 1037. shews, that this is very doubtful, and is only founded on the sea of Cinnereth being afterwards called the sea of Tiberias: which by no means proves that Cinnereth and Tiberias are the same town. Besides, he observes, that the portion of Napthali did not begin towards the south, but at Capernaum; [Matt. iv. 13. says, Capernaum was on the confines of Zebulun and Napthali; and Joshua says, xix. 34. that Napthali passes into Zebulun, towards the south.] which is more to the north than Tiberias; and yet Cinnereth, Hammath, Rakkath, belong to the portion of Napthali, Josh. xix. 35.

Josephus tells us, Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 3. De Bell. lib. ii. cap. 8. that this city was built in honour of Tiberius, by king Herod Agrippa. Not far from it were baths of hot water; and it stood in a place where were many tombs and dead bodies (cap. 2.) which was contrary to the usages, and customs of the Jews. Tiberias was thirty furlongs from Hippos, sixty from Gadara, an hundred and twenty from Scythopolis, and thirty from Tarichea. De vitâ suâ, p. 1025, 1010.

Herod the Tetrarch who built this city, endowed it with great advantages. Its convenient situation soon made it considerable; and it became the metropolis of all Galilee. When Agrippa was obliged to leave Rome, he retired hither with his uncle Herod: The emperor Claudius afterwards bestowed it on him; for which reason, in medals it has the name of Claudia Tiberina. Josephus took possession of it, at the time of the wars with the Jews, and gave the bastinado to the officer who came to propose terms of peace to it from the Romans. Vespasian intended to put all the inhabitants to the edge of the sword; but Agrippa, to whom it belonged, prevailed on him to be satisfied with beating down part of its walls. Tiberias was much frequented by fishermen and boatmen: whence we see a boat on the reverse of some medals struck in this city. In another medal struck under Trajan, we find the goddess Salus surrounded by a serpent, and sitting on a mountain, whence proceeds a great quantity of water; to shew that Tiberias was famous for its baths of hot waters, from which diseased people received great benefit.

In this city, certain Jews, and some of the most learned of their priests, after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, assembled, and laid the foundation of an academy, which became famous by the Mishna that was composed in it; by the celebrated labours of the Masorites, the authors of the pointed vowels; and by the reputation of the doctors who there kept their schools. In the same city also resided the patriarch of the nation.

Epiphanius observes, advers. Hæres. p. 127, that in the time of Constantine the Great, the Gospel of St. John, and the Acts of the Apostles, translated into Hebrew, were discovered by count Joseph, in the archives, or treasury, of Tiberias; and that before this time no Christian was permitted to dwell at Tiberias, or at Capernaum, or at Nazareth, or at Diocæsarea; and that count Joseph, having obtained leave from Constantine to build a church there in honour of Jesus Christ, he made use of a temple, called Adrianeum, which had never been finished, or consecrated. This he completed, and dedicated it to the use of the Christians. Lampridius, de Severo, informs us, that the emperors Alexander Severus, and Adrian, had intentions of placing Jesus Christ among the gods, and to consecrate temples [without statues] to him: and at this day, says the author, temples without statues are seen in every city, which for this reason, are called Adrianea.

[Dr. E. D. CLARKE says, Trav. vol. ii. p. 467, "The town of Tiberias is situated close to the edge of the lake. It is fortified by walls, but has no artillery; and like all Turkish citadels, it makes a great figure from without, exhibiting at the same time, the utmost wretchedness within. Its castle stands upon a rising ground, in the north part of it. No antiquities now remain, except a very ancient church, of an oblong square form, to which we descended by steps.

There

There is reason to believe this the first place of Christian worship erected in Tiberias, and that it was constructed as long ago as the fourth century. The roof is of stone, and it is vaulted. It is called the House of Peter. About a mile south of the town are the celebrated hot baths of Emmaus."—Volney says, that persons attacked by rheumatic complaints, find great relief, and are frequently cured by baths of the black mud they yield.

• The Jews declare, almost with one consent, that Tiberias was a fortified city in the days of Joshua, (xix. 55.) called Rakkath.

Tiberias, says Josephus, was built by Herod, in a place where many sepulchres had been; so that the king was obliged to entice inhabitants. It daily increased in splendor: and at last became the chief city, not only of Galilee, but also of the whole land of Israel. It was the seat of a famous university; which continued there many ages. Bab. Berach. fol. 30. 8.

It was also famous for the Sanhedrim sitting there: and for the Jerusalem Talmud, written there for certain. But there is great difference of opinion concerning the time when: it mentions Dioclesian, and perhaps Julian.

"Arden, the chief town of which is Tiberthah, or Tiberiah, on the banks of the Small Sea, whose waters are sweet, and its length twelve miles, and its breadth two or three farsang. Here is a running stream of water, very warm, which goes on for about two farsang, and when it reaches the town, is exceedingly hot." Ibn Haukal.

Arden was the dwelling place of Jacob, to whom be peace. Id.

The Rabbins have a tradition that Joshua gave the people ten laws; one of which permitted any Israelite to fish in the Sea of Tiberius with nets, but not to set up stakes or fences, i. e. weirs, lest these should impede navigation.]

[TIBERIAS, Sea of. "This immense lake, almost equal in the grandeur of its appearance, to that of Geneva, spreads its waters over all the lower territory, extending from the north east towards the south west. Its eastern shores present a sublime scene of mountains, extending towards the north and south, and seeming to close it in at either extremity; both towards Chorazin, where the Jordan enters; and the Aulon, or Campus Magnus, through which it flows to the Dead Sea. The cultivated plains reaching to its borders, resembled, by the various hues their different produce exhibited, the motley pattern of a vast carpet. . . Captain Culverhouse, thought it might be six miles across. Its length exceeds twelve miles, says SANDYS;

Dr. CLARKE inclines to think it full seventeen miles.]

The sea of Tiberias, is the same as the lake of Genesareth, or the sea of Cinnereth, or of Galilee. See CINNERETH.

TIBERIUS, Τιβέριος, son of the Tiber.

TIBERIUS, ALEXANDER LYSIMACHUS, nephew to Philo the Jew, and son of Alexander Lysimachus, Alabarch, or chief of the Jews, at Alexandria, and brother to Philo the Jew. Tiberius Alexander was therefore a Jew by nation, and even of the sacerdotal race: but he quitted the religion of his forefathers, and became a Pagan. He was appointed to succeed Cuspius Fadus, in the government of Judæa, A. D. 46. He made no innovations in the province, any more than his predecessor before him; which kept things in tranquillity. He caused to be crucified James and Simon, sons of Judas the Galilean, who had made an insurrection forty years before. He governed Judæa till A. D. 48, and had for successor Ventidius Cumanus. Josephus Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 3. He was given as a hostage to the Parthians, when Corbulo engaged Tiridates to come to Rome, to receive the crown from Tiberius. Tacit. Annal. lib. xv. cap. 26, 29. Dio. lib. lxii. A. D. 63. He was Prefect of Egypt, A. D. 66. He was the first that acknowledged Vespasian as Emperor, July 1, A. D. 69, and was lieutenant-general to Titus, at the siege of Jerusalem, A. D. 70. Titus had a great esteem for him; and Tiberius Alexander was, in a manner, the principal man of his council.

TIBERIUS, the emperor, son of Livia, the wife of Augustus, and of Tiberius Nero, her former husband, of the patrician family of the Claudii, was adopted by Augustus, A. D. 4, succeeded him A. D. 14, and reigned twenty-two years, seven months, and seven days. We shall not give a particular account of his life and government, but what may contribute to illustrate the Scriptures, which is the object of this work.

The Jews made application to Tiberius, A. D. 17, for some abatement of their taxes, with which they were oppressed. The emperor referred the matter to Germanicus, who was to proceed this year on his expedition into the East. But we are not informed how Germanicus determined this affair: Tacit. Annal. lib. xi. cap. 4. In A. D. 19, of Tiberius the 6th, the Senate of Rome forbid any Jewish ceremonies to be exercised in the city; they even decreed, according to Tacitus, that the Jews should be expelled Italy, except they changed their religion in a certain time; and that all who did not conform to to this decree should be reduced to slavery. But neither Josephus nor Suetonius tells us, that they were really driven out of Italy. Philo, Leg. p. 1014, imputes this persecution to the intrigues of Sejanus, who apprehended their too great fidelity might obstruct the designs he contemplated. Josephus says, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 5. it took its rise from four Jews, who, professing to teach Judaism at Rome, had persuaded Fulvia, a Roman lady, to embrace this religion, and to put rich presents into their hands, to be sent, (as they said) to the temple at Jerusalem; though in truth they were converted to their own use. Tiberius being informed of this by Saturninus, the husband of Fulvia, expelled all the Jews from Rome. Four thousand of them were enrolled, to be sent against the robbers in Sardinia. Sueton. in Tiber. cap. 36.

Towards A. D. 26, Tiberius sent Pontius Pilate into Judea, to succeed Gratus. This governor attempted to consecrate to Tiberius, golden bucklers in the palace of Herod at Jerusalem; but the Jews procured from Tiberius, a revocation of the order. Pilate also attempted to introduce the ensigns of the army on which were the effigies of Tiberius: but the constancy of the Jews induced Pilate to withdraw them. Vide PILATE.

Forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem, A. D. 30, of Tiberius 17, the Romans deprived the Jews of the power of life and death. John xviii. 31. Judæi apud Casaub. Exerc. 15. n. 71. Philo, Legat. p. 1015. But in the year following, Tiberius sent orders to the governor, to make no innovations on the customs of the Jews, nor to commit any violence on their persons. After the execution of Jesus Christ, A. D. 33, Pilate wrote to Tiberius, say Euseb. Hist. Eccles. lib. xi. cap. 2. and Tertull. Apolog. cap. 5. an account of his death, and of the coincident prodigies. The emperor wrote to the senate in such a manner, as shewed he desired they should decree divine honours to Jesus Christ. But the senate withheld those honours, partly, to maintain their own authority, and to hinder others from adoring any god without their permission; and partly, in compliment to Tiberius, who had declined them when offered to him by the senate. Tiberius did not forbear to shew pacific inclinations towards the Christians; and even threatened those with death who should give them any disturbance. In effect we do not find any persecution of the church under this emperor. He died March, A. D. 37. He was jealous, cruel, and profligate: Pilate dreaded his anger. John xxix. 13.

TIBHATH, תִּבְחָת, murder, or cook; from תִּבְחָת tabach. [Supposed to be a transposition from Betah, 2 Sam. viii. 8. if so, it signifies reliance, security; of the inhabitants, no doubt.]

TIBHATH, or THEBAT, a city of Syria-Zoba, taken and plundered by David, 1 Chron. xviii. 8. Stephanus, the geographer, speaks of a Thebes, in Syria.

TIBNI, תִּבְנִי, straw, or hay; from תִּבְנִי theben: otherwise, understanding; from בִּנְיָה binah: otherwise, filiation: from בֶּן ben, a son.

TIBNI, or Thebni, son of Ginath, competitor with Omri for the kingdom of Israel: but Omri prevailed. 1 Kings xvi. 21. Scripture does not tell us what death Tibni died; but it should seem that he fell in battle, A. M. 3079, ante A. D. 925.

TICHON, תִּיכּוֹן, ΤΙΧΩΝ, middle, from תִּיכּוֹן thoc: otherwise, preparation; from כּוֹן cun.

TICHON. Ezekiel, xlvii. 16. speaks of the house of Tichon, or Beth-tichon, on the confines of Auranitis. Its situation is unknown; but it could not be far from Damascus, nor from Trachonitis. Pliny mentions the Bæteceni, lib. v. cap. 23. Others read Bætarreni, instead of Bætaceni. [Hazar-hatticon, Eng. Tr.] [Temple of the regulator, or disposer?]

TIDAL, תִּדְעַל, Θαρδάλ, that breaks the yoke; from הוֹל hol, a yoke, and דָּלַל dalal, to break: otherwise, knowledge of elevation; from יָדָה jadah, knowledge, and הָלַח halah, elevation. The LXX. read רֶשֶׁת resh for דָּלֶת daleth; Tharal.

TIDAL, or THADAL, king of nations, or of Goim, Gen. xiv. 1. מֶלֶךְ-גּוֹיִם, Melech-Goim. Some think he was king of Galilee of the Gentiles beyond Jordan, Matth. iv. 15. Symmachus translates it, King of Pamphilia; the Syriac, King of the Galites. Joshua speaks of a king of the nations of Gilgal, or of Galilee, according to the Septuagint. Joshua xii. 23.

TIGER, a fierce wild beast; mentioned once in the Latin. Job says, iv. 11. (לַיִשׁ laish), Tigris perit eò quòd non haberet prædam. But the Hebrew Laish, translated tiger, signifies rather an old lion: as in Eng. translation.

This animal is of the cat kind. Oppian says, it is the most beautiful of quadrupeds, as the peacock is the finest of birds. It is so nimble and active, that the poets have fancied it to be conceived by the wind. In fable, the chariot of Bacchus is drawn by tigers, to insinuate that wine tames the fiercest and most savage of men. [rather, that Bacchus was an Indian deity, in his origin; the true tiger being a native of that country only.] In the Mogul's court they exhibited combats of men against tigers. Pietro della Valle, p. 4.

TIGLATH-PILESER, or TILGATH-PILNESER, תִּגְלַת־פִּלְנֶסֶר, or תִּגְלַת־פִּלְאֶסֶר, Θειλαθ-φალασσάρ; that binds or takes away captivity, miraculous, or ruinous: from אָסַר asar, to bind; and גָּלָה galah, captivity, and פָּלָא pala, miraculous; or from נֶפֶל nephel, or מַפְּחָלָא maphala, ruin. That hinders or binds, and withholds the snow that falls; from אָסַר asar, to bind, to hinder, and the Chaldee תִּלָּג thelag, to snow, and from פָּלָה palah, to disperse, to divide. This name is Assyrian, and foreign to the holy language.

[It is probable, that the name Pileser, is compounded of pul, great, and sur, or asur, prince, Chaldee words synonymous, as a title, with the great king; a well known appellation of Persian, &c. sovereigns. Tiglath or Tilgath, is supposed to mean splendor, or majesty, which also, is very analogous to the Oriental mode of giving, or taking, titles:—the majesty of the great king; the great prince manifested, appearing in splendor.]

TIGLATH-PILNESER, or THEGLAT-PHALASSAR, king of Assyria, son and successor of Sardanapalus; he began to reign at Nineveh, A. M. 3257, ante A. D. 747. Profane writers generally call him Ninus Junior. Ælian, Hist. Animal, lib. xii. cap. 12. calls him Thilgam. He restored the kingdom of Assyria, after the dismembering of it by Belesis and Arbaces. See SARDANAPALUS.

Ahaz, king of Judah, finding himself pressed by Rezin king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, and unable to oppose them, commissioned ambassadors to Tilgath-pilneser, to desire his assistance against those kings, 2 Kings xvi. 7, 8, 9, &c. At the same time he sent him all the gold and silver found in the treasures of the temple, and of the palace. Tilgath-pilneser marched against Rezin, killed him, plundered Damascus, and transported the inhabitants to places on the river Cyrus. Ahaz went to meet this prince at Damascus, 2 Chron. xxviii. 20, 21. Tilgath-pilneser was not satisfied with the presents of Ahaz, but entered Judæa, where he found no opposition, and ravaged the whole country. He did the same in Samaria, carried away the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, and transplanted them to Halah, Habor, and Hara; on the river Gozan, 1 Chron. v. 26. He took also the cities Ijon, Abel-bethmaachah, Janoah, Kedesh, Hazor, Galilee, and the countries of Gilead and Naphtali, and carried away the inhabitants into Assyria, 2 Kings xv. 29. Tilgath-pilneser reigned nineteen years at Nineveh, he died A. M. 3276, ante A. D. 728. His successor was his son Shalmaneser.

TIGRIS, Τήρρις, תִּרְיָא, Chidekel, or Hiddekel: point of swiftmess, or swift as an arrow. Tigris in Persian, signifies an arrow, says Q.

Curtius, lib. iv. cap. 9. Hiddekel may be derived from תִּי chad, sharp, and לָלַי chalal, swiftmess: otherwise, sharp sound; from חוֹל chol, sound, and chad. Joyful sound, or swiftmess; from chalal and chol, and חָדַח chadah, to rejoice: or, according to the Syriac and Hebrew, a voice, a sound, a velocity.

TIGRIS, a famous river, which rises in Armenia, and discharges itself into the Persian gulph. Moses calls it Hiddekel, Gen. ii. 14: the ancients Digilito; and to this day it is called Degil, or Tigil. Josephus, the Chaldee paraphrast, the Arabian and Persian translators, call it Digilat. Pliny, lib. vi. cap. 27. says, that at its fountain, and so far as it runs smoothly, it is called Digilito; but when it becomes more rapid, it is called Tigris, which in the language of the Medes, signifies an arrow. He adds, that it rises in the greater Armenia, in the midst of a plain called Elegosine: it enters the lake Arethusa, and crosses it, without mingling with its waters: after which it meets with mount Taurus, where plunging into the earth, it passes under the mountain, and rises again on the other side. The cave at which it enters is called Zo roanda: and in proof that it is the same river, and not another, that rises on the other side, it re-produces at its opening, what had been cast into it at its entrance into the cave: thus says Pliny. Ptolemy also, places the spring of Tigris in the middle of Armenia, 39° 30 min. N. Lat. [Part of the same stream is called Hie, another part Digel, these united, probably form the Hi-dekel of Moses.]

Strabo, lib. xi. seems to have taken for the fountain of the Tigris, its re-appearance out of mount Taurus: since he places it out of Armenia, and says it rises south of mount Niphates, which is a part of mount Taurus. The Tigris east, and the Euphrates west, are the boundaries of Mesopotamia; which country lies between these rivers. After having passed through a large tract of land, from north to south, these two famous rivers discharge themselves into the Persian gulph. At this day they unite in one channel; but formerly they entered it separately, as Pliny observes, lib. vi. cap. 27, 28. and in his time traces of the ancient channels were still seen. The Tigris took its rise in the land of Eden, and was one of the four rivers that watered the earthly paradise, Gen. ii. 14. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DV. &c. The Tigris overflows its banks in the beginning of spring, occasioned by the melting of the snows on the mountains of Armenia. Herodotus. xiv. 25.

TIKVATH, תִּקְוָה, hope, union, or heap; from תִּקַּח cavah: otherwise, line, cord, or rule; from יָקַח can. TIKVATH,

T I M

TIKVATH, or Thècue, father of Shallum, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22. Perhaps it may only mean, that Shallum was a native of Tikvah or Tekoa.

TILON, תִּילֹן, muttering; from לֵן lun; otherwise, his suspension; from תָּלָה thalah, to suspend: otherwise, their heap; from תָּלָה thalal, heap or mass, and the pronoun an, theirs.

TILON, or THILON, son of Shimon, a descendant of Caleb. 1 Chron. iv. 20.

TIME, Tempus. This term is commonly taken in all languages for the measure of motion, or for the duration of any thing. [Time, says Mr. Locke, is the flux of instants.] It is also taken for opportunity, for the favourable moment for doing, or omitting to do a thing. The time of any one, signifies the time of his coming, Isaiah xiii. 22. propè est ut veniat tempus ejus, et dies ejus non elongabuntur. Jesus Christ speaking of his death, says, that his time was not yet come. John vii. 6, 7.

The time of the vengeance of God, is spoken of as the time of the Lord, the time of his visiting: "Woe unto them, for their day is come, the time of their visitation. Behold, I am against thee, O thou most proud, saith the Lord God of hosts; for thy day is come, the time that I will visit thee." Jer. l. 27, 31.

To redeem the time, Daniel ii. 8. I know of certainty that ye would gain the time, or redeem the time. And Ephes. v. 16. Redeeming the time, because the days are evil. These expressions may signify to gain time; to protract an affair to a great length: to wait for a more favourable opportunity. Thus Nebuchadnezzar's magicians would have gained time, requiring a length of time from the king wherein to explain his dream; hoping that his desire of recovering it might have passed away, or that the dream might have revived in his memory. St. Paul advises the faithful to redeem the time, because the days are evil; i. e. to let the time of the anger and rage of wicked men pass away; to wait for more favourable circumstances.

[I doubt whether our learned author has hit the true meaning of these passages: I think I hear Nebuchadnezzar saying, "It has pleased God to grant me a dream, evidently prophetic, and monitory; to warn me against approaching danger from enemies: now, you refuse to explain it, because you would have the time pass away during which this warning might be of use: you refuse to explain it, till after the opportunity for profiting by it, is over: in this delay, you assist my enemies, by keeping me in ignorance. I am sure you mean to protract the time, beyond the event predicted." St. Paul advises his Christian friends to REDEEM time: i. e. to buy it back again, like those who have sold a commodity much beneath its value; to re-purchase, and re-possess it: it is true, this is naturally impossible, in respect of time: but the person who is desirous of re-purchasing what he has sold too cheaply, will take especial care of the remainder of his commodity; and will esteem that so much the more valuable, as he has been a loser by his former conduct; which is precisely, I apprehend, what the apostle designed by his precept. Comp. the story of the Sybil and her books: the last three were equal in value to all those previously destroyed. See SYBIL.]

King Ahasuerus consulted the wise men which knew the times, Esth. i. 13. i. e. his counsellors, who understood the history, customs, and laws of the Persians. Jerom has translated, he consulted the sages, who were always near his person, according to the custom of kings. The Chaldee paraphrast insists, that he consulted the children of Issachar, who were skilful in the science of times and seasons. Moses says, Deut. xxxiii. 48, 49. that those of this tribe should invite the people to come to the mountain: populos vocabunt ad montem. They shall be able astronomers, and shall know the festival days exactly; they shall invite their neighbours to repair to Jerusalem, to the holy mountain.

Jesus Christ says to his apostles, who asked him if he was soon to restore the kingdom to Israel? Acts i. 7. "It is not for you to know the times, or the seasons which the Father has put [RESERVED] in his own power." They thought that the kingdom of the Messiah was to be a temporal kingdom. But the Holy Ghost, which they received at Pentecost, instructed them that the complete kingdom of the Messiah, the renovation of all things, was not to take place before the end of the world. St. Peter, speaking to the Jews, Acts iii. 20, 21. refers to the time of refreshing; the time of the restoration of all things. And St. Paul, 1 Thess. v. 1. uses almost the same terms as those in which our Saviour expressed himself to his apostles, concerning his last coming.

A time, times, and half a time, in Dan. xii. 7. and in Rev. xii. 14. denotes three years and a half; which the persecutions continued, against the Jews in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, and against the Christians in the time of Dioclesian. Tempus, a year; tempora, two years; dimidium temporis, half a year. [Unless it be rather a series of years; during which the gospel is to be oppressed and obscured: 360—720—180=1260 years: taking one year of 360 days, for tempus] years. "Until seven times [years] have passed over him." This denoted the seven years of the insane metamorphosis of king Nebuchadnezzar. Ezek. iv. 10, 11. a tempore usque ad tempus comedes: you shall eat these three hundred and ninety loaves, in the three hundred and ninety days, that I have appointed you. From one time to another time, is from the beginning of such a term to the end of the same.

In Dan. iv. 13. seven times are taken for seven years.

T I M

An acceptable time, a time of good pleasures, a time of favour, a time of visitation; the time of the favour, of the goodness, of the mercy of God; to which is opposed, a time of fury, a time of correction, the time of anger, of vengeance, the evil day, &c.

Our time, is put for the time of death: 1 Macc. ix. 10. Si appropinquavit tempus nostrum moriamur in virtute propter fratres nostros. The devils complained that Jesus Christ was come to torment them before the time: Matt. viii. 29. i. e. before the last judgment, at which the devils will be thrown for ever into the fire prepared for them. The fulness of time, Gal. iv. 4. stands for the time of the coming of the Messiah. The latter times also, denotes, occasionally, the time of the Messiah; but elsewhere, the last judgment, and the time of the persecution of Antichrist. Ante tempora secularia, Tit. i. 2. stands for that eternity which was before the creation of the world. Before the world there was properly no time: the time that has elapsed from Adam to us, is the tempora secularia, the times of ages, opposed to that duration of eternity, which preceded the creation, and which is a time improperly so called. Psal. xxx. 16.

We read in Psal. xxxi. 15. in manibus tuis sortes meae; My lot is in thy hands: בִּידְךָ עֲתוֹתַי, LXX. οἱ κληροί μου. Aq. Sym. Theod. οἱ καίροι. The Hebrew is, in manibus tuis tempora mea, my time, the duration of my life, [with the circumstances of it,] is in thy hand. Several Latin copies read in the same manner; as the Roman psalters of St. Germain des Prez, and that of St. Peter of Chartres.

TIMEUS, Τιμαῖος, in Greek may signify perfect, honourable: in Hebrew, admirable: from תָּמַח thamah, to admire. Father of the blind man whom Jesus Christ cured at Jericho; who is called Bar-Timeus, i. e. son of Timeus. Mark x. 46.

TIMNA, תִּמְנָה, hinderance, prohibition; from מָנַע manah: otherwise, trouble, perfect, or complete; from נָוַח nuah, motion, concussion, and תָּמַח thamam, perfect, finished.

I. TIMNA, or THAMNA, son of Eliphaz, and grandson of Esau, 1 Chron. i. 36. But we should rather say, that Timna was mother of Amalek, and wife of Esau, to reconcile the Chronicles with Gen. xxxvi. 12.

T I M

II. TIMNA, concubine of Esau, and mother of Amalek, Gen. xxxvi. 12. probably the same Timna as the above.

III. TIMNA, duke, or chief, of Idumea, after Hadad, 1 Chron. i. 51. Gen. xxxvi. 40.

TIMNATH, תִּמְנָת, image, or figure; from מָנַח mon: otherwise, enumeration, from מָנָה manah: or, according to the Syriac, that establishes.

I. TIMNATH, TIMNAH, THANMAH, or THAMNATHA, [a separation of one from another, i. e. a lot, a portion, or property;] a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 10, 57. to which Judah was going, when he met with Tamar, Gen. xxxviii. 12. This city may well enough be that which lay between Jerusalem and Diospolis.

II. TIMNATH, a city of the Philistines, where Samson married a wife. Judg. xiv. 1, &c. Perhaps this is the same as the former, which might then belong to the Philistines; for it was near their country.

[TIMNATHA, the considerable portion.

A city of Dan, Josh. xix. 43. afterwards of the Philistines, Judg. xiv. 1. in the Greek, Thanatha, 1 Macc. ix. 50. Hence TIMNATH SERAH, a redundant portion: "an overplus." A present made to Joshua by the tribes. A city in mount Ephraim, Josh. xix. 50. xx. 30. by metathesis called Timnath Heres, Judges ii. 9. whence Mount Heres, Judges i. 35. But it should rather appear, that this name, alluding to the Sun, had been formerly given to this hill by its ancient inhabitants.]

TIMNATH-SERAH, תִּמְנַת-סֶרַח, Θαμναθ-σαρά, Thamnath-sare, or Thamnath-heresh, by the transposition of the ס samech, figure, or image extended, or that remains; from מָנַח man, an image, and סֶרַח serah, extended, or remaining: or image of the sun; from חֶרֶם cheres: otherwise, extensive enumeration; from מָנָה manah, to reckon, and סֶרַח sarach; otherwise, image, stink; from the Syrian and Chaldee. סָרַח sarah. [See TIMNATHA above.]

TIMNATH-SERAH, or Thamnath-Sarah, a city of Ephraim, which Joshua chose for his dwelling, and burying place, Josh. xix. 50. xxiv. 30.

TIMNITE, תִּמְנִי, Θαμναθῆς, see Timnath.

TIMON, Τίμων, honourable, worthy; from the Greek timē.

TIMON, one of the seven first deacons, Acts vi. 5. Nothing particular is known of him. The Greeks honour four of the first deacons on July 28. They say of Timon, that being made bishop bishop of Bostra, in Arabia, he was burnt by the infidels. The Latins place his death on April 19, at Corinth. They tell us that he preached some time at Berea, and then came to Corinth, where the Jews and Pagans threw him into a fire; and seeing that by a miracle he escaped from thence, they fixed him on a cross. Dorotheus makes him sometime bishop of Bostra, and sometime of Tyre and Sidon. See the Bollandi, on April 19.

TIMOTHY, Τιμόθεος, honour of God, or valued of God; from the Greek τιμή, and θεός, God.

I. TIMOTHY, TIMOTHEUS, general of Antiochus Epiphanes, together with Bacchides, another general of the same prince, was twice defeated by Judas Maccabeus: First, A. M. 3840, shortly after the purification and re-dedication of the temple, 2 Macc. viii. 30. Also, the same year, beyond Jordan, several times. 1 Macc. v. 6, 7. He was killed a little after, with Chereas his brother, at Gazara, whither he had fled, after the loss of a great battle. 2 Macc. x. 87.

II. TIMOTHY, general of king Antiochus Epiphanes, and governor of the country beyond Jordan, a different person from the former Timothy. 1 Macc. v. 11, 12. 2 Macc. xii. 20, 21, &c. He assembled a great army beyond Jordan, but was overcome by Judas Maccabeus, and Jonathan his brother. Timothy falling into the hands of Dositheus and Sosipater, begged his life of them, promising to set at liberty many Jewish prisoners; giving his word of honour that he would release the captives: he was set at liberty, without injury. We hear no more of him. 2 Macc. xii. 1 Macc. v. 11, 44. A. M. 3841, ante A. D. 163.

III. TIMOTHY, a disciple of St. Paul. He was of Derbe, or rather of Lystra, both cities of Lycaonia. Acts xvi. 1. xiv. 6. His father was a Gentile, but his mother was a Jewess. Her name was Eunice, and his grandmother's name was Lois. St. Paul commends their piety, and the scriptural education they had given Timothy. 2 Tim. i. 5. iii. 15. When St. Paul came to Derbe and Lystra, about A. D. 51, or 52, the brethren reported very advantageously of the merit and good disposition of Timothy; and the apostle determined to take him with him. He circumcised him at Lystra. Acts xvi. 3. Timothy applied himself to labour in the gospel, and did St. Paul very important services, through the whole course of his preaching. It is not known when he was made bishop; but it is believed that he received very early the imposition of the apostle's hands, and this in consequence of a particular revelation, or intimation from the Holy Ghost. 1 Tim. iv. 14. 2 Tim. i. 6. St. Paul calls him, not only his dearly beloved son, but also his brother, the companion of his labours, and a man of God; observing, that none was more united with him in heart and mind than Timothy.

This holy disciple accompanied St. Paul to Macedonia, to Philippi, to Thessalonica, to Berea: and when the apostle went from Berea, he left Timothy and Silas there, to confirm the converts. Acts xvii. 14, 15, 16, &c. When at Athens, he directed Timothy to come to him: A. D. 52. When he was come, and had given him an account of the churches of Macedonia, St. Paul sent him back to Thessalonica, from whence he afterwards returned with Silas, to St. Paul at Corinth, Acts xviii. 5.—There he continued with him; and the apostle names him with Silas, at the beginning of the two epistles to the Thessalonians.

About A. D. 56, St. Paul sent Timothy and Erastus into Macedonia; Acts xix. 21, 22. and directed Timothy to call at Corinth, to refresh the minds of the Corinthians in the truth. And some time after, writing to the same Corinthians, 1 Cor. iv. 17. he recommends to them the care of Timothy, and to send him back in peace. Timothy returned to St. Paul, in Asia, who there stayed for him. They went together into Macedonia; and the apostle joins Timothy's name with his own, in the second epistle to the Corinthians, which he wrote from Macedonia, about the middle of A. D. 57; he also sends his commendations to the Romans, in the letter which he wrote to them from Corinth, the same year, [or A. D. 58.] Rom. xvi. 21.

Though it does not appear by the Acts, that Timothy was with St. Paul the two years in which he was prisoner at Cæsarea, nor during his voyage to Rome; yet Timothy had accompanied him in his journey to Jerusalem; Acts xx. 4. and it is certain he was in Rome when the apostle wrote to the Philippians, to the Colossians, and to Philemon, because he is named in the titles of these epistles, which were written A. D. 60, 61, 62. The year following, when St. Paul wrote to the Hebrews, Heb. xiii. 23. A. D. 64, he tells them, that Timothy was come out of prison: but he mentions no circumstances, either of the imprisonment, or of the delivery of this disciple.

[There is some authority for thinking that Timothy was the penman of the chief part, if not the whole, of the Epistle to the Hebrews: some Greek copies hint as much; and it is expressly affirmed in the Syriac copies obtained by

by Dr. Buchanan from the Syrian Christians in India.]

When St. Paul returned from Rome, A. D. 64, he left Timothy at Ephesus, 1 Tim. i. 3, 4. ii. 1, 8, 9. iii. 1, 8. v. 7, 20. to oversee that church, of which he was the first bishop, as he is recognized by the council of Chalcedon, tom. 4. p. 699. Constitut. Apost. lib. vii. cap. 46. St. Paul wrote to him from Macedonia the first of the two letters that are addressed to him, about A. D. 64, or 65. 1 Tim. vi. 23. He recommends him to be more moderate in his austerities, and to drink a little wine, because of the weakness of his stomach, and his frequent infirmities. After the apostle came to Rome, A. D. 65, being now near his death, he wrote to him his second letter, which is full of kindness and tenderness for this his dear disciple, and which is justly considered as the last will of St. Paul. He desires him to come to Rome to him before winter, and to bring with him several things that St. Paul had left at Troas. 2 Tim. iv. 10, 11, 12, 13. If Timothy went to Rome, as is probable, he must have been a witness there of the martyrdom of St. Paul, A. D. 66.

Timothy returned to Ephesus, probably, A. D. 67; and continued to govern this church as its bishop; for St. John the Evangelist, who resided there, [see JOHN V.] had the care of the churches of all Asia, by authority superior to that of a bishop. The Acts of St. Timothy, of which Photius has transmitted an abridgment to us, Cod. 254.—(See the Bolland. 24 January; M. De Tillemont, tom. ii. p. 161, 564.) import, that on January 22, A. D. 97, the Pagans of Ephesus held a great feast, in which they carried in procession the images of their gods, the devotees being masked, and armed with great clubs; that Timothy rushed in among them, to oppose this idolatrous superstition, but they killed him with stones and with their clubs. His disciples carried him to a mountain near the city, where he was buried. The Greeks, Usuard, and some Latins, put his feast on this day; but Bede, Raban, Adon, and others, place it January 24. The ancient martyrologies, under the name of Jerom, mention him September 27.

If he did not die before A. D. 97, we can hardly doubt but that he must be the angel of the church of Ephesus, to whom St. John writes, Rev. ii.—though the reproaches of having left his first love, do not seem to agree to so holy, so eminent a man. “I know thy works, and thy labour, and thy patience, and how thou canst not bear them which are evil; and thou hast tried them which say they are apostles and are not, and has found them liars: And hast borne, and hast patience, and for my name sake hast laboured, and hast not fainted. Nevertheless, I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love. Remember therefore from whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do thy first works; or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candlestick out of its place, except thou repent.” The greater part of Interpreters think, that these reproaches do not so much concern Timothy, personally, as some members of his church, whose zeal was become cool. Others are persuaded that they may even be imputed to Timothy himself, who made ample atonement by his martyrdom, for what the Apocalypse reproaches him with in this place. We are not to think that the primitive Saints were impeccable; or that their zeal never suffered diminution. It is thought Timothy was succeeded by Onesimus.

[This is the usual history of the life of Timothy; but, there are difficulties attending several parts of it. If St. Paul left Timothy at Ephesus, A. D. 64, what could be the age of this disciple? Not less than thirty-five. But, how is this consistent with the expression, 1 Tim. iv. 12. “Let no man despise thy youth.” Moreover, it is clear that Timothy was left at Ephesus previous to the appointment of church-officers—bishops and deacons: now, it is all but impossible, that the church at Ephesus should have been without those officers, during fourteen or fifteen years. Comp. Acts xx. 17, 28. These arguments favour the opinion of those who think that Timothy was left at Ephesus, after the sudden departure of St. Paul, occasioned by the riot of Demetrius, and his craftsmen. Our readers are prepared to pay no deference to the subscriptions to the epistles: that which places the first Epistle to Timothy at Laodicea, is not better supported than others.

The second Epistle to Timothy is universally ascribed to the later days of St. Paul; but, whether Timothy were then at Ephesus, is questioned; because, 1. St. Paul says, chap. iv. 12. “Tychicus have I sent to Ephesus;” not “have I sent to thee;” and moreover, in that case, Timothy knew it, without this information. 2. St. Paul says, “Trophimus have I left at Miletus, sick.” That town was so near to Ephesus (see Acts xx.) that Timothy must have known this in a day or two. 3. St. Paul wishes Timothy to call at Troas; but Troas was much out of the way from Ephesus to Rome.

Now, if Timothy were not at that time resident at Ephesus, nor perhaps, in later years, then he might not be that Angel of the Church there, who was reprimanded in the Apocalypse.

Some

T I N

Some have thought that Timothy died several years before the date of the Apocalypse; while others extend his life to A. D. 109. To say the least, he must have been aged in A. D. 97, and if he had then been bishop of Ephesus nearly forty years, he must have seen too many heathen processions to have been so greatly moved, as the story of his martyrdom supposes.]

[TIN. "The ancient kingdom of Dunmonium, which signifies hills of tin mines, and takes its name from thence, may with great propriety claim a distinction in the annals of metallurgy; but more eminently ought that part of it called Cornwall to be distinguished, as having, perhaps, yielded more tin in one year, than Devonshire has done in half a century. I may yet proceed, and infer, how super-eminently this little province of Great Britain deserves to be ranked amongst the first principles of this island, as a nation and people, whose very name, according to the ancient authority of Bochart, and the later opinion of Boerhaave, is derived from Bratanuck, which in the Phœnician language signifies Land of Tin."

"Tyre and Sidon were situate in Phœnicia, a part of the ancient Palestine; and were the first maritime powers that we read of, either in sacred or profane history. Tyre, (the grand sea-port and mart of Phœnicia,) was taken and entirely demolished by Nebuchadnezzar, in the thirty-second year of his reign, and in the year 573 before Christ; so that the latest date of their trading here cannot be less than four and twenty centuries since. I believe it is agreed by all writers, that they were the first who used to frequent this island for commerce; that they traded upon the western coasts of Cornwall, full six hundred years before the coming of our Saviour; and that their navigation to it was for the sake of our tin. They considered this traffic as a point of such consequence, that they erected forts and castles on our coasts for the protection and preservation of their commerce; and a great number of the proper names of men and places in Cornwall, are plainly derived from the Syriac tongue." [Comp. FRAGMENTS, Nos. DCVI. DCVII.]

"Tin, in its mineral state, being totally unknown to all other countries but our own, affords ample reason to assert, that we supplied all the markets of Europe and Asia with that commodity in early ages. Accordingly, we read of tin in Judah, so long back as the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah; (Isaiah i. 25.) and also in the writings of Homer, who flourished 907 years before Christ.

"In hissing flames, huge silver bars are roll'd,
And stubborn brass, and TIN, and solid gold.
A darker metal mixt intrench'd the place,
And pales of glittering TIN th' enclosure grace."

Pope's Hom. Iliad, lib. xviii.

"The mine of Huel Cock, in the parish of St. Just, is wrought eighty fathoms in length, under the sea, beyond low water-mark; and the sea, in some places, is but three fathoms over the back of the workings; inasmuch, that the tinners underneath hear the break, flux, ebb, and reflux of every wave, which, upon the beach overhead, may be said to have had the run of the Atlantic ocean for many hundred leagues; and consequently are amazingly powerful and boisterous. They also hear the rumbling noise of every nodule and fragment of rock, which are continually rolling upon the submarine stratum; which, altogether, make a kind of thundering roar, that will surprise and fearfully engage the attention of the curious stranger. Add to this, that several parts of the Lode, which were richer than others, have been very indiscreetly bulked and worked within four feet of the sea; whereby, in violent stormy weather, the noise overhead has been so tremendous, that the workmen have many times deserted their labour, under the greatest fear, lest the sea might break in upon them. This proximity of the sea over the workmen, without their being incommoded by the salt water, is more wonderful than the account which Dr. Stukeley gives, of his descending into a coal-pit at Whitehaven one hundred and fifty fathoms deep, till he came under the very bed of the ocean, where ships were sailing over his head; being at that time, deeper under ground by the perpendicular, than any part of the ocean between England and Ireland. In this case, there is a vast thickness of strata between the mine and the sea; but, at Huel Cock, they have only a crust between, at most; and though, in one place they have barely four feet of stratum to preserve them from the raging sea, yet they have rarely more than a little dribble of salt water, which they occasionally stop with oakum or clay, inserted in the crannies through which it issues. In a lead mine in Peran Zebuloe, formerly wrought under the sea, they were sometimes sensible of a capillary stream of salt water, which they likewise prevented by the same means, whenever they perceived it." PARCE on Mines. Compare the description of mining in Job.]

TIPHSAH, תִּפְסָה, תַּפְסָה, תַּפְסָה, passage, [by a bridge, perhaps,] leap, or step, made in halting: or the passover; from תִּפְסָה pasach.

2 S div. 2

[A city

[A city of this name on the Euphrates, was called Thapsacus by Greek writers. That there was a bridge over the Euphrates not far from this place is witnessed by Strabo, lib. xvi. Arrian, lib. ii. Curtius, lib. iii. Alexander, in Curtius, lib. iv. cap. 9, 12. refers to passing it.]

TIPHSAH, or THAPSA, a city of Ephraim. Shallum son of Jabesh having slain Zechariah king of Israel, Menahem, general of this prince's army, procured himself to be acknowledged king; 2 Kings xv. 16. A. M. 3233, ante A. D. 771. The city of Tiphseh having shut its gates against him, he took it by force; and exercised the utmost cruelties against the inhabitants. See Joseph. Antiq. lib. ix. cap. 11.

TIRAS, תִּירָס, that demolishes or destroys; from אֶרֶס aras: otherwise, that waters; from רָסָא rasas. Seventh son of Japheth, son of Noah. Genesis x. 2. Interpreters agree, that he was father of the Thracians. [desired?]

TIRATHITES. The word is not in the Vulgate, but only in the Hebrew of 1 Chron. ii. 55. תִּירָתִים, Tirathim. Vulgate Canentes. The Tirathites, in Chaldee signifies porters. They descended from Hemath, head of the family of the Rechabites.

TIRHAKAH, תִּירְחָקָה, inquirer, examiner, or dull observer, whose eyes are stopped, or whose sight is disturbed; from תִּירָה thur, to seek, to examine, and קָחָה caah, made dull: otherwise turtle, or law made dull; from the same תִּירָה thur, a turtle, or תִּירָה thorah, a law, and קָחָה caah, to make blunt. This is an Ethiopian name; its etymology is not in the Hebrew. [From the Ethiopic, the high; but, whether referring to dignity of station, or to personal stature, the tall, is uncertain. We read of Artaxerxes Longimanus, the long-handed, of Persia; and we have an Edward, surnamed Long-shanks, in our own history.]

TIRHAKAH, or THARACA, king of Ethiopia; i. e. of the land of Cush, bordering on Palestine and Egypt. This prince, at the head of a powerful army, attempted to relieve Hezekiah, when attacked by Sennacherib. 2 Kings xix. 9. A. M. 3291, ante A. D. 713. Sennacherib was engaged in the siege of Lachish; which he raised, and went to meet him. But the angel of the Lord smote his army that night, and killed of them to the number of eighty-five thousand men. It does not appear that this prince had given Tirhakah battle; his army was routed before he came up to him. Tirhakah is called Thearchon by Strabo. lib. i. p. 653. That geographer quotes Megasthenes, who related, that this prince had carried his conquests into Europe, and even to the pillars of Hercules.

TIRIA, תִּירִיָּא, that searches or examines; from תִּירָה thur: otherwise, that beholds; from רָחַרְחַח raah. [Fear, timidity.] Son of Jehaleleel; descended from Caleb. 1 Chron. iv. 16.

TIRSHATHA, תִּירְשָׁתָה, that overturns the foundation; from שָׁתָה shathoth, foundation, and תִּירָה thur, or thuar, that overturns: according to the Syriac, that beholds the time, or the year. This word is foreign from the Hebrew tongue; it will not be easy to find its true etymology in that language. [Probably a title, signifying the king's cup bearer. חֲזִיר שֶׁתָּה Pincerna Regis. Neh. vii. 65, 70. x. 1. See NEHEMIAH.]

TIRZAH, תִּירְצָה, Heb. Tirzathah, benevolent, or complaisant; from רָצָה ratza: otherwise, that runs; from רוּץ rutz. [Pleasing.]

I. TIRZAH, or THERSA, fifth daughter of Zelophehad. Numb. xxvi. 33. xxvii. 1. Josh. xvii. 3.

II. TIRZAH, [Pleasant] A city of Ephraim, the royal seat of the kings of Israel, from Jeroboam, son of Nebat, to the reign of Omri, who built the city of Samaria, which then became the capital of this kingdom. Joshua killed the king of Tirzah, Josh. xii. 24. Menahem, the son of Gadi, of Tirzah, slew Shallum, the usurper of the kingdom of Israel, who reigned at Samaria, and assumed the government himself. But the city of Tirzah, shutting its gates against him, he made it suffer the most terrible effects of his indignation. See 2 Kings xv. 14, 16. Joseph. Antiq. lib. ix. cap. 11.

TISHBITE, תִּישְׁבִי, that makes captives; from שָׁבָה shabah: otherwise, that turns back, or recalls, that dwells; from שָׁבַב shub.

TISHBITE: THESBE, or THISBE, a city of Gilead, beyond Jordan; the country of the prophet Elijah, who from hence was called the Tishbite. 1 Kings xvii. 1. Epiphanius says, that Thisbe was in the country of the Arabians, because in his time the whole district beyond Jordan belonged to the Arabians. Josephus calls this city Thesbon, Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 5.

TISRI, or TIZRI, the first Hebrew month of the civil year, and the seventh of the ecclesiastical year. The Hebrews call it תִּזְרִי Tizri, otherwise רֹאשׁ-הַשָּׁנָה Rosh-hashana, — Initium, vel caput anni. i. e. the beginning of the year. It answered to the moon of September. On the first day of this month was kept the feast of trumpets, because the beginning of the year was then proclaimed by the sound of trumpets. On this day they refrained from all sorts of servile business, and offered in sacrifice a bull, a ram, and seven lambs. Levit. xxiii. 24. Numb. xxix. 1.

It is thought Joshua died on the first day of Tisri. The sabbatical year, and the year of jubilee, began on this day.

The third day was a fast for the death of Gedaliah, son of Abikam, killed at Mizpah. 2 Kings xxv. 25. Jer. xli. 2.

The fifth day was a fast for the death of twenty of the chief Jewish doctors; particularly for that of Akiba. See AKIBA.

The eighth day, the dedication of Solomon's temple, which began on this day, and continued fourteen days, to the 22d. 1 Kings viii. 35. 2 Chron. vii. 9, 10.

The tenth day, the feast of solemn expiation. Lev. xvi. 29. xxiii. 27. See EXPIATION.

The fifteenth of Tisri, the feast of Tabernacles. It continued seven days. Lev. xxiii. 34. See TABERNACLES.

The twenty-third day, the Jews keep the feast of The rejoicing for the Law: they thank God for having given it them; they read the blessings; and the history of the death of Moses. Deut. xxxiii. xxxiv.

TITANS, Τῑτᾱνες, in Greek, may signify revenger, punisher. Giants, famous in history, or rather in fable. Vide REPHAIM.

TITLE, Titulus. This word is variously used:—

1. For a monument. Jacob rose up early in the morning, and took the stone that had served him for a pillow, and made a monument of it: Gen. xxviii. 18. Erexit in titulum. Jacob, together with Laban, erected a title, or monument, of their covenant, by a pile of stones on mount Gilead. Gen. xxxi. 45, 46. After the death of Rachel, Jacob raised her a monument. Gen. xxxv. 20. Absalom in his life-time set up for himself a monument, or title, The hand of Absalom. 2 Sam. xviii. 18. In most of these places the Hebrew word is Matzbah, מצבה, Statua, Columna, quicquid statuitur et erigitur in monumentum, which, in general, signifies any thing set up as a memorial, whether a statue, a pillar, a stone, a mound, &c. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CLXVI. Moses forbids the erecting of superstitious monuments, or titles, throughout Israel. Lev. xxvi. 1. See Numb. xxxiii. 52.

2. Title is taken for whatever is put upon any thing, as a mark. So, the title of a Psalm, the title of a book. Thus we often find in the inscriptions of the Psalms, [Psal. xv. lvi. lvii. lviii. lix. lx. Heb. לְדָוִד מְתַנַּחֵם. LXX. Σηλογογραφία τῷ Δαυίδ. Aquila. Ταπεινοφρόνος καὶ ἀπλῆς. Sym. Ταπεινόφρονος καὶ ἀπλῆς. Hieron. Humilis & simplicitatis David.] Psalmus David in tituli inscriptionem. The Hebrew reads, Michsam le David; which Jerom, Aquila, and Sym-machas, express by, A Psalm of David, the humble and simple: Others, A golden Psalm of David. We think it only means, A Psalm, inscribed, sealed, or marked, by the name of David. Isaiah says, xix. 19. "the time shall come when a title, (or pillar,) to the Lord shall be seen on the borders of Egypt; and an altar, or monument, inscribed to his name." The evangelists tell us, that a title was put on the cross of our Saviour; i. e. the subject of his condemnation, written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, "Jesus of Nazareth, the king of the Jews;" which might be understood to imply, that Jesus of Nazareth was condemned for assuming the quality of king of the Jews. See FRAGMENTS, No. DLXXV.

3. Title seems also to be put for an epitaph, or inscription; for a pillar, tomb, or other erection, &c. over a grave of the dead. We have already observed in this sense the titles of Rachel, and of Absalom. See 2 Kings xxiii. 17. the title of the man of God, sent to reprove Jeroboam, which was preserved by king Josiah; also, those titles (or signs) mentioned Ezekiel, xxxix. 15. which were put near the dead bodies, that they might be buried.

TITUS, Τῑτος, honourable; from the Greek τέω, I honour.

TITUS, son and successor of the emperor Vespasian. He was one of the best princes the Roman empire ever had; liberal, generous, mild, wise, and valiant. He thought that day lost, in which he had not done some service to mankind. He was called the love and delight of human kind. He was made use of by Providence to accomplish the destruction of the city and temple of Jerusalem; and by that means to fulfil the denunciations of the Son of God against a city, which had murdered the prophets, and subsequently, the Messiah himself. Matth. xxiv.

Vespasian was in Achaia with the emperor Nero, when appointed by him to conduct the Jewish war, A. D. 66. He did not arrive in Judæa till the year following, and began to form his army in 67. His son Titus whom he had chosen for one of his lieutenants, joined him at Ptolemais, with two legions which he brought from Alexandria. Joseph. de Bell. lib. iii. cap. 5. Sueton. in Vespas. cap. 4. They began the war in Galilee, that they might give the people of Jerusalem time to reflect on what was approaching. Titus gave many proofs of bravery; and Vespasian, his father, being declared emperor, A. D. 69. and, consequently obliged to set out for Italy, he left the whole care of the Jewish war to his son. Titus laid siege to Jerusalem in the beginning of April, A. D. 70.

The first wall was taken April 28, the second wall May 7. The tower Antonia was taken by storm, July 5. The perpetual sacrifice was discontinued, and entirely ceased July 7, or 10. The temple was burnt, notwithstanding Titus's orders to the contrary, August 10. The Romans carried the third wall of the city, September 7, and Titus entered the day following, September 8.

Titus caused the temple and city to be razed, except three towers, Hippicos, Phasaël, and Mariamne, with the wall that surrounded the western part of the city. De Bell. lib. vii. cap. i. 34. The Jews have a tradition, that he caused a plough to pass over the city, or at least over the temple, in token of entire desolation; but it is believed this happened rather under Adrian. Vide Scalig. Isagog. lib. iii. Thus was fulfilled the prediction of Jesus Christ, who told his apostles, that enemies would not leave one stone upon another of those buildings, which they so much admired. Matt. xxiv. 2. Titus left at Jerusalem the tenth legion, under the command of Terentius Rufus; [to whom is ascribed by the Rabbinical writers the act of passing the plough share over the ground where Jerusalem had stood. This must be taken with some restriction.] As the approaching winter would not allow Titus to go to Rome, to his father, he visited several cities of Syria, where he often had games represented at the cost of the Jews, the slaughter of whom, says Josephus, always made a part of those entertainments. De Bell. lib. vii. cap. 6, 8, 13.

He continued some time at Berytus, and went to Antioch, in the beginning of A. D. 71. From thence he passed to Zeugma, on the Euphrates, where he had conferences with the ambassadors of Vologesus, king of the Parthians. He then returned to Antioch, where he declined to abridge the privileges of the Jews, or to expel them from this city, as the citizens of Antioch earnestly endeavoured to persuade him: de Bell. lib. vii. cap. 14. He then passed through Jerusalem, in his way to Egypt. He could not forbear shedding tears, when he saw the condition to which that city was reduced: and he uttered imprecations against those who had forced him to this extremity, contrary to his own inclination. de Bell. lib. vii. cap. 15. From Alexandria he went to Rome by sea, where he participated in a triumph over the Jews, with his father, Vespasian. Among the plunder displayed, was the golden table, and the golden candlestick with seven branches, with the roll of the law of the Jews; all which were carried in the triumph, de Bell. lib. vii. cap. 17. The book of the law was kept in the palace, with the purple hangings that had been used in the temple. The golden vessels were placed in the temple built by Vespasian, and consecrated at the Temple of Peace, de Bell. lib. vii. cap. 19. See the PLATE, ARCH of TITUS, with its Explanation.

Vespasian died A. D. 79; Titus succeeded him, and governed the Roman empire two years, two months, and twenty days. His brother Domitian succeeded him. See BERENICE.

II. TITUS, surnamed Justus, a native of Corinth, and host to St. Paul in that city. We read, Acts xviii. 7. that St. Paul quitted the house of Aquila, where he had lodged, and entered that of one Titus Justus, who feared God, and whose house adjoined the synagogue: As if he meant to hint that he abandoned the Jews, with reluctance, and was ready to return to them, if they would but relinquish their stubbornness, and hardness of heart. Some Greek MSS. read only Titus, without Justus: others read Titus son of Justus. St. Chrysostom, Ep. ad. Tit. 1. and Grotius, were of opinion that this Titus was the bishop of Crete, to whom St. Paul addressed an epistle. But the contrary opinion, which distinguishes these two persons, has generally prevailed. We know nothing particular concerning Titus Justus.

III. TITUS, a disciple of St. Paul, was a Gentile by religion and birth, Gal. ii. 3. but was converted by St. Paul, who calls him his son. Tit. i. 4. Jerom says, Ep. 150. Qu. 11. that he was St. Paul's interpreter; and this, probably, because he might write what St. Paul dictated; or explain in Latin what this apostle discoursed in Greek; or render into Greek what St. Paul said in Hebrew or Syriac: St. Paul took him with him to Jerusalem, A. D. 51. Gal. ii. 1. about the time of the question—whether the converted Gentiles should become subject to the ceremonies of the law? Some would then have obliged him to circumcise Titus; but neither he nor Titus would consent. Titus was sent by the same apostle to Corinth, 2 Cor. xii. 18. towards the end of A. D. 56. on occasion of some disputes in that church. He was very well received by the Corinthians, and much satisfied by their ready compliance, but would receive nothing from them; thereby imitating the disinterestedness of his master.

From Corinth he went to St. Paul in Macedonia, and gave him an account of the state of the Corinthian church, 2 Cor. vii. 6, 15. A little while afterwards the apostle desired him to return to Corinth, to regulate things against his own coming. Titus readily undertook this journey, and departed immediately, 2 Cor. viii. 5,

16, 17. carrying with him St. Paul's second letter to the Corinthians. Titus was made bishop of Crete about A. D. 63. when St. Paul was obliged to quit this island, to take care of other churches, Tit. i. 5. The following year he wrote to him, to desire that as soon as he should have sent Tychicus or Artemas to supply his place in Crete, Titus would come to him to Nicopolis in Macedonia, (or to Nicopolis in Epirus, on the gulph of Ambracia), where the apostle intended to pass his winter. Tit. iii. 12. [It is very extraordinary, that active as Titus appears to have been, we read nothing of him in the Acts: it can hardly be supposed, that Titus and St. Luke never met; but, possibly, they might be very little together.]

The subject of this epistle, written A. D. 64, is, to represent the qualities that should characterize church-officers. As a principal function of Titus in the isle of Crete, was to ordain bishops and deacons, it was highly incumbent on him to make a discreet choice. The apostle also suggests the advice and instructions he should give to all sorts of persons; to the aged, both men and women; to young people of either sex; to slaves and servants. He exhorts him to exercise a strict authority over the Cretans, and to reprove them with severity; on account of their lying, idleness, and gluttony. And as there were many converted Jews in Crete, he exhorts Titus to oppose their vain traditions, and fables; also to decline the observation of the legal ceremonies, as no longer necessary; to shew that the distinction of meats is abolished, and that every thing is pure and clean to those who are pure. He puts him in mind of exhorting the faithful to be obedient to temporal powers, to avoid disputes, quarrels, and slander; to engage in honest callings; and to shun the company of heretics, after the first and second admonition. [Comp. CRETE, Add.]

The Epistle to Titus has always been acknowledged by the church. The Marcionites did not receive it, Tertull. contr. Marcion. lib. v. cap. ult. nor the Basilidians, and some other heretics, says Jerom, Prolog. in Epist. ad Tit. Tatian, the chief of the Encratites, received it and preferred it before all the rest. It is not certainly known from whence it was written, nor by whom it was sent.

Titus was deputed to preach the gospel in Dalmatia; and he was there A. D. 65, when the apostle wrote his second epistle to Timothy, 2 Tim. iv. 10. He afterwards returned to Crete, whence, it is said, he propagated the gospel in the neighbouring islands. He died, aged ninety-four, and was buried in the island of Crete.

[I have been used to think, from the similarity of their contents, that the epistle to Titus, and the first to Timothy, were written at no great interval one from the other. For, if that to Timothy, suppose, were extant long before Titus wanted the advice contained in that to him, it might have been sufficient to refer him to the directions already given in a like case: and vice versa. St. Luke certainly omits many actions of St. Paul, during the period of their separation, occasioned by the Evangelist's residence in Philippi; and among them might be a voyage to Crete, and a winter abode at Nicopolis. How far this may be confirmed by remarking the "lack of opportunity" of the Philippians for sending remittances to St. Paul, occasioned by the apostle's frequent removals, also, by his "thrice suffering shipwreck," &c. so early as before his second epistle to the Corinthians; also, by his having already "preached round about unto Illyricum," &c. 2 Cor. xv. 19. must be left to the better judgment of the reader. Lardner, Michaelis, and others, place the epistle to Titus thus early. Comp. TIMOTHY, Add.]

TOB, טוב, good, or goodness. [a good place.]

TOB, the country of Tob, Tubin, or of the Tubenians, lay beyond Jordan, in the most northern part of the portion of Manasseh. Into this country Jephthah retired, when exiled by his brethren. Judges xi. 3, 5. This country is called Tobie, or Tubin, 1 Macc. v. 18. and the Jews of this district are called Tubieni, 2 Macc. xii. 17. See PLATE, MEDALS of TOB.

TOB-ADONIJAH, טוב-אדניא, my good God; from טוב tob, good, אדון adon, master, ruler, and יה jah, the Lord; otherwise, the goodness of the foundation of the Lord; from the same, tob and jah, and עדן eden, base, or foundation. [Good is my lord JAH.]

TOB-ADONIJAH, or THOBADONIAS, a Levite, and doctor of the law, sent with others by king Jehoshaphat, into the cities of Judah, to instruct the people, 2 Chron. xvii. 8. A. M. 3092, ante A. D. 910.

TOBIAH, טוביה, the Lord is good, or the goodness of the Lord, from טוב tob, good, or goodness, and יה jah, the Lord.

TOBIAH, TOBIAS, or TOBIT, was the son of Tobiel, (Ita Edit. Rom. LXX. Hebrai Munster,) and grandson of Ananiel, of the tribe of Naphtali. Others make him the son of Ananiel, niel, (Ita Hebræi Fagii, et Antiq. Edit. Latin). His habitation was in Kadesh, the capital of Napthali. The Greek text intimates, that he was of Thisbe, which was to the right of Kadesh of Napthali. Tobit married Anna, a woman of his own tribe, and had by her one son, whom after his own name, he called Tobiah, or Tobit, Tob. i. Tobiah was born A. M. 3262; married Anna about 3281: had young Tobiah in 3281; was carried captive to Nineveh in 3283, ante A. D. 721. Though he lived in the midst of Galilee, and in the kingdom of the ten tribes, where the worship of the golden calves had long prevailed, yet he did not omit to go secretly to the temple of the Lord at Jerusalem, on the solemn feasts, and there to offer his tithes and first-fruits. He continued this pious practice from his youth, till Shalmaneser took Samaria, and led him away captive to Nineveh, with his wife and son.

In this country, he abstained from the food of the Gentiles, and preserved himself pure from their defilements. God gave him favour before king Shalmaneser, who not only allowed him liberty, but made him his purveyor. "Ἡμῖν ἀντὶ ἀγοραστῆς. Tob. i. 13. Going on a time to Rages in Media, he lent to one Gabael, a Jew, his kinsman, or according to the Greek, committed to his trust, ten talents; about 3,422l.

After the death of Shalmaneser, Tobit was disgraced by king Sennacherib, his successor; was turned out of his employment, fell into great poverty, and was forced to conceal himself, to avoid the death he was threatened with. Moreover, the king confiscated his whole estate.

But after the death of Sennacherib he returned to his house, and his goods were restored to him. He continued, as before, in the exercise of piety. One day, after he had buried a dead body, left in the market place, he durst not enter his house because of the uncleanness he had thereby contracted: he therefore went to sleep under the wall of his court. While he slept here the warm dung of a sparrow, or swallow, whose nest happened to be just above him, fell into his eyes, and deprived him of sight. This misfortune, which God permitted by way of trial, did not provoke him into repining and impatience, but he still retained his integrity, notwithstanding the insults and reproaches of his relations; and of his wife herself, who asked, where were the fruits of all the works of charity he had done?

Seeing that he could be of no further use, but was become a burthen to himself and to others, he begged of the Lord to take him out of this life: and thinking himself near death, he sent his son to Gabael at Rages, to fetch the money left with him. Tobias went, married Sara, the daughter of Raguel, at Ecbatana, and brought the money to his father. Also, by means of the gall of a fish, caught on the banks of the Tigris, he restored sight to his father. Vide TOBIAH II.

Tobit intending to reward the angel Raphael, which had conducted his son to Ecbatana, and which he took to be a mere man, offered him half of the money brought out of Media. But the angel, taking them into a private place, thus spoke to them: "Bless the great God of heaven, who has thus manifested his mercy towards you. Prayer, joined to fasting and alms-giving, is better than all the riches in the world. And since you were agreeable to him, he has thought fit to make trial of your virtue. I am the angel Raphael, whom God has sent to relieve you." &c.

Then the two Tobits, father and son, prostrated themselves on the earth, worshipping God, for three hours. On this occasion Tobit composed a canticle of thanksgiving, in which he extols the greatness, the power, and the goodness of God; he foretells the end of the captivity, the restoration of Jerusalem, the magnificence of the holy city, and its temple, and the multitude of its inhabitants. After Tobit had recovered his sight, he lived forty-two years, and saw the sons of his grand-children. He was fifty-six years old when he became blind, and recovered his sight at sixty. When dying, he called his son Tobias, and his seven young grand-children, and said to them---"the destruction of Nineveh is near; the land of Israel that has been forsaken, shall be peopled again; the house of God that was burnt shall be rebuilt. My children, serve the Lord in truth; endeavour to do what is agreeable to him. Continue not long here; but as soon as you have buried your mother near me, in the same sepulchre, think of leaving this place as soon as possible."

After Tobit had lived an hundred and two years, he died in peace, and was honourably buried in Nineveh, A. M. 3263, ante A. D. 641. [He died aged 158 years. Eng. Tr.]

II. TOBIAS, son of Tobit, mentioned above, and of Anna, his wife, was born A. M. 3281, ante A. D. 723. He was very young when carried captive to Nineveh, by king Shalmaneser, (A. M. 3283) with his father, who educated him in the fear of the Lord, and in the practice of the law. His father supposing himself near death, called him, and gave him many pious instructions; also, advised him to be active in recovering the ten talents, committed to Gabael, who dwelt at Rages in Media. He added,

"Be

"Be not discouraged, my son; we are poor now, it is true, but we shall be rich enough if we fear God, if we avoid sin, and if we practise good works."

He bid Tobiah seek a guide, who would conduct him into Media. For this purpose he soon found a young man, who appeared willing to undertake the journey. Vide RAPHAEL.

When arrived at their inn, a place on the river Tigris, Tobiah went into the river to wash his feet, when presently a great fish leaped out of the water, as if it would devour him. The angel bid him take courage, seize it by the gills, and draw it to land, then to take out the heart, the gall, and the liver, which would compose some particular remedies. Being come near to Ecbatana, Tobiah asked the angel, where they should lodge? He told him there lived in that city one Raguel, who has an only daughter, whose name is Sara. You are his nearest kinsman, and all his estate ought to come to you: you must therefore marry her.

Tobiah answered, report affirms, that she hath already had seven husbands, but they are all dead, being slain by a dæmon that haunts her. I am afraid the same fate should happen to me, by which I should bring the grey hairs of my parents to the grave. The angel replied, the dæmon has power over those only who marry to gratify a brutal passion: but when you have married this young woman, live with her in continence for three nights, and the first night put upon hot coals the liver of the fish, the fume of which will drive away the evil spirit.

Raguel received them with joy. He observed in young Tobiah a great resemblance to his father, and being informed who he was, he fell on his neck, and embraced him with tears. Having ordered refreshments, Tobiah told him, he would not sit down to his table, before he promised him his daughter Sara in marriage. Raguel apprehending the same misfortune might happen to him as had happened to the other husbands of Sara, durst not return an answer; till the angel said, You need not hesitate to give your daughter to this young man: because he fears God; and your daughter is due to him, as her nearest kinsman; for which reason no other could legally marry her. Raguel then promised him his daughter; and taking Sara's right hand, and putting it into that of Tobiah, he said to them, May the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, be with you both, unite you, and pour out his blessings upon you!

After supper, Tobiah was admitted into the nuptial chamber, where having put the liver of the fish upon burning coals, the angel Raphael seized the dæmon, and chained him up in the deserts of Egypt. (See RAPHAEL and ASMODEUS; also FRAGMENTS, No. CCLXXI.) Tobiah and Sara passed the night in devotion and continence. The day following, very early, Raguel sent to see whether Tobiah were alive or dead; fearing the worst, he had provided a grave for him. But when he heard that he was living and in good health, he filled up the grave, and praised God. Then preparing a great feast, he invited all his friends and neighbours.

Tobiah gave the angel the bond, and desired him to go to Rages himself, and to receive from Gabael the money, which was the chief occasion of their journey: this he did, and brought with him Gabael himself, who desired to see young Tobiah.

In the mean time, Tobit the father, with his wife Anna, were in great trouble about their son, fearing that some misfortune had befallen him. Especially Anna was inconsolable, and went out every day that way by which he was to return, in hopes of meeting him. Nor was Tobiah himself less impatient to return to his parents. Raguel would fain have detained him longer, but Tobiah was so urgent, that at last he consented to let him depart with his wife Sara, and much property.

When they came to Charan, or Haran, Raphael said to Tobiah, you know in what condition you left your father; if you think well of it, we will go before, and let your servants and your wife come slowly after, with the cattle. This being determined on, they went forward. Anna, Tobias's mother, perceiving him at a distance, ran to carry the news to her husband. That instant came in the dog that had followed Tobiah, as it were to tell that his master was hard by. Old Tobit, blind as he was, rose up, and taking a servant by the hand, ran to meet his son, fell upon him, and embraced him; his mother did the same, and both began to weep. Tobiah then taking the gall of the fish, he rubbed his father's eyes with it, and in about half an hour afterwards a thin white film or skin, like the inward skin of an egg, began to fall from his eyes; after which he recovered his sight. Sara, Tobiah's wife, with the servants, and cattle, arrived seven days afterwards.

God blessed this marriage, and gave Tobiah seven children. After his return, he lived with his father about forty-two years. He then paid him the last duties; and having done the same by his mother, he quitted Nineveh, with his wife and children, and returned to his father and mother-in-law at Ecbatana. He also closed their eyes; and lived to see his children's children, to the fifth fifth generation. After having lived fourscore and nineteen years, he died in peace and was buried by his children. He was sent to Rages, A. M. 3322; he died A. M. 3380, ante A. D. 624. [He died aged 127 years. Eng. Tr.]

The book of Tobit contains the history of the father and son, as now related. It is thought to have been composed by them, or, at least that they left the materials out of which it was composed; for we may observe in it some reflections that seem not to have proceeded immediately from themselves. It is not doubted but that the original of this work was either in Hebrew or Chaldee, though it cannot now be found. Jerom having retrieved a Chaldee copy of it, engaged a man who perfectly understood that language, to render it into Hebrew, which version Jerom translated into Latin. This Latin translation, now in use, was declared authentic by the council of Trent. Before this, there was another translation, from the Greek, the author of which, and his age, are unknown. It was made from a different original than that of Jerom, and very often disagrees with it much. The ancient Latin translations from the Greek, were not very consistent with one another; and the Greek copies we now have are not uniform.

We have the history of Tobit in Hebrew, printed by Fagius, and by Munster. Origen had been informed, that the Jews read Tobit in their own language, Ep. ad African. Huetius had a Hebrew manuscript of Tobit in his possession. We cannot judge of that which the Jews had, and which Origen mentions, because it is unknown to us; but those of Fagius and Munster, are different from both the Greek and the Latin, and can be thought to be only copies or translations, modern enough, from the Greek or the Latin. The Syriac version has so great a conformity with the Greek, that it is easily perceived to have been made from it. Lastly, the Latin version being the most natural, the most perspicuous, and most free from foreign circumstances, has the greatest tokens of truth.

The book of Tobit not being received into the canon of the Jews, was not admitted into that of the ancient Christians. Jerom does not register it among the sacred books. Some moderns speak of it with very little respect. Paul Fagius has pretended, that it did not contain a true history, but a pious fiction; exhibiting a pattern of a good father and an obedient son; exemplifying in what manner God rewards the practice of good works, even in this life; especially the care of burying the dead.

Notwithstanding these reasons, we are assured that the Jews had always a great regard for this book. Origen, in his epistle to Africanus, says, that they read this work, but placed it among their apocryphal writings. Jerom acknowledges, that though they did not receive it into their canon, yet they admitted it among their Hagiographia: Quem Hebræi de catalogo dignarum scripturarum secantes, his quæ Hagiographa memorant manciparunt. Hier. Ep. Chromat. & Hesiod. Grotius owns that they read this work, and considered it as a true history. Præfat. in Tob. Vide & Sixt. Sen. Biblioth. lib. viii.

In the Christian church, several of the ancient fathers admitted this book as canonical. St. Cyprian quotes it in more places than one, as a divine writing, and dictated by the Holy Ghost. Testim. & lib. de Opere & Eleemos. lib. iii. Polycarp in his epistle, Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, contra Cels. lib. iii. the author of the Apostolical Constitutions, lib. i. cap. 1. iii. 15. Sts. Basil, Ambrose, Jerom, Austin, and other fathers, have often quoted it, as they quote canonical books. Tobit is mentioned in the catalogues of holy books composed by the council of Hippo. A. D. 393. Can. 98. in the third council of Carthage, A. D. 397. Can. 47. in the Epistle of Innocent I. to Exuperius; in the Roman synod, held under Gelasius; in the more modern authors, as Cassiodorus, Rabanus Maurus, Isidorus of Seville, the decree of union between the Greeks and Latins under Eugenius IV. and, lastly, in the council of Trent. [Notwithstanding which, Protestants by rejecting it avoid many difficulties; they are amply justified, by its non-existence in an authentic original; and by the contrariety found in those translations which have come down to us. It may be AUTHENTIC as a history (and probably it is founded on fact) without being CANONICAL, or inspired: and therefore it is very properly placed among the Apocryphal writings.]

III. TOBIAS, brother-in-law to the high-priest Onias II. father of Joseph, and grandfather of Hyrcanus; Josephus, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 4. This Tobias is but little known, but his son Joseph, and his grandson Hyrcanus, are very conspicuous in history. 2 Macc. iii. 11. gives Hyrcanus the surname of Tobias.

IV. TOBIAH, an Ammonite, an enemy to the Jews; he strenuously opposed the rebuilding of the temple, after the return from Babylon. Neh. ii. 10. iv. 3. vi. 1, 12, 14. A. M. 3550, ante A. D. 454. This Tobiah is called in some places the servant, or slave, of Nehemiah; probably because he was originally of servile condition. However, he became of great consideration among the Samaritans, where he was governor with Sanballat. Tobiah married the daughter of Shechaniah, a principal Jew of Jerusalem, and had a powerful party in Jerusalem itself, in opposition to Nehemiah. Neh. vi. 18. He maintained a correspondence with this party, against the interests of Nehemiah; but this prudent governor, by his wisdom and moderation, defeated all their machinations. Nehemiah being obliged to return to Babylon, after he had repaired the walls of Jerusalem, Tobiah took this opportunity to come and dwell at Jerusalem; and even obtained of Eliashib, who had the care of the house of the Lord, an apartment in the temple. But Nehemiah returning from Babylon, some years after, drove Tobiah away, and threw his goods out of the holy place. Neh. xiii. 4—8. The year is uncertain. Scripture makes no farther mention of Tobiah: probably he retired to Sanballat at Samaria.

Josephus and Jerom were of opinion, that Togarmah was the father of the Phrygians: Eusebius, Theodoret, and Isidorus of Seville, thought he peopled Armenia: the Chaldee and the Talmudists are for Germany. Several moderns believe that the children of Togarmah peopled Turco- mania in Tartary and Scythia. Bochart is for Cappadocia: in consequence of what is said, Ezekiel xxvii. 14. "they of the house of Togarmah traded in thy fairs (at Tyre) with horses and horsemen and mules." He proves that Cappadocia was famous for excellent horses and asses. He observes also, that certain Gauls, under the conduct of Trocmus, made a settlement in Cappadocia, and were called Trocmi, or Throgmi. The opinion, which places Togarmah in Scythia and Turcomania, seems to stand on the best foundation.

Togarma, Ezek. xxvii. 14. xxviii. 6. is written by the LXX. Thorgamah, Thogarma, Thergama, Thorgaba. In Josephus Thygrammes and Thorgammes. The Armenians are called by some historians Thorgomum, which probably intends the Thogarma of Moses. [See GALATIA. Add. Bochart's opinion would refer the origin of this people to France.]

The Turcos, a very ancient people of Asia, on the shores of the Caspian Sea, called Turcomans, are by the Russians called Truchmenzos, which approaches to the Throgmos, or Thurgamos, by which some write Thogarma, as above. But the distance from hence to Tyre is considered as too great for these people to have traded to the Tyrian fairs: nor is it thought their country was favourable to the breeding of mules.

M. Guldenstaedt was permitted to make some extracts from a MS. chronicle in the Georgian language, compiled by order of Tachtang, late prince of Georgia, from the archives preserved in the monasteries of Gelati, near Cutais, and of Zcheta, near Teflis. This singular history states that "In the year of the world 1792, there dwelt in a fortress, on mount Ararat, a man of the name of Targamos. He lived six hundred years, and was the father of eight sons: 1. Aos, from whom are descended the Armenians. 2. Kartelos, from whom came the Kartnelts (Georgians). 3. Baidos, ancestor of the people of Ranta (Shirvan). 4. Moakan, from whom are descended the Mokavnelts (people of Erivan). 5. Lekas, ancestor of the Lecta (Lesguis). 6. Eros, father of the Mingrella (Mingrelians). 7. Kaukas, of the Kaukasianta (Caucasians). And 8. Egros, father of the Imeretians and Caketians.

"Of these sons, the most distinguished was Kartelos. He had four sons, all of whom became Mépé, (sovereigns)."

This history mentions "Alexander Makedonaeli, (the Macedonian,) who came from Sioletti (the north) to Katweli:" took the cities in

"There are in Georgia considerable numbers of Jews, called, in the language of the country, Uria. Some have villages of their own, and others are mixed with the Georgian, Armenian, and Tartar inhabitants, but never with the Ossi. They pay a small tribute above that of the natives. According to Gaerber, there are numbers of Jews scattered over the provinces of Shirvan and Daghestan; and he says, that they subsist principally by agriculture and raising cattle, very few of them being employed in trade. He adds, that they are a very ancient colony: their Rabbins pretend that their forefathers were driven from Jerusalem into Media, by the Musul Padishah, or King of Niniveh." Ib.

TOI, or ΤΗΟΥ, king of Hamath, in Syria. When he heard that David had conquered king Hadadezer, he sent his son Joram to congratulate him on that occasion, and to offer him vessels of gold, silver, and brass. 2 Sam. viii. 9, 10, 11. A. M. 2960, ante A. D. 1044.

TOLA, תולע, worm, or grub: otherwise, scarlet, because this colour is made from a worm; from תולע tholah. [Perhaps, he was marked with crimson spots; as sometimes happens to children.]

I. TOLA, or ΤΗΟΛΑ, the tenth judge of Israel. He succeeded Abimelech, and judged Israel twenty-three years; from A. M. 2271, to 2294; ante A. D. 1310. Scripture says, Tola was the son of Puah, uncle to Abimelech by the father's side, and consequently brother to Gideon; yet Tola was of the tribe of Issachar, and Gideon was of Manasseh. To reconcile this, it is said, that Gideon and Puah might be uterine brothers; born of the same mother, who might successively have married two husbands, one of the tribe of Manasseh, from which marriage Gideon proceeded, the other of the tribe of Issachar, who was father of Puah. See St. Austin, Quest. 47. in Judic. and other commentators on Judges x. 1. [Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CCCXXIX.] Tola was buried at Shamir, a city in the mountain of Ephraim, where he dwelt. He had for successor Jair of Gilead.

II. TOLA, eldest son of Issachar, and chief of a family. Numb. xxvi. 23. Gen. xlvi. 13.

TOLAD, תולד, birth, or generation; from תלד jalad.

TOLAD, or THOLAD, a city of Judah, 1 Chron. iv. 29. yielded by Judah to Simeon. The Greeks call it Molada. [Probably the El-tolad of Josh. xv. 30. xix. 4. signifying generation of God.]

[Many nations considered themselves as children of God; Comp. Acts xvii. 28. So the Rhodians affirmed that they were children of the sun; the Romans, that they were sons of Mars; the Aicadians, that they were sons of Jupiter: the Gauls reported that they were descended from a deity named Dite, as Cæsar informs us, De Bell. Gall. lib. vi. cap. 18.]

TOMB. See SEPULCHRE.

TO-MORROW, is used in Scripture indefinitely, for any future time. For instance, Exod. xiii. 14. "when thy son asketh thee in time to come," Heb. to-morrow. And, Deut. vi. 20. "in time to come, your children might speak to our children," Heb. to-morrow: also Josh. iv. 6, 21. In the style of the Orientals to-day often signified the present life, and to-morrow, the life to come, Josh. xxii. 24. Jesus Christ forbids his disciples to indulge anxiety about to-morrow, and tells them that the morrow will take care for itself. [Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. D. Letter from late Rev. Mr. FELL.]

TONGUE. This word is taken in different senses:

1. For the natural tongue, the organ of speech.
2. For the tongue, or language, spoken in any country.

3. For good or bad discourse: thus we say, a bad tongue, a slandorous tongue, &c. Many questions are proposed about tongues, taken in the second sense, for language. See LANGUAGE.

To gnaw one's tongue, is a sign of fury, despair, and torment. The worshippers of the beast, "gnawed their tongues for pain; and blasphemed the God of heaven, because of their pains and their sores, and repented not of their deeds." Rev. xvi. 10.

Tongue of the sea, — tongue of land, are terms terms used in Scripture for an extremity or point of a sea. Or a peninsula, a cape, a promontory of land, having the sea on both sides.

Lingua eucharis, a tongue of blessing and kindness, Ecclus. vi. 5. in opposition to an ill tongue, a tongue of reproach and scandal: the first promotes friendship, love, and concord, among men; the other causes destruction, hatred and dissention.

Flagellum linguae, the flail, the lash of the tongue, malicious discourses, scandal, calumny, insulting and offensive speeches. The wise man says, Ecclus. xxvi. 6. that a jealous woman is a scourge of the tongue. In families, where polygamy was frequent, jealousy among women was the foundation of an infinite number of evil discourses and backbitings. The same author says, Ecclus. xxviii. 17, 18. "The stroke of the whip maketh marks in the flesh, but the stroke of the tongue breaketh the bone. Many have fallen by the edge of the sword, but not so many as have fallen by the tongue." And Job says, v. 21. God shall defend you from the lash of the tongue; you shall not be exposed to its strokes.

The gift of tongues with which God endowed the apostles and disciples assembled at Jerusalem, on the day of Pentecost, Acts ii. was communicated to the faithful, as appears by the Epistles of St. Paul, which regulate the manner in which this great privilege was to be used in their assemblies, 1 Cor. xii. 10. xiv. 2. and it continued in the church so long as God thought necessary, for the conversion of heathen, and the confirmation of believers. Irenæus testifies, lib. v. cap. 6. that it subsisted in the church in his time.

The Rabbins teach (see Basnage's Jewish Antiquities, tom. i. cap. 13. p. 111.) that the judges of the Sanhedrim ought to understand several tongues. Some extend the number to seventy, supposing there is only this number of languages in the world. It would be a shame to use an interpreter before this famous tribunal. Every one might present themselves here, either to accuse or to defend, without fear of not finding a judge who could understand his language. This is what the Jewish doctors pretend; but Josephus, Antiq. lib. xx. cap. ult. informs us, that the Jews made but little account of the study of languages, because they regarded it as a thing common to freemen and slaves; and which any one might acquire, if he pleased, by a little labour. They esteemed such only as studied the law and the holy writings, and who had a knowledge of them sufficiently extensive and profound, to interpret them to others.

They bring the instance of a Jew, the son of Duma, who consulting his master about the study of foreign languages, received this answer: that he must meditate on the law of God both day and night; if you can find an hour, said the master, that is neither night nor day, you may then leave the study of the law, and read Greek. Mishnah. in Sota, cap. 9. They report also, that when Jerusalem was besieged by a king of the Asmoneans, they let down every day, in a basket, over the walls, so much money as was necessary for buying lambs for the daily sacrifices, which lambs they drew up again in the same basket. But a man, who spoke Greek, having acquainted the besiegers, that so long as the sacrifices were offered the city could not be taken, they sent up a hog in the basket, instead of the usual victim: and from that time they cursed every one that could speak Greek.

Tongue of Angels, 1 Cor. xiii. 1. St. Paul says, "Though I speak with the tongues of men, and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal." Some of the ancients thought, that angels had an audible language, because Scripture says, they speak to God, and discourse with one another. Others supposed, that they used the Hebrew tongue, as being the shortest and most expressive of all languages. A Rabbin, called Sochanan, boasted that he knew the language of angels and of devils, because he could exorcise the one, and conjure the other. Vide Lightfoot—1 Cor. xiii. 1.

But these opinions are now rejected: it is agreed that angels have no audible language, either common or particular. If they speak to God, if they commune among one another, it is by an operation of spirit and will, proper to their powers and state, by which they reciprocally communicate their thoughts. Souls and spirits speak by their desires, says Gregory the Great, Moral. lib. ii. cap. 5. Animarum verba ipsa sunt desideria.

When therefore, St. Paul says, that though he should speak with the tongue of men and of angels, it would be nothing without charity; he uses a supposed hyperbole, as when we say, angelical beauty, angelical voice, &c. I would have every one set a due value on the gift of tongues, says St. Paul; but though a man possessed the most exquisite eloquence, could he speak as well as angels themselves, this inestimable gift would be of little use to him, as to salvation, if he be without charity.

TOOTH. The Hebrews called ivory, tooth, q. "elephant's tooth." 1 Kings x. 22. They also called naked and craggy rocks teeth: 1 Sam. xiv. 4. The rock from which God caused the water to gush, for quenching Samson's thirst, is called mektesh, the jaw-tooth. Judges xv. 19. When Moses appointed the law of retribution, Legem talionis, he ordered tooth for tooth. Exod. xxi. 24. To grind the teeth, to gnash the teeth, are tokens of sorrow, despair, and passion. Psal. xxxv. 16. God breaks the teeth of the wicked, Psal. lviii. 6. he puts it out of their power to injure good men. The wicked complain, that the fathers had eaten sour grapes, but the children's teeth were set on edge; Ezek. xviii. 2.—as if they would accuse God of injustice, for punishing the innocent, and sparing the guilty. Amos, iv. 6. tells the prevaricating Jews, that God had sent them cleanness of teeth, i. e. famine: They should not have wherewithal to defile their teeth. St. Jerom translates it, stuporem dentium. The Gospel, in several places, speaks of the gnashing of teeth of the damned, out of rage and despair. David says, that his enemies have teeth as sharp and piercing as swords or arrows. Psal. lvii. 4.

TOPARCHY, Τοπαρχία, a Greek word, signifying a lordship, the government of a place or district, which gives to the person who possesses it no particular title, either of governor, or president, or ethnarch, or tetrarch, or king. There is frequent mention in the Maccabees, of the three toparchies (or governments) of Apherema, Lydda, and Ramashem. 1 Macc. xi. 28. x. 30, 38. Pliny, lib. iv. cap. 14. enumerates ten toparchies of Judea; Jericho, Emmaus, Lydda, Joppa, Acrabatene, Gophnitica, Thamnica, Betholene, Tephene, Orine, wherein was Jerusalem, and lastly, Herodium. Josephus also, de Bello, lib. iii. cap. 4. names ten, of which Jerusalem was the chief; Gophna, Acrabate, Thamna, Lydda, Ammaus, Pella, Idumea, Engaddi, Herodium, Jericho. Elsewhere, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 5. he mentions three toparchies, added to Judea; Samaria, Galilee, and Perea; or Samaria, Joppa, and Galilee.

TOPAZ, Topasius, פסד, Pitdath, Exod. xxviii. 17. Vide also chap. xxxix. 10. Job xxviii. 19. Ezek. xxviii. 13. The LXX. St. Jerom, Pagninus, Leo of Juda, Junius, and the greater part of modern interpreters, translate pitdath by topaz: the paraphrasts Onkelos and Jonathan, by a green stone: Kimchi translates it the same; which agrees perfectly with the topaz, of which the finest are green. Pliny says, lib. xxxvii. cap. 8. Egregia topazio gloria est, suo virenti genere. Yet others maintain, that the most beautiful topazes are of a gold colour. It is probable enough that Moses expresses the topaz by the Hebrew pitdath, which has a good deal of resemblance to topazios, being read backwards. It is pretended this stone was named topaz, from an island in the Red Sea, of the same name. Pliny reports Juba king of Mauritania, to have been the first who found them: but if it were known to Moses, it must be much more ancient. Job speaks of the pitdath of Cush; Job xxviii. 19. which may confirm the opinion of those who suppose the topaz came from the Red Sea; because there was a country of Cush on the eastern shore of this sea.

Others conceive that pitdath signifies an emerald. Pliny says, lib. xxxvii. cap. 5. that the emerald is of a fine green, and comes from Ethiopia. The land of Cush often signifies Ethiopia; and Job speaks of the pitdath of Cush. [There were mines of emeralds on the Egyptian coast of the Red Sea; on the opposite coast was Cush.] This stone was the second of the first row in the pontifical breast plate, and had the name of Simeon on it. Exod. xxviii. 17.

The LXX. Psal. cxix. 127. translate by topazion the Hebrew word pas, or phaz, which rather signifies the purest gold, the gold of Phaz, or Pison. Compare Jer. x. 9. 1 Kings ix. 28. Dan. x. 5. Job xxvii. 22. [UPHAZ.]

TOPHEL, לפח, Τοφάλ, ruin, folly, without understanding, insipid; from לפח thaphil. Deut. i. 1. [Murmuring. Whether this was, where murmurings for want of food, or what other cause, happened? The Arabic signifies spit out, abominable, or stinking.]

TOPHET, תפת, drum; from תפ thoph: otherwise, betraying; from פתח pathah.

[TOPHET, detestation, execration. A place near Jerusalem, which was rendered abominable by idolatry. 2 Kings xxiii. 10. Jer. vii. 31. that very detestable place; the name is enforced, Isaiah xxx. 3.]

TOPHET. It is thought Tophet was the butchery, or place of slaughter at Jerusalem, lying south of the city, in the valley of the children of Hinnom. It is also said, that a constant fire was kept here, for burning the offal, and other filth, brought from the city. Into the same place they cast the ashes and remains of the images of false gods, when they demolished their altars and statues. Isaiah, xxx. 33. seems to allude to the custom of burning dead carcasses in Tophet, when speaking of the defeat of the army of Sennacherib, he says "For Tophet is ordained of old; yea, for the king it is prepared; [we may read, "for Moloch it is prepared."] he hath made it deep and large. The pile thereof is fire and much wood: the breath of the Lord, like a stream of brimstone doth kindle it."

Others think the name of Tophet was given given to the valley of Hinnom, because of the sacrifices offered there to the god Moloch, by beat of drum, to drown the cries of the consuming children. In Hebrew, a drum is called toph. Vide MOLOCH.

Jeremiah, vii. 31. upbraids the Israelites with having built temples to Moloch, "The high places of Tophet, which is in the valley of the sons of Hinnom, to burn their sons and their daughters in the fire." We learn from the same prophet, that Tophet was a polluted and unclean place, where they used to throw the carcasses to which they refused burial, chap. vii. 32. xix. 11, 12, 13. King Josiah defiled the place of Tophet, where the temple of Moloch stood, that nobody might go thither any more, to sacrifice their children to that cruel deity. 2 Kings xxiii. 10, 11.

TORRENT, or BROOK. In Palestine, Arabia, and the neighbouring countries, where water is scarce, and the heat excessive, to find a torrent, brook, or rivulet, in the wilderness, or on a journey, is very acceptable and refreshing. God promises his people, that at their return from the captivity of Babylon, he would provide them streams of waters, in the deserts through which they should be obliged to pass. Isai. xxxv. 6. Jer. xxxi. 9. The Psalmist describes the Messiah, as a conqueror at the head of his army, who finds water in abundance on his march. Psal. cx. 7. [Others understand this very differently; He shall drink of the brook of suffering:—rather, the brook of personal consolation, and Divine supports.]

Figuratively, a torrent generally signifies plenty and abundance, whether of good or evil. A torrent or river of tears, Lam, ii. 18. Ps. xviii. 4. a torrent of iniquity, or torrent of Belial, according to the Hebrew. Psal. cxxiv. 5. My soul has passed through the torrent, it has been, as it were, plunged in the waters, but God has preserved it. A torrent of sulphur, &c. and in a contrary sense, a torrent or river of delights, of peace; rivers of gold, of butter and honey. Job xxii. 24. xx. 15.

[TORTOISE, Testudo. This is a class of animals, which is strongly allied to the reptile kinds. Tortoises are amphibious; yet some species more particularly affect the sea, or water; others the land. The sea tortoise is generally called turtle; but those kinds which are eaten under that denomination, were unknown to the ancients: yet some might probably be known to Moses, as beside those land tortoises which are common in the East, in Greece, &c. some of the larger kinds of sea turtle have been found and killed at the mouth of the Nile. Nevertheless, the Hebrew choled, which our translators render tortoise, Lev. xi. 29. is by some rendered land crocodile, by others green frog:—it is an unclean animal; but the choled, if it be the tortoise, seems to be strangely inserted between the mouse and the ferret, which are land vermin; it should seem rather to mean the weasel, accordingly the LXX. so render it, and so the Vulgate, mustela.]

TOTAPHOTH, תופת, Totaphot. LXX. 'Ασάλευροι. Aquila 'Ενεκρά. Exod. xiii. 16. Deut. vi. 8. xi. 18. [Sign, token, Eng. Tr.] Jerom translates it by appensum quid, an appendage; and elsewhere by a sign. Several commentators think, that totaphoth is an Egyptian word, and denotes some sort of ornament, with which we are not well acquainted. The Septuagint generally translate it by things immovable, Aquila, by things appendant. The Chaldee paraphrasts sometimes translate it by tephelim, preservatives; sometimes by a tiara, a crown, a bracelet, probably according to the custom of the Jews of their time, who took the totaphoth for rolls of parchment, which they wore upon their foreheads. The Syriac has it, a memorial before your eyes; Paguinus, bandages before the eyes.

Some Rabbins say, that totaphoth signifies a looking glass; and several learned men conjecture (Oleas. Munst. Mayer. Grot. &c.) that in Egyptian it signifies spectacles. Scaliger, and Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Matthew xxiii. explain it by amuleta, phylacteries, preservatives; Samuel Petit, Var. Lect. cap. 20. תופת, pudenda è luto efformata: in the Septuagint he reads Αζα λευτα, from ἀζα, dust, and λευτα, pudenda, instead of 'Ασάλευρα, as usually read, i. e. obscene figures which the Pagans wore about them by way of preservative. St Jerom imagined, they were rolls of parchment that were moveable before, or between, the eyes of the Jews. Deut. vi. 8. Movebuntur ante oculos tuos: chap. xi. 18. Inter oculos vestros collocate: Exod. xiii. 16. Quasi appensum quid. And in his commentary on Matth. xxiii. though he quotes the Septuagint, who translate totaphoth by immoveable things, yet he does not omit to observe that the Pharisees explained the words of Moses too literally, and wrote the decalogue on ships of parchment, folded them up, put them upon their foreheads, and made as it were a crown of them, which was in motion upon their eyes. He remarks, that the Jews of India, Babylonia, and Persia, retained this custom in his time: and those who wore these rolls were esteemed the most devout. Vide PHYLACTERIES, ΤΕΦΗΛΙΜ, and PLATE.

I should

I should think that the word totaphoth signifies pendants, worn upon the forehead, and hanging down between the eyes. See Gen. xxiv. 22. And that Moses requires that the law of God should be always present to the minds of the Israelites, as those ornaments of the forehead were always before the eyes of those who wore them. The word totaphoth might, perhaps, be Egyptian. I observe, in most of the figures of priests, represented in the pictures of Isis, a little ornament raised upon the forehead, fixed to their bonnet. This ornament does not seem to be flowing on the forehead, but like a leaf turned up. By the words of Moses it should be an ornament peculiar to men, because he exhorts men not to forget the commandments of God, and not to lose sight of them, no more than they did of the totaphoth, which they hung on their foreheads. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCXXXVI. and Plate of PRIESTS' DRESSES.

TOUCHING, Tangere. "Of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die." Gen. iii. 3. To touch a woman, Gen. xx. 6. Non permisi ut tangeres eam. And St. Paul, Bonum est homini mulierem non tangere: 1 Cor. vii. 1. It is best for a man to live in a state of continence. Isai. lii. 11. Do not touch, or eat, any thing unclean. The touching of unclean things defiled those who were clean, and the touching of holy things defiled those who were unclean, or who were not qualified to touch them. See Lev. v. 2, 3. vi. 18, 27, &c. God forbids to build an altar to him of such stones as had been touched by an iron tool. Deut. xxvii. 5. Josh. viii. 31. See HOLY ADD.

To touch, is also used for to punish, or to put to death. "We shall know that it is not his hand that smote us," that sent this misfortune upon us; 1 Sam. vi. 9. "Touch not my anointed;" 1 Chron. xvi. 22. Psalm cv. 15. And in Job i. 11. "Touch all which he possesses." Wisdom iii. 1. "The pangs of death do not touch them:" Also, chap. xviii. 20. Tetigit et justos tentatio mortis. Even the just themselves—the Israelites, were struck with death.

God touches the heart of those in whom he inspires sentiments of conversion and piety. Jer. iv. 18. 1 Sam. x. 26. Speaking after the manner of men, God himself is touched with repentance and grief, Gen. vi. 6. Tactus dolore cordis intrinsecus; or rather, he acts as if he really repented. [by conforming his judgments to the deserts of men.]

Jesus Christ upbraids the Pharisees with refusing so much as to touch with their finger those burdens which they laid upon others, Luke xi.

46. And God says, that the wicked Israelites do not stay to be purified from their first murders, before they commit fresh ones, Hos. iv. 2. Blood touched blood.

To touch the feet, expresses supplication. See Exod. iv. 25. 2 Kings iv. 27, 37.

TOWER, Turris; in Greek Πύργος, Pyr-gos; in Hebrew, Migdol. See MIGDOL.

TOWER of Strato. See STRATO.

TOWER of Siloam was probably near the fountain of that name, east of Jerusalem. Vide SILOAM, and MAP of JERUSALEM.

TOWER of the Flock, or Tower of Adar. Vide ADAR. It is said this tower was in the neighbourhood of Bethlehem, Gen. xxxv. 21. and that the shepherds, to whom the angel revealed the birth of our Saviour, appeared near this tower, where afterwards a church was built. Luke ii. 8, 15. Jerom, Ep. 27. Many interpreters assert, that this passage of Micah, "And thou tower of the flock, the strong hold of the daughter of Zion," stood for the city of Bethlehem; others maintain, that the prophet intended [the royal Zion, near] the city of Jerusalem.

TOWER of the Watchmen, 2 Kings xvii. 9. xviii. 8. We often find this form of speaking in Scripture—"From the tower of the watchmen to the fenced city," to express in general all the places [structures] of a country from the least to the greatest. A tower of watchmen, or of shepherds, stood alone in the midst of a plain, to lodge shepherds and herdsmen, who looked after the flocks;—or watchmen. King Uzziah caused several towers to be built for shepherds in the desert; and made many cisterns there, because he had a great number of flocks; 2 Chron. xxvii. 10. The Tower of the Flock, mentioned before, and that which Isaiah notices, v. 2. built in a vineyard, were of the same kind. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCXXXV. and Plate of AGRICULTURE. See GADARA, II. 7. Add.

Scripture speaks of the Tower of Phanel, of that of Succoth, of Shechem, and others: these were a kind of citadel or fortress to those cities. The Tower of Babel, was also, as it were, the fortress of Babylon; Faciamus Civitatem & Turrim, Gen. xi. 4, 5. Jerom observes, ad Princ. that the Septuagint often use in the Greek the word baris, which is a word proper to Palestine, to signify houses that were shut up on all sides, and constructed in the manner of towers. And this is probably what he would express in 2 Chron. xvii. 12. when he says, Jehoshaphat built in Judah houses in the form of towers. Edificavit in Judah domos ad instar turrium. The Hebrew has Biranioth, from the Chaldee bira, a palace. Vide BARIS. [They are common in some parts of Greece, not wholly subjugated to the Turks, as Mainia, &c.]

Mention is also made of several towers in the city of Jerusalem; of which the true situation is little known. We shall not venture to determine here any thing of them.

Ezekiel, in two places, xxix. 10. xxx. 6. speaks of the Tower of Syene; Heb. בִּירְנִיּוֹת Biranioth:—A turre Syenes, usque ad terminos Æthiopiæ. But we have shewn, under the article SYENE, that the passage ought to be translated, from Migdol or Magdolum, a city in the Lower Egypt, to the city of Syene, at the southern extremity of Upper Egypt, on the frontiers of Ethiopia.

TOWER of Babel. See BABEL. The LXX. read, Isaiah x. 9. 'Οὐκ ἔλαβον τὴν χώραν τὴν ἐπάνω Βαβυλώνος, καὶ Καλάνης ἡ ὁ πύργος ὠκοδομηθῆναι, Did not I take the country which is above Babylon and Chalaneh, where the tower was built?—The Greek fathers, who used this version, and thought it correctly represented the Hebrew, were really persuaded that this famous tower was built above Babylon, and that Chalaneh was the place where it was raised. But the Hebrew text implies, Is not Calaneh as Carchemish, Hamath as Arpad, and Samaria as Damascus? i. e. Have not I subdued all these cities? Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DXCII.

TOWER of Shechem, Judg. ix. 46, &c. A citadel, or fortress, [Acropolis] standing on higher ground than the rest of the city, and capacious enough to receive above a thousand persons. After Abimelech had taken and razed the city of Shechem, he endeavoured also to take this tower, to which the inhabitants had retired; but as he could not conquer it, because it was extremely strong, he resolved to set it on fire; whereby all who had taken refuge in the tower, perished in the flames, or were stifled by the smoke.

TRACONITIS, Τρακωνίτις, rough, strong, from the Greek τραχὺν. [rocky, or rugged.]

TRACHONITIS, TRACHONITE, or DRACHONITE. St. Luke, iii. 1. says, that in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, Philip, son of Herod the Great, was Tetrarch of Iturea, and of Trachonitis. This province had Arabia Deserta east, Batanea west, Iturea south, and the country of Damascus north. Trachonitis is often ascribed to Arabia, to which it rather belongs than to Palestine. Josephus, Antiq. lib. i. cap. 7. says, it is situate between Palestine and Coelo-Syria, and was peopled by Hush or Cush, a son of Aram. The road to Trachonitis lay toward the lake Phiala, where were the sources of the Jordan. This province was full of rocks, which served to harbour a great number of thieves and robbers, who often found employment for Herod the Great, as may be seen in Josephus. Eusebius says, in loc. voce Kanath, that the tribe of Manasseh extended into Trachonitis, towards Bostra; elsewhere, that Iturea penetrated also into Trachonitis, and into the desert near Bostra. Jerom says, that Trachonitis is beyond Bostra, inclining towards Damascus. Strabo speaks of two mountains called Trachones, which were above Damascus, towards Arabia and Iturea, where are steep mountains with caves in them, that would afford retreats to a thousand men. Comp. FRAGMENTS, Nos. DLVIII. DLIX.

TRADITION. A sentiment, custom, &c. not written in the holy books, but delivered down by succession, and, as it were, from hand to hand, is called tradition.

The Jews did not commit their traditions to writing, before their wars against the Romans, first under Vespasian, afterwards, under Adrian and Severus. Then the Rabbin Judas, surnamed the Holy, composed the Mishna, i. e. the second law; which is the most ancient collection of Jewish traditions. To this were added the Gemara of Jerusalem, and that of Babylon, which, together with the Mishna, form the Talmud of Jerusalem, and that of Babylon; these compose the supplement and explication of the Mishna, or principal code of their traditions. Vide MISHNA, TALMUD.

Jesus Christ, in the Gospel, often censured the false traditions of the Pharisees. He reproached them with preferring these traditions to the law itself; for the observation of which they even violated the commandments of God. Mark vii. 7, 8, 9, 10, &c. Matth. xv. "For laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men.—Full well ye reject the commandment of God, that ye may keep your own tradition." He gives several instances of their falsifications of the law, of their superstitious adherence to vain observances, while they neglected essential things. However, the Pharisees and Jews have not abated their supercilious zeal for the traditions of their fathers; and those who cherish not a blind respect for them, or do not pay unlimited submission to them, are looked upon as heretics. Witness the Caraites, who adhere to the text of Scripture, and who admit of no traditions, but such as coincide with the words and intention of the lawgiver.

The Jews call their traditions the Oral Law, pretending that God delivered them to Moses verbally, on mount Sinai, when he gave him the written law; that this lawgiver taught and committed mitted them to the elders of the people, as a trust, which they were to convey down to their successors; and so on. Through this channel the Jews pretend to have received all their traditions, which are read at this day, in the Talmuds: and hence proceeds their extravagant veneration for them; which is carried so far, as to make them prefer these before the most express texts of Scripture. See LAW Oral.

The Christians also had traditions, which they received from Jesus Christ, or his apostles. St. Paul, 2 Thess. ii. 15. says, "Therefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word, or by our epistle." The ancient fathers acknowledged the truth and authority of the apostolical traditions, as well written as not. Vide Iren. contra Hæres. lib. iii. cap. 3, 4. Tertull. de Corona Militis, cap. 3. Basil, ad Amphilocho. de Spiritu Sancto, cap. 29. Chrysost. in 2 Thessal. ii. Epiphian. Hæres. lxi. August. Ep. olim. 118. nunc. 54. ad Januar. But they have not pretended that we must blindly receive as apostolical traditions all that may be put upon us as such. Reason and discretion teach us to distinguish the true from the false: we are obliged to admit of none, but such as are approved of and authorized, by general consent in the church.

[TRANCE, seems to mean, in Scripture language, a rapture of mind, an ecstasy; in what a trance might differ from a vision, it is not easy to say; unless, that during a vision, the senses of the person who beheld it were awake and active; whereas, during a trance, the bodily senses were suspended. St. Paul was in a trance when rapt up into the third heaven, and he could not tell whether he were "in the body or out of the body;" certainly this implies a temporary absence of the exercise of the bodily senses, at least. The LXX. render by the word ecstasy, what the Hebrew expresses by a deep sleep, or a dead sleep. Adam might be in a trance when Eve was formed from his side: Balaam was in a trance when he saw the visions of the Almighty: Daniel and St. John appear to have been in trances, and to have had their mental faculties greatly enlarged, invigorated, and exalted, in order to receive those communications which were about to be made to them. Whether immediate communications of supernatural information, from supernatural personages and powers, might not always be too powerful (unless expressly prevented) for the constitution of the human body, so as to produce a trance, astonishment, ecstasy, or temporary kind of approach towards death, by the suspension of the personal faculties, may deserve consideration.]

TRAGELAPHUS, τρῆ, Alko; from the Greek τράγος, a goat, and ελαφόν, a stag.

TRANSFIGURATION. After our Saviour had enquired of his disciples, what men thought of him? and, what they themselves thought of him? St. Peter answered, that he was the Son of the living God. Then Jesus Christ began to speak of his passion, as at hand, Matth. xvi. 28. adding, "Verily, I say unto you, there be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the son of man coming in his kingdom." Six days after this promise,—[Matth. xvii. 1. says six days; but Luke ix. 28. mentions eight days; probably because he counted inclusively, reckoning the day of the promise, and the day of the execution of that promise; whereas the other evangelist regarded only the six intermediate days. One evangelist also says, about eight days—the other, after six days.]—Jesus taketh Peter, James, and John his brother, and bringeth them up into an high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them, and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light: and behold there appeared unto them Moses and Elias talking with him."

The subject of their conversation, says St. Luke, was the expected suffering, and death of Jesus at Jerusalem.

We conceive that this transfiguration happened in the night: hence proceeded the sleep which oppressed the apostles. Moreover, St. Luke observes that the next day they came down from the mountain. Luke ix. 37. Therefore they had passed the preceding night there. The chief design of the Son of God in this transfiguration, was, according to the fathers, to fulfil his promise made a few days before, that he would let some of his disciples see a glimpse of his glory before their death; and to fortify them against the scandal of the cross; by giving them this convincing proof that he was the Messiah. It is observed, with great reason, that the condition in which Jesus Christ appeared among men, humble, weak, poor, despised, was a true and continual transfiguration; whereas, the transfiguration itself, in which he shewed himself in the real splendor of his glory, was his true and natural condition.

[It is probable, that being well aware of the sufferings which awaited him at Jerusalem, Jesus himself was refreshed by this manifestation, and by the encouragement resulting from a view of the glory that should follow his crucifixion: hence his decease is not expressed by the usual term for death, but by the term exodus, implying a deliverance from suffering, with an admission

nion into a state of happiness; as the Israelites were released, by their exodus, from the bondage of Egypt, and conducted into Canaan, the land of rest, from their labours and wanderings.]

It is the common opinion of interpreters, that this transfiguration occurred upon mount Tabor: but this opinion is attended with great difficulties. Vide TABOR.

As to the appearance of Moses and Elias, it is asked, how could the apostles know them? It is answered, that Jesus Christ might call them by their names; or, he might tell his apostles so afterwards. Or, the apostles might know them by pictures or descriptions, received from their ancestors: for it cannot be doubted but that among the Jews there was a covert tradition of these matters, as there is in the Christian church, concerning the likeness, for instance, of St. Peter, or of St. Paul.

The fathers observe in this manifestation, that the law, represented by Moses, and the prophets, represented by Elias, gave testimony to our Saviour. It is believed that Moses was raised from the dead on this occasion: as for Elias, he did not die; and he came from the place where he now is, a place unknown to men, to appear on the mount of transfiguration. Some have thought that these two holy persons did not appear in reality, but in figure only. See SOUL, SPIRIT.

TRANSMIGRATIONS. See CAPTIVITIES. Great difficulties are started concerning the country whither the ten tribes of Israel were transplanted. Scripture informs us, 2 Kings xv. 29. 1 Chron. v. 26. that Tiglath-Pilneser carried away Napthali, Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, from beyond Jordan, to Halah, to Habor, and to Hara, A.M. 3264. About twenty years after, in 3283, when Salmanasser took Samaria, he carried off the rest of Israel into Assyria, to Haluh, to Habor, on the river of Gozan, and into the cities of the Medes. 2 Kings xvii. 6. xviii. 10. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DLXXI.

Lahela and Halah are certainly the same, and probably denote the land of Havilah or Cholchis. Habor, or Chabor, is the river Chaboras, and the country watered by it. Gozan, or Gauzan, is the name of the province through which the river Chaboras flows, according to 2 Kings xviii. 10. In Habor fluvii Gozan; and xvii. 6. In Habor juxta fluvium Gozan. There is also a district in Media, called Gauzan, between the rivers Cyrus and Cambyses. Benjamin of Tudela places Gozan in Media, four days journey from Hamdam. By Gozan the Jews understand the river Sabbatium, which does not run on the

VOL. II. PART XXX. Edit. IV.

Sabbath-day; but on this day is surrounded by fire, so as not to be passable.

Hara, or Ara, is in Media. This is probably the province of the Areans, known to the ancient geographers. Benjamin of Tudela assures us, that there were in Media fifty cities peopled by Israelites. We see by Tobit i. 11, 16. iii. 7. v. 8. that there were Israelites at Nineveh, at Rages in Media, at Shushan, or Susa, and at Ecbatana. In our Saviour's time there were Israelites scattered through the provinces of the East, Acts ii. 9, 10, 11. Persia, Media, the country of Elam, Mesopotamia, Cappadocia, Pontus, Asia, Phrygia, Pamphilia, Egypt, Cyrenaica, the island of Crete, Arabia, &c. St. James, i. 1. writes to the twelve tribes that were dispersed. Philo, Legat. ad Caium, describes the Jews as being very numerous throughout the East, under the empire of the Persians. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 5. speaking of the ten tribes, says, that in his time they were in great multitudes beyond the Euphrates. And Jeron, in Ezech. xxiii. assures us, that even in his time the ten tribes existed in captivity, in the mountains and cities of Media.

The second book of Esdras, xiii. 41, &c. advances a notion, that the Israelites carried captive by Salmanasser, resolved on withdrawing from among the nations, that they might serve God with greater liberty; and that for this purpose they passed over the Euphrates, God having opened the channel of this river, by a miracle in their favour, like that when he gave the Hebrews passage over the Jordan, under Joshua. They marched a year and a half before they arrived at the place they intended. At last they settled at Arzeret, where they are to remain to the latter ages, and then the Almighty will recall them, and again open a passage for them through the Euphrates.

But where is this country of Arzeret? The Hebrews themselves do not know it. Josephus Ben-Gorion says, that when Alexander the Great would have passed over the dark mountains which separate the country of the Israelites from the other nations, he was prevented by a voice which cried to him, Take care that you enter not into the House of God. Benjamin of Tudela reports, that after a journey of one and twenty days, as he travelled towards the North, he arrived at the kingdom of the Rechabites, the extent of which was sixteen days journey. Of the cities of this kingdom he relates many particulars, but does not say that this was the kingdom of Arzeret.

Manasseh Ben-Israel pretends, in La Esperanza di Israel, that the Israelites of the ten tribes retired retired into Tartary, whence several of them passed into America; which opinion is not peculiar to him. Many learned men have thought (Philip. Mornay, de Verit. Relig. Christ. cap. 26. Geneb. Chronic. Religions du Monde, tom. ii. Vide Grot. de Origin. Gent. Americ.) that the ten tribes were settled in Tartary; whence they have spread into Russia, Muscovy, Poland, Lithuania, where they are in greater numbers than in any other places of Europe. The Tartars have preserved several Jewish customs. They eat no swines-flesh, are circumcised at nine years old, observe the Levitical law, which requires that the brother shall marry his brother's wife, if he dies without children. Davity relates, Etats du Turc en Asie, p. 124, 168. that the king of Thabor, in Tartary, came into France in the reign of Francis I. and proposed to this prince to become a Jew. He made the same proposal to several other princes of Europe, who received it with contempt.

It is believed that several Jews passed from Tartary into China. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DCIV.

As to that opinion which supposes the Israelites of the ten tribes, or a part of them, to have passed into America, the foundation of it is this: Montesini, in his relation addressed to Manasseh Ben-Israel, says, that he found many Israelites concealed behind the mountains Cordilleron [Cordilleras], which are on the confines of Chilly [Chili] in Armenia, [South America.] He adds, that when he advanced farther into this country, he arrived at the banks of a river, and a signal being given, he saw people appear who pronounced in Hebrew those words of Deuteronomy, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord thy God, is the only [one] Lord." They held Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to have been their progenitors, and pretended to be of the posterity of Reuben. They said they had been brought into this country by the particular and miraculous providence of God; that at the instigation of the Magi, the Indians had three times waged war against them, but that the Israelites had always been victorious. That at last, the Magi having escaped the slaughter, declared that the God of Israel was the only true God, and that at the consummation of ages the Israelites should become masters of the world.

This relation of Montesini deceived Manasseh, who thereupon composed his treatise called The Hope of Israel. In this he maintains, that Asia and America were heretofore but one continent, which God divided at the streights of Anian: that it was before this separation the Israelites passed thither, and fixed themselves there, notwithstanding the opposition of the inhabitants. He supports this opinion from those words of the prophet Isaiah, li. 5, "The isles shall wait upon me, and on mine arm shall they trust." xlii. 4. "The isles shall wait for his law." America, says Manasseh, is intended by the word isles in these passages. [Behring's Straits, which separate Asia from America, are so narrow, that both shores may be seen from a ship sailing in mid-channel.]

Sir William Penn, in his letter concerning the state of the dominions of the English in America, is persuaded, that the Americans originally were derived from the Hebrews. Their countenances, especially those of their children, have so exact a resemblance to those of Jews, that in looking upon them any one would think that they saw the Jews themselves. Their eyes are small and black: they reckon by moons: they offer up their first-fruits: their altars are said to be composed of twelve stones: their mournings continue a year: their women observe the same customs as the Jewesses: their language is masculine, short, close, energetic; one word serves instead of three, the rest being supplied by the hearers.

Others add, that the Mexicans receive circumcision; that giants have been seen heretofore in their country; that the Americans have some notion of the deluge, and of the passage over the Red Sea: that in some places of Peru they kill a white lamb, the blood of which they mingle with meal and distribute it to the people, who with this blood make a token over the doors of their houses. Some of them believe a resurrection; they keep up a perpetual fire in honour of their gods; observe a year of jubilee at the end of fifty years, and a sabbath every week. These marks of conformity between the Americans and the Israelites, and many others that have been taken notice of, cannot be merely casual. It must therefore be acknowledged, that the Israelites penetrated as far as America, either by China, or some other way.

Some Jews suppose them to have passed thither from Spain or France; and these understand the words of Obadiah, verse 20, to allude to this passage. Vide SOPHARAD, BOSPHORUS.

But, when we consider these proofs with a little attention, and examine the facts advanced as foundations of this opinion, we find a great part of these characters fallacious; other parts are doubtful, and others equivocal. If we observe among the Americans some traces of Judaism, we may also observe some marks of Christianity, but more especially a declared open Paganism and idolatry. So that nothing can be reasonably reasonably concluded about the origin of the Americans, as proceeding from either Jews or Christians.

It has been said, long ago, that the ten tribes, at least a part of them, are settled in Ethiopia. It is thought that at, and after, the time of Solomon, many Hebrews followed the queen of Sheba. Rabbi Eliezer tells us, vide Bartolocci, Bibl. Rabbin. tom. 1. p. 129. that in the time of Jeroboam, the tribe of Dan went into this country, and, after some time, that the tribes of Napthali, of Gad, of Asher, and of Moses, went thither. The tribe of Moses, (of which tribe Scripture mentions nothing) according to him, was idolatrous: but being converted, they built themselves palaces in the land of their settlement. These tribes united, under a powerful monarch of their own nation, who could bring into the field, six score thousand horse, and a hundred thousand foot. But what we may be certain of is, that in Ethiopia there are many Jews, that they are brave and warlike, and that, at times, some of them have been powerful. In the seventeenth century one of them proclaimed himself king of a little mountainous country, which was of very difficult access; as we are informed by the two ambassadors of the king of Ethiopia, whom M. Bernier saw at the court of the great Mogul. Bernier, Voyage de Cachemire, lib. iv. These Jews pretend to be descended from Judah, and there is no proof of their descent from other tribes. [Mr. BRUCE confirms this; and has given a history of their nation, with particulars of their policy, &c. in his Travels to discover the Source of the Nile.]

Olaus Rudbek, son of the famous M. Rudbek, author of the Atlantica, in his Laponia Illustrata, pretends, that we must not expect to find the remains of the ten tribes of Israel either in Asia, or in Africa, and much less in America; but in the utmost northern climes, even in his own country, Lapland. These surmises he supports by some general probabilities, and by the conformity between the manners and ceremonies of the Laplanders and those of the Jews. But, upon this foundation, there can be no country in the world in which the Jews of the ten tribes, may not be found.

Certain it is, first, that there is no place of the earth known to us, where the ten tribes can be found politically united, as one people: Secondly, that there are but few countries where there are not Jews, i.e. Israelites, and consequently, some traces of their religion: Thirdly, that a great number of captive Israelites returned into their own country under the governments of the Persians and Greeks: Fourthly, that the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, and the ten tribes of Israel, are at present so blended together, that it is hardly possible to distinguish them, and therefore it is needless to give ourselves trouble in seeking the ten tribes in any part of the world. See CAPTIVITY, &c. [Sir W. JONES has lately hinted at their settlement toward India, which is very probable. But Major Rennell having found the cities mentioned in S.S. still existing in Media and Persia, finds in the same districts vast numbers of Jews, at this day. That colonies of Jews might travel to great distances, is evident, from the Black Jews found in India, by Dr. Buchanan, together with White Jews, &c.]

TREASURE, אוצר, Θησαυρος. Thesaurus. The Hebrew word signifies any thing collected together, in stores, provisions, magazines. So, a treasure of corn, of wine, of oil; treasures of gold, silver, brass; treasures of coined money. Snow, winds, hail, rain, waters, are in the treasures of God: "He bringeth the wind out of his treasures," Psal. cxxxv. 7. Jer. li. 16. We say also, a treasure of good works, treasures of iniquity, to lay up treasures in heaven, to bring forth good or evil out of the treasures of the heart. The wise men opened their treasures, i.e. their packets or bundles, to offer presents to our Saviour. Joseph told his brethren, when they found their money returned in their sacks, that God had given them treasures. Gen. xliii. 23. The treasures of the house of God, whether in silver, corn, wine, or oil, were under the care of the Levites, the porters, or door-keepers, of the temple. The kings of Judah, had also keepers of their treasures, both in city and country; 1 Chron. xxvii. 25. 2 Chron. xxxii. 27, &c. and the places where these magazines were laid up were called treasure-cities.

Pharoah compelled the Hebrews to build him treasure-cities, or magazines: Exod. i. 11. ערי מסכנות, Urbes Tabernaculorum, says the Vulgate; but the best interpreters translate the Hebrew by treasure. This word is often used to express any thing whatever in great abundance. Colos. ii. 3. "In Jesus Christ are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." The Wise Man says, that wisdom contains in its treasures understanding, the knowledge of religion, &c. St. Paul, Rom. ii. 5. speaks of heaping up a treasure of wrath against the day of wrath, &c. And the prophet Amos says, iii. 10. they treasure up iniquity, they lay up iniquity as it were in a store-house; which will bring them a thousand calamities.

The treasures of impiety or iniquity, Prov. x. 2.
2 U 2 express

express ill-got riches. The treasures of iniquity, says the Wise Man, will eventually bring no profit; in the same sense, Christ calls the riches of iniquity, Mammona iniquitatis, an estate wickedly acquired. Luke xvi. 9.

Gospel faith is the treasure of the just; but St. Paul says, 2 Cor. iv. 7. "We have this treasure in earthen vessels." Isaiah says of a good man, xxxiii. 6. "the fear of the Lord is his treasure." We read, Eccus. xxix. 11. "Lay up thy treasure, according to the commandment of the Most High, and it will bring thee more profit than gold." Our Saviour tells us, Matth. xii. 35. "A good man, out of the good treasure of his heart, bringeth forth good things; and an evil man, out of the evil treasure, bringeth forth evil things." Nothing can proceed from us, but what is within us, whether good or evil.

Under the name of treasure, is often understood some secret, unknown, and precious thing. Deut. xxviii. 12. "The Lord shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven, to give the rain unto thy land, in his due season." The terrible effects of the vengeance of the Lord, "Is not this laid up in store with me, and sealed up among my treasures?" Job asks, "Have you penetrated the treasures of the snow, and have you seen the treasures of the hail? All these things are unknown to mortals; God keeps them concealed in his treasuries."

TREES. There is hardly any thing less certain in Scripture, than the Hebrew names of plants and trees. [which amount to, at least, two hundred and eighty.] We shall not attempt to enumerate them here, but rather, as occasions offer, shall speak of the chief of them mentioned in Scripture.

[TREES. Barren trees in Judea, were stigmatized with marks of infamy. Trees which shook off their fruits before they were ripe, were marked with red, and loaded with stones, say the Rabbins. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. LXVII. Matt. xxi. 14. Mark xi. 12.]

When the Jews had planted a vine, or fruit-tree, they were not allowed to eat the fruit, during the first three years: They offered to God that of the fourth year, and afterwards might use whatever those trees produced. Lev. xix. 23. The fruit of the first three years was accounted unclean: Scripture says, that for these three years they allowed a sort of circumcision to the trees: Auferetis præputia eorum. After this they became common. They profaned (as it were) their trees, after they had offered the first fruits to the Lord.

Tree of Life: this was a tree planted in the midst of Paradise; whose fruit had the power of preserving the life of Adam, if he had continued obedient to the commands of God: But this tree of life became to him a tree of death, because of his infidelity and disobedience.

Tree of the knowledge of Good and Evil. This was also planted in the midst of paradise, and Adam was forbid to touch it on pain of death, Gen. ii. 17. It is disputed, whether the tree of life, and that of the knowledge of good and evil, were not the same tree? Opinions are divided: but that opinion which makes them distinct, seems to be the most probable.

These reasons are generally alleged, for and against the opinion which supposes the Tree of Life, and the Tree of Knowledge, to be two different trees. Moses says, that God planted the garden of Eden, and placed therein all sorts of good trees, particularly the Tree of Life in the midst of the garden, as also the Tree of the knowledge of Good and Evil. And when he placed Adam in Paradise, he said to him, "Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; but of the tree of the knowledge of Good and Evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die." And when the serpent tempted Eve, he said to her, "Yea, hath God said, ye shall not eat of every tree in the garden?" Eve answered, God hath permitted us to eat of all fruits of Paradise, "but of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die." To which the serpent replied, "Ye shall not surely die; for God doth know, that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be open, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." And after Adam and Eve had transgressed the command of God, he drove them out of Paradise, saying of them, "Behold the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil. And now, lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the Tree of Life, and eat, and live for ever,—therefore the Lord sent him forth from the garden of Eden."

From these passages it is inferred in favour of one tree only, whose use was forbid to Adam; First, that there is no necessity for admitting two trees; the same fruit that could prolong Adam's life, might also communicate knowledge. Secondly, the text of Moses may very well be understood of one tree: "God planted the Tree of Life, or the Tree of Knowledge." Frequently in the Hebrew the conjunction and is equivalent to the disjunctive or; in like manner, "lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the Tree of Life, and live for ever," may be explained in the same sense: Lest he should return to it again, to obtain life also; as he has already eat of it in order to obtain knowledge. Thirdly, the tempter plainly ascribes to the same tree, the fruit of life, and the fruit of knowledge; "Ye shall not surely die; for God doth know, that in the day ye eat thereof, ye shall know good and evil." He confirms them against the apprehensions of death, and assures them of knowledge; by their eating the forbidden fruit.

But, the contrary opinion seems to have a better foundation in the letter of the text. Moses plainly distinguishes two trees, the Tree of Life, and the Tree of Knowledge; why then should we confound them without necessity? Life and Knowledge are very different effects; why should they be produced by one and the same fruit?—was it too much to forbid Adam the use of two trees? The discourse of God with Adam after his fall, seems to be express, for a distinction of trees:—"Lest he take also of the Tree of Life, and eat, and live for ever." As if he had said, he has already tasted of the fruit of Knowledge: he must be driven away from the fruit of Life, lest he should take of that also. The tempter indeed assures Eve and Adam against the fear of death; but he only offers them the fruit of Knowledge, telling them, that as soon as they had tasted of it, they should have the knowledge of gods. Hence, after their sin, it is said, their eyes were open. These reasons incline us to prefer this opinion, instead of the former, which we had espoused. See St. Austin, lib. vi. cap. 30. of his imperfect work against Julian.

It is enquired, of what nature was the forbidden fruit? Some have thought it was wheat, others the vine. Rabb. in Sanhedrin, fol. 70. Bemidbar. Rabb. fol. 170, and 238. Others the fig-tree. Theodor. apud Theodoret. qu. 28. in Genes. Isidor. Pelus. lib. i. ep. 2. Others the cherry-tree, others the apple-tree. This last sentiment has prevailed, though no better founded than the rest. However, they quote the passage of Canticles, viii. 5. "I awakened you under the apple-tree; there your mother lost her innocence;"—as if Solomon here intended to speak of the fall of the first woman. We read this passage thus in our translation: "I raised thee up under the apple-tree: there thy mother brought thee forth; there she brought thee forth that bare thee." Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CCCCXXVI.

Many of the ancients considered this whole relation of Moses as figurative: and were of opinion, that his account could only be understood as an allegory. St. Austin thought, de Genes. ad liter. lib. viii. cap. 5. and de Pecat.

Mentis. lib. ii. cap. 21. that the virtue of the Tree of Life, and that of the knowledge of good and evil, were supernatural and miraculous. Others have thought, that this virtue was natural to them. Joseph. Antiq. lib. i. cap. 1. Bonavent. in 2. Sent. dist. 19. Strab. in Genes. Hug. Victor, Abulens. alii passim. According to Philo, de Opificio Mundi, p. 95. the Tree of Life represents Piety, and the Tree of Knowledge, Prudence. God is the foundation of these virtues. The Rabbins tell very incredible and ridiculous stories concerning the Tree of Life: that it was of a prodigious size, and all the waters of the earth gushed out at its foot: that one could hardly go round it in five hundred years. Perhaps all this is allegorical; but the secret meaning is hardly worth the trouble of penetrating into. Basnage, Hist. Jews, lib. vi. cap. 12. art. 18.

[In considering the question of the Tree of Life, it should not be forgot, that, if the natural properties of the Tree of Knowledge were deleterious, as every thing leads us to conclude, then the notion of obtaining a renovation of vital powers, or prolongation of life from it, is an unequivocal contradiction. And farther, that various allusions are made in Scripture to the Tree of Life, and its properties; but, none to the Tree of Knowledge: that is forgotten, as if it had never existed; or, having existed on a special occasion, only, was ever after buried in oblivion.

Ezekiel alludes to the Tree of Life, chap. xlvii. 7, 12. "On the brink of the river, on each side, shall grow all trees for food, whose leaf shall not fade, neither shall the fruit thereof be consumed: it shall bring forth new fruit according to his months:—the fruit shall be for food, and the leaf for medicine." Certainly, this is perfectly distinct from any reference to the Tree of Knowledge.

This passage is imitated by the writer of the Apocalypse, chap. xii. 2. "On either side of the river of the water of life, was the Tree [read trees, for one tree could not stand on both sides of a river.] of Life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month: and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations." Inasmuch then, as we find no suspicion of any ill effects following the use of the fruit, or the leaves of the Tree of Life,—nor the smallest hint of any change in its properties, from evil to good, it should seem demonstrable that these trees, of whatever kind they were, were not the same, nor even in any degree similar.]

[TRENCH. Vide FRAGS. No. CCXXI. seq.

TRENCHES are a kind of ditches cut into the earth, earth, for the purpose of receiving and draining the water from adjacent parts. Somewhat of this kind was the trench cut by the prophet Elijah, to contain the water which he ordered to be poured on his sacrifice, 1 Kings xviii. 32. and which, when filled to the brim with water, was entirely exhausted, evaporated, by the fire of the Lord, which consumed the sacrifice.

TRENCHES, the. This is a military term, and denotes one description of the approaches to a fortified town; they are sunk into the earth, in the present day. Trenches were anciently used to surround a town, to enclose the besieged, and to secure the besiegers against attacks from the besieged. Trenches could not be cut in a rock; and I suspect, that when our Lord tells Jerusalem, Luke xix. 43. "Thy enemies shall cast a trench about thee," meaning "they shall raise a wall of inclosure;" he foretold what the Jews would barely credit, from the nature of the case; perhaps, what they considered as impossible: yet the providence of God has so ordered it, that we have evidence to this fact, in Josephus, who says, that Titus exhorting his soldiers, they surrounded Jerusalem with a wall in the space of three days: although the general opinion had pronounced it impossible. This circumvallation prevented any escape from the city, and deterred from all attempts to relieve it, by succours going into it.

Such being the nature of trenches, we are led to suppose that our translators have used this word incorrectly, 1 Sam. xxvi. 5. "Saul was sleeping within the trench;" because, a trench demanded too much labour, and was too tedious an operation to be cut around every place where a camp lodged for a night. The margin therefore hints at a circle, or ring, of carriages; and so Buxtorf interprets the word: it seems, however, more likely that it means a circular encampment, in the midst of which stood the tent of Saul; or, a circular guard which surrounded the royal tent, as Mr. HARMER supposes. I doubt, however, from the description given of the tent of Nadir Shah, whether it may not mean a circular skreen, with passages, which surrounding the royal tent, kept off, from passing into that tent, all persons but those to whom the guards gave regular admission. This screen might be of canvas, or of any other substance, like the tent itself, or, &c. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DCXCII.]

[TRESPASS, is an offence committed, a hurt, or wrong done to a neighbour; it partakes of the nature of an error, or slip, rather than of deliberate or gross sin: the delinquent who had trespassed, was of course bound to make satisfaction; but an offering or oblation was allowed him, whereby to reconcile himself to the Divine Governor, Lev. v. 6, 15. If a person sin through ignorance, or inadvertency, &c.

For TRESPASS-MONEY, vide 2 Kings xii. 16. It was not brought into the temple treasury; but belonged to the priests.

It deserves notice, that whoever does not forgive the trespasses of a fellow man against himself, is not to expect that his Father in heaven will forgive his trespasses; if he will not forgive smaller, inadvertent, non-intentional offences, but harbours a bitter, revengeful disposition, how should he propitiate God, when God withholds forgiveness for his lesser crimes? and moreover, charges him with accumulated guilt by great transgressions? May this thought promote a forgiving spirit, a spirit of reconciliation, and mutual charity between neighbours and friends!]

TRIBE. Jacob having twelve sons, who were heads of so many families, which all together formed a great nation; each of these families was called a tribe. But this patriarch on his death-bed adopted Ephraim and Manasseh, the two sons of Joseph, and would have them also to constitute two tribes in Israel. Gen. xlviii. 5. Instead of twelve tribes, there were now thirteen, that of Joseph being two. However in the distribution of lands by Joshua, under the order of God, they reckoned but twelve tribes, and made but twelve lots. For the tribe of Levi being appointed to sacred service, had no share in the distribution of the land; but received certain cities to dwell in, with the first fruits, tithes, and oblations of the people.

The twelve tribes, while in the desert, encamped around the Tabernacle of the Covenant, each in due order. To the east were Judah, Zebulun, and Issachar: to the west were Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin: to the south were Reuben, Simeon, and Gad: and to the north were Dan, Asher, and Napthali. The Levites were distributed round about the tabernacle, nearer to the holy place than the other tribes; so that Moses and Aaron, with their families, were to the east, Gershom to the west, Kohath to the south, and Merari to the north.

In the marches of Israel, the twelve Tribes were divided into four great bodies. The first body, in front of the army, included Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun: the second was composed of Reuben, Simeon, and Gad. Between the second and third body of troops, came the Levites and priests; with the ark of the Lord, and the furniture of the Tabernacle.

The third body of the army of Israel was composed of Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin.

The

The fourth, which brought up the rear, was Dan, Asher and Napthali.

In the division made by Joshua of the land of Canaan, Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh, had their lot beyond Jordan, E.; all the other tribes, and the remaining half of Manasseh, had their distribution on this side the river, W. See the title of each tribe, JUDAH, SIMEON, LEVI, BENJAMIN, DAN, EPHRAIM, MANASSEH, REUBEN, GAD, ASHER, ZEBULUN, ISACHAR, and NAPTHALI.

The twelve Tribes continued united as one state, one people, and one monarchy, till after the death of Solomon. At that time ten of the tribes revolted from the house of David; they formed the kingdom of Israel, and received as their king Jeroboam, the son of Nebat; and only the tribes of Judah and Benjamin continued under the government of Rehoboam, son of Solomon. This separation may be considered as the leading cause of those great misfortunes which afterwards befel these two kingdoms, distinctly or alternately, and thereby the whole Hebrew nation. First, it caused the alteration and change of the primitive religion, the ancient worship of their forefathers. Jeroboam, son of Nebat, substituted the worship of golden calves instead of worshipping the Lord; which induced the ten tribes to forsake the temple of the Lord. Secondly, this schism caused an irreconcilable hatred between the ten tribes of Israel, and the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin; with infinite wars and disputes. The Lord being provoked, delivered them up to their enemies. Tiglath-Pilneser first carried captive the tribes of Reuben, Gad, Napthali, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, beyond Jordan, and transported them over the Euphrates. 2 Kings xv. 29. 1 Chron. v. 26. A. M. 3264, ante A. D. 740. Comp. PLATE, MAP of the CAPTIVITIES of ISRAEL and JUDAH.

Some years afterwards, Salmaneser, king of Assyria, destroyed Samaria, and took away the rest of Israel, to beyond the Euphrates. 2 Kings xvii. 6. xviii. 10, 11. Thus ended the kingdom of Israel, A. M. 3283, ante A. D. 721.

It has been a great problem among the fathers and interpreters, to determine whether these ten tribes continued in their residence beyond the Euphrates, or whether they returned again into their own country. [See TRANSMIGRATIONS.] The greater part are of opinion, that they never did return; but the contrary opinion seems better founded in Scripture, which in several places promises the return of these tribes, and represents Palestine as well peopled by Israelites of all the tribes, long before the coming of Christ. However, it must be owned, that this return is not clearly apparent in history, because it was performed by degrees, and was not so complete and entire but that a great number of Israelites still remained beyond the Euphrates; so that St. Peter addresses his first epistle to the converted Jews dispersed in the provinces of Pontus, Cappadocia, Bythinia, Asia, &c. [Major RENNEL, on Herodotus, has proposed strong arguments to prove that the deportation of Israel, like that of Judah, was not universal, or of all the people. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DLXXI.]

The tribes of Judah and Benjamin, under the government of the family of David, continued much longer in their own country: But at last, Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, burnt the temple, and carried Judah and Benjamin to Babylon. 2 Kings xxv. 1, 2, 3, &c. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 17, 18, &c. A. M. 3416, ante A. D. 588.

The captivity of Judah continued seventy years, as the prophets had foretold. Jer. xxv. 11, 12. xxix. 40. The beginning of it may be fixed A. M. 3398, the end in 3468, which is the first year of Cyrus at Babylon. Or, the beginning A. M. 3416, the year of the taking of Jerusalem, and its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar; the end in 3486, the beginning of the reign of Darius, son of Hystaspes, the spouse of queen Esther, and the protector of the Jewish nation. The return of Judah is plainly assigned at the end of the second book of the Chronicles, and the books of Ezra and Nehemiah. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 20, 21, 22, 23. The decree of Cyrus which allowed their return into Judea, was A. M. 3468, ante A. D. 536. [It should seem that three captivities, commencing at three different periods, being mentioned, we ought not to expect a complete or full return to Judea, at one period only. It is probable, that different opportunities of returning occurred to different companies of Jews scattered throughout the extensive empire of Persia, &c. See the EXPLANATION of the PLATE of the CAPTIVITIES.]

[TRIBULATION, expresses in our version pretty much the same as trouble or trial; importing afflictive dispensations, to which a person is subjected, either by way of punishment, or by way of experiment. For tribulation, by way of punishment, see Judges x. 14. Matt. xxiv. 21, 29. Rom. ii. 9. 2 Thess. i. 6. For tribulation, by way of trial, see John xvi. 33. Rom. v. 2. 2 Thess. i. 4.]

TRIBUNAL. The place where judicial proceedings are exercised and administered. Moses appointed, (Deut. xvi. 18. xvii. 8, 9. Ezek.

Ezek. xlv. 24. Joseph. Antiq. lib. x. cap. ult.) that in every city there should be judges and magistrates, who should hear and determine differences: And that if any thing very difficult occurred, it should be referred to the place which the Lord should choose, and be laid before the high-priest, or priests, of the race of Aaron, and before the judge, whom the Lord should raise up there for the time being. See JUDGE and SANHEDRIM.

The Rabbins affirm, that there were three descriptions of tribunals in Israel; one of three judges, another of twenty-three, another of sixty. The tribunal of three judges was in every village, and determined causes on money matters, and ordinary affairs; the tribunal of twenty-three judges was stationed in cities, and could take cognizance of matters relating to life and death. Lastly, the third tribunal of sixty, was held only at Jerusalem, in an apartment of the temple. This the Jews call the great Sanhedrim, to the authority of which, even the king, the high-priest, the tribes of Israel, the false prophets, and the affairs of religion, were subject. The Rabbins affirm, that the privilege of judging in capital causes was taken away from this council forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem; A. D. 30, seven years before the death of our Saviour. Wherefore the Jews represented to Pilate, that it was not permitted them to put any one to death. John xviii. 31.

TRIBUNE, an office of dignity among the Romans. They had tribunes of several kinds. Some commanded the troops; others directed the administration of the commonwealth. We find some called Tribuni Celerum, who commanded a sort of light-horse: others called Tribuni Aerarii, had the inspection of the public treasure. Tribuni Fabricarum, attended to the making of arms and armour. Tribuni Maritimarum, were superintendants of sea-ports, of rivers, of salt-works. Tribuni Plebis were the guardians and patrons of the people, to protect them against injuries they might receive from the nobles, &c. Lastly, Tribuni Militum, or Militiæ, who were divided into greater and lesser tribunes; the first were tribunes of legions, the others tribunes of troops or cohorts.

In Scripture the word tribune is often used, in the Latin of the Old Testament, because the translators were acquainted with no word equally proper to express certain employments, which resembled that of tribune in the Roman republic. For example; Exod. xviii. 21, 25, מְשֹׁנֵה מִלְחָמָה, Principes Militum. LXX. Χαλιάρχοι. (Vide Numb. xxxi. 14, 48, 52. Deut. i. 15. 4 Reg. viii. 12. xvii. 18. et passim.) Jerom translates by Tribune what the Hebrew calls princes of thousands, and the Septuagint, Chiliarchoi; which has the same signification as the Hebrew. In the New Testament, the word tribune has more correct relation to the offices or employments of the Romans, since they were really officers of the Roman troops: as John xviii. 12. Acts xxi. 31, 32, 33, 37, &c. Mark, vi. 21. speaks of the tribunes of the court of Herod the Tetrarch, these in the Greek are called Chiliarchoi, or captains of a thousand men, as tribunes of legions were. But, he that apprehended St. Paul, and took him out of the hands of the Jews, Acts xxi. 31. was only a captain, or tribune of a company.

TRIBUTE, in Hebrew, מַס Mas; from the verb Masas, to melt or liquify; in Greek Φόρος, Phoros. The Hebrews acknowledged no sovereign over them, but God. Whence Josephus calls their government a Theocracy, or Divine government. They acknowledged the sovereign dominion of God by a tribute, or capitation of half a shekel a head, which every Israelite paid yearly, Exod. xxx. 13. Our Saviour, Matt. xvii. 25. thus reasons with Peter: "Of whom do the kings of the earth take custom, or tribute? of their own children, or of strangers?" Meaning, that he, as son of God, ought to be exempt from this capitation. I do not find that either the kings, or the judges of the Hebrews, when they were of that nation, demanded tribute.

Solomon, at the beginning of his reign, 1 Kings ix. 21, 22, 23. 2 Chron. viii. 9. compelled the Canaanites, left in the country, to pay tribute, and to perform the drudgery of the public works he had undertaken:—The children of Israel, he would not suffer to be employed therein, but made them his soldiers, his ministers, his chief officers; to command his armies, his chariots, and his horsemen. However, toward the end of his reign, he imposed a tribute on them, and made them work on the public buildings; 1 Kings v. 13, 14. ix. 15. xi. 27. This alienated their minds, and sowed the seeds of that discontent which afterwards ripened into open revolt, by the rebellion of Jeroboam, son of Nebat. Hence the Israelites said to Rehoboam, son of Solomon: "Thy father made our yoke grievous; now, therefore, make thou the grievous service of thy father, and the heavy yoke which he put upon us, lighter, and we will serve thee."

The Israelites were frequently subdued by foreign princes, who laid great taxes and tribute on them; to which, necessity compelled them to submit. E. gr. after Archelaus had been banished to Vienne in France, A. D. 6, and after Judea was reduced to a Roman province, Augustus gustus sent Quirinius (Cyrenius) into this country, to take a new poll of the people, and to make a new estimate of their substance, that he might thereby regulate the tribute that each was to pay to the Romans. Joseph. Ant. lib. xvii. 15. Afterwards, Judas, surnamed the Galilean, or Gaulonite, raised an insurrection, to oppose the levying of this tribute: pretending that it was not lawful to pay tribute to a foreigner; that it was the badge of actual servitude, and that Jews were not allowed to own any for their master, who did not worship the Lord. Vide Judas the Galilean, and HERODIANS, also CYRENIUS, and FRAGS. NOS. CCCXXII. et seq.

See in Matthew xxii. 17, &c. the answer of Jesus Christ to the Pharisees, who came with insidious designs of tempting him, and asked him, Whether or no it was lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar? also, John viii. 33. where the Jews boast of having never been slaves to any; of being a free nation, acknowledging God only for sovereign. And note that, at that time many Jews had imbibed the principles of Judas Gaulonites, and infused into the people their notions of independence, and a vain shew of liberty. On the contrary, the apostles Peter and Paul, in their epistles, always endeavoured to recommend, and inculcate on faithful Christians, submission and obedience to princes, with a conscientious discharge of their duty, in paying tribute. See Rom. xiii. 1—8. 1 Pet. ii. 13.

TRIBUTE-MONEY. We read, Matt. xxii. 16, 17, 18, &c. that the disciples of the Pharisees and the Herodians, came to tempt Jesus, and asked him if it were lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar, or not? Jesus knowing their malice, said to them; Ye hypocrites, why tempt ye me? Shew me a piece of that money, with which the tribute is paid: numisma census. It is enquired what piece of money this was? and of what tribute our Saviour here spoke? As to the first of these questions, the gospel informs us, that this piece of money had on it the image and inscription of Cæsar, i. e. the Roman emperor. It was therefore a piece of money of Tiberius, or one of his predecessors. As to the question about the tribute, there is great probability it was a capitation, or a tax levied at so much a head. Appian; in Syriac. says, that the Jews paid the capitation; and Ulpian assures us, lib. iii. Digest. de Censib. Vide Fischer, de Numism. censu, that in the province of Syria, all the males from the age of fourteen years, and all the females from twelve, till they were sixty-five years old, were obliged to pay this tribute, or capitation. This is the proper signification of the word Census. Comp. FRAGMENTS, Nos. XXVIII. XCH.

TRINITY. This term is used to express the greatest mystery of the Christian religion; i. e. that the one only God exists in three distinctions, modifications, or &c. which for want of a better term in human language, are generally denominated persons: the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. The word Trinity does not occur in Scripture; nevertheless, these three divine distinctions are plainly expressed, and named. For example, God created the heaven and the earth: i. e. God the Father. The Son is expressed through the whole Scripture, by the terms The Word, The Wisdom, The Saviour, The Deliverer. The Holy Ghost, who inspired the prophets, is called in the Gospel, The Comforter, or Paracletus. The Father and the Son are represented in Psalm cx. 1. "The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand," &c. In the New Testament the three persons are distinctly expressed: as Matt. xxviii. 19. "Go and teach all nations; baptizing them in the name [singular; not plural, names] of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." [importing that one name included these three distinctions.] And when Jesus Christ was come out of the water, at his baptism, the heavens were opened, and the Spirit descended on him, like a dove, while a voice was heard from heaven, saying, Matt. iii. 16, 17. "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." The whole gospel of St. John, especially his first chapter, marks distinctly the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost; to whom John the Baptist gives his testimony, John i. 32, 33, 34. saying, that he saw the Holy Ghost, descend upon Jesus like a dove. He adds, that he who sent him to baptize, the same said to him, "Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on him, the same is he who baptizeth with the Holy Ghost."

It has been thought that the distinction of three Persons in the Deity was not unknown to Plato, and his disciples: and some moderns have even dared to affirm, that from their writings the fathers of the church borrowed the greater part of their expressions concerning the Trinity. Bagnage, Hist. Jews, tom. iv. lib. vi. cap. 4.

It cannot be denied that some of the ancient Jews, who lived before Jesus Christ, and some also who lived in his time, were ignorant of the mystery of the Holy Trinity: which yet is so clearly revealed in the Old Testament, that it could not be unknown to the patriarchs, the prophets, and the enlightened of the ancient Hebrews.

brews: Raymond, Martin, Galatine, and others, have undertaken to shew, that the Chaldeo Paraphrasts, and the ancient Rabbins, expressly mention the Trinity; i. e. three Divine Persons: and we do certainly find in their writings the words Shalishith, שלישית, which signifies Trinity; and Memar, מִמָּר, Verbum, the Word; and Kuach Hakadoshak, כּוּחַ קֹדֶשׁ, Sanctus Spiritus, the Holy Spirit. We also find, God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost. Lastly, Tres in Uno. אחד בשלש, Unus in Tribus, the Tri-une, Three in One, and One in Three; also Jehovah, to express the Father, Memrah-Jah, to express the Word of the Father, and Shechinah, to express the Holy Ghost.

It is true, modern Rabbins disclaim part of the books in which these words are found, maintaining that they were not written by Jews; others they explain in another sense: and they not only do not acknowledge a Trinity, but they expressly deny it, and declare against it; either because they have departed in this from the sentiments of their forefathers; or, that their antipathy and hatred to Christians has excited them to dispute this truth, which is so clearly revealed by Christ and his apostles; or, that this mystery from the beginning was unknown to the generality of the Jews; and the people had but a very imperfect idea of it. Indeed the conceptions of the Jews were so very gross, and they were so little acquainted with abstract speculations, that from belief of the Trinity, it would have been very easy for them to have passed to that of the plurality of gods. For which reason, perhaps, the wisdom of God might withhold from them the plain discovery of this mystery. Vide Basnage, as before, the Lexicon of Suicerus, under the word Trius; Cudworth's Intellectual System, lib. i. cap. 4. and Joshua Ardnt, Diatriba de mysterio Trinit. e scriptis Rabb. [It is not the least remarkable thing belonging to this subject, that it appears to have made part of the belief of the most ancient nations, and in the earliest ages. Modern discoveries have found a Trinity among the Brahmins in Hindostan, that may have been the origin of the Platonic notions; and very possibly is the remain of a principle, generally, if not universally, received in the theology of the primitive orientals. Comp. FRAGMENTS, Nos. DCXIII. et seq.]

TRIPOLIS, a city of Phœnicia, on the Mediterranean sea, between Botrys, to the south, and Arca, to the north. It is watered by a river that runs from Libanus. It is mentioned, 2 Macc. xiv. 1. where we read, that three years after the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius, the son of Seleucus, to whom the kingdom of Syria belonged, escaped from Rome, and landed at Tripolis, A. D. 3642, ante A. D. 362. Tripolis in Greek, signifies three cities; because, in fact, it was composed of three cities, distant from one another the length of a stadium, or furlong. One of these cities belonged to the Arabians, the second to the Sidonians, the third to the Tyrians. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xvi. cap. 41. Strab. lib. xvi. p. 519. Pliny, lib. v. cap. 20. It is still a considerable place, because of its harbour.

At the foot of the castle runs a river called Nahar-Kadisha, or the Holy River. It has its source from the springs and melted snow that flow from Libanus, and particularly from the fountain called in Scripture, The Fountain of Gardens, Cant. iv. 15. Fons hortorum, puteus aquarum viventium, quæ fluunt impetu de Libano. The waters of this river, the inhabitants convey as they please, by little canals, and stop up the outlets, to overflow the land and the neighbouring gardens.

TROAS, Τρωας, penetrated, [perforated,] from the Greek τρωακω, I penetrate.

TROAS, a city of Phrygia, or of Mysia, on the Hellespont, between Troy [not Homer's Troy, but a much later] north, and Assos south. Sometimes the name of Troas [or the Troad] signifies the whole country of the Trojans, the province where the [ancient] city of Troy had stood. But in the New Testament the word Troas signifies a city of this name, sometimes called Antigonia, and Alexandria: Ipsa Troas, Antigonia dicta, nunc Alexandria, says Pliny, lib. v. cap. 30. Sometimes both names are united, Alexandria-Troas. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DCXLVII.

St. Paul was at Troas, A. D. 52, Acts xvi. 8, &c. and had a vision in the night, of a man of Macedonia, who requested gospel-assistance. He embarked therefore at Troas, and passed over into Macedonia: the apostle was several other times at Troas. See Acts xx. 5, 6. 2 Cor. ii. 12. He left behind him at Troas, in the custody of Carpus, some clothes and books, which he desired Timothy to bring with him to Rome, A. D. 65. a little before St. Paul's death. 2 Tim. iv. 13.

TROGLODYTES, Τρωγλοδυται. תְּרוֹגְלוֹדֵיטַי, Suchim, a people, who are anointed; from תָּרַב, suc; otherwise, that are covered, and in the shade; from תָּרַב sacac. The Greek Troglydta, signifies those that dwell in caverns; from τρύγλη, a cavern, and εἰς or εἰς, to go into.

TROGLODYTES. There are many, who dwell in rocks and caverns, in Palestine, Arabia, on the coast of the Red Sea, the Persian Gulph, and and in Egypt. Scripture mentions Troglodytes only in 2 Chron. xii. 3. Lybies et Troglodytæ, et Ethiopes. Hebrew, the Lubim, the Sukkim, the Cushim, or Ethiopians.

Most interpreters agree, that the Sukkim signifies the Troglodytes. Bochart, Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 29. shews, that Sukkah in Hebrew, signifies a hole, or cave; and Pliny, lib. vi. cap. 29. places the city of Succha on the shore of the Red Sea, in the country of the Troglodytes. Grotius, and some others, rather suppose these Sukkim, which were in the army of Shishak, king of Egypt, were a people that dwelt in tents, as the Arabian Scenites. Many of these Arabians dwelt in Arabia Petrea, and about Egypt, who neither cultivated lands, nor built houses. Comp. [TROGYLLIUM, a promontory of Mycale, near Samos, Acts xx. 15.]

TROOP. vide GAD.

TROPHIMUS, Τρόφιμος, well-educated, or brought up; from the Greek τρόφιμος, from τρέφω, to bring up, or educate.

TROPHIMUS, a disciple of St. Paul, a Gentile by religion, and an Ephesian by birth. He came from Ephesus to Corinth with the apostle, and accompanied him in his whole journey from Corinth to Jerusalem, A. D. 58, Acts xx. 4. When St. Paul was in the temple there, the Jews laid hold of him, crying out, "he hath brought Greeks into the temple, and hath polluted this holy place:" this they said, because certain Jews of Ephesus having seen St. Paul in the city, accompanied by Trophimus, whom they looked on as a Gentile, imagined that St. Paul had introduced him into the temple.

Vide PAUL. It is very probable Trophimus followed him to Rome, and attended him while in bonds. It is pretended, that after the apostle had obtained his liberty, A. D. 63, he went into Spain; and passing through Gaul, he left Trophimus at Arles, as bishop. See Baronius, A. D. 62, sect. 4. But this is very difficult to reconcile with what St. Paul writes to Timothy, 2 Tim. iv. 20. that he had left Trophimus sick at Miletus. Trophimus must necessarily have returned to Asia, about a year after St. Paul had left him at Arles. The Greeks keep April 14, in honour of Trophimus, and say he was decapitated by command of Nero, along with St. Paul. At Arles his feast is kept December 29.

TRUMPET. The Lord commanded Moses to make two trumpets of beaten silver, for the purpose of calling the people together, when they were to decamp. Vide Numb. x.

"The priests the sons of Aaron shall, only, have the privilege of sounding the trumpets; and this shall be an immutable law throughout all your generations. They shall sound when you go forth to war against your enemies; and the Lord your God shall remember you, to succour you. They shall also sound when you are to keep your religious festivals; when you celebrate your solemn feasts; when you offer your burnt-offerings, and your peace-offerings; and on the first day of every month." They also chiefly used these trumpets to proclaim the beginning of the civil year, the beginning of the sabbatical year, Lev. xxiii. 24. Numb. xxix. 1. and the beginning of the Jubilee, Lev. xxv. 9, 10. Josephus says, Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 11. that these trumpets were near a cubit long, that their tube or pipe was of the thickness of a common flute. Their mouths were no wider than just admitted to blow into them, and their ends were like those of a modern trumpet. At first there were but two in the camp, afterwards they made a great number. In the time of Joshua there were seven, Josh. iii. 4. At the dedication of the temple of Solomon there were six score priests that sounded trumpets, 2 Chron. v. 12. Josephus, Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 3. affirms, that this prince made two hundred thousand trumpets as Moses had commanded. I know not whence he took this account, of so great a number. [Omit the word thousand: or the cyphers; and the same with the numbers generally in that chapter; on the principles adduced in the FRAGMENTS, on Hebrew Notation of Numbers.]

Besides the sacred trumpets of the temple, whose use was restricted to the priests, even in war and in battle, there were others used by their generals, Judges iii. 27. Ehud sounded the trumpet, to assemble Israel against the Moabites, whose king Eglon he had lately slain. Gideon took a trumpet in his hand, and gave each of his people one, when he assaulted the Midianites, Judges vii. 2, 16. Joab sounded the trumpet, as a signal of retreat to his soldiers, in the battle against Abner, 2 Sam. ii. 28. and in that against Absalom, 2 Sam. xviii. 16. and in the pursuit of Sheba, son of Bichri, 2 Sam. xx. 22. and there are many other instances.

Feast of TRUMPETS: was kept on the first day of the seventh month of the sacred year; which was the first month of the civil year: called Tizri; answering to the moon of September. The beginning of the year was proclaimed by sound of trumpet: Lev. xxiii. 24. Numb. xxix. This day was kept solemn; all servile business was forbid. They offered a solemn holocaust, in the name of the whole nation; of a calf, two rams, and seven lambs of the same year, with offerings of flour and wine, as usual with these sacrifices. Scripture does not mention the occasion of appointing this feast. Theodoret, qu. 32, in Levit. believes, it was in memory of the thunder and lightning on Mount Sinai, when God gave the law. The Rabbins say, it was in remembrance of the deliverance of Isaac, by the substitution of a ram.

At present the Jews are accustomed on this evening to wish one another a good year, to make better cheer than ordinary, and to sound the trumpet thirty times successively. Leo of Modena observes, Cerem. of the Jews, P. iii. cap. 5. that heretofore there was a dispute among the Rabbins concerning the time at which the world began: some holding for spring, others for autumn. But the opinion prevailed that placed it in autumn; and on this occasion the Feast of Trumpets was founded; which is kept in autumn. During this feast, which lasts the first two days of the month, labour and business are suspended. The Jews hold by tradition, that on this day God particularly judges the actions of the foregoing year, and disposes the events of the year following. Wherefore, on the early days of the foregoing month, or at least, eight days before the Feast of Trumpets, they generally apply themselves to works of penitence and mortification; and the evening before, many of them receive thirty-nine lashes, by way of discipline.

On the first evening that begins the year, and which precedes the first day of Tizri, as they return from the synagogue they say to one another, May you be written in a good year! the other answers, And you also! Being returned home, they serve at table honey, and leavened bread, and whatever may betoken a happy and plentiful year. Some of them on the morning of these two feasts, go to the synagogue clothed in white, in token of purity and penitence. Among the German Jews, some wear the habit which they have appointed for their burial; as a mortification. This day they repeat in the synagogue several particular prayers, and benedictions; they take the Pentateuch very solemnly out of its chest, and read to five persons the sacrifice that was performed on this day: then they twenty times sound a horn, sometimes very slowly, and then very briskly. They say it reminds them of the judgments of God, it intimidates sinners, and induces them to repent. After prayers they return to their houses, sit down at table, and pass the rest of the day in hearing sermons, and in other exercises of devotion; the two days of the feast are alike.

To prepare themselves for the Feast of Trum- pets, or for the beginning of the civil year, many Jews plunge themselves into cold water, and as they descend into it they confess their sins, and beat their breasts. They plunge over head and ears, that they may appear entirely clean before God. They think that on this day God assembles his council, i.e. his angels; and that he opens his books to judge all men. Three sorts of books are opened; the book of life, for the just; the book of death, for the wicked; and the book of the middle state, for such as are neither entirely good, nor entirely bad. In the two books of life and death, there are two pages, one for this life, the other for eternity. For it often happens, that the wicked are not punished in this life according to their demerits; whereas the just suffer with severity, as if they had incurred the anger of God. This conduct of God is the occasion that no one can be sure of his state, but is uncertain, whether he is worthy to be loved or hated. As for the middling ones, they are not written down any where; as the Jews say, God stays till the day of expiation, which is the tenth of the year, to try if they will be converted. On this day their sentence passes, whether for life or for death.

TRUTH, Veritas, is used in several senses.

1. TRUTH is opposed to falsehood, to a lie, a mistake, a deceit, e.g. None among you shall consult the dead, to learn the truth from them; Deut. xviii. 11. and the Psalmist, v. 9. speaking of the wicked, says, the truth is not in their lips. And St. Paul, Rom. ix. 1. "I speak the truth in Christ, I lie not."

2. TRUTH is put for fidelity, sincerity, punctuality in keeping promises. Generally to truth, taken in this sense, is joined mercy, or kindness: so Gen. xxiv. 27. Eliezer, the servant of Abraham, thanks God for shewing kindness and truth to his master Abraham: Mercy and Truth may also express a stable, constant, permanent mercy, or kindness; the Lord be praised, who has favoured my lord and master Abraham in so constant and uniform a manner.

Those expressions, mercy and truth, are frequent in Scripture, Gen. xxiv. 29. And Gen. xlvii. 49. Jacob says to Joseph, "If I have found grace in thy sight, put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh, and deal kindly and truly with me; bury me not, I pray thee, in Egypt:" You shall promise this favour, and you shall faithfully perform it. And, Joshua ii. 14. the spies of the Israelites promised Rahab to deal with her kindly and truly; that they would faithfully perform what they had promised. And, 2 Sam. ii. 6. David sent to tell the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead, that the Lord would shew kindness kindness and truth to them, for their piety in burying the bones of Saul; and that he himself would requite it to them. As this manner of speaking occurs in almost every page of Scripture, in my opinion it may signify, that God will bestow his kindness and favour on all those to whom he promises mercy and truth; and that he will do this in a fixed and permanent manner.

To some God makes promises, but they are only conditional; on others, he confers favours, but they are only temporary; others receive his first blessings, but not final perseverance. God made many promises to the Israelites, but on condition that they should continue faithful to him: He gave the royal dignity to Saul, but it was only for a time, nor did Saul's conduct correspond with so great a favour: Solomon partook plentifully of his first favours, but it is doubted whether he had the gift of perseverance, for his weakness was no less distinguished than his wisdom. In this sense God may be said to have granted them his kindness, but not his truth. On the contrary, he granted both his mercy, or favour, and his truth, to David, in a particular manner; and more perfectly still to the ~~Messiah~~ Messiah. Vide Psalm xl. 11. lvii. 3. lxxxix. 33.

The LXX. generally translate the Hebrew word chesed by justice, which the Vulgate renders mercy. Blessed be the Lord, who hath not withdrawn his justice and truth from my master. But in these passages, as in many others, the words mercy and justice are synonymous, even in the Hebrew.

Hezekiah desires of the Lord, that peace and truth may be established in his days: 2 Kings xx. 19. Isaiah xxxix. 8. Heb. "Shall there be peace and truth for my life?" May I flatter myself, that God will suspend the terrible effects of his vengeance till after my death?—Peace and truth here denote constant and continual prosperity. Jeremiah, xxviii. 6. uses almost the same expression: I will discover to them an effectual manner of prayer, to obtain peace and truth, or a fixed and durable peace. Otherwise, I will give them that solid happiness they desire. And, Zechariah viii. 19. Seek peace and truth, which relates to what he said a little before, verse 16. Judge in truth and peace; live in peace, and exercise justice over your brethren; let the judges and magistrates do justice to their applicants, in truth and equity, with desire of preserving peace. Or else, judicium veritatis et pacis, implies judgment that procures peace to them, constant prosperity. Or, judicium verum et perfectum: judgment attended by perfect equity. The Hebrew word shalom, peace, stands also for perfection.

Jesus Christ is the eternal and essential truth, John xiv. 6. "I am the way, the truth, and the life." 1 John v. 6. "Even as Christ is true." He is the Word, full of grace and truth. He has granted and communicated to us a plenitude of both of these. "Grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." He has sent to his apostles the spirit of truth, John i. 16, 17.

The word of truth, the way of truth, the knowledge of truth, to walk in the truth, to speak in truth, to give testimony to the truth, in the sacred authors of the New Testament, import the truth of the Gospel, the holy truths of Christianity.

The Psalmist says, Psal. xxxvi. 5. lvii. 11. that the mercy of the Lord reaches to the heavens, and his truth to the clouds, to express their extent and immensity. He says also, that all creatures partake of them, Psalm lxxxv. 10, 11. "Mercy and Truth are met together; Righteousness and Peace have kissed each other. Truth shall spring out of the earth, and Righteousness shall look down from heaven:" he describes the happiness of Judah, after the return from the captivity; and in a more exalted sense, the advantages of the church after the coming of the Messiah. Mercy and justice, peace and truth, in these places may be considered as synonymous terms. In Judah, mercy, justice, peace, and truth, shall be seen to flourish, a constant and permanent mercy, a full and perfect justice. Certain it is, that justice is often put for clemency, benignity, mercy. Comp. HOLY, Add.

In Psalm lxxxix. David in several manners extols the truth of God, or his fidelity to his promises. It is a song of thanksgiving for the mercies God had vouchsafed to the house of David. The fertile invention of the prophetic poet suggests a great variety of expressions to declare the greatness of God's favour, and the immutability of his promises. "I will for ever shew forth his mercies; I will publish his truth from generation to generation.—His mercy is founded in heaven, he has confirmed his truth.—His truth shall be magnified in the congregation of the saints.—His power is infinite, and his truth surrounds it on all sides.—Justice and equity are the supporters of his throne.—Mercy and truth go before him.—His mercy and his truth shall be always displayed to David." All these different expressions and turns of language amount to this, his mercy prevents and promises, his truth executes and performs his kind intentions.

[TRUTH,

[TRUTH, veritas, is that accurate correspondence, of what is related of a subject, or, of what is expected from it, which fully justifies the relation; or, it is, the precise conformity of a description, an assertion, a proposition, &c. to its subject. In Scripture language, eminently, God is truth: i. e. in him is no fallacy, deception, perverseness, &c. Jesus Christ is THE truth, the true way to God, the true representative, image, character of the Father; the Holy Ghost is the Spirit of truth, who communicates truth, who maintains the truth in believers, and guides believers in the truth; and who hates and punishes falsehood, or lies, even to the death of the transgressor. Psalm xxxi. 5. John xiv. 6, 17. Acts v. 3, &c.

Good men maintain truth, they speak the truth, they practise truth; i. e. they are careful that their words, actions, and sentiments correspond with what is correct, accurate and upright.

Truth, as a substance, is opposed to typical representations, as shadows; the law was given by Moses, but the grace and the truth—the reality of the promised blessings, came by Jesus Christ.

Every man should speak truth to his neighbour; i. e. honestly, sincerely, with integrity. Truth, on the part of God, is often united with kindness, mercy, goodness, &c. because fidelity to promises being one great branch of truth, and goodness, mercy, &c. being implied in the Divine promises, when God realized any special good, he did but shew himself faithful, true, fulfilling the desires, or acting for the advantage, of those who confided in him, and in his word. But sometimes the severity of God is his truth, Psalm xl. 10. Rom. iii. 21. Truth is judicial, in reference to a verdict given, Prov. xx. 28. judicious, Rom. i. 25. constant, Rom. iii. 7. upright, 1 Cor. v. 8. The love of the truth is among the noblest characters of the Christian; and as genuine piety, wherever it prevails, will banish falsehood, so we find a real love of truth, the comparison of a man's conduct with the regulations of truth, and a conformity to those regulations, are always among the most desirable, the most favourable, and the most decisive proofs of genuine religion; which being itself a system of truth, delights in nothing more than in truth, whether of heart, discourse, or conduct. Of this the apostle John is an instance, who expresses to the Lady Eclecta his delight at seeing her children walk in the truth.]

TRYPHÆNA, Τρυφαίνα, delicious, delicate; from τρυφαία.

TRYPHOSA, from the same.

TRYPHENA and TRYPHOSA, Christian women, whom St. Paul mentions, Rom. xvi. 12. "Salute Tryphena and Tryphosa, who labour in the Lord." Much mention is made of these two women in the history of St. Thecla; but a fabulous history can give no authority to the actions of these holy women. The Roman martyrology places their feasts Nov. 10. It is said they went to Rome to be serviceable to the saints, and to obtain a crown of martyrdom; but they returned into the east, where their blood was spilt for Jesus Christ.

TRYPHON, Τρυφών, from the same τρυφαία.

TRYPHON, a king of Syria. See DIONOTUS, and 1 Macc. xi. 39, 54. xii. 42, 49. xiii. 1, 12. xv. 10, 15.

TUBAL, תבל, Θοβλ, the earth, the world; from תבל thebel: otherwise, that is carried, or led; from בל jabel: otherwise, confusion; from בלל bnlal. [spreading, i. e. of the family.]

TUBAL, or THUBAL, fifth son of Japhet. Scripture commonly unites Tubal and Meshech, whence it is thought that they peopled countries bordering on each other. The Chaldee interpreters, by Tubal and Meshech understand Italy and Asia, or rather Ausonia. Josephus thinks Iberia and Cappadocia. Jerom affirms, that Tubal represents the Spaniards, heretofore called Iberians. Bochart is very copious to prove, that by Meshech and Tubal are intended the Muscovites and the Tibarenians. See Gen. x. 2.

[Some refer to the Tibarenes near the Moschian mountains. The Tibarenes brought to Tyre vases of brass or copper, i. e. of elegant workmanship. Ezek. xxvii. 13. xxxi. 26. There are mines of copper yet worked in some parts of Mount Caucasus, in Kubescha, near Arzeroum, which is in the Moschian mountains. The Moschian people, says Josephus, were so called from Moschus, their leader; and they are now called Cappadocians. They have very ancient traces of their name: a city now extant among them is called Mazaca. Jerom, on Ezek. xxvii. 13. says the same; adding, that Mazaca was called Cæsarea, in honour of Augustus Cæsar. Moses Chorenensis says to the same purpose, that Mazaca was re-edified and embellished, and took the name of Cæsarea. Strabo says the region of Moshica was divided into three parts, which were possessed by the Colchians, the Iberians, and the Armenians. See Ros.

It may deserve enquiry whether the name Tobol, for the river on which Tobolskoi, the capital of Siberia, is situated, be as old as the time of the prophet Ezekiel. The city, itself, is certainly, not so old; but, as we find Moscow, as a city, taking name from the Moskwa, the river on which it stands, and the same of Tobolskoi, it should seem to be not improbable, that these nations which are mentioned together, should agree in this particular; and therefore the ascertaining of one would ascertain the other. Comp. what is said of Ros, and Mosc, and Tobl, or Tubal. Ezek. xxxviii. 2, 3. Copper is abundant in Siberia; and was so anciently, as appears from the copper knives, or blades, which are every where found in the ancient sepulchres of the country.

N. B. The Moscovites are not mentioned in Russian history as a distinct people; and, by some, are thought to have taken their name from their capital city Moscow, or from the river Moskwa.]

TUBAL-CAIN, תובל-קין, worldly possession: or possessor of the world; from תבל thebel, the world, or the earth, and קנה canah, possession: or who is jealous of confusion; from קנא kinna, to be jealous, and בלל balal, confusion. [Rather, the spreading of the family of Cain. See TUBAL.]

TUBAL-CAIN, or THUBAL-CAIN, son of Lamech the bigamist, and of Zillah, Gen. iv. 22. Scripture calls him the father, i.e. inventor, or master, of the art of forging and managing iron, and of making all kinds of iron-work. It has been thought that he gave occasion to the Vulcan of the Heathen. The name Tubal-Cain, is not very remote from Vulcan. [This etymology must not be depended on. See FRAGMENTS, No. CCLXXI.]

TURTLE, a clean bird often mentioned in Scripture. They might offer in sacrifice either turtles, or young pigeons. These were appointed in favour of the poor, who could not afford more substantial sacrifices. Before the law, Gen. xv. 9. Abraham offered birds, which were a turtle and a pigeon; and when he divided the other victims, he left the birds entire. Moses appointed, Lev. xii. 6, 7, 8. for a woman's purification after child-birth, if she had not wherewithal to offer a lamb, that she should bring two turtles, or two young pigeons. The Holy Virgin did so at her purification, Luke ii. 24.

The Nazarites offered two turtles, or two young pigeons, one to be sacrificed for a sin-offering, the other for a burnt-offering, when, during their Nazariteship, they had been accidentally defiled by the presence of a dead body, Numb. vi. 10. When a leper was poor, and could not afford the larger sacrifices, the law appointed for his purification two turtles, or two young pigeons, one for a sin-offering, the other for a burnt-offering; Levit. xiv. 22. There were other pollutions, to purify from which turtles were offered. Vide BIRDS, PURIFICATIONS, &c.

Jeremiah says, viii. 7. "The stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed times, and the turtle and the crane, and the swallow, observe the time of their coming." The turtle is a bird of passage, as well as the swallow, and the stork. The spouse in the Canticles, compares his bride to the turtle.

TUTOR, a person who has the care of a child or children for a time: usually one who is not their natural father, but a hireling. This office is very important, but it is only temporary: it leads the young mind toward maturity, but when the time of that maturity is arrived, and youth is advanced to manhood, tutorage ceases. This has served the apostle for a simile, in which he compares the law of Moses to a tutor. Gal. iv. 2. See PEDAGOGUE.]

TYCHICUS, Τυχικός, casual, by chance; from τύχη, fortune. [Fortunatus, lucky, luck.]

TYCHICUS, a disciple of St. Paul, employed by the apostle, to carry his letters to several churches. He was of the province of Asia, and accompanied St. Paul, A. D. 58, in his journey from Corinth to Jerusalem; Acts xx. 4. He carried the epistle to the Colossians, written A. D. 61; that to the Ephesians, A. D. 65; and the first to Timothy, A. D. 64. [See TIMOTHY.] St. Paul did not send him merely to carry letters, but to learn the state of the churches, and to bring him an account of them. Wherefore he calls him his dear brother, a faithful minister of the Lord, and his companion in the service of God. Ephes. vi. 21, 22. Col. iv. 7, 8. He had intentions of sending him into Crete, to preside there in the absence of Titus. Tit. iii. 12. It is thought also, that he was deputed to Ephesus, while Timothy should be at Rome, when he carried a letter to the Ephesians from this apostle. The Greeks celebrate the feast of St. Tychicus, December 8 or 9. They give him the title of one of the seventy disciples, and bishop of Colophon in the province of Asia. Usuard, Ado, and other martyrologists, mark his feast at Paphos in Cyprus, April 19. Usuard gives him only the title of deacon.

TYMPANUM, a timbrel, or instrument of music, often mentioned in Scripture. The Hebrews called it תוף toph; and, I suppose, under this name they comprehended all kinds of drums, tabors, and timbrels. I do not find that the Hebrews used it in their wars, but only at their public rejoicings; and it was commonly employed by the women. After the passage of the Red Sea, Miriam, sister of Moses, took a tympanum, or timbrel, and began to play and dance with with the women. Exod. xv. 20. The daughter of Jephthah came to meet her father with timbrels, and other musical instruments. Judg. xi. 34. It was probably of the same kind as those ancient tympana, which are put in the hands of Cybele the mother of the gods. Tympana habet Cybele, et sunt mihi tympana cribri. κ

The ancient marbles generally represent Cybele with a tympanum. They used also to play on this instrument at the feasts of Bacchus. Vide MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, Plate III. No. 8.

II. TYMPANUM, an instrument of punishment; this occurs in the Greek of Hebrews, xi. 35. Ἐτυμπαλίσθησαν, distenti sunt. Both ancient and modern interpreters are divided about the sense of this word. Some have explained it of the tressel, or chevalet, a punishment frequent in antiquity, but very little known at this day. St. Chrysostom, and the other Greek interpreters who have followed him, and who ought to have understood the meaning of this word better than the Latins, thought the apostle, in this place, alluded to the death of John the Baptist, and to that of St. James, who were both beheaded. Hesychius, Suidas, and Oecumenius, think the verb tympanizein signifies to flea alive. Others, more modern, take it in a generical sense, for all kinds of capital punishments and of violent deaths. And it is true that the Greek verb is sometimes used in this import.

But we think the apostle, in this place, means the bastinado, or punishment of the whip, and that he alludes to the cruelties exercised on old Eleazar, and the seven brethren, Maccabees. 2 Macc. vi. 19. Ἐλεάζαρος . . . ἀνταῖρεως, ἐπὶ τὸ τύμπανον προσῆγεν. Verse 28. Τόσαῦτα δὲ αἰπὼν ἐπὶ τὸ τύμπανον ἐνθάως ἤλθε. Speaking of the martyrdom of Eleazar, says the writer, he went to the tympanum, and when almost expiring under the blows of the rods, he said, groaning; "the Lord, who knows all things, knows this, that though I could escape death, yet I chuse to suffer these violent pains in my body, being torn with the rods." St. Paul seems plainly to allude to this passage, when he says, some have suffered the punishment of the tympanum, not desiring to rescue themselves from this torture, in hopes of a better resurrection. The seven brethren Maccabees, were also tormented with stripes and rods. The scholiast on Aristophanes, in Plutum, speaking of the punishment of the tympanum, says, Τύμπανα ξύλα ἐφ' οἷς ἐτυμπαίνον, they called tympana those instruments of wood, upon which criminals were whipt as were condemned by the judges to such beating. This punishment is still used in the east. See PUNISHMENTS. [In this sense the word tympanum is from Τύττω, to beat, to beat violently.]

[TYPE, Τύπος. This Greek word signifies, generally, a resemblance, by whatever means made. So John, xx. 25. "unless I see in his hands the type, mark, print of the nails." So Acts vii. 43. the types, likenesses, of the gods which ye made; but, these gods being imaginary existences, no likeness could, properly speaking, be made. So verse 44. Moses should make the tabernacle according to the type, model, exemplar, he had seen." It is spoken of the copy of the letter sent from Claudius Lysias to Felix, Acts xxiii. 25. It is used concerning the form of doctrine into which believers were inducted, and, as it were, pressed, as clay is pressed into the mould, the impression, form, or resemblance of which, it takes exactly. Comp. 1 Cor. x. 6. Phil. iii. 17. et al.

Types are supposed to be very frequent in the O. T. A type is usually considered as an example, pattern, or general similitude to a person, event, or thing which is to come: and herein it differs from a representation, memorial, or commemoration of an event, &c. which is past. For instance, the sacred ceremony of the passover among the Jews, with its bitter herbs, its lamb slain, &c. was a commemoration, or memorial repetition of what their fathers had originally transacted at their Exodus from Egypt. The same may be said of their dwelling in booths, &c. Nay, I apprehend the opinion may be justified, which considers sacrifices themselves as commemorative; being originally instituted after the first great transgression, they perpetually revived in Adam, and in his posterity, the recollection of his first guilt, and of the victim which died instead of himself, on that occasion.

In the nature of commemorative ordinances, Jews and Christians are agreed: but Christians say further, that many, or most, if not all the sacred institutions among the Jews were prefigurative hints, or notices of what was to happen under a more perfect dispensation. Hence a sacrifice, the blood of which was shed before the ark, or other symbolical presence of God, prefigured a more noble, more dignified blood, which should be shed before God at some future time: that as such blood was shed to reconcile man and God, to mediate between those otherwise distant parties, so the nobler blood should mediate, with unlimited success, in restoring amity between God and man. They say also, that the dwelling in tabernacles, or booths, prefigured the appearance of a great personage, whose residence in human nature was to him but a mere temporary humble dwelling; as much below his true dignity, as a slight booth or hut is below the dignity of a palace. In like manner, the passover lamb was a victim which exempted from evil, while it also prefigured a nobler deliverer (and deliverance) from divine wrath and anger, than could possibly be accomplished in the exemption of Israel from the stroke of the destroying angel which smote the first-born of the Egyptians,—a nobler deliverance from the moral tyranny of sin, than that of the Israelites was, from the oppressive dominion of Pharaoh: which deliverance is accomplished by the blood of “the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world.”

Types differ from signs, in that signs were occasional, and usually pointed to a time, but little distant, in the first place; though ultimately to a much more distant event, of whose accomplishment, the accomplishment of the sign was a token, an earnest, and in some sense a proof: as it manifested a Divine interposition on the subject to which the sign related. So, when Ezekiel, at a great distance from Jerusalem, brought out his goods, and digged through his house, he signified the fate of Jerusalem: so, when Isaiah was ordered to beget a child (a son) by a young woman, then a virgin, this being accomplished, was a sign of a much greater birth to be expected in the person of Emmanuel, to whom the prophet expressly directs the ultimate reference.

If this be correct, what should prevent types also from looking forward? If it pleased God to encourage the hope and faith of his people by occasional signs, why not also by lasting and permanent (signs) types? Why might not the same ideas be conveyed every day, every year, on public occasions, as incidentally, only, in a less conspicuous manner? Nevertheless, that may be true of public services under a general idea, which it would be imprudent and unadvisable to apply to every minute circumstance attending them. E. gr. The holy of holies in the Jewish temple might be emblematic of heaven, the residence of God; but it certainly is not prudent to consider whatever may at any rate, and by any construction, bear a reference to the holy of holies, as therefore assimilated to a correspondent antitype in heaven. The wit, the ingenuity of many of those references, which occur in some systems of divinity, may be admirable, but admiration differs from approbation. Though we read that the bellies of the pillars in Solomon's temple were decorated with lilly work, it is by no means certain that “the typical meaning was, to denote that ministers being the pillars of the gospel church, and lillies being emblems of the care of Providence, therefore gospel ministers should leave to Providence the care of their bellies.” Whatever may be thought of the doctrine, it is far enough from certain, that this was the intention of the sacred writer, or of the Holy Spirit, in recording this passage; to which intention too much cautious deference cannot be paid.

Whether certain histories which happened in ancient times, were designed as types of future events, it is not easy to determine: but observe, (1.) it is likely that such histories are recorded (being selected from among many occurrences) as might be useful lessons, &c. &c. to succeeding ages. (2.) That there being a general conformity in the dispensations of Providence, and Grace, to different persons, and in different ages, instances of former dispensations may usefully be held up to the view of later times, and may encourage, or may check, may direct, or may controul, those placed in circumstances, &c. similar to what is recorded, though their times and their places may be widely separated. We have New Testament authority for this.

Types may be considered as possessing different degrees of that clearness which determines their reference to their antitype: some may be evident, and palpable; others more obscure: some may be referable in a general or leading sense, or under some particular view, but, if only that general (or that particular) view were originally designed, it is not for us to particularize every division, every ramification seen under every aspect, and tinged with every hue which the multiplication glass of a fertile imagination may offer, or may induce us to admire.

The Jewish literati delighted in the studies and the application of learning derived from the types: they even thought certain letters, and their positions, were of the nature of types; hence arose their Cabala: and it must be owned, that Christian fathers have vied with them in such treatment of Scripture; but the fallacy of this mode of instruction, as to any reliance to be placed on it, appears, from considering, that scarcely any two commentators agree in their explanations and inferences, when such principles are the basis of their remarks.

Types should be referred from a less to a greater, as from the death of a beast to the death of a man: from a lower to a higher, as from earth to heaven: from time present to futurity, as from this world to the eternal state: from lesser degrees of perfection to more absolute, as from man to God. If the sacrifice of a lamb availed officially to restore peace, or to conciliate liate favour, that of a person in whom dwelt the fulness of Divinity, must be infinitely more available to mediate reconciliation: if pardon and exemption from punishment in this world be desirable, justification and deliverance from eternal misery is infinitely more desirable: if the tender feelings of a father in this unequal state, and amidst all the imperfections of the social principle be powerful, how much more those of the great Father of all, the Father of our spirits! Whatever is Divine is infinite, whatever is infinite eludes our comprehension, however urged by the most vehement imagination: under this reflection, types may be useful by offering similitudes adapted to our powers, but when that which is perfect is come, that which is imperfect, and partial, that which is feeble and unsatisfactory, shall be done away.]

late

TYPHONICUS, Τυφώνικος, a turbulent, or impetuous wind; from the Greek τύφα, that is inflamed, or that blows violently. Acts xxviii. 14.

TYRANNUS, Τύραννος, Prince. We read, Acts xix. 9 that St. Paul, at Ephesus, withdrew from the synagogue, but taught every day in the school of one Tyrannus. It is enquired who this Tyrannus was? Some think him a prince, or great lord, who accommodated St. Paul with his house in which to receive and instruct his disciples. But the generality conclude, that Tyrannus was a converted Gentile, a friend of St. Paul, to whom he withdrew. The name of one Tyrannus may be applied, either to a man of this name, or to some sovereign prince. But, besides, that the name Tyrannus was then become so odious, that it would not have been given to a man who deserved only what was good to be said of him, without some kind of mitigation, some Greek manuscripts have Tyrannios instead of Tyrannos. Other copies intimate, that he taught from the fifth to the tenth hour. We find in history more men than one by the name of Tyrannus. [This name was probably a family name; as King, Duke, Earl, &c. are among ourselves: but the name does not imply the dignity of king, duke, or earl. From the manner of the writer's mentioning this person, as τινος, a certain Tyrannus, it should seem that he was not of great eminence in his profession, which appears to have been that of a schoolmaster; it is true that some schools were held for philosophic purposes, and for the liberal arts; but the phrase used rather leads to a different view of this school, which, possibly, might be for the education of youth.]

TYRANT, prince: or that governs; from the Greek τυραννός, that reigns or governs.

TYRANT. This word is taken in an odious sense in most modern languages, for a prince who abuses his authority, to oppress his subjects, and to molest his neighbours. But in the Greek and Latin, tyrannus is often taken in a good sense, and anciently there was no distinction or difference of signification between tyrannus and rex. Nihil intererat apud majores inter tyrannum et regem. Servius, in Æneid. lib. iv. Afterwards, the word tyrant became a word of reproach and detestation, especially in free states.

In Esth. vi. 2. Primus de regibus principibus ac tyrannis. פַּרְתֻּמִּים, Parthumim, seems to answer to the Greek παρτιμιος, paratimios, an illustrious man. We read the same word, parthumim, in Daniel, i. 3. translated tyrannus in the Vulgate. In chap. iii. 2, 3. we read in Heb. גִּדְבָרַי, gedabræi, instead of tyrannus, as in the Greek and Latin. In Job, xxxiv. 19. tyrannus answers to the Hebrew Shar, a prince; and chap. xxxv. 9. it answers to Rabbim, great men. In Ezekiel xxiii. 23. Tyrannus is put for the Hebrew Shuah. In Habakkuk, i. 10. Tyrannus is put for the Hebrew Rasen, which signifies a lord, a governor; and is probably the same as Saren or Suren, a great lord. I shall not speak of the books that are written in Greek; as the Book of Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, and the Maccabees, where the word Tyrannus is used sometimes in a good sense, and sometimes in a bad sense; as by other Greek authors.

TYRE, צֹר, צָר, Sor, or Tzur; Τυρός, strength, rock, sharp. [Josh. xix. 29. מִבְּצָר צָר, Urbem munitissimam Tyrum. Vulg.]

TYRE, a famous city of Phœnicia. Aulus Gellius, lib. xiv. cap. 6. says, its ancient name was Sarra. [q from Zor?] Plautus, in Trucul. calls it Sara:

Purpuram tibi ex Sara attuli.

And Silius Italicus, lib. xv. puts Sarranus murex for Tyrius:

Sarano murex fulgens.

Tyre was allotted to the tribe of Asher, with other maritime cities of the same coast; but it does not appear that the Asherites ever drove out the Canaanites. Yet very learned men maintain, that in Joshua's time Tyre was not built; and that Mibzar-Zor, Urbem munitissimam Tyrum, [Strong Tyre—well-fortified Tyre—Tyre the Great,] is not the city of Tyre. Isaiah, xxiii. 12. calls Sidon the daughter of Tyre, i.e. a colony from it. Homer never speaks of Tyre, but only of Sidon. Josephus, Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 2. says, Tyre was built not above two hundred and forty years before the temple of Solomon; which would be A. M. 2760, two hundred hundred years after Joshua. Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 44. says, it was affirmed by the priests of Tyre, that the temple of Hercules in this city was built at the same time as the city itself, which was 2,300 years before the time of his writing; (A. M. 3596.) By which account Tyre must have been built 656 years before the deluge; which by no means can be admitted. [Query, should we read 1,300? in the passage of Herodotus.]

But there seems to be a possibility of reconciling these variations, by allowing two cities of Tyre; one known to the ancients by the name of Pala-Tyrus; the other a later city, called only Tzor, or Tyre. The first was built on the Continent, and here stood the temple of Hercules, of whose antiquity the priests of Tyre so extravagantly boasted to Herodotus. In this temple the Tyrians would have had Alexander sacrifice, when he sent them word he desired to come into their city, under pretence of offering sacrifices to Hercules. Quint. Curt. lib. iv. cap. 5. Justin. lib. xi. cap. 1. Tyrum se ire velle ad vota Herculi reddenda dixit. Legati responderunt, esse Templum Herculis extra urbem, in ea sede quam Pala-Tyron, sive veterem Tyrum ipsi vocant, ibique in antiquiore templo rectius id eum esse facturum, &c. The other Tyre stood on an island opposite the former, from which it was divided but by a narrow slip of the sea; Pliny says, lib. v. cap. 19. not above seven hundred paces. Alexander the Great filled up this space, in order to take the city; and the island continued joined to the Continent in Pliny's time: Tyrus quondam Insula præalto mari septingentis passibus divisa: nunc verò Alexandri oppugnantis operibus continens.

Joshua therefore must be understood to speak of the ancient Tyre. The later city was not built, even in the time of Solomon; there was only a temple on the island, dedicated to Jupiter Olympius. Dios, and Menander, the Ephesian, apud Joseph. contra Appion. lib. i. who wrote the Phœnician history, relate, that Hiram, the friend of Solomon, joined to the city of Tyre the temple of Hercules, which stood by itself on the island, by a mole formed by throwing earth, &c. into the sea. It is true, that when Hiram wrote to Solomon, he asked corn of him; because, says he, we have need of it, living in an island whereon our city is built. But there is great probability that this circumstance was added by Josephus, since we read the same letters in Eusebius, Euseb. Præpar. lib. x. cap. 33, 34. in a very different style, and where this circumstance is not found. There still remain many traces of the ancient Tyre; as large cisterns, and parts of an aqueduct, which conveyed water from the main land into the island. This island was 22 stadia, or 3,190 paces in circumference: old Tyre was 19,000 paces.

Menander of Ephesus relates, Joseph. Antiq. lib. ix. cap. ult. that Salmaneser, king of Assyria subdued all Phœnicia. For the inhabitants of Sidon, of Acco, and of some other cities having renounced their alliance with the Tyrians, and having surrendered to the king of Assyria, Salmaneser made war against the Tyrians, with a fleet of sixty ships and eight hundred rowers. The Tyrians had but twelve ships, yet they obtained the victory, dispersing the king's fleet, and taking five hundred prisoners. Salmaneser was then obliged to return to Nineveh, but he left his land forces before Tyre, who took possession of the waters of the river, and of the aqueducts. This continuing for five years, the Tyrians were forced to dig wells in their own city. Usher places this expedition of Salmaneser A. M. 3287, under the reign of Hezekiah, king of Judah, ante A. D. 717.

Ezekiel, xxvii, xxviii. describes at length, the siege of Tyre, by Nebuchadnezzar. A. M. 3419, ante A. D. 585. The learned are not agreed, whether he speaks of old or new Tyre, Jerom, in loc. et in Amos i. thinks it to be new Tyre, because he says Nebuchadnezzar joined the isle to the Continent, by earth, stones, and wood, thrown into the water. Marsham, Perizonius, and some others, think on the contrary, it was old Tyre. However this might be, Nebuchadnezzar ruined the city of Tyre; and the prophets shew clearly enough that it was never rebuilt. Marsham, Canon. Chron. Sæcul. xviii. p. 578. This can be strictly understood of old Tyre, only; for new Tyre flourished much later; long after Nebuchadnezzar. It even recovered itself, after its fall by Alexander.

Isaiah says, xxiii. 15, 17, 18. "It shall come to pass in that day, that Tyre shall be forgotten seventy years, according to the days of one king; after the end of seventy years shall Tyre sing as a harlot. And it shall come to pass, after the end of seventy years, that the Lord will visit Tyre, and she shall turn to her hire, and shall commit fornication with the kingdoms of the world, upon the face of the earth. And her merchandize, and her hire shall be holiness to the Lord, it shall not be treasured nor laid up; for her merchandize shall be for them that dwell before the Lord, to eat sufficiently, and for durable clothing." It is not easy to fix either the beginning or the end of these seventy years of oblivion, of the city of Tyre. For if we place its beginning at the capture of this city by Nebuchadnezzar, or at that by Alexander the Great, we must take the word oblivion, in an unusual sense, since we read that Nebuchadnezzar left Ithobal for king of Tyre, Joseph. cont. Appion. lib. i. and that Alexander left therein Abdalonymus, or Ballonymus, or Strato; (for all these names are found in the ancients, Diodor. Sicul. Justin, &c.) and that these princes and their successors reigned there a long time. Nor do we perceive that the Tyrians, before the time of Jesus Christ shewed any zeal for the Lord, or for his worship. Therefore to reconcile these prophecies, it must be supposed, that when the prophets speak of the total destruction of Tyre, they mean the ancient Tyre, which was never rebuilt: and that when they foretel the re-establishment of Tyre, they must be understood of the new city, which became very flourishing, and rose superior to its misfortunes. And finally, that when it embraced the Christian religion, it offered to the Lord the fruits of its labours and traffic. In the time of St. Paul, there was a great number of believers in Tyre, Acts xxi. and afterwards the church of Tyre became very famous. It afforded a great number of martyrs for the Christian faith, and several illustrious bishops; councils have been held there.

[In FRAGMENTS, No. XC. the reader may see the fulfilment of prophecy, as noticed by Mr. BRUCE: the latest traveller who has visited Tyre, is Mr. BUCKINGHAM; who describes the port as of difficult entrance, but not impracticable; and the town as now consisting of two hundred houses.]

TYTHES. We have nothing more ancient concerning tythes, than what is read Gen. xiv. 20. that Abraham gave tythes to Melchizedech, king of Salem, of all the booty he had taken from the enemy. Jacob imitated this piety of his grandfather, when he vowed to the Lord the tythe of all the substance he might acquire in Mesopotamia. Gen. xxviii. 22. Under the law, Moses ordained, "All the tythe of the land, whether of the seed of the land, or of the fruit of the tree, is the Lord's; it is holy unto the Lord. And if a man will at all redeem ought of his tythes, he shall add thereto the fifth part thereof. And concerning the tythe of the herd, or of the flock, even of whatsoever passeth under the rod, the tenth shall be holy unto the Lord, Lev. xxvii. 30, 31, 32.

The Pharisees, in the time of Jesus Christ, to distinguish themselves by a more scrupulous observance of the law, not content with tything the grain and fruits growing in the fields, they also paid tythe of pulse and herbs growing in their gardens, which was more than the law required. Our Saviour did not censure this exactness; but he blames their hypocrisy and pride in it, Matt. xxiii. 23. Luke xi. 42. We read also in the Talmud, Seder. Serrin Musco: that whatever is eaten, or laid up in reserve, which is produced from the earth, is liable to first-fruits and tythes.

Tythes were taken from what remained, after the offerings and first-fruits were paid. They brought the tythes to the Levites in the city of Jerusalem, as appears by Josephus, Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 8. and Tob. i. 6. The Levites set apart the tenth part of their tythes for the priests (for the priests did not receive them immediately from the people) and the Levites were not to enjoy the tythes they had received, before they had given to the priests such a part as the law assigned them. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CXXXV.

Of those nine parts that remained to the proprietors, after the tythe was paid to the Levites, they took another tenth part, which was either sent to Jerusalem in kind, or, if that were too far, they sent the value in money, adding thereto a fifth, from the whole, [?] as the Rabbins inform us, Vide Lyran, Deut. xxvi. 12. This tenth part was applied toward celebrating the festivals in the temple; and was nearly resembled by the Agapæ, or love-feasts, of the first Christians. Thus those words of Deuteronomy, xiv. 22, 23. are understood by the Rabbins: "Thou shalt truly tythe all the increase of thy seed, that the field bringeth forth year by year. And thou shalt eat before the Lord thy God, in the place which he shall choose to place his name there, the tythe of thy corn, of thy wine, and of thy oil, and the firstlings of thy herds and of thy flocks: that thou mayest learn to fear the Lord thy God always." Josephus also speaks of these feasts which were made in the temple, and in the holy city. Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 8.

Tobit says, i. 6. that every three years he paid punctually his tythe to strangers and proselytes. This was probably because there were neither priests nor Levites in the city where he dwelt. Moses speaks of this last kind of tythe, Deut. xiv. 28. xxvi. 12. "At the end of three years thou shalt bring forth all the tythe of thine increase the same year, and shalt lay it up within thy gates. And the Levite, (because he hath no part nor inheritance with thee), and the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, which are within thy gates, shall come, and shall eat and be satisfied; that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hand which thou dost." We think this third tythe not to be different ferent from the second kind already noticed, except that in the third year it was not brought into the temple, but was used on the spot by every one in the city of his habitation. Therefore, properly speaking, there were only two sorts of tythes, 1. That which was given to the Levites and priests, 2. that which was applied to feasts of charity, either in the temple at Jerusalem, or in other cities.

Samuel tells the children of Israel; that their king would "take the tenth part of their seed, and of their vineyards, and give to his officers and his servants. He will take the tenth of your sheep, and ye shall be his servants." 1 Sam. viii. 15, 16. Yet it does not clearly appear from the history of the Jews, that they regularly paid tythe to their princes. But the manner in which Samuel expresses himself, seems to insinuate, that it was looked on as a common right among the kings of the east.

At this day the Jews no longer pay tythe, at least they do not think themselves obliged to do it, except those that are settled in the territory of Jerusalem, and the ancient Judea, Leo of Modena, Part i. cap. 12. Because very few Jews now have lands of their own, or flocks. They only give money for the redemption of the first-born, to those whom they think are descended from the priests or Levites. However, we are assured, that such among the Jews as would be thought very strict, and religious, give the tenth part of their income to the poor.

Christians also pay tythe of the produce of their estates to the ministers of the Lord. But not by virtue of any law, either of Jesus Christ or his apostles. Our Saviour has commanded nothing on this, only, when he sent his apostles to preach in the cities of Israel, he forbade them to carry either purse, or provisions, but to enter the houses of those who were willing to receive them, and to eat what should be set before them: for, as he adds, the labourer is worthy of his hire, i.e. of his maintenance, Matth. x. 10. Luke x. 7, 8. And St. Paul determines, that he who receives instruction, should administer some of his good things to him who gives it. Gal. vi. 6. It is agreeable to nature and reason, that they who wait at the altar should live by the altar; and, who ever undertook a warfare at his own expence? 1 Cor. ix. 13.

In the infancy of the church, the ministers lived only on the alms and oblations of the faithful. Afterwards, lands and fixed revenues were settled on churches, and their ministers. Good people began early to give them a certain portion of their substance, which was called tythe, in imitation of that paid to the priests of the old covenant, though every one gave only as his devotion inclined him: without any express obligation, either as to quantity or quality. Lastly, the bishops, in concurrence with secular princes, made laws for this, and obliged Christians to give to ecclesiastics the tythe of their revenues, and of the fruits of the earth. As these regulations were not all made at the same time, nor in an uniform manner, we cannot precisely fix the period of the establishment of tythes. But they were paid as far back as the sixth century; not every where, nor under the same obligations. Origen thinks, Homil. xi. in Numeros, that the laws of Moses concerning tythes and first-fruits, are not repealed by the Gospel, but that they ought to be observed under the new dispensation. F. Paul, in his Treatise of Benefices, observes, that till the eighth, or the ninth century, tythes were not paid in the East, or in Africa. But those who have treated this matter with greater accuracy, shew that tythes had been paid from the earliest time.

The most barbarous nations, the heathen, Greeks, and Romans, from a principle of religion, from a feeling common to all men, often dedicated tythes to their gods. Some made it a standing obligation, others practised it on particular occasions; or by the impulse of a transient devotion. The Arabian merchants who traded in spices, durst not sell any till they had paid the tythe to their god Sabis, Pliny, lib. xii. cap. 14. The Persians were very exact in offering to their gods the tythe of the spoils taken from their enemies, Xenoph. Cyropæd. lib. iv. v. vii. The Scythians sent their tythes to Apollo, Solin. cap. 27. The Carthaginians were accustomed to send to Tyre, of which they were a colony, the tythe of their profits, Mela, lib. ii. cap. 5. and they sent to Hercules Tyrius the tenth of the spoils they took in Sicily. Diodor. lib. xx. Justin, lib. xviii. The ship that brought the usual tythe of the Carthaginians to Tyre happened to arrive there a little before Alexander begun the siege of that city. Q. Curt. lib. iv. cap. 2. When Pisistratus wrote to Solon, to persuade him to return to Athens, he told him that every one there paid the tythe of his goods for the offering of sacrifices to the gods. Laert. lib. i. The Pelasgians that were settled in Italy, received a command from the oracle, to send their tythes to Apollo of Delphos. Dionys. Halicarn. Plutarch, in more places than one, mentions a custom of the Romans, of offering to Hercules the tythe of what they took from their enemies.

[VAHEB, a gift, a place given. The name of a place, Numb. xxi. 14. Le Clerc thought it to be the same as Mathana, a gift, Numb. v. 18, 19. Some think it to be the name of a king of Moab. This name does not appear in Eng. Tr. but is nevertheless usually adopted by critics.]

VAICRA, ויקרא, the Title of the Book of Leviticus, being the first word of that book, signifying, And he called; from the conjunction ו vau, and the word קרא kara, to call.

VAJEDABER, וידבר, the Title of the Book of Numbers, being the first word of that book, signifying, And he spake; from the conjunction ו vau, and the word דבר dabar, to speak.

VAJEZATHA, ויעזא, βαζαθα, Vulgate, Jezata. That waters the bed; from נזח nazah, to water, and חדר tha, chamber, or bed: or according to the Syriac and Hebrew, Woe to the olive. [The youngest son of Haman. Esth. ix. 9. From the Persian, clear, pure, or gladness.]

VALE, or VALLEY. There are many vallies mentioned in Scripture.

Valley of BERACHAH, or of blessing, in Judah, west of the Dead Sea, 2 Chron. xx. 26.

Vale of SIDDIM, Vale of the Wood, Vallis Sylvestris, Gen. xiv. 3, 8, 20. גיא השדים. The valley of Heshedim. Some translate the vale of the Fields, or the vale of Chalk; the LXX. the vale of Salt. In this vale stood the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah; and here, afterwards, the lake Asphaltites, or the Dead-Sea was formed. [The term signifies to shed forth; possibly, it may refer to the slime-pits, or ooziings of bitumen: but Parkhurst thinks it refers to the genial powers of nature, idolatrously worshipped here.]

Vale of SHAVEH, or, The King's Dale, Gen. xiv. 17. 2 Sam. xviii. 18. Shaveh is a city in the King's Dale, over against Jerusalem, according to Eusebius. In this vale Melchisedec met Abraham, at his return from his victory over the five kings. But some think this interview was at the foot of mount Tabor. Vide Vit. Melchisedec, tom. iii. Oper. S. Athanas. 239. et Brochard. Descript. Ter. Sanct.

Valley of SALT, [or Salt Pits,] Vallis Salinarum, 2 Sam. xiii. 13. 2 Kings xiv. 7. This is generally placed in the southern parts of Idumea, south of the Dead-sea. Here, they say, the Idumeans were defeated by David, or by Joab; and again by Amaziah, son of Joash, king of Judah. We place it in the eastern parts of Idumea between Tadmor and Bozrah. See SALT.

Valley of REPHAIM, or of the Giants. 2 Sam. v. 18. xxiii. 13. See REPHAIM.

Valley of ESHCOL, or of Grapes, Vallis Botri, Numb. xxxii. 9. See NEHEL ESHCOL.

Valley of JEZREEL. The same as the vale of Esdraelon, or the plain that extends east and west from Scythopolis to the foot of mount Carmel, on the Mediterranean.

Valley of MAMRE, near Hebron. See MAMRE.

Valley of MOREH, near Sichem, called the Plain of Moreh. Gen. xii. 6. See MOREH.

Valley of ACHOR. Josh. vii. 24, 26. Isaiah lxv. 10. Hos. ii. 15. north of Jericho, according to Jerom. Here the unfortunate Achan was stoned. See ACHOR.

Valley of AJALON. See AJALON. This city gave name to the valley.

Valley of REEDS, Vallis Arundinis, Josh. xvi. 8. xvii. 9. גיא קנה, Ge-Kana, the valley, brook, or river of Kanah. It was not far from the Dead-sea, nor from Tapuah.

Valley of JEHOSHAPHAT. It is generally understood to be the valley wherein the brook Kidron runs, east of Jerusalem. See JEHOSHAPHAT. Joel iii. 12. and MAP of JERUSALEM.

Valley of HINNOM, or Valley of the Sons of Hinnom. Josh. xv. 8. גיא חנוך, Gehennon, or Geben-Hennon; whence Gehenna. It was east and south of Jerusalem. See HINNOM, HENNON, or TOPHET: and MAP of JERUSALEM.

King's Dale, or Valley. See Valley of SHA-VEH, before.

Valley of CHARASHIM, or of Craftsmen, Vallis Artificum. 1 Chron. iv. 14. Neh. xi. 35. גיא חרשים Ge-charashim. It is placed on the side of the Jordan, in Benjamin.

Valley of KEZIZ. Josh. xviii. 21. עקק קצי, in Benjamin. Its situation is not exactly known. Some translate the Hebrew by the valley of Incision. It is conjectured that this name was given it, because, perhaps, they here cultivated balm, balm, which is drawn from the tree by incision. But I cannot think this plant was cultivated here so early as the times of Joshua.

Valley of JIPHTHAH-EL. Josh. xix. 14, 27. It probably took its name from the city of Jiphthah-el, on the frontiers of Zebulun. The true situation is unknown. See JIPHTHAH-EL.

Valley of SOREK, Judg. xvi. 4. in which was the city of Sorek, in Dan. Perhaps it may be the same as the valley of Eshcol. See SOREK.

Valley of ZEBOIM, 1 Sam. xiii. 18. Zeboim was one of the four cities consumed with Sodom by fire from heaven. Gen. xiv. 2. xviii. xix. The valley of Zeboim was therefore on the Dead-sea, but its situation is not known. Perhaps Zeboim was rebuilt; See Neh. xi. 34. as also Sodom. The Chald. Hebr. Vatab. take Zeboim, or Tzeboim, in a generical sense, for serpents, basilisks, or dragons. [rather some wild beast; perhaps, a wild wolf, the sheeb of the Arabs.]

Valley of GAD. 2 Sam. xxiv. 5. beyond Jordan, in the portion of Gad, and probably along the Arnon.

Vale of BACA, or of Tears, Psalm lxxxiv. 6. probably the same as the valley of Tears, or Weepers, or Bochim. Judg. ii. 1. 2 Sam. v. 23. See BOCHIM. This valley was south of Jerusalem. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCCIV.

Valley of VISION, Isaiah xxii. 1. in the prophetic and figurative stile, signifies Jerusalem. It is called a valley by Antiphrasis, for in reality that city stood on a mountain. And the additional name of vision was given it, because it is the subject of the prophecy of Isaiah; or, because the temple of Jerusalem was built upon mount Moriah, which is the Mountain of Vision, Gen. xxii. 14. [Query, the valley between two hills, as between Zion and Moriah? LXX. Valley of Sion.]

The FAT Valley, Isaiah xxviii. 1, 4. Vallis Pinguium. This lies below and about the city of Samaria. This country was very fat and fruitful. Samaria stood on a rising ground that commanded this valley: In vertice vallis pinguissimæ. See FRAGMENTS, No. DLXVII.

Valley of SLAUGHTER, Vallis interfectionis. This name, according to the prophet Jeremiah's prediction, should be given to the valley of Hinnom, or Tophet. See TOPHET, and Jer. vii. 32. xix. 6. xxxi. 40. It is called the Valley of Decision, or Concision, Joel iii. 14. and the Valley of Jehoshaphat, or of the judgment of God.

Valley of the DEAD BODIES, Jer. xxxi. 40. Vallis Cadaverum. The same as Topheth, which was the slaughter-house of Jerusalem. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DLXXVIII.

Valley of the PASSENGERS, or Travellers, Ezek. xxxix. 11. Vallis Viatorum ad orientem maris. We think this stands for the great road at the foot of mount Carmel from Judea, Egypt; and the country of Philistia, into Phœnicia.

Valley of HAMON-GOG, Ezek. xxxix. 11, 15. or the burying-place of the army of Gog. Probably the valley of Jezreel, in which, we think, the army of Cambyses was defeated after the death of that prince. See GOG.

Valley of the MOUNTAINS, Zech. xiv. 5. Vallis Montium. The vallies round about Jerusalem, where the inhabitants of that city took shelter in their last misfortunes, when the city was besieged by the Romans.

The Illustrious Valley, near Sichem. The vale, or plain of Moreh. The Hebrew calls it, Gen. xii. 6. Elon-Moreh, the oak, or grove of Moreh.

Vale of KIDRON, 2 Kings xxiii. 4, 6. or the fields of the brook Kidron, east of Jerusalem, between this city and the mount of Olives. Comp. FRAGMENTS, passim, and MAP of JERUSALEM.

Valley of GIHON, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14. west Jerusalem, named from the fountain of Gihon, whose spring is in this place, and runs from west to south.

Valley of SUCCOTH, or the valley of tents, Psal. lx. 6. cviii. 7. Convallis Tabernaculorum. Beyond Jordan, near the city of Succoth. The Psalmist puts the valley of Succoth, for the whole country beyond Jordan.

Valley, or plain of ZAANAIM, Judg. iv. 11. where dwelt Heber the Kenite. In Galilee, near Zaanaim, and Kedesh of Naphtali.

Valley of ELAH, 1 Sam. xvii. 2. עֵלַי קִרְיָה, of the oak, or terebinthus. Saul here encamped with the army of Israel; when the giant Goliath came to insult the Hebrews. This valley was south of Jerusalem, towards Sochoh and Azekah. Also the name of the valley of Terebinthus is given to the valley of Mamre, because of the terebinthus tree, under which Abraham entertained the angels. See TEREBINTHUS.

Valley of ZEPHATHAH, at Mareshah, 2 Chron. xiv. 10. Here Asa, king of Judah, defeated a great army of Ethiopians or Cushim: This valley was towards Mareshah and Eleutheropolis.

VALLIS PINGUIUM, עֵשְׂמָנִים, Geshemanim. See GETHEMANI. The vale of the fat ones, or the fat valleys; from עֵשְׂמָנִים ghei, a vale, and עֵשְׂמָנִים shaman, fat. Isaiah xxviii. 1.

VALLISSALINARUM, מְלַח־קִרְיָה, Ge melach, Γεμαλὲχ. Valley of Salt-pits; from עֵשְׂמָנִים ghei, a valley, and מְלַח melach, salt. 2 Sam. viii. 13.

VALLIS

VALLIS SYLVESTRIS, עֵמֶשׂ הַשִּׁידִים, Emeshashidim, Εμέσσηξ, The vale of woods, or of fields, or wild; from עֵמֶשׂ hamac, a vale, or depth, and שִׁידָה shidded, to harrow, to prepare a field. Gen. xiv. 3.

VANIAH, נִיחַ, nourishment of the Lord, or the arms of the Lord. One of those put away their strange wives, after the return from Babylon. Ezra x. 36. [Simon thinks, oppressed, i. e. in the captivity.]

VANITY. Interpreters generally translate by vanitas and vanum, the Hebrew words, שָׁוְיָה, vanitas, mendacium, and הֶבֶל, habel, vanitas, inutilitas: the first of which rather signifies what is opposed to truth; the second what is opposed to reality and solidity. Thus the word vanity is taken in several senses, in the sacred writers.

I. VANITY is put for vain glory, or pride, which inflates men with a great opinion of themselves, boasting, or self-conceit. So Psal. cxix. 37. "Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity." 2 Pet. ii. 18. "They speak great swelling words of vanity."

II. VANITY is taken for lying, Psalm iv. 2. "How long will ye love vanity, and seek after leasing?" Exod. xx. 7. "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain;" or, thou shalt not swear to confirm a thing that is false; thou shalt not appeal to the Lord as a witness of lies. Visions of vanity, words of vanity, signify false and deceitful discourses, or lies.

III. VANITY is taken for mere nothing, or emptiness. Eccl. i. "Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher, vanity of vanities, all is vanity:" I have seen nothing but vanity and vexation of spirit, in every thing done in this world, or under the sun. Psalm cxliv. 4. "Every man living is but altogether vanity: Man is like to vanity, his days are as a shadow that passeth away."

IV. VANITY is taken for idols: Deut. xxxii. 21. "They have moved me to jealousy with that which is not God, they have provoked me to anger with their vanities: They followed vanity, and became vain." 2 Kings xvii. 15. Jer. ii. 5. "Is not the Lord in Sion? Is not her king in her? Why have they provoked me to anger with their graven images, and with strange vanities?"

V. Vain is often put for falsely, or wantonly, unnecessarily: "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain:" Exod. xx. 7. Thou shalt not swear falsely; or, rather, Thou shalt not take uselessly, needlessly, and without very good and substantial reasons, the name of God to witness what thou affirmest. The Hebrew word שָׁוְיָה shave, translated cain, is put for false in many places; as Deut. v. 20. Exod. xx.

16. Lev. xix. 12. Psalm iv. 3. xxxvii. 18, lxi. 10. Ezek. xii. 24. xiii. 6. Hos. x. 4. xii. 11. Jonah ii. 9. Zech. x. 2. Matth. v. 33. Tertull. de Idololat. cap. 20. Cyrill. Clem. Alex. &c. were of opinion, that this passage forbade to give the name of God to false gods, to idols. It is certain, that vana is often taken for false gods: But that is not the literal meaning of this place.

VI. Vain is opposed to true, real, substantial. Psalm v. 10. Their heart is vain, or full of vanity and lying. Psalm xii. 2. They have deceived their neighbours by vain discourses, by words of deceit and lies. The false prophets, Ezekiel xiii. 6. Vident vana et divinant mendacium, have only idle dreams, and empty visions: They pronounce only vain and false predictions. See also Isaiah lvi. 10.

Vain things are idols. 1 Sam. xii. 21. Do not run after idols, that cannot protect you; for they are non-entities. See Acts xiv. 14, 15.

To lift up the soul to Vanity, Psalm xxiv. 4. i. e. to swear by his own life, to swear vainly and falsely. Psalm lxii. 10. They have sought my soul in vain; they have unsuccessfully endeavoured to take away my life; God has preserved me, and defended me from their snares; or, rather, they have sought, without any reason, and under false and vain pretences, to put me to death.

Vain men, does not only signify men puffed up with pride, and full of vanity, but also worthless and inconsiderate persons, without religion, without rule or conduct—brainless fellows. So, 2 Chron. xiii. 7. אֲנָשִׁים רָקִים בְּנֵי בָלִיעַל. LXX. ἄνδρες λοῖμοι. Viri vanissimi, et filii Belial. The Hebrew says, men void of sense, or beggars, miserable children, without a yoke, worthless children, [sons of unrestrainableness.] — Rakim, which the Vulgate translates by vanissimi, is the same as raca, Matth. v. 22. whoso calleth his brother raca. Instead of vanissimi the LXX. render it pestilential (or dangerous) fellows.

He that heaps up riches by lying is vain, and without understanding, Prov. xxi. 6. הֶבֶל נָרָף. Vanus est et excors. The Hebrew says, vanity is driven by the wind; is as chaff, the sport of winds. And elsewhere, Prov. xii. 8. נָעוּיָה לֵב. Perversus corde. He that is vain, and without understanding, shall be exposed to contempt. The Hebrew says, He that hath a perverse and corrupted heart, &c. Those that have no knowledge of God, are only vanity; all their other qualities, their science, their skill, is nothing but ignorance, without this knowledge. The Greek intimates, All men are by nature vain; they can do nothing of themselves, they tend to nothing, &c.

VASHNI, וַשְׁנִי, Καὶ ὁ δεύτερος. This has been taken for the name of a person, but very improperly. 1 Chron. vi. 28. is defective; Filii Samuel primogenitus Vasseni. It should be read, Filii Samuel, Joel primogenitus, et secundus (Heb. וַשְׁנִי vaseni.) Abia. The word Vashni therefore denotes only the second. Some Latin copies have Vashni, Joel, and Abiah. But it should be thus supplied, the sons of Samuel were—Joel, the first-born, and—the second, Abiah. See 1 Chron. vi. 33.

VASHTI, וַשְׁתִּי, Ἀστί, that drinks; from שַׁתְּחַה shathah: otherwise, thread, or woof; from שֶׁתִּי shethi. [Beauty, very beautiful.]

VASHTI, or VASTHI, a wife of king Ahasuerus. Esth. i. 9, &c. This prince made a great feast for all the nobles of his kingdom; queen Vashti also made a feast to entertain the women, in the palace. On the seventh day of the feast, when the king was more merry than usual, being warmed with wine, he ordered his principal officers to fetch queen Vashti, with her royal ornaments, that he might shew her extraordinary beauty to his subjects: but she refused to come. This put the king in a great passion, and he consulted with his statesmen, what should be her punishment. Memucan, the first of the counsellors, answered, that she should be divorced, her crown taken from her, and given to another more worthy. This advice prevailed. Vashti was repudiated, and Esther taken in her place. See ESTHER. This happened A. M. 3486, ante A. D. 518.

It is enquired, who this queen Vashti was? Some have thought she was Atossa, daughter of Cyrus, first married to Cambyses, her own brother, afterwards to the Magian, or counterfeit Smerdis; and lastly, to Darius, son of Hystaspes, whom we take to be Ahasuerus. She was of exquisite beauty; and Herodotus, lib. vii. cap. 3. assures us that Darius had four sons by her, and that she had, for a long time a share in the management of affairs. Therefore she could not be Vashti, who was divorced in the third year of this prince. Others think her to have been Ahasuerus's own daughter. The Persians made no scruple of this kind of marriage, and polygamy was customary among them. But history gives no warrant to this conjecture. Herodotus, lib. vii. cap. 59. speaks likewise of Aristone, wife of Darius, son of Hystaspes; perhaps she may be Esther. [but, this also is attended with great difficulties.]

The Hebrews tell us, that Vashti refused to obey the king, because he required her to shew herself naked, [unveiled. Vide FRAGMENTS, No.

CLIX.] before all the people; which she peremptorily refused.

VEIL, or Theristrum, this Greek word signifies a veil, or scarf, with which women of quality cover their faces in summer, to keep off the heat of the sun. Jerom uses this word to express the veil with which Tamar covered herself when disguised. Gen. xxxviii. 14. וְהִסְתַּר בַּמִּצְנֵה, LXX. Περιέβαλε τὸ Θέριστρον. It answers to the Hebrew word tzaiph, translated a veil, a scarf, a mantle, with which the eastern women covered the head and face. We find the same term, Gen. xxiv. 65. where the Vulgate hints that Rebecca covered herself with her mantle: Acceptit pallium suum. We read also theristrum in the Latin of Isaiah iii. 23. But the Hebrew has haradidim, חֲרָדִידִים. LXX. Θέριστρα κατὰ κλίτα, veils to sit at table in. Others render it by very fine veils, which the women used in summer. They wore their bracelets on their arms and legs next to the skin; and the veil covered their face, neck, bosom, and shoulders, when they were at home: The girdle was very precious, and their sandals probably were adorned with soles of gold. The veil was a kind of crape, so that they could see through it; or at least a passage was left for the light to come to their eyes. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. CLIX. with the PLATE annexed.

UEL, VEL. וֵאל, Ὡς, or God, or the strong; from the conjunction וְ o, or, and וֵאל el, God, or strong: otherwise, that desires God; from וָאֵל ivah, to desire, and וֵאל el, God. Ezra x. 34.

VELLE-SHEMOTH, וְלֵשְׁמֹת, the Title of the Book of Exodus, being the first words of the book: And these are the names; from the conjunction וְ vau, and, the pronoun שְׁמֹת elle, these, and וְ shem, name.

VENGEANCE. See REVENGE.

VENUS, the goddess of love, worshipped by the heathen. Some think her name is derived from the Hebr. Succoth-Benoth, Benos, or Venos. 2 Kings xvii. 30. See SUCOTH BENOTH, and FRAGMENTS, No. CCXIII. with the PLATE annexed. The Egyptians called her Nepthis; the Assyrians, Mylytta; the Arabians, Alitta; the Persians, Mitra; She was also known by the name of Tenais, at Babylon; of Erycina, in Sicily; of Aphrodite, among the Greeks. I believe she was generally worshipped in the territories of Israel by the name of Astarte, or Astaroth, or Asterah, or the goddess of the groves. She is confounded with the moon, whom the Pagans called the heavenly Venus, and the Hebrews the queen of heaven, or the goddess Meni. Comp. FRAGMENTS, Nos. 2 Z div. 2. DII.

DII. DIIL. DXII. The god Dagon was also very probably Venus. [Vide on DAGON, DERKETOS, and PLATES.] The dove was consecrated to this deity. Vide ASTARTE.

Three leagues from Carthage, says Valerius Maximus, lib. ii. cap. 6. was a temple called Sicca Veneria, which had the greater resemblance to the Succoth-Benoth of Scripture, as the women there sacrificed their chastity in honour of Venus; hereby they obtained portions to place themselves out in matrimony afterwards. Siccae enim fanum est Veneris, in quod se matronæ conserebant, atque inde procedentes ad quæstum, dotes corporis injuria contrahebant: honesta nimirum tam inhonesto vinculo conjugia juncturæ.

VERMILION, from the Latin, vermis, or vermiculus, a worm; because crimson and scarlet are dyed by means of little worms, gathered from a kind of green oak, which affords the kermes, or scarlet grain. See WORM. But the true vermilion has no relation to the vermiculus, but in colour. The vermilion known to the ancients, (vide Pliny, Theophrast. Dioscorid. Vitruv.) was found in Spain, on inaccessible rocks, in stones that were beat down with arrows, [as they said.] also in Colchis. Artificial vermilion was made of a red sand, procured near Ephesus, after it had been washed several times. The vermilion we use at present is composed of artificial cinnabar, which has been levigated for a long time upon porphyry, and reduced to an impalpable powder.

Wisdom, xii. 14. speaks of vermilion, with which they painted the statues of the gods: "Laying it over with vermilion, and with paint, colouring it red, and covering every spot therein." When a statuary had formed a statue of crooked and knotty wood, he coated it with vermilion, i. e. with red paint, to give it a splendid colour, and by this covering to hide the deformities of the wood. The ancients much esteemed vermilion, and were very thrifty in the use of it, because of its scarcity, and great price. In the time of Vitruvius, lib. vii. cap. 5. it was pretty common, and entire walls were sometimes painted with it. Verrius, quoted in Pliny, lib. xxxiii. cap. 6. informs us, that on high festival days, there was a ceremony, and a kind of prodigality, in painting the face of Jupiter with vermilion. I have seen a head of Diana wherein the vermilion might still be perceived, if it were wetted. The Censors in Pliny's time, contracted for the care of painting Jupiter's statue with vermilion: A Censoribus Jovem miniandum locari. Camillus triumphed, painted all over with vermilion. Such was the taste of the ancient Romans. Among the Ethiopians, they painted the statues of their gods with this colour: and great men daubed their whole bodies with it. [Whereby they resembled the ancient heroes; conquerors imbued as it were with blood; giants, Rephaim. See FRAGMENTS, on IDOLS, &c.]

VERSIONS of Scripture. It was late before the books of the Old Testament were translated into foreign tongues. The Hebrews were always jealous of their privileges, and of being distinguished from all nations, as the only depositories of the oracles of the prophets, and of the laws of God. They did not readily converse with strangers, but kept close in their own country, which they looked on as the finest and best on the earth. They made as little excursions from hence as they could; and contenting themselves with the study of their own language, and laws, they despised the study of profane sciences, and the conversation of foreigners. This is the observation of their historian Josephus, contr. Appion. lib. i.

They did not think of translating their books into Greek, till the time of the successors of Alexander the Great. Before then, though many Jews were scattered in Persia, Media, Assyria, and Chaldea, yet they never intended translating their sacred books into other tongues; the proximity and relation of the languages of these countries with the Hebrew, or rather, the care they took to preserve their own tongue, in the midst of those people, was a reason why they found no necessity for translating the Hebrew books. They satisfied themselves with expounding them, vivâ voce, to such as did not understand Hebrew. This was the method of Esdras after the return from the captivity, and was continued by his successors, or such as undertook to read and explain the law to the people. Nothing of these Chaldee paraphrases, or interpretations, was committed to writing, till about the time of our Saviour, when Onkelos and Jonathan composed their Targums.

But, after the conquests of Alexander the Great, when the Jews were dispersed throughout the vast empire of that conqueror, and the Greek was now become the universal language for all those provinces,—a language which had no affinity with the Hebrew, many of the Jews were no longer able to understand the sacred books, consequently they were under the necessity of having recourse to some Greek translation. This first produced that version called the LXX. after the seventy interpreters: (Vide SEPTUAGINT;) then those of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion.

The

The other versions of Scripture, whether of the Old or New Testament, into Latin, Syriac, Arabic, and into the vulgar tongues of Europe, Asia, and Africa, were procured and performed chiefly by christians. These were urged by a spirit very different from that of the Jews, and desired nothing more eagerly than to publish to the whole world the truths belonging to Salvation, and to spread every where the light of the law and of the gospel. [For a fuller account of these versions, and for the history of English versions of the Bible; see the Article BIBLE.]

VESPASIAN, was nominated by the emperor Nero, to manage the war against the Jews, A. D. 66. Sueton. in Vespas. cap. 4. Tacit. His. lib. iv. Joseph. de Bello, lib. iii. cap. 1. He was then in Achaia with the emperor, and began immediately to assemble troops, knowing the importance of this undertaking. He did not come into Judea, till A. D. 67, and began the war in Galilee, where he took Gadara and Jotapata. Thence he returned to Ptolemais, and to Cæsarea, where he gave his army some refreshment. Afterwards he took Tiberias, Tarichea, Gamala, and all Galilee. A. D. 68, in order to prepare for the siege of Jerusalem, Vespasian took all the posts and strong places round about.

In the mean time Nero died, A. D. 68, and Galba was declared emperor, but was killed at the beginning of the year following. Vitellius was proclaimed emperor at Cologne; at the same time Otho was made emperor at Rome. Otho losing the battle at Bebraic, slew himself, April 15, A. D. 69. Vitellius was acknowledged emperor alone, and reigned about eight months. While this was doing, Vespasian was declared emperor by the army at Alexandria, July 1, A. D. 69, and by his own army at Cæsarea, July 3. Immediately all the east declared for him, and soon after all the west. Indispensible affairs now calling him to Italy, he left his son Titus to manage the war against the Jews. Titus besieged Jerusalem, and took it A. D. 70, the 73d year of Christ.

Vitellius came to Rome with his army about the middle of July, A. D. 69; and the legions of Illyricum, which had declared for Vespasian, under the conduct of Antonius Primus, defeated the army of Vitellius in two battles, near Cremona. Vitellius himself was killed, December 20, and Vespasian came to Rome some time after. His son Titus came thither also A. D. 71, having reduced Judea, and demolished Jerusalem; on which occasion they had both together a triumph over the Jews. Vespasian sold all the lands of Judea; Joseph. de Bello, lib. vii. cap. 27. sent a colony to Emmaus, which he called Nicopolis; and obliged the Jews to pay the half-shekel a head to the Capitol at Rome; which before they had paid to the temple at Jerusalem. Dio. lib. lxxvi. Vide Origen ad African. Lastly, he made a strict enquiry for all the lineage of David, Euseb. Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. 12. ex Hegesippo, in order to extirpate the whole race, had it been in his power. But though his commands were executed with great rigour, yet he could never succeed in destroying that illustrious family. He died June 24, A. D. 79, aged sixty-nine years, seven months, and seven days. He reigned ten years, wanting six days. He was succeeded by his son Titus.

VESTMENTS, or GARMENTS. The Hebrews wore a coat, or waistcoat, called כתנת Chetonet; and a cloak, called מעיל Mehil. The coat was their under garment, next their skin, and the cloak over this. These two garments together made what Scripture calls a Change of Raiment, 2 Kings v. 15, 22. such as those which Naaman brought as presents to Elisha. The coat was commonly of linen; and the cloak of stuff, or woollen. As the cloak was only a great piece of stuff, not cut; there were often many made, each of one piece, of which they used to make presents. The Hebrews never changed the fashion of their clothes, as we know of; but they dressed after the manner of the country wherein they dwelt. A white colour, or a purple, was in most esteem among them. Solomon advises him who would live agreeably, Eccl. ix. 8. "Let thy garments be always white." Josephus observes of this prince, that being the most splendid and magnificent of kings, he was commonly clothed in bright and white garments. Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 2. Angels generally appeared in white; and in our Saviour's transfiguration, his clothes appeared as white as snow. Moses appoints none but white coats to the priests.

Mention is made in Scripture of a coat of many colours, Gen. xxxvii. 3. כתנת פסים Chetonet passim, with which Joseph was clothed. Tamar daughter of David, wore one also. 2 Sam. xiii. 18. Interpreters are divided about the signification of this word. Some translate it by a long gown; others, by a gown striped with several colours; and others by a gown with large sleeves. The Arabians wear very wide sleeves to their coats. These sleeves have a very wide opening at the end, which hangs sometimes down to the ground, but at the shoulder they are much narrower. In their houses, this coat or gown drags on the ground, but abroad they tuck it up, that they may walk at more liberty; or they tie it up with a girdle. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. LXI. LXII. and PLATES of ARABIAN DRESSES, &c.

Isaiah, iii. 16—25. has a long enumeration of particulars comprised in the dresses of the women of his time. We shall not undertake to explain them, because the correct ideas of the greater part of the Hebrew terms are unknown to interpreters. See PLATES and FRAGMENTS, No. DCLXVII.

Some coats were without seams, woven in a loom, and had no openings, either at the breast, or on the sides; but only at the top, to let the head through. Such, probably, were the coats of the priests, Exod. xxviii. 32. and that of our Lord Jesus Christ, John xix. 23. which the soldiers would not divide, but chose rather to cast lots for it. St. Chrysostom, Theophylact, and Theophanes are of opinion, that it was made of two pieces of woollen stuff, woven in a loom, and fine-drawn together with a needle, so that it seemed to be but one piece. Others consider it as all needle-work from top to bottom. But Braunius, de vestitu Sacerdotum Hebræorum, lib. i. cap. 16. proves that it was all wove in a loom. They still make them after the same manner in the east.

It is an ancient tradition, Vide Euthym. in Joan. xx. that the Holy Virgin herself wove her son's coat. The women formerly made the stuffs and the cloth, not only for their own clothes, but also for their husbands and children. This appears from the instance of the virtuous woman, whose character Solomon delineates, Prov. xxxi. 13. also from that of Penelope, the wife of Ulysses. Alexander the Great, Augustus, and Charlemagne, wore clothes made by the hands of their mothers, their wives, or their daughters.

Another popular tradition is, that the coat of Jesus Christ, for which the soldiers drew lots, was the same he had received from the Virgin Mary, when he was a child, which had continually grown with him, without being worn out. But this tradition is not derived from antiquity. [It was, probably, founded on the following most extravagant misinterpretation.]

Moses informs us, Deut. viii. 4. that the clothes worn by the Hebrews in the Wilderness did not wear out. "Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell these forty years." Justin Martyr, and some interpreters, following the Rabbins, take these words literally, and think that not only the clothes of the Israelites did not grow old, or wear out, but also that those of the children grew with them, and constantly fitted them at every age. Jerom, Ep. 38. asserts, that so much as their hair or nails, did not grow too long. But others think, with much greater probability, that Moses intended no more, than that God so effectually provided them with necessaries, that they did not want clothes [nor had been forced to wear old or ragged clothes] in all their journey.

To distinguish the Israelites from other people, the Lord commanded them to wear tufts, or fringes, at the four corners of their upper garments, of a blue colour, and a border of galloon on the edges. Numb. xv. 38. Deut. xxii. 12. From Matth. ix. 20. we see that our Saviour wore these fringes at the bottom of his cloak. For the woman who had the issue of blood twelve years, promised herself a cure, if she did but touch the hem, i. e. the fringe of his garment. The Pharisees, still further to distinguish themselves, wore these borders, or fringes, longer than others, Matth. xxiii. 5. Magnificent fimbrias. Jerom adds, that to make a shew of greater austerity, they fastened thorns to them, that when they struck against their naked legs, they might be reminded of the law of God.

The Jews at this day, says Leo of Modena, Cerem. Jews, P. 1. cap. 5. that they may comply with the law, Lev. xix. 19. Deut. xxii. 11. which says, "neither shall a garment mingled of linen and woollen come upon thee," do not so much as sew a woollen garment with thread, nor a linen garment with yarn. They take care also not to wear the clothes of a different sex, according to the command, Deut. xxii. 5. See TALED.

The garments of mourning among the Hebrews were sackcloth and haircloth; their colour was dark brown, or black. As the prophets were penitents by profession, their common clothing was mourning. Widows also dressed themselves much the same. Judith fasted every day, except on festival days, and the sabbath-day, and wore a hair-cloth next her skin. Judith viii. 6. The prophet Elias, 2 Kings i. 7, 8. and John the Baptist, Matt. iii. 4. were clothed in skins or coarse stuffs, and wore girdles of leather. St. Paul says, Heb. xi. 37. that the prophets wore melotes, sheep-skins, or goat-skins. The false prophets put on habits of mourning, and penitence, the better to deceive the people. Zech. xiii. 4.

It is disputed, whether the ancient Hebrews lined their clothes. Doubled, or lined, garments, are pretty often mentioned in Scripture. Micah offers his Levite ten pieces of money a year, et vestem duplicem. Judg. xvii. 10. Gehazi asks Naaman for a talent of silver, and doubled or lined garments: Vestes mutatorias duplices. 2 Kings v. 22. The household of the virtuous woman woman in Prov. xxxi. 21. are clothed with lined garments: Vestiti sunt duplicibus. But it is imagined that changes of raiment are to be understood by these expressions, a pair of garments—two coats, and two cloaks; or simply—a coat and a cloak, a complete suit; or perhaps—a garment so large, that it may be doubled about the wearer; yet it must be owned, that duplex, in speaking of clothes, is sometimes taken for a garment that is really doubled or lined. So Moses appoints the pectoral, or breast-piece of the high-priest, to be made square, and to be lined.

To see garments, or frocks, entire without seam, with sleeves and quarters of the same piece, woven together in the loom, is no rarity in the east. We are told (Voyage to China, by two Arabians, in the ninth century, Paris, 1718, octavo, page 2,) that in the Maldivé islands there are workmen and weavers so ingenious that they make entire shirts and waistcoats of the tow of the cocoa-tree, after the manner before described.

VETCHES, or FITCHES, Vicia; a creeping plant that has several stalks, which entangle one in another, and put out small, narrow, longish leaves, less than those of a lentil. Its flower is small, reddish, and sometimes white. Its pods are like those of pease, but shorter and slenderer. The grain they enclose is round, and blackish; they are used for feeding pigeons, which are very greedy of them. [The tares of Matt. xiii. 24, 30. are a very different kind of plant. See TARES.]

Isaiah, xxviii. 25. speaks of fitches; “Doth he not cast abroad the fitches?” The Hebrew כוסמת, cusmeth, is by some translated spelta, by others zea, a kind of wheat. Ezekiel, iv. 9. uses the same word; which the LXX. render by olyra, a kind of wheat.

VINES, VINEYARDS, VINTAGE. There were in Palestine many excellent vineyards. Scripture celebrates the vines of Sorek, of Sebamah, of Jazer, of Abel. Profane authors mention the excellent wines of Gaza, Sarepta, Libanus, Saron, Ascalon, and Tyre,

Dulcia Bacchi
Munera, quæ Sarepta ferax, quæ Gaza creârat.
CORRIP. lib. iii.

Jacob, in the blessing he gave Judah, Gen. xlix. 11. says, “binding his sole unto the vine, and his ass’s colt unto the choice vine; he washed his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes:” to shew the abundance of vines that should fall to his lot. The spouse in the Canticles, i. 13. compares her beloved to a cluster of cypress, that grew in the vineyards of En-gedi. See COPHER and CYPRESS.

These vineyards of En-gedi were not vineyards of grapes for wine [only] but of plants of cypress. At the same place the plants of balsam grew; which may rank this garden among vineyards.

Noah planted the vine after the Deluge, and was the first who cultivated it, Gen. ix. 20. Many are of opinion, that wine was not unknown before the Deluge; and that this patriarch only continued to cultivate the vine after that event, as he had done before it. But the fathers think that he knew not the force of wine; having never used it before, nor having ever seen any one use it. He was the first that gathered the juice of the grape, and reduced it [by the fermentative process] to a potable liquor. Before him, men only ate the grapes, like other fruit.

God often compares his people to a vine, Psalm lxxx. 8. Isaiah v. Jer. ii. 21. Ezek. xvii. Joel i. 7. Matt. xx. 1. which he had brought out of Egypt, and planted in Palestine, as in a good soil, but which, instead of bringing forth good fruit, brought forth only bitter fruit and wild grapes. Jesus Christ relates, that the householder having let this vine to tenants, who ought to have rendered him the fruit of it, instead of that, they abused his servants, and killed his own son, who went to require the payment of what was due to him. In another place our Saviour says to his disciples, “I am the true vine, and my father is the husbandman. Every branch in me that beareth not fruit, he taketh away,” &c. John xv. 1, 2, 3, &c.

The law of Moses forbade that he who planted a vine should eat of its fruit before the fifth year, Lev. xix. 24, 25. Nor did they gather their grapes on the seventh year; the fruit was then left for the poor, the orphan, and the stranger. A traveller was allowed to gather and eat grapes in a vineyard as he passed along, but he was not permitted to carry any away. Deut. xxiii. 24. It was also forbidden to sow any thing else in a vineyard: “Thou shalt not sow thy vineyard with olive seeds. Lev. xxv. 3, 4, &c. Deut. xxii. 9.

VINE, Wild; Labrusca. This plant grew without culture, near the highways and hedges. Its fruit was a very small grape, which became black when ripe: but often it did not ripen at all. See WILD GRAPE, and Isaiah v. 2, 4.

The wild vine of 2 Kings iv. 29. was not the labrusca; but the wild gourd, a plant that produces the coloquintida, a fruit of a deadly bitterness. [It grows in desert spots, as we might say, on heaths or commons.]

VINE of Sodom, mentioned by Moses, Deut. xxxii. 32. is a vine of a plant from Sodom, which brings only bitter and useless grapes; wine as bad (deadly) as the gall of a serpent; grapes as bitter as gall. [Some of] the fruits which grow about the Dead-sea are rotten within; and full of dust: Cuncta spontè edita aut manu sata sive herbâ tenuis aut flore, seu solitam in speciem in adolevere, atra et inania velut in cinerem vaneſcunt. Tacit. Hist. lib. v. Joseph. de Bello, lib. v. cap. 5. Solin. cap. 44. [They are, probably, of the lycoperdon, or puff-ball species; having apples, or balls, of a beautiful green; but when dry, containing a pungent powder. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DLX.]

Naboth's vineyard is passed into a proverb, to express an inheritance usurped by the hand of oppression from a poor man unable to defend it. See the history, 1 Kings xxi. 1, 2, &c.

To express a time of public tranquillity, of profound peace, it is said that every one lives in quiet under his own vine, and under his own fig-tree. All the reign of Solomon, "Judah and Israel dwelt safely, every man under his vine, and under his fig-tree, from Dan even to Beersheba. 1 Kings iv. 25. Says the prophet Micah, iv. 4. "They shall sit every man under his vine, and under his fig-tree," &c. And under the government of Simon the high-priest, "Then did they till their ground in peace, and the earth gave her increase, and the trees of the field their fruit, &c. Every man sat under his vine, and his fig-tree, and there were none to fray them." 1 Macc. xiv. 8, 12.

VINTAGE. This season was accompanied with feasts and great rejoicings. Isaiah says, xxv. 6. "In this mountain shall the Lord of Hosts make unto all people, a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees, well refined." Literally, a feast of fatness, a feast of lees, of marrowy fatnesses, of clarified lees. And chap. xvi. 10. "Gladness is taken away, and joy out of the plentiful field; and in the vineyards there shall be no singing, neither shall there be shouting; the treaders shall tread out no wine in their presses; I have made their vintage-shouting to cease." Heb. out of Carmel. Carmel signifies an excellent vineyard. Jeremiah says, xlviii. 33. "Joy and gladness is taken from the plentiful field (from the Carmel) and from the land of Moab, (which was fruitful in vines) and I have caused wine to fail from the wine presses, none shall tread with shouting, their shouting shall be no shouting." Hebrew, literally, they shall no longer tread the grape, and he that cries hedad! shall no more cry hedad! hedad! This last term is the cry of the vintagers, whence is formed heth and de heth, [Huzza! Bravo!] with vigour, with courage, cheerfully.

In a figurative sense, a vintager is taken for one who ravages a country, or carries on a bloody war in it. The prophets use this metaphor, to express vengeance taken by the Lord, on his enemies. Thou hast planted thy people as a vine, and now all that pass by plunder the vintage: Psalm lxxx. 12. Jeremiah, Lam. i. 15. makes Jerusalem speak in this manner; Vindemiavit me sicut locutus est Dominus, in die furoris sui. To which is added, deal with them, O Lord, as thou hast dealt with me; tread them in a wine-press as thou hast trod me, because of my iniquities. Isaiah, lxiii. 2. speaking of a conqueror returning from a great expedition, having his clothes stained with blood, describes him thus: "Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah? This that is glorious in his apparel, travelling in the greatness of his strength? I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save. Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel, and thy garments like him that treadeth in the wine fat? I have trodden the wine-press [of fury, wrath, &c.] alone, and of the people there was none with me, &c." See Lam. i. 15. Rev. xiv. 20. xix. 15, &c. See WINE.

VINEGAR, Acetum. Vinegar is made of wine, beer, cyder, or even of water. The wine of the palm-tree turns into vinegar, if it be kept two or three days. The ancients had several kinds of vinegar which they used for drink. The emperor Pescennius Niger gave orders that his soldiers should drink nothing but vinegar on their marches; Neminem in expeditione vinum bibere, sed aceto universos esse contentos. Spartian, in Pescennio. Boaz told Ruth, (ii. 14.) that she might come and dip her bread in the vinegar, with his people. Harvesters used this liquor for their refreshment. Aceto summa vis in refrigerando, says Pliny, lib. xxiii. cap. 1. There is great probability that the vinegar which the Roman soldiers offered to our Saviour at his crucifixion, Matt. xxvii. 48. was the vinegar they used for their own drinking. Constantine allowed them wine and vinegar alternately, every day.

This vinegar was not like that which we use for salads and sauces, but a small wine, called pescà or sera; of which the authors de re Rustica, have given us the composition. Columel. lib. i. de re Rust. et lib. xii. cap. 40. Cato, Pliny, &c. It is much used in Spain and Italy, in harvest time; also in Holland, and on ship-board, board, to correct the ill taste of water. Scripture forbids the Nazarites to use vinegar, Numb. vi. 3. כַּיִן וְשָׂכָר יִירָחֲמֵץ יִין, and all sorts of liquor drawn from the vine, which are capable of inebriating. The Hebrew has vinegar made of wine, and vinegar made of secar, or the wine of the palm-tree. Pliny, lib. xiv. cap. 16. speaks of several sorts of vinegar which might be drank.

It must be allowed, however, that there was a kind of strong vinegar, which was not proper for drinking; at least till well diluted. The Psalmist complains, that his enemies had given him vinegar to drink: Psalm lxi. 21. And Jesus Christ, to fulfil this prophecy in his own person, would not drink the vinegar that was offered to him. Solomon says, Prov. x. 26. "As vinegar to the teeth, and as smoke to the eyes, so is the sluggard to them that send him." We must distinguish then between that vinegar, or small wine, which was used as a drink, and in which the harvesters dipt their bread; and that vinegar which was of considerable strength, and used in sauces.

VIPER, a sort of serpent, called vipera quasi vivipera, because it brings forth its young alive. The viper is not very long, the largest being generally less than a yard in length; in thickness about an inch. It has a flat head. The male has only two teeth, but the female has several; and the male is commonly blacker than the female. It has been said, that when the viper brings forth, the young ones kill their dam; but this is contradicted by experience. She brings forth her young alive, but they are inclosed in little skins, that open on the third day. The poison of the viper is very dangerous; but its flesh is good in many distempers.

The viper is mentioned in several places of Scripture. Job says, xx. 16. רֹאשׁ פֶּתֶן, "The viper's tongue shall slay him:" the Hebrew peten, they say, is rather the asp, than the viper. Isaiah xxx. 6. speaks of the viper; where the Hebrew has נָחֶשׁ ephee. LXX. Ασπίδες. This is thought to be the true name of the viper. Bochart. de Animal. P. 2. lib. iii. cap. 1. The LXX. and Jerom translate ephee by regulus, or the basilisk. Comp. SERPENTS.

VIRGIN, Virgo; in Greek Πάρθενος, Parthenos; in Hebrew, מַלְּאָה, Almah. [Vide ALMAH, with the addition.] These words properly signify an unmarried woman, who has preserved the purity of her body; but some think, that by abuse, they were used to express a young woman, whether she had kept her virginity, or not; and the more precisely to express virginity, Scripture adds to the words maid or virgin,

"neither had any man known her." Gen. xxiv. 16. Numb. xxxi. 17, 18. Sometimes virgin signifies only a young woman: "Lament like a virgin [young woman] girded with sackcloth for the husband of her youth," Joel i. 8. In Proverbs xxx. 19. Solomon acknowledges the tokens of virginity to be very fallacious: Quartum penitus ignoro - - - viam viri in adolescentia: Heb. in adolescentula.

The Hebrew word almah signifies a person concealed; for young unmarried women lived in retired apartments, where men did not go. And young women, when walking out, were always veiled, and never appeared uncovered. When Amnon, son of David, had conceived a violent passion for Tamar, he could not so much as see her: "For she was a virgin, and Amnon thought it hard for him to do any thing to her." 2 Sam. xiii. 2. When Heliodorus came to Jerusalem, to take away the treasures of the temple, the most recluse virgins came out of their retirements; some appeared in the streets, some at their windows, others upon their walls. 2 Macc. iii. 19.

VIRGIN, often in Scripture, symbolizes a people, a city, a nation. The virgin, the daughter of Babylon, the virgin, the daughter of Sion, of Israel, of Egypt, of Sidon, &c. signifies the province, the land, the people, the city of Babylon, Sion, Israel, Egypt, Sidon, &c.—[Query, how far the proper term for virgin, Almah, is used to denote a city? and whether, after that city has been taken by an enemy?]

THE VIRGIN, by way of eminence, or excellence, is said of the Holy Virgin Mary, the mother of Jesus Christ; a virgin marked out by those words of Isaiah, vii. 14. "A virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel. Matt. i. 23.

The state of virginity was not honourable in the East. When the daughter of Jephthah was to be sacrificed by her father, Judg. x. 37, 38. she previously retired to bewail her virginity on the mountains. Sterility was a reproach in Israel: Isaiah, iv. 1. intending to shew the scarcity of men in Israel, says, that seven women should offer themselves in marriage to one man, and say to him, we shall be no charge to you; we will maintain ourselves in food and clothes; only take us for wives, and deliver us from the reproach of barrenness that we are now under. The same prophet comforts Jerusalem, saying, "Thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth, and shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood any more. Isaiah liv. 4.

VIRTUE. This word is very equivocal. It is used,

1. For

1. For that Virtue which renders us acceptable both to God and man, and which answers to the Greek word arete.

2. For Power, Valour, and agrees with the Greek word dynamis.

3. For a Miracle, or a supernatural power.

4. For celestial powers or virtues. [Angels.]

I. VIRTUE, in the sense of a moral virtue, is rarely found in Scripture. I know no Hebrew word that answers to it in this sense; and even arete, by which the Greeks express moral virtue, is often put to signify force, or strength, in the New Testament. As 1 Pet. ii. 9. "That ye may shew forth the virtues [praises, Eng. Tr.] of him who hath called you."—The Greek word aretas plainly in this place signifies power: [rather, excellencies or wonders:] Also 2 Pet. i. 3. "Who hath called us to glory and virtue." But in the fifth verse, virtus is used for virtue: Ministrate in fide vestra virtutem, in virtute autem scientiam.

II. Nothing is more common in the Old and New Testament, than the word virtue, for power, valour, strength, army. This term answers to the Hebrew words, און on, איל ail, גבורה geburah, חיל chail, כוach coach, and to the Greek words dynamis and arete. So Ruth, iii. 11. "For all the people do know that thou art a virtuous woman." A woman of courage, a stout woman, [a woman of CHARACTER: i.e. of confirmed good manners]. And 2 Chron. ix. 5. Strength and virtue—power—are in your hands. Judith ii. 7. Virtus Assyriorum, the armies of the Assyrians, 1 Macc. i. 4. Congregavit virtutem, he assembled forces.

III. VIRTUE is put for miracles. Matt. vii. 22. Nonne in nomine tuo virtutes multas fecimus? Have we not wrought many wonders in thy name? And xiii. 58. Non fecit ibi virtutes multas; He did not many miracles. [It is used for miraculous power, Mark v. 30. Luke vi. 19. viii. 46. Jesus perceived that virtue was gone out of him!] And Acts xix. 11. Virtutes non quaslibet faciebat Deus per manum Pauli. [Special Miracles, Eng. Tr.]

IV. VIRTUE, VIRTUES, signifies the heavenly host, or powers: Rom. viii. 38. Certus sum quia neque virtutes, neque instantia, neque futura --- neque creatura alia poterit nos separare a charitate Dei. And Peter, 1 Epist. iii. 22. Jesus Christ ascending into heaven, has subjected to his majesty, the angels, powers, and virtues.

VISION, expresses the several ways by which God manifested himself to the patriarchs, the prophets, and ancient saints. He sent them prophetic angels; he appeared to them by night in dreams; he illuminated their minds; he spoke to them by his voice; he sent them ecstasies, transported them beyond themselves, and shewed them things that eye had not seen, nor ear heard, nor the heart of man conceived. The Lord shews himself to Moses, and converses with him at the mouth of the cave. Jesus Christ manifested himself to his apostles, in his transfiguration upon Tabor; and on several occasions, after his resurrection. God appeared to Abraham; he shewed himself to Isaiah and to Ezekiel, in the splendour of his glory. All this, in Scripture-style is expressed by the name of vision.

The Lord appeared to Abraham in a vision, Gen. xv. 1, 5. and said to him, "Fear not, Abraham, I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward." This happened in the night, for "he brought him forth abroad, and said, Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them: and he said unto him, So shall thy seed be." The Lord also appeared to Jacob by night, and told him to go down into Egypt without fear, Gen. xli. 2. When Moses perceived the bush burning, yet not consumed, he said, "I will now turn aside, and see this great sight [vision] why the bush is not consumed." Exod. iii. 3. When Aaron and Miriam murmured against Moses, Numb. xii. 6, 7, 8. the Lord said, "Hear now my words: if there be a prophet among you, I, the Lord will make myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak to him in a dream. My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all mine house: with him will I speak, mouth to mouth, even apparently and not in dark speeches; and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold." The false prophet Balaam, whose heart was perverted by covetousness, says of himself, that he had seen the visions of the Almighty. Numb. xxiv. 14, 16. In the time of the high-priest Eli, 1 Sam. iii. 1. "The word of the Lord was precious in these days, there was no open vision:" there was no acknowledged prophet. [This is a very remarkable passage: it signifies, literally, "the vision did not break forth." Such communications were not vouchsafed to any prophet then existing. It was decorous that the person so honoured, should be a man of confidence, of eminence, &c. &c.]

Visions are used for prophecies written by the prophets. The visions of Obadiah; of Nahum; of Isaiah, son of Amos, &c.

Vision often signifies the bare appearance of an object, or what is seen by the eyes. The Messiah will not judge according to appearance; not according to the sight of his eyes, Isa. xi. 3. Ezekiel describing the throne of God, says that the the wheels upon which it moved, resembled the sea; Ezek. i. 16. And, chap. viii. 2. he says, that the majesty of God appeared to him quasi visio electri. St. John, Rev. iv. 3. says, that he saw about the Lord as it were a rainbow, of the colour of an emerald.

Vision sometimes stands for the vain prophecies of visionary people. The false prophets had only deceitful visions: lying visions; Jerem. xxiii. 16. Those that see visions, or the visionaries, shall be confounded. Mic. iii. 7.

In some passages vision stands for the spectres and phantoms, that sometimes appear and frighten the wicked. Moses seems to hint at dreadful visions of this nature seen by the Egyptians while their country was involved in darkness: Deut. iv. 34. Horribiles visiones juxta omnia quæ fecit Dominus in Ægypto. The book of Wisdom speaks plainly of them, chap. xvii. 9, 10. xviii. 19. Visiones enim quæ illos turbaverunt, hæc præmonebant, ne inscii quare mala patiebantur perirent. Eliphaz in Job, describes his fear, when a spirit spoke to him in the night. "In thoughts from the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men; fear came upon me, and trembling, which made all my bones to shake. Then a spirit passed before my face, the hair of my flesh stood up. It stood still, but I could not discern the form thereof; an image was before mine eyes, there was silence, and I heard a voice." Job iv. 13, &c. also vii. 14. Comp. SILENCE; and DREAMS Add. for the distinction between Visions and Dreams.

VISIT. The term to visit, is taken either, 1. in a good, or, 2. in an evil, sense.

1. God visited Sarah in his mercy, and gave her a son. Gen. xxi. 1. He visited the Israelites in Egypt, and sent Moses to deliver them. Exod. iii. 16. He visited Hannah, the mother of Samuel. 1 Sam. ii. 21. Lastly, he visited and redeemed his people by the coming of the Messiah. Luke i. 48.

2. He visits also in his wrath, and vengeance. He visits the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, to the third and fourth generation. Exod. xx. 5. Comp. FRAGS. No. CCCXL. He threatens to visit the iniquity of the worshippers of the golden calf, in the day of his vengeance, Exod. xxxii. 34. He says he will visit the land of Canaan, whose crimes are full. Lev. xviii. 25. Nothing is more frequent in the language of the prophets, than the verb to visit, in the sense of punishing, chastising, &c.

To visit, is also used to express taking a review of; for example, of an army, or of a flock: Ego requiram oves meas, et visitabo eas, sicut visitat pastor gregem suum. Ezek. xxxiv. 11, 12.

VOL. II. PART XXX. Edit. IV.

Zech. x. 3. "Mine anger was kindled against the shepherds, and I punished the goats: for the Lord of Hosts hath visited his flock, the house of Judah." The author of Ecclesiasticus, xlix. 18. has used the term to visit, in a very extraordinary sense, when he says the bones of the patriarch Joseph have been visited, and prophesied after his death: Ossa ipsius visitata sunt. Joseph had foretold to his brethren, that the Lord would visit them after his death, Gen. l. 42. and he conjured them, that they should not leave his body behind them in Egypt, but carry it with them into the land of Canaan. This was performed by Moses: his bones were visited; they were taken out of his tomb; and they may be said in some sense to have prophesied, by verifying Joseph's prophecy. [rather, of which removal, deliverance, or Exodus, he had prophesied.]

Visitans speciem tuam non peccabis, says Job, v. 25. Some have understood this of the lawful use of marriage; but the Hebrew imports, you shall visit, you shall take a review of, you shall govern your dwelling, without offending. Eliphaz speaks of the conduct of a wise and prudent man.

To visit is also taken for paying visits of civility, friendship or duty; as when Jesse sent his son David to visit his brethren in the army, to know how they did. 1 Sam. xvii. 18. And when David went to visit his son Amnon, who was sick, 2 Sam. xiii. 6. and when Ahaziah, king of Judah, went to pay a visit to Jehoram, king of Israel. 2 Kings ix. 16. Or when Paul and Barnabas went to visit the churches they had planted. Acts xv. 36.

A visit, visitation, as well as the verb to visit, is sometimes taken for a visit of mercy from God, but oftener for a visit of rigor and vengeance: day of visitation, year of visitation, time of visitation, or simply visitation, generally signifies, the time of affliction, and vengeance. [of close INSPECTION.]

VITELLIUS. Lucius Vitellius, the censor, father of the emperor, A. Vitellius, was made governor of Syria, at the expiration of his consulate, A. D. 35, and the emperor Tiberius intrusted him with the management of affairs in the East, which were then very much embarrassed. The same year, or the year following, at farthest, he came to Jerusalem at the feast of the Passover, and was very magnificently entertained there. Joseph. Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 6. As an acknowledgment of this reception, he released the city from a tax on the fruits sold there. He also committed to the care of the Jews the high-priest's habit, with the pontifical ornaments, which Herod and the Romans had kept till then in the Tower Antonia. He deposed Joseph Caiaphas from the high-priesthood, and put in his place Jonathan, son of Ananus; after which he returned to Antioch.

3 A div. 2

When the emperor Tiberius had ordered him to attack the Arabians, he marched to Ptolemais, intending to pass through Judea with his troops, on his way to Petra. But the chief of the Jews waited on him, and intreated him to take another route; because their law did not allow them to suffer strange gods in their country, and images, such as were upon the Roman ensigns. He complied, sent his army another way, and came himself to Jerusalem, accompanied only by a few friends, and Herod the Tetrarch. He there offered sacrifices, and took the priesthood from Jonathan, whom he had made high-priest but two years before, and gave it to Theophilus, the brother of Jonathan. He was again at Jerusalem, when he heard of the death of the emperor Tiberius; he then received the oath of fidelity from the Jews, in the name of the new emperor Caligula, for whom he offered solemn sacrifices. Philo, Legat. p. 1041.

In the foregoing year, A. D. 36. he had sent Pilate, the governor of Judea, to Rome, to justify himself to the emperor, for his violence against the Samaritans. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 7. This is the sum of what we know concerning this L. Vitellius, governor of Syria, who acquired as much esteem in his province, for good government, as he deserved contempt at Rome, for servile flattery to Caius and Claudius. Tacit. Annal. lib. vi. cap. 33.

ULAI, יְלַי, Ὀυλαί, by the ancient Greek geographers named ἐλαῖος, strength, from יָלַל ul: otherwise, fool, senseless; from יָלַל ovil. The Hebrew is יְלַל-יְלַל ubal-ulai; but Ubal signifies a river, and Ulai is the name of that river. [According to Reland, Diss. Miscell. P. i. p. 47. it is composed of Arabic words signifying the clayey stream. It is probable this name should be sought for in the Persian language.]

ULAI, the river Euleus runs by the city Shushan in Persia. Daniel had a famous vision on the river Ulai, and at the gate of this river; i. e. the gate of this city towards the Ulai. Dan. viii. 2, 16.

ULAM, יְלַמ, the porch, the court; from יְלַמ ulam; otherwise, their strength, or their folly; from יָלַל ul, strength, or from יָלַל avil, senseless, and the pronoun אֲמ, theirs.

I: ULAM, son of Machir, and Maachah, and father of Bedan, of Benjamin. 1 Chron. vii. 16.

II. ULAM, son of Eshek, of Benjamin. 1 Chron. viii. 39.

III. ULAM. Eusebius says, in Ὀυλαί, that there is a village called Ulamna, twelve miles from Diocæsarea, east.

ULAM-AIS. The LXX. say that the ancient name of the city of Dan was Ulamais; but in the Hebrew it is Ulam-laish, which is to be translated heretofore Laish. The true ancient name of Dan was certainly Laish. Judges xviii. 29.

ULAM-US, or ULAM-LUZ: the LXX. have taken this for the ancient name of Bethel; but the Hebrew says, Ulam-Luz, Gen. xxviii. 19. i. e. heretofore Luz. Vide Jerom, in Bethel.

ULATHA, a city between Galilee and Trachonitis. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 13.

ULLA, עֲלָא, elevation, or holocaust, or leaf; from עָלָה halah: otherwise, young child; from חָלָה halal. [uniting, or yoke: as a child unites or yokes his parents more closely together. Comp. LEVI.]

ULLA, or OLLA, of Asher. He had three sons, Arab, Hamel, and Rezia. 1 Chron. vii. 39.

UMMAH, חֲמָה, hidden, covered [a covering, or shelter.] from חָמָה hamam: otherwise, his people; from חָמָה ham, a people, and the pronoun הָ he, his: otherwise, with her; from the preposition עִם om, with, and the pronoun הָ he, her. [perhaps a joining or union of inhabitants.] A city of Asher. Josh. xix. 30.

UNCTION. Unctions were very frequent among the Hebrews. They anointed and perfumed, from principles both of health and neatness. They anointed the hair, head, and beard. Psalm cxxxiii. 2. At their feasts, and rejoicings, they anointed the whole body; but sometimes only the head or the feet. John xii. 3. Luke vii. 37. Matt. vi. 17. The anointing of dead bodies was also practised, to preserve them from corruption. Mark xiv. 8. xvi. 1. Luke xxiii. 56. They anointed kings and high-priests at their inauguration. Exod. xxix. 29. Lev. iv. 3. Judg. ix. 8. 1 Sam. ix. 16. 1 Kings xix. 15, 16. They also anointed the sacred vessels of the tabernacle and temple, to consecrate them. Exod. xxx. 26, &c.

Unction, in general, signifies a particular sanctification; a designation to the service of God, to a holy and sacred use. For example, as Jacob went to Mesopotamia, he anointed with oil the stone upon which he had slept, and whereon God had favoured him with a vision. Gen. xxiii. 18. This unction was a kind of dedication of this stone, as an altar to the Lord. Some years afterwards he came to the same place, and consecrated this stone a-new, by a holy unction. Gen. xxxvi. 14. God appoints to Moses the manner of making the oil, or the perfumed ointment.

ment, which the priests and the vessels of the tabernacle were to be anointed with. It was composed of the most exquisite perfumes and balsams. He adds, "This shall be an holy anointing oil unto me, throughout your generations; upon man's flesh shall it not be poured; neither shall ye make any other like it, after the composition of it; it is holy, and it shall be holy unto you. Whosoever compoundeth any like it, or whosoever putteth any of it upon a stranger, shall even be cut off from his people." Exod. xxx. 23, &c. Ezekiel upbraids his people with having made a like perfume for their own use. chap. xxiii. 41. Thymiana meum et unguentum meum posuisti super eam [mensam tuam.]

The unction given to sacred persons, and to sacred ornaments, and utensils of the temple or the tabernacle, to the altars, and basins, removed them from ordinary and common use; separated them to an appropriate dignity, rendered them holy, sacred, and reverend. The unction received by Aaron and his sons, devolved on his whole race, which thereby became devoted to the service of the Lord, and consecrated to his worship. Vide Lev. viii. Exod. xxix. 7. Psalm cxxxiii. 2. The Rabbins think the holy oil was poured on the head of Aaron in the form of a X, or St. Andrew's cross; according to others, in the form of a caph, or 2. Many are of opinion, that of the ordinary priests, the sons of Aaron, the hands only were anointed. The Levites did not receive any unction.

These ceremonies were continued seven days. The Rabbins inform us, that while the ointment or perfume lasted, that was composed by Moses, they thus anointed all the high-priests that succeeded, for seven days. But when this perfume was exhausted, they contented themselves with installing the high-priest for seven days, in his sacred habit. Selden, de Succession. in Pontif. lib. ii. cap. 9. Cuncæus, de Rep. Heb. The former, therefore, were called high-priests anointed, Lev. iv. 3. v. 16. the latter were said to be initiated in their habits. They say, there was never made any new oil, after that of Moses was spent; which they think lasted to the captivity of Babylon. But the Christian fathers believe, that the unction of the high-priests, continued to the coming of the true anointed, the Messiah, Jesus Christ. Besides, Moses no where forbids to renew, or compose again, this ointment. It even appears that he intended it should be repeated as occasion required, by setting down its composition so punctually.

The unction of kings is not commanded by Moses; but we plainly see it practised in sacred history. Samuel gave unction to Saul, 1 Sam.

x. 1. "Samuel took a vial of oil, and poured it upon his head, and kissed him, and said, is it not because the Lord hath anointed thee to be captain over his inheritance?" This anointing was renewed some time after at Gilgal, [1 Sam. xi. 15. Vulg. et Heb. Fecerunt ibi Regem Saul. LXX. et Joseph. Unxit ibi Samuel Saulem in Regem. Καὶ ἔχρισε Σαμὴλ ἐκεῖ τὸν Σαὺλ εἰς βασιλεία, &c.] when Saul had delivered Jabesh-Gilead from the violence of Nahash, king of the Ammonites. Samuel received orders from the Lord, to give the royal unction to young David: "Samuel took the horn of oil, and anointed him in the midst of his brethren," 1 Sam. xvi. 13. As his title to the crown was much disputed by the house of Saul, the unction was given him three times, reckoning this the first. He was afterwards consecrated at Hebron, by the tribe of Judah, after the death of Saul; 2 Sam. ii. 4. and lastly, at Hebron, by all Israel, after the death of Abner. 2 Sam. v. When Absalom rebelled against his father, he also caused himself to be anointed with the holy oil: Solomon also was anointed by the high-priest Zadok, and the prophet Nathan. 2 Sam. xix. 10. 1 Kings i. 39.

We do not find that the kings of Israel generally practised this ceremony. The prophet Elijah received an order from the Lord to give the royal unction to Hazael, importing his ruling over Syria; and to Jehu, son of Nimshi, for his reigning over Israel, 1 Kings, xix. 15, 16. Elijah did not execute this commission himself; but, his disciple Elisha performed it on the person of Jehu. He is the only king of Israel whose unction is expressly mentioned in Scripture. But among the kings of Judah, we find many instances, even down to the fall of this kingdom; especially when any difficulty occurred about the succession to the crown; as under Joash and under Jehoahaz, sons of Josiah, who was not the eldest son of this prince, 2 Kings xi. 12. After the return from the captivity, unction was no longer practised, on the kings; nor even on the priests, if the Jews may be believed.

Lastly, it is said in Scripture, (or it is implied) that the prophets were anointed: but we have no particulars of the manner. It is even doubted, whether they did receive any real unction. Elijah is sent to anoint Elisha; 1 Kings, xix. 16. "Elisha, the son of Shaphat of Abelmeholah, shalt thou anoint to be prophet in thy room:" but as to the execution of this command, Elijah does nothing to Elisha but throw his cloak over his shoulders. It is therefore very probable that the word unction, in this place, only imports a particular appointment, designation, or call, to the office of prophet.

The unction of Christ the Messiah, the anointed of the Lord, by excellence, was represented by all these now mentioned. It was foretold in Psalm xlv. 7. "Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest iniquity; therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness, above thy fellows." And in Isaiah lxi. 1. "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me," &c. And Dan. ix. 24. "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people, and upon thy holy city . . . to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the Most Holy."

In the Christian dispensation we acknowledge the spiritual unction of Jesus Christ, the true anointed of the Father, Luke vi. 18. Acts iv. 27. x. 38. who hath anointed us by his grace, hath sealed us with his seal, and hath given us the pledge of the Holy Spirit, which dwells in our hearts. 2 Cor. i. 21.

[Our Lord was also anointed, personally; at least, some parts of his person, by repenting converts: but not, that we read of, by way of dignity, or to public honour. [Vide MESSIAH] But, especially at his baptism, when the Shekinah settled on him. Some ancient sects thought, that at this time the Christ, i. e. the anointing, was peculiarly communicated to him. Was not the spitting in his face by the soldiers a mock unction; as the crown of thorns, and the purple robe, were mock ensigns of royalty?]

St. Mark, vi. 13. informs us, that when the apostles were sent by Jesus Christ, to preach throughout Judea, they worked many miracles, they anointed the sick, and healed them in the name of the Lord. St. James gives directions that the sick among the faithful should send for the priests of the church, who shall pray for him and give him unction with oil, in the name of the Lord. He says, that prayer, accompanied with faith, shall heal the sick; that the Lord will comfort him, and if he have sinned, it shall be remitted to him. On this it is that the church [of Rome, Concil. Trident. Sess. xiv. cap. 1, 2, 3, 4, de Sacram. Extremæ Uctionis.] founds her extreme unction, acknowledges it as an institution of Jesus Christ, and receives it as one of her seven sacraments, to which the sanctifying grace is promised. [Forgetting that St. James directs this unction for the purpose of restoring the sick to health, i. e. for life: whereas the church of Rome employs it for the purpose of dismissing the expiring soul: i. e. for death. The custom of unction is common in the East, it is used civilly, as a part of personal elegance and dress; medically, as being beneficial in certain disorders, and even, say some, preventing the plague: and to this use of it St. James evidently alludes. It is used also officially, as appears in the foregoing parts of this article.]

UNICORN, in Greek, Monoceros; in Latin, Unicornis; Hebrew, Reem, Numb. xxiii. 22. Deut. xxxiii. 17. Job xxxix. 9. Psalm xxix. 6. Isaiah xxxiv. 7. Profane authors have given such odd and extraordinary descriptions of this animal that they have brought it into question, whether there ever were true unicorns. Travellers are but little agreed in their descriptions of the unicorn. Marmol says, it is like a foal of two years old, except that it has a beard like a goat; and in the middle of its forehead a horn three feet long, smooth, white, and streaked with yellow. Jerome Lobo says, that in Ethiopia there is an animal called Arvocharis, which is extremely swift, has but one horn, and much resembles a roebuck. John Gabriel, a Portuguse, tells us, that in the kingdom of Damor he saw a unicorn, which had a beautiful white horn on his forehead, of the length of a foot and a half: the hair of his neck and of his tail was black and short. Vincent le Blanc relates, that he saw a unicorn in the palace of the king of Pegu. Its tongue was very long and rugged. Its head was rather like that of a stag than that of a horse. Louis de Bartheleme says, that at the Soldan's of Mecca, in Arabia, he saw two unicorns, which had been sent him as presents by a king of Ethiopia. They were as large as a colt thirty months old, of a dark colour, and had heads much like that of a deer, a horn of three fathoms [!! feet?] long, short manes, small legs, the feet cloven, and hoofs like a goat [q. ANTELOPES?] There are sea-unicorns, which should be called fishes, Narwhal: these furnish the unicorns' horns in the cabinets of the curious.

It follows plainly, either that the generality of such accounts of unicorns must be false; or that travellers have confounded several species of animals into one. We know that there are several kinds of animals in Ethiopia and the Indies, which have a single horn, some upon the nose, others upon the forehead, others upon the head. Dalechamp, in Plin. lib. viii. xxi. lib. xi. cap. 46. has observed as far as seven species of this sort. Cosmas Monach. the Egyptian, tom. ii. Collect. SS. PP. p. 338. has given us the description of a Rhinoceros, an animal well known in Ethiopia. M. Chardin, Travels in Persia, tom. iii. p. 45. saw a rhinoceros in Persia, which had a horn on his nose, nearly of the bigness and shape of a small sugar-loaf. The colour of this horn was a dark grey, as also the skin of the animal. The snout of the rhinoceros is round, turned downward. He has but four teeth, two above, and two below. His eyes eyes are set very low, almost over against his lips. His tail is small, and made up of nine or ten joints. His whole hide, except his back and head, is covered with little knobs or protuberances. His feet are short and thick, having three toes, or stubbed hoofs before, and a callus behind.

Interpreters are not agreed that the Hebrew Rheem was either a unicorn, i. e. a rhinoceros or a monoceros. Some think it denotes the Urus, a kind of wild ox: others understand it of a deer, or the roe-buck; or the oryx, which is an Arabian kind of roe-buck, very large, of a white colour, and has very large horns. Aristotle says, the oryx has but one horn; but the Arabians, who call it Rim, say it has two horns. The Rheem was very wild; for God asks Job, xxxix. 9, 10. if he could tame the Rheem? if this creature would eat in his stables, like a domestic animal? and if he could put a yoke upon it? Moses, magnifying the strength of Joseph, Deut. xxxiii. 17. says, "his horns are like the horns of unicorns," or of the Rheem; and the Psalmist desires of God, Psalm xxii. 21. to preserve him from the mouth of the lion, and from the horn of the Rheem. Bochart, de Animal Sacr. P. 1. lib. iii. cap. 27.

The rhinoceros is much less than the elephant, but of extraordinary strength. [We have had several shewn as sights in London: but none so large as to give a just idea of the animal. The largest, and finest in Europe, was in the menagerie at Versailles; it was very tame; but to prevent accidents, its horn was cut off when I saw it, which deprived the animal of much of its natural characteristic appearance. It is now well known from the accounts of our travellers into Abyssinia, &c. It inhabits also India. Comp. RHINOCEROS; also FRAGMENTS, No. CXV. also in the NATURAL HISTORY, with the PLATES.]

UNNI, נני. Poor, or afflicted: or that answers: from עני. A musician, 1 Chron. xv. 18.

VOCATION. This term has been appropriated chiefly to denote the grace of our calling to the Christian faith and religion; a vocation, entirely gratuitous on the part of God, "who hath called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace given us in Jesus Christ." 2 Tim. i. 9. The chain and connection of graces that God vouchsafes to us, to effect our salvation, is expressed, Rom. viii. 30. "Whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified." It is our part, by the help of God, to make our calling sure, by faith and piety. 2 Pet. i. 10. and to live in a manner suitable to that state to which we are called; 2 Thess. i. 11. for our Saviour tells us, that many are called, but few are chosen. Matt. xxii. 14. See CALL.

VOICE. The daughter of the voice, in Hebrew, Bath-col, was one way in which God was supposed to discover his will, after prophecy had ceased: but its use was casual and fortuitous: consequently not authentic.

By the word voice is understood, not only the voice of a man, or a beast, but all other sorts of sounds, noises, or cries. Thunder is often described as the Voice of God. Moses says, Exod. xx. 18. that all the people saw, or heard, the voice which was uttered from Sinai: i. e. the noise of the thunder.

Samuel says to Israel, 1 Sam. xii. 17. "Is it not wheat-harvest to-day? I will call unto the Lord, and he will send thunder [Heb. a voice,] and rain." Job says, xxxvii. 2, 3, &c. "Hear attentively the noise of his voice, and the sound that goeth out of his mouth. He directeth it under the whole heaven, and his lightning unto the ends of the earth. After it a voice roareth, he thundereth with the voice of his excellency, and he will not stay them when his voice is heard. God thundereth marvellously with his voice; great things doeth he, which we cannot comprehend." And the Psalmist xxix. 3. The voice of the Lord thundereth, &c. see the passage.

To hear the voice of any one, is to obey him. Psalm lxxxi. 13. "O that my people had hearkened unto me, and Israel had walked in my ways!" Exod. xv. 26. "If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God, and wilt do that which is right in his sight, and wilt give ear to his commandments, and keep all his statutes—I will put none of these diseases upon thee, which I have brought upon the Egyptians." But, on the contrary; "If thou wilt not hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe to do all his commandments, and his statutes, which I command thee this day, then all these curses shall come upon thee, and overtake thee." Deut. xxviii. 15.

The mother of the seven brethren Maccabees spoke to them patria voce, i. e. in Hebrew or Syriac; for they were examined in Greek, 2 Macc. vii. 8, 21, &c.

St. Paul says, 1 Cor. xiv. 7, 8, 10. that there is nothing in the world but has its voice: instruments of music, the trumpet, the harp, &c.

The voice of the blood of Abel cried to the Lord from the earth, Gen. iv. 10. Judas Maccabeus intreated the Lord to have compassion on the holy city, and to hear the voice of the blood blood that cried to him for vengeance, 1 Macc. viii. 3. Comp. Heb. xii. 24.

VOW, Votum; a promise made to God, of doing some good thing hereafter. The use of vows is observable throughout Scripture. Jacob, going into Mesopotamia, vowed to God the tenth of his estate, and promised to offer it, at Bethel, to the honour of God. Gen. xxviii. 22. Moses enacts several laws for the regulation and execution of vows. A man might devote himself, or his children to the Lord. Jephthah devoted his daughter; and some think he offered her in sacrifice, Judg. xi. 30, 31. Samuel was vowed and consecrated to the service of the Lord, and was really offered to him, to serve in the tabernacle. 1 Sam. i. 21, 22, &c. If a man or woman vowed themselves to the Lord, they were obliged to adhere strictly to his service, according to the conditions of the vow; but in some cases might be redeemed. A man from twenty years of age till sixty, gave fifty shekels of silver; and a woman gave thirty. From the age of five years to twenty, a man gave twenty shekels, and a woman ten: from a month old to five years, they gave for a boy five shekels, and for a girl three. A man of sixty years old, or upwards, gave fifteen shekels, and a woman of the same age gave ten. If the person were poor, and could not procure this sum, the priest imposed a ransom on him, according to his abilities, Lev. xxvii. 3.

If any one vowed an animal that was clean, he had not the liberty of redeeming it, or of exchanging it, but must sacrifice it to the Lord. If it were an unclean animal, such as was not lawful in sacrifice, the priest made a valuation of it, and the proprietor, if he desired to redeem it, added a fifth part to the value, by way of fine. They did the same, in proportion, when the thing vowed was a house or a field. They could not devote the first-born, because in their own nature they belonged to the Lord. Whatever was devoted by anathema, could not be redeemed, of whatever nature, or quality, it was; if an animal, it was put to death; and other things were devoted for ever to the Lord, Lev. xxvii. 28, 29. The consecration of Nazarites was a particular kind of vow; and had special rules. Vide NAZARITES.

The vows and promises of children were void, of course, except ratified by the express, or tacit consent of their parents, Numb. xxx. 1, 2, 3, &c.—Also the vow of a married woman, was of no validity; except confirmed by the express, or tacit, consent of her husband. But widows, or liberated wives, were bound by their vows, of whatever nature. Deut. xxiii. 21, 22. “When thou shalt vow a vow unto the Lord thy God, thou shalt not slack to pay it; for the Lord thy God will surely require it of thee, and it would be sin in thee. But if thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin in thee.” See Eccl. v. 3, 4, &c.

Under the New Testament also we see vows. St. Paul had a vow of Nazariteship, when he left Cenchrea to go to Jerusalem, Acts xviii. 18. When arrived at Jerusalem, St. James, the apostle, and the brethren advised him to join four Judaizing Christians, who had a vow of Nazariteship, and to contribute to the charges of their purification in the temple. Acts xxi. 18, 19, &c. We have seen in all ages, a great number of Christian men and women, who have bound themselves by promises, either public, or particular, to the observation of evangelical precepts.

The vows of the Jews always included, or at least implied, a kind of imprecation against themselves, if they failed in the performance. Such vows were generally expressed in a distinct and plain manner, but the penalty was declared in a conditional or hypothetical manner. For example, Psalm xcv. 11. “I have sworn in my wrath, if they shall enter into my rest.” I have sworn they shall not enter, and I have said, —Let me be a liar,—or something else, not expressed,—if they do enter. And David vows to the Lord, to build him a temple, saying, “Surely I will not come [or if I come,] into the tabernacle of my house—until I find out a place for the Lord, an habitation for the mighty God of Jacob.” Where we observe, that he does not mention the penalty to which he becomes liable, should he fail of performing his vow: as if he had said, “Let God treat me with the utmost rigour, if I allow myself the least respite, till I have accomplished my design.”

Sometimes they expressed the penalty, or imprecation; but directed it against their enemies; or against brute beasts. For example, “So, and more also, do God, unto the enemies of David, if I leave any that pertain to him by the morning light, any that pierce against the wall.” He does not say, “may God treat me as a forsworn person, if I leave any one alive of the family of Nabal;” but,—may God do so to the enemies of David, if I leave so much as a dog alive. Generally, the Scripture expresses the imprecation by, God do so to me—and more also, &c. without specifying any particular penalty, or imprecation; whether it be that the person vowing did not express any, or that out of discretion he forbore to mention any, [or, that the penalty was so publicly known, being customary, that it was understood without being expressed.] See DEVOTING. and IMPRECATION.

At the time of our Saviour the Pharisees had strangely altered the law of vows, and oaths, by their subtilities. See CORBAN.

Leo of Modena writes concerning the practice of the modern Jews in relation to vows, P. 2. cap. 4.—"Vows are not much approved of among them; but when they are made, they ought to be performed. Yet a husband may acquit his wife, even though against her inclinations, of any vow about abstinence, to which she may have engaged herself: but this must be done within the first four and twenty hours that he has knowledge of it. A father also may annul the vow of his daughter, if she is unmarried, as is said, Numb. xxx. 4.

"They hold also, by a tradition, that a man or woman who makes an oath, or a vow, provided it be no prejudice to any third person, and that they have good reason to revoke it,—they maintain, I say, that such may be dispensed with for not performing it, by a Rabbi of authority, or by three other men, though of no distinction. He, therefore, that would be delivered from the obligation of his vow, represents his reasons to a Rabbi, or to three private persons, who, if they find them sufficient, may say three times, "be thou discharged from thy vow." And by this means he obtains his liberty.

UPHARSIN. See MENE, or TEKEL.

UPHAZ, יפאז, Μοφὰς, gold of Phasis, or Pison: the finest gold; from יפאז paz. [q. Ai paz, the golden island, or district?—as we say, the "Gold Coast," of Africa, W]

UPHAZ, or OPHAZ, or PHAZ. Cant. v. 11. Dan. x. 5. Jer. x. 9. The gold of Uphaz and of Ophir is the same. Probably this gold was brought from Phasis in Colchis, and sold, or exchanged, in some city in the country of Ophir. See OPHIR.

UR, אור, Oup, fire, light; from אור, ur, or or; otherwise, a valley.

UR, a city of Chaldea, the country of Terah, and of Abraham. Gen. xi. 28. God ordered Abraham to leave Ur, that he might bring him into the land of Canaan. As he was proceeding thither, with Terah his father, and Lot his nephew, at Haran, a city of Mesopotamia, Terah fell sick, and died. After paying the last duties to him, Abraham continued his journey. A. M. 2082, ante A. D. 1922.

The City of Ur was in Chaldea, as Scripture notices in more places than one; but its true situation is unknown. Some think it was Camarina, in Babylonia: others Orcha, or Orchoe, in Chaldea, according to Ptolemy and Strabo: others, Ura, or Sura, in Syria, on the Euphrates. Bochart and Grotius maintain that it is Ura in Mesopotamia, two days' journey from Nisibis. Ammian, lib. xxv. cap. 26. It is observed, that Chaldea and Mesopotamia are often confounded, and it is said indifferently, that this city is in one or the other of those provinces.

As the word Ur, in Hebrew signifies fire, some have pretended, that when Moses says, God brought Abraham out of Ur of the Chaldees, he alluded to a fire into which the Chaldees had cast him. See ABRAHAM and TERAH. Jerom followed this opinion, when he translated Neh. ix. 7. "Thou broughtest Abraham out of the fire of the Chaldees," instead of, out of Ur of the Chaldees. But in his Hebraical Questions, he considers as a mere fable what the Jews relate of Abraham's pretended deliverance from the fire of the Chaldees. See FRAGMENTS, No. DXXXV.

It is thought the name Ur, אור, fire, was given to this city, because fire was the deity worshipped therein. Fire was the symbol of the sun; which luminary was adored throughout the East. They kept a sacred and perpetual fire, to his honour, in certain temples or enclosures, which were shut up on every side, but were not covered at the top. See CHAMANIM, PERSIANS, and Plate PLACE OF FIRE. For the mode of passing through, or over, fire, vide FRAGMENTS, No. LI. CXLIX. and for the general prevalence of the worship of fire, in Palestine, after the time of Abraham, vide the FRAGMENTS, No. CCLXXI. "On the name ASH."

Rufinus relates, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. 26. (See also Suidas, Article, Canopus,) that the Chaldeans heretofore carried their deity, fire, through all the provinces where they came, to combat the other gods worshipped therein; that which ever should obtain the superiority in this conflict, might be esteemed the chief god. The gods of brass, gold, silver, wood, and stone, were easily overcome by the fire, which every where obtained the victory. A priest of Canopus [of the Nile] in Egypt bethought himself of this stratagem. The Egyptians have certain earthen vessels with little holes on all sides, intended to filtrate the water of the Nile: he filled one of these vessels with water, and stopped up the holes with wax. He fastened a head to it, said to be the head of Menelas, and set it up as a god. The Chaldeans, to put the power of this god to the test, lighted a fire about it, that these two deities might contend with each other. But no sooner had the fire melted the wax that stopped up the holes of the pitcher, than the water gushing out, quenched the fire; by which ingenious device, the crafty priest, of Canopus completely triumphed.

URBANE, mentioned by St. Paul, Rom. xvi. 9. "Salute Urbane, our helper in Christ." The Greeks place him among the seventy disciples; and say, he was ordained bishop of Macedonia by St. Andrew; they keep his feast October 31. The Latins, October 30. We know nothing particular of him.

URL, אורל, Oupel, from ur, fire, light. Father of Bezaleel, of Judah, Exod. xxxi. 2.

URIAH, or URIJAH, אוריה, the Lord is my light, or fire; or the light of the Lord; from אור ur, or or, fire, and יה jah, the Lord.

URIAH, celebrated for his misfortune; a Hittite originally, and husband to Bathsheba. After Bathsheba had committed adultery with king David, she found herself with child by him, and gave him notice of it, that he might provide for her reputation. 2 Sam. xi. 5, 6. The king wrote to Joab, to send him Uriah the Hittite, then with his army; when he was come, David asked him news concerning military events, and bid him go home; Uriah quitted the royal presence, but did not go home, chusing rather to pass the night with the officers of the king's guard. David hearing of this asked him, why did you not go home to refresh yourself after your journey? Uriah answered, while the ark of the Lord, while Israel and Judah are under tents, and while my lord Joab and his servants are lying upon the ground, should I go to my house, to eat and drink, and sleep with my wife? David invited him this day to eat at his table, making him drink plentifully, yet he went as before, to sleep with the officers of the guard.

The day following David sent him back to the camp, with a letter to Joab, directing him, "Place Uriah in the front of the battle, and contrive to abandon him, that he may die by the hand of the enemy." Joab punctually executed these orders; Uriah was exposed to the besieged, and killed. When Bathsheba knew of the death of Uriah, she mourned for him; after which David took her to his own house. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXIV.

The Rabbins justify David and Bathsheba, saying, it was a law in Israel, that when a man went to the wars, he left a bill of divorce with his wife, that she might freely marry whom she pleased in his absence: that Bathsheba took advantage of this liberty, and married David.—But why should they excuse a crime, which Scripture condemns in many places, and which David himself confessed, and bewailed with bitter tears? This happened A. M. 2969, ante A. D. 1035.

I. URIJAH, chief priest of the Jews under Ahaz, king of Judah. Ahaz going to Damascus, to meet Tiglath-Pilneser, king of Assyria, saw there an altar, the form of which pleased him so much, that he sent a model of it to the high-priest Urijah, with orders to set up such an one in the temple at Jerusalem: this Urijah too well performed. 2 Kings xvi. 10, 11, 12. Ahaz also ordered this high-priest to remove the brazen altar from before the Lord; and on this new altar to offer the morning and evening sacrifices, &c. reserving to himself to dispose of the great brazen altar, at his pleasure: Urijah obeyed the orders of this wicked king in every thing. A. M. 3264, ante A. D. 740. Urijah succeeded Zadok II. and was succeeded by Shallum.

II. URIJAH, a prophet of the Lord, son of Shemaiah of Kirjath-jearim. Jer. xxvi. 20, 21. He prophesied at the same time as Jeremiah, and declared the same things against Jerusalem and Judah. Jehoiakim, king of Judah, and his great men, resolved to secure him, and put him to death; but Urijah escaped into Egypt. Jehoiakim sent messengers after him, who brought him out of Egypt: he then put him to death by the sword, and ordered him to be buried dishonourably in the graves of the meanest of the people. A. URIEL, אוריהל, God is my light, or fire, the light of God; from אור or, or ur, fire, light, and אל el, God.

I. URIEL. This name is given to an angel, which the Jews, and some Christians, take for an angel of light. In an apocryphal Jewish book, called The Prayer of Joseph, the patriarch Jacob is introduced in conversation with the angels Uriel and Raphael. The second book of Esdras speaks of Uriel as of a good angel. 2 Esd. iv. 36. Uriel Archangelus; also 2 Esd. v. 20. sicut mandavit Uriel Angelus; as does St. Ambrose, de Fide, lib. iii. cap. 3: Non moritur Gabriel, non moritur Raphael, non moritur Uriel. The Oriental liturgies, and the prayer-books of the Greeks, often mention the angel Uriel, or Suriel, as a good angel: Honoremus Surielem quartum inter Angelos, says the Coptic prayer-book; and in the Ethiopic edition of the New Testament is the picture of the angel Uriel, with this inscription, St. Uriel, who was with Adam and Eve when they went out of Paradise. He is also found in several ancient litanies; among others in those published by F. Mabillon. (Analecta, tom. ii.) which he names Carolinian, as being of the time of Charlemagne. Surius relates, that A. D. 1544, was discovered at Rome, in the tomb of the empress Mary

Mary, wife of the emperor Honorius, a plate of gold, on which were written, in Greek characters, the names of Michael, Gabriel, Raphael, and Uriel. [The name is very common on the tokens of the Basilidians, in Egypt; usually placed among the Abrazas: with many other names of spirits.]

M. Tiers, in his epistle dedicatory to F. Luke Dachery, before his treatise De retinenda voce Paraclitus, (Lyons, 1669,) maintains that Uriel is the name of an evil angel. He acknowledges that his name is invoked in the ritual of Chartres; but he says, he never recites the litanies in which his name is found, without being shocked at it. He shews that the councils and fathers never speak of more than three good angels, Gabriel, Raphael, and Michael; and that the second Roman council, A. D. 745, Art. 3. condemns a prayer that one Adalbert used, wherein he invoked the holy angels, Uriel, Raguel, Tubuel, Michael, Inias, &c. The fathers of this council maintain, tom. 6. Concil. Labb. p. 1561. that all the names now mentioned, excepting that of Michael, are not names of angels, but rather of dæmons; Non enim nomina Angelorum, præter nomen Michaelis, sed nomina Dæmonum sunt; and that the church acknowledges only Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael. However, it is proper to observe, that the intention of this council was to reject all new, and unusual, names of angels; which this man endeavoured to introduce into the church. But Uriel was no modern name; it had been long admitted, even among the Latins, as may be seen, lib. iv. cap. 33. n. 20. of William Durand, bishop of Mendes, who died 1296.

Some apocryphal books assure us, that from the beginning of the world, to the hundred and sixtieth year of Enoch, they did not reckon by years, but by weeks; and that it was the archangel Uriel which revealed to Enoch what were months, years, and the revolutions of the seasons, or of the heavenly bodies. Vide Salmas. lib. de Annis Climactericis.

II. URIEL, son of Tabash, and father of Uziah, a Levite, of the family of Kohath. 1 Chron. vi. 24. xv. 5, 11.

III. URIEL, of Gibeah; father of Michaiah, wife of king of Rehoboam, and mother of king Abijah. 2 Chron. xiii. 2.

URIM and THUMMIM: אֲרִימִים וְתֻמִּימִים, Exod. xxviii. 30. The literal signification of these two words is, according to the Hebrew, Lights and Perfections; or, The shining and the perfect. According to Jerom, Doctrine and Judgment: according to the LXX. Δήλωσις καὶ Ἀλήθειαν, Declaration (or manifestation) and Truth. Some think Urim and Thummin are only epithets, or explanations, of the stones on the breast-plate of the high-priest: as if it were said, "Thou shalt put therein stones that are shining and perfect." Others believe that these two words are rather Egyptian than Hebrew; and that the LXX. have given their true signification. Ecclesiasticus hints, chap. xlv. 12. (Vulgate) as if manifestation and truth were the qualities of the high-priest, who was clothed with the ephod: virī sapientis iudicio et veritate præditi. The same appears still more plainly, in Ezra, ii. 63. (Vulgate) Donec surgeret sacerdos doctus atque perfectus; where the Hebrew and our English translation, read, Till there stood up a priest with Urim and with Thummin.

But Josephus, Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 8. and after him several others, as well ancient as modern authors, maintain that the Urim and Thummin were the precious stones of the high-priest's breast-plate, which discovered the will of God by their extraordinary lustre, thereby predicting the issue of events to those who consulted them. For, when these stones gave no extraordinary lustre, it was concluded that God did not approve of the matter in question. Josephus adds that it was two hundred years, at the time of his writing, since these stones had left off shewing that lustre: so that this oracle had ceased about one hundred and ten years before Christ.

Others believe that the Urim and Thummin was something belonging to the breast-plate, but they are not agreed what it was; neither Moses, nor any other sacred writer, has distinctly expressed what it might be. Epiphanius, tract. de 12 gemmis. and Suidas, in Ἐφὸδ, think, that beside the twelve stones of the breast-plate, there was a diamond of extraordinary beauty; which by the liveliness of its lustre indicated to the high-priest whether the enterprize in hand were pleasing to God, or no. Procopius, Arias Montanus, and some others, place two stones therein, beside the twelve mentioned by Moses. But St. Austin, qu. 117. in Exod. does not approve of these additional stones; nor of that pretended miraculous splendour of these stones; since Scripture says nothing about it.

St. Cyril, Exposit. in Symboli. seems to say, that manifestation and truth were written on two precious stones, or on a plate of gold; which is an opinion pretty much followed, both by ancients and moderns. Others held, that the words Urim and Thummin were written in embroidery on the breast-plate, between the rows of the stones, or on two borders; one above, the other below the pectoral. Rabbi Solomon, followed in this by Eugubinus, believes that the name Jehovah, written on a plate of gold was the Urim and Thummim. Spencer, in his dissertation on these words, believes they were two little golden figures which gave responses, which were shut up in the pectoral as in a purse, and which answered with an articulate voice such questions as were put to them by the high-priest. He supports his opinion by the authority of Jerom and of Cedrenus among the ancients; and of some Rabbins; of Cornelius à Lapide, and of Louis de Dieu, among the moderns. Philo, de vitâ Mos. lib. iii. et de Monarch. lib. ii. seems to have had the same thought; he says, there were on the breast-plate two figures in embroidery, of great virtue, one of which represented truth, and the other manifestation. M. Le Clerc supposed, that Urim and Thummim were the names of some precious stones which composed a great collar, hanging down on the breast of the high-priest; which might be imitated from the Egyptians, among whom the chief officer of justice wore about his neck a figure of truth, engraved on precious stones, and hanging by a golden chain. Diodor. Sicul. Biblioth. lib. ii. cap. 3. Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. xiv. cap. 34. Peter della Valle, in a letter written from Cairo, says, that he saw in Egypt a very ancient mummy, with a great collar hanging on its breast, the end of which was a tablet of gold, whereon was a bird engraved.

[It is remarkable enough, that among the Egyptian antiquities delineated by M. Denon, is represented a king, who (it may be thought) is applying to a deity (an oracle?) for advice, no less than as an act of worship: He wears on his bosom two small images, suspended by strings hung round his neck. It is impossible to say with certainty what these import; but, if such an addition were among the Egyptian insignia at such times, it would render credible the notion, that the Urim and Thummim were no part of the pectoral itself, but, additions made to it, on such important occasions.]

It is not probable that Moses represented, either in relief, embroidery, or engraving, any figure of man, or animal; but, no ill consequence can follow from supposing, that he might represent some mysterious device, or hieroglyphic, such as the cherub.

There is a great diversity of opinions concerning the manner in which God was consulted by Urim and Thummim. See Spencer, de Urim et Thummim. cap. 6. sect. 1, 2, 3, &c. It is agreed, first, that this way of consultation was used only on affairs of very great importance. Secondly, that the high-priest was the only officiating minister in it; and that for this purpose, he was clothed in all his pontifical habits; particularly, he was to wear his pectoral, to which the Urim and Thummim was affixed. And thirdly, say Mishna in Joma, cap. 7. sect. 5. Maimon. in Cæle Hammikdasch, cap. 10. that he was not allowed to perform this solemn consultation for a private person, but only for the king, for the president of the Sanhedrim, for the general of the army of Israel, or other chief of the nation. And even then, not on any affair of a private nature, but for the public welfare of church or state; for the common interest of the twelve tribes, whose names the high-priest wore on his pectoral. Abarbanel, in Exod. xxviii. et in Deut. xxxiii. Rab. Levi Ben Gerson, et Maimon. ibid.

When the Urim and Thummim was to be exercised, the high-priest put on his robes, and presented himself, not in the sanctuary, where he could enter but once a year, but in the holy place, before the curtain that parted the sanctum from the sanctuary. Maimon. ibid. Jalkuth, fol. 248. There, standing upright, and turning his face toward the ark of the covenant, on which the Divine presence rested, he proposed the matter for which he consulted. Behind him, in a direct line, at some distance, out of the sanctum, stood the person for whom he consulted, expecting with humility and reverence, the answer of the Lord. The Rabbins think, that the high-priest having then his eyes fixed on the stones of the pectoral, worn on his breast, he there read the answer of the Lord. The letters that raised themselves out of their places, and shone with more than ordinary lustre, were formed into the answer desired. For example; when David enquired of God, "Whether he should go up to one of the cities of Judah?" 2 Sam. ii. 1. it was answered him, אלה אל alah, "go up," i. e. the three letters, y ain, lamed, and he, rose by their splendor out of their places, as we may say, above the rest, to compose the answer. Maimon. in Cæle Hammikdasch, cap. 10. Zohar. in Exod. Jalkuth. ex lib. Siphre. R. Bechai, in Deut. xxxiii. 8. Ramban. Alii.

This notion is very old among the Jews, since Josephus, Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 9. and Philo, de Monarchia, lib. ii. understood it in this manner, and on their authority several of the ancient fathers have thus explained the responses by Urim and Thummim. Yet this presents difficulties. First, all the letters of the Hebrew alphabet were not found on the pectoral, four were wanting, heh, teth, zade, and koph. To supply these, the Rabbins pretend, that the names of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were also on the pectoral; still teth would be wanting.

Therefore

Therefore they say, this title also was there, Col-elle-schitbe Israel: see here all the tribes of Israel. But all this is advanced without proof, and against probability.

A second difficulty is, that if we admit all that the Hebrew doctors suggest in this affair, still it remains to be explained, by what rules the high-priest combined these letters? Suppose, for example, that any six of the letters should shine with more than ordinary lustre; how must the high-priest dispose them? which must be first, or last? It is answered, that in this circumstance he was always inspired, and filled with the spirit of prophecy; but if so, then the Urim and Thummim would have been unnecessary. For why must miracles be multiplied without occasion? The high-priest need only speak himself; and perhaps the whole effect of the Urim and Thummim was, to replenish him with an internal and supernatural light, which discovered future events to him, and revealed to him the will of God on what was enquired after.

Others think, with great probability, that God gave his answers in an articulate voice, heard from within the sanctuary, and from between the cherubim, over the ark of the propitiatory, called the oracle, Exod. xxv. 18, 20. xxxvii. 6. xl. 20. Lev. xvi. 2. et passim. When the Israelites made peace with the Gibeonites, they were blamed for not having inquired at the mouth of the Lord, which insinuates, that he had been used to make his voice heard, when he was consulted.

This method was probably observed in the army, and in the camp of Israel, as well as in the tabernacle, and in the temple. They took care to carry the ark of the covenant with them in their military expeditions; a tent was pitched for it, and it was consulted in the same manner as in the tabernacle. The ark was in the camp, with the two sons of the high-priest, Eli, when it was taken by the Philistines, 1 Sam. iv. 3, 5. v. 2. It was also in Joab's army before the city of Rabbah, 2 Sam. xi. 11. Saul had, doubtless, the ark along with him, 1 Sam. xiv. 18. when he said to Ahijah, Bring hither the ark of God; for the ark of God was at that time with the children of Israel.

But the Rabbins have other notions; they maintain that the ark of God was never removed out of the sanctuary; but only at that time so fatal to Israel, when the Philistines took it; that on all other occasions, where the ark is said to be in the army, it must be understood of a chest, wherein they kept the ephod, and pectoral, of the high-priest, whence they took them when they enquired of the Lord by Urim and Thummim. Thus Moses sent Phinehas to war against Midian, who took with him the vessels of the sanctuary, and the sacred trumpets, Numb. xxxi. 6. that is, says Jonathan, son of Uziel, he put into his hands the Urim and Thummim, that he might consult the Lord on occasion. So when David says to Abiathar, 1 Sam. xxiii. 9. Applica Ephod; they also understand it of this chest, containing the holy ornaments; and the same what Uriah says of the ark of the Lord being under tents.

They add, that in such cases it was not the high-priest that went to the camp, or that consulted God in the army, but some other priest; who, that he might be qualified for this high function, received the holy unction as well as the high-priest, and was called, The Anointed for the War. Maimon. in Cale Hammikdasch. cap. 1. § 7. et in Melachim. cap. 7.

But all these particulars are very much to be suspected. We find no hint in Scripture of any such chest, or of an ark sent into the camp to be the depository of the high-priest's vestments; nor any trace of this pretended priest, anointed for the war, nor any prohibition of carrying the ark into the army. The ark was at Gilgal, when Saul sacrificed there, and commanded Ahijah to consult the Lord before his ark. For the sacred historian adds, the ark was there with the children of Israel, 1 Sam. xiii. 9. xiv. 18, 19. When David was forced to quit Jerusalem before the face of Absalom, the high-priest Zadok followed him with the ark; but David sent them back, 2 Sam. xv. 24. In the time of king Josiah, 2 Chron. xxxv. 3. the priests carried the ark from place to place; but this prince ordered, that it should be settled in the sanctuary, and not be removed any more.

Yet we must not pretend that it was absolutely necessary the ark should be present when God was consulted by Urim and Thummim. David, during his flight from Saul, consulted the Lord on three different occasions, though the ark was not in his little army: viz. twice at Keilah, and once at Ziklag, 1 Sam. xxiii. 2, 4. xxx. 8. I also think, that the ark was not with him when he consulted God a fourth time, after the death of Saul, to know whether he should abide in one of the cities of Judah? But the business is to know on these occasions, how the Lord was consulted by Urim and Thummim?

Scripture insinuates, that sometimes this was done in a hurry. Saul, seeing the camp of the Philistines in a tumult, and not knowing what Jonathan his son had done, says to the high-priest, Applica arcam Dei. 1 Sam. xiv. 18, 19, 20. And as the priest stretched out his hands, probably to offer his petition, and to consult the Lord, Saul says to him, Let down your hand. And, without staying for an answer, they cried, To arms! and marched against the enemy. In all this there seems to be but little of preparation and ceremony, though the ark was at hand. But when it was not on the spot, probably the Lord was consulted in the king's domestic chapel, or in the most private part of his tent; and then the Lord made known his will to the priest, either by an articulate voice, or by some inward illumination, which enlightened the mind of the priest.

It remains to enquire, how long the custom of consulting God by Urim and Thummim subsisted. The Rabbins think, it continued no longer than under the tabernacle. They have a maxim, that the Holy Spirit spoke to Israel by Urim and Thummim under the tabernacle; under the first temple, by prophets; under the second temple, or after the captivity of Babylon, by the Bath-col, or daughter of the voice: meaning a voice from heaven, as at the baptism of Jesus Christ, Matt. iii. 17. and at his transfiguration, Matt. xvii. 5. 2 Pet. i. 17. But see BATH COL.

Spencer has adopted this opinion, and endeavours to support it by these two arguments. First, that the Urim and Thummim were a consequence of the divine government, or theocracy. While the Lord immediately governed his people, it was necessary there should always be means at hand to consult him. Secondly, that this method was established to consult God on affairs that concerned the common interest of the nation. But the theocracy ceased, when the kingdom became hereditary, in the person and family of Solomon: as the interests of the nation ceased to be common, after the division of Israel into two monarchies; and what seems to be conclusive is, that no traces of consulting the Lord by Urim and Thummim, appear from the building of the temple of Solomon, to its destruction; and after its destruction, all agree, that this was never restored.

USURY, Usura, or Fenus. A premium received for the loan of a sum of money, over and above the principal. It is said, Exod. xxii. 25, 26. "If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury. If thou at all take thy neighbour's raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that the sun goeth down." And Lev. xxv. 35, 36, 37. "If thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen into decay with thee, then thou shalt relieve him; yea, though he be a stranger, or a sojourner, that he may live with thee. Take thou no usury of him, or increase, but fear thy God, that thy brother may live with thee. Thou shalt not give him thy money upon usury, nor lend him thy victuals for increase." The Hebrew may be translated: "When your brother shall fall into poverty and misery, you shall support him; and as to the stranger or foreigner that shall be settled among you, you shall take no usury of him; you shall not lend him your money for usury, &c." So that this passage would contain two precepts: first, that a brother was to be maintained when in poverty; secondly, that even a stranger was to be relieved without paying usury.

And, Deut. xxiii. 19, 20. "Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother, usury of money, usury of victuals, usury of any thing that is lent upon usury. Unto a stranger thou mayest lend upon usury, but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury: that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all that thou settest thine hand to, in the land whither thou goest to possess it." In this place the Lord seems to tolerate usury towards strangers; i. e. the Canaanites, and other people devoted to subjection, but not toward such strangers against whom the Hebrews had no quarrel, and against whom the Lord had not denounced his judgments. To exact usury is here, according to St. Ambrose, de Tobia. cap. 23. an act of hostility; it was a kind of waging war with the Canaanites, and of ruining them by means of usury. Demand usury from him whom you may kill without a crime: Cui enim jure inferuntur arma, huic legitime inducantur usurae.—Ab hoc usuram exige, quem non sit crimen occidere. So that the true inference is, that God did indeed tolerate, but not approve the usury, which the Hebrews received from the Canaanites. He allowed thus much to the hardness of their hearts, because it could not be entirely prevented.

Jesus Christ, in his gospel, has revoked all such tolerations, which obtained under the old law. Luke vi. 30, 31, 32, 33. "Give to every man that asketh of thee, and of him that taketh away thy goods, ask them not again. If ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have you? for sinners also lend to sinners, to receive as much again. But love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again." These last words, Mutuum date nihil inde sperantes, may be explained three ways: 1. Lend even to the poorest, where there is no hope that he can be able ever to repay. 2. Lend, without expecting that the like kindness shall be returned to you. 3. Lend, without distrusting your neighbour; or, lend without distrusting Providence;

Providence; so that the fear of indigence should withhold you from doing good: but we think the genuine meaning to be the first. St. Austin, Epist. 153. would not determine, whether gain be unjust that is acquired by usury; and whether restitution ought not to be made in this case: Quid dicam de usuris, quas etiam Leges et Judices reddi jubent? Hæc atque ejusmodi male utique possidentur, et vellem restituerentur; sed non est quo Judice repetantur. Probably he speaks of secret usury. Nehemiah, v. 11. obliges the Jews, after their return from the captivity, to restore to their brethren what they had extorted from them. "Restore, I pray you, to them, even this day, their lands, their vineyards, their olive-yards, and their houses; also the hundredth part of the money, and of the corn, the wine, and the oil that ye exact of them." The Hebrew says, restore, or make restitution. But it is needless to enlarge:—Usury is condemned by all laws, natural, divine, or human. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. XLVI. LXXIX.

UTHAI, וְתַי, 'OoSi, my time; from וְתַי heth: otherwise my iniquity; from וְתַי hiveth, to pervert, and the pronoun i, my. Son of Ammihud of Judah, 1 Chron. ix. 14.

VULGATE. This title is given to that Latin translation of the bible which was declared authentic by the council of Trent, Sess. iv. cap. 2. "The holy council taking it into their consideration, that the church of God would receive no small advantage, if, of the several Latin editions at this day to be seen, it were known which ought to be admitted as authentic; it orders, declares, and determines, that the ancient and common edition, which has been approved by the church by a long use for so many ages, ought to be held as authentic; that it ought to be received as authentic in the public lessons, disputations, preaching, and theological explications; and will not allow that any shall be so bold as to reject it on any pretence whatever." The council does not intend to compare the Vulgate with the originals, for that was not the question; but with the other Latin versions then in vogue, many of which were very suspicious. It is therefore unreasonable, that adversaries [Protestants] should accuse the council with having preferred the Vulgate to the Originals. Salmero, Proleg. 3. who assisted at this council, and Pallavicini, who wrote the history of it, both assure us, that the council had no other intention, than to declare that the Vulgate was the only Latin version it approved, and held as authentic; as containing nothing contrary to sound faith, or to good morals.

We cannot assign either the time, or the author, of this ancient Latin version; but we are persuaded, that it is only since the establishment of Christianity that the Scriptures were translated into Latin. We have no knowledge that the Jews ever rendered any of their sacred writings into Latin, although they were numerous in Rome and Italy. But the Christians signalized their zeal very early, and with a spirit of emulation, in spreading the truth through the world, by a great variety of translations of Scripture. Great numbers applied themselves to this, as we are told by Augustin, de Doctr. Christ. lib. ii. cap. 11. n. 16. Qui Scripturas ex Hebræa Lingua in Græcum verterunt, numerari possunt: Latini autem Interpretes nullo modo. No sooner did any man apprehend, that he had some talent at translating, but he endeavoured to translate the first Greek copy that came into his hands; Ut enim cuique primis fidei temporibus in manus venit Codex Græcus, et aliquantulum facultatis sibi utriusque Linguae habere videbatur, ausus est interpretari.

Hence proceeded a multiplicity of Latin versions of the Bible, and the little agreement they had with each other. This made Jerom, præfat. in Josue. assert, that there were almost as many different translations as books: Cùm apud Latinos tot sint exemplaria ferè quot Codices, et unusquisque pro arbitrio suo vel addiderit, vel subtraxerit quod ei visum est. But among these ancient versions, there was one of greater authority, and more generally received than the others. This was known to antiquity by the name of the Italic Version, the Vulgar, or the Vulgate: and was called the Ancient, after Jerom had formed a new one from the Hebrew. The former was a translation from the Greek, and it had the greatest credit among the Latin editions, because it adhered closer to the letter of the original, and was the most perspicuous as to sense: Verborum tenacior cum perspicuitate sententiæ. Greg. Mag. Præfat. in Moral. in Job.

Although intelligent persons readily allowed the necessity of a new translation, which should be faithful and accurate, and which might stand in stead of all others; yet they continued to the end of the fourth century, or to the beginning of the fifth, without accomplishing this matter. And when Jerom began a Latin translation immediately from the Hebrew, he met with great opposition, even from persons who meant well, but who apprehended the authority of the Septuagint would suffer by it, whom several looked on as divinely inspired; and they feared it might give offence to those who were accustomed to the ancient version, to see a new one differing from it. The good father first made some trials, trials, to reform, if he could, the Latin versions made from the Greek; he twice attempted to restore the Psalter; he also bestowed some labour on several other books of the bible, the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, the Canticles, Job, and Chronicles, (see the second Prolegomena of the new edition of St. Jerom,) but his endeavours met with little success; the old usage still prevailed. At last he yielded to the solicitations of many of his friends, who desired him to undertake an entire Latin version of the bible, from the Hebrew. Jerom. Præfat. in Paralip. Item, Præfat. in Job. Esdr. Josue.

At first he translated the books of Samuel and the Kings, at the request of Paula and Eustochius: then he translated the book of Job, which he seems to have intended for Marcella, a Roman lady: thirdly, the greater and the lesser prophets, and some time after, Ezra. Fourthly, he translated the Psalms from the Hebrew, and gave them to Sophronius to put into Greek. Fifthly, at the instances of Heliodorus and Chromatius, he translated the three books of Solomon; the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles. Sixthly, he undertook the translation of the Pentateuch, at the request of his friend Desiderius; but he could not finish this work till after several interruptions, because of its great length. Seventhly, at the intreaty of Eustochius, he completed the version of Joshua, Judges, Ruth, and Esther. Lastly, he translated the Chronicles, at the request of Chromatius.

It is impossible to shew exactly the time at which each of these works was performed; but we know—that A. D. 392, the books of Samuel and Kings, Job, the greater and smaller prophets, the Psalms, and the books of Solomon, were already translated:—that the books of Esdras and Genesis were translated into Latin between A. D. 392 and 394. He could not finish the rest of the Pentateuch, i. e. Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy, till A. D. 404, or 405, (i. e. after the death of Paula, A. D. 404.) See Jerom's preface to Joshua, and the Prolegomena to the new edition of St. Jerom. After this year he translated Joshua, Judges, and Ruth. He did not finish the translation of the Chronicles till A. D. 396, as may be collected from his letters and prefaces. He did not undertake the Apocryphal books; such as Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Maccabees, Baruch, the letter of Jeremiah, the additions to Esther and Daniel, which are however in the ancient Vulgate. Even the Psalter, as sung at this day, is almost entirely of the ancient Italic: St. Jerom's version of it from the Hebrew is not in our bibles. Our Vulgate of the Psalter is not the ancient Latin version, reformed from the Greek by Jerom, but a mixture of the ancient Italic, with the emendations of Jerom.

Jerom translated also the New Testament from the Greek, at the request of pope Damasius. Præfat. in quatuor Evangel. Before his translation, there was so little agreement among the Latin copies, that there were almost as many different versions as books: Tot enim sunt exemplaria penè quot sunt codices. But to avoid giving offence to those who had been accustomed to the ancient Vulgate, he endeavoured, as much as possible, to retain the old forms of expression that were already in the text: Ita calamo temperavimus, ut his tantùm quæ sensum videbantur mutare correctis, reliqua pateremur manere ut fuerant. This did not a little contribute to render his translation popular throughout the whole Latin church, to the exclusion of the old Italic, which is not to be found any where complete, that we know of, and of which there only remain some parts in old manuscripts, or some fragments, in the writings of the fathers before Jerom. [But, latterly, several considerable portions of this version have been recovered by the researches of the learned, as Bianchini, Sabbatier, and others: the continued diligence of biblical antiquaries, with the spirit now active in the examination of ancient MSS. may justify the expectation of recovering this original version entirely. An entire and unadulterated copy of this version would be little less valuable than the LXX. its original.]

The progress of his new translation was so rapid, that this father could no sooner publish a book than it was dispersed through the cities and provinces. Rufinus, the rival of Jerom, could not see this without uneasiness, and he reproaches him with it. Invectiva in Hieron. lib. ii. Lucinus, the Spaniard, a person zealously affected to the Holy Scriptures, in A. D. 394, sent to Bethlehem six transcribers, to write out the versions, and all other works of Jerom. St. Augustin was at first not very favourable to the version of Jerom; but afterwards he had so great an esteem for it, that from it he composed his Speculum, or Looking-glass, which is a collection of passages of Scripture, for the use of unlearned believers. Philip, the priest, who was contemporary with Jerom, in his commentary on Job, has wholly followed the version of Jerom. Gregory the Great has almost always done the same in his Morals on Job, though he says, that in his time the Roman church used indifferently the ancient Italic version, or the new one from the Hebrew. Isidore of Seville, de Officiis Eccles. lib. i. who lived about A. D. 680, says, without exception, that all the churches followed the version of Jerom: Cujus Editione omnes ecclesie usquequaque utuntur. Hugo Victor affirms, de sacris Scripturis, cap. 9. that the Latin church made a decree, by which it ordained, that for time to come no other version should be used. We know nothing of this decree; and it is very possible that no such ever was made; but the constant use and practice of the church is equivalent to the strongest decree.

The ancient Vulgate, in use before that of Jerom, although composed at a time when the Latin tongue was in its greatest purity, was, however, very barbarous, as may be sufficiently proved by what remains of it. The first interpreters made it much less their care to express themselves purely and elegantly, than plainly and intelligibly, so as to be understood by the most ignorant, and to render the Greek text of Scripture faithfully, and literally into Latin. Jerom's style is much purer, though without any affectation of ornament. He studied much more to translate perspicuously, than to write fine Latin:—and in the main, it may be said, that his translation is excellent, though not without faults. The learned even among the Protestants have commended the Vulgate, and have preferred it before any other Latin translation. Ludovicus de Dieu acknowledges, that the ancient Latin translator was a very learned man. He has his faults, and his barbarisms, says he; but I cannot help admiring his fidelity and judgment, even in places where he is most barbarous. When Grotius gives his reasons for choosing the Vulgate, on which to compose his notes on the Scriptures, he has these remarkable words: I have always much esteemed the author of the Vulgate, not only because he delivers no opinion contrary to faith, but also because he abounds with erudition. Grot. Prefat. in Annotat. in Vet. Testament. Fagius looks on those as shameless, and half-learned, who speak ill of this translation: Prefat. ad Col-lat. translat. Vet. Testament.

When the council of Trent. Sess. 4. gave orders, that the Scriptures should be printed as soon as might be, and as correctly as possible, particularly according to the ancient edition of the Vulgate, Pope Sixtus V. made it his care to procure a perfect edition of the Latin Vulgate, which might serve as a model to all future editions, for the use of the catholic church. He appointed many learned divines to this work, who laboured in it with great application. His edition was finished A. D. 1589, but was not published till 1590. But this was found very imperfect; therefore Pope Clement VIII. procured another edition in 1592, which has been taken as the model for all printed since. Yet we are not to imagine that this edition is exempt from faults. Cardinal Bellarmine, who with other divines attended the correction of it, acknowledges, in his letter to Lucas of Bruges, that it contains various faults, which the correctors did not remove. Scias velim Biblia vulgata non esse à nobis accuratissime castigata; multa enim de industria justis de causis pertransivimus.

[The VULGATE, being a translation made from the original Hebrew, by one who had not only considerable qualifications for it, himself, but, who enjoyed advantages not possessed by western translators, deserves special attention. Jerom derived assistance from the famous school of Jewish doctors at Tiberias. He resided in the Holy Land; he had traversed the country in various directions; he had seen the principal places mentioned in Sacred History; he knew their natural history, their animals, plants, and localities; he was familiar with the manners and customs of the country; with the idioms and turns of expression admitted by the natives, &c. &c. all these were inappreciable advantages. The disadvantages which operated against Jerom were—haste: his translation of the three books of Solomon he calls "the works of three days." No facility of writing can justify such dispatch. Can we wonder, that he changes proper names into appellatives, and appellatives into proper names?—that he makes improper divisions of colons and periods?—that he sometimes translates excessively closely, while at others he almost paraphrases? A second disadvantage was, too great confidence in his Jewish guides. Though his knowledge of Hebrew was, certainly, considerable, it was not perfect: he might be superior to most—perhaps to all Christian fathers of his day; yet many moderns have surpassed him in this, and these discover in him too much deference to Rabbinical authority, instead of drawing from less questionable sources of information. And perhaps, a still remaining desire to stand well in the opinion of his Christian friends and readers, must be allowed for, as a third, and not an inconsiderable, disadvantage. He was not, strictly speaking, perfectly independent. He wished not to deviate too far from what was current. He outlived the storm raised against him; but, at first he could not but feel it. We are, nevertheless, under the greatest obligations to his labours; and though they cannot hold the place of the originals, they have produced a version of secondary use and value. But, the Vulgate as now extant, is not exactly what what Jerom left it. In some places the western churches still retained much of the Old Italic; even whole books; in other places, corrections of various kinds were annexed to it. Towards the end of the eighth century, it was revised by the Saxon Alkwin, at the desire of Charlemagne: and, subsequently, by other editors. The first printed editions are faulty. The Complutensian copy is much better; but the best is that of Robert Stephens, 1540. Other editions, of later times, have collected many various readings. The reader has seen the repeated exertions made under papal authority, with their acknowledged demerits, in the foregoing part of this article.

It may be worth while to add, that when the emigrant French clergy, who fled to England to save their lives from the fury of the revolution in France, were somewhat settled in England, the University of Oxford printed two thousand copies of the Vulgate version of the New Testament, to be distributed gratis among them: and two thousand more were printed for the same purpose at the expence of the Marquis of Buckingham: on this occasion arose a controversy, for and against the authority of the Vulgate; the general opinion of well-informed persons seemed to be, that, considered as a version, the Vulgate was not to be rejected; but then its authority should be restricted to that due to a version only.

The avidity with which this present was received by the French clergy, was sufficient to justify a much more serious charge against the church of Rome, viz. that even this version, which she patronizes, is little known, and consequently less studied and understood, even by the priests of her communion: most of whom have never seen it, otherwise than mutilated in their breviaries, and very few of whom have considered and investigated it, as those ought to do who have the charge of instructing others. What a man does not understand himself, he cannot possibly explain to any inquirer. May this absence of information never again be truly charged on the clergy of the Romish church, or of any other church!]

VULTURE, a bird of prey, declared unclean by Moses, Lev. xi. 14. Deut. xiv. 13. We are told that vultures feed on human flesh; whence they were reckoned among the ancient birds of ill omen. Yet it is certain that the Romans were of another opinion. The Indians, Persians, and ancient Spaniards, exposed dead bodies to be eaten by vultures:

Tellure, ut perhibent, is mos antiquus Iberi,
Exanima obsecans consumat corpora Vultur.
SILIVS ITAL. lib. xiii.

In hieroglyphics it is said, the vulture signified pity, and sharpness of sight, and was consecrated to Juno.

Moses calls it דַּאִיַּא Daia, or דַּאִיַּא Daah; but interpreters are not agreed that this signifies a Vulture. Bochart distinguishes between Aia and Daia, maintaining that the former signifies a merlin, and the other a vulture. Others think that Daah, or Daia, signifies a kite; and Aia a vulture, or a raven. Daah is translated eagle, Jer. xlviii. 40. xlix. 22; and Daia a kite, Isaiah xxxiv. 15. Vulg. The LXX. and Jerom render the Hebrew word, Job xxviii. 7. וַיְהִי הַיֵּט (Γυψ. Vul. Vultur.) by a vulture, which rather signifies a bird in general. Vide BIRD.

UZ, וֹז, Us, (Vulgate) counsel; [very prudent. Eng. Wise?] or wood, from וֹז hetz: according to the Syriac, to fix, to fasten to. [fixed.]

UZ, וֹז, or Hus, the eldest son of Aram, and grandson of Shem. It is thought he peopled Trachonitis, a province beyond Jordan, having Arabia Deserta east, and Batanea west. This opinion is proposed by Jerom and Josephus. The ancients inform us, that Uz founded the city of Damascus. The Hebrews call by the name of Uz the country about Damascus, which the Arabians call Gaut or Gauta. Uz might also be placed about the sources of the river Tigris. Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, and Pliny, place thereabouts a people called Uxii or Oxii.

Moses says nothing of the genealogy of Uz, or of his posterity. But the Arabians tell us, that Uz, or Hus, had Ad for a son, who was father of a people called Adites, in Arabia Felix. These people falling into idolatry, God was provoked at their obstinacy, and destroyed them. Vide HEBER, and d'Herbelot, Bibliotheca Orientalis, p. 460. also, JETHRO.

Josephus, Antiq. lib. i. cap. 7. and Jerom, Quaest. Heb. in Genes. think, that Uz the son of Aram, founded the city of Damascus; and that his descendants settled in the Trachonitis, which is near the plain of Damascus. Bochart is of opinion, that the Husites peopled the valley between Libanus and Antilibanus, called by the Arabians, Algauta, i. e. the country of Gaut, or of Hus.

LAND OF UZ. Eusebius and Jerom assure us, that according to the tradition of the people of Palestine, and around it, the city of Astaroth-Carnaim was the place of Job's habitation. But Astaroth-Carnaim was beyond Jordan, between Mahanaim and Esdrai, on the Jabbok. Others suppose he lived in the city of Bozra, the capital of Idumea; and Job's mother is thought to have been of this city. Others think him to have dwelt at the famous city of Emah, or Hamah, which which is often mentioned in Scripture: it was in Syria, on the Orontes. Others believe he lived at Hama, which is thought to be Apamea, in the same country, and on the same river. All this is on the supposition, that Job was a descendant of Uz the son of Aram.

As it is our opinion that Job may very well be the Jobab mentioned Gen. xxxvi. 33, 34. and 1 Chron. i. 43, 44. we also think the country of Job was the city of Dinhabah, which Scripture assigns for Jobab's dwelling place. But Dinhabah or Denabah, according to Eusebius and Jerom, was in the country of Moab, between Areopolis and Heshbon. Ptolemy places a city of this name in the Palmyrene.

UZAI, אזאי, now: [hasty?] from אז az: or this; from אז o, or, and the pronoun אז za, this. Father of Palal. Neh. iii. 25.

UZAL, אזל, אִלְזָל, that travels, that approaches: from אזל azel: otherwise to sail: otherwise to distil, to drop. [Progression? i.e. addition to the family. Gen. x. 27. 1 Chron. i. 21.]

UZAL, sixth son of Joktan. He is commonly placed in Arabia Felix. In the book of Juchasim we find mention of Uzal, the capital city of the kingdom of Aljemen, or Sabas. From Uzal the Latins have formed Auzar, and call Myrrha Auzaritis, a kind of myrrh that comes from this country. Pliny, lib. xii. cap. 6.

UZZAH, אזח, [for אזח, strong] strength; from אזח hazaz: otherwise, goat, or kid; from אזח hez.

UZZAH, Aza, or Oza, son of Abinadab, 2 Sam. vi. A. M. 2956, ante A. D. 1045. A Levite, who with his brother Ahio, conducted the new cart, on which the ark of the covenant was brought from Kirjathjearim to Jerusalem. When they were come to Nachon's threshing floor, or the floor that was prepared, (see NACHON.) Uzzah stretched out his hand to support the ark of God, which seemed to him in danger of falling, because of the stumbling of the oxen. (The Hebrew is, וַיִּשְׁמַע הַבָּקָר, Quoniam calcitrabant boves, 2 Sam. vi. 7. Bos lascivius inclinaverat eam. 1 Chron. xiii. 9. The force of the Hebrew word is unknown.) The anger of the Lord smote Uzzah, because of his rashness and ignorance; and he died on the place.

Opinions are much divided about the occasion of the death of Uzzah. Some think the Lord put him to death, because he touched the ark irreverently; not shewing sufficient respect to it. Others, that the Lord was provoked by his distrust on this occasion, in attempting to hold up the ark; as if God were not able to preserve it without his assistance. But the true cause is sufficiently explained by David himself, when he says, because there were no priests to carry the ark, 1 Chron. xv. 13. Vide Joseph. Antiq. lib. vii. cap. 4. Theodoret. qu. 19. in 2 Sam. Uzzah, who was not of the race of Aaron, was so rash as to handle it, and was (it is presumed) the adviser of carrying it in a cart, instead of having it carried on the shoulders of the priests.

VOL. II. PART XXXI. Edit. IV.

ADDITION.

As the history of the death of Uzzah, being related very succinctly, is liable to be misunderstood, it may be proper to notice,

1. That the law, Exod. xxv. 14. ordered that the ark should be carried on the shoulders of Levites, whereas, in this instance, it was drawn by oxen, on a cart, 1. as if this carriage by beasts were good enough for it: 2. it was hereby assimilated to the processions of the heathen, who drew their gods about in carriages: 3. if it had been borne by Levites, would Uzzah have been one to bear it?—did he think this too much trouble? the distance too great, &c.

2. That the ark ought to have been enveloped, —wholly concealed, by the priests, before the Levites approached it; whereas, 1. no priest attended this procession: 2. was it carried openly, exposed to view? as it was by the Philistines, 1 Sam. vi. 13—19. Uzzah being a Levite, ought to have known these rules, and being the principal in conducting the procession, and, as may be supposed, the elder brother, Uzzah was principally guilty; Ahio being subordinate to him.

3. It is likely, that the oxen drew it safely while in a straight road, but when they came to turn into the threshing floor, that was prepared, one or both of them became restiff, and refused to go in, started aside [stumbled is the usual idea of the word,] which provoking Uzzah, put him off his guard.

But the words appear to be capable of another rendering; literally—And they came to the threshing floor prepared; and Uzzah put forth his hand to the ark of God, and seized it, laid hold of it strongly, held it back, וַיִּשְׁמַע הַבָּקָר INSOMUCH THAT—to such a degree that—one of the oxen stumbled, or started—and the Lord smote Uzzah UPON וַיִּשְׁמַע הַבָּקָר THIS RASHNESS; and he died on the spot וַיִּשְׁמַע הַבָּקָר WITH i. e. as close as possible, adjoining to [by] the ark.

This history then may stand thus: Uzzah was so intent on preventing the oxen from drawing the cart any further than the entrance of the floor prepared to receive it, that he pulled, with all his might, against the oxen, which were going on, one of them slipped, and the whole weight of the cart, or rather of the ark, falling on Uzzah, he was crushed on the spot. In this view of the story Uzzah may be said to have been the cause of his own death. This shews also, 1. how Ahio, though equally blameable of not covering, or not bearing the ark, might escape any disaster. 2. It gives the reason of the prepared floor being mentioned, the occurrence happening at the entrance of it; and 3. it agrees with the name given by David to the place, "the BREACH of Uzzah," i. e. the place where Uzzah was broken,—PRESSED OUT—crushed to death.

Observe, had the ark been carried on the shoulders of Levites, as it ought to have been, such a fatal event could not have happened; as they could have heard and obeyed orders to regulate their march, to turn, to stop, &c. so that greater respect to the ark, had been greater security to its attendants. This is perfectly agreeable to what David afterwards observes, 1 Chron. xv. 13. "The Lord made a breach upon us formerly, because we sought him not after a due order," &c. The order of the words is strongly in favour of this sense of the particle כִּי, rendered insomuch, as is its frequent import; instead of for, as in our translation.

UZZEN-SHERAH, עֶזְרַן שְׂרָה, ear of the flesh, or of the parent, &c. from עֶזְרַן ozen, an ear, and שְׂרָה sheor, flesh, or parent: or the ear of him that remains; from sheor, or shaar, accord-

UZZI, עֲזִי, my strength, or my kid; from hazaz, or hez. See UZZAH.

UZZI, AZZI, UZI, or OZI, son of Bukki, the sixth high-priest of the Jews, of the race of Eleazar. Eli was his successor, of the race of Ithamar. It is not known how long Uzzi held the priesthood, but Eli entered on this office A. M. 2828, ante A. D. 1156.

UZZIAH, עֲזִיָּה, 'עֲזִיָּה, strength of the Lord; from עֲזִי hazaz, strength: otherwise, the kid of the Lord, from עֲזִי hez, a kid, and יָהּ jah, the Lord.

[WAGGONS. The form and construction of the ancient waggons of Egypt, Gen. xiv. 19, 27. differed from chariots. They somewhat resembled our carts drawn by two horses abreast.]

[WALK, WALKING. This word, in Hebrew, signifies, not merely to proceed or advance, step by step, steadily, but to proceed with increased velocity: it signifies to swell out louder a musical note or voice—a crescendo, as musicians term it: and so, generally, to augment a moderate pace till it acquires rapidity. Under this idea examine Isaiah xl. 31. "the youths shall faint and grow weary, the young men shall utterly fail of their power, but they who wait on the Lord shall renew strength; shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk—shall increase their swiftness—augment their velocity—and not faint." The passage requires the admission of some idea to this effect, since walking after running, is an anticlimax, and therefore could not be the poetical prophet's meaning.

To

To walk, signifies the conduct of life, the general course of a party, his deportment, demeanour, &c. To worship God truly, is to walk before the Lord; Enoch walked with God, maintained and increased in piety towards him; so did Noab: God promises to walk with his people, and his people desire his influence, that they may walk in his statutes.

The phrase is used of the tongue, which walketh through the earth: i. e. whose cavillings, censures, revilings, &c. roam without controul, without respect of persons, or things. The pestilence is said to walk in darkness; spreading its ravages by night as well as by day. God is said to walk on the wings of the wind; and the heart of man to walk after detestable things. Blessed is he who walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly.

To walk in darkness, 1 John i. 6, 7. is to be misled by error: to walk in the light is to be well informed; to walk by faith is to expect the things promised or threatened, and to maintain a conduct accordingly; to walk after the flesh is to gratify fleshly appetites; to walk after the spirit, is to pursue spiritual objects, to cultivate spiritual affections, to be spiritually minded, which is life and peace.]

WALL. The Lord tells the prophet Jeremiah, i. 18. xv. 20. that he will make him as a wall of brass, to withstand the house of Israel. St. Paul, Acts xxiii. 3. calls the high-priest Ananias a whited wall, intending to expose his hypocrisy. He says, Eph. ii. 14. that Jesus Christ, by his death, broke down the partition-wall that separated us from God, or, rather, the wall that separated Jew and Gentile; so that these two people, when converted, may make but one. [Vide the low wall in the Temple, FRAGMENTS, No. CCXL.]

Anciently they hung up their bucklers on the walls of cities, [or towers, Cant. iv. 4.] from whence, on any alarm, they were taken down. Hence Isaiah says, xxii. 6. Parietem nudavit clypeis.

WAR. When the Hebrews drew out their armies, and went to war against their enemies, and battle was at hand, the high-priest, at the head of the army, spoke to the people in this manner: Hear, O Israel, and be not in fear of your enemies; for the Lord your God fights for you, &c. Deut. xx.

The Lord commanded, Deut. xx. 10. that when the Israelites intended to besiege a city, they should previously offer it conditions of peace; which, if accepted, they were to save the lives of the inhabitants, and to satisfy themselves with having subdued them. But if it refused to open its gates, then they might besiege it, and having taken it, put all the males to death. He ordered also, that in long sieges, and where machines were employed, they should spare the fruit-trees, and restrict themselves to cutting down wild and useless trees, for carrying on their works.

The Hebrews were formerly one of the most warlike nations in the world. The books that relate their wars are neither flattering authors, nor ignorant, but inspired by the spirit of truth and wisdom. Their warriors were not fabulous heroes, but, commonly, wise and valiant generals, raised up by God, to fight the battles of the Lord; such were Joshua, Gideon, Jephthah, Samson, David, the Maccabees, &c.

Their wars were not undertaken on slight occasions, nor performed with a handful of people. Under Joshua the affair was no less than the conquest of a country, allotted by God to Israel, from several powerful nations, who were devoted to an anathema; to vindicate an offended Deity, and human nature, debased by wicked and corrupt people of different nations, which had filled up the measure of their iniquities. Under the Judges, the purpose was to assert their liberty, by shaking off the yoke of powerful kings, who kept them in subjection. Under Saul, and David, to these motives were added that of subduing such provinces, as God had promised to his people.

In the later times of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, we find their kings bearing the shock of the greatest powers of Asia, the kings of Assyria and Chaldea, Shalmaneser, Sennacherib, Esar-Haddon, and Nebuchadnezzar, who made the whole East to tremble. Under the Maccabees, the business was with a handful of men, to oppose the whole power of the kings of Syria, to uphold the religion of their fathers, and to free themselves from the despotism which designed to subvert both their religion and liberty. In the last times of their nation, with what courage, with what intrepidity, and constancy, did they sustain the war against the Romans, then masters of the world? Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. CCI. and PLATE, ARCH of TITUS.

In the beginning, under Moses and Joshua, they were all soldiers, and men bearing arms. They came out of Egypt in number 600,000 fighting men. [Comp. FRAGS. No. DCCXVII.] When Joshua entered Canaan, he fought sometimes with detachments, and sometimes with his whole army. To signalize his omnipotence, and to humble the pride of man, God often gave victory to very small armies. For example, under Gideon, when he ordered that general to dismiss the greater part of his army, and only to keep with him three hundred men, with which he defeated an innumerable multitude of Midianites and Amalekites.

If we would see examples of numerous armies, Abijah, king of Judah, with four hundred thousand men, made war against Jeroboam, king of Israel, who had eight hundred thousand; of whom there were five hundred thousand slain in one battle: [these numbers, however, may have a cypher too much.] 2 Chron. xiii. 3, 17. Pekah, son of Remaliah king of Israel, in one day killed one hundred and twenty thousand men of Judah. 2 Chron. xxviii. 6. Asa, king of Judah, having an army of six hundred thousand men, was attacked by Zerah, king of Cush, who had an army of a million of men. Zerah was entirely routed by the troops of Asa, 2 Chron. xiv. 9, 13. The standing forces of David and Solomon were more than three hundred thousand men. 1 Chron. xxvii. Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, had eleven hundred and sixty thousand men of war, not including the garrisons in his fortified places. 2 Chron. xvii. 14, 19. [But Comp. FRAGMENTS, Nos. DCCXV. et seq.]

We may distinguish two kinds of wars among the Hebrews. Some were of obligation, being expressly commanded by the Lord; others were free and voluntary. The first were, for example, against the Amalekites, and the [intrusive] Canaanites, nations devoted to an anathema. The others were to avenge injuries, insults, or offences against the nation. Such was that against the city of Gibeah, and against the tribe of Benjamin: and such was that of David against the Ammonites, whose king had affronted his ambassadors. Or to maintain and defend their allies, as that of Joshua against the kings of the Canaanites, to protect Gibeon. Lastly, whatever causes are usually thought to authorize a nation, or a prince, to make war against another, obtained likewise among the Hebrews. The laws of Moses suppose that Israel might make war, and might oppose enemies.

The first law of war is, that it should be declared to the enemy, and that reparation should be demanded, for the wrong supposed to have been suffered, before the enemy is attacked. Deut. xx. 10, 11, &c.

DECLARATION OF WAR. We have several examples of defiance, challenge, or declaration of war; and complaints of those who were attacked, without having had war formally declared. When the Ammonites by surprise attacked the Israelites beyond Jordan, Jephthah sent to enquire of them, "What hast thou to do with me, that thou art come against me, to fight in my land?" &c. Judg. xi. 12. When the Philistines entered the territory of Judah, to avenge themselves for the fire that Samson had put to their corn, the men of Judah came out to enquire of them, "Why are ye come up against us?" Judg. xv. 10. &c. They answered, they had no quarrel against any but Samson, who had destroyed their fields. The men of Judah promised to deliver up the guilty person, and the Philistines retired.

Amaziah, king of Judah, puffed up with some advantages he had obtained over the Edomites, sent a challenge to Joash, king of Israel, saying, "Come let us look one another in the face." 2 Kings xiv. 8, 9, 10. The king of Israel, without giving himself any disquiet about it, sent him a parable in answer: Amaziah would not hearken to his advice, but Judah was beaten. Benhadad, king of Syria, came with his army before Samaria, and sent to declare war against Ahab, king of Israel, saying, "Thy silver and thy gold is mine; thy wives also, and thy children, even the goodliest are mine." 1 Kings xx. 1, 3. Ahab at first submitted, but Benhadad becoming more arrogant, Ahab determined to resist him, and Benhadad failed of his purpose.

When a war was resolved on, all the people capable of bearing arms were assembled, or only part of them, according to the exigence of the case, and the necessity and importance of the enterprize: for it does not appear, that before the reign of David there were any regular troops in Israel. A general rendezvous was appointed, and a review was made of the people by tribes, and by families. When Saul, at the beginning of his reign, was informed of the cruel proposal made by the Ammonites to Jabesh-Gilead, he cut in pieces the oxen belonging to his plough-team, and sent dis severed members through the country, saying, "Whosoever cometh not forth after Saul and Samuel, to the relief of Jabesh-Gilead, so shall it be done unto his oxen." 1 Sam. xi. 7. —after this he marched to meet the enemy. When the children of Israel had heard of the crime committed by the inhabitants of Gibeah, against the wife of the Levite of Bethlehem, Judg. xx. 8. they resolved not to return to their houses till they had adequately punished it. They consulted the Lord, who appointed the tribe of Judah to lead the enterprize. They chose ten men out of every hundred, to bring provisions to the army; after which they proceeded to action.

In ancient times, those who went to war commonly carried their own provisions with them; hence these wars were generally of short continuance, because it was hardly possible to sustain a large a large body of troops long, with such provisions as each carried with him. When David, Jesse's younger son, stayed behind to look after his father's flocks, while his elder brothers accompanied Saul in the army, Jesse sent David with provisions to his brothers. 1 Sam. xvii. 13. We suppose that this way of making war prevailed under Joshua, the Judges, Saul, David at the beginning of his reign, the kings of Judah and Israel, successors to Rehoboam and Jeroboam; also, under the Maccabees, till the time of Simon Maccabeus, prince and high-priest of the Jews, who kept soldiers in pay. See 1 Macc. xiv. 32. Every one also provided his own arms. The kings of the Hebrews did not begin to form magazines of warlike implements till David.

The kings went to war in person, and in the earlier times they fought on foot; we do not read of horses, either for the general, or for the officers, under the Judges, Saul, or David. After this time they were not so scarce; and it appears that the kings of Judah and Israel headed their armies, riding in chariots. See CHARIOTS; also FRAGS. Nos. DCLXXV. et seq.

The officers of war among the Hebrews were, 1. The generalissimo of the armies, or the military prince,—such as Abner under Saul,—Joab under David, and—Benaiah under Solomon. 2. The princes of the tribes, or the princes of the fathers, or of the families of Israel, who were at the head of their tribes. 3. Princes of a thousand, or tribunes, captains of a hundred, heads of fifty men, thirdsmen, (in Hebrew shalishim,) whose functions are unknown: also decurions, or chiefs of ten men. 4. Shopherim, scribes or writers, a kind of commissaries, who kept the muster-roll of the troops; and, 5. Shoterim, or inspectors, who had authority to command the troops under their inspection.

WASHING, purification. See BAPTISM.

WASHING OF FEET. The Orientals used to wash the feet of strangers, who came off a journey, because they commonly walked with their legs bare, and their feet were defended by sandals only. So Abraham washed the feet of the three angels. Gen. xviii. 4. They washed the feet of Eliezer, and those who accompanied him, at the house of Laban, Gen. xxiv. 32. likewise those of Joseph's brethren, when they came into Egypt. Gen. xliii. 24. This office was commonly performed by servants and slaves. Abigail answers David, who sought her in marriage, that she should think it an honour to wash the feet of the king's servants. 1 Sam. xxv. 41. Our Saviour washed his apostles' feet, to set them an example of a perfect humility.

John xiii. 3, 6. When St. Paul recommends hospitality; he would have a widow, assisted by the church, to be one who had washed the feet of saints. 1 Tim. v. 10. In a moral sense, to wash the feet, signifies, to purify from earthly and carnal affections.

Our Saviour, after his last supper, gave his last lesson of humility, by washing his disciples' feet. John xiii. 5, 6. "Then cometh he to Simon Peter; and Peter saith unto him, Lord, dost thou wash my feet? Jesus answered him, If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me. Simon Peter saith unto him, Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head."

This threatening of our Saviour to Peter, If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me, gave occasion to several of the ancients to believe, that the washing of feet had something of the nature of baptism. St. Ambrose, de Myst. cap. 6. testifies, that in his time they washed the feet of those who were newly baptized, at their coming out of the holy font:—Ideo planta abluitur, ut hæreditaria peccata tollantur: nostra enim propria per baptismum relaxantur. He says on Psalm xlviii. Alia est iniquitas nostra, alia calcanei nostri. Unde Dominus discipulis pedes lavit, ut lavaret venena serpentis:—But, he adds, that what is cleansed by the washing of feet, is rather concupiscence, or inclination to sin, than sin itself. St. Austin quotes pretty nearly the same thing, from a work of St. Ambrose on Isaiah, which is now lost.

The custom of washing the feet of persons newly baptized was not peculiar to the church of Milan; it was observed in other places of Italy, in Gaul, in Spain, and in Africa. Some of the ancients have given it the name of a sacrament: St. Bernard and Ernardus, abbot of Bonneval were of this opinion. Gerard, bishop of Toul, A. D. 994, every day washed the feet of a certain number of poor men; Credens, ut est vera fides, criminum sordes abluere, uti multoties sanctum audiebat Præsulem certissime prædicare.

On Good Friday the Syrians celebrate the festival of washing of feet. The Greeks perform the sacred Niptere, or holy washing: and in the Latin church this ceremony is practised. The bishops, the abbots, and princes in many places, practise it in person. The council of Elvire, seeing the abuse that some persons made of it, by putting a confidence in it for remission of sins, suppressed it in Spain.

TO WASH THE HANDS. The Hebrews frequently washed their hands, see Mark vii. 3, 4. "For the Pharisees, and all the Jews, except they wash their hands oft, eat not, holding the tradition tradition of the elders. And when they come from the market, except they wash, they eat not." The Greek text might signify, that they washed their hands from the elbow to the ends of their fingers. Vide FRAGS. No. XXXII. Elisha poured water on the hands of Elijah, 2 Kings iii. 11. Pilate washed his hands as a protest of his innocency, in the unjust sentence forced from him against Jesus Christ. Matt. xxvii. 24.

Children were washed immediately after their birth. Ezek. xvi. 4. They also washed the dead, [immediately, as Christ, and] as Tabitha. Acts ix. 37. They washed their clothes when they would purify them from uncleanness, or prepare themselves for a particular sanctity. External washings were symbols of that internal purity and cleanness which God requires of those who approach to holy things, and those who serve him.

To wash one's feet in butter, Job xxix. 6. to wash one's clothes in wine, Gen. xlix. 11. to wash one's feet in the blood of the wicked, Psalm lviii. 10. are figurative and hyperbolical expressions; to signify great abundance of butter, of wine, of vengeance, &c.

WASHING-BALLS, Smigma. When Susanna went to bathe, she sent her maids to fetch oleum et smigmata, essence, soap, wash-balls, such compositions as women used, and still use, to perfume themselves, &c. Vide Psalms lx. 8. cviii. 9. also FRAGMENTS, No. DCLIX.

[WATCH. This word is taken, 1. for a period of time; 2. for the duty of watchfulness. Watchman is taken for 1. a military centinel; 2. for a person who proclaims the passage of time; 3. for a guard of a city. Vide FRAGS. Nos. CCLXIII. CCLXIV.]

WATCHERS. Sometimes this name is given to angels: Dan. iv. 10, 14. עִיר וְקָדִישׁ. A watchman and a holy one came down from heaven; Vigil et sanctus de cælo descendit.—And a little afterwards, sententia vigilum decretum est. The Chaldee עִיר hir, or Ir, translated watcher, according to Jerom, might give origin to Iris, the messenger of the gods. The Chaldeans conceived of these angels or watchers, as of a company of judges, who determined the fate of men. This appears from Dan. iv. 17. "This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones:"—the holy ones and watchers, are the same in these passages. The LXX. in Lam. iv. 14. Ἐπαλεύσιν οἱ ἑγρεγοροὶ αὐτῆς, read hirim, the watchers, instead of hivirim, the blind; as we now have it. The apocryphal book of Enoch often speaks of the egregori, or watchers; and the Syrians owned an order of angels in heaven, which they called egregori. It was these watchers who espoused the daughters of men. Gen. vi. 2. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DII.

WATERS OF JEALOUSY. See ADULTERY.

This mode of trial or proof, described by Moses in so exact and circumstantial a manner, is one of the most extraordinary things that can be imagined, and could not be practised without a constant and perpetual miracle. It cannot be doubted, but that the wiser men of the nation must have disapproved of this custom, and that Moses allowed it to the Jews only because of the hardness of their hearts; having probably been used to see such kinds of trials among the Egyptians, or other nations, and fearing worse, or greater violence, if this had not been permitted. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXIX.

It is plain, that the people of the East have long had a custom, of making those undergo several kinds of trial, whom they suspected of crimes, the discovery of which could not be effected in the usual way. The most common of these proofs are those by red-hot iron, and by boiling water. They are very frequent at this time in China. When a man is accused of a capital crime, he is asked, whether he is willing to undergo either of these trials? If he submits, they put upon his hand seven leaves from a certain tree, and upon those leaves they clap a red-hot iron. He holds it there for a certain time, and then throws it on the ground. They immediately put his hand into a leather pouch, which they seal with the seal of the magistrate. At the end of three days, if the hand is found to be sound and well, he is declared innocent, and his accuser is condemned to pay a mark of gold to the use of the prince. The trial by water is performed by throwing a ring into a kettle of boiling water: If the person accused can take it out from thence with his hand, without suffering any harm, he is pronounced innocent. A Voyage to China, in the Ninth Age, page 37. notes, page 159. Comp. Asiat. Research. vol. iv.

This way of proof was not unknown to Sophocles, Vide Antigone. ver. 274. and it was long used among Christians in Europe. Ducange Lexic. Ferrum candens. Juret. in Not. ad Yvon. Carnut. Baluz. in Not. ad Capitular. They even pretended to make it pass for a harmless and a religious rite; and we find masses and prayers said on these occasions. The Indians continue this practice. The Caffres oblige those who are suspected of any capital crime to swallow poison, to lick a hot iron, or to drink boiling water in which certain bitter herbs have been infused. The Negroes of Loango and of Guinea, Guinea, the Siamese and other Indians have the same superstition, and are thoroughly persuaded that these trials do no harm to any that are innocent.

WATER of the Feet: Urine. Isaiah xxxvi. 12. Ut bibant urinam pedum suorum.

WATERS often stand for posterity. Isaiah xlviii. 1. "Which are come forth out of the waters of Judah." Numb. xxiv. 7. "He shall pour the water out of his buckets, and his seed shall be in many waters." Prov. v. 15, 16. "Drink waters out of thine own cistern, and running waters out of thine own well. Let thy fountains be dispersed abroad, and rivers of waters in the streets."

WATERS of Merom. Vide MEROM.

WATERS. Great waters, in the language of the prophets, often denote a vast multitude of people. Rev. xvii. 15. "The waters which thou sawest, where the whore sitteth, are peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues."

WATERS of the Abyss. Waters of the sea, of rivers, streams concealed within the bowels of the earth; called also waters of the deep, to distinguish them from the waters of heaven; the clouds, the rain, the dew, which are called upper waters, separated from the lower by the firmament; i. e. the air, or heaven. Gen. i. 6, 7. vii. 11. Exod. xv. 5. Deut. viii. 7. xxxiii. 13. Isai li. 10, &c. Scripture says, the Lord has the abysses in his treasury; he has given them limits and boundaries, which they cannot pass.

WATERS of Contradiction. Numb. xx. 2, 3, &c. Moses tells us, that when the Israelites came to Kadesh, and were in want of water, they raised a sedition against him and his brother Aaron, who entered the tabernacle, and prostrating themselves, cried to the Lord. The Lord said to Moses, "Take thy rod, and call the people together, thou and thy brother Aaron, and speak to the rock before you, and it shall give you drink."

Moses therefore took his rod, and assembled the people before the rock, and said to them, "Hear, O ye rebels and infidels! Shall we be able to draw you water out of this rock?" Then Moses lifted up his hand, and striking the rock twice with his rod, there came forth water in abundance, so that all the people, and all their cattle, drank their fill. At this time the Lord said to Moses and Aaron, "Because you have not believed me, and because you have not sanctified me before the children of Israel, you shall not bring this people into the land that I have promised them." These were the waters of contradiction, where the children of Israel murmured against the Lord, and where he was sanctified in the midst of them. Instead of waters of contradiction, the Hebrew reads מַרִּיבָה, waters of Meribah, waters of quarrelling, of contention, of murmuring of the people against Moses and against God. [of Strife, Eng. Tr.]

It is enquired, in what consisted the sin of Moses on this occasion, which was so displeasing to God, that he deprived him of the honour of introducing his people into the Land of Promise. The Psalmist tells us, that Moses was soured, vexed, or troubled, at these murmurs of the people, and expressed some distrust by his words. Psal. cv. 32, 33. Irritaverunt eum ad aquas contradictionis, et vexatus est Moyses propter eos, et distinxit labiis suis: he erred with his lips. He shewed some doubt in the promises of the Lord. God had absolutely promised him, that he should bring water out of the rock; Moses made some scruple to believe it: Shall we be able to draw water out of this rock? He struck the rock twice; whereas God had only bid him speak to it. He was afraid, that on this occasion, God being provoked with his people, should refuse to fulfil his promises. Anima eorum variavit in me, says the prophet Zechariah; their soul was fluctuating, wavering, and irresolute. Zech. xi. 8.

They did not sanctify the Lord, they did not pay that honour due to him, by a strict, punctual, and faithful obedience to his words. They did not sanctify him before the people: they gave the people occasion to conceive too low an idea of the power and goodness of God; they did an injury, in some measure, to his power, by shewing so little confidence in it. Lastly, the Lord was sanctified in them; he caused his justice and his majesty to shine out upon them; he taught his people, in their instance, and by the punishment inflicted on them, in what manner he would be served and obeyed. And, indeed nothing is better adapted to strike awe and terror, and to shew us how far God is jealous of his glory, than the punishment of Moses and Aaron, in an affair that to us appears of but small importance.

WATERS of MARAH. See MARAH.

Faithful Waters, Isaiah xxxiii. 16. Waters that never fail, spring-waters that corrupt not; opposed to lying waters, Jer. xv. 18. [Sure waters, Eng. Tr.]

LIVING WATERS, spring waters, running waters, streams, in opposition to waters that stagnate in a cistern, or in a lake, which are dead waters.

As in Scripture, bread is put for all sorts of food, or solid nourishment, so water is used for all sorts of drink. The Moabites and Ammonites ites are reproached for not meeting the Israelites with bread and water, i. e. with proper refreshments. Deut. xxiii. 4. Nabal says, insulting David's messengers, "Shall I then take my bread and my water, and my flesh that I have killed for my shearers, and give it unto men, whom I know not whence they be?" 1 Sam. xxv. 11. Jeroboam's false prophet tells the prophet of the Lord, 1 Kings xiii. 18. "An angel spake unto me by the word of the Lord, saying, Bring him back with thee into thy house, that he may eat bread and drink water."

Strange waters, stolen waters, Prov. ix. 17. denote unlawful pleasure with strange women. The Israelites are reproached with having forsaken the fountain of living water, to quench their thirst at broken cisterns; Jer. ii. 13. i. e. with having quitted the worship of God for that of false and abominable deities.

WATERS sometimes denote afflictions and misfortunes: Lam. iii. 54. So the Psalmist, "Save me, O God, for the waters are come in unto my soul." Psal. lxix. 1. See Psal. cxxiv. 4, 5. cxvii. 16.

Also waters sometimes stand for tears and moisture: "O that my head were waters, and mine eyes fountains of tears. Jer. ix. 1. And Per cuncta genua fluent aquæ, Ezek. vii. 17. xxi. 7.

[WAVE-OFFERING, was distinguished from the heave-offering, in that it was waved to the right hand and to the left hand, by the party who offered it, as taught by the priest, before the Lord, at the time it was offered; whereas the heave-offering was lifted up on high, and then let down again. Why this particular action was appointed, may rather be conjectured than determined. We read of the wave-breast, Numb. vi. 26. the wave-shoulder, Lev. vii. 30. viii. 29. ix. 21. x. 15. the wave-sheaf, Lev. xxiii. 12. The jealousy-offering also was waved, Numb. v. 25. a whole lamb was waved. Lev. xiv. 21.]

WAY, or PATH, Via. [The Jewish lawyers determined that a private way was in breadth four cubits; a public way was sixteen cubits. Peah, cap. 2. hal. i. Comp. Matt. vii. 13.] This word is also taken

1. In a moral sense, for conduct. Make your path straight. The paths of the wicked are crooked. The Lord knows the way of the just, &c.

2. For the laws of the Lord. To follow the ways of the Lord, to forsake the ways of the Lord: Lord, guide me in thy paths, &c.

3. For custom, manners, course of life.—All flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth. The way of all flesh, the custom of all nations, the manner of all the earth, the ways of the children of Adam.

4. For the conduct of the Lord in respect of us. "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts." Isaiah lv. 8, 9. "The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his way, before his works of old." Prov. viii. 22. "The meek will he teach his way." Psal. xxv. 9.

5. We find, throughout Scripture, these kinds of expression; the way of peace, of justice, of iniquity, of truth, of darkness, &c.; they need no explanation.

6. To go the way of all the earth, is put to signify dying and the grave. Josh. xxiii. 14.

A hard way expresses the way of sinners, a life of impiety: Judg. ii. 19. In the book of Wisdom the wicked complain, that they have pursued difficult ways, rugged, painful, chap. v. 7. Comp. Eccls. xxxii. 25. In a contrary sense, the ways of God, the ways of piety, are often described as strait, narrow, difficult to find, and to walk in. Propter verba labiorum tuorum ego custodivi vias duras: Psal. xvii. 4. I have guided myself with the same circumspection as a man that walks over precipices. And Jesus Christ, Matt. vii. 14. "Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, that leadeth unto life; and few there be who find it."

The way of life. The Psalmist says, xvi. 11. "Thou wilt shew me the path of life." Thou hast taught me to know thy will, and thy commandments, which give life: to the keeping of which thou hast annexed the promise of long life; of eternal life. Jesus Christ, by his resurrection, was shewn, and hath shewed us, the way of life, of eternal life, a way before unknown to any man whatever. The Wise Man, Prov. vi. 23. says, metaphorically, The commandments of God, his laws, are a shining light; and the reproofs of a wise man are the way of life. They lead us to life, to a long and happy [a spiritual and divine] life. The Old Testament is full of such promises; but the enlightened saints raised their hopes and contemplations to a life far above this. See Prov. x. 17.

Way is taken for all the means by which a thing is done, or by which it happens to us. Job says, xxxviii. 19, 24, 25. "Where is the way where light dwelleth?" the way that leads to its palace. "Who hath divided a water-course for the over-flowing of water, or a way for the lightning and thunder?" The Wise Man acknowledges, Prov. xxx. 19, 20. that among things which appear difficult to him, are the way of an eagle in the air, the way of a serpent on the earth, the way of a ship at sea, and the way of a man in his youth: Via viri in adolescentula: [with a maid. Eng. Tr. Vide ALMAN.] And Ecclesiasticus, xi. 5. saith, You know not the way of the wind. [Comp. John iii. 8.]

In certain passages it is said, God turns us from his ways: "Thou hast made us to err from thy way; thou hast hardened our hearts that we should not fear thee." Isaiah lxiii. 17. And the Psalmist says, xliii. 17. "Thou hast turned aside our paths from thy way," &c. But these expressions only intend that God suffers the enormities of men, which he might hinder, if the laws of his justice and mercy required it, and if men, by their depravity and hardness of heart, did not repel his grace and mercy. God does not harden the sinner by promoting his wickedness, but by restraining his own omnipotent mercy.

The Pharisees tell Jesus Christ by their disciples, Matt. xxii. 16. "Master, we know that thou art true, and teachest the way of God in truth:" i. e. the true principles of religion, without accepting any man's person. "Prepare the way of the Lord," Mark, i. 3. dispose your hearts and minds to receive the Messiah; and to hear the words of life. Our Saviour says, that he is "the way, the truth, and the life," John xiv. 6. He teaches the way to heaven; he is the absolute pattern of perfection; he is the essential truth, and the fountain of truth; he is the life of the soul. [He is the way, in the same sense as he is the door—to heaven and glory.]

St. Paul departed from Jerusalem with a resolution of seizing all such as should make profession of this way: i. e. Christianity; Acts ix. 2. The way of truth is blasphemed by heretics, says St. Peter, 2 Epist. ii. 2. The truths of the Christian religion are corrupted by false teachers. "They have gone in the way of Cain," they have followed his example. Jude ver. 2.

WEDDING. See MARRIAGE.

WEEK. The Hebrews had three sorts of weeks:—

1. Weeks of days, reckoned from one sabbath to another.

2. Weeks of years, reckoned from one sabbatical year to another; and consisting of seven years.

3. Weeks of seven times seven years, or of forty-nine years; reckoned from one jubilee to another. This may be seen in the Constitutions of Moses, and in the practice of the Jews.

WEEKS OF DANIEL. It is agreed, that the famous seventy weeks of Daniel are weeks of years, and not of days. But some have taken them for seventy years; Origen, tract. 29. in Matt. so that the seventy weeks would contain four thousand nine hundred years. Some Rabbins make them of forty-nine years, or from one jubilee to another; so that they would make three thousand four hundred and thirty years. Others make them to consist of an hundred years: so that the seventy weeks would contain seven thousand years. But the generality of interpreters suppose them to consist of seven lunar, or Hebrew, years; and by this reckoning, the seventy weeks make four hundred and ninety years. Vide Dan. ix. 24—27.

There are many different hypotheses concerning the beginning and end of Daniel's seventy weeks; even among Christian writers, who believe this prophecy marks the time of the birth, and death, of our Saviour Jesus Christ. Some begin them from the first year of Darius the Mede, which is the time of Daniel's prophecy, and conclude them at the profanation of the temple, under the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes. 1 Macc. i. 17. Joseph. Antiq. lib. x. cap. ult. Sixt. Senens. Bibl. lib. viii. Est. in Dan. Marsham, Can. Egypt. Sacul. 18. Harduin, de 70. hebdomad. Daniel. Others begin them from the first year of Cyrus at Babylon, and end them at the destruction of the temple by the Romans. Clem. Alex. Stromat. lib. i. Quidam apud Euseb. Demonst. lib. viii. Alii. Others fix their beginning at the first year of Darius the Mede, in which this revelation was made to Daniel; and their end at the birth of Jesus Christ. Julius Africanus (lib. v. Temporum, apud Hieron. in Dan. ix.) began the seventy weeks at the second year of Artaxerxes, who allowed Nehemiah's visit to Judea, with commission to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, Nch. i. 1. ii. 5. and he terminated them at the death of the Messiah; which happened (according to him) in the fifteenth year of Tiberius. This hypothesis, or system, seems to be the most rational of any proposed by the ancients, and is adhered to by commentators in general.

The ancient Jews, as Jerom reports, in Dan. ix. began the seventy weeks of Daniel, at Darius the Mede, and ended them at the destruction of Jerusalem. The eight remaining weeks they determined at the utter dispersion of the Jews under the emperor Adrian. The modern Jews are not agreed among themselves; they fear the demonstration from this prophecy, that the Messiah is already come, and that their expectation of him is hopeless. Some pronounce a curse against those who compute the time; saying, it is in vain to expect the Messiah, who came long ago. Others believe he is not come, but that he would have come a great while ago, if the sins of the Jews had not prevented him. Others place the beginning of the seventy weeks at the destruction of the first temple, by Nebuchadnezzar, and their end at the destruction of the second temple by Titus. Between these two events they reckon but four hundred and ninety years; which is a proof of their great ignorance in chronology. They believe the desolation of Jerusalem is to continue till the war of Gog and Magog, who are to be destroyed by the Messiah. Thus it is understood by Jarchi and Abrabanel, with the chief of the Rabbins.

The system of Julius Africanus is adopted, some small particulars excepted, by the greater part of interpreters and chronologists, whether Romanists, or Protestants. This places the first year of the seventy weeks at the twentieth year of Artaxerxes Longimanus; who commissioned Nehemiah to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem. From thence to the last week, that in which Jesus, the Messiah, was put to death, are reckoned seventy weeks, or four hundred and ninety lunar years.

There are some variations in the calculation of these years; but the greatest difference does not exceed nine or ten years. Petavius, in his twelfth book De doctrina Temporum, reconciles all these differences, by shewing, that the words of Daniel, from the going forth of the word to rebuild Jerusalem, ought to be understood of the complete execution of the order to rebuild Jerusalem, which was performed by Nehemiah. He shews also, that the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, Neh. i. 1. ought to be explained, not of the twentieth year of the reign of Artaxerxes alone, but of his twentieth year, from the time when his father associated him in the kingdom; ten years before his death. These ten years deducted from the number that elapsed between the decree of Artaxerxes in favour of Nehemiah, and the death of Jesus Christ, deliver chronologers out of their perplexities, and dispel the difficulties that arise from the ten supernumerary years.

This prophet adds, that after the death of Christ, "the people that had renounced him should be no more—that the temple should be destroyed by the foreign prince and people,—that this war should be attended by the abomination of desolation." This clearly foretels the dissolution of the covenant between God and the incredulous and murdering Jews; the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple; with the dispersion of the Jewish nation, by the Romans. The abomination of desolation, expresses the ruin, the razing, the profanation of the temple; and the Roman eagles set up in the holy place. "During this last week the covenant shall be confirmed with many." Jesus Christ died in the middle of the seventieth week, and by his death was the covenant sealed and confirmed to many; i. e. to those who believed on him. "In the midst of the week the oblations and sacrifices should cease." Not that they really ceased at the very moment of our Saviour's death, but from that time they were abrogated.

"The abomination of desolation shall be seen in the temple, and this desolation shall continue to the end." The destruction of the temple, its rites, and priesthood, did not happen till [nearly] forty years after our Saviour's death; but it was determined, and in some manner begun, from the moment of his death. The destruction of the Jews was suspended for some years, to give them time to return to God by repentance. After this last calamity their nation could never recover itself again. "This desolation shall continue to the end." Yet so that there always will be Jews, dispersed all the world over, to bear testimony to the truth of the Scriptures and prophecies, and as a monument of God's vengeance on an ungrateful and incredulous nation. Comp. FRAGS. No. DLXXIV.

WEeping. The ancient Hebrews wept, and shewed their trouble openly, in mourning and affliction. They were not of opinion, that courage and greatness of soul consist in seeming insensible under adversity, or in restraining tears. They indulged those natural movements, and were not ashamed to testify their grief by weeping. The heroes in Homer do the same. It was even looked on as a great misfortune to one not to be bewailed at his funeral. Job, xxvii. 15. says of the wicked man, "His widows shall not weep." And the Psalmist, lxxviii. 64. speaking of the death of Hophni and Phinehas, says, "Their priests fell by the sword, and their widows made no lamentation." God forbids Ezekiel, chap. xxiv. 16. to weep, or to express any sorrow for the death of his wife; to shew that the Jews should be reduced to so great misfortunes, that they should not have liberty [or inclination] even to bewail themselves.

Weeping men and weeping women. The ancient Hebrews hired men and women to weep at funerals. So says Jeremiah, ix. 17, 18. "Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, Consider ye, and call for the mourning women, that they may come; and send for cunning women, that they may come. And let them make haste, and take up a wailing for us, that our eyes may run down with tears, and our eyelids gush out with waters. For a voice of wailing is heard out of Sion."

And,

And, Amos v. 16. "Wailing shall be in all streets, and they shall say in all the high-ways, Alas! Alas! And they shall call the husbandman to mourning, and such as are skilful of lamentation to wailing." The weeping men and women of Israel sung the Lamentations that Jeremiah composed on the death of the pious king Josiah, 2 Chron. xxxv. 25. The Jewish doctors teach that at the burying of the mother of a family, the husband must have at least two players on instruments, besides a hired weeping woman. Talmud. tit. Cetuboth. cap. 4.

It appears by Luke vii. 32. that when any one met a funeral procession, it was expected he should mingle his tears and mournful songs with those who bewailed. "We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned to you, and ye have not wept." Jesus, son of Sirach, insinuates, Eccclus. xii. 5. that the company attending the corpse, and the weeper, took a circuit round the place. "Man shall go to the house of his eternity, or the grave, [his long home,] and the mourners shall go about the place." And the prophet Zechariah, describing a famous mourning, says, that the families shall go separately in troops to make their lamentation, the men on one side, and the women on the other, &c. The prophets had a custom, after having proclaimed the calamities of a nation or country, to compose a song of mourning, as it were, proper to be sung by the weeping men and women on the day when the event came to pass. See Jer. ix. 10, 18, 20. Ezek. xxvi. 17. xxvii. 2. xxxii. 2.

The vale of Tears, Psalm lxxxiv. 7. in the moral sense, signifies this world, which, to good men, presents only an occasion of grief and tears, because of the disorders that prevail herein, of the continual dangers to which we are exposed, and the absence of those eternal good things which we ought to long after. But in the literal sense, this valley of tears, or, according to the Hebrew, of Bocha, or Bochim, was not far from Jerusalem, and was remarkable for its barrenness and dryness. The Psalmist says therefore, "Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee, in whose heart are the ways of them, who, passing through the valley of Baca, or tears, make it a well, the rain also filleth the pools." Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. CLXIX. CCCIV.

The place of Tears, Judges ii. 5. This is the same as that just mentioned; which is noticed 2 Sam. v. 23. under the name of the place of mulberry-trees, in Hebrew, Bochim.

The bread of affliction, or of Tears, Psalm lxxx. 5. "And, my tears have served me for food day and night," Psalm xlii. 3. These expressions admirably represent the temper of a soul overwhelmed with trouble; and which, being sensible of the outrages committed against God, is in a manner fed with tears, and finds a kind of comfort in them.

The prophet Isaiah, xvi. 9. speaking of the troubles of Moab, says, אֲרִיךְ דְּמַעְתִּי חֶשְׁבֹן וְאֵלְעָלָה, "I will water thee with my tears, O Heshbon and Elealeh." Literally, I will make thee drunk with my tears; I foretel that you shall be drunk with tears. My tears, is the tears I foretel to you. I will make you drunk, I declare to you, that you shall be drunken. I imagine here, that the prophet plays on the words; and instead of Medeba, a city of Moab, near to Heshbon and Elealeh, he has purposely put Dimeath, which signifies tears, and has some affinity with Medeba. I shall intoxicate Dimeath, the city of tears, as also Heshbon and Elealeh.

Malachi, ii. 13. upbraids the Jews with having covered the altar of the Lord with tears. You are the cause that my altar is bathed in the tears of your wives, whom you have put away without just reason. You have in some measure drowned it with tears, and made it resound with cries and weeping. "Covering the altar of the Lord with tears, with weeping, and with crying out, insomuch that he regardeth not the offering any more, or receiveth it with good will at your hand. Because the Lord hath been witness between thee and the wife of thy youth, against whom thou hast dealt treacherously, yet is she thy companion, and the wife of thy covenant."

WEIGHTS. The Hebrews weighed all the gold and silver they used in trade. The general word to denote a weight is a stone: Deut. xxv. 13, 15. "Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights;" Heb. a stone and a stone. This forbids two different weights; one too heavy, to buy with; the other too light, to sell with; but thou shalt have only one stone of perfection and justice, i. e. one true weight. "Divers weights and divers measures are alike abomination to the Lord." Prov. xx. 10. God condemns fraud and injustice in traffic. The shekel, the half shekel, the talent, are not only denominations of monies, of certain values, in gold and silver, but also of certain weights. When Moses expresses the drugs to compose the perfume for the golden altar, he says that they were to take the weight of five hundred shekels of myrrh, &c. Exod. xxx. 23. 2 Sam. xiv. 26. it is said of Absalom's hair, that it weighed two hundred shekels. The same may be observed of the word talent, in Hebrew, kikkar; it is used to express a considerable weight [or value.]

WEIGHT of the Sanctuary, or Weight of the Temple. Moses speaks of this weight, Exod. xxx. 13, 24. Lev. v. 5. Numb. iii. 50. vii. 19. xviii. 16, &c. when there was occasion to express a just, public, and determinate weight. Several learned men have pretended, that the weight of the Sanctuary was heavier than the common weight; others, on the contrary, think that the common weights were heavier than those of the sanctuary. They are farther divided about the value and weight of the two shekels, and about the distinction between the shekel of the Sanctuary, and the public shekel; or the shekel of the king, and the common shekel. 2 Sam. xiv. 26. Ducentis sicutis pondere publico. Heb. pondere regis. Some think the weights of the sanctuary, and the king's weight, are put by way of opposition to the weight of foreign nations, as the Egyptians, the Canaanites, the Syrians. Others, that the king's weight means the Babylonian weight; and the weight of the sanctuary the Jewish weight: that till the captivity of Babylon there was no variety among the weights of the Jews; that the only passage which mentions the king's weight was either written or corrected, since the captivity. Vide TALENT, and MONEY.

Our best critics maintain, that the distinction of the weight of the sanctuary, and the public weight, is but imaginary, the only difference being, that the standards were preserved in the temple, or the town-house, and those of merchants and citizens were derived from thence. This seems to us to have the greater certainty. We see by 1 Chron. xxiii. 29. that there was a priest in the temple, who had the weights and measures under his care. Moses appoints, that all things valued by their price in silver, should be rated by the weight of the sanctuary. Lev. xxvii. 25. He mentions no difference between this shekel of twenty oboli, or twenty gerahs, and the common shekel. Ezekiel, xlv. 12. speaking of the ordinary weights and measures used in traffic among the Jews, says, that the shekel weighed twenty oboli, or gerahs:—it was therefore equal to the weight of the sanctuary. Neither Josephus, nor Philo, nor Jerom, nor any ancient author, speaks of this pretended distinction between the weights of the temple, and those in common use.

Besides, the custom of preserving the standards of weights and measures in temples is not peculiar to the Hebrews. The Egyptians, as Clement Alexandrinus informs us, had an officer in the college of priests, whose business it was to examine all sorts of measures, and to take care of the originals. The Romans had the same custom. Fannius, de Amphora;

Amphora fit cubitis, quam ne violare liceret, Sacrare Jovi Tarpeo in monte Quirites.

The emperor Justinian, Novell. 128. cap. 15. decreed, that standards of weights and measures should be kept in Christian churches.

WEIGHT, or BURDEN, onus, Hebrew, מַשָּׂא massa, is commonly used in the prophets for a disastrous prophecy. The burden of Babylon, the burden of Nineveh, of Moab, of Egypt. The Jews asking Jeremiah, captiously, What is the burden of the Lord? He answered them, You are that burden; you are, as it were, insupportable to the Lord; he will throw you on the ground, and break you to pieces, and you shall become the reproach of the people. Jer. xxiii. 33—40.

The burden of the desert of the sea, Isaiah, xxi. 1. A calamitous prophecy against Babylon, which stood on the Euphrates, and was watered as by a sea; and which, from being great and populous, as it then was, would soon be reduced to a solitude. Comp. FRAGS. on BABYLON.

The burden of the valley of vision, Isaiah, xxii. 1. A dreadful vision against Jerusalem, called, by way of irony, The Valley of Vision, though it stood on an eminence. It is called of Vision, or of Moriah, because it is thought that on Mount Moriah, Abraham was about to sacrifice Isaac. Vide VISION.

The burden of the beasts of the south, Isaiah xxx. 6. The prophecy in which we find these words plainly respects Judea. But we cannot perceive on what account this inscription is found in this place. It may easily happen, that copiers supplied it; for it seems to make no sense with the context, but, on the contrary, interrupts and suspends it. One may thus read the text of Isaiah, ver. 4, 5. The Jews sent their ambassadors as far as Tanis and Hanes; but they were confounded when they saw that these people were not in a condition to assist them. (The burden of the beasts of the south.) They went, I say, "into the land of trouble and anguish, from whence come the young and old lion, the viper and fiery flying serpent; they will carry their riches upon the shoulders of young asses, and their treasures upon the bunches of camels, to a people that shall not profit them." [q. a marginal note, crept into the text?]

The stone of weight, or burden, mentioned Zechariah xii. 3. "In that day will I make Jerusalem a burdensome stone for all people. All that that burden themselves with it shall be cut in pieces, though all the people of the earth be gathered together against it." Those that would lift it shall be hurt [strain themselves] by it. All nations around Jerusalem tried their strength against it; the Assyrians, the Chaldeans, the Persians, the Egyptians, &c. but all these had been hurt by the Jews. They have taken the city, it is true, but they paid dear for their victory by their losses. Jerom, on Zach. xii. observes, that in the cities and villages of Palestine, there was an old custom, which continued even to his time, to have great and heavy round stones, which the young people lifted up as high as they could, by way of exercise, and to try their strength. He assures us moreover, that in the citadel at Athens, near the statue of Minerva, he had seen an iron ball of very great weight, and which he could not move but with difficulty, with which they heretofore used to try the strength of the Athleta, that their powers might be known, and that they might not be too unequally matched. Many think that the stone of Zeheleth, 1 Kings i. 9. was one of these stones of burden; and Ecclesiasticus, vi. 21. alludes to this custom, when he says, "She will lie upon him as a mighty stone of trial, and he will cast her from him ere it be long."

The weight, or burden of the day, Matt. xx. 12. expresses the labour and toil of the day, during many hours, especially the meridian heat.

A weight of glory, of which St. Paul speaks, 2 Cor. iv. 17. is opposed to the lightness of the evils of this life. The troubles we endure are really of no more weight than a feather, or of no weight at all, if compared to the weight or intenseness of that glory, which shall be hereafter a compensation for them. [Beside this, the apostle alludes to the double meaning of the Hebrew word chabod, which signifies not only weight, but glory: Glory, i.e. splendour, is in this world the lightest thing in nature; but in the other world it may be real, at once substantial and radiant; q. a weight of glory.]

WELL, or SPRING. There is frequent mention of wells in Scripture, and under this name fountains are generally included, whose sources issue out of the ground, and bubble up as from the bottom of a well. Such is the well spoken of by the spouse, Cant. iv. 15. A fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and streams from Lebanon. About a league from Tyre is shewn a well of living water, which they pretend to be that alluded to by the spouse. Jacob's well, was near Shechem, or Sychar, and is called the fountain of Jacob. John iv. 6. Here our Saviour had a conversation with the woman of Samaria. Afterwards a church was built over this fountain: and Jerom notices it in his letter called, The Epitaph of Paula. Antoninus Martyr saw it afterwards in the sixth century, Adamnanus in the seventh, and Villibaldus in the eighth. Reland, Palestin. lib. iii.

Heretofore, in the plain or vale of Siddim, or Sodom, i.e. the plain now possessed by the lake of Sodom, there were great numbers of slime-pits, or wells of bitumen; whence they procured pitch and bitumen, which is still found in the salt waters of the lake Asphaltites. Gen. xiv. 10.

Moses speaks of the well called Beer-lahai-roi, or the "well of the living and seeing," between Kadesh and Bered, which the angel shewed to Hagar in the wilderness, to quench the drought of her son Ishmael, who was in great danger of dying with thirst. Gen. xvi. 14. In that country, where water is very scarce, they conceal their wells by covering their mouths with a stone, and that stone with sand, that strangers may not use them. Sometimes there is great quarrelling and fighting among the shepherds, and the country people, on account of a well. See in Genesis xxvi. 15, 20, 21, 32. the contests between the people of Abimelech, king of Gerar, and those of Isaac.

At Askalon they shew travellers certain wells, of an admirable structure, which they pretend were constructed by Abraham and Isaac. Origen, contra Cels. lib. iii. Euseb. ad vocem Φεαρ. Antonin. Martyr. Itinerar. Vide Reland, Palestin. lib. iii. p. 589.

The Hebrews call a well כּוּם, beer; whence this word is often compounded with proper names: as—Beer-sheba, Beeroth-bene-jaakan, Beeroth, Beerah, &c.

Those who have seen the wells in the deserts of Arabia, say, that these wells, or basins, are nearly of the same form. Relation of the Caravans, printed at Nancy. They are dug into the rock, their mouths are about eighteen palms, or six feet in diameter, and they are from nineteen to twenty feet in depth. Some have affirmed that they use the compass to discover them; because in this country there are neither cities nor high-ways, nor other landmarks by which they may be found, without correct and constant acquaintance with them. So that none but the native Arabs of the country, or those that have been long slaves there, can know them. They generally go to them in the night-time, because of the danger of being met by the Arabs; and besides, they must fill their vessels in haste, for fear of who may come after them, with whom they would be obliged to contend for it. The water of these wells is very clear, clear, and so cool that they dare not drink it alone. They mingle wine with it; but it is soon warm in a climate so hot as this is. It is observed, that it grows sour when carried out of these deserts, and when they enter Egypt or India; but recovers itself again when brought back into its own climate. Sometimes the Arabians, out of malice, fill up the wells, by throwing sand into them; and sometimes they destroy the springs, or infect the waters, by throwing carrion into them, to hinder the caravans from their supplies of water. Vide FRAGMENTS, Nos. LXX. CXII. CXVII.

Our travellers speak with great admiration of Joseph's well, which is still to be seen at Cairo. [But it is the work of Joseph Saladin, the Mahomedan Sovereign; not of the patriarch Joseph.]

[WEST, in Judea, was toward the great sea, or Mediterranean; in other words, to a person looking east it was behind him: and when the cardinal points of the heavens are referred to, it is under a supposition that a spectator directs his face toward the rising sun.]

WHALE, the greatest of fishes known. Pliny, lib. xxxii. cap. 1. says, that whales have been seen of six hundred foot long, and three hundred and sixty foot thick. And Solinus, cap. 52. writes that there have been seen some of eight hundred foot long. Others have said, that the whale could swallow up a ship with its rigging. Dionys. Perieget. ver. 603. Priscian. Festus Avienus,

Protenus hæc ipsas absorbent fauce carinas,
Involvuntque simul mox monstra natantia nantes.

But these are fables, and extravagant exaggerations. Father Tetre says, that in more than twelve thousand leagues that he had sailed, he never saw any that seemed above fifty or sixty foot long. We are assured, however, that in America there are some so large, that they measure ninety or a hundred foot from head to tail. And it is acknowledged, that the whales in the North Seas are larger than those on the coast of Guinea, or in the Mediterranean. [And might be much larger formerly; before the harpoon cut them off long before the natural term of their life.]

In Scripture there is often mention made of the cetus, or whale. But the Hebrew תנינ, thannim, translated whale, includes all large fishes, whether of rivers, or of the sea. The leviathan, Job xl. 20. by which several interpreters understand the whale, rather signifies the crocodile. Lastly, the fish that swallowed Jonah was probably the carcharias, great shark, or sea dog. See FISH, and FRAGMENTS, Nos. CXLV. CXLVI. CCXVII. See also PLATES, TANNIM.

The whale brings forth her young alive, as other perfect animals: one, or two at most; which she nourishes by the breast, with great affection. [Therefore, is not a true fish.]

Whales have generally no teeth, but only strainers, or whiskers, in the mouth, of about a span in breadth, and fourteen or fifteen feet long, which end in fringes; these at top are set in the palate, and ranged according to their different magnitudes.—These extend or contract the cheeks of the creature, which are sometimes so large, that they are able to contain the little whales newly born, when it blows a storm, as Olaus pretends.

They are nourished by a froth which they suck from the sea; and by some little marine animals, as the sea-flea, the sea-spider, anchovies, [?] seaweed [the medusa, Lin.] Yet some species have teeth; and in their bellies have been found thirty or forty cod-fish.

[WHEAT, is a kind of corn well-known. It has been justly observed by the ancients as well as moderns, that as this is the principal and most valuable kind of grain for the service of man, so it will produce in almost any part of the world: it grows well, not only in temperate climates, but in hot and in cold climates also; and in places where it is not native, but is introduced and cultivated by fresh settlers, it succeeds as well as where it has been long domesticated: Wheat sown in America, north or south, produces as large crops as in Europe. I do not presume to say to what extent this property of wheat might enter into our Lord's comparison of himself to this grain; but the "much fruit" of the simile should not be restrained to that age, or to that country, wherein our Lord was native; nor to this age, or this country, but is common to the world at large.

It is understood, also, that there is a peculiar propriety in the description of a grain of wheat as dying, i. e. being wholly exhausted, when in the ground, in order to its future fertility. In whatever manner other grains fructify, a grain of wheat, it is said, is dissolved into a kind of pulp, without which dissolution of itself, which may very properly be called dying, "it brings forth no fruit."]

WHEEL. Scripture frequently mentions, 1. the wheels of chariots of war; 2. of chariots used in threshing corn; and 3. the wheels of the chariot of the Lord, which appeared to Ezekiel; and to Daniel: these were of a wonderful magnitude, beauty and splendor. Ezekiel says, says, that they were living and animated; full of eyes, or inlaid with precious stones and jewels, that glistened like eyes, and wheel within wheel: whether the wheels are to be conceived of as one within another, as a smaller within a larger; or, that both were of the same dimensions, crossing at right angles, making a wheel that might move every way. See CHERUBIM and FRAGMENTS, No. CLII.

The violence and precipitation of the wicked is represented in Scripture under the idea of a wheel that turns with great impetuosity. Psalm lxxxiii. 13. 1 Sam. xxv. 29. When the Psalmist describes the destruction of Pharaoh and his army, at their passage into the Red Sea, he says, that the arrows of the Lord, or his lightning, were darted forth, and that the voice of his thunder broke out, to overthrow the wheels of the Egyptians.

Solomon, describing enigmatically the effects of old age, says, The wheel shall be broken at the cistern. Eccl. xii. 6. This may be understood of the natural passage of the urine, and the organ of generation, which then loseth its strength. [Rather of the action of the heart and blood.] St. James says, iii. 6. Vulg. that the tongue sets on fire the wheel, or course, of nature, or of life. Our life may be justly compared to a wheel, because of its inconstancy and volubility: and the tongue creates abundance of sin and misery in this mutable life.

WHEEL, POTTER'S. Jer. xviii. 13. See POTTER'S WHEELS.

WICKED. Malus, Malignus. The wicked one taken absolutely, is generally put for the devil: deliver us from the wicked [evil] one. Matt. vi. 13. "Then cometh the wicked one, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart." Matt. xiii. 19. The wicked, in the plural, signifies perverse and sinful men. The evil day, Ephes. vi. 13. is the day of temptation, or trial; the day in which one is most in danger of doing evil. The evil eye, signifies jealousy, envy, or sordid niggardliness, being opposed to liberality and charity. [The evil eye is perhaps, a grudging, or malign aspect; but, certainly, in the East, they believe the eye to have great powers of striking the party looked on; and perhaps the phrase alludes to this:—a mischievous—malignant—injurious—direction of the eye,—q. Ex-shot: as our poets speak, "darting malignant fires."] An evil name, beati eritis cum egerint nomen vestrum tanquam malum, &c. Happy are ye when they shall speak evil of you, and your reputation shall be ill-treated on my account.

WIDOW. Among the Hebrews, even before the law, a widow who had no child by her husband, was to marry the brother of her deceased spouse, in order to raise up a child who might inherit his goods, and perpetuate his name and family. See LEVIRATE. We find the practice of this custom before the law, in the person of Tamar, who married successively Er and Onan, sons of Judah, and who was likewise to have married Shelah, the third son of this patriarch, after the two former were dead without issue. Gen. xxxviii. 6—11. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXX.

The law that appoints these marriages is Deut. xxv. 5, &c.

Two motives prevailed to the enacting of this law. The first was, the continuation of estates in the same family; the other was to perpetuate a man's name in Israel. It was deemed a great misfortune for a man to die without an heir, or to see his inheritance pass into another family. They had but little regard to the indecency there might seem to be, in making a brother-in-law to marry a sister-in-law; though this in any other case was prohibited. Probably they might consider a marriage as not consummated when there was no procreation of children. This law was not confined to brothers-in-law only, but was extended to more distant relations of the same line; as we see in the example of Ruth, who married Boaz after her rejection by a nearer kinsman.

WIDOWHOOD, as well as barrenness, was a kind of shame and reproach in Israel. Isaiah, liv. 4. says, "Thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth, passed in celibacy and barrenness, and shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood any more." It was presumed, that a woman of merit and reputation might have found a husband, either in the family of her deceased husband, if he died childless; or in some other family, if he had left children. It is true, indeed, that a widow was commended, who, from affection to her first husband, declined a second marriage, and continued in mourning and widowhood, as was the case of Judith.

It was thought the greatest misfortune that could happen to a man, to die, and not be bewailed by his widow, i. e. without receiving the solemn honours of sepulture, of which the tears and praises of the widow made a chief part. The wicked and his children shall die, says Job, "and their widows shall not mourn for them." chap. xxvii. 15. The Psalmist, speaking of the lamentable death of Hophni and Phineas, observes, as a great disaster, that they were not bewailed by their widows. Psalm lxxviii. 64.

Vidua

Viduae eorum non plorabantur, or rather non plorabant, according to the Hebrew.

God frequently recommends to his people to be very careful in relieving the widow and orphan. Ezech. xxi. 22. Deut. x. 18. xiv. 29. et passim. St. Paul would have us honour widows, that are widows indeed, and desolate; 1 Tim. v. 3, &c. i. e. the bishop should have a great regard for them, and supply them in their necessity; for this is often signified by the verb to honour. God forbids his high-priest to marry a woman who is either a widow, or divorced. Lev. xxi. 14.

Formerly there were widows in the Christian church, who, because of their poverty, were placed on the list of persons to be provided for at the expence of the church. There were others, who had certain employments in the church; as, to visit sick women, to assist women at baptism, and to do several things which decency would not permit to the other sex. St. Paul did not allow any woman to be chosen into this number, unless she were threescore years old at least. 1 Tim. v. 9. Such must have been married but once; must produce sufficient testimony of their good works; must have given good education to their children; must have exercised hospitality; washed the feet of the saints; and bestowed succour on the miserable and afflicted. He forbids that young widows should be admitted among these, [or, at least, among such as were on the church-list for maintenance.]

[It is remarkable, that Ignatius, in his epistle to the Smyrneans, salutes the virgins who are called widows; whence it should seem that unmarried women bore office of some kind in the church. They are thought to be deaconesses by Vossius and Cotelerius; which, however, seems to be contrary to the directions of the apostle to Timothy and Titus, who expects the deaconesses to be married women, or such as had been married.]

Scripture proposes several examples of real widows, who lived in the practice of piety, in retirement, and humiliation. Such were Judith, Tabitha, Anna, daughter of Phanuel, the mother of the seven Maccabees, the widow of Sarepta, who entertained and fed Elijah, &c. Jesus Christ reproves the Pharisees, because under pretence of long prayers, they devoured widows' houses; either abusing their simplicity and credulity, or flattering their passions, and fomenting their weak superstitions, [or, being entrusted with their worldly affairs, through the confidence unhappily placed in the external devotion of these sectaries.]

[WIFE, vide WOMAN, HUSBAND, WIDOW.]

[WILDERNESS, vide DESART.]

WILL. Beside the common acceptation of this word, to signify that faculty of willing, with which we are endued; i. e. of choosing, desiring, and loving; the word will is taken,

1. For the absolute and immutable will of God, which nothing can withstand: "For who hath resisted his will?" Rom. ix. 19. Gen. i. 19, 20. Isai. xlv. 10.

2. For a will not absolute and immutable: as when Jesus Christ desired that the cup of his passion might pass from him, if such had been the will of God. Matt. xxvi. 39. It is not the will of God that the wicked should perish. Ezek. xviii. 23. "Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die, saith the Lord God, and not that he should turn from his ways, and live?" But if he determine to perish, and refuse to be converted, God is not obliged to interpose, and to hinder him from perishing, against his will.

Will is often taken for a will of sign or token. It is the will of God that all men should love and obey him, since this he has commanded; yet certain it is, that small is the number of those who discharge these duties. We must therefore affirm, that his will, in respect of those who do not love and obey him, is a mere will of token, distinct from that which is called the will of favour: the first is analogous to a general will, the other to a special will.

4. Will is taken for love, approbation, and complacency: Malac. i. 10. Non est mihi voluntas in vobis,—"I have no pleasure in you." Also, "Thou shalt no more be termed forsaken, neither shall thy land any more be termed desolate; but thou shalt be called Hephzi-bah:"—sed vocaberis voluntas mea in ea. [My delight is in her.] Isaiah lxii. 4.

5. Will is put for the proper will of man: Isaiah lviii. 3. "Wherefore have we fasted, say they, and thou seest not?" Because it was in compliance to your own will and pleasure: Ecce in die jejunii vestri invenitur voluntas vestra. And Jesus, son of Sirach, says, "Go not after thy lusts, but refrain thyself from thine appetites:"—a voluntate tua avertere. Eccles. xviii. 30. Simeon and Levi, to gratify their own will, their revenge, and cruelty, "in their self-will they digged down a wall." Gen. xlix. 6.

6. To do the will of God is put for keeping his law, submitting to his orders, &c. "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father, which is in heaven." Matt. xii. 51. And, xii. 50. "Whoever shall do do the will of my Father, which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother."

WILLINGLY, VOLUNTARY. Voluntarius is generally put for one who willingly undertakes to do a thing, i. e. of his own mere motion, prompted by his personal zeal for the glory of God. Exod. xxxv. 5. Let every one offer voluntarily, and with a cheerful mind, what he intends to offer to God. And Psalm cxix. 108. The vows which I have made willingly; or, the praises which I give thee, from the mere motion of my own heart. Amos, iv. 5. speaks of Vocate voluntarias oblationes: the alms collected by sound of trumpet, the voluntary offerings, the pacific sacrifices which were to be offered to the Lord. St. Paul says, the churches of Macedonia were liberal [willing] beyond their ability. 2 Cor. viii. 3. He says also, the Lord loveth a cheerful giver. 2 Cor. ix. 7.

The Psalmist says, Psalm lxviii. 9. Pluviam voluntariam segregatis, Deus, hereditati tue: thou hast appointed for thy people a free, a liberal, an abundant rain. Psalm liv. 6. Voluntarie sacrificabo tibi: I will offer thee a thanksgiving, a pacific, a free-will sacrifice. See Lev. iii. St. Paul, Heb. x. 26. says, "If we sin willingly—there remains no other sacrifice for sin." In the old law, sacrifices for the expiation of offences committed against the ceremonies of the law, were repeated as often as those offences were acknowledged. But, under the new law, those who fall voluntarily and wilfully into great crimes, are not to expect that Jesus Christ will come to die for them again: he died but once, and is not to die any more, [neither is there to be any succeeding mediator.] Those who fall into great crimes, it is true, may always hope for pardon, or may return and repent; but this remedy and this return are not easy. By those voluntary crimes mentioned by St. Paul, many understand final impenitence, hardness of heart, despair, or the sin against the Holy Ghost.

WILLOW, Salix, a very common tree: it grows in marshy places; the leaf of it is very like that of the olive. God, speaking of the feast of tabernacles, commands the Hebrews to take branches of the handsomest trees, particularly of the willows of the brook, and to bear them in their hands before the Lord, as a token of rejoicing. Lev. xxiii. 40. Heb. עֲרֵב תִּלְיָה, salices torrentis. Ita interp. passim. LXX. ἑτέρας καὶ ἄγνου κλάδους ἐκ χειμάρρου. Willows, and branches of the agnus castus.

WIND, Ventus, often Spiritus; and in some passages of Scripture opinions are divided, whether it signifies the aërial wind, or the Holy Spirit. For example, Gen. i. 2. "The spirit of God moved on the water." Some understand this of the Holy Spirit, others of a violent wind. And Isaiah xl. 7. The grass is dried up, because the spirit of the Lord hath blown upon it. But, commonly the tenor of the discourse will distinguish whether spiritus intends the Holy Spirit, the aërial wind, or the soul by which mankind are animated. See SOUL, SPIRIT.

The Hebrews, as well as we, acknowledge four principal winds. Ezek. xlii. 16, 17, 18. (1.) The East wind, רֵיחַ הַקִּדְמוֹת, kadim; (2.) the North wind, רֵיחַ הַצָּפוֹן, tzaphon; (3.) the South wind, רֵיחַ הַדָּרוֹם, darom; and (4.) the West wind, or that from the Mediterranean sea, רֵיחַ הַיָּם, hajam.

Jerom often translates kadim, which is the East-wind, by ventus oriens, a burning wind. Gen. xli. 27. Exod. x. 13. (LXX. Νότος.) The South-wind is extremely scorching in Egypt, as well as the East-wind.

The North-wind was cold, as appears from Eccus. xliii. 22. Frigidus ventus aquilo flavit, et gelavit crystallus. Solomon says, in his Proverbs, xxv. 23. רֵיחַ צָפוֹן תְּחַלֵּל גֶּשֶׁם, that this wind disperses the clouds and the rain; but other interpreters translate, it produces rain.

The wind Typhonicus, mentioned by St. Luke, Acts xxvii. 14. blows between the east and north. Euroaquilo, or Euroclydon, a squall, is a very dangerous wind, of the nature of a whirlwind, which falls suddenly on ships, makes them roll about, and sometimes sinks them. See Pliny, lib. ii. cap. 48. See EUROCLYDON.

WING, Ala. By the name wing, the Hebrews understand not only the wings of birds, but also the lappet, skirt, or flap of a garment, the extremity of a country, the wings of an army;—figuratively and metaphorically, protection, or defence. God says, that he has borne his people on the wings of eagles, Exod. xxi. 4. See also Deut. xxxii. 11. i. e. he had brought them out of Egypt, as an eagle carries its young ones under their wings. The prophet begs of God to protect them under his wings. Psalm xvii. 8. He says, that the children of men put their trust in the protection of his wings. Psalm xxxvi. 7. Ruth desires Boaz to stretch the wing of his garment over her. Expande pallium tuum, Heb. alam tuam. Ruth iii. 9. "In thy skirts [Heb. wings] is found the blood of the souls of the poor innocents." Jer. ii. 34. Isaiah, speaking of the army of the kings of Israel and Syria, who were coming against Judah, says, "The stretching out of his wings shall fill the breadth of thy land, O Immanuel." Isaiah viii. 8. The same prophet calls the sistra of the Egyptians cymbalum alarum, probably because because of the rings that played in the holes of the sistrum; Isaiah xlii. 1. but vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCCXXII. [In modern language, we speak of the wing of a house, the wing of an army, &c. &c.]

He calls the utmost part of a country, the wing of the land, Isaiah xxiv. 16. We have heard the praises of the just from the extremity of the earth; à finibus terræ; Heb. ab alis terræ. See Job xxxviii. 13. In Malachi, iv. 2. the name of wings is given to the sun-beams: or, rather, the sun is represented as having wings, because of the great rapidity of its course. Profane authors ascribe wings to the animals that draw the chariot of Apollo; and to Mithras, who is the sun. Hosea, iv. 19. speaking of the wind, describes it as having wings; as does the Psalmist, —he (God) walketh on the wings of the wind.

WINE. Several of the ancients were of opinion, that wine [i.e. the fermented liquor of grapes,] was not in use before the deluge, and that Noah was the first who introduced it. If wine, say they, had been known before the flood, Abel would have made an offering of it to the Lord; and Noah would have been on his guard against the effects of drinking it. Others maintain, that it is much more probable the first men should have had the use of wine; which is a liquor so generally useful and agreeable that it could not be unknown even to Adam. Jesus Christ tells us that the first men were surprised by the deluge while they were eating and drinking, which is commonly understood of such as drink wine. We may say, that though Noah knew the intoxicating quality of wine, yet he might think, that the quantity he drank of it was not capable of causing drunkenness.

Hardly any sacrifices were made to the Lord, but they were accompanied by libations of wine. See Exod. xxix. 40. Numb. xv. 5, 7. Vide VINES and GRAPE.

There were many excellent vineyards in Palestine. Jacob says of his son Judah, "He washed his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes." Gen. xlix. 11. The use of wine was forbid to the priests during the time they were in the tabernacle, employed in the service of the altar. Lev. x. 9. This liquor was also forbid to the Nazarites, Numb. vi. 3. and whenever wine was forbid, all other intoxicating liquors were understood to be forbidden also. The Rechabites observed a strict abstinence from wine, in pursuance of the commands received from their father Rechab. Jer. xxxv.

In the style of the sacred penmen, wine, or the cup in which it is contained, often represents the anger of God: "Thou hast made us drink the wine of astonishment." Psalm lx. 3. "In the hand of the Lord there is a cup, and the wine is red; it is full of mixture, and he poureth out of the same. But the dregs thereof all the wicked shall wring them out and drink them. Psalm lxxv. 8. The Lord says to Jeremiah, xxv. 15. "Take the wine-cup of this fury at my hand, and cause all the nations to whom I send thee to drink it."

Wine was administered medically to such as were sinking in trouble and sorrow, Prov. xxi. 4, 5, 6. "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine to those that be of heavy hearts." The Rabbins tell us, Tract. Sanhedr. that it was customary to give wine and strong liquors to criminals condemned to die, at their execution, to stupify them, to abate their fear and lull the sense of their pain. There were certain charitable women at Jerusalem, they say, who used to mix certain drugs with wine, to make it stronger, and more effectual in diminishing the sense of pain. It is thought a mixture of this kind was offered to Jesus Christ to drink, before he was fastened to the cross. Mark xv. 23. "And they gave him to drink, wine mingled with myrrh; but he received it not." [Opiates of various kinds were probably known and administered among the ancients.]

We read in the Evangelists of three drinks offered to our Saviour at his passion: St. Matthew says, xxvii. 33. that when they came to Calvary, they offered him wine mixed with gall; but when he had tasted it, he would not drink it. St. Mark says, xv. 22. that they offered him wine mixed with myrrh; but he would not drink it. St. Matthew says, xxvii. 48. that Jesus being upon the cross, a soldier filling a sponge with vinegar, put it on the end of a reed, and raised it to his mouth. Vide VINEGAR. This is entirely different from the former. The business is, to reconcile Matthew and Mark, and to determine whether the wine mingled with gall, mentioned by Matthew, be the same as the wine mixed with myrrh of Mark.

The text of Matthew, xxvii. 33. "Ὁξος μετὰ χολῆς μεμιγμένον, [Syr. Origen. Jerom.] in several Greek copies, intimates, that they offered our Saviour vinegar mingled with gall. But many excellent manuscripts, as well as the Vulgate, read wine, with Mark, also many of the ancients, both Greeks and Latins.

To reconcile these Evangelists, some have advanced, that Matthew having wrote that wine mixed with gall, was offered to our Saviour;—Mark intended to express the bitterness of the gall by the word myrrh, which is a very bitter ingredient. Others have thought, that Matthew, writing in Hebrew, [Syriac,] used the word rosch, which signifies poison, bitterness; and that Mark, meaning to specify the sort of bitterness, rendered it myrrh; which the Greek interpreter of Matthew translated gall, thinking this was the bitterness intended by his original.

writing

[Michaelis was of this opinion; but, it has its difficulties; notwithstanding which the probability is, that both writers intend the same potion, though described under terms somewhat different. It is very likely that the cause of that difference was some duplicity of import in the language of the country, whether verbal, or written.]

Some have conceived that these were two potions offered our Saviour at different times; that the devout women who attended on him offered him myrrhed wine, to diminish his sense of pain, whereas that of the soldiers was wine mingled with gall. [q. was the first potion particularly prepared by friends, the second common to ordinary criminals? See WINE of the condemned.]

Many think, that myrrh had almost the same effect in wine as incense; that it stupified the patient, caused a kind of intoxication, and counteracted the sense of pain. They gave to elephants wine in which incense had been mixed, to inebriate them, and take away their horror at shedding blood; says the Third Book of Maccabees. Apuleius, Metam. lib. viii. says, that a person had fortified himself against the violence of blows by taking a potion of myrrh: also lib. x. Sed obfirmatur myrrhæ præsumptione, nullis verberibus ac ne ipsi quidem succubuit igni. Vide GALL.

WINE of Helbon. בִּין חֶלְבֹן. Ezekiel, xxvii. 18. speaks of a kind of excellent wine, sold at the fairs of Tyre: he calls it fat wine. Heb. Wine of Helbon. This wine was well known to the ancients, under the name of Chalibonium vinum. It was made at Damascus; the Persians had planted vineyards there on purpose, says Posidonius, quoted by Athenæus, Dipnosoph. lib. i. Vide Strab. lib. xv. Plutarch, de Fortun. Alexand. This author says, that the kings of Persia used no other wine for their common drink.

WINE of Libanus. Hosea, xiv. 7. speaks of this wine: "The scent thereof shall be as the wine of Libanon." The wines of those sides of mount Libanus that had a good aspect were heretofore much esteemed. They commend that of Biblos; and even to this day the wines of Libanus are in repute. But some think, that wine of Libanus may signify a sweet-scented wine, wine in which perfumes are mixed, or drugs to exalt its flavour. Odoriferous wines were not unknown to the Hebrews. In Cant. viii. 2.

mention is made of a medicated wine, Vinum conditum, wine mixed with perfumes, [spiced. Eng. Tr.] Wisdom, ii. 7. notices a precious sort of wine, which probably was perfumed. "Let us fill ourselves with costly wine and ointments." Nectar was also a wine of the same nature. The Hebrew word נֶקְטָר Nectar signifies Suffiri, suavi odore perfundi; to be perfumed.

The wines of Palestine being heady, were usually qualified with water, that they might be drank without inconvenience. Prov. ix. 2, 5. "She hath mingled her wine, she hath also furnished her table. Come, eat of my bread, and drink of the wine which I have mingled." And Psalm lxxv. 8. "In the hand of the Lord there is a cup,—it is full of mixture." The priests of Bel said to the king of Babylon, Bel. 11. "Sir, do you mingle the wine yourself, and set the meat upon the altar of Bel." Rev. xviii. 6. "In the cup of the whore, mingle as much again as she has mingled for others." Fulgentius says, in the second book of Mythologies, that the wine of Sarepta, a city of Phœnicia, was so strong, that the greatest drinkers could hardly drink above a pint of it.

[I think it likely that this mingling of wine is rather two kinds of wine mingled together, to improve their flavour; as rough with smooth, over sweet wine with other of a weaker relish, &c. Those who "sat long over wine," were too good judges to admit of water as an improvement. The cup of mixture, Rev. xviii. possibly, means some of the lees—to be drank off to the very dregs: as they did not keep their wine bottled, but in larger quantities, so when they drew it off, some mixture might accompany the clear liquor:—but, rather a potation mingled with drugs, i. e. aphrodisiacs, exciting to the purposes of this mystical harlot. Comp. FRAGMENTS, Nos. DCLXIX. et seq.]

WINE of Astonishment, Psalm lx. 3. יִין תִּרְעֵלָה, may represent the cup of God's anger, with which he inebriates the wicked; or, rather, according to the Hebrew, the cup of the wine of affliction, impregnated with its lees: it might also be translated, wine of trembling, that produces death, that poisons, that stupifies, Psalm lxxv. 8. The LXX. translate it, wine that stings inwardly, that causes affliction, or compunction: Aquila—wine of stupefaction: Symmachus, wine of agitation, or disturbance.

WINE of the Palm-tree, (Vulgate, Sicera, Deut. xiv. 26, et passim.) is made of the sap of the palm-tree. It is common in the East.

WINE of Libation, Deut. xxxii. 38. Esth. xiv. 17. was the most excellent wine, poured on the victims in the temple of the Lord. Or, pure wine, because in libations they used no mixture.

The wicked eat the bread of impiety, and drink the wine of iniquity, Prov. iv. 17. they are maintained by ill-gotten goods; or, they abuse the good things that God gives them; they offend him by their abuse of the comforts of life.

WINE of Uprightness, Cant. i. 4. יין טהור, vii. 9. Prov. xxiii. 30. good wine, true and excellent wine, [NEAT wine; but vide the FRAGS. on SOLOMON'S SONG, Nos. CCCXXVIII. also VINDICATION.] Jerom has translated the Hebrew by Vinum quod ingreditur blandè, instead of Vinum rectitudinem, as the text. Horace has well expressed this thought, generosum et lene requiro,

Quod curas abigat, quod cum spe divite manet
In venas animumque meum.

HORAT. lib. i. Ep. 15.

A feast of wine is that in which wine abounds. See Eccles. xxxi. 41. xxxii. 7. xlix. 2. Or, a festival of solemnity, a banquet of invitation: for usually they drank no wine at their ordinary meals. See Isaiah xxii. 13. xxiv. 9, 11.

Hosea ix. 2. Vinum mentietur eis; their wine shall fail them, their vines shall delude their expectations, shall not produce any wine.

WINE of the condemned, Amos ii. 8. may be understood of the wine given to condemned criminals; as above on Proverbs xxxi. 6. and the Evangelists. Diodorus Siculus, lib. i. p. 62. speaks of a wine in Egypt, to dispel sorrow and to appease anger. Homer says, that in Egypt Helen learned the composition of Nepenthe, which effects forgetfulness of evils. But another interpretation may be commodiously given to this passage of Amos, יין שווא, LXX. Oïvon êk sukoφavtîwv, wine earned by their slanders; they drink the wine, they make themselves merry, at the expence of those whom they had unjustly condemned. The Chaldee, the wine of rapine, [of fines, mulcts, penalties, obtained by false accusation.]

New WINE, which is not to be put into old bottles, Matt. ix. 17. Mark ii. 22. Luke v. 37. the Holy Ghost, with which the apostles were to be replenished after our Saviour's ascension. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. LVIII. BOTTLE.

WISDOM, Sapientia; in Greek Σοφία, Sophia; Hebr. חכמה, Chachemah. The Jews understand in a greater latitude the words wise and wisdom, than either the Greeks or Latins. With them,

1. WISDOM signifies understanding, or the knowledge of things supernatural and divine. It occurs in this sense in the Psalms, &c. This wisdom Solomon entreated of God with so much earnestness; and God granted it to him with so much liberality. [SACRED UNDERSTANDING.]

2. WISDOM expresses quickness of invention, and dexterity in the execution of works, which require not so much strength of body, as exertion of mind. God told Moses, that he had filled Bezaleel and Aholiab with wisdom and understanding, and knowledge, to invent and perform several sorts of work for the tabernacle. Exod. xxviii. 3. xxxi. 3. [INGENUITY.]

3. WISDOM is used for craft, cunning, and stratagem; whether good or evil. It is said, Exod. i. 10. that Pharaoh dealt wisely with the Israelites, when he oppressed them in Egypt. It is observed, 2 Sam. xiii. 3. of Jonadab, the friend of Ammon, and nephew of David, that he was very wise, i. e. very subtle and crafty. And Job says, v. 13. that God "taketh the wise in their own craftiness." And Solomon, Prov. xiv. 8. "the wisdom of the prudent is to understand his way." [SUBTLETY.]

4. WISDOM is taken for doctrine, learning, and experience. Job xii. 2, 12. "With the ancient is wisdom, and in length of days understanding; with him is wisdom and strength, he hath counsel and understanding." Job xv. 2. "Should a wise man utter vain knowledge, and fill his belly with the east wind?"—or, shall he explain the cause and origin of it? Job xxxviii. 37. "Who can number the clouds in wisdom?" And Psalm lviii. 5. the deaf adder "will not hearken to the voice of the charmer, charming never so wisely." Pharaoh set Joseph over all his house, to teach his senators wisdom. cv. 22. [SAGACITY.]

5. WISDOM is sometimes taken in Scripture to denote the talents of magicians, enchanters, fortune-tellers, sooth-sayers, and interpreters of dreams. [SCIENCE.]

6. WISDOM is put for the Eternal Wisdom, the Word, the Son of God. Prov. iii. 9. By wisdom God established the heavens and founded the earth; this wisdom the Lord possessed "from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was." Prov. viii. 22, 23. It existed before God created any thing, and was present with the Creator at his production of sensible beings. It was established over all the creation, &c. See also Wisdom, vii. 22, 26. viii. xvii. 12, 26. ix. 1, 2. xviii. 15. and Ecclesiasticus xxiv. 5, 6, 7, &c. where are magnificent commendations, not only of wisdom, as a virtue, but also as the Word, the only Son of God, before all worlds.

7. WISDOM of the flesh, wisdom of this world, human wisdom, are spoken of by St. Paul, as opposed to true wisdom, to the wisdom of Jesus Christ, Christ, to the wisdom of the Spirit. 1 Cor. i. 19, 20, 21. ii. And St. James, iii. 14, 15, &c. speaks of an earthly wisdom, sensual and devilish, opposed to "the wisdom that is from above, which is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy." It dissembles not, is not harsh, &c.

WISDOM, Book of, or, as the Greeks read Σοφία Σολομωντος, the Wisdom of Solomon, is quoted by some of the ancients under the Greek name Panaretos; q. a collection or treasury, of all virtue, or instructions to bring us to virtue. The principal purpose of the author is, to instruct kings, the great, the judges of the earth. To incline them the more effectually to the study of wisdom, he assumes the name of Solomon, and proposes him as their pattern: he shews them the methods of attaining wisdom, and proves that the means are not out of their reach. He threatens the wicked with the judgments of God, shews their despair in another life at seeing the happiness of the just: proves the advantages men obtain by wisdom; and gives the character not only of wisdom as a virtue, but also of the eternal and uncreated wisdom. We find noble and great conceptions of the Deity in this book.

The original of this work is in Greek; and it does not appear that it was ever extant in Hebrew, notwithstanding what some have thought. We find none of those Hebraisms, or Barbarisms, which are hardly avoidable in translating from Hebrew. The author wrote Greek very well: he had read Plato and the Greek poets. He even borrows expressions peculiar to the Greek poets, as Ambrosia, chap. xix. 20. Gr. the river of forgetfulness, or Lethe, chap. vii. 13. the kingdom of Pluto, or Hades, chap. i. 14, &c. His style abounds with epithets, is swelling, poetical, obscure, and figurative. The Jewish authors had some knowledge of him, and have quoted him; but what they cite is taken out of the Greek. He always quotes Scripture according to the LXX. even when they depart from the Hebrew; which is a proof that this book was written originally in Greek.

The Latin translation that we have of this book is not of Jerom. It is the ancient Vulgate, used by the church at the beginning, and made from the Greek long before Jerom, who acknowledges that he did not meddle with the translation of this work. Præf. in Lib. Salom. The translator is very ancient, and keeps very close to the text. But though he lived in an age wherein the Latin tongue was in its purity, yet he often introduces words that are not used by the best authors in his sense. So he puts honestas for riches, honestus for a rich man; respectus, or visitatio, for the punishment of God on wicked men; supervacuitas, for vanity, or vain-glory; animalia supervacua, for dangerous, or noxious animals, &c.

The author of this book is unknown. Some ascribe it to Solomon, and imagine that he wrote it in Hebrew, and that it was afterwards translated into Greek; that the original being lost, the Greek has since supplied the place of the original. They observe, that in this work Solomon shews himself, if not more clearly, at least as conspicuously, as in any of his works, that are not disputed; that it is not unworthy of this wise prince; that the fathers often quoted it under his name; and that in the title it bears the name of Solomon. But if this book really belongs to this prince, how comes it that the Jews never admitted it as canonical? How comes it not to be found in the Hebrew?—that no one has ever seen it in this language?—that the translator says nothing of such a fact, and that the style shews no tokens of this pretended original? See Jerom, in Prolog. Galeatus.

St. Austin once thought, that the book of Wisdom, and that of Ecclesiasticus, were by the same author; but he soon discovered his mistake: he does not declare his judgment concerning the author of the Book of Wisdom, but acknowledges, that learned men were of opinion it is not Solomon's; nor is it probable that it can belong to Jesus, son of Sirach, the author of Ecclesiasticus. Jerom says, that some of the ancients imputed it to Philo the Jew: nonnulli scriptorum veterum hunc esse Judæi Philonis affirmant. These words have afforded matter of dispute: Some have thought that Philo the Jew of Alexandria, whose works are extant, and who lived under the emperor Caius, was the author of the Book of Wisdom. Lyran. in Sap. Galatin. de Arcan. Cath. Fid. lib. i. cap. 4. Ludov. Vives, in Aug. de Civit. Dei, lib. xvii. cap. 20. Others look on this opinion as an error. Jacob. Faber. Vien. Ep. apud Lorin. in Sap. Præf. cap. 2. Others pretend, that the Philo mentioned by Jerom is more ancient than the Alexandrian Jew. Driedo de Eccles. Dogm. lib. i. cap. 4. Michael Medina de recta in decem fide, lib. vi. cap. 12. Genebr. ad An. 3860. Melch. Canus de locis Theol. lib. i. cap. 11.

And indeed we hear of three writers named Philo. The first (they say) lived under Ptolemy Philadelphus. The second is Philo of Biblos, cited by Eusebius and by Josephus. The third is Philo the Jew, who lived in the time of the emperor Caius. The first Philo is obscure, no author author has mentioned him. The second was a Pagan, who wrote the history of Phœnicia in Greek. Philo the Jew is well known. The Book of Wisdom could not be composed by the first, because, probably he never existed: nor by the second, because he was a Heathen: nor by the third, who was not so much as a Christian, though he lived in the time of Christianity. Besides, the style of Philo and that of this writer are very different. Lastly, we know none of the fathers, either before Jerom, or since, who have ascribed this work to Philo; nor does Jerom himself ascribe it to him.

Grotius, Præf. de Sapient. suggests that this book was wrote by some Jew, (as he thinks) in Hebrew, after the time of Esdras, and before the pontificate of the high-priest Simon. He thinks for this reason it was placed before Ecclesiasticus. It was traslated, he says, by some Christian author, who understood Greek well enough, but who took great license in his translation, not confining himself to the words of his original: he adds some strokes, and some sentiments, derived from Christianity. Hence it mentions the universal judgment, the happiness of the righteous, and the punishment of the wicked, in a manner more distinct and express than we find generally in the books of the ancient Hebrews. An hypothesis so singular required the confirmation of reasons and arguments.

Cornelius à Lapede believes this book to have been written in Greek by a Jewish author (after the captivity of Babylon, and about the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt,) whom he even suspects might be one of the seventy interpreters; for Aristæus relates, that this prince proposed to each of these interpreters some question concerning good government. This book, being an instruction for princes, might have been written on this occasion. He adds, that the opinion which ascribes it to Philo, might easily have originated in the following equivocal terms:—Solomon had two names, Solomon and Jedidiah; the latter signifies, Friend of God; in Greek Philo or Philos, signifies a friend. The Rabbins, when they quote Philo, call him Jedidiah. It was imagined, that because the title of this book was The Wisdom of Philo, that this signified Philo the Jew, whereas it stood for Solomon. This conjecture may be regarded as ingenious.

The Jews never acknowledged the book of Wisdom as canonical: several of the fathers and churches rejected it from their canon. Athanas. in Synopsi. Epiphani. de Ponderib. et Mensur. Jerom, Prolog. Galeato, et in Zach. viii. cap. 11.

et in Ep. 115. Origen, in Psalm. li. Melito, Ep. ad Onesim. Euseb. Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. 28. Gregor. Nazianz. Cyrill. Hierotol. Laodicæne Synod. Athanas. Ep. Festali Damascen. lib. iv. cap. 18. de Fide orthodoxa, &c. Lyras. in Sapient. and Cajetan, in Esther, ad finem, did not admit it as indisputably canonical. But others of the ancient Fathers owned it, and quoted it as Holy Scripture. The sacred authors of the New Testament have alluded to it. The councils of Carthage, A. D. 397; of Sardis, A. D. 347; of Constantinople, A. D. 692; of Toledo, A. D. 675; of Florence, A. D. 1438; and, lastly, that of Trent, Sess. IV. received it into the list of canonical books.

The book of Wisdom is ascribed by the Musulmans to their Locman. They tell us this famous writer was not a Nabi, or prophet, but only a Hakim, or wise man. The author of Wisdom often puts The Word of God, for God himself; and I doubt not but that St. John the Evangelist had him in view. Philo has used it in the same sense, which might easily have given rise to the suspicion that Philo was the author of the book of Wisdom. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. IX. Comp. No. DCXIII. et seq.

[WITCH, of Endor, see PYTHONESS.]

[WITCHCRAFT, INCHANTMENTS, CONJURORS. There were, (and are still) in the East, many kinds of practices, whereby an insight into futurity was attempted to be obtained by those who used them. Moses prohibited the profession of them, and Saul slew those who studied them. In the gospel history we find mention of some "who used curious arts." There is no doubt but that the distinctions of these arts are expressed in Scripture, and probably they are allied to what Niebuhr tells us are now current in Arabia.]

WITNESS, one who bears testimony to any thing: thus it is said,—you are a witness—a faithful witness—a false witness—God is witness, &c.

Witness, in Greek Μάρτυς or Μάρτυρ, Martyr or Martyr, signifies one who gives testimony to the truth, though at the expence of his blood, his life, his estate, &c. Jesus Christ is the faithful witness, Rev. i. 5. the Martyr of truth and justice. God promises to give to his two witnesses (which some think to be Enoch and Elijah) the spirit of prophecy, Rev. xi. 3. after which (says he) they shall be put to death. See TESTIMONY.

The law appoints, that two or three witnesses should be credited in matters of judicature; but not one witness only: Deut. xvii. 6, 7. When any one was condemned to die, the witnesses were were the first to begin the execution. They threw the first stone, for example, if the party were to be stoned. The law condemned a false witness to the same punishment as that he would have subjected his neighbour to, Deut. xix. 16, 17, 18, 19. Jeremiah calls God a judge, and witness; chap. xxvii. 23. i. e. He does not stay for any one to accuse the wicked to him; he has no need of the testimony, or accusation, of men, to know the demerit of the guilty: he accuses them himself, he punishes them, he condemns them; he knows all their misdemeanors by his wisdom, his justice, his infinite penetration, &c.

Isaiah, lv. 4. gives the name of witness to the Messiah: "Behold, I have given him for a witness to the people, a leader and commander to the people." God sent him to give testimony to the truth, and to bring men into the ways of justice and salvation. Hosea, xi. 12. says, that when Ephraim deceived the Lord, and forsook his worship for that of the golden calf, Judah walked with his God as a faithful witness." The Jews tell us, that the tribe of Judah signalized its fidelity and courage, by entering first into the Red Sea; while the other tribes hesitated, and durst not venture, though Moses assured them of the protection and assistance of God. This action of Judah God intended to recompence, by settling the royal power in this tribe. Apud Hieron. in Osee xii. Malachi, iii. 5. threatens perjured persons, calumniators, adulterers, and other wicked men with the vengeance of the Lord, and says, the Lord shall be a ready [swift] witness against them: he is both witness and judge, as observed before. This is explained of the coming of the Messiah, or of the last judgment. Jesus Christ was witness and judge against the hardened and incredulous Jews. See John xvi. 8.

The Prophets are the witnesses of our belief; they witness the truth of our religion. St. Paul, Heb. xii. 1. calls them a cloud of witnesses. The Apostles are still further witnesses of the coming, the mission, and the doctrine of Christ. If Jesus Christ is not risen, says St. Paul, then are we false witnesses. 1 Cor. xv. 15. We are witnesses, says St. Peter, Acts x. 39, 41. of all that Jesus did in Judea: he chose a small number of persons to be witnesses to him: and when the Apostles thought fit to put another in the place of Judas, Acts i. 32. they selected one who had been a witness of the resurrection along with themselves.

[WOE, is used in our translation where a somewhat softer expression would be at least equally proper: "Woe to such an one!" is in our language, a threat, an imprecation, which comprises a wish for some calamity, natural or judicial, to befall a person: but this is not always the meaning affixed to this word in Scripture. We have the expression, "Woe is me," i. e. alas, for my sufferings! and "Woe to the women with child, and those who give suck," &c. i. e. Alas, for their redoubled sufferings, in times of distress! It is also more agreeable to the gentle character of the compassionate Jesus, to consider him as lamenting the sufferings of any, whether person, or city, &c. than as imprecating, or even as denouncing them; since his character of judge formed no part of his mission. If, then, we should read, "Alas, for thee Chorazin! Alas, for thee Bethsaida!" we should do no injustice to the general sentiments of the place, or to the character of the person speaking. This, however, is not the sense in which woe is always to be taken; as when we read "woe to those who build houses by unrighteousness, and cities by blood:" woe to those who are "rebellious against God," &c. &c. in numerous passages, especially of the Old Testament. The import of this word, then, is in some degree qualified by the application of it: where it is directed against transgression, crime, or any enormity, it may be taken as a threatening, a malediction; but, in the words of our Lord, and where the subject is suffering under misfortunes, though not extremely wicked, a kind of lamentatory application of it should seem to be most proper.]

WOLF, Lupus; in Greek Λύκος, Lycos; in Hebrew זאב, Zeeb. A wild creature, very well known. The Scripture notices these remarkable things respecting the wolf:

1. It lives upon rapine. 2. Is violent, cruel, and bloody. 3. Voracious and greedy. 4. Seeks its prey by night. 5. Is very sharp-sighted. 6. Is the great enemy of sheep. That Benjamin shall ravine as a wolf. Gen. xlix. 27. False teachers are wolves in sheep's clothing. Persecutors of the church, and false pastors, are also ravenous wolves.

The prophets speak of evening wolves. Jeremiah, v. 6. "A wolf of the evening shall spoil them." And Habakkuk, i. 8. "Their horses are more fierce than the evening wolves." And Zephaniah, iii. 3. "Her judges are evening wolves." Jerom on Habakkuk observes, that towards evening wolves are more dangerous, as being more hungry. Instead of wolves of the evening, the LXX. translate, wolves of Arabia; because the Hebrew word Arab [אֲרָב Oreb,] signifies both the evening and Arabia. Wolves indeed are common in Arabia, but they have nothing nothing peculiar in that country; so that there can be no reason to prefer this translation.

The Chaldean interpreters explain—Benjamin shall ravine as a wolf, of the altar of burnt-offerings at Jerusalem, which stood in the tribe of Benjamin. Others refer it to that violent seizure by the sons of Benjamin, of the young women that came to the tabernacle at Shiloh. Judg. xxi. 21. Others refer it to Mordecai, or to Saul, who were of the tribe of Benjamin. Others explain it of St. Paul, who was also of this tribe; and this interpretation has commonly prevailed among Christian interpreters. Tertull. contr. Marcion. lib. v. cap. 1. Ambros. de Benedic. Patriarch. cap. 12. Jeron. in Isai. lib. iv. et in Osee, lib. ii. Augustin. &c.

The wolf is a fierce creature, abiding in forests, ravenous, greedy, crafty, of exquisite quickness of smell: his head is something square, his hair inclined to grey. It is commonly said, that what makes him so voracious is, that he has but one very large, short gut, in which his food stays but a little time. But this is a popular mistake: his guts are as long as those of other animals; or as a dog's, being himself a kind of wild dog. Dogs carried from Europe into New Spain have degenerated into wolves.

Isaiah, xi. 6. lxxv. 25. describing the tranquil reign of the Messiah, says, "The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf, and the young lion, and the fatling together, and a little child shall lead them." Our Saviour, Matt. x. 16. says, that he sends his apostles as sheep among wolves. Luke. x. 3. And, indeed, both Jews and Pagans, like ravenous and voracious wolves, persecuted and slew almost all the apostles and disciples of our Saviour. But at last these same wolves themselves became converts, and docile as lambs: St. Paul, one of the most eager persecutors of the church, was afterwards one of its most zealous defenders.

WOMB. The fruit of the womb is children: Gen. xxx. 2. and the Psalmist, cxxvii. 3. describes children as the blessing of marriage. Psal. cxxxii. 11. I will give you a son of your own to inherit your throne. Psal. xxii. 10. Lord, thou art my God from my mother's womb.

WOMAN. The Lord having created all animals in pairs, male and female, and having brought them to Adam, in his review of them he could not discover any one like himself, or created as a fit companion for him. Gen. ii. 20. Hereupon it is thought he supplicated God to give him a companion and assistant, as he had done to the animals. God therefore cast him into a profound sleep, and while he was sleeping, took a rib from his side, of which he formed woman. When Adam awoke, he perceived her, and said, "This is bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh; she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of man." Wherefore a man shall forsake father and mother, and be united to his wife; and they two shall be but one flesh; or, they shall be but one in two different bodies, because of the production of children, which are derived from both.

Some writers have fancied, that Adam was created of both sexes; because it is said "in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them:" this is said on the sixth day; and in the following chapter the sacred author relates the formation of the woman as above; it is therefore inferred, that man was already formed male and female, before Eve was created. Others guess that the bodies of Adam and Eve were created on the sixth day, but inserted sideways in each other; that afterwards God sent a deep sleep on Adam, and separated the woman from him: and thus they explain those words, "He took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof." The Hebrew may be thus translated: "he took one (the woman) out of his side, and put flesh in its place." Rabb. Samuel, Manasseh Ben-Israel, Maimonid. Eugubin. in Genes. in Cosmopæia. Others consider the man and the woman as created on the sixth day, according to Gen. i. 27. and that what is related chap. ii. 20, &c. is only a recapitulation, or a supplement, to what had been before mentioned concisely. [Comp. what has been suggested on the article PENTATEUCH, respecting duplicate Records, used by Moses in composing this history.]

Some think that the manner in which the creation of the woman is related by Moses, ought to be understood metaphorically and allegorically, and not truly and historically. It must be owned, that the relation of the sacred penman seems to call for an explication more sublime than that of the bare letter; but it is dangerous to weaken the literal truth of Scripture; and the Fathers always explained this passage literally.

[The Brahmans represent the different castes into which their population is divided as being derived from the different parts of the body of the first man,—the labourers from his arms—the learned from his head, &c. Much like the pious Mr. Henry, who says the woman was not derived from his feet, to be trampled on;—nor from his head to govern him; but from his side, to be treated with affection and tenderness. This seems to meet the allegory alluded to by our author.]

Some

Some Rabbins think, that God had created for Adam a former wife, before Eve. See LITTA.

Profane authors relate of Prometheus, that he formed man of the mud of the earth, and stole fire from heaven to animate him. Jupiter, provoked at this theft, ordered Vulcan to form a woman also of the mud of the earth, who having received from all the gods some gift, was called Pandora. Jupiter gave her a box full of miseries and diseases, to give to her intended husband Prometheus; but he declined the connexion. Epimetheus married Pandora, accepted the box from her, and opened it: immediately the diseases and misfortunes flew out, and spread themselves over mankind. He hastened to shut it up again, but it was too late: the evils were already abroad; and at the bottom of the box there only remained HOPE. [This is understood to allude to the fall of man, by means of woman.]

Woman was created as a companion and assistant to man; equal to him in authority and jurisdiction over the animals: but after the fall, God subjected her to the government of man. Gen. iii. 16. "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee." Beside the duties prescribed by the law, common to men and women, certain regulations were peculiar to this sex; as those respecting legal uncleanness during their ordinary infirmities, those attending child-bearing, &c. The law does not allow any action of the woman against the man; but it permits the husband to divorce his wife, and to cause her to be stoned, if she violate her conjugal vow: and when the tokens of virginity could not be found in wives newly married, their husbands might put them away.

The Rabbins say, that whatsoever is forbid to men in the negative precepts of the law, is also forbid to women; but they are not bound to those affirmative precepts which require a fixed time for their performance, on account of the weakness and delicacy of their sex, of their obedience to their husbands, and of the services they are obliged to perform for them. They ought to inform their husbands of their monthly periods, that they may not approach them. Moreover, when they kneaded their bread, they were to make a little cake, which was formerly offered to the Lord, but at present is thrown into the fire. Lastly, they were to light up a lamp in their houses on Friday evening, against the night of the Sabbath. These the Rabbins call precepts of the women.

If a married woman made a vow, of whatever nature, she was not bound by it, if her husband forbade it the same day. But if he stayed till the next day before he contradicted it, or knowing the thing, if he held his peace, he was then supposed to consent to it; and the woman was bound by her vow. Numb. xxx. 7, &c. See 1 Cor. vii. 2, &c. for the duties of women towards their husbands. The apostle would have them submissive; as to Christ, Eph. v. 22. He forbids them to speak or teach in the church; or to appear there with their heads uncovered, or without veils, 1 Cor. xi. 5. xiv. 34. He does not allow a woman to teach, or to domineer over her husband; he would have them continue in submission and silence. He adds, that the woman shall be saved in bearing and educating her children, if she brings them up in faith, in charity, sanctity, and a sober life. See Titus, ii. 4, 5. and 1 Peter iii. 1, 2, 3. where modesty is recommended to them, with great care in avoiding superfluous ornaments, and unnecessary finery. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DCLXX.

[WONDER, is some occurrence, or thing, which so strongly engages our attention, by its surprising greatness, rarity, or other properties, that our minds are struck by it into astonishment. Wonder is also pretty much synonymous with sign, "if a prophet give thee a sign, or a wonder," says Moses, Deut. xiii. 1. and "if the sign or wonder come to pass," &c. Isaiah says, he and "his children are for signs and wonders," chap. viii. 18. i. e. they were for signs—indications of—allusions to—prefigurations of—things future, that should certainly take place; and they were to excite notice, attention and consideration in beholders; to cause wonder in them.

WONDER also signifies the act of wondering, as resulting from the observation of something extraordinary, or beyond what we are accustomed to behold.]

WOOD, Lignum. This term is often put for trees.

"Ye shall not serve gods, the work of men's hands, wood and stone;" that is, idols made of wood or of stone, Deut. iv. 28.

Moses sweetened the waters in the desert, by casting into them some of the wood Alvah. Exod. xv. 25. See ALVAH.

Jeremiah, xi. 19. has a remarkable passage, ἡμῶν γὰρ πρὸς τὸν κύριον, LXX. Ἐμβάλωμεν ξύλον εἰς ἄπρον αὐτοῦ. [English Translation; Let us destroy the tree, with the fruit thereof.] The prophet, speaking of our Saviour's passion; describes the rage of his enemies in these terms; Mittamus lignum in panem ejus, &c. "Let us cast wood into his bread, let us destroy him from off the land of the living; and let his name be known there no longer." Several senses are affixed to this text. The Hebrew says, literally, "Let us corrupt wood in his bread:" Let us put poisonous wood, let us grate some mortal root into his food, that may cause him to die, that may poison him. Louis de Dieu translates it, Let us break wood on his flesh. The Hebrew word that signifies bread, sometimes also stands for flesh. Glassius, Let us corrupt wood in his bread; or let us corrupt his bread in the wood; let us poison the kneading trough, in which he kneads his bread. [This is not an Eastern idea. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DCXCVII.]

3 F div. 2.

WOODS. There is frequent mention in Scripture of woods or groves, wherein a thousand infamous things were committed in honour of false deities; "he sacrificed and burnt incense on the high places, and on hills, and under every green tree;"—sub ligno frondoso.

[The Talmudists determine that "it is lawful for cattle to feed in common in the woods; yea, for the tribe of Judah to feed (cattle) in the tribe of Naphtali." Tal., Jerus. Buva Bathra. fol. 15. 1.]

WORD, in Hebrew דבר Dabar; in Latin, Verbum, or Sermo; in Greek, Πῆμα, Rhema, or Λόγος, Logos. In Scripture it is often put for thing or matter: as Exod. ii. 14. "Surely this thing [Heb. word] is known. To-morrow the Lord shall do this thing [Heb. word] in the land," Exod. ix. 5. "I will do a thing [Heb. word] in Israel, at which both the ears of every one that heareth it shall tingle," 1 Sam. iii. 11. "And the rest of the acts [Heb. words] of Solomon," 1 Kings xi. 41.

Sometimes Scripture ascribes to the word of God certain supernatural effects; or represents it as animated and active. So, He sent his word, and healed them. The book of Wisdom ascribes to the Word of God the death of the first-born of Egypt. Wisdom, xviii. 15. xvi. 26. ix. 1. xvi. 12. the miraculous effects of manna; the creation of the world; the healing of those who looked up to the brazen serpent. The centurion in the Gospel says to our Saviour, Matt. viii. 8. "Speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed." And Jesus Christ says to the devil that tempted him, Matt. iv. 4. "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Vide WORD, MEMRA, infra. Also, ADDITION, Rhema.

WORD, Verbum. The word of God is taken either, 1. for that internal word heard by the prophets, when under inspiration from God, or 2. for that which they heard externally, when God spoke to them; as when he spoke to Moses, face to face, or as one friend speaks to another, Exod. xxxiii. 11. or—3. for that word which the ministers of God, the priests, the apostles, the servants of God, declare in his name to the people. When Ehud, judge of Israel, came to Eglon, king of Moab, he said to him, Sir, I have a secret commission to you from God, Judg. iii. 19, 20. or—4. For what is written in the sacred books of the Old and New Testament.

WORD also signifies the command of God. Psal. cvii. 20. He sent forth his word and healed them; he spake but one word, and health was restored to them: and Psalm cxlvii. 18. "He sendeth out his word and melteth them;" i. e. the ice or hail: a word dissolves them. Thus the good centurion said to Jesus Christ, Luke vii. 7. "Wherefore neither thought I myself worthy to come unto thee; but say in a word, and my servant shall be healed."

The words of my sins, the words of a lie, of iniquity, of songs; the words of knowledge, of understanding, of discipline, or conduct, may be explained either of sins, of a lie, of knowledge, &c. or of discourses uttered along with them.

Verbum Regis, the orders of the king; Verbum malum, a scandal; Loquar verbis meis, I will tell my reasons. Verbis tuis facite stateram; make a balance for your words; never speak them before you have well weighed what you have to say: David praised the Most High by the words of his song; by Psalms composed to his glory. The word of promise, the word of faith, the word of the cross, the word of wisdom, the word of life, the word of the truth of the gospel, a form of sound words, are expressions easily understood. Sometimes the term word is redundant, as in this passage: Posuit in eis verba signorum suorum. God put his word of prodigies in them; which is only saying, he made them the depositaries of his power to perform miracles. Thus the word of promise only means promises. The word of the cross is that preaching which declares Christ crucified. The word of joy is that which proclaims a life to come, and which gives life to the soul. The sound word is that opposed to vain, deceiving, dangerous, lying discourses of wicked men and heretics.

WORD is also consecrated and appropriated to signify the only Son of the Father, the uncreated Wisdom, the second person of the most Holy Trinity, equal and consubstantial to the Father. St. John the Evangelist, more expressly than any other, has opened the mystery of the the Word of God, when he tells us, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made." chap. i.

W^{ORD}, put for the Eternal Word, or the second Person of the Trinity. The Chaldee paraphrasts, the most ancient Jewish writers extant, generally use the name MEMRA, or WORD, where Moses puts JEHOVAH. It is thought, by interpreters, that under this term they allude to the Son of God, the second Person of the Trinity. Now their testimony is so much the more considerable, as having lived before or at the time of Jesus Christ, they are irrefragable witnesses of the sentiments of their nation on this article; since their Targum, or explanation, has always been, and still is, in universal esteem among the Jews. In the greater part of the passages where the sacred name occurs, these paraphrasts substitute Memra Jehovah, "דבריהם Verbum Dei, which signifies the WORD, and differs from pitgama, which in Chaldee signifies discourse. And as they ascribe to Memra all the attributes of Deity, it is concluded from hence that they believed the divinity of the Word

In effect, according to them Memra created the world; appeared to Abraham in the plain of Mamre, and to Jacob at Bethel. It was to Memra Jacob appealed to witness the covenant between him and Laban:—Let the Word see between thee and me. The same Word appeared to Moses at Sinai; gave the law to Israel; spoke face to face with that law-giver; marched at the head of that people; enabled them to conquer nations, and was a consuming fire to all who violated the law of the Lord. All these characters, where the paraphrast uses the word Memra, clearly denote Almighty God. This Word therefore was God; and the Hebrews were of this opinion at the time when the Targum was composed.

This Memra answers to the Cachema, or Wisdom mentioned by Solomon, Prov. iii. 9, 20. viii. 11, 12, &c. and by Jesus, son of Sirach, Eccles. i. ii. iii. &c.

The author of the book of Wisdom, who lived before Jesus Christ, expresses himself pretty much in the same manner. He says that God created all things by his Word, Wisd. ix. 1. Qui facisti omnia Verbo tua; that it is not what the earth produces that feeds man; but the Word of the Almighty that supports him, Wisd. xvi. 26 Quoniam non natiuitatis fructus pascunt homines, sed Sermo tuus hos, qui in te crediderint, conseruant. It was this Word that fed the Israelites in the desert: it was the same Word that healed them after the biting of the serpents: Wisd. xvi. 12. Neque herba neque malagma sanauit eos, sed tuus, Domine, Sermo, qui sanat omnia. It was the same Word who by his power destroyed the first-born of the Egyptians: Wisd. xviii. 15. Exod. xii. 29, 30. Omnipotens Sermo tuus de caelo à regalibus sedibus durus debellator in mediam exterminis terram prosiliuit, &c. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. IX.

By the same Word Aaron stopped the fury of the fire that was kindled in the camp, which threatened the destruction of all Israel. Wisd. xviii. 22. See Numb. xvi. 46. Non in virtute corporis, sed Verbo illum qui se vexabat subiecit, &c.

Philo, a famous Jew, who lived at the time of Jesus Christ, and who much studied Plato, makes use of almost the same manner of speaking. He says, for example, that God created the world by his Word (Logos.) That the intelligible world is no other than the Word of God that created the world: that this invisible Word is the true image of God. The Platonists, to express the Creator of all things, sometimes used the term Logos, which in St. John also signifies the Eternal Word. The Stoics also used it against the Epicureans, who maintained, that all things were produced by chance, and without design; whereas the Platonists and the Stoics pretended, that every thing was made by the Logos, i. e. the Divine Reason, or Divine Wisdom. But it may be reasonably doubted whether the Platonists, the Stoics, and Philo, by this Logos, meant the Word of God, or God himself, after the manner that we understand it.

This has perplexed those who deny the divinity of the Word. To elude the authority of the Targum, Grotius has pretended, that, according to the Jews, God created a subaltern being, or secondary Deity, by whose ministry he made the world. But this Being who creates, whoever he be, must of necessity be God, since none can possess creative power but God, and that power the Targum ascribes to Memra.

Le Clerc says almost the same thing, writing on the first chapter of St. John. He maintains, that in all that Philo says of the Logos, he does not look on the Word as a distinct [Divine] person, but as an angel, or a principle, inferior to proper Deity. But though Philo might fail of due accuracy, in treating on a matter so sublime and abstruse, we are not much to wonder at it; this inaccuracy ought not to be imputed to the Word itself:—but we should inquire whether

St. John has not more accurately explained it in his gospel, who was much better informed than Philo on the nature of the Memra. We may securely rely on the authority of this divine writer, who had his instructions from Jesus Christ himself, and the inspiration of his Spirit. [The chief passages in Philo are, in his works De Mundi Opificio, and De Somniis.]

St. John, in his Gospel, in his first Epistle, and in his Revelations, has cleared up the nature of the divine Word. The councils have fixed the language of the church on this important point, and the church by its decisions has manifested its doctrine, concerning the consubstantiality of the Word, his nature, his unity, and the divinity of his person.

[It is worth while to notice the different applications of the terms Rhema and Logos, in the N. T.; because, the Eng. Tr. by one term—word,—equally expresses both. Perhaps, it were not fully satisfactory to accept the first—Rhema, as including the idea of command, authoritative dictate, efficiency; the other, Logos, that of instruction, advice, counsel. But, a few instances may elucidate this proposition.

Luke iii. 2. "the word, command, impulse, ῥῆμα, of God came unto John." Acts x. 22. "Cornelius was warned . . . to hear words, authoritative doctrines, from thee." Heb. xii. 19. "the sound of a trumpet, and the voice of words, φωνὴ ῥημάτων,—i. e. of the law given on Sinai:" So, Matt. v. 11. "Blessed are ye, . . . when men shall say all manner of evil—shall charge you falsely, for my sake." xxvii. 14. "He answered him never a word; he offered no defence to the accusations," verse 12. "of the chief priests," &c. Mark ix. 32. "The Son of Man shall be killed—and rise again. They understood not that saying, that solemn affirmation, which he then taught his disciples," verse 31. Luke vii. 1. "When he had ended all his sayings—his injunctions, precepts, dictates, in the audience of the people." xx. 26. "They could not take hold of his words—his decision—render to Cæsar," &c. John x. 20. "These are not the words, the powerful commands, of one who hath a devil: can a devil open the eyes?" &c. Acts x. 44. "While Peter yet spake these words, opened his authoritative message, the Holy Ghost fell—" xxvi. 25. "I am not mad—but speak the words, announce the doctrines, report matters of absolute fact, words of truth and soberness." Again, John iii. 34. "He whom God hath sent, speaketh the words, authoritative commands of God." v. 47. "If ye believe not the writings of Moses, how can ye believe my words, my teaching, doctrine?" et al. freq.

Hence we may gather the true sense of ῥῆμα vi. 17. "The sword of the Spirit is the word, commandment, efficient doctrine of God;" also, v. 26. "that Christ might sanctify and cleanse the Church, by the washing of water under his injunction." Several of the Fathers explain this passage in reference to the baptismal form, Matt. xxviii. 19, 20. Again, Heb. i. 3. "Upholding all things by the word of his power, the efficacy of his determination, his authority." xi. 2. "The worlds were framed by the word of God, his command, his power," &c. &c.

I do not find that Rhema is ever personified, or that personal actions are attributed to the term, but, generally speaking, when relating to events, the force of our English word facts, unquestionable facts, is intended; in other cases, authority, influence, or power.

The word, Logos, imports simple speech;—that by which the party hearing it may be instructed: also, written information,—that by which the reader may be edified. Acts i. 1. "The former treatise, λόγον, I have made."—Also, commandments, John viii. 55. Rom. xiii. 9. 1 Thess. iv. 15. et al. Prophecy, promises, disputes, threatenings, evil speakings, and, in short, whatever is the subject of words, whether good or bad. Hence, teaching in all its branches: hence, Teacher, Instructor, Wisdom; hence Heavenly Wisdom, the Heavenly Teacher, the Heavenly Instructor, &c. And this word, Logos, is personified, and personal actions are attributed to it, as in the FRAGMENT already referred to; and in the preceding parts of this article.

It is not easy to suggest English terms by which to fix this distinction in every instance; but, it is very desirable to represent the original as accurately as possible, and to avoid interchanging terms which, certainly, were not adopted by the Sacred Writers, to express such difference, without valid and efficient reasons.]

WORK, Opus. This term has several significations: Quod est opus vestrum? said Pharaoh to Joseph's brethren: what is your profession? your labour, by what do you get your livelihood? Gen. xli. 38. xlvii. 8. "God rested from his work," he ceased from producing new creatures, Gen. ii. 2. Opus Domini terribile; the terrible wonders that God performed in the midst of his people, Exod. xxxiv. 10. Works in foundry, in wood, in embroidery; works of the perfumer, of the carpenter, &c. Lev. xix. 13. Work is also often put for the management of life: Nihil puerile gerit in opere, Tob. i. 4. And to reward them according to their works, Psalm xxviii. 4. Isaiah xlii. 17. "Peace shall be the work, or rather rather the recompense of justice. And Psalm ciii. 9. Ecce opus eorum qui detraxerunt mihi; such shall be the punishment of my backbiters. And Isaiah xl. 10. Ecce opus illius coram illo. He carries with him the recompense and hire of his labours. Habak. iii. 17. Mentietur opus olivæ; the work [labour] of the olive shall lie. This tree shall not reward him who has cultivated it. 1 Mac. ii. 47. Prosperatum est opus in manibus eorum; the undertaking succeeded in their hands.

The Jews are often reproached with having worshipped the works of their own hands; the idols which they themselves had made. Isaiah, ii. 8. The work of God is sometimes put for his vengeance: "Let him make speed, and hasten his work, that we may see it," Isaiah v. 9. And chap. xxvi. 12. Lord thou wilt give us peace, for thou hast done all that has happened to us; Thou also hast wrought all our works in us: Again, xxviii. 21. The Lord prepares to do his work, but it is a work which is strange to him; he is going to labour, but this labour is very unwilling on his part. "For the Lord shall rise up, as in mount Perazim, he shall be wrath, as in the valley of Gibeon, that he may do his work, his strange work, and bring to pass his act, his strange act."

Works of the law in opposition to those of grace, are the ceremonial works of the law of Moses. Dead works are sins. The works of the flesh are those whose principle is concupiscence. Faith without works is dead, James ii. 17. Faith not enlivened by charity, and void of good moral works is useless.

WORLD, Mundus; תבל thebel; Κόσμος, Cosmos. Sometimes this word is taken,

1. For the universe, comprehending the heavens, earth, sea; the elements, angels, men, animals; in a word, all created beings. Comp. Fragments, No. DI. et seq.

2. For the globe of the earth, the waters, and all things therein contained.

3. For the race of mankind, the people. Thus Christ says to his apostles, John viii. 12. "I am the light of the world." And, xvii. 25. "O righteous Father, the world hath not known thee." And xv. 18. "If the world hate you, ye know that it hated me before it hated you."

4. For the lovers of this world, the good things of this world: John xv. 19. "If ye were of the world, the world would love his own: but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you." And St. Paul says, Gal. vi. 14. "The world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world." And St. John, 1 John ii. 15. "Love not the world, nor the things that are in the world: if any love the world, the love of the Father is not in him."

Concerning the Creation of the world, there are many questions proposed, which we shall only touch upon. It is asked, whether the whole mass of matter was created at once? whether all corporeal beings were ranged at the same time, or progressively in the space of seven days, as Moses describes? Interpreters are of opinion, that God created all the matter of the universe in an instant, by one simple act of his almighty will; but they are not agreed on the other question. Some maintain, that sensible beings were not brought to their perfection till after seven days. This is the opinion of the greater part of the fathers and interpreters, and is founded on Moses's narration, who expresses it distinctly. Besides, it cannot easily be conceived, that the chaos should settle into order, till after an infinite variety of different motions, by which the parts of matter of unlike and incompatible qualities were separated from each other, and till there should be a combination and coalescence of those which were of a similar nature; all these motions required a sufficient space of time.

Others, as Philo, Alleg. lib. i. et de Mundi, Opificio, p. 6, 41. Origen, contra Celsum, lib. vi. St. Austin, lib. iv. de Genes. ad Lit. cap. 18. et lib. xi. de Civit. cap. 7. et lib. xii. Confess. cap. 29, &c. fearing consequences contrary to the immutability and omnipotence of the Creator, from the opinion of a successive creation, thought, that nothing should be inferred from Moses's description, but a mental succession of order, and that he only represents the creation as performed in succession of time, to accommodate himself to popular apprehension, and to render his account intelligible to simple readers. The Wise Man says, Eccles. xviii. 1. "He that liveth for ever created all things in general," or together. Matter, being obedient to the commands of the Almighty, needed no preparation. This is most plausibly advanced in support of this last opinion. But the first seems the most probable, and has the greater number of followers.

It is enquired, at what season of the year the world was created? The generality of the fathers favour the spring. So determined, a council, said to have been held in Palestine, by Theophilus of Alexandria, at the instances of Pope Victor, Cancil. Palest. apud Bedam, de sex stat. Mundi. The poets describe the first days of the world as those of a fine spring season. But a great number contend, that the world was created in autumn. They urge, 1. That the Hebrews, Hebrews, the Egyptians, and most of the Orientals, began their year in autumn; which custom they had received from their ancestors, and they from the first men, who would naturally begin their year from the time when the world began. 2. When God created man and animals, he was to provide them with necessary nourishment. 3. Lastly, there was fruit on the trees in the garden of Eden: "We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden," says Eve. It was therefore autumn, in whatever place we suppose Adam to have been created. This opinion has been embraced by the most learned chronologists.

The ancient Hebrews had very different notions of the system of the universe, and the disposition of its parts, from modern philosophers and astronomers. Their system was simple, and accommodated to the apprehensions of the vulgar; and Scripture proposes it as a received opinion, to which it conforms its expressions, in order to be understood by the people, rather than as a confirmation and approbation of it, as of a doctrine requiring belief and submission. It leaves this kind of enquiry to the curiosity of philosophers: "This sore travail hath God given to the sons of men, to be exercised therewith." The Hebrews believed, that at the beginning of the creation God divided the waters into two parts, one of which sunk into the deep, and made the sea; the other was laid up above the firmament, where it supplies the rain, &c.

They thought the earth to be wholly impregnated and penetrated by the waters; that all fountains and rivers returned into the sea, from whence they were supplied. They admitted of three heavens; 1. that wherein the birds fly, and the clouds are formed; 2. that in which the stars are set; 3. that wherein the majesty of the Most High resides; whither St. Paul was transported, and where he heard words unlawful to be uttered. 2 Cor. xii. 4. See HEAVEN.

Many difficulties are started concerning the duration of the world. This duration may be considered either in respect of time past, or time future. The greater part of the ancient nations and kingdoms, of which we have any accounts remaining, differ from each other concerning the duration of the world. The Chaldeans, the Egyptians, the Chinese, the Greeks, the Hebrews, have different ways of computing the age of the world. Even the chronologers, who follow the Hebrew and the Vulgate, are not agreed among themselves. The Hebrew text of the Jews differs from that of the Samaritans; and the translation of the Septuagint varies much from the Hebrew. According to Usher, whose computation is at present generally followed, from the beginning of the world to the birth of Christ, is reckoned just four thousand years. [N. B. The common reckoning of Christ's birth, or A. D. is three years too late.]

As to the duration of the world to its final termination, this is extremely doubtful and uncertain. The Egyptians were of opinion, that after a revolution of 36,525 years, all the planets would be found on the same line, and that then the world would be renewed, either after a deluge, or a conflagration. They thought the world had already been renewed several times in such a manner. This sentiment was also common among the Greeks: but they were not agreed about the number of years of this great period. Some, as Aristarchus, assigned it 2484 years; others, as Aretes of Dyrrachium, 5552 years; Heracitus and Linas, 10,800 years; others, 18,000; Dion, 80,881; Orpheus, 100,020 years; Cassander, 3,600,000. Plato, and his school, as also Origen, were persuaded, that after a certain number of years, there was a succession of new worlds; which opinion St. Austin refutes.

[The Brahmins of India have their notions, also, on the duration of the world. They say, that after the revolution of 12,000 divine years, a periodical renovation of the world takes place. Their astronomers calculate the time when the nodes and apsides of the planets will be precisely the same as they were at the beginning of the period, "in a line of conjunction, in the first degree of Aries." Their poets multiply this by adding thousands, so that 1,728,000 poetical years are only 1728 real years; and this has caused great confusion. Somewhat of the same, probably, has affected the numbers of the poets, Orpheus, &c. among the Greeks.]

The Jews had an ancient tradition, Gemar. Abodah, Zarah, cap. 1. received from Elijah, (not the prophet of that name, but another, who lived after the captivity of Babylon; about 154 years after the rebuilding of the second temple); according to this tradition, the world was to continue 6000 years; 2000 in a state of nature, before the law; 2000 under the law; and 2000 under the Messiah. This tradition was adopted by several of the fathers, as St. Cyprian, Lactantius, Ambrose, Irenæus, Hilarius, Gauden- tius of Brescia, the author of the Orthodox Questions under the name of Justin, Jerom, Victorinus on the Revelations, Raban Maur on Deuteronomy, Isidore of Seville, and a great number of later writers. Vide apud Cornel. à Lapide, in Apoc. xi. 5. St. Austin seems pretty favourable favourable to this opinion, in his City of God, lib. xi. cap. 7. But, elsewhere, he inveighs with some vehemence against the temerity of those who dare to affirm, that the world should continue but six thousand years; whereas they were aware, that Jesus Christ, in his gospel, has declared that the Father has reserved to himself the knowledge of the time of the last day. Matt. xxiv. 36. Vide & Acts i. 6, 7. According to this sentiment, the world ought not to endure longer than about two hundred years, from A.D. 1800.

Many have thought that the world was eternal; that it always existed, and always will exist. Many have maintained, that there have been several worlds, which have succeeded one another, and that the world has been renewed several times: that matter is eternal, but that in the extent of eternity God has given it an infinite variety of forms, which we call creation; that Moses has given us the history of the last of these creations. That God's works were co-existent with himself; for being eternal and not capable of inactivity, he could not remain without action, nor leave matter to itself, without form or motion. This opinion has been espoused by a great number of Jews and Mahometans, Averroes, Avicenna, Alfaraba, and others, who made profession of following the philosophy of Aristotle. Some Christian commentators, as Grotius and Vatablus, have been of opinion, that the words of Moses, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth," may be understood, according to the Hebrew, Before God created the heaven and the earth, every thing was contained in the chaos. This would intimate the pre-existence of matter, and even its eternity, before God had given it the form which it has retained.

The question concerning the antiquity of the world was renewed in the time of Maimonides, in the twelfth century. Mose Nebochin, Par. ii. cap. 13, 14, &c. But it seems, that even in the time of Solomon, there were free-thinkers who maintained it. Eccles. i. 9, 10, 11. "The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done, is that which shall be done; and there is no new thing under the sun. Is there any thing, whereof it may be said, See, this is new? It hath been already of old time, which was before us. There is no remembrance of former things, neither shall there be any remembrance of things that are to come, with those that shall come after." They that insist on the eternity of the world never fail to quote the opinion of this prince, who was endued with so much wisdom and understanding. Maimonides wrote on purpose to confute them, and the Hebrews reject as heretics, as excommunicated persons, and cut off from Israel, those who pretend to maintain, that matter is co-eternal with God. True it is, that such Jews as defend this sentiment, endeavour to screen themselves by the authority of Maimonides himself, who, as they affirm, has not comprehended the creation of the world among the fundamental articles of the Jewish creed.

In the fifteenth century, Rabbi Samuel Sarsa endeavoured to reconcile the Pagan philosophers with Moses, on the subject of the creation of the world. Vide Menasseh Ben-Israel, de Creatione, Prov. 3. He contended that the world was created out of nothing, but was formed of pre-existent matter, in a succession of several days, as we read in Genesis. But Sarsa was condemned to be burned alive. Capanton, a Spanish Rabbi, eagerly solicited his condemnation, and he was supported by a great number of doctors of that time, and of his own nation.

Yet the Jews tolerate those who maintain, that before the world which we now inhabit, there was a former, which came to its period in the seventh millenary after its creation; and that its successor shall in like manner determine. They support this opinion by a proof of but little solidity: it is because Moses begins his account by the letter beth, which stands for two.—This proceeds from the mint of the cabalists. Other doctors teach, that God created seven things before the universe: 1. the law, or wisdom; 2. hell; 3. paradise; 4. the throne of his glory; 5. the sanctuary; 6. the name of the Messiah; 7. repentance. All this is founded on passages of Scripture, understood preposterously, and in a remote sense.

WORM, Vermis, Vermiculus. Scripture, to represent the meanness and weakness of human nature, compares it to a worm of the earth; because nothing is weaker than this creature, Psalm xxii. 6. "I am a worm, and no man, a reproach of men, and despised of the people." Words which the Son of God applied to himself, to express his state of humiliation. "Fear not, thou worm Jacob;" ye Hebrews, humbled as worms of the earth. Isaiah xli. 14.

The worm of the damned, which dies not, and the fire which ever burns. See FIRE. The figurative expression of a worm that gnaws and never dies, is taken from carrion exposed to the birds of the air, and to worms and maggots; which is sometimes consumed by fire, to prevent the stench, and the corruption of the air: Vindicta carnis impii, ignis et vermis. Eccles. vii, 17.

No one doubts about the worms and the fire that that consume carrion and carcases; but there are great disputes about the nature of the worm that gnaws the damned. Origen thought, that this was only metaphorical: and St. Ambrose expressly denies that this worm is corporeal. He maintains, that it is only remorse of conscience which gives the sinner no respite: Neque vermis est corporalis—vermis est, eò quod anima peccata mentem rei sensumque compungunt, et quadam exedunt viscera conscientiae. Jerom, on Isaiah lxvi. 24. acknowledges it as the opinion of many, that this worm consists only in the gnawings of conscience. Thomas Aquinas embraced this opinion, and has been followed by several of the schoolmen. Thom. in 4. Distinct. 50. q. 2. art. 3. ad 1 et 2. [Comp. Ecclus. vii. 17. Judith xvi. 17. Some of the ancients expressed the same thought, by saying, that the spinal marrow of a wicked man became after his death, "a huge and fierce serpent," i. e. to corrode his guilty soul by the anguish of never-dying recollections. See Ælian, Hist. Anim. lib. i. cap. 51. Marc. Anton. lib. viii. cap. 50.]

But, St. Austin, de Civit. lib. xxi. cap. 9. having carefully examined both these sentiments, declares himself for that opinion which holds this worm to be real and corporeal: Ergo tamen facilius est ut ad corpus dicam utrumque pertinere, quam neutrum. St. Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, Theophylact, Prosper, in his third book of the Contemplative Life, Anselm, Hugh of St. Victor, declare themselves of this opinion. St. Bernard, in his Books of Consideration, expresses himself in a manner favourable to each sentiment. He observes plainly, that this worm is remorse of conscience; but, at the same time, he speaks of its biting, and of its nourishment, as of a thing real and sensible. He says, speaking of an evil conscience; Hic est vermis qui non moritur, memoria præteritorum, semel injectus vel potius innatus, per peccatum, hæsit firmiter, nequaquam deinceps evellendus, nec cessat rodere conscientiam, eaque pastus, escæ utique inconsumptibili, perpetuat vitam. Horreo vermem mordacem, et mortem vivacem.

It must be confessed, that it is not easy to comprehend how a worm can act on a soul separate from the body; but is it impossible for God to effect, that by a worm, immortal and insatiable, the soul should be afflicted and tormented? as it would be, if this worm were acting on a body to which it was united by the will of the Creator. The action of the body on the soul, which animates it, is not more immediate than what might be, by the will of God, the action of a worm on a soul, a worm always gnawing, always greedy, and insatiable.

WORM, Vermiculus, is taken for scarlet. Moses repeatedly uses this term in his enumeration of the stuffs and colours employed in the veils of the tabernacle. The Hebrew words, Exod. xxv. 4. וְצִיָּה תוֹלַחַת שָׁנִי, LXX. Φαικκοῦν, a colour red as scarlet; Aqu. Διάφανον, translucent. Sym. Διαφανον, transparent. Vulg. coccum bis tinctum, or vermiculum; properly signifies the worm, coccus. Tolahat certainly signifies a worm; q. the worm called shani. Tolahat alone can only denote a worm in general; but shani alone signifies a deep red colour. Though your sins were as scarlet, (the shannim,) yet they should become as white as snow, says Isaiah, i. 18. And the spouse in the Canticles, iv. 3. says to his beloved, thy lips are like a thread of scarlet, of shani.

As the word shani may signify two or double, κόκκον διπλοῦν, Jerom in some passages has taken it for wool twice dyed, coccum bis tinctum; and the LXX. for a stuff of two threads; but it is better to understand it of the worm, coccus, in Arabic, kermes; whence comes the word crimson, because these worms are used in dyeing that colour.

The kermes or coccus, is a small round grain, or shell, membranous, thin, smooth, and shining; of a reddish brown colour, mixed with a whitish ash-colour, about a quarter of an inch in diameter, generally divided into two equal cavities, the greater of which is full of an almost infinite number of little oval eggs, very red, or vermilion colour; and the smaller cavity is full of a kind of liquor which is likewise red, and not very different from blood. This cod, or shell, is found on a dwarf kind of green oak.

These oaks are found in Palestine, in Provence, in Languedoc, in Spain, in the isle of Crete, and elsewhere. These cods, or shells, are removed from the leaves to which they are fastened, and the worms of which they are full, come out of the hole made by taking them from the leaf; they separate these little animals from the shells by a sieve, and put them together, by pressing them lightly, and make them into balls the size of a pullet's egg. They were formerly much used for dying crimson; but are not so much employed since the discovery of cochineal. The origin of the kermes is from a kind of gnat, or worm, which pierces the green oak, and makes a kind of blister, or bladder, in which it lays its eggs; these become red; and, if they have time, are hatched, and produce a prodigious quantity of little gnats of a red colour, which creeping about upon the shrub, that supplied the place of a matrix to them, they leave thereon, against the year following, the rudiments of those grains or pods

[WORMWOOD,

[WORMWOOD, Abutilum. This plant grows wild about dunghills, and on dry waste grounds. It flowers in summer; the leaves have a strong offensive smell, and a very bitter nauseous taste; the flowers are equally bitter, but less nauseous. The bitterness of this plant is mentioned in several comparisons in Scripture.]

[WORSHIP OF GOD (cultus Dei), is an act of religion: it consists in paying a due respect, veneration, and homage to the Deity, from a sense of his greatness, of benefits already received, and, under a certain expectation of reward. This internal respect, &c. is to be shewn and testified by external acts; as prayers, [sacrifices, formerly,] thanksgivings, &c.]

Worship may be taken as 1. internal, or 2. external: 1. private, or 2. public: 1. personal, or 2. social: 1. active, or 2. passive; for there is a worship of God in sentiment, in submission to his will, in intentional obedience, &c. which is not external or active, but which becomes a habit of mind, and indeed forms the mind to a devout disposition for active worship.

School-divines divide worship into divers kinds, viz. latria, that rendered to God; and idolatria, that rendered to idols or images. To which the Romanists add dulia, that rendered to saints; and hyperdulia, that to the Virgin. Some theological writers have observed, that the Greek word προσκυνω, to worship, is not descriptive only of the honour which is appropriated to God, but is, indifferently used to signify the honour and respect paid to superiors of all kinds, whether in heaven or on earth. Accordingly, they have distinguished between civil and religious worship, or adoration, and honour. Vide ADORATION.

That it is the duty of man to worship his Maker, has been sufficiently proved under other articles. It is not indeed easily to be conceived, how any one who has tolerably just notions of the attributes and providence of God, can possibly neglect the duty of private worship; and if we admit that public worship does not seem to be expressly enjoined in that system which is called the religion of nature, yet it is most expressly commanded by the religion of Christ, and will be regularly performed and promoted by every one who reflects on its great utility, or who enjoys its extensive benefits.

As the illiterate vulgar cannot form to themselves correct notions of the Divine Providence and attributes, it is obvious, that without the institution of public worship, they would never think of worshipping God at all, unless perhaps occasionally, when under the influence of terror, or the pressure of some severe calamity; but occasional worship, the offspring of compulsion, could have little of the resigned and obedient spirit of true devotion. Ignorant, however, as the lowest of the vulgar are, and necessarily must be, it cannot be denied, that in most Christian countries, perhaps in all, they are more accurately acquainted with the first principles of religion, and the laws of morality, than even the leaders of barbarous nations. This superiority is doubtless, owing in some measure to their access to the sacred Scriptures, but much more, we are persuaded, to the instruction they receive in the assemblies which they frequent for public worship. If this be admitted, public worship may easily be proved to be the duty of every individual of the community: for were those, who may be supposed to stand in no need either of the contagion of society to kindle their own devotion, or of the advantages of official instruction to enforce on their minds the doctrines and precepts of the gospel, to "forsake, on these accounts, the assembling themselves together, as the manner of some is," religious assemblies and public worship would quickly fall into disuse and oblivion. Man is prone to imitation; and every order in society is ambitious of adopting the manners of the order immediately above it. Were the wise and the good, therefore, to absent themselves from assemblies instituted for the public worship of the Creator and Redeemer of the world, others would quickly follow their example; impelled to it not only by the universal propensity to negligence, indifference and sloth, but by the additional motive of wishing to appear both to the world and to themselves, as wise and as good as their privileged neighbours. The consequence is obvious: one man would stay from church with the serious intention perhaps of employing the Lord's day in private devotion and religious study; another, following his example, would absent himself under the same pretence, but would, in reality, waste the day in dozing indolence, or in secret sensuality. For these and other reasons, which might be easily assigned, no sincere Christian will think himself at liberty to dispute a practice enjoined by the inspired preachers of his religion, sanctified by the example and conduct of Christ himself, coeval with his institutions, and retained by every sect into which Christianity has been (unhappily) divided.

Worship may be, in some sense, considered as a promulgation of laws which are to regulate personal conduct to the greatest advantage: now, if the question related to an act of parliament, either as to its meaning and effect, as to obedience to be rendered to it, or as to advantages to be derived from it, (or other statutes law, in other countries), could it admit of debate, whether he, who though unable himself to read the law, yet attends often where the law is read, and so hears it, or he who never attends at such public reading, although incapable of reading it himself,—I say, were it asked which of these persons is most likely to conform his conduct to regulations adapted to his individual advantage, and required for the general welfare, could it admit of debate? Persons who do not attend public worship forget that they withhold a testimony of their adherence to God, while they deprive themselves of whatever information and knowledge, satisfaction and comfort, complacency and enjoyment, the exercise of divine worship is adapted to produce.

For the mode of conducting public worship among the primitive Christians, vide SABBATH changed to Sunday.]

WRESTLING of Jacob. It is said, Gen. xxxii. 24. that when Jacob had sent his people over the brook Jabbok, “he was left alone, and there wrestled a man with him until the breaking of the day. And when he saw that he prevailed not against him, he touched the hollow of his thigh; and the hollow of Jacob’s thigh was out of joint as he wrestled with him. And he said, Let me go, for the day breaketh; and he said I will not let thee go, except thou bless me.” The angel blessed him, and changed his name to Israel; and Jacob called this place Peniel; q. the appearance [face] of God. Moses gives the name of “man” to him who wrestled with Jacob, but no doubt it was an angel: and the prophet Hosea, xii. 4. affirms it; “He had power over the angel, and prevailed.” Several of the ancient fathers thought it was the Son of God, the second person of the Holy Trinity, who appeared in this place. Justin, Dialog. cum Tryphone. Clem. Alex. Pædag. lib. i. Tertull. contra Praxeam. Hilar. lib. v. et xv. de Trinit. Athanas.

Orat. 8. contra Arian. &c. Some of the Rabbins have pretended that it was the angel of Esau, or rather the angel of the country of Esau, who wrestled with Jacob, to compel him to resign the right of primogeniture, which he had obtained from Esau.

As to the sinew of Jacob’s thigh, which was touched by the angel, it is thought the angel touched his thigh in that place where the great bone enters the acetabulum of the os sacrum. He touched him in the thickest and most fleshy part of the thigh, and made the sinews contract, which rendered Jacob lame. Some say, that he only halted for a few moments; others, that he halted till his arrival at Shechem; others say, that he was lame all his life. Vide SINEW.

It is enquired, whether this wrestling of Jacob was a real event, or a vision? Theodoret, Quæst. 1. 92. in Deut. and Maimonides, in More Nebochim, Par. 2. cap. 42. were of opinion, that this passed only in his mind and imagination. Jacob, being strongly possessed with the danger he was going to encounter, at meeting his brother Esau, received this vision of a man wrestling with him; who, not being able to overcome him, says to him, you shall no longer be called Jacob, but Israel; he that overpowers God: and, if you prevail in struggling with God, or with an angel, much more will you prevail when you strive only against a man, your brother Esau. As a proof that this vision was more than an ordinary dream, it seemed to him that the angel touched his thigh; and in effect, when he awoke, he found himself lame, probably by the force of his imagination.

But the general sentiment, and that which is best founded, is, that this affair really happened to Jacob. The account of Moses seems to admit of no other explication; and Jacob’s infirmity, which was a consequence of it, proves that this must be something more than a dream.

XERXES, son of Darius, son of Hystaspes, and his successor in the kingdom of Persia, A. M. 3519, ante A. D. 485. His mother was Atossa, daughter of Cyrus; and he was declared king by Darius, his father, a little before his death. To him are applied these words of Daniel, xi. 2, 3, &c. “Behold there shall stand up yet three kings in Persia, [Cyrus, Cambyses, and Darius son of Hystaspes,] and the fourth shall be far richer than they all. And by his strength through his his riches he shall stir up all against the realm of Grecia." In effect, when Xerxes had subdued the Egyptians, the Phœnicians, the isle of Cyprus, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Pavidia, Lycia, Caria, Mysia, Troas, the Hellespont, Bithynia, and Pontus, in the space of three or four years, he sent ambassadors into Greece, to demand earth and water, in token of submission. Herodot. lib. vii. cap. 25, &c. This being refused, the year following he attacked the Greeks by sea and land with a prodigious number of forces. It is well known from history, how this great undertaking miscarried. He returned to Susa, and thence to Ecbatana. He was killed A. M. 3531, ante A. D. 473; his successor was Artaxerxes, surnamed Longimanus. Xerxes reigned only twelve years.

We are informed by Josephus, Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 5. that this prince confirmed to the Jews all the privileges granted them by Darius son of Hystaspes, his father; particularly that which assigned to them the tribute of Samaria, for the charge of sacrifices offered in the temple at Jerusalem.

In the second year of his reign he marched against the Egyptians; Herodot. lib. vii. and having overcome them, he increased the yoke of their servitude. He gave the government of this kingdom to his brother Achemenes; and at the end of the year returned to Shushan.

Proud of the success of this expedition, he resolved on a war against the Grecians, at the instigation of Mardonius, son of Gobrias, who had married one of his sisters. Herodot. lib. vii. Josephus thinks, that the Jews were ordered to march with him. See SOLYMI.

After his return from this famous and unfortunate expedition, Xerxes gave orders to demo-

Strabo, lib. xiv. Cicero, de Legib. lib. ii. Æschyl. in Pennis. Herodot. lib. viii. (None was spared but that of Diana at Ephesus, probably by reason of its magnificence.) He did the same in all places through which he passed. He was induced to do this by zeal for the religion of the Magi, in which Zoroaster had instructed him, and had infused into him the utmost horror of idols and images. At his return he passed through Babylon, where he destroyed idolatry and idols, from the same motive. Strab. lib. xvi. Herodot. lib. i. Diodor. lib. ii. Arrian. *de Expedit. "I will punish Bel in Babylon, and I will bring forth out of his mouth that which he hath swallowed up. I will do judgment upon the graven images of Babylon," &c.

XYLOPHORIA, a feast of the Hebrews, in which they brought wood into the temple with great solemnity, for the support of the sacred fire that was continually burning on the altar of burnt sacrifices. We do not find this feast mentioned in Scripture; but Josephus speaks of it De Bello, lib. ii. cap. 17.

Selden will have it that this provision was laid up in the month Ab, answering nearly to our July. Others place it in the month Elul, which answers to August. The Rabbins inform us, that they prepared with great care, the wood that was to be burnt on the altar, that they made it very clean, and that they permitted no rottenness, corruption, or mouldiness among it.

YEAR. The Hebrews had always years, of twelve months. But, at the beginning, and in the time of Moses, they were solar years, of twelve months, each month having thirty days; but the twelfth month had thirty-five days. We see by the enumeration of the days of the deluge, Gen. vii. that the Hebrew year consisted of three hundred and sixty-five days. It is supposed that they had an intercalary month at the end of one hundred and twenty years; at which time the beginning of their year would be out of its place full thirty days. Vide Scaliger, de Emendat. Temporum, lib. iii. But it must be owned, that no mention is made in Scripture of the thirteenth month, or of any intercalation. It is probable that Moses retained the order of the Egyptian year, since he himself came out of Egypt, was born there, had been instructed and brought up there, and since the people of Israel had been long accustomed to this year. But the Egyptian year was solar, and consisted of twelve months of thirty days each, and had been so calculated for a very long time before.

After the time of Alexander the Great, and of the Grecians, in Asia, the Jews reckoned by lunar months, chiefly in what related to religion, and to the festivals. Eccles. xliii. 6, 7. "He made the moon also to serve in her season for a declaration of times, and a sign to the world. From the moon is the sign of feasts, a light that decreaseth in her perfection." St. John, Rev. xi. 2, 3. xii. 6, 14. xiii. 5. assigns but twelve hundred and sixty days to three years and a half, i. e. 30 days to every month, and 360 days to a year. [This is commonly called the prophetic year.] Maimonides tells us, that the years of the Jews were solar, and their months lunar; and Geminius, Isagog. cap. 6. makes the same observation on the years of the Greeks: Universi Græci annos juxta solem; menses verò et dies juxta lunam agebant. Since the completing of the Talmud, they use years purely lunar; having alternately a full month of thirty days, and a defective month of twenty-nine days. To accommodate this lunar year to the course of the sun, at the end of three years they intercalate a whole month after Adar: which intercalated month they call Ve-adar, i. e. second Adar.

The Civil Year of the Hebrews has always begun in autumn, at the month Tizri, (i. e. September, and sometimes it enters October, according as the lunations happen.) But their sacred year, by which the festivals, assemblies, and other religious acts were regulated, began in the spring, at the month Nisan, (March, sometimes including a part of April, according to the course of the moon.) Vide MONTHS, and CALENDAR of the Jews.

Nothing is more equivocal among the ancients than the term year. The year always has been, and still is, a source of dispute among the learned; as to its duration, its beginning, or its end. Some think, that from the beginning of the world to the hundred and sixtieth year of Enoch, mankind reckoned only by weeks: and that the angel Uriel revealed to Enoch the use of months, years, the revolutions of the stars, and the return of the seasons. Some nations formerly made their year to consist of one month, others of four, others of six, others of ten, others of twelve. Some have made one year of winter, another of summer. The beginning of the year was fixed sometimes at autumn; sometimes at spring; sometimes at mid-winter. Some used lunar months, others solar. Even the days have been differently divided: some beginning them at evening, others at morning, others at noon, others at mid-night. With some the hours were equal, both in winter and summer; with others they were unequal. They counted twelve hours to the day, and twelve to the night. In summer the hours of the day were longer than those of the night; on the contrary, in winter the hours of the night were longest. See Hour, and FRAGMENTS, Nos. CCLXII, CCLXIII.

Originally the Egyptians allowed but one month to their year, then two, then four months, and lastly, twelve months, Censorin. de die Natali, lib. vii. cap. 38. King Pison is said to have given it a regular form of twelve months and five days. But this regulation must have been very ancient, since Moses, who was educated in Egypt, uses no other year than that of twelve months. The Egyptians began it at the rising of the dog-star, Porphyry, de Nymphæ antro; or at the beginning of autumn, Plutarch de Iside. For it appears that they varied in this as well as in their months, [and days,] beginning them sometimes in the evening, sometimes in the morning.

We know not the form of the ancient Chaldean year, because their ancient history is lost. They boasted formerly of a prodigious antiquity, and pretended to have astronomical observations for 472,000 years, according to Diodorus Siculus, lib. ii. or 470,000 years, according to Cicero, de Divinat. lib. ii. or 720,000, according to Epigenes, quoted by Pliny, lib. vii. cap. 56. (The printed books read only 720; but the sequel of the discourse shews that it ought to be 720,000.) When Callisthenes was at Babylon, and very inquisitive to know the truth of this, he sent word to Aristotle (Vide Simplic. lib. iii. de Cælo), that he could find no observations more than 1903 years old: which brings us nearly to the time of the building of Babylon. We are assured, that they began their day at sun-rise, in honour of their principal deity, the sun. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DCCXV.

The Grecians at the beginning had no fixed year. Several people of Greece composed their year of four months, Censorin. de die Natali. Those of Arcadia first made it of one month; afterwards of three months: those of Caria and Acarmania made it sometimes of one month, sometimes of six. But from the time of Homer it appears to have been settled at twelve months. The ancient year of the Athenians was fixed at three hundred and sixty days. Pliny, lib. xxxiv. cap. 6. It was afterwards extended to three hundred and sixty-five days. They began it at the vernal equinox: their days were reckoned from evening evening to evening, and the year was divided into four seasons, spring, summer, autumn, and winter. In Homer's time they did not use the word hours, according to our manner of speaking. The word hour in this poet signifies the Seasons, Censorin. cap. 19. It was Anaximenes and Anaximander who received from the Babylonians the way of reckoning by hours. Laertius, ex Phavorino.

Among the Latins, the year of Romulus consisted of ten months, Ovid, Fast. as well as that of the Albans. It had three hundred days; began in March, and ended in December. Tarquin is said to have added to it the two months of January and February; Junius, apud Censorin. As to the civil year, the beginning was in January; because then the sun approaches us; as Ovid says, but the sacred year they continued to begin in March.

Principium capiunt Phœbus et annus idem.

The people of Lavinium formed their years of thirteen months, or 374 days. Those of Umbria made it consist of fourteen months. The Albans allotted thirty-six days to the month of March; twelve to May; twenty-eight to August; sixteen to September; those of Tusculum appointed thirty-six days to July, and thirty-two to October. Those of Aricia made it consist of thirty-nine days. Neither the Romans, nor any other people of Italy reckoned by weeks, as did the Orientals; but they had three terms for reckoning the days of every month. The kalends were always the first day of the month. In the months of March, May, July, and October, the first six days belonged to the nones. The other months of the year had but four days before the nones. From the nones to the ides were always eight days. What remained after the ides was reckoned according to its distance from the following kalends.

The Hebrews always reckoned by weeks, as a memorial of the creation of the world in seven days. They had weeks of seven years each, at the close of which was the sabbatical year: also weeks of seven times seven years, terminated by the year of jubilee; and, finally, weeks of seven days. See WEEKS.

The day was reckoned among them from evening to evening, both in their sacred and civil accounts. Moses makes no distinction in this respect between festival days and other days. The feasts began, Exod. xii. 6. ad vesperam בין הערבים Heb. inter duas vespas, i. e. between the declining and setting of the sun. After the Jews were in subjection to the Greeks, and subsequently to the Romans, they were obliged to conform to their customs to maintain order, by beginning their day at midnight, or in the morning, and by distributing the day into twelve unequal hours, as also the night. This usage is plainly expressed in Matthew, xx. 3, 4. and John xi. 9. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCLXIII.

[MANNER OF RECKONING YEARS.]

In some parts of the East, (particularly in Japan, says Baron Thunberg,) the year ending on a certain day, any portion of the foregoing year is taken for a whole year; so that supposing a child to be born in the last week of our December, it would be reckoned one year old, on the first day of January. This sounds like a strange solecism to us: a child not a week old, not a month old, is yet one year old! because born in the old year.

If this mode of computation obtained among the Hebrews, the principle of it easily accounts for those anachronisms of single years, or parts of years taken for whole ones, which occur in sacred writ; it eases the difficulties which concern the half years of several princes of Judah and Israel: in which the latter half of the deceased king's last year, has hitherto been supposed to be added to the former half of his successor's first year.

We cannot but observe how this mode of enumeration clears the phrase "three days," &c. where it occurs, reckoning as the entire first day, whatever small portion of that day was included, even if only a quarter of it; and the same as to the third day; so that a few hours pass for a whole day in this case, as a few months, or a few weeks pass for a whole year, in the other case.

This may contribute to explain a passage or two, which are not commonly seen in this light.

1 Sam. xiii. 1. "A son of one year was Saul in his kingdom; and two years he reigned over Israel," i. e. say he was inaugurated in June; he was consequently one year old as king on the first day of January following, though he had only reigned six months; the son of a year: but, after [and on?] this first of January he was in the second year of his reign, although according to our computation, the first year of his reign wanted six months of being completed: in this, his second year, he chose three thousand military, &c. guards. This passage has been noticed as a difficulty: may we now perceive the reason of this remarkable phraseology?

The same principle may account for the phrase (απο διηνος) used to denote the age of the infants slaughtered at Bethlehem, Matt. ii. 16. "from two two years old, and under." If these words as they stand, do not form an absolute contradiction, they come pretty near one.

This difficulty has been strongly felt by the learned, and has been made the most of by the antagonists of Christianity,—“What,” say they, “some infants two weeks old, others two months, others two years: equally slain! Surely those born so long before could not possibly be included in the order, which purposed to destroy a child, certainly born within a few months.” This is regulated at once, by admitting the existence of this manner of calculating time, or rather of expressing a mode of calculating time; by the idea that they were all of nearly equal age, being all recently born; some not long before the close of the old year, others not long since the beginning of the new year. Now those born before the close of the old year, though only a few months or weeks, would be in their second year, as the expression implies; and those born since the beginning of the year, would be well described by the phrase “and under,” i. e. under one year old;—Some two years old, though not born a complete twelvemonth, (perhaps, in fact, barely six months,) others under one year old, yet born three, or four, or five months; and therefore a few days younger than those previously described: “according to the time which he had diligently enquired of the wise men:”—1st their second year, and UNDER.

The influence of this remark, on the proper placing of the birth of our Lord, before the death of Herod is considerable: it lessens too the number of infants slain by his order; it draws a strong distinction between those appointed to death, and those allowed to escape; while it shortens the interval between the appearance of the star to the Magi, and their visit to Jerusalem, if I am not mistaken, full one half, of what some have allowed for it.]

YESTERDAY is used to denote all time past, however distant; as to-day denotes time present, but of a larger extent than the very day on which one speaks: Exod. xxi. 29. “If the ox was wont to push with his horn in time past; Heb. yesterday. And it came to pass, when all that knew him before time; Heb. yesterday; whereas thou camest but yesterday,” 2 Sam. xv. 20. or lately, et al. freq. “Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever.” Heb. xiii. 8. His doctrine, like his person, admits of no change; his truths are invariable. With him there is neither yesterday, nor to-morrow, but one continued to-day. Job says, viii. 9. We are but of yesterday, and know nothing; because our days upon earth are a shadow.

[YOKE. It appears that yokes were of two kinds, as two words are used to denote them in the Hebrew: one refers to such yokes as were put upon the necks of cattle, and in which they laboured: so Numb. xix. 2. the heifer which had not borne a yoke; the same Deut. xxi. 3. This yoke we presume may be seen in our PLATE, of THRESHING. Comp. FRAGS. No. XLVIII. The subjects of Solomon complain that he had made his yoke heavy to them, 1 Kings xii. 10. and they use the same word;—But Jeremiah, xxvii. 2. made him bonds and yokes of another construction, and fitted to the human neck; which he expresses by another word; most probably they were such as slaves used to wear when at labour; however, they were the sign of bondage. We read of yokes of iron, Deut. xxviii. 48. Jer. xxviii. 13. The ceremonies of the Mosaic ritual are called a yoke, Acts xv. 10. Gal. v. 1. as also tyrannical authority: but Christ says, his yoke is easy, and his burthen is light. Matt. xi. 29.]

[YOKE-FELLOW, Phil. iv. 3. The apostle in this passage entreats a person whom he calls true yoke-fellow:—some understand the word Syzigus, here rendered yoke-fellow, as a proper name, as if he had said, My honest Syzigus—(your name signifies yoke-fellow, and we have been yoke-fellows in the glorious cause of Christianity;) but others think it only implies the latter idea, of association.—Married persons are spoken of as drawing in the same yoke, 2 Cor. vi. 14. “Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers;” it is probable the apostle alludes to Deut. xxii. 10. where it is forbid to plough with an ox and an ass in the same yoke. See 1 Tim. vi. 1. Lam. iii. 27.]

[YOUNG. This word is applied not only to children, or persons little advanced in life, but also to persons long since arrived at years of maturity: so Benjamin is called a child, when above thirty years of age, Gen. xliv. 20. and Timothy is advised to let no man despise his youth, and to flee youthful lusts, when he could not be less advanced in life, but probably was more; having been in the ministry twelve or fourteen years. Vide also 1 Sam. ix. 2. xxx. 17. So we find soldiers are called young men, 2 Sam. ii. 14. “Let the young men arise and play before us,”—meaning strong, able, active, vivacious men; and the same is its meaning, Isaiah xl. 30. Even the youth, the vigorous, the robust, shall faint and be weary—perhaps, also, Prov. vii. 7. the STOUT. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DCL.]

Hippocrates says, a man is young till twenty-eight; but Varro (and I think Aristotle) extends youth to thirty-five.]

A. M. 3859, ante A. D. 145. Diodorus Siculus, lib. xxxii. gives the name of Diocles to this Zabdiel. Profane historians tell this story with some variation. They say that the generals of Alexander Balas, providing for their own security and interest, when their master retired into Cilicia, they treated privately with Demetrius Nicator, son-in-law of Ptolemy Philometor, and treacherously slew Alexander, sending his head to Ptolemy by this Zabdiel. ZABIANS, זַבְיִים Tsabiim. These are said to be ancient Chaldeans, addicted to astrology, and to the worship of the stars; their chief employment was to form Talismans under certain aspects of the planets. It is doubted whether the Zabians were a particular people, or a sect of philosophers; and whether the name denotes their religion, their country, or their situation. On this there are five or six different opinions. vide vide Spencer, de Legib. Hebr. lib. ii. cap. 1. de Zabiis. Some think that the name Zabians comes from Zaba, or rather Saba, son of Cush; or from Zabah, an army, because they worshipped the host of heaven; or from the Arabic Tzabin, which signifies the east-wind, because these people were Chaldeans, and known by the name of Orientalis. Spencer believes the best etymology is that of Scaliger, Epist. lib. i. Ep. 62. who thinks that Zabim signifies Orientalis, or Chaldeans; he thinks also this name ought not to be confined to the Chaldeans, but to be extended to all who adopted their principles; as the Egyptians, the Nabatheans, the Canaanites, Syrians, &c. So that the name of Zabian, would denote a sect, spread far and wide throughout the East. [It is very possible that this name imported holy men; peculiarly conversant with divine things: separated: it seems to imply justice, in the sense of correctness, according to the Chaldee, the Syriac, and the Arabic.]

What was the religion and philosophy of the Zabians? Some think it was the most ancient religion of the world. Some place the origin of it under Seth, the son of Adam; others under Noah; others under Nahor, the father of Terah, and grandfather of Abraham. Maimonides, More Nevoch. lib. iii. thinks that Abraham followed the religion and principles of the Zabians while he was in Chaldea. A chief article of their religion was, the worship of the stars, and a kind of magic; which makes Spencer say they were Pagans; and that their religion, so much of it as was known to the Jewish and Arabian authors, was only a corruption of Judaism, and borrowed in many things from the ancient Chaldeans, the Jews, Platonists, and Gnostics; so that a mixture of these composed their religion. He adds, that the name of Zabians, and even their religion itself, as now professed, is very modern, and not earlier than Mahomet; since neither their name, nor religion, occurs in any ancient author, Greek or Latin, nor in any work written before the Koran.

Hyde, in his Account of the Religion of the Persians, has endeavoured to prove, that the ancient Zabians were not Gentiles; that Shem and Elam were the first authors of their religion; that if afterwards it became burdened with superstitions, Abraham reformed it, and supported its reformation against Nimrod, who persecuted it: that Zoroaster came afterwards, and re-established the worship of the true God, which Abraham had taught before. True it is, that the ancient Persians, or Zabians, maintained a continual fire on their altars, and in their temples; but the same might be seen at Jerusalem, on the altar of that temple, where the priests took care that the fire never went out. They seemed to worship the sun; but he thinks this was only a secondary worship, and subordinate to that of the true God. The remains of the ancient Persians in the East constantly affirm to those who enquire of them, that this respect to the sun is only a respect of civility, such as is paid to kings, and their officers.

The unity of God, with the necessity of a Mediator, was an original persuasion throughout mankind. See PRIDEAUX Connect. P. 1. lib. iii. and the authors whom he quotes. The unity of the Godhead is discoverable by the light of nature; our need of a Mediator to obtain access to the supreme Being is a consequence of our degeneracy. But some men having no knowledge of him, or having lost what had been revealed to Adam of the qualities of the Mediator, they had recourse to mediators of their own choosing, through which they might address the supreme God. This was the first step towards idolatry. Then, observing nothing in nature of greater perfection than the stars, in which they imagined that certain intelligences resided, which animated and governed those vast bodies, they concluded that none could be fitter for the office of Mediatorship between God and themselves. And because the planets, of all the celestial bodies, are nearest to the earth, and seem to have the greatest influence over it, they ascribed to them the chief places among these mediators, and on that account made them objects of their worship.

Such was the origin of idolatry. First they set up tents, or chapels, to these powers; then they represented them by statues and images. These images at first were only regarded as sacred habitations, wherein the intelligences resided: and those who worshipped one of them, only paid it a relative adoration, with respect to the planet to which it belonged. Afterwards, they proceeded to make statues, in which they imagined, that after their consecration these intelligences were as much present by their influence, as in the planets themselves, and that prayers addressed to these were as effectual, as if addressed to the heavenly bodies. This was the origin of the worship of statues or images.

They were invested with the names of the planets they represented: as Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Apello, Mercury, Venus, and Diana. These were what the ancients called the great gods. Afterwards an opinion prevailed, that the souls of good men, after their separation from the body, might become mediators and intercessors between God and man; hence they deified deified, many whom they characterized as eminently just and good; by which the number of deities was greatly increased.

This religion took its rise among the Chaldeans: their study of astronomy contributed to incline them to it. This obliged Abraham to abandon Chaldea; from whence this worship spread through the East, into Egypt, into Greece, and among the nations of the West. The first authors of this superstition were known in the East by the name of Zabians, or Sabbeans. Maimon. Moreh Nevochim, Pocock, Specimen Histor. Arab. Thom. Hyde, Hist. Relig. veter. Persarum.

The remains of this ancient sect are still known in the East by the name of Sabbeans, which they pretend to have received from Sabius, son of Seth. They have among them a book which they ascribe to Seth, which contains the doctrine of their sect.

To this sect of the Sabbeans was diametrically opposed that of the Magi; who held idols in abhorrence, and worshipped God only by fire. They began in Persia, and spread to India, where they still subsist. They acknowledge two principles, one of good, the other of evil. See MAGI.

To return to the Zabians; as the system we have now proposed concerning their origin and progress is founded neither on matter of fact, nor on accounts of ancient historians, nor on the credit of any authentic monuments; we think ourselves obliged to acquaint the reader, that all this is an hypothesis, probable, indeed, but of small assurance.

[The Druids of Britain had many principles and practices in common with the Zabians, and with the ancient patriarchal religion. The reader of British history will improve this hint.

The reader has seen in FRAGMENTS, Nos. DI.—DIII. a much better account of the ancient Zabians, or worshippers of fire and light, from their own books: chiefly from the Desâtir, which appears to contain their principles generally; also, he has seen in Nos. DCIX.—DCXIII. and in the article JOHN the Baptist, Disciples of, a correct view of the sect properly called Sabeans; that these two sects should be confounded, so little being known of either, could not be wondered at; but, for every reason, they ought to be kept distinct, especially as the testimony borne by the latter to many particulars and incidents of Christianity, is not without its importance.

The following account from M. D'Herbelot, comprizes instances of the confusion to which we have alluded, and proves the necessity for distinguishing these sects; which the reader will easily effect, by means of the FRAGMENTS referred to.]

VOL. II. PART XXXII. Edit. IV.

ZABIANS, or SABBEANS. This religion is one of the three, to which Mahomet gave his protection, with a kind of approbation, in his Koran, chap. 2. These three religions are Judaism, Christianity, and Sabiism.

According to Houssain Vaez, in his Persian paraphrase on the Koran, the Sabians have several observances derived from Judaism, Christianity, and Mahometanism. They honour angels with a religious worship: they read the Psalms of David: they pray, turning towards the south, and sometimes towards the north. Some think they hold the principles of the Saducees.

They have a book, says M. d'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. Art. Sabi, which they ascribe to Adam: it is their rule of faith: written in characters which are very particular, but the language is almost entirely Chaldean. They venerate John the Baptist, whose disciples they profess to be. They practise baptism; whence some travellers give them the name of Christians of St. John.

Ben Schunah, a Persian author, calls the Sabians Sirians, or Syrians. According to him they are descended from the most ancient nation of the world, and use even to this day, at least in their books, the language of Adam and his children; and they have derived their religion and their law from Seth and Enoch; whose books they pretend to have, containing moral instructions, recommending the practice of virtue, and the abhorrence of vice. They pray to God seven times a day with intense application. They fast during the whole course of a moon, from sun-rise to sun-set, without eating or drinking. This fast always concludes at the summer equinox.

They honour the temple of Mecca, and have great respect for the pyramids of Egypt; for they think that Sabi, son of Edon or Enoch, is buried under the third of them. But their chief pilgrimage is to a place near Haran, (the ancient Charra, or Haran), in Mesopotamia, where, as some think, Abraham was born; and certainly, from hence he departed with his family for the land of Canaan. Some insist, that the Sabians respect this place, because of Sabi, son of Mari, who lived in Abraham's time; from whom they derive their origin, and perhaps their religion, with more probability, than from Sabi, son of Enoch, who lived before the deluge.

Ben-hazem says, that the religion of the Zabians is not only the first, and the most ancient, but was the most general (if not the only) religion of the world till the time of Abraham, from whom the other religions are descended. And in their histories the Arabians commonly describe the ancient Persians, Chaldeans, Assyrians, Grecians, Egyptians, and Indians, as Zabians, before they embraced Judaism, Christianity, or Mahometanism; and the Oriental Christians make no difficulty to affirm, that Constantine the Great quitted the religion of the Zabians for Christianity.

Some confound the Zabians with the Magians, or Guebres, or Gaures, the worshippers of fire in Persia; but the more correct carefully distinguish them.

We do not find the name of Zabians in Scripture; and our reason for mentioning them is, because the Rabbins and commentators often speak of them, pretending that Moses had them in view, in several of his ceremonial laws, either to contradict, or to rectify customs and ceremonies practised by them. See Spencer, de Legibus Hebræorum Ritualibus, lib. iii.

ZABINA, זַבִּינָא, Zaβenna, that runs now; from זָבַז zub, to run or flow, and נָא na, now: otherwise, that buys; from the Chaldee זָבַן za-ban. One who dismissed his foreign wife after the return from Babylon. Ezra x. 43.

ZABUD, זָבֻד, portion, or endowed; from זָבַד zabad, a dowry. Son of Nathan, a favorite of king Solomon. 1 Kings iv. 5.

ZACCAI, זַכַּי, Zaxaia, pure, clean; from זָכַךְ zacac; according to the Syriac, just, or justified. His children returned from Babylon in number seven hundred and sixty. Ezra ii. 9.

ZACCHEUS, Ζακχαῖος. See ZACCAI.

I. ZACCHEUS. Judas Maccabæus left Simon, Joseph, and Zaccheus, to besiege the sons of Bean, in two towers. 2 Macc. x. 19. 1 Macc. v. 4, 5. A.M. 3840, ante A.D. 164. But Simon's people being bribed, permitted some to escape. Judas put these traitors to death. It is not plain that Joseph, Simon, or Zaccheus, had any share in this treachery.

II. ZACCHEUS, chief of the Publicans; i.e. farmer-general of the revenue, [for a district, perhaps, rather than for a province.] Luke xix. A.D. 33. a little before the death of our Saviour. When Jesus Christ passed through Jericho, Zaccheus greatly desired to see him, but could not, because of the multitude, and because he was low of stature. He therefore ran before, and climbed up into a sycamore-tree. When Jesus came to the place, he looked up to him, and said, Zaccheus make haste and come down, for to-day I must abide at thy house. Zaccheus immediately came down, and received him joyfully. Those who saw this murmured, and said within themselves, He is gone to be a guest with a man a sinner! In the mean time Zaccheus said to Jesus, Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor; and if I have taken any thing from any man by false accusation, I restore him four-fold. The Roman laws condemned Publicans convicted of extortion, to make restitution to four times the value. Jesus Christ answered him, This day is salvation come to this house, forasmuch as he also is a son of Abraham. This is all that Scripture informs us of Zaccheus the Publican.

[Notwithstanding the general disrepute of Publicans or tax-gatherers, Zaccheus could not have acquired all his property by injustice; nor one eighth part of it; if half would have enabled him to make four-fold restitution: indeed, he seems rather to say, that he had not wronged any, by his use of the particle if. Considering the general character of these collectors, he appears to have been an exemplary man.]

Some have thought, that Zaccheus was a Gentile: but the opinion of commentators is, that he was a Jew: for many of this nation exercised the employment of a Publican. Clemens Alexandrinus says, Strom. lib. iv. that many did not distinguish Zaccheus from St. Matthew, pretending he was advanced to the apostleship after the death of Judas. Others have affirmed that St. Peter ordained him bishop of Cæsarea in Palestine. Constit. Clem. lib. vii. cap. 46. Recognit. lib. iii. cap. 65, 74. Rufin. Prefat. Recognit. Vide et Chrysolog. homil. de Zachæo. But it is probable they confounded him with another Zaccheus, bishop of this church in the second century. Prædestinat. Serm. cap. 11, 13.

ZACCHUR, זָכֹר, that remembers, or is remembered: otherwise male; from זָכַר zacar, male, or memory. [memorial.]

I. ZACCHUR, ZACCUR, ZACHUR, or ZECHUR, father of Shammua, of Reuben. Numb. xiii. 4.

II. ZACCHUR, son of Hamuel, and father of Shimei. 1 Chron. iv. 26.

III. ZACCHUR, a Levite, of the family of Merari. 1 Chron. xxi. 27.

IV. ZACCHUR, a Levite and singer, son of Asaph. 1 Chron. xxv. 2.

V. ZACCHUR, or Zabbud, son of Bigvai or Imri; he returned from the captivity of Babylon with his brother Ushai, and seventy of their family, [Zabbud]. Ezra viii. 14. Neh. iii. 2.

ZACHARIAH, זַכְרְיָה, memory of the Lord, or male of the Lord; from זָכַר zacar, memory, or male, and יָה jah, the Lord.

I. ZACHARIAH, or Zaccariah; of Reuben, chief of a family. 1 Chron. v. 7.

II. ZACHARIAH,

II. ZACHARIAH, king of Israel, succeeded his father Jeroboam II. A. M. 9220, ante A.D. 784. He reigned but six months, and did evil in the sight of the Lord. 2 Kings xiv. 29. Shal-lum, son of Jabesh, conspired against him, killed him in public, and reigned in his stead. Thus was fulfilled what the Lord had foretold to Jehu; that his children should sit on the throne of Israel to the fourth generation. 2 Kings xv. 8—11.

III. ZACHARIAH, son of Meshelemiah, a porter of the tabernacle; of the race of Korah. 1 Chron. ix. 21.

IV. ZACHARIAH, a Levite, and doctor of the law: one sent by king Jehoshaphat throughout Judah, to instruct the people, 2 Chron. xvii. 7. A. M. 3092, ante A. D. 912.

V. ZACHARIAH, son of Jehoiada, high-priest of the Jews; probably the Azariah of 1 Chron. vi. 10, 11. He was slain by order of Joash, A. M. 3164, ante A. D. 840. Scripture observes, 2 Chron. xxiv. 20, 21, 22. "Joash the king remembered not the kindness which Jehoiada, father of Zachariah, had done to him, but slew his son: and when he died, he said, The Lord look on it, and require it." The year following God sent the army of Syria against Judah, which entered Jerusalem, slew the princes of the people, and sent a great booty to Damascus.

Jerom, on Matt. xxiii. followed by a great number of commentators, believed that this Zachariah, son of Jehoiada, was he of whom our Saviour speaks, Matt. xxiii. 34, 35. "I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes; and some of them ye shall kill and crucify... that on you may come all the righteous blood shed on the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zachariah, son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar." The difference of names of these fathers, Jehoiada and Barachiah, does not move Jerom, or those who follow him: they observe, 1. That in the Hebrew Gospel of St. Matthew, used by the Nazarenes, was read Jehoiada, not Barachiah. 2. That among the Hebrews nothing was more usual than to have two names. Examples of this are common in Scripture; and it is very easy to imagine, that the same person might be called Barachiah and Jehoiada.

To this opinion three things are objected: 1. That Zachariah, son of Barachiah, according to the intention of Jesus Christ, seems to have been the last of the prophets, or just, slain by the Jews, as Abel was the first of the just who suffered a violent death. 2. That Zachariah son of Jehoiada was stoned in the court of the house of God; whereas Zachariah, son of Barachiah, was killed between the temple and the altar. 3. That though it be true that the Hebrews had often two names, it is hardly to be thought that Jesus Christ would here omit the name of Jehoiada, which was so well known, and substitute that of Barachiah, which was not so familiar. Vide ZACHARIAH, No. XII. We rather incline to believe that our Saviour points at Zachariah, son of Baruch.

VI. ZACHARIAH, the eleventh of the lesser prophets. He was son of Barachiah, and grandson of Iddo. He returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, and began to prophecy in the second year of Darius, son of Hystaspes, A. M. 3484, ante A. D. 520, in the eighth month of the holy year, and two months after Haggai. These two prophets, with united zeal, encouraged the people to resume the work of the temple, which had been discontinued for some years, Ezra v. 1. The time, and place, of birth, of Zachariah, are unknown. Some think he was born at Babylon, during the captivity: others think, at Jerusalem, before Judah and Benjamin were carried away. Some suggest that he was a priest; others see no proof of it. Many say he was son of Iddo: others, with much more reason, that he was son of Barachiah, and grandson of Iddo. Zech. i. 1.

He has been confounded with Zechariah, son of Barachiah, contemporary with Isaiah; viii. 2. and with Zachariah, the father of John the Baptist; which opinion is plainly incongruous. He has been thought to be the Zachariah, son of Barachiah, whom our Saviour mentions as killed between the temple and the altar; though no such thing is any where said of this prophet. At the foot of mount Olivet, they shew a tomb which they pretend belongs to the prophet Zachariah. Dorotheus maintains, that he was buried in a place called Bethariah, a hundred and fifty furlongs from Jerusalem.

Epiphanius ascribes to him some prophecies composed while he was at Babylon: which foretold the birth of Jesus, or Joshua, son of Josedech, and of Zerubbabel, son of Salathiel; also, that he predicted to Cyrus the victory he should obtain over Croesus and Astyages, and that he should restore at Jerusalem the public exercise of religion. But we make small account of such particulars, which are not in Scripture.

Zachariah begins his prophecy with an exhortation to the people, to return to the Lord, and not to imitate the stubbornness of their fathers.

In the fourth year of Darius, A. M. 3486, ante A. D. 518, on the fourth day of the ninth month, the prophet was consulted by Sherezer, Regem-melech, and others, whether they ought to continue to fast on the fifth month, as they had hitherto done, since the ruin of the temple? He answered, that these fasts were of their own invention; that what God chiefly required of them was piety and justice; and that, finally their days of fasting should be soon changed into days of joy and thanksgiving.

He foretels very distinctly, the coming of Jesus Christ, a Saviour, poor, and sitting on an ass, and a colt the foal of an ass. In the eleventh chapter he speaks of the war of the Romans against the Jews, of the breach of the covenant between God and his people; of thirty pieces of silver given for a recompense to the shepherd; of three shepherds put to death in one month, &c.

Zachariah is the longest and the most obscure of the twelve minor prophets, says Jerom. Præfat. in lib. i. Zach. His style is broken and unconnected. His prophecies concerning the Messiah, are more particular and express than those of some other prophets. Several modern critics, as Mede, Epist. lib. iv. 31. and Hammond, on Matth. have been of opinion, that chap. ix. x. xi. of this prophet were written by Jeremiah; because in Matthew xxvii. 9, 10. under the name of Jeremiah, we find quoted Zach. xi. 12. and as the chapters make but one continued discourse, they concluded, that all three belonged to Jeremiah. But it is much more natural to suppose, that the name of Jeremiah, by some unlucky mistake, has slipped into the text of St. Matthew.

The prophet Zachariah foretold very exactly, the siege of Babylon, by Darius, son of Hystaspes. This prince laid siege to that rebellious city at the beginning of the fifth year of his reign, and reduced it at the end of twenty months. Zachariah, a little before the time of her fall, writes thus to the Jews in Babylon; "Ho, ho, come forth, and flee from the land of the north, saith the Lord: for I have spread you abroad as the four winds of the heavens, saith the Lord. Deliver thyself, O Sion, that dwellest with the daughter of Babylon. For thus saith the Lord of hosts; After the glory hath he sent me unto the nations which spoiled you: for he that toucheth you toucheth the apple of his eye. For, behold, I will shake mine hand upon them, and they shall be spoil to their servants: and ye shall know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me." Zech. ii. 6, 7, 9. There is great probability that the Jews obeyed these admonitions, and retired from Babylon, if not into their own country, at least, into a place of security. Vide BABYLON.

The Mahometans do not distinguish between the prophet Zachariah, and Zachariah father of John the Baptist. D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 922. Some of them derive his pedigree from David; others from Levi.

VII. ZACHARIAH, son of Barachiah, or Jeberechiah, mentioned Isaiah viii. 2. According to Jerom, in loc. this is the prophet described 2 Chron. xxvi. 5. under the reign of Hezekiah, or rather under the reign of Azariah or Uzziah. "And he sought God in the days of Zachariah, who had understanding in the visions of God." This Zachariah might live to the reign of Ahaz, A. M. 3262, when the Lord said to Isaiah, "Take thee a great roll, and write in it . . . And I took unto me faithful witnesses to record, Uriah the priest, and Zachariah, son of Jeberechiah." These two persons might authenticate a testimony, that at such a time the prophet had foretold that he should have a son, and that before this son should be able to name father or mother, Resin and Pekah, the two enemies of Judah, should be destroyed. Vide ALMAH.

VIII. ZACHARIAH, father of Abi, or Abijah, mother of king Hezekiah. 2 Kings xviii. 2. 2 Chron. xxix. 1.

IX. ZACHARIAH, a Levite, of the race of Asaph. 2 Chron. xxix. 13.

X. ZACHARIAH, the father of Joseph, under the Maccabees. 1 Macc. v. 18, 56.

XI. ZACHARIAH, a priest of the family of Abia, father of John the Baptist, and husband to Elizabeth. Luke l. 5, 12, &c. This is what we read in the gospel: "Zachariah and Elizabeth were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless. And they had no child, because Elizabeth was barren, and they both were now well stricken in years." But A. M. 3999, about fifteen months before the birth of Jesus Christ, as Zachariah was waiting his week, and performing the functions of priest, in the temple, "according to the custom of the priest's office, his lot was to burn incense when he went into the temple of the Lord," on the altar of gold in the holy place. "And there appeared unto him an angel of the Lord standing on the right side of the altar of incense. And when Zachariah saw him, he was troubled, and fear fell upon him. But the angel said unto him, Fear not Zachariah: for thy prayer is heard; and thy wife Elizabeth shall bear thee a son, and thou shalt call his name John. And Zachariah said unto the angel, Whereby shall I know this? for I am an old man, and my wife well stricken in years. And the angel answering said unto him, I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God; and am sent to speak unto thee, and to show thee these these glad tidings. And, behold, thou shalt be dumb, and not able to speak, until the day that these things shall be performed, because thou believedst not my words, which yet shall be fulfilled in their season." See ANNUNCIATION, also FRAGMENTS, No. DCX.

The people were waiting till Zachariah came forth out of the holy place; and they were surprised at his long delay. But when he came out he was not able to speak; by his making signs to them, they found that he had seen a vision, and was become dumb. When the days of his ministry were completed, i. e. at the end of about a week, he returned to his own house; and his wife Elizabeth conceived a son, of whom she was happily delivered in its due time. Her neighbours and kinsfolks assembled to congratulate her on this occasion; and on the eighth day they circumcised the child, calling his name Zachariah, after the name of his father: but Elizabeth interposed, and said, No: his name is John. They then desired a token from his father, how he would have him named; he, making signs for a tablet, wrote on it, his name is John, which excited the admiration of all present. At this instant his tongue was loosed, and he spake, praising God. And being filled with the Holy Ghost, he prophesied, by a canticle, which St. Luke has preserved, chap. ii. Comp. FRAGMENTS, No. DCXLI.

St. Ambrose, lib. i. in Luc. Beda, Theophyl. Strab. Brug. in Luc. St. Austin, in Joan. Homil. 49. St. Chrysostom, and several others, have conjectured that Zachariah was high-priest, on a false supposition, that the offering of incense was reserved to the high-priest: but it appears from St. Luke himself, that he was an ordinary priest, of the family, or course, of Abia; and it is certain besides, that the ordinary priests went every day into the sanctum. The Protevangelium of James and the spurious Gospel of the Nativity of the Virgin, affirm, or at least suppose, that Zachariah, the father of John the Baptist, was high-priest: but the authority of such pieces is very inconsiderable.

The same Protevangelium of James insinuates, that when Herod caused the young John, afterwards the Baptist, to be searched for, in order to destroy him with the other children of Bethlehem, not being able to find him, because his mother Elizabeth had sent him into the wilderness; the king sent to Zachariah, then attending his ministry at the altar, to enquire where his son was? Zachariah sent word, that he knew nothing of him. Herod sent the soldiers back, with orders to kill him, if he would not discover where his son was. Zachariah still protested to them with an oath, that he knew nothing of him; whereupon they killed him between the porch and the altar, in the inclosure that surrounded the altar of burnt-sacrifices. Neither the priests, nor the other Israelites knew when he was killed; and one of the priests finding he stayed too long, entered into the temple, found him dead, and his blood congealed on the ground. At the same time he heard a voice, saying, "Zachariah has been put to death, and his blood shall not be wiped out till his revenger comes."

It was doubtless on this foundation that many of the ancients thought Zachariah, the father of John the Baptist, to be that Zachariah, son of Barachiah, whose blood was shed between the temple and the altar. Origen, in Matt. xxvi. Petr. Alex. cap. xiii. Basil, lib. i. Homil. 25. Nyssen, tom. iii. Homil. de Natal. Christ. Epiphanius, de vita et morte Prophet. Theophylact, &c. Tertullian, Scorpiac. cap. 8. speaks of the blood of Zachariah, the marks of which were still visible on the pavement of the temple. These marks were pretended to be yet visible also in the time of Jerom, who gave but little credit to them, as plainly appears by his commentary on Matthew xxiii. 35. Vide, si placet, et Athanas. tom. ii. p. 697.

The Greeks honour Zachariah September 5, as a priest, a prophet, and a martyr. Usuard, Ado, and other Latins, honour him as a prophet, November 5. The Roman martyrology joins Elizabeth with him.

XII. ZACHARIAH, son of Baruch, was a great enemy to all injustice and evil, and the greatest assertor of the liberty of his country. Joseph. de Bello, lib. iv. cap. 19. in Græco, seu lib. v. cap. 1. in Lat. The zealots, though resolved to destroy him, as a great opposer of their designs, and very rich and powerful, yet determined to observe some sort of formality in his condemnation: they convened seventy judges of the most considerable people, to compose a kind of tribunal or sanhedrim, where they made Zachariah son of Baruch appear, and accused him of a design to deliver up the city to the Romans. But of this conspiracy they could produce neither proofs, nor tokens.

Zachariah seeing his accusers resolved on his destruction, and escape impossible, instead of being discouraged by the danger, was more than ordinarily animated. Having briefly confuted the accusations of his enemies, he began to expose their iniquity, and their proceedings to disturb the public tranquillity. At this the zealots were incensed with rage, and could hardly contain themselves: but thinking it best to hold out to the end, that they might give his trial some some appearance of justice, they suffered the seventy judges to pronounce their sentence. This they did by unanimously acquitting Zachariah.

The zealots cried out with rage and fury, and two of those wretches flying on Zachariah, killed him in the midst of the temple, insulting his dead body with these words, "Receive now this absolution that we give thee, which is much more safe than the other." Then they threw his body into the valley below the temple. This happened A. D. 67, three years before the taking of Jerusalem.

Many learned commentators, as Grotius, Hammond, Louis de Dieu, Constantine l'Empereur. Jansen, on Matthew, have thought that this was the Zachariah, son of Baruchiah, mentioned by Jesus Christ, Matt. xxiii. 35. They say, that Christ spoke in the manner of the prophets; using the time past instead of the future.

It is objected against this opinion, first, that our Saviour denounces to the Jews, that they shall bear the punishment of the death of these just men. But God does not punish a crime before it is committed. The Jews to whom he spake not knowing this Zachariah, and being ignorant of his death, which was yet future, it would be impertinent to menace them on that account. Secondly, Zachariah, son of Baruch, killed by the zealots, was a Jew, and according to all appearances, an unbelieving Jew. Josephus says not one word that insinuates he had embraced Christianity. The old ecclesiastical writers did not own him as such. The zealots that slew him had no regard to his religion, but to his great riches. They were afraid that by his great interest he might drive them away, and therefore accused him of keeping correspondence with the Romans. If Zachariah had been a Christian, it is not probable that he would have been in the city A. D. 67.

These reasons, however, are thus replied to. It is allowed, that men cannot ordinarily be threatened for crimes not yet committed; but it is no rare thing to observe in the prophets, the destruction of a city, the calamity of a people, the death of a prince foretold, as if their crimes were already at their full measure, although their punishment be still distant. It is true, indeed, that neither Josephus, nor any other ancient writer, has said that Zachariah was a Christian; neither have they said the contrary. Josephus speaks of St. James the less, slain by Ananus, as a Jew. At that time Christians were looked on as a sect of Jews. And though the Christians of Jerusalem might have begun to withdraw themselves to Pella, about A. D. 66, four years before the siege; yet, in the year 67, it was time enough, two years before the city was invested.

In the valley of Jehoshaphat, over against Jerusalem, is to be seen a monument, said to be the tomb of Zachariah. It is cut in the rock; has four pillars on each side, with capitals, the entablature of which supports a roof rising to a point, like a pyramid. This monument is square, and is fourscore feet in circumference. There is a little window behind, through which there are seen within only a few stones one upon another. Vide PLATES, MAP of JERUSALEM, Margin.

[Though Calmet seems to acquiesce in referring prophetically to this Zachariah, yet I think it worth while to observe, that righteous Abel is the first martyr to truth and piety recorded in the Old Testament, Gen. iv. 8. and that Zachariah is the last person mentioned as slain on account of his reproving the wickedness of his times. 2 Chr. xxiv. 20, 21. Is not this reference then, equal to—all the righteous men mentioned in Scripture—all whom your ancient history records—from the first to the last of them.]

From the decease of Eli the high-priesthood had been in the family of Ithamar; but was restored to the family of Eleazar, in the time of Saul, in the person of Zadok, who was put in the place of Ahimelech, slain by Saul, A. M. 2944, ante A. D. 1056. 1 Sam. xxii. 17, 18. While Zadok performed the functions of the priesthood with Saul, Ahimelech performed them with David; so that till the reign of Solomon there were two high-priests in Israel; Zadok of the race of Eleazar, and Ahimelech of the race of Ithamar. 2 Sam. viii. 17.

When David was forced to quit Jerusalem by the rebellion of his son Absalom, Zadok and Abiathar would have accompanied him, with the ark of the Lord. 2 Sam. xv. 24. But David would not permit them. To Zadok he said, O seer, return into the city with Abimaash your son, and let Abiathar and his son Jonathan return also. I will conceal myself in the country, till you send me news of what passes. Zadok and Abiathar returned therefore to Jerusalem; but their two sons Abimaash and Jonathan hid themselves near the fountain of Rogel; and when Hushai the friend of David, had defeated the counsel of Ahitophel, they communicated this event to David.

After the defeat of Absalom, David sent word to Zadok and Abiathar, to persuade the elders of Judah to shew their zeal for the king, by promptly inviting his return to his metropolis. 2 Sam. xix. 11, 12.

The high-priest Zadok counteracted the party of Adonijah, who aspired at the kingdom, to the exclusion of Solomon; 1 Kings i. 5—10, &c. and David sent Zadok with Nathan, and the chief officers of his court, to give the royal unction to Solomon, and to proclaim him king instead of his father.

After the death of David, Solomon excluded Abiathar from the high-priesthood, because of his adherence to the party of Adonijah; and Zadok was high-priest alone. 1 Kings ii. 35. It is not very well known when he died; but his successor was his son Ahimaash, who enjoyed the high-priesthood under Rehoboam.

II. ZADOK, son of Ahitub, and father of Shallum, high-priest of the Jews: under the reign of Jotham, king of Judah.

ZAHAM, זָחַם, Zaàm, crime, filthiness, impurity; from זָחַם ziem, naught, impure. Son of Rehoboam and of Abihail, daughter of Eliab. 2 Chron. xi. 19. [from the Arabic, very fat.]

ZAIR, צַעִיר, Ṣa'ir, little; from צָעַר tsahar. See ZOAR. Otherwise, afflicted, in tribulation.

ZAIR, or SEIRA. The country, or mountain, of Seir, inhabited by the Idumeans. 2 Kings viii. 21. "So Joram went over to Zair, and smote the Edomites;" צַעִירָה Zeira, instead of צַעִיר Zeir, according to the rules of the Hebrew language, intimates a motion towards Zeir, or Zair. The Hebrew reads Zeira; but we think it to be a fault, and that it should be read Seira. [q. a local pronunciation?]

ZALAPH, צֶלֶף, shadow, or tingling of the ear, or smiling; from צָלַל tsalal, shadow, &c. and the Chaldee צֶלֶף tsalaph, to break. [one who breaks out, who opens; i. e. the first-born of his mother. Neh. iii. 30.]

ZALMON, צֶלְמֹן, his shade, his obscurity, his image; from צָלַם tsalum, shade, image, &c. and the pronoun ׁ, an, his. [very shady.]

ZALMON, SALMON, or SELMON, a mountain near Shechem, [overshadowed with trees, &c.] Judg. ix. 48. The snow of Zalmon is mentioned Psalm lxxviii. 14. [The Latin as well as the Hebrew takes shadow in the sense of protection, security: so does the Arabic: whether this mountain might be overshadowed with fortifications, or other defences?]

ZALMONAH, צֶלְמוֹנָה, the shade, or sound of the number; from צָלַל tsalal, shade, &c. and מִנָּה manah, number: otherwise, your image, or picture, from צֶלֶם tselem, image, picture, and the pronoun ׁ, yours, or ours. [The feminine of ZALMON, and of the same import.]

ZALMONAH, or SALMONA, or SELMONA, an encampment of Israel in the desert. Numb. xxxiii. 41. Some think that here Moses set up the brazen serpent. [The idea of protection may be derived from the elevation of the brazen serpent in this place.] See PUNON.

ZALMUNNA, צֶלְמוֹנוֹ, shadow, image, or idol, forbidden; from צֶלֶם tselem, shade, and מָנָע manah, to forbid; or נֹעַ nuah, to be shaken; or, noise of trouble; from צָלַל tsalal, noise, and manah, trouble. [shade: i. e. protection.]

ZALMUNNA, or SALMANA, prince of the Midianites, Judg. viii. 5. defeated by Gideon, A. M. 2759, ante A. D. 1245.

ZAMZUMMIM, זִמְזִמִּים, project of crimes, or enormous crimes; from זָמַם zamam.

ZAMZUMMIN, ZOMZOMIM, or ZUMIN; ancient giants who dwelt beyond Jordan, in the country afterwards inhabited by the Ammonites. Deut. ii. 20. [The high-headed; proud, lofty.]

[ZANOACH, a straggling village, or town: long, and its parts distant. The name of two towns in Judah. Josh. xv. 34, 56. Neh. iii. 13. xi. 30. 1 Chron. iv. 18.]

ZANOAH, זָנוּחַ, Zanw, forgetfulness, or desertion; from זָנַח zanach: otherwise, this rest, this consolation; from the pronoun ׁ ze, this or that, and נָח nuach, rest, or נָחַם nacham, consolation.

ZANOAH, or ZANOE, son of Jekuthiel. 1 Chron. iv. 18. But I rather think that Zanoah was a city, built or inhabited by Jekuthiel and his posterity.

ZAPHNATH-PAANEAH, or PSEUTHOPANECH. LXX. Gen. xli. 45. Ψευδοφανεχ. Joseph. Antiq. lib. ii. cap. 3. Ψονδοφανηχαν. Thus the Septuagint, and after them Josephus, express the name given by Pharaoh to Joseph. Moses says, he called him צַפְנָת פַּעֲנֵחַ Zaphath-paaneah, which Jerom translates Salvatorem mundi; but the greater part of interpreters render it one that discovers hidden things.

ZAPHON, צָפוֹן, hidden, or that observes; [watchman, centinel,] from שָׁפַן shuph: otherwise NORTH; from צָפוֹן tsaphon. [Hidden, says Simon; surrounded on all sides by mountains. The Arabic root expresses the north-wind.] A city of Gad. Josh. xiii. 27.

ZARAH, צָרַח, leprosy, or scab; from צָרַח tsarah. A city. Joshua xix. 41 [gathering; mob.]

ZARAH, זָרַח, son of Judah and Tamar. When his his mother was in labour of him and his brother, Zarah presented his hand, and the midwife tied a red ribbon about it, saying, this will be the first-born; but this child withdrawing his hand, his brother was born first, and was called Pharez, Gen. xxxviii. 28, 29. Zarah had five sons, Ethan, Zimri, Heman, Calcol, and Dara.

ZARA, a city of Moab. Josephus says, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 23. that Alexander Jannæus took this city.

ZARAITÉ, זָרַיִת, my east, my brightness, 1 Chron. xxvii. 11. [light rising up, i. e. out of darkness, as day break: the same, also, may be the import of Zarah, son of Tamar.]

ZARED, זָרַד, strange descent, or power: from רָדָד radad, to descend, to put under, or רָדָה radah, power, and זָר zar, strange. [otherwise, extraneous things, or scattered power. The Chaldee root implies "a green tree, growing so luxuriantly that its branches may be separated from it." Jonathan the Paraphrast thinks it is the willow: more probably it is of the nature of our oxiars. "The valley of oziar beds."]

ZARED, or ZERED, a brook beyond Jordan, on the frontier of Moab. It falls into the Dead-sea. Numb. xxi. Deut. ii. 13, 14.

ZAREPHATH, or SAREPTA, צָרְפָּתָה, ambush of the mouth; from צָרַר tzarar, to lie in ambush, and פֶּת path, mouth, mouthful: otherwise, crucible, in which metals are melted; from צָרַף tzaraph, to melt, to purify. [perhaps, puffing or blowing, as of the cheeks in blowing a fire; or, of bellows in larger operations.]

[This name appears to signify melting, or blowing, i. e. of glass, from the root Zareph, to liquify, to blow, to melt in fire: it was, probably, a station of glass-houses, so that the name may be taken as analogous to what we term "smelting houses," or furnaces. And indeed some suppose that it was a place famous for refining of metallic ores, somewhat like what we call a blast furnace. It is called Sarepta in the Greek of Luke iv. 26. It is reckoned to the tribe of Asher. Deut. xxiii. 25. in which tribe Sarepta was situated.]

ZAREPHATH, or SAREPTA, a city of the Sidonians, between Tyre and Sidon, in Phœnicia, on the coast of the Mediterranean sea. Pliny and Stephanus call it Sarapta; the Arabians, Tzarphaud; Josephus and the Greeks, Sarephta, or Saraphtha; the Jews, Zarphat. The Arabian geographer Scherif-ibn-Edris, places it twenty miles north from Tyre, and ten south from Sidon. It was remarkable for being the residence of the prophet Elijah, with a poor woman here, during a famine in the land of Israel. 1 Kings xvii. 9, 10. In the time of Jeram, and a good while after, they used to show the place where the prophet dwelt, which was a little tower. Afterwards they built a church in the same place, in the midst of the city. The wine of Sarepta was not unknown to the ancients. Vide WINE;

At this time Sarepta is a small village standing on a hill about fifteen hundred paces from the sea. [But Maundrell says, there are considerable ruins between this hill and the sea.] It was from the city of Sarepta that Jupiter, in the shape of a bull, carried off Europa.

ZARETH-SHAHAR, צֶרֶת-הַשָּׁחַר, Σαρδ κασιον, position, or plan of the morning; from צָרַח tsurah, to put, and שָׁחַר shachar, the morning: otherwise, link of ambushes, or figure of blackness; from צָרַר tsarar, to join or lay ambushes, or from צֹר tzur, to figure, and שָׁחַר shachar, blackness; or from יָצַר jatzar, to form, and שָׁחַר shachar, the morning; that is, formation of the morning. [Rather, splendor of the morning; a city situated on a hill, or mountain, so that the earliest rays of the sun were reflected from it, and rendered it visible and bright very early in the morning.]

ZARETH-SHAHAR, or SARAT-ASAR, a city of Reuben, beyond Jordan. Josh. xiii. 19.

[ZARETAN, was in the land of Manasseh on this side Jordan: it is called Zartanah, 1 Kings iv. 12. and is said to be near Beth Sheu, which was in the northern limits of Manasseh. From Adam to Zaretan the waters dried up; Josh. iii. 16. from Zaretan upwards, they stood on a heap. The brazen vessels for the temple were cast in the clay ground between Zaretan and Succoth. 1 Kings vii. 46. Vide ZEREDATHAN. [Eng. Tr. Zarthan, q. the narrows? of the stream, or of the town]

ZATTHU, זָתָה, Ζουθδολα; Ζαδουα, olive, or olive-tree; from זָתָה zith. One who renewed the covenant with the Lord, after the return from Babylon. Neh. x. 14. [ornament; decus.]

ZATTU, from the same root as ZATTHU.

ZATTU returned from Babylon with nine hundred and sixty persons of his family. He is very probably the same as Zatthu, in the foregoing article. Ezra ii. 8.

ZAZA, זָזָא, beast; from זָזָא zia; or universat, or that glitters: [splendid?] according to the Syriac, that draws back.

ZAZA,

ZAZA, or ZIZA, son of Jonathan, of the race of Jerahmeel, son of Hezron, of Judah. 1 Chron. ii. 33.

ZEAL, Zelus; Heb. קנא, kanah, is taken,

1. For the eagerness with which any thing is pursued. "I have been very jealous (or zealous) for the Lord God of hosts;" 1 Kings xix. 10, 14. I burn with zeal for his honour. "Phinehas was zealous for his God, and made an atonement for the children of Israel." Numb. xxv. 13. Judith says, that Simeon and his brethren were filled with the zeal of the Lord, to revenge the injury done to their sister. Judith ix. 4.

2. Zeal is put for anger, 2 Kings xix. 31. "The zeal of the Lord of hosts shall do this;" i. e. his anger: Psalm lxxix. 5. "How long, Lord, wilt thou be angry? for ever? shall thy jealousy, or zeal, burn like fire? The whole land shall be devoured by the fire of his jealousy, or zeal. Zeph. i. 18. iii. 8.

3. Zeal is put for jealousy, Prov. vi. 34. "Jealousy, or zeal, is the rage of a man, therefore he will not spare in the day of vengeance." The jealousy of a husband in fury will not forgive. Zech. i. 14. viii. 2. "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, I was jealous for Zion, with great jealousy, and I was jealous for her with great fury."

4. Zeal is put for envy, Psalm xxxvii. 1. "Fret not thyself because of evil doers, neither be thou (zealous or) envious against the workers of iniquity:" grudge not their appearance of happiness. 1 Cor. iii. 3. "For whereas there is among you envying (Vulg. zelus) and strife, are ye not carnal, and walk as men?" See also James iii. 16. "Bitter envying and strife," (Zelus amarus, Vulg.) is opposed to the zeal of charity, which, as the apostle says, "suffereth long, is kind, and envieth not." 1 Cor. xiii. 4, 5. But blind and false zeal, and zeal of bitterness, is full of contention and animosity.

ZEAL, JUDGMENT of ZEAL. Among the Hebrews, this was a term expressing the action of people, who, being transported with zeal, without awaiting the sentence of the Judges, and without observing the common forms of justice, put to death some Jew, detected in open and scandalous violation of an important point of the law; or in uttering blasphemy against God, against his temple, or against his people. In such case any Israelite was allowed to pursue him, and to put him to death. In like manner, if the priests in the temple detected any of their brethren performing his functions in a state of uncleanness, they were authorized by custom to drag him out of the holy place, out of the court, and to knock him on the head with clubs. Mishna tit. Sanhedr. cap. 9. Gemar. Babylon. et Jerosol. ibidem. But, that this liberty might not be abused, it was necessary that the crime should be committed in the presence of ten Israelites, at least; and that he who committed it persevered in it, and did not withdraw when warned of it, and remonstrated with for it. For if he desisted, they were not allowed to kill him, till he had been condemned judicially.

They founded this right on a tradition which they pretended to have received from Moses, and on the example of Phinehas, who, transported by a holy zeal, pierced at one blow Zimri and Cozbi. Numb. xxv. 7, 8. Animated by this zeal, Matathias, the father of the Maccabees, slew Apelles, whom the king of Syria had sent to Modin, to compel the Jews to sacrifice, 1 Macc. ii. 24. By the same custom, the Jews of Egypt took vengeance on three hundred of their brethren who had apostatized; 3 Macc. cap. ult. Lastly, we may say, that through the same zeal our Saviour drove out of the temple the money-changers, the bankers, and those who sold doves and other animals. Matt. xxi. 12. John ii. 14, 15. The Evangelist observes, that on this occasion the apostles called to mind those words of Psalm lxix. 9. "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up." See Grotius, de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. ii. cap. 20. sect. 1. Selden, de Jure Nat. et Gent. lib. iv. cap. 4, 5. [A striking instance of the power of this zeal is apparent in the history of Stephen, Acts vii. 57. they, the populace, the hearers, not expressly the council, though they might consent,—they ran upon him with one accord, and cast him out of the city, and stoned him. And the witnesses, who were required to cast the first stone, were active in this tumultuous and lawless proceeding.]

The Idol of zeal, סמל חקנא חמקנא, Ezek. viii. 3, 5. was Adonis; called the idol of jealousy, because he was beloved by Venus; and therefore Mars, stimulated by jealousy, sent a wild boar against him, which killed him. In pursuing the discourse of Ezekiel, we see that the same idol which at the fifth verse is called the idol of jealousy, is called Thammuz at the fourteenth verse. Vide TAMMUZ. Jerom, who is followed by several commentators, thinks that Baal was the idol of jealousy; which was set up in the temple by king Manasseh, but was taken away by Josiah. Others think, that under the name image of jealousy, i. e. that excites to jealousy, the prophet comprehended all sorts of idols, which provoke the anger of God against their worshippers.

3 I div. 2.

The

The ear of zeal [jealousy] hears all things: auris zeli audit omnia. God, like a jealous husband, hearkens to every thing, even to the profane discourses of the wicked. Wisd. i. 10.

Nolite zelare mortem in errore vitæ vestræ: forbear to seek death with so much eagerness; so much zeal for your own destruction. Wisd. i. 12. Otherwise, accuse not death; charge not your misfortune upon it. The verb zelare is sometimes put for taking vengeance. Phinehas was transported with zeal against the offenders; he took up weapons to slay them. Numb. xxv. 11. Saul put the Gibeonites to death with an unseasonable and furious zeal, to revenge the trick they had put upon Israel: Voluit Saul percutere eos zelo; quasi pro filiis Israel et Juda. 2 Sam. xxi. 2. Comp. SAUL and GIBEON. The book of Wisdom, v. 18. represents the Lord as arming himself with zeal against his enemies; i. e. as going to take vengeance on their malignity. Isaiah, xi. 13. says, that Ephraim shall no longer make war against Judah, and that these two kingdoms shall live together in peace: Auferetur zelus Ephraim, et hostes Juda peribunt; Ephraim non æmulabitur Judam, et Juda non pugnabit contra Ephraim. Where we see that zelari and æmulari are put as synonymous terms with hostes and pugnare. Ezekiel says, xxxix. 25. that the Lord shall zealously revenge the affront done to his name: assumant zelum pro nomine sancto meo.

In Deuteronomy xxxii. 21. God says that the ungrateful and faithless Israelites would move him to jealousy or zeal, by worshipping gods that are no gods; and I, says the Lord, will provoke their zeal and jealousy, by loving another (people) which is no people. I will vex them, by substituting in their stead a foolish nation; like a husband actuated by jealousy against an unfaithful spouse, who has abandoned herself to unworthy lovers, in contempt of him who is infinitely more deserving affection. He threatens to divorce her, to reject her, to take into her place another people, which does not deserve the name of a people, to excite in her, by this comparison, a spirit of zeal and jealousy, of vexation and anguish. This was accomplished in the reprobation of the Jews, and the call of the Gentiles to the Christian religion. 1 Peter ii. 9.

ZEALOTS. Vide ZELOTS.

ZEBADIAH, זבדיה, portion of the Lord, or the Lord is my portion; from זבד zabad, a portion, and יה jah, the Lord.

I. ZEBADIAH, ZABADIA, or ZEBEDIA, son of Beriah. 1 Chron. viii. 15.

II. ZEBADIAH, son of Elpaal. 1 Chron. viii. 16, 17.

III. ZEBADIAH, son of Jehoram, of Gedon; one who adhered to David, while persecuted by Saul. 1 Chron. xii. 7.

IV. ZEBADIAH, a Levite, son of Meshelemiah, a porter of the temple. 1 Chron. xxvi. 2.

V. ZEBADIAH, son of Michael; he returned from the captivity of Babylon with fourscore men. Ezra viii. 8.

ZEBAH, זבח, victim, sacrifice, immolation; from זבח zabach. [devoted to Moloch?]

ZEBAH, a prince of the Midianites, whom Gideon himself slew. See the history, Judg. viii. 5, 21. Psalm lxxxiii. 11. A. M. 2753, ante A. D. 1251.

ZEBAIM, זבאים, Vulg. Sabaim, kid, antelope, or beauties; from זבי zabi; otherwise, armies: from זבא zaba. Neh. vii. 59. Vide seq.

ZEBEDEE, זבדי, Ζεβεδαι, Ζεβδαῖος, abundant portion, or flux; from זבד zabad, portion, or endowed, or זב zub, flux, and די dai, abundant, sufficient.

I. ZEBEDEE, son of Asaph, and father of Micah. An excellent musician of the temple. Neh. xi. 17. [Zabdi, Eng. Tr.]

II. ZEBEDEE, father of the apostles James, and John, the Evangelist, We know nothing that can be relied on concerning the person or actions of Zebedee; but that he was a fisherman by profession, that his wife was called Salome, and that his two sons left him, to follow our Saviour. See Matt. iv. 21.

ZEBOIM, זבוי, [young of] deer, goats, &c.; or tinging, dying; from זבץ zatz, to stain: otherwise, fair, or exemplary. [Syriac, Volunteers.]

[A place of rendezvous for armed troops, from a root which imports to gather a crowd. Comp. Gen. xiv. 3, 8. otherwise, when spoken of as a region, agreeable, as Ezek. xx. 6. Dan. viii. 9. and of a city, Isaiah xiii. 19. Ezek. xxv. 9. The name Zeboim is spelled somewhat differently. Hosea xi. 8.

ZEBOIM, 1 Sam. xiii. 18. A valley. In Neh. xi. 34. this is differently written, and is said to denote dyes, or standing heaps. Possibly "haunts of the Zebo," the wild wolf, or hyæna. See HYÆNA, in NAT. HIST.

Some suppose the name Zeboim is derived from a species of serpent which abounded here.

The name of a city of Benjamin. Neh. xi. 34.

To this also is referred, 1 Sam. xiii. 18. where the Chaldee renders the valley of the serpent.

We rather query, whether this city also did not take name from the wild wolf, or hyæna.]

ZEBOIM, or Seboim, one of the four cities of Pentapolis, Pentapolis, consumed by fire from heaven. Gen. xix. 24. Eusebius and Jerom speak of Zeboim, in locis Sodoma et Adama, as of a city extant in their time, on the western shore of the Dead Sea. Therefore, after the time of Lot and Abraham, a city must have been rebuilt near where Zeboim stood before.

ZEBUDAH, זְבוּדָּה, Zaβovδà, endowed; from זָבַד zabad. Mother of Jehoiakim king of Judah. 2 Kings xxiii. 36.

ZEBUL, זְבֻל, habitation; from זָבַל zabal.

ZEBUL, governor of the city of Shechem for Abimelech, son of Gideon. Judg. ix. 28. A.M. 2771, ante A.D. 1233. Gaal, son of Ebed, having prevailed on the Shechemites to revolt, Zebul sent intelligence of it to Abimelech, who, marching all night, appeared next morning on the hills near Shechem. Gaal, going out of the city, said to Zebul, See, a great multitude coming down the mountains. Zebul answered him, You mistake the shadows of the hills for men. But as the troops of Abimelech advanced, Zebul said to Gaal, Where is now that confidence with which you boasted, Who is Abimelech, that we should be his subjects? Go now and fight them. He did so, but was soon overcome by Abimelech.

ZEBULUN, זְבֻלֹּן, from זָבַד zabad, to endow: or dwelling, habitation; from זָבַל zabal.

I. ZEBULUN, or ZABULON, the sixth son of Jacob and Leah. Gen. xxx. 20. He was born in Mesopotamia, about A.M. 2256, ante A.D. 1748. His sons were Sered, Elon, and Jahleel. Gen. xli. 14. Moses acquaints us with no particulars of his life: but Jacob in his last blessing, Gen. xlix. 13. said, "Zebulun shall dwell at the haven of the sea, and he shall be for a haven of ships, and his border shall be unto Zidon." His portion extended to the coast of the Mediterranean, one end of it bordering on this sea, and the other on the sea of Tiberias, vide Josh. xix. 10. Moses joins Zebulun and Issachar together. Deut. xxxiii. 18. "Rejoice, Zebulun, in thy going out; and Issachar in thy tents. They shall call the people unto the mountain; there they shall offer sacrifices of righteousness: for they shall suck of the abundance of the seas, and of treasures hid in the sand." Meaning, that these two tribes being at the greatest distance north, should come together to the temple at Jerusalem, to the holy mountain, and should bring with them such of the other tribes as dwelt in their way; and that occupying part of the coast of the Mediterranean, they should apply themselves to trade and navigation, and to the melting of metals and glass, denoted by those words, Treasures hid in the sand. The river Belus, whose sand was very fit for making glass, was in this tribe. Vide GLASS.

When the tribe of Zebulun left Egypt, its chief was Eliab, son of Elon, and it comprehended 57,400 men able to bear arms. Numb. i. 9, 30. In another review, thirty-nine years afterwards, this tribe amounted to 60,500 men, of age to bear arms. Numb. xxvi. 26, 27. A.M. 2553, ante A.D. 1451. The tribes of Zebulun and Napthali distinguished themselves in the war of Barak and Deborah, against Sisera, the general of the armies of Jabin. Judg. iv. 5, 6, 10. v. 4, 18. It is thought these tribes were the first carried into captivity beyond the Euphrates, by Pul and Tiglath-Pilneser, kings of Assyria. 1 Chron. v. 26. See the PLATES, MAP of the CAPTIVITIES of ISRAEL and JUDAH. They had also the advantage of hearing and seeing Jesus Christ in their country oftener and longer than any other of the tribes. Isaiah ix. 1. Matt. iv. 13, 15. Vide Jerom and others on Isaiah ix. ♣

The Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, an ancient though apocryphal book, says, that when Zebulun was at the point of death, being a hundred and fourteen years old, thirty-two years after the death of Joseph, he called his sons to him, and declared that he had no share in the crime of his brethren, when they sold Joseph; but did every thing in his power to avert them from that resolution. After which he prophesies of succeeding events too plainly to be genuine.

II. ZEBULUN, a city of Asher, Josh. xix. 17. but probably afterwards yielded to Zebulun, whence it took its name. It was not far from Ptolemais, since Josephus, de Bell. lib. iii. c. 2. makes the length of lower Galilee to be from Tiberias to Ptolemais. It received the name of Zābulon andrawn, or Zebulun of men, probably from its great populousness, de Bell. lib. ii. cap. 22. Elon, judge of Israel, was of this tribe, and was buried in this city. Judg. xii. 12. When Cestius entered it, he gave the plunder of it to his soldiers, and then burned it, though he admired the beauty of it; for its houses were built like those of Tyre, Sidon, and Berytus.

ZECHARIAH. See ZACHARIAH.

ZEDAD, or SEDADA, צֵדָדָה, his side; from צָד tzad: or his hunting, or his ambush; from צִדָּה tzadah, and the pronoun הָ ah, his. A city of Syria, in the most northern part of the Land of Promise. Numb. xxxiv. 8. Ezek. xlvii. 15.

[On a flat, or level, q. The town on the flats, or breadth, or side of Mount Lebanon, as Simon thinks, on the river Eleuthernus. Comp. 1 Sam. xxiii. 26. 2 Sam. xiii. 34. The Arabic root imports the bed, or mouth, of a river.]

ZEDEKIAH, צדקיה, the Lord is my justice, or justice of the Lord; from צדק tsadak, just, and יהוה the Lord.

I. ZEDEKIAH, or SEDECIAH, or MATTANIAH, the last king of Judah, before the captivity of Babylon. He was son of Josiah, and uncle to Jeconiah, his predecessor. 2 Kings xxiv. 17, 19.

When Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, he carried Jeconiah to Babylon, with his wives, children, officers, and the best artificers in Judah, and put in his place his uncle Mattaniah, whose name he changed to Zedekiah, and made him promise, with an oath, that he would maintain fidelity to him, A. M. 3405, ante A. D. 599. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 13. Ezek. xvii. 12, 14, 18. He was twenty-one years old when he began to reign at Jerusalem, and he reigned there eleven years. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, committing the same crimes as Jehoiakim. 2 Kings xxiv. 18, 19, 20. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 11, 12, 13. He regarded not the menaces of the prophet Jeremiah from the Lord, but hardened his heart. The princes of the people, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, imitated his impiety, and abandoned themselves to all the abominations of the Gentiles.

In the first year of his reign Zedekiah sent to Babylon Elasah, son of Shaphan, and Gemariah, son of Hilkiah, probably to carry his tribute to Nebuchadnezzar. By these messengers Jeremiah sent a letter to the captives at Babylon. Jer. xxix. 1, 2—23. Four years afterwards, either Zedekiah went thither himself, or at least, he sent thither; for the text may admit either of these interpretations. Jer. xxxii. 12. li. 59. Baruch i. 1. See SERIAH VII. The chief design of this deputation was to intreat Nebuchadnezzar to return the sacred vessels of the temple. Baruch i. 8. In the ninth year of his reign, he revolted against Nebuchadnezzar. 2 Kings xxv. It was a sabbatical year, in which the people should set their slaves at liberty, according to the law. Exod. xxi. 2. Deut. xv. 1, 2, 12. Jer. xxxiv. 8, 9, 10. Then king Nebuchadnezzar marched his army against Zedekiah, and took all the fortified places of his kingdom, except Lachish, Azekah, and Jerusalem.

He sat down before Jerusalem on the tenth day of the tenth month of the holy year, (which answers to our January.) Some time afterwards Pharaoh Hophra, king of Egypt, marched to assist Zedekiah. Jer. xxxvii. 3, 4, 5, 10. Nebuchadnezzar left Jerusalem, and went to meet him, defeated him, and obliged him to return into Egypt; after which he resumed the siege of Jerusalem. In the mean while, the people of Jerusalem, as if freed from the fear of Nebuchadnezzar, retook the slaves whom they had set at liberty, which drew upon them great reproaches and threatenings from Jeremiah, xxxiv. 11—22. During the siege, Zedekiah often consulted Jeremiah, who advised him to surrender, and denounced the greatest woes against him if he should persist in his rebellion: Jer. xxxvii. 3—10. xxi. But this unfortunate prince had neither patience to hear, nor resolution to follow, good counsels. In the eleventh year of Zedekiah, on the ninth day of the fourth month, (July), Jerusalem was taken, 2 Kings xxv. Jer. xxxix. lii. Zedekiah and his people endeavoured to escape by favour of the night; but the Chaldean troops pursuing them, they were overtaken in the plain of Jericho. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCXXIV.

He was taken and carried to Nebuchadnezzar, then at Riblah, in Syria. The king of Chaldea reproaching him with his perfidy, caused all his children to be slain before his face, and his eyes to be put out; then loading him with chains of brass, he ordered him to be sent to Babylon. 2 Kings xxv. Jer. xxxii. lii. Thus were accomplished two prophecies, which seemed contradictory; one of Jeremiah, who said that Zedekiah should see, and yet not see, Nebuchadnezzar with his eyes, chap. xxxii. 4, 5. xxxiv. 3. the other of Ezekiel, xii. 13. which intimated, that he should not see Babylon, though he should die there. The year of his death is not known. The Rabbins (Tradit. Hebr. in Lib. Reg. et Paralip. sub nomine Hieronym.) say he died of grief because, having been invited to a feast by Nebuchadnezzar, Zedekiah was there made drunk, and in his drunkenness committed several indecent actions. But these traditions are of no authority, and learned men are agreed that they have no right to bear the name of Jerom. Jeremiah had assured him, chap. xxxiv. 4, 5. that he should die in peace; that his body should be burned, as those of the kings of Judah usually were; and that they should mourn for him, saying, Alas, my lord!

The Rabbins say, that at the obsequies of Zedekiah they cried out, Alas! king Zedekiah is dead, who has drank up the dregs of all ages! i. e. who has suffered the punishment due to all his predecessors. They say also, that he made his escape from Jerusalem by a subterraneous passage, which led from the king's palace to the plains of Jericho: but that a hind following him without, and going just the same pace above ground as the king went under ground, and the Chaldeans following the hind, they came upon the king at unawares, just as he came out of his his subterraneous passage. Josephus, de Bell. lib. vii. cap. 4. relates, that Zedekiah, to save the city and the temple, went into voluntary exile and captivity; but this is to disguise the truth: Zedekiah's flight was not a voluntary act to save his country. He reigned eleven years at Jerusalem; and after him the kingdom of Judah was entirely suppressed.

II. ZEDERKIAH, second son of king Jehoia-kim. 1 Chron. iii. 16.

III. ZEDEKIAH, son of Chenaanah; a false prophet of Samaria, 1 Kings xxii. 11. who put iron horns on his head, and said to Ahab, king of Israel, Thus saith the Lord, You shall beat Syria, and toss it up into the air with these horns. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXIV. The prophet Micaiah, son of Imlah, being sent for, and denouncing the direct contrary, Zedekiah came near him, and giving him a blow on the face, said to him, Which way went the Spirit of the Lord from me, to do thus to you? Micaiah answered, You will see that, when you shall be obliged to hide yourself in an inward chamber. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. XXV. It is not said what became of Zedekiah; but all the prophecies of Micaiah proved true. See MICAHIAH.

IV. ZEDEKIAH, son of Maaseiah, a false prophet, who always opposed Jeremiah. Against him, and Ahab, son of Kolaiah, Jeremiah pronounced a terrible prophecy, chap. xxix. 21, 22. "Of them shall be taken up a curse by all the captivity of Judah which are in Babylon, saying, The Lord make thee like Zedekiah, and like Ahab, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire," &c. The Rabbins, Rabb. Hieronym. in Jer. xxix. Raban. Hugo. Thom. Salian. with some commentators, are of opinion, that they were the two elders who attempted the chastity of Susanna. But this is not probable.

V. ZEDEKIAH, son of Asadias, and father of Maaseiah, grandfather of Baruch. Baruch i. 1.

ZEDEKIEL, זְדַקְיָאֵל, justice of God.

ZEDEKIEL. The name of an angel of the first order. The Jews make him preceptor of Abraham. See Fabricius, Apoc. Vet. T. tom. i.

ZEEB, זֵבֶב, wolf; from זֵבֶב zeeb.

ZEEB, or ZEB, a prince of Midian. He was found at a wine-press, and slain by the Ephraimites, who sent his head to Gideon beyond Jordan, whither they pursued their enemies. Judg. vii. 25. A. M. 2753, ante A. D. 1251.

ZELAH, זֶלַח, [a rib, or] side, or that halts [a sprain]: otherwise, calm, pacific. [possibly, the branch or side of a mountain.]

ZELAH, or SELA, a city of Benjamin. Josh. xviii. 28. We read in the Hebrew, 2 Sam. xxi. 14.

Z E M

that Saul was buried at Zelah, in the tomb of his father Kish.

ZELEK, זֶלֶק, the shadow, or the noise of him that licks, that laps, or strikes; from זֶלֶק tzalal, to be in the shade: or tingling of the ear, and קָלַק lakak, to lick or lap: according to the Chaldee, that roasts or burns, or that strikes; from זֶלֶק tsalah, to roast: Arabic, that makes a noise; [crack, fissure?] from זֶלֶק tsalak.

ZELEK, or SELEK, an Ammonite; one of David's heroes. 2 Sam. xxiii. 37. 1 Chron. xi. 39.

ZELOPHEHAD, זֶלֶפְחָד, shade, or tingling of fear; from זֶלֶק tzalal, shadow, &c. and זֶלֶק pachad, fear: otherwise, fear of submersion, or of being burnt; from זֶלֶק pachad, and זֶלֶק tsalah, to burn; or from זֶלֶק tzalal, to be plunged, or sunk. [fissure, opening the first, i. e. the first-born?] Son of Hopher, of Manasseh. He died, leaving no sons, but five daughters, Mahlah, Noah, Hoglah, Milcay, and Tirzah, who received their portion in the Land of Promise. Numb. xxvi. 33. xxvii. 1.

ZELOTES, Ζηλωτῆς, jealous, or full of zeal; from the Greek ζῆλος, zeal, jealousy.

ZELOTES. See SIMON ZELOTES.

ZELOTS, or ZEALOTS. This name was given to a sect of Jews which rose in Judea about A. D. 66, four or five years before the taking of Jerusalem by the Romans. They were called zealots from that furious and mad zeal they pretended for the liberty of their country. They were also called Sicarii, or Assassins, because of the frequent butcheries they committed with their short daggers, called in Latin Sica. We think them to be the same as the Herodians. Matt. xxii. 16. Mark iii. 6. xii. 13. See HERODIANS and GALILEANS. All these kinds of people were followers of Judas the Galilean. See JUDAS GAULONITES, and Josephus, Antiq. lib. xviii. See also ZEAL.

[ZELZAH, shade, or protection, from the heat of the sun: a shadowy place. A place in the borders of Benjamin. 1 Sam. x. 2.]

ZEMARAIM, זִמְרַיִם, wools, from זִמְרַיִם tsa-mar, succour; from זִמְרַיִם tsamereth. [or trees. The Chaldee root imports heat; perhaps in this place two springs of hot water burst forth.]

ZEMARAIM, or SAMARAIM, a city of Benjamin, near Bethel. Josh. xviii. 22. See also 2 Chron. xiii. 4. according to the Hebrew, the mount of Zemaraim.

ZEMARAIM, SEMERON, or SHOMERON. A name of the mountain of Shemer. 2 Chron. xiii. 4.

ZEMARITE, זִמְרִי, Σαμαρειός, or Samaræus, wool, or sap, or succour. LXX. Trees.

ZEMARITE, Samaræus. The tenth son of Canaan;

Canaan; father of the Zemarites, who, we think, inhabited Simyra, a city of Phœnicia, near Orthosia. The two Chaldee paraphrases, and Jerom, say they dwelt at Emesa, in Syria. Some have imagined that they gave name to the mountain of Shomeron, on which Samaria was afterwards built. 1 Kings xvi. 24. But they did not observe the difference between the names שֹׁמֶרוֹן Shomeronim, Samaritans, and צֹמְרִים Zomerim, Zemarites. Gen. x. 18.

ZEMIRA, זמירָה, from זָמַר zamar, to sing; or זָמַר zamir, vine, branch. Son of Bochar of Benjamin. 1 Chron. vii. 8.

ZENAN, זֶנָן, Ζενᾶν, coldness; from the Chaldee זָנַן tsanan: otherwise, shield, or buckler, arms. [A place extremely prolific, or rather, abounding in sheep: from the Arabic, the many sheep-folds, or cotes. q. d. Eubœa. Micah i. 11. written ZANAAN.]

ZENAS, Ζηνας, living; from Gr. ζῆν, to live.

ZENAS, a doctor of the law, and disciple of St. Paul. Tit. iii. 13. Ζηνᾶν τὸν νομικόν. Vulg. Zenam legis peritum. [Zenas the lawyer. Eng. Tr.] Legis peritus, in this place, is the same as Scriba, or doctor of the law. See Matt. xxii. 35. Luke vii. 30. x. 25. xi. 45, &c. We know nothing of him, but that he was an apostolical man, well instructed in the Jewish law, and esteemed by St. Paul; who informs Titus, that he wishes to see Zenas at Nicopolis, as also Apollos; and that he should take care that nothing might be wanting to them for this journey. Dorotheus, bishop of Tyre, makes him bishop of Diospolis in Palestine.

ZEPHANIAH, צִפְנִיָה, the Lord is my secret, or the secret of the Lord; or the north of the Lord; from צָפַן tsaphan, to hide, or saphon, the north, and יָהּ jah, the Lord.

I. ZEPHANIAH, or SOPHONIAS, son of Maaseiah; called, 2 Kings xxv. 18. the second priest, while the high-priest Seraiah performed the functions of the high-priesthood, and was the first priest. It is thought Zephaniah was his deputy, to discharge the duty when the high-priest was sick, or when any other accident hindered him from performing his office. After the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, Seraiah and Zephaniah were taken and sent to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah, who caused them to be put to death; A. M. 3416, ante A. D. 588. Zephaniah was sent more than once by Zedekiah, to consult Jeremiah, xxi. 1. xxxvii. 3. I know not whether Josiah and Hen, Zech. vi. 10, 14. were sons of this Zephaniah, or of some other.

II. ZEPHANIAH, a Levite, of the family of Kohath. 1 Chron. vi. 36.

III. ZEPHANIAH, son of Cushi, and grandson of Gedaliah; was of the tribe of Simeon, according to Epiphanius, and of mount Sarabata, a place not mentioned in Scripture. The Jews are of opinion, that the ancestors of Zephaniah, recited at the beginning of his prophecy, were prophets. Some have pretended, without foundation, that he was of an illustrious family. We have no exact knowledge, either of his actions, or the time of his death. He lived under king Josiah, who began to reign A. M. 3363, ante A. D. 641. The description that Zephaniah gives of the disorders of Judah, leads us to judge, that he prophesied before the eighteenth year of Josiah; i. e. before this prince had reformed the abuses and corruptions of his dominions. 2 Kings xxii. Besides, he foretels the destruction of Nineveh, chap. ii. 13. which could not fall out before the sixteenth year of Josiah, by allowing, with Berosus, twenty-one years to the reign of Nabopolassar over the Chaldeans. Therefore we must necessarily place the beginning of Zephaniah's prophecy early in the reign of Josiah.

The first chapter of this prophet is a general threatening against all the people whom the Lord had appointed to slaughter: against Judah; against those who leap over the threshold; meaning the Philistines. (See 1 Sam. v. 5. "Therefore, neither the priests of Dagon, nor any that come into Dagon's house, tread on the threshold of Dagon in Ashdod unto this day.") In the second chapter he inveighs against Moab, Ammon, Cush, the Phœnicians, and the Assyrians. He foretels the fall of Nineveh, which happened A. M. 3378. The third chapter contains invectives and threatenings against Jerusalem; but afterwards gives comfortable assurance of a return from the captivity, and of a flourishing condition.

ZEPHATH, צֶפֶת, which beholds, that attends, that covers; from צָפַח tsaphah: otherwise, honey-comb; from צִיָּץ tzuph. [A watch-tower. Several such stations eventually became towns; hence Zephathah; the Valley of, in Chronicles, might derive its name from a tower or a watch station, on some adjoining hill; for certainly a station proper for distant observation could never have been placed in a valley.]

ZEPHATH, or ΣΕΡΦΑΑΤ, a city of Simeon. Judg. i. 17. probably the same as Zephathah, near Mareshah, in the south of Judah. 2 Chron. xiv. 10. It was called Hormah, or Anathema, after the victory obtained by Israel over the king of Arad. Numb. xxi. 3. Judg. i. 17.

ZEPHATHAH, צֶפְתָּה. See ZEPHATH. The valley of Zephathah near Mareshah, is mentioned 2 Chron. xiv. 10. Perhaps this vale was near

near Zephath, or Hormah: or, perhaps, it should be read Shephalah, instead of Zephathath. See SEPHALA.

ZEPHI, צִפִּי, Σαφονή, that sees and observes, or that expects, or covers; from צָפָה tzaphah. Third son of Eliphaz, son of Esau. 1 Chron. i. 36. Gen. xxxvi. 15.

ZEPHO, צֶפּוֹ, [the expected, the hoped for, sc. by his parents. Gen. xxxvi. 11, 15.] the same as Zephi. 1 Chron. i. 36.

ZEPHON, צֶפֶן, Vulg. Sephion, that beholds; from צָפָה tsaphah: or the north; from צֶפֶן tsaphon: or that is hid; from צָפָן tsaphan: otherwise, the north that is hid. Vide BAALZEPHON.

ZEPHON, or SEPHRON, son of Gad, chief of a family. Numb. xxvi. 15.

ZER, צָר, Τύρος, anguish, pain, tribulation; from צָרָה tzur, to oppress: otherwise, stone, rock, fortress; from the same. Vide TYRE. A city of Napthali. Josh. xix. 35. [Straitness, a narrow place: the narrows.]

ZERA, זָרָה, east, or brightness; from זָרַח zarach, to arise, or sun-rising. See ZARAH.

ZERA, or ZARA, of Bozrah, son of Reuel, and grandson of Esau, and father of Jobad. Gen. xxxvi. 13, 17, 33.

I. ZERAH, or ZARA, son of Simeon, and grandson of Jacob, father of a family. Numb. xxvi. 13.

II. ZERAH, king of Ethiopia, rather of Cush, in Arabia Petræa, on the Red Sea, and bordering on Egypt. 2 Chron. xiv. 9, 10, &c. A. M. 3063, ante A. D. 941. This prince came to attack Asa, king of Judah, with an army of a million of foot, [See FRAGS. DCCXV. seq.] and three hundred chariots of war. Asa went out to meet him, and set his army in battle array in the valley of Zephathah, near Mareshah. He called on the Lord, who cast terror and consternation into the hearts of the Ethiopians, so that they ran away. Asa and his army pursued them to Gerar, and obtained a great booty. Vide ASA.

ZERAHIAH, זְרַחִיָּה, east, or brightness of the Lord; from זָרַח zarach, &c. and יָה jah, the Lord. Son of the high-priest Uzzi, and father of Meraioth. 1 Chron. vi. 6.

ZEREDA, צֶרֶדָה, ambush, change of dominion, or descent; from צָרָה tsarar, to tie, &c. and רָדָה radah, to rule, or יָרַד jarad, descent: otherwise, plan of power. [Straitness, or tying together of the Lord; otherwise, descensions of the Lord, or of descension. The country of Jeroboam. 1 Kings xi. 26. The straitness, or narrowness, of habitation, most probably; so we have among ourselves, "narrow way," "narrow wall," &c. Some think this is the same as Zererath. Judg. vii. 22.

ZEREDA, or SABEDA, a city of Ephraim, the native place of Jeroboam, son of Nebat. 1 Kings xi. 26. Perhaps Zeradatha, or Zarthan.

ZEREDATHAH, צֶרֶדָתָה. See ZEREDA.

ZEREDATHAH, otherwise ZARTHAN, a city of Ephraim, in which were cast the great works of brass that Hiram made for Solomon's temple. 2 Chron. iv. 17. 1 Kings vii. 46. The waters of Jordan flowed up as high as Zarthan, or Zaretan, when the Hebrews passed this river under Joshua. Josh. iii. 16.

[ZERERATH, the straits, the narrows. A city in Manasseh, not far from Bethshan. Judg. vii. 22. Also called ZEREDA, 1 Kings xi. 26. and ZEREDETHA, 2 Chron. iv. 17; perhaps also Zaretan, the narrow dwellings. Joshua iii. 16. 1 Kings vii. 46. and Zaretanah, 1 Kings iv. 12. Vide ZARETAN.]

ZERESH, זֶרֶשׁ, Ζωσάρα. This name is a stranger to the holy language. Misery, stranger, strange, or dispersed inheritance; from זָרַח jarash, misery, or heritage, and זָרַח zer, stranger, or dispersed: otherwise, crown of inheritance, or of misery, from the same זָרַח zer, crown, or circle, and זָרַח jarash, inheritance, or misery. The wife of Haman, who advised the destruction of Mordecai. Esth. v. 10, 14. [Much rather, according to the Persian and Arabic, the Star of Venus, or the brilliancy of the star Venus. It coincides also with the name of Diana among the Persians—Zaretis, according to Hesychius.]

ZERETH, זֶרֶת. See ZUR. Otherwise formed, made; from זָרַח jarash. A son of Asher. 1 Chron. iv. 7.

ZERETH, a Hebrew measure; in length half a cubit, or 10½ inches. Jerom translates it by Palmus. 1 Sam. xvii. 4. The high-priest's breast-plate was a Zereth, or half a cubit square. Exod. xxviii. 16. xxxix. 9. Isaiah seems to say, that in respect of God the heavens are but a zereth [A SPAN] in space. xl. 12. But in this passage zereth rather denotes the hand extended.

ZERI, צָרִי, squeezing, bonds, pains: from צָרָה tsarar: otherwise, rosin, treacle; from צָרָה tsarah: otherwise, stone; from צָרָה tsur. Son of Jeduthun. His family was the fourth among the twenty-four families of the Levites, which attended in the temple. 1 Chron. xxv. 3, 11.

ZEROR, צֶרֶר, Σαράρ, boot, or that straitens, that binds, that keeps tight; from צָרָה tsarar: otherwise, a stone; from צָרָה tzerror. Son of Bechorah, great grandfather of Saul. 1 Sam. ix. 1.

ZERUAH, צֶרוּעָה, leprous, or wasp, or hornet; from צָרַע tzerah. 1 Kings xi. 26.

ZERUBBABEL, זְרֻבָּבֶל, banished, or a stranger stranger in Babylon; from זָרַר zer, a stranger, and בָּבֶל babel: or dispersion of confusion; from זָרַר, to disperse, and babel, confusion.

ZERUBBABEL, or ZOROBABEL, son of Salathiel, of the royal race of David. St. Matthew, i. 12. and Chronicles, 1 Chr. iii. 17, 19. make Jeconiah, king of Judah, to be father to Salathiel; but they do not agree as to the father of Zerubbabel. The Chronicles say Pedaiah was father of Zerubbabel; but St. Matthew, St. Luke, Esdras, and Haggai, constantly make Salathiel his father. We must therefore take the name of son in the sense of grandson, and say that Salathiel having educated Zerubbabel, he was always afterwards considered as his father. Some think that Zerubbabel had also the name of Sheshbazzar, and that he is so called. Ezra i. 8. See SHESHBAZZAR. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 4. and the first book of Esdras, describe Zerubbabel as one of the three famous body-guards of Darius, son of Hystaspes. In a dispute, which of four things was most powerful, the king, women, wine, or the truth? Zerubbabel maintained it was the truth, and obtained the victory. But this story must be regarded as very apocryphal. Zerubbabel returned to Jerusalem long before the reign of Darius, son of Hystaspes. He returned at the beginning of the reign of Cyrus, A. M. 3468, ante A. D. 536, fifteen years before Darius.

Cyrus committed to his care the sacred vessels of the temple, with which he returned to Jerusalem. Ezra i. 11. He is always named first, as being chief of the Jews that returned to their own country. Ezra ii. 2. iii. 8. v. 2. He laid the foundations of the temple. Ezra iii. 8, 9. Zech. iv. 9, &c. He restored the worship of the Lord, and the usual sacrifices. When the Samaritans offered to assist in rebuilding the temple, Zerubbabel and the principal men of Judah refused them this honour, since Cyrus had granted his commission to the Jews only. Ezra iv. 2, 3.

When this undertaking was discontinued, the prophets Haggai and Zechariah encouraged Zerubbabel and the other Jews, to resume the work; which they did, in the second year of Darius, son of Hystaspes, A. M. 3485, ante A. D. 519. Hag. i. 1, 2, 3. Zech. iv. 6, 7. Ezra v. 1, 2, 3. When the Lord shewed the prophet Zachariah two olive-trees, near the golden candlestick with seven branches, the angel sent to explain this vision informed the prophet, that these two olive-trees, which supplied oil to the great candlestick, were Zerubbabel, the prince, and Joshua, the high-priest, son of Josedech. Scripture says nothing of the death of Zerubbabel, but it informs us, 1 Chron. iii. 19. that he left seven sons and one daughter. These were Meshullam, Hananiah, and Shelomith, their sister; Hashubah, Ohel, Berechiah, Hasadiah, and Jushabhesed. St. Matthew, i. 13. makes the name of one of his sons to be Abiud; and St. Luke, iii. 27. makes it Rhesa. Consequently, one of the sons of Zerubbabel, above enumerated, must have had more than one name.

Some would make a distinction of two Zerubbabels, the second of which was son of Pedaiah, mentioned 1 Chron. iii. 19. But we think it needless to have recourse to this solution of the difficulty; and that it is sufficient to say, that Pedaiah was son of Salathiel, and father to Zerubbabel; and that Scripture generally calls Zerubbabel, son of Salathiel, only because Salathiel, his grandfather, was the more eminent, and perhaps had adopted and educated him. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCCXXIX. &c.

Others, to reconcile the first book of Esdras with Sacred History, pretend that Zerubbabel might have dwelt at Jerusalem seventeen years, from the first year of Cyrus to the second of Darius, son of Hystaspes, and then might return to Babylon, where he was in the office of a guard to Darius. But nothing obliges us to receive as true the improbable story of Darius's three life-guard men, which evidently includes several marks of fiction and imposture.

ZERUIAH, צְרוּיָה, Zarouia, or SARVIA, pain, or tribulation, chains of the Lord; from צָרַר tsarar: otherwise, placing; from צוּרָה tsurah: or, figure; from צוּר tzur, and יְיָ jah, the Lord.

ZERUIAH. Sister of David; and mother of Joab, Abishai, and Asahel. 2 Sam. ii. 18. 1 Chron. ii. 16.

ZETHAM, זֶתָם, Vulgate, Zathan, their olive, or olive tree; from זֵיתָא zaith, and the pronoun זֶ am, their: otherwise, this is perfect, complete, finished: otherwise, simple: from the pronoun זֶ ze, this or that, and תָּמָם thamam, perfect, &c.

ZETHAN, זֵיתָן, olive, or olive-tree; from זֵיתָא zaith.

I. ZETHAN, or ZETHAM, son of Bilnan, son of Jediahel, of Benjamin. 1 Chron. vii. 10.

II. ZETHAN, son of Laadan, of Levi, and of the family of Gershon, 1 Chron. xxiii. 8. a treasurer of the temple. xxvi. 22.

ZETHAR, זֵתָר. This word is a stranger to the Hebrew tongue. He that examines, or beholds, or olive of vision, or olive of the turtle; from the pronoun זֶ ze, this or that, and תָּרָא thar, to examine, or behold: otherwise, turtle; from the same זֵתָר thar: or olive; from זֵיתָא zith. [From the Persian, very high, very great.]

One of the seven eunuchs, or principal officers of Ahasuerus. Esth. i. 10.

ZIA, זיא, sweat, labour; from זיא jazah: otherwise, fear, disturbance; from זיא zuah.

I. ZIA, זיא, ZIE, זיה, SIHA, or SIAHA, a city beyond Jordan, five miles from Philadelphia, west. Euseb. in Zem.

II. ZIA, a part of the city of Jerusalem, where the Nethinim dwelt, or [a chief over, Eng. Tr.] those who served in the temple. Neh. xi. 21.

III. ZIA, son of Abihail, of Gad. 1 Chron. v. 13.

IV. ZIA, son of Hasupha, of the race of the Nethinim. Ezra ii. 43.

ZIBA, זיבא, army, fight, strength, stag; from זיבא tzaba. [Plant?]

ZIBA, a servant to Saul. 2 Sam. ix. King David having resolved to shew kindness to some descendants of Saul, for the sake of Jonathan, he asked Ziba, if any remained of his master's house? Ziba mentioned one of Jonathan's sons, named Mephibosheth, who was lame, and dwelt at the house of Machir, at Lodebar. David sent for him, and gave him the privilege of his table all the rest of his life. He said to Ziba, I have given to Mephibosheth all that belonged to Saul, therefore make the best of his estate, that your master may have a sufficient subsistence. Ziba replied, My lord, your servant will obey your commands; and Mephibosheth shall be served at my table, when he shall please to be there, as one of the king's sons. Now Ziba had fifteen sons, and twenty servants who were employed to attend Mephibosheth, and to make the best of his estate. But Mephibosheth ate at the king's table, though he dwelt with Ziba.

Some years afterwards, 2 Sam. xvi. when David was expelled from Jerusalem, by his son Absalom, Ziba went to meet David, with two asses loaded with provisions. The king asked him what do you mean by these? Ziba answered, The asses are to mount some of the king's officers, and the provisions are for those that attend you. David then asked him, Where is Mephibosheth? Ziba replied, He continues at Jerusalem, saying, The house of Israel will now restore me to the kingdom of my father. The king then said to Ziba, I give you all that belongs to Mephibosheth.

After the defeat of Absalom, Ziba came to meet the king, with his fifteen sons and twenty servants. Mephibosheth also came to meet the king, and in such a plight, as sufficiently shewed his trouble for the king's absence. For, from the time of David's flight, he had neither washed his feet, nor trimmed his beard, nor taken any care of his dress. David asked him, Mephibosheth, why did you not go with me, but stay at Jerusalem? Mephibosheth replied, My lord, my servant Ziba deceived me: for being, as you know, lame of my feet, I bid him prepare me an ass, to follow you; but, instead of that, he went himself, to accuse me falsely. The king interrupted him, and said, Say no more: what I have determined shall stand; you and Ziba divide the estate. David did not think proper to make a stricter scrutiny into this matter, perhaps out of consideration for Mephibosheth. For it is hardly to be supposed that David would have confirmed Ziba in the possession of half Saul's estate, if he had thought him guilty of such gross calumny, ingratitude, and disobedience to his master. It is therefore believed, that David made up to Mephibosheth the moiety of his estate given to Ziba.

ZIBEON, זיבון, Σεβων, iniquity, that dwells: from זיבון shub, to dwell, to rest, and זיבון haron, iniquity: otherwise, elevation, or swelling: otherwise, oath, or fulness, or the seventh; from זיבון shabah: according to the Syriac, he that stains, or is stained. [dyed, dyer.]

ZIBEON, a Hivite, father of Anah, and grandfather of Abolibamah, wife of Esau. Gen. xxxvi. 2. 1 Chron. i. 38.

ZIBIAH, זיביה, deer, or goat, or honourable and fine; from זיביה tzabah, or זיביה tzabi: otherwise, the Lord dwells; from זיביה jatsab, to dwell, to stand up, and זיביה jah, the Lord: or voluntary, according to the Syriac. See TABITHA.

I. ZIBIAH, or SEBIA, of Beer-sheba, mother of Jehoash, king of Judah. 2 Kings xii. 1.

II. ZIBIAH, son of Hodesh. 1 Chron. viii. 9.

ZICHRI, זכרי, that remembers, or that is a male; from זכר zakar. [gift for memorial?]

I. ZICHRI, or ZECHRI, son of Izhar, and grandson of Kohath. Exod. vi. 21.

II. ZICHRI, of Ephraim, a very stout and valiant man. He killed Maaseiah, son of king Ahaz, Arikam, the governor of the palace, and Elkanah, who was second after the king. 2 Chron. xxviii. 7.

ZIDDIM, זידים, hunting; from זידה zadah, to hunt, to lay an ambush: otherwise, sides: according to the Syriac, destructions, desolations. [A flat, or side of a mountain in a river.]

ZIDDIM, or ASSEDIM, a city of Naphtali. Josh. xix. 35. The Hebrew reads, זידים צר חמת. The fortified cities of the Tyrians are Tyre and Hamah. [Eng. Tr. Ziddim, Zer, and Hammath.]

ZIDON. Vide SIDON.

ZIF, or ZIO, Ζύριος, the second month 3 K div. 2. of of the holy year of the Hebrews; afterwards called Jiar; it answers to April. We find this name only in 1 Kings vi. 1.

ZIHA, זיהא, brightness, whiteness; from זיהא tzachach: or, dryness; from זיהא tzachicha. [Victor, Victory. Ez. ii. 43. Neh. vii. 6.]

ZIKLAG, זיקלא, measure pressed down; from זיקלא log, a kind of measure of capacity, and זיקלא tzuk, to squeeze: or, measure running over; from זיקלא jatzak, to spill, and log, a kind of measure. [The risings up of water; plentiful springs. 1 Sam. xxvi. 7. Neh. xi. 28.]

ZIKLAG, a city that Achish, king of Gath, gave to David, when he took shelter among the Philistines, 1 Sam. xxvii. 6. and which, after that time, always belonged to the kings of Judah. The Amalekites took it, and plundered it, in the absence of David. Joshua had allotted it to the tribe of Simeon. Josh. xix. 5. Eusebius says it lay in the south of Canaan.

ZILLAH, זילה, Σελλα, shadow, which is roasted, the tingling of the ear; from זילה tzalah, or זילה tzalal: or prayer, according to the Syriac.

ZILLAH, a wife of Lamech, the bigamist. She was mother of Tubal-cain and Naamah. Gen. iv. 21, 22. See LAMRCH.

ZILPAH, זילפה, distillation; from זילפה zalaph: or contempt of the mouth; from זילפה zul, vile, deserving contempt, and זילפה pe, the mouth.

ZILPAH, or ZELPHA, Leah's maid, who became wife to the patriarch Jacob, and mother of Gad and Asher. Gen. xxx. 9. xli. 18.

ZILTHAI, זילתאי, shadow, or tingling of the ear; from זילתאי tsalal: otherwise, roasted, burnt; from זילתאי tzalah: according to the Syriac, he that prays. [shade, i. e. protection. 1 Chron. viii. 20. xii. 20.]

ZIMMAH, זימה, thought, evil contrivance, or crime; from זימה zamam. A Levite, father to Joash, of the race of Gershon. 2 Chr. xxix. 12. [from the Arabic, chain, bond, to the parents.]

ZIMRAM, זימרא, Συμβραν, song, or singer; from זימרא zamar. See ZIMRI. The first son of Keturah, and of Abraham. He dwelt in Arabia with his brethren. Gen. xxv. 2. [Perhaps rather the fair rock goat, from זימרא.]

ZIMRI, זימרי, Ζιμρι, my field: otherwise, my song, my vine, my branch; from זימרי zamar, to sing; or זימרי zamir, vine branch.

I. ZIMRI, ZAMRI, or ZAMBRI, son of Zerab, and grandson of Judah and Tamar. 1 Chron. ii. 6.

II. ZIMRI, son of Salu, prince of the tribe of Simeon, who went publicly into the tent of Cozbi, a Midianite woman, and was followed by Phinehas, son of Eleazar the high-priest, who slew him with Cozbi. Numb. xxv. 14.

III. ZIMRI, general of half the cavalry of Elah, king of Israel, when he rebelled against his master. 1 Kings xvi. 9, 10. Elah was making merry at Tirzah, when Zimri killed him, and usurped his kingdom. He cut off the whole family, not sparing any of his relations or friends; whereby was fulfilled the word of the Lord, denounced to Baasha, the father of Elah, by the prophet Jehu. Zimri reigned but seven days; for the army of Israel, then besieging Gibbethon, a city of the Philistines, made their general Omri king, and came and besieged Zimri in the city of Tirzah. Zimri seeing the city on the point of being taken, burnt himself in the palace, with all its riches.

ZIN, זין, buckler, coldness; from זין sinan. [Among the Talmudists this word denotes the smaller, or dwarf, palm; whence some have derived the name of a town, and of the desert.]

ZIN, SIN, or SENNA, a city south of the Land of Promise. Numb. xxxiv. 4. Perhaps this is the Senaah of Ezra ii. 35. or Zin, Josh. xv. 3. Eusebius mentions Migdal-Senna, or the tower of Senna, eight miles from Jericho, north. This cannot be the Zin, or Sennah, of Numbers or Joshua; but may it not be that of Ezra? See SIN.

ZINA, זינה, Ζιζα, Vulgate, Ziza, fornication, prostitution; from זינה zanah: according to the Syriac, inn; from זינה zun, or from זינה zunah: otherwise arms. The son of Shimei, a Levite. 1 Chron. xxiii. 10.

[ZING, or ZENJ, son of Ham. See FRAGS. No. DXXVIII.]

ZION, ציון, a monument raised up, heap of stones set up, sepulchre, turret, dryness; from ציון tzun. [extremely dry?]

[Simon denies the derivation from the Arabic and Ethiopic roots, which signify to guard, to protect, to defend; nevertheless, it appears from 2 Sam. ii. 7. that it was a strong hold.

If it might be derived from the person, or power, Aun, it would import the "Aun of the Tzi, or ship." Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CCXIV.]

ZION, or SION, a mountain on which the temple of the Lord was built in Jerusalem by Solomon, and where David built the city of David, over against, and north of, the ancient Jebus, or Jerusalem, which stood on the hill opposite to Zion. Psal. xlviii. 2. "Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is mount Zion, on the sides of the north, the city of the great king." Scripture generally puts mount Zion for the place where the temple of the Lord stood; but strictly it stood rather on mount Moriah, which was one of the hills of which mount Zion was composed. 2 Chron. iii. 1. M. Reland pretends, pretends, that mount Zion was to the south of Jerusalem, and not to the north. The reader may see his reasons, Palæst. tom. ii. p. 847, 848. Vide PLATES, MAPS of JERUSALEM, also FRAGMENTS, Nos. CXXXVI. DLXXII.

ZIOR, צִיֹּר, [very] small, from צָר tsahar: or, ship of him that watches, or is awake, or of him that is robbed, or of the enemy; from צִי tai, a ship, and צָר hur, to be awake, or from צָר her, or hur, an enemy; or that watches: or from צָרָה harah, to spoil, or rob. A city of Judah. Josh. xv. 54.

ZIPH, זִפְּה, or ZIO, this mouth, or mouthful; from זֶה ze, this, or that, and from פֶּה pe, a mouth, or mouthful: otherwise זָפַח zuph, which in Chaldee signifies to falsify or corrupt. The second Hebrew month. 1 Kings vi. 1.

ZIPH, or ZIPHA, זִפְּהָ. See ZIPH above. [The name appears to signify an interchange of gifts.]

I. ZIPH, or ZIPHA, son of Jehaleleel, of Judah, and of the family of Caleb. 1 Chron. iv. 16. probably he gave his name to the city of Ziph, in Judah. [and Zipha, Eng. Tr.]

II. ZIPH, a city of Judah. Josh. xv. 24. Jerom says, that in his time they shewed the village of Ziph, eight miles from Hebron, eastward. David kept himself concealed for some time in the wilderness of Ziph. 1 Sam. xxiii. 14, 15.

III. ZIPH. There was another city called Ziph, near Maon and Carmel of Judah. Josh. xv. 55.

ZIPHION, צִפְּיוֹן, Vulgate, Sephion, that beholds; from צָפָה tsaphah: or the north; from צָפֹן tsaphon: or who is hid; from צָפַן tzaphan: otherwise, the north that is hid. The eldest son of Gad. Gen. xli. 16. [vehemently looked for.]

ZIPPOR, צִפּוֹר, bird, or sparrow; from צִפּוֹר tsiphor: otherwise, crown, or desert: according to the Syriac, early in the morning, or goat. [Father of Balak, king of Moab. Numb. xxii.]

ZIPPORAH, שִׁפּוֹרָה, beauty, trumpet; from שָׁפַר shaphar. [Feminine of ZIPPOR, little bird.]

ZIPPORAH, or SEPHORA, daughter of Jethro, and wife of Moses, and mother of Eliezer and Gershom. When Moses fled from Egypt, Exod. ii. 16, 17, 18, &c. he withdrew into Midian; where having stood up in defence of the daughters of Jethro, priest, or prince, of Midian, against shepherds who would have hindered them from watering their flocks; Jethro took him into his house, and gave him his daughter Zipporah in marriage, by whom he had two sons, Eliezer and Gershom.

Several years after, Exod. iv. 20, 21, 22, &c. A. M. 2513, ante A. D. 1491, when Moses, in obedience to the commands of the Lord, was returning into Egypt, with Zipporah and his two sons; at one of their resting places, an angel of the Lord was about to put him to death: (it is not clearly expressed in the text, whether it was Moses, or his son Eliezer, whom the angel was about to put to death.) On which, Zipporah took a sharp stone, and having circumcised her son, she laid hold of the feet of Moses, saying, You are a bloody husband unto me: after which the angel quitted Moses (or Eliezer); and Zipporah, with her two sons, went back to her father Jethro.

Some time after this, when Moses had brought the people of Israel out of Egypt to the camp of Sinai, Exod. xviii. A. M. 2514, ante A. D. 1490, Jethro came to meet Moses, and brought with him Zipporah and her two sons, whom Moses received with joy. See JETHRO and MOSES. Scripture gives no other particulars respecting Zipporah; except that a quarrel arose about her, between Moses, Aaron, and Miriam, Numb. xii. in which Zipporah seems not to have been concerned.

The Rabbins tell us, that Jethro at first had Moses clapped into prison, with intention of sending him back to Pharoah; but that Zipporah falling in love with Moses, procured his liberty. Jethro then consented that Moses should have Zipporah in marriage, if he could pull up a twig of saphir that was planted in his garden. Vide SAPHIR. Moses did it instantly, and obtained Zipporah for his wife. This twig of saphir was, they say, inscribed with the sacred name Jehovah; and Moses afterwards used it as a wand.

The same authors tell us, that the murmuring of Aaron and Miriam, above mentioned, was because Moses had separated himself from his wife. Some think, that the wife, who gave occasion to this murmuring, was not Zipporah, daughter of Jethro, but Tharbis, daughter of the king of Ethiopia, whom Moses had forsaken. Others infer, that Aaron and Miriam were uneasy because Moses had married Zipporah, who was a stranger, fearing the consequences of such an example in Israel. They called her Cushite, or Ethiopian, because Midian was either in the land of Cush, or very near it. Habakkuk, iii. 7. seems to put Cushan, or Cush, as synonymous with Midian. Others, with more reason, are of opinion, that Zipporah had given occasion to this quarrel, by valuing herself on the favours God vouchsafed to Moses. The answer of Aaron and Miriam seems to insinuate something like this, "Hath the Lord indeed spoken only by Moses? Hath he not also spoken by us?"

ZIPHRON, זִפְרוֹן, according to the Hebrew and Syriac, falseness of the song, or false joy; otherwise, whistling; from זָפַר zaphar. A city north of the Land of Promise. Numb. xxxiv. 9. It is now unknown. Jerom, on Ezek. lxvii. says, it is Zephyrium in Cilicia. [Arabic, fragrance.]

ZITHRI, זִיתְרִי, to hide; otherwise, demolished, or overturned; from סָתַר sathar: otherwise, my refuge; from sathar, and the pronoun i, my. Son of Uzziel. Exod. vi. 22.

ZIZ, זִיז, 'Αῖς, flower, [bud,] branch, a lock of hair; from זָיַז tziz: wing, feather, according to the Syriac. [A cliff, covered perhaps with bushes, whence it has a frizzled aspect: or, as it seems to mean, a collection of flowers: possibly, a meadow producing flowers.]

ZIZ, or SIS. King Jehoshaphat obtained a complete victory over the Ammonites and Moabites, near the desert of Ziz, or cliff of Ziz. 2 Chron. xx. 16. It was probably near Ziza, which Ptolemy places in Arabia Petræa.

I ZIZA, son of Shipi. 1 Chron. iv. 37.

II. ZIZA, son of Rehoboam, king of Judah, and Maachah, daughter or grand-daughter of Absalom. 2 Chron. xi. 20.

ZIZITH. Thus the Jews called the tuffs or fringes that they wore heretofore, at the four quarters of their upper garments. Numb. xv. 38. Deut. xxii. 12. Vide GARMENT and TALED.

ZOAN, זֶן, motion. [migration, going forth: more probably, the end of migration. A royal city of Egypt, extremely ancient. Called in Greek Tanis. Judith i. 10. Built, no doubt, by emigrants. Numb. xiii. 22. Psalm lxxviii. 12, 43. Isaiah xix. 11, 13. xxx. 4. Ezek. xxx. 14. I think, however, that this word may be taken to signify a lake, or marsh; such was the situation of the ancient Zoan in Egypt, surrounded by water.

The Zaananim of Josh. xix. 33. is rendered by the Chaldee lakes, marshes. This sense seems to be justified by the fact.] See TANAI.

ZOAR, זֹאֵר, Ζογὸρ, Σογὸρ, Σηγὸρ, small; from זָוַר zavar. [or poor, a trifling, petty place.]

[It should appear that Zoar, though called "little town," afterwards obtained importance, as it is mentioned by Ptolemy, who calls it Zoara.]

ZOAR, ZOARA, SEGOR, or BELA; a city of the Pentapolis, on the southern extremity of the Dead Sea. It was destined, with the other five cities, to be consumed by fire from heaven; but at the intercession of Lot, it was preserved. Gen. xiv. 2. It was called Bela before; but after Lot intreated the angel's permission to take refuge in it, and insisted on the smallness of this city, it had the name Zoar, which signifies small, or little. See BELA. The Romans kept a garrison at Zoar, or Segor, says Jerom, Onomast. in Bela. He observes, Quæst. Hebr. in Gen. xiv. xix. 30. that the name of Bela was given to this city, because, as soon as Lot was gone out of it, it was swallowed up by an earthquake, as Bela signifies. Theodoret, Quæst. in Gen. mentions the same tradition. Jerom also reports, that the Hebrews think Zoar has the name of Shalisha, 1 Sam. ix. 4. and is the heifer of three years old, Vitula conternuna. Isaiah xv. 5. They pretend that this city has often been destroyed by earthquakes.

[ZOBAH, a host, or camp: otherwise, the taught in them, or swelling, or tumor. The name of a place. 1 Sam. xiv. 7. 2 Sam. viii. 3. xxiii. 36. 1 Chron. xviii. 3. Psalm. lix. Judg. xiii. Depression, inclination, cavity, from the Arabic, says Simon: the Ethiopic signifies narrowed, contracted. Vide SYRIA Zobah.]

ZOBEBAH, צִבְבָּה, the army, or the fight is in her; from צָבָא tzaba: otherwise, the tumour, the swelling is in her; from צָבָה tzabah, the preposition בְּ beth, in, and the pronoun הָ a, her. Son of Coz. 1 Chron. iv. 8.

ZOHAR, צֹהַר, Σαῦρ, white, shining; from צָוַר tzachar: otherwise, dryness; from צָחַח tsechichu. [splendor, i. e. of the family.]

I. ZOHAR, SOHAR, or SEHOR, father of Ephron the Hittite, of Hebron. Gen. xxiii. 8.

II. ZOHAR, fifth son of the patriarch, Simeon, Gen. xlv. 10. Called Zerah. 1 Chron. iv. 24.

ZOHELETH, זֹחֶלֶת, that creeps, slides, or draws; from זָחַל zachal. [smooth?]

ZOHELETH. The stone of Zohelath, was near the fountain Rogel, or En-rogel, just under the walls of Jerusalem. 1 Kings i. 9. The Rabbins tell us, that this stone served as an exercise to the young men, who tried their strength by throwing it, or rather rolling it, or lifting it. Others think it was useful to the fullers, or whistlers, to beat their clothes upon, after they had washed them. [both, perhaps.]

ZOHETH, זָחַח, to separate, [violently] from זָחַח, zachach: or, he that fears, or is bruised; from זָחַח, this, or that, and זָחַח chathah, to bruise, to astonish: according to the Syriac, that descends.

ZOHETH, son of Ishi, of Simeon. 1 Chron. iv. 20.

ZOLEIKA. The name given by the Orientals to the daughter of Pharoah, who was wife of Potiphar. The irregular passion of this woman for Joseph, is sufficiently known. Vide JOSEPH.

ZOPHAH, צֹפָה, decree that binds; from צָפָה tsava, decree, or precept, and צָפָה pach, bond: otherwise otherwise, the precept of the blowing; from the same tsira, and פוח puach, to blow. These etymologies are forced, and there is reason to believe that the text is corrupted. [Extension, i. e. of the family, from the Arabic: son of Helem, i. e. Hammer.]

ZOPHAH, or SUPHA, son of Helem, of Asher. Zophah was the father of Suah, Harnepher, Shual, &c. 1 Chron. vii. 35, 36.

ZOPHAI, צופי, that beholds; from צפה tsapha: [sweet.] or, honeycomb, or that swim; from צוף tsuph: otherwise, which is covered. Son of Elkanah, of the family of Kohath. 1 Chron. vi. 26.

ZOPHAR, צופר, rising early, or crown; from צפירה tsephira: otherwise, sparrow, or little bird; from צפר tzippor: goat, according to the Syriac; from צפיר tsaphir. [Leaper.]

ZOPHAR, or SOPHAR, the Naamathite, a friend of Job. Job ii. 11. The LXX. call him Sophar, king of the Mineans; the interpreter of Origen makes him king of the Nomades. We cannot tell whether Naamah be the name of his country or of his father.

ZOPHIM, צופים, those that behold, that attend; from צפה tsaphah, to behold, to attend: otherwise, that float, that cover; or honeycomb; from צוף tsuph. See ZOPHAI.

ZOPHIM, or SOPHIM. The plural of Zoph, or Zuph, a descendant of Kohath, a Levite. 1 Chron. vi. 26. The descendants of Zoph, i. e. the Zophim, dwelt at Ramath, the country of Samuel; whence it had the name of Ramath of the Zophim; which denomination was extended to all the district, thence called the land of Zuph. 1 Sam. ix. 5.

ZORAH, צרעה, leprosy, or scab; from צרע tsarah. [From the Samaritan, an assembly: a much more probable derivation.]

I. ZORAH, or SARAA, a city of Judah, Josh. xv. 33. built, or rebuilt and fortified, by Rehoboam. 2 Chron. xi. 10.

II. ZORAH, a city of Dan, and the birth-place of Samson, Judg. xvi. 31. on the frontier of Dan, and of Judah, not far from Eshtaol. Eusebius, in Sara, et in Sorec, places it ten miles from Eleutheropolis, towards Nicopolis, not far from Kaphar-Sorek. I think the Zorites, 1 Chron. ii. 54. and the Zorathites, 1 Chron. iv. 2. were inhabitants of Zorah.

ZOROASTER. I should not speak of this famous man here, had not he been confounded with Abraham; and had not Scripture mentioned the Chananim, or temples consecrated to fire; which was the principal object of worship among his disciples.

The learned are much divided as to the history of Zoroaster. The Orientals generally call him Zerdasht, or Zaradasht, or Zerdoust. The Book of the Philosopher Giamasb, D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 930, says, that in the year 1300 after the deluge, Zoroaster appeared, and began to instruct men in the worship and adoration of fire. That after his death, Kistab, son of Lahorasb, who reigned in Persia, embraced his religion, and continued firmly attached to it.

Under the reign of this prince lived the great philosopher Giamasb, surnamed the Magian, who in his book Of the Great Conjunctions says, that during the great conjunction of the planets, 1300 years after the deluge, in the month Schebat, under the reign of Feridoun, king of Persia, of the first dynasty; God sent the prophet Zerpasche, or Zoroaster.

He says a little farther; after Zoroaster, and since the building of the Pyrae, or fire temples, happened the second conjunction, esteemed a very great one; and then came out of the mountains of the third climate a person named The Master of the Virgin, (meaning Moses,) who founded another religion differing from that of Zoroaster. This is the oldest account we have of this teacher. The book of Giamasb is not supposititious, no more than another ascribed to Zoroaster himself, which bears the name of Kesab-al-Kenaret. This observes, as well as the first, that the Master of the Virgin, (Moses,) appeared under the second great conjunction of the planets; and they agree in this with the sentiments of the ancient Persians, who all contend that Zoroaster was more ancient than Moses.

But, if Zoroaster appeared thirteen hundred years after the deluge; i. e. according to our chronology, A. M. 2956, ante A. D. 1048, he was consequently, a great while AFTER Moses, who came out of Egypt A. M. 2513, ante A. D. 1491. Thus the chronology of the Persians must therefore be erroneous, who think Zoroaster much more ancient than Moses, yet place him 1300 years after the deluge, which date coincides with the reign of David over Israel.

The Magians of Persia, D'Herbelot, p. 931, to procure the greater authority to their doctrine, maintain, that their master Zoroaster is the same as the patriarch Abraham; who having been cast into a burning furnace, by order of Nimrod, was miraculously delivered from it. The sight of this miracle converted a great number of persons, and drew after Abraham (whom now they called Abraham Zerdasht, i. e. Abraham Friend of Fire,) an infinite number of followers, who were easily persuaded by him to pay their adoration tion to fire. It was therefore in Mesopotamia and Chaldea that the first Pyræa, or fire temples, were set up.

But this opinion is still less supportable than the former, on many accounts. First, from chronology: Nimrod was born soon after the deluge; for Scripture represents him as building cities, and founding a great monarchy, quickly after the interruption of the tower of Babel. Therefore, if we place his birth about A. M. 1660, four or five years after the deluge, he must be 423 years old at the time when Abraham left Ur to go into the land of Canaan; but it would be rare, to find any born after the deluge arrive at such an age.

But, if we grant that Nimrod might have known and persecuted Abraham; what proof is there that he ordered him to be cast into fire, and that he came out safe and sound? It is true, the Jews and Orientals affirm this; but on what foundation—because Scripture says, he came out of Ur: Ur is the Hebrew word for fire,—therefore he came out of a fiery furnace. Would Moses have related a fact of such consequence in so slight and superficial a manner? The very terms of his history sufficiently evince that Ur denotes a city. Gen. xi. 28, 31. “And Haran died before his father Terah, in the land of his nativity, in Ur of the Chaldees.” And afterwards, “And Terah took Abram his son, and Lot the son of Haran, his son’s son, and Sarai his daughter-in-law, his son Abram’s wife; and they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan.” Also, Gen. xv. 7. “I am the Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees.” Do not all these passages concur to prove, that Ur is the name of a city; for who ever supposed, that Terah, Abram, Lot, and Sarai, were all thrown into fire by the Chaldeans? Indeed, Jerom has translated Nehemiah ix. 7. by, “Thou broughtest Abram forth out of the fire of the Chaldees,” because he thought proper to render Ur literally; but in his Hebrew Questions, he treats as a fable, all which the Jews had advanced of Abraham’s being delivered out of the fire.

It would be doing an injury to religion, and to the piety of Abraham, to imagine, that he could have established, or promoted, the worship of fire. It does not appear from his history in Genesis, that he ever paid any particular honour to this element, or recommended to his children any devotion to it. The ancient Israelites always had this worship in abhorrence, as well as the worship of other creatures.

Other Oriental authors, says D’Herbelot,

Bibl. Orient. p. 231, place Zoroaster long after Abraham. Kendomir, in the Life of Kischtasb, son of Lahorasb, says, that Zoroaster, having learned by the rules of astrology, that a great prophet was to be born, would persuade the world that he himself was that prophet. To succeed in this he often raised the devil, who appeared to him in the midst of fire, and communicated a kind of luminous brightness to him. This splendor in which he appeared from time to time, and the boldness with which he affirmed himself to be a messenger from God, procured him credit. He composed a book called Zend, which contained his doctrine, in which the devil had instructed him, out of the fire, being transformed into an angel of light. This same author says, that those who will not allow Zoroaster to be so old as this, insist that he learned out of the books of the Hebrews, that after Moses there should arise another great prophet, described by Balaam under the image of a star, and a light; and that he undertook to pass himself on the world as this light.

The Tarik Montekab teaches, that Zoroaster was a disciple of the prophets Elijah and Elisha, and of the Rechabites, from whom he learned the secret of the prophecies of the Jews; but corrupting them by a mixture of his own fancies, he composed from thence his Book of Life. He was the first, says the author, who started the doctrine of two principles of the patriarch and evil; and that the name of Megiousch, or Magians, given to his disciples, is a word corrupted from the Persian Meikousch, which signifies bitter-sweet, because of his two opposite principles of good and evil.

According to the two Persian authors already quoted, Zoroaster was contemporary with Kischtasb, son of Lahorasb, the fifth king of Persia, of the dynasty of the Caianians; this prince espoused his doctrine, caused it to be embraced by all his subjects, and built Pyræa throughout Persia. But king Kischtasb is the same as Hystaspes, or Darius, son of Hystaspes, of the Greeks, and, consequently, Zoroaster could not live till after the captivity of Babylon. Others make him contemporary with Jeremiah, Daniel, and Ezra, and his father Lahorasb contemporary with Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar. This brings down Zoroaster very much below the time of Abraham.

The Oriental Christians, apud Abulpharag. 5 Dynastic. make Zoroaster contemporary with Cambyses. Some of them think him to be a native of Media, others of Assyria; and they describe him as a disciple of Elijah, probably because this prophet brought down fire on those who were sent to apprehend him, and again, on the victims offered to the Lord on mount Carmel, and was taken up in a fiery chariot. Moreover, it is said by Abulfarage, that Zoroaster foretold to his followers the coming of the Messiah, informed them that a new star should appear at his birth; that this Messiah was to be born of a virgin, and that they should have early information of it; when they should not fail to go and to offer him their presents. To this the Magi were obedient, who went to worship Jesus Christ at Bethlehem. The anachronism is very apparent, that makes Zoroaster contemporary with Cambyzes and Elijah, who lived at periods very distant from each other. Cambyzes died A. M. 3483, and Elijah was taken away about A. M. 3108.

Ebn-Batrick, otherwise Eutychius, patriarch of Alexandria, thinks that Zoroaster was contemporary with Smerdis, the successor of Cambyzes, predecessor to Darius, son of Hystaspes, and that he lived under Thamurah, king of Persia, of the first dynasty of the Pishdadians. The author of Tarik Montekeb seems to think that Zoroaster was the same as Smerdis now mentioned, and chief of the sect of the Guebres, whom the Magians placed on the throne. For the Persian name of Mi-khousch, which is an abridgment of Mickgousch, very well describes the state of Smerdis, who had his ears cut off.

Ben-Schunah pretends, that Zoroaster was a disciple of Esdras, which prophet cursed him, because he maintained opinions contrary to Judaism. That to punish him for his impiety, God struck him with a leprosy, as he had done Gehazi: and that on this account, being driven from Jerusalem, he withdrew into Persia, where he became the head of a new religion. The Persians were then Zabians; he taught them the worship of fire, and made a mixture of Zabiism and Magiism, of which he was the inventor. Hence it is that many confound the Zabians with the Magians.

Other Persian authors say, that Zoroaster was among those who undertook to build the tower of Babel. Others confound him with Dohac, one of the kings of Persia of the first dynasty of the Pishdadians; others derive his descent from Manougeher, king of Persia, of the same dynasty; so little are the Persians agreed about the age of this their famous prophet.

Many authors, both ancient and modern, among the Orientals, affirm Zoroaster to have been, not the inventor, but the reformer of Magiism. And indeed we read in the histories of the most ancient kings of Persia, that the worship of fire had commenced even from the times of Cauimarrath, [Caimuras?] founder of this great monarchy of the Persians, according to the Orientals, or rather, of the Assyrians, according to the Greeks and Latins. But according to them, this was the original of their worship. Cauimarrath having lost his son Siamek, who was assassinated by robbers, he caused a great funeral pile to be erected and burnt on the place where he was buried. His subjects, in emulation, lighted up also great fires throughout Persia, to shew their concern for the loss of this young prince. These fires, by degrees, became the object of their worship, and the foundation of their religion.

Let us now come to Greek authors. Eudoxus, apud Plin. lib. xxx. cap. 1. places Zoroaster six thousand years before the death of Plato. Aristotle does the same. Hermodorus, apud Diogen. Laert. in Proem. Hermippus, apud Plin. lib. xxx. cap. 1. and Plutarch, de Iside et Osiride, place him five thousand years before the Trojan war. But Xanthus the Lydian, Diogen. Laert. in Proem. and another anonymous author, followed by Suidas, in voce Zoroáσnp, are contented to place him, one of them five hundred years before the siege of Troy, the other six hundred before the expedition of Cyrus against Greece. This last opinion is that of Xanthus the Lydian, whom Suidas supposes to have lived under the reign of Darius, son of Hystaspes, and whose testimony would be much more weighty than it is, if we were sure that the writings which went under his name were really his. But Athenæus, lib. xii. acquaints us, that the works which bore his name were composed by a Greek called Dionysius Scythobrachion, who lived a little before Julius Cæsar.

Justin says, lib. i. cap. 1. that Zoroaster was king of Bactriana, and contemporary with Ninus, king of Assyria; that he invented the magical art, and was very skilful in astronomy, and in the knowledge of antiquity; that Ninus made war upon him, conquered and killed him. Pliny, lib. xxx. cap. 1. acknowledges two Zoroasters: one very ancient, who lived, as he says, several thousand years before the magical sects of Moses, of Jamnes, and of Jotapus. This Zoroaster was of Persia, and is supposed to be the most ancient inventor of magic. The other was of Proconessus, and lived but a little before Ostanes, who followed Xerxes in his expedition against Greece. It is plainly impossible to reconcile either the Oriental authors with each other, or the Greek and Latin authors among themselves, or with the Orientals; not even by admitting two Zoroasters, or as many as you please.

John

John Cassion, Petrus Comester, the spurious Berosus, father Kircher, father Scipio Sgambati, and some others, have thought that Ham was the same as Zoroaster, the inventor of magic. The author of the Recognitions under the name of Clement, thinks him to have been Mizraim, son of Ham. The author of the Paschal Chronicle has followed this opinion. Gregory of Tours has confounded Zoroaster with Cush, son of Ham. He who composed the pretended writings of St. Clement confounds him with Nimrod; Franciscus Patricius with Japheth. The gospel of the Infancy of Jesus Christ informs us, that the Magi who came to worship Christ at Bethlehem, had notice of his birth from their master Zoroaster. George Hornius pretended that Zoroaster was the same as Balaam, mentioned by Moses. It must be owned as very difficult to make a judicious and secure choice among this variety of opinions; to reconcile them is impossible. The greatest proof of uncertainty in historical facts is diversity of opinions, which cannot be greater in any instance than in the subject before us.

If we endeavour to trace the origin of fire-worship, we soon find ourselves surrounded by new perplexities. For Moses, according to the sentiments of several learned men, has spoke of the Pyrae, in Lev. xxvi. 30. under the word chamanim, חַמָּנִים. Isaiah, xxvii. 9. uses the same word, chamanim; he likewise threatens the infidel Jews to overthrow their groves, and their chamanim. Vide CHAMANIM.

Some are of opinion, that the chamanim of 2 Kings xxiii. 5. in Hosea x. 5. and Zephaniah i. 4. חַמָּרִים camarim, are priests of the Magi, who kept up the sacred fire in the Pyrae. The word chamanim signifies black or sooty. King Josiah, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 4. destroyed the altars of Baal, and overturned the chamanim, which were above, or over them. Vide CHAMARIM.

Some think that the perpetual fire, which Moses ordered to be maintained on the altar of the Lord, Lev. vi. 9, 12. was an imitation of the fire of the Magi, and a condescension of Moses to the weakness of the Hebrews, who had been long accustomed to such fires in the temples of the Pagans. Theophrastus, apud Euseb. Prepar. lib. i. cap. 9. puts the custom of keeping a continual fire in the temples, among the most ancient practices of religion. Ammianus Marcellinus, lib. xxiii. says, the Magi pretended that the fire of their temples descended from heaven. Fire was always carried before the kings of Persia. It cannot be said that Zoroaster and the Magians borrowed this from the Jews, since Moses so early mentions chamanim.

If, therefore, Zoroaster be the first author of the worship of fire, he must be acknowledged as more ancient than Moses. If he be only the reformer or restorer of it, he may be placed after Cyrus; and if there have been several men under the name Zoroaster, this will allow greater scope for a variety of opinions concerning his person. But it seems plain to us, that the Zoroaster who appeared in Asia a little after Cyrus, and who formed the religion of the Magi, was a mere Pagan; that he paid an impious worship to the heavenly bodies, to fire, and to the two principles, one of which was subordinate to the other; and that this ancient religion was very different from that of the modern Guebres, or Gaures, who call themselves disciples of Zoroaster, and who worship fire; but with the ancient religion of their master, they have mingled other opinions, taken from the Jews and Christians.

Dr. Hyde, who had studied the ancient religion of the Persians, pretends, that Zoroaster was the greatest impostor that ever appeared, except Mahomet. This last was utterly ignorant, and could neither write nor read; whereas Zoroaster, according to him, was versed in all the sciences of the Orientals, and especially in the religion of the Jews, and in the books of the Old Testament, which makes him think he was originally a Jew, and native of the Holy Land. He imagines him to have been a disciple of the prophet Daniel, and intent on raising himself into a prophet; by that to attain good fortune. He did not found any new religion; he only undertook to reform that of the Magians, which for several ages had been the prevailing religion of the Medes and Persians.

But it appears that Dr. Hyde had been prepossessed in favour of the disciples of Zoroaster; and did not enough distinguish between the creed of the ancient Magians, and that of the modern Guebres, or Gaures. He pretends, that the old Persians had just notions of the Deity, and that they admitted but of one God: that indeed they received two principles, but one of them was uncreated, and the other created: that the worship they paid to the sun was merely civil. But the ancient authors who have described the religion of the Persians are unanimous, that they adored the sun and fire, under the name of Mithras.

The Guebres hold, for example, that there is a sovereign, independent being, self-existent from all eternity. That under this being there are two angels, one of light, the author of good; the other of darkness, the author of evil. That these two angels have formed all things that exist exist, from a mixture of light and darkness. Anciently, the Magians built their temples uncovered, on the tops of mountains, and other eminences, in the open air; these they consecrated to fire. But as their sacred fire was often extinguished by rain, storms, and tempests, they built temples over these altars. Before and around these fires, they exercised their acts of religion. The ancients are universally agreed, that they paid them the highest degree of adoration: but those of the present day constantly deny that they worship the fire, but God only, under the symbol of fire. They always approach these fires on the western side, so that they have their faces turned towards the sun-rising.

The prophet Isaiah, xlv. 5, 6, 7. seems to have had in view the error of the Magi concerning the two principles, when he says, "I am the Lord, and there is none else; there is no God besides me. I girded thee, though thou hast not known me. That they may know, from the rising of the sun, and from the west, that there is none besides me; I am the Lord, and there is none else. I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil: I the Lord do all these things." The God of Israel addresses these words to Cyrus king of Persia. Ezekiel, viii. 16. speaking of these idolaters, says, "At the door of the temple of the Lord, between the porch and the altar, were about five and twenty men, with their backs towards the temple of the Lord, and their faces towards the east; and they worshipped the sun towards the east." This is a manifest allusion to the worship of the Magians, the disciples of Zoroaster.

This impostor feigned, that he had brought a sacred fire from heaven, and had deposited it on the altar of the first temple that he caused to be built, in the city of Xiz, in Media, whence it was propagated into all the other temples which observed the rites of the Magians. And such was the respect of the priests for this pretended sacred fire, that they watched it night and day, to keep it in, and never blowed it, either with their mouth, or with bellows, for fear of profaning it, on pain of death. Vide FRAGMENTS, No. CXXVIII. and PLATE. They carried this superstition so far, that the priests could not approach this fire without a linen cloth before their mouths, lest their breath should pollute it. Hence also, when they performed their ceremonies, they rather muttered between their teeth, than pronounced their prayers in an intelligible and articulate manner.

VOL. II. PART XXXII. Edit. IV.

From Media, Zoroaster passed into Bactriana, where he fixed his abode in the city of Balk; from thence he proceeded into the Indies, and became skilful in the sciences studied there. He returned to Balk, which lies on the river Oxus, on the confines of Persia, the Indies, and Chorasana, where he built the chief of his temples, and ordered all his followers to make their pilgrimages to it. But after Persia was ravaged by Mahometans, in the seventh century, the Archimagus fixed his residence at Kerman; and the temple of this place is not in less repute than that of Balk was formerly.

The Magians have at this day a book, which they pretend was composed by Zoroaster in a cave whither he retired; it was wrote in twelve volumes, each of which contained a hundred skins of vellum. This book is called Zendavesta; by contraction Zend. This word literally signifies light-fire, and might with us express a tinder box. The first part of this book contains their liturgy, which they now use in their temples. The rest treats of other matters of their religion. The Magians have the same respect for this book as we have for our bible: it is written in old language, and in the old Persian, or Chaldee characters. Dr. Hyde offered to publish this work, with a Latin translation, if he could have been assisted in defraying the expences of his edition. But for want of this assistance, his project was never put in execution.

In this book we find many things taken out of the Old Testament, with a great part of the Psalms of David. Zoroaster names Adam and Eve, as the first of mankind. He gives the history of the creation very like that of Moses; but whereas Moses says that God created the world in six days, Zoroaster describes it as having been created at six different times, each made up of a certain number of days, which in all amount to three hundred and sixty-five days, i. e. a year. He also speaks of Abraham, of Joseph, of Moses, and of Solomon, in the same manner as Scripture. He calls his book the Book of Abraham, and his religion, the Religion of Abraham. He gives the same laws as Moses concerning clean and unclean animals; the payment of tythes to the priests; the care necessary to avoid all kinds of pollution, internal and external; the manner of being purified after them; the continuation of the priesthood in the same tribe; the ordination of a high-priest. The rest of this book contains the history of the life and prophecies of the author; and exhortations to virtue.

His

His morality is pure, excepting that he looks on incest as indifferent.

All these marks prove incontestably, that Zoroaster was after Moses; and other particulars, which the Guebres relate of the author of their sect, taken from the history of Jesus Christ, prove that they have mingled their old superstitions with some truths of the Christian religion; and with some Christian usages, which, however, they have altered and corrupted in several ways. They say, for example, that the mother of the prophet their master, found herself with child after a visit she had received from an angel; that the astrologers knew by their art, that the son she should bring into the world would be a prophet, and the author of a new sect. Of this they informed Neubrom, or Nimrod, who then reigned. This prince gave orders that all the women with child in his empire should be put to death. His order was executed; but the pregnancy of the prophet's mother not being discovered, she was saved. The child was happily brought into the world, and was called Ebrahim-Zer-Atcuscht. The king being informed of his birth, ordered him to be brought into his presence, and drawing his sabre, intended to kill him with his own hand; but his arm was instantly dried up and withered. He caused a great fire to be lighted, and the infant to be thrown into it; but it reposed there, as if on a bed of roses. After several other miracles, the prophet disappeared, and was taken up, according to some, both body and soul, into heaven; according to others, he was laid on an iron couch, and carried away by angels.

After that Ebrahim-Zer-Atcuscht was entered into paradise, God sent to his disciples, by his means, seven books, which contained the true religion; after them, seven others, of the explanation of dreams; then seven others, of physic. When Alexander became master of the East, he had the first seven burnt, because nobody understood the language in which they were written, and kept the other fourteen for his own use. After the death of this conqueror, the Gaures restored, as far as their memories enabled them, the seven books that had been burnt, and made them into one large volume, which they still preserve; though they do not understand the language of it, nor even the character; which is different from the Arabic, the Persian, or the Indian. This is what is reported by certain modern travellers, who were not so well informed on the character and language of the books of Zoroaster, as the authors we have quoted before.

The Guebres, or Gaures, have great respect for fire; they still keep it with great care, and distribute it every month among their sect. They call it heavenly fire, and swear by this element, but they do not worship it. They acknowledge only one God, the creator of heaven and earth. They wash their children, after their birth, with warm water; while the Magus, or Gazi, repeats a prayer. When they are married, a Gazi rubs the foreheads of the married couple with a certain water, over which he has said prayers. They believe a general resurrection, and think that before that time all nations will unite into one religion, which will be that of their prophet. Every Gaur may have five wives; but one of these has the superiority over the rest.

The greater part of those who have written the history of Pythagoras, describe him as a disciple of Zoroaster at Babylon, and as deriving from him that great knowledge which afterwards made him so famous in the West. This is what is said by Apuleius, Florid. 2. Jamblicus, vita Pythagor. cap. 4. Porphyry, vita Pythagor. and Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. 1. The Zabratus, or Zaratus of Porphyry, and the Nazaratus of Clemens, are Zoroaster. When Cambyses conquered Egypt, he there found Pythagoras travelling; he took him prisoner, and with other captives, sent him to Babylon. There he became acquainted with Zoroaster, or Zabratus. Porphyry, vita Pythag. p. 185. edit. Cantab. Zabratus purified him from all defilements of his former life, instructed him in such things as a virtuous man should acquire; taught him the secrets of nature, and the principles of the universe. The reader may see, under the article EZEKIEL, that some have thought Pythagoras was acquainted with this prophet, and that it was he whom the ancients intended by the name of Nazaratus or Zaratus.

[Mr. Bryant has a long and laboured article on the subject of Zoroaster, (Anc. Myth. vol. ii. p. 110.) in which he endeavours to trace the original Zoroaster to Noah: this is, certainly, very difficult of reception. Yet, that some ancients have supposed him to be Cush, or Mizraim, must be admitted. The appellation is explained by Clemens [Recognitions, lib. iv. cap. 28.] to import the living star; and we have seen in FRAGMENTS, No. DII. the stars characterized in the Desâtir, as messengers of God to men. This name, therefore, may signify the living interpreter of the will of the gods; and though though it might originate with the most ancient of these personages, yet nothing prevents its being given to eminent reformers in later ages. And this appears to be the fact; the number of Zoroasters which may be traced is, probably, not less than ten or a dozen, and much that is attributable to one has been transferred to others; whence has proceeded great confusion. A star is an emblem of purity, hence the Sidere pulchrior of Horace, lib. iii. ode 9. Heroes and other illustrious persons have also been compared to stars for brightness: so Alexander the Great is called the Star of Macedonia, by Craterus, (Curtius ix. 6, 8.) the star of Cæsar is well known; also, the reception of the Roman emperors and empresses among the stars, &c. Comp. also Rev. i. 16, 20. in which the teachers of the churches are symbolized by stars. In short, the title star enters into the composition of many names, Persian, Arabic, &c.

Since the time of CALMET the laws and institutions of Zoroaster, at present extant, have been translated and published by M. Anquetil du Peron, in 3 vols. 4to. Paris, 1771. They are not without mixture of interpolations, yet contain many traces of antiquity. Their truths are combined with fables; their ceremonies are debased by late additions; they are, perhaps, collections of scattered fragments, renovations by various priests;—for, their votaries affirm, that Alexander the Great caused all the then extant Zoroastrian books, in twenty-one volumes, to be burned. These they have recovered or replaced, as well as they could; but, doubtless, imperfectly. Zend is the name of the character, not of the language in which they are written: the language is called Avesta; and the entire work is called Zend-Avesta. It may gratify the curious; but, to separate the authentic from the traditional and interpolations is extremely difficult. See MAGI, with the Addition.

On the whole, it seems most adviseable, to admit the existence of several Zoroasters; to accept the title as an honourable sacerdotal appellation; and to conclude, that although many reformation were effected by these personages in successive ages, and many established histories, maxims, rites, and observances, of the early fathers of the Persian nation, were revived and invigorated, yet that these renovations were seldom lasting, and that the successors of these stars, shone with greatly diminished purity, splendor and efficacy.]

END OF THE DICTIONARY OF THE HOLY BIBLE.

THE CALENDAR OF THE JEWS.

THE Year of the HEBREWS is composed of twelve Lunar months, of which the first has thirty days, and the second twenty-nine; and so the rest successively, and alternately. The Year begins in Autumn, as to the civil Year; and in the Spring, as to the sacred Year. The Jews had Calendars anciently, wherein were noted,—all the feasts,—all the fasts,—and all the days on which they celebrated the memory of any great event that had happened to the Nation. Zech. viii. 19. Esth. viii. 6. in Græco. These ancient Calendars are sometimes quoted in the Talmud; Misna Tract. Taanith. n. 8; but the Rabbins acknowledge that they are not now in being. Vide Maimon. & Bartenora, in eum locum. Those that we have now, whether printed, or in manuscript, are not very ancient. Vide Genebrar. Bibliot. Rabbinic. p. 319. Buxtorf. Levit. Talmudic. p. 1046. Bartolucci. Bibl. Rabbinic. t. ii. p. 550. Lamy's Introduction to the Scripture; & Plantav. Isagog. Rabbin. ad finem. That which passed for the oldest, is Megillath Thaanih, "the Volume of Affliction;" which contains the days of fasting and fasting heretofore in use among the Jews; which are not now observed; nor are they in the common Calendars. We shall insert the chief historical events, taken as well from this volume, Thaanih, as from other Calendars.

T I Z R I.

The first month of the civil Year; the seventh month of the sacred Year. It has thirty days, and answers to the moon of September.

Day 1. NEW MOON. Beginning of the civil year.

The feast of Trumpets. Levit. xxiii. 34. Numb. xxix. 1, 2.

3. Fast for the death of Gedaliah. 2 Kings xxv. 25. Jer. xli. 2.

The same day, the abolition of written contracts. The wicked kings having forbid the Israelites to pronounce the name of God; when they were restored to liberty, the Asmonæans or Maccabees ordained, that the name of God should be written in contracts after this manner: In such a year of the High-Priest N, who is minister of the most High God, &c. The Judges to whom these writings were presented, decreed they should be satisfied; saying, for example, "on such a day such a debtor shall pay such a sum according to his promise, after which the schedule shall be torn." But it was found, that the name of God was taken away out of the writing; and thus the whole became useless and ineffectual. For which reason they abolished all these written contracts, and appointed a festival-day in memory of it. Megil. Taanith. c. 7.

5. The death of twenty Israelites. Rabbi Akiba, son of Joseph, dies in prison.

7. A fast, on account of the worshipping the golden calf; and of the sentence God pronounced against Israel, in consequence of that crime. Exod. xxxii. 6, 7, 8, 34.

10. A fast of expiation. Lev. xxiii. 10, &c.

15. The feast of Tabernacles, with its octave. Lev. xxiii. 34.

21. Hosanna-Rabba. The seventh day of the feast of Tabernacles, or the feast of branches.

22. The octave of the feast of Tabernacles.

23. The rejoicing for the Law, a solemnity in memory of the covenant that the Lord made with the Hebrews, in giving them the law by the mediation of Moses.

On this same day, the dedication of Solomon's Temple, 1 Kings viii. 65, 66.

30. The first new-moon of the month Marchsevan.

N.B. The Jews, for fear of mistaking, always keep two days for the new-moon.

M A R C H S E V A N.

The second month of the civil Year; the eighth month of the sacred Year. It has but twenty-nine days, and answers to the moon of October.

Day 1. THE second new-moon; or, first day of the month.

CHRON. B

G. A

THE JEWISH CALENDAR.

6. A fast, because Nebuchadnezzar put out the eyes of Zedekiah, after he had slain his children before his face. 2 Kings xxv. 7. Jer. lii. 10.

19. A fast on Monday and Tuesday, and the Monday following, to expiate faults committed on occasion of the feast of tabernacles. Vid. Calendar, à Bartoloccio editum.

23. A feast, or memorial of the stones of the altar, profaned by the Greeks; which were laid aside, in expectation of a prophet, who could declare to what use they might be applied. 1 Macc. iv. 46. Megillath c. 8.

25. A feast in memory of some places possessed by the Cuthites; which the Israelites recovered at their return from the captivity.

26. A dispute of Rabbin Jochanan, son of Zachai, against the Sadducees, who pretended that the loaves of the first-fruits, (Lev. xxiii. 17, 18.) were not to be offered on the altar, but to be eaten hot. Megillath c. 9.

29. First new-moon of the month Cisleu.

CISLEU.

The third month of the civil Year; the ninth month of the sacred Year. It has thirty days; and answers to our moon of November.

Day 1. NEW-MOON, or the first day of the month.

2. Prayers for rain. Calendar. Bartolucci.

3. A feast in memory of the idols which the Assyrians threw out of the courts, where the Gentiles had placed them. Megil. Taanith.

6. A fast in memory of the book of Jeremiah, torn and burnt by Jehoiakim. Jer. xxxvi. 23.

7. A feast in memory of the death of Herod the Great, son of Antipater; who was always an enemy to the sages. Megillath c. 11.

21. The feast of mount Gerizim. The Jews relate that when their high-priest Simon, with his priests, went out to meet Alexander the Great, the Cuthians or Samaritans went also, and desired this prince to give them the temple of Jerusalem, and to sell them a part of mount Moriah. Which request Alexander granted. But the high-priest of the Jews afterwards presenting himself, and Alexander asking him what he desired? Simon intreated him not to suffer the Samaritans to destroy the temple. The king replied to him, that he delivered that people into his hands, and he might do what he pleased with them. Then the high-priest, and inhabitants of Jerusalem, took the Samaritans, bored a hole through their heels, and tying them to their horses' tails, dragged them along to mount Gerizim, which they plowed and sowed with tares; just as the Samaritans had intended to do to the temple of Jerusalem. In memory of this event, they instituted this festival. [Comp. Sivan 25.]

25. The dedication, or renewing of the temple, profaned by order of Antiochus Epiphanes, and purified by Judas Maccabeus. 1 Macc. iv. 52.

2 Macc. ii. 16. John x. 22. This feast is kept with its octave. Josephus says that in his time it was called the feast of lights; perhaps, says he, because this good fortune, of restoring the temple to its ancient use, appeared to the Jews as a new day. Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 11. But the Jewish authors give another reason for the name of lights. They report, that when they were employed in cleansing the temple, after it had been profaned by the Greeks, they found there only one small phial of oil, sealed up by the high-priest, which would hardly suffice to keep in the lamps so much as one night; but God permitted that it should last several days, till they had time to make more: in memory of which, the Jews light up several lamps in their synagogues, and at the doors of their houses. See Selden, de Syned. lib. iii. c. 13. Others affirm (as the Scholastical History, Thomas Aquinas, cardinal Hugh on 1 Macc. iv. 52.) that the appellation of the feast of lights was a memorial of that fire from heaven which inflamed the wood on the altar of burnt-offerings; as related, 2 Macc. i. 22.

Some think this feast of the dedication was instituted in memory of Judith. Vide Sigon. lib. iii. c. 18. de Republ. Hebr. But it is doubted whether this ought to be understood of Judith, daughter of Merari, who killed Holofernes; or of another Judith, daughter of Mattathias, and sister of Judas Maccabeus, who slew Nicanor, as they tell us. Vide Ganz, Zemach David. Millenar. 4. an. 622. & apud Selden. de Synedriis, lib. iii. c. 13. n. 11. This last Judith is known only in the writings of the Rabbins, and is not mentioned either in the Maccabees, or in Josephus. But there is great likelihood that the Jews have altered the Greek history of Judith, to place it in the time of Judas Maccabeus.

A prayer for rain. Time of sowing begins in Judea.

30. First new-moon of the month Tebeth.

TEBETH.

The fourth month of the civil Year; the tenth month of the ecclesiastical Year. It has twenty-nine days, and answers to the moon of December.

Day 1. NEW-MOON.

8. A fast, because of the translation of the law out of Hebrew into Greek. This day, and the three following days, were overcast by thick darkness.

The fast of the tenth month. Calend. Bartolucci.

9. A fast, for which the Rabbins assign no reason.

10. A fast, in memory of the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. 2 Kings xxv. 1.

28. A feast in memory of the exclusion of the Sadducees out of the Sanhedrim, where they had all the power in the time of king Alexander Jannæus. Rabbi.

THE JEWISH CALENDAR.

Rabbi Simeon, son of Shatach, found means of excluding them one after another, and of substituting Pharisees. Megillat. Taanith. [Comp. Jiar 23.]

29. First new-moon of the month Shebeth.

S H E B E T H.

The fifth month of the civil Year; the eleventh month of the sacred Year. It has thirty days, and answers to the moon of January.

Day 1. NEW-MOON, or the first day of the month.

2. A rejoicing for the death of king Alexander Jannæus, a great enemy to the Pharisees. Megill.

4. or 5. A fast in memory of the death of the elders, who succeeded Joshua. Judg. ii. 10.

15. The beginning of the year of Trees, i.e. from hence they begin to count the four years, during which trees were judged unclean, from the time of their being planted. Lev. xix. 23, 24, 25. Some place the beginning of these four years on the first day of the month.

22. A feast in memory of the death of one called Niskalenus, who had ordered the placing images or figures in the temple, which was forbid by the law: but he died, and his orders were not executed. The Jews place this under the high-priest Simon the Just. It is not known who this Niskalenus was. Megill. c. 11.

23. A fast for the war of the ten tribes against that of Benjamin. Judg. xx.

They also call to remembrance the Idol of Micah. Judg. xviii.

29. A memorial of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes; an enemy of the Jews. 1 Macc. vi. 1. Megillath.

30. First new-moon of the month Adar.

A D A R.

The sixth month of the civil Year; the twelfth month of the sacred Year. It has but twenty-nine days, and answers to the moon of February.

Day 1. NEW MOON.

7. A fast, because of the death of Moses. Deut. xxxiv. 5.

8, 9. The trumpet sounded, by way of thanksgiving for the rain that fell in this month, and to pray for it in future. Megillath Taanith.

9. A fast in memory of the schism between the schools of Shammai and Hillel.

12. A feast in memory of the death of two proselytes, Hollianus and Pipus his brother, whom one Tyrinus or Turianus would have compelled to break the law, in the city of Laodicea; but they chose rather to die, than to act contrary to the law. Selden, de Synedr. lib. iii. c. 13. ex Megill. Taanith.

13. Esther's fast; probably in memory of that Esth. iv. 16. Geneb. Bartolucci.

A feast in memory of the death of Nicanor, an enemy of the Jews, 1 Macc. vii. 44. 2 Macc. xv. 30, &c. Some of the Hebrews insist, that Nicanor was killed by Judith, sister of Judas Maccabeus.

14. The first Purim, or lesser feast of lots, Esth. ix. 21. The Jews in the Provinces ceased from the slaughter of their enemies on Nisan 14; and on that day made great rejoicing. But the Jews of Shushan continued the slaughter till the 15th. Therefore Mordecai settled the feast of lots on the 14th and 15th of this month.

15. The great feast of Purim, or lots; the second Purim. These three days, the 13th, 14th, and 15th, are commonly called the days of Mordecai; though the feast for the death of Nicanor has no relation either to Esther, or to Mordecai.

The collectors of the half-shekel, paid by every Israelite, Exod. xxx. 13. received it on Adar 15, in the cities; and on the 25th in the temple. Talmud. Tract. Shekalim.

17. The deliverance of the sages of Israel, who flying from the persecution of Alexander Jannæus, king of the Jews, retired into the city of Koslik in Arabia; but finding themselves in danger of being sacrificed by the Gentiles, the inhabitants of the place, they escaped by night. Megillath Taanith.

20. A feast in memory of the rain obtained from God, by one called Onias Hammagel, during a great drought in the time of Alexander Jannæus. Megillath Taanith.

23. The dedication of the temple of Zerubbabel, Ezra vi. 16. The day is not known. Some put it on the 16th, the Calendar of Sigonius puts it on the 23rd.

28. A feast in commemoration of the repeal of the decree, by which the kings of Greece had forbidden the Jews to circumcise their children, to observe the sabbath, and to decline foreign worship. Megillath Taanith. & Gemar. ut Tit. Thainith. c. 2.

29. First new-moon of the month Nisan.

* * * When the year consists of thirteen lunar months, they place here, by way of intercalation, the second month of Adar, or Ve-adar.

N I S A N, or A B I B. Exod. xiii. 4.

The seventh month of the civil Year; the first month of the sacred Year. It has thirty days, and answers to the moon of March.

Day 1. NEW-MOON. A fast, because of the death of the children of Aaron. Lev. x. 1, 2.

10. A fast for the death of Miriam, the sister of Moses. Numb. xx. 1. Also in memory of the scarcity of water that happened after her death, to the children of Israel in the desert of Kadesh. Numb. xx. 2.

On this day every one provided himself a lamb or a kid, preparatory to the following passover.

14. On the evening of the 14th they killed the paschal lamb; they began to use unleavened bread, and ceased from all servile labour.

14. The solemnity of the Passover, with its octave. The first day of unleavened bread, a day of rest. They ate none but unleavened bread during eight days.

After sun-set they gathered a sheaf of Barley; which they brought into the temple. Cod. Mena-chot. vi. 3.

16. On the second day of the feast they offered the barley which they had provided the evening before, as the first-fruits of the harvest. After that time it was allowed to put the sickle to the corn.

The beginning of harvest.

From this day they began to count fifty days to Pentecost.

21. The octave of the feast of the Passover. The end of unleavened bread. This day is held more solemn than the other days of the octave; yet they did not refrain from manual labour on it.

26. A fast for the death of Joshua. Josh. xxiv. 29.

29. Supplication for the rain of the spring. Geneb.

30. The first new-moon of the month Jiar.

The book called Megillath Taanith, does not notice any particular festival for the month Nisan.

JIAR, or IYAR.

The eighth month of the civil Year; the second month of the ecclesiastical Year. It has but twenty-nine days, and answers to the moon of April.

Day 1. NEW-MOON.

6. A fast of three days for excesses committed during the feast of the Passover, i. e. on the Monday, Thursday, and the Monday following. Calendar. Bartolocci.

7. The dedication of the Temple, when the Asmoneans consecrated it anew, after the persecutions of the Greeks. Megil. Taanith. c. 2.

10. A fast for the death of the high-priest Eli, and for the capture of the ark by the Philistines.

14. The second Passover, in favour of those who could not celebrate the first, on Nisan 15.

23. A feast for the taking of the city of Gaza, by Simon Maccabeus. Calend. Scalig. 1 Macc. xiii. 43, 44.

Or, for the taking and purification of the citadel of Jerusalem, by the Maccabees; according to the Calendar of Sigonius. 1 Macc. xiii. 49, 53. xvi. 7, 36.

A feast for the expulsion of the Caraites out of Jerusalem, by the Asmoneans or Maccabees. Meg. Taanith. [Comp. Tebeth 28.]

27. A feast for the expulsion of the Galileans, or those who attempted to set up crowns over the gates of their temples, and of their houses; and even on the heads of their oxen and asses; and to sing hymns in honour of false gods. The Maccabees drove them out of Judea and Jerusalem, and appointed this feast to perpetuate the memory of their expulsion. Megil. Taanith.

28. A fast for the death of the prophet Samuel. 1 Sam. xxv. 1.

29. The first new-moon of the month Sivan.

SIVAN.

The ninth month of the civil Year; the third month of the ecclesiastical Year. It has thirty days, and answers to the moon of May.

Day 1. NEW-MOON.

6. Pentecost, the fiftieth day after the passover. Called also the feast of Weeks, because it happened seven weeks after the passover. We do not find that it had any octave.

15, 16. A feast to celebrate the victory of the Maccabees over the people of Bethsan. 1 Macc. v. 52. xii. 40, 41. Megillath Taanith.

17. A feast for the taking of Cesarea by the Asmoneans; who drove the Pagans from thence, and settled the Jews there. Megillath Taanith.

23. A fast in memory of the prohibition by Jeroboam, son of Nebat, to his subjects, forbidding them to carry their first-fruits to Jerusalem. 1 Kings xii. 27.

25. A fast in commemoration of the death of the Rabbins, Simeon son of Gamaliel, Ishmael son of Elisha, and Chanina the high-priest's deputy.

A feast in memory of the solemn judgment pronounced in favour of the Jews by Alexander the Great, against the Ishmaelites, who by virtue of their birth-right maintain a possession of the land of Canaan; against the Canaanites, who claimed the same, as being the original possessors; and against the Egyptians, who demanded restitution of the vessels and other things, borrowed by the Hebrews, when they left Egypt. See Megillath Taanith. But the Gemara of Babylon, Tit. Sanhedrim, c. 11. puts the day of this sentence on Nisan 14. [Comp. Cisleu 21.]

27. A fast, because Rabbi Chanina, the son of Thardion, was burnt with the book of the law.

30. The first new-moon of the month Thammuz.

THAMMUZ, or TAMUS.

The tenth month of the civil Year; the fourth month of the holy Year. It has but twenty-nine days, and answers to the moon of June.

Day 1. NEW-MOON.

14. A feast for the abolition of a pernicious book of the Sadducees and Bethusians, by which they endeavoured to subvert the oral law, and all the traditions. Megillath Taanith.

17. A fast in memory of the tables of the law, broken by Moses. Exod. xxxii. 19.

On

On this day the city of Jerusalem was taken. The perpetual Evening and Morning sacrifice was suspended, during the siege of Jerusalem by Titus. Epistemon tore the book of the law, and set up an idol in the temple. It is not said whether this happened under Nebuchadnezzar, Antiochus Epiphanes, or the Romans.

29. The first new-moon of the month Ab.

A B.

The eleventh month of the civil Year; the fifth month of the sacred Year. It has thirty days, and answers to the moon of July.

Day 1. NEW-MOON. A fast for the death of Aaron the high-priest.

5. A commemoration of the children of Jethuel, of the race of Judah, who, after the return from the captivity, furnished wood to the temple. Megil. Taanith.

9. A fast of the fifth month, in memory of God's declaration to Moses on this day, that none of the murmuring Israelites should enter the land of promise. Numb. xiv. 29, 31.

On the same day the temple was taken and burnt, Solomon's temple first by the Chaldeans; Herod's temple afterwards by the Romans.

18. A fast, because in the time of Ahaz the evening lamp went out.

21. Xylophoria; a feast, on which they stored up the necessary wood in the temple. Selden. See Josephus, de Bello, lib. ii. cap. 17. Scaliger places this festival on the 22d of the next month.

24. A feast in memory of the abolition of a law by the Asmoneans, or Maccabees, which had been introduced by the Sadducees, enacting, that both sons and daughters should alike inherit the estates of their parents. Megil. Taanith.

30. The first new-moon of the month Elul.

ELUL.

The twelfth month of the civil Year, and the seventh month of the ecclesiastical Year. It has but twenty-nine days, and answers to the moon of August.

Day 1. NEW-MOON.

7. Dedication of the walls of Jerusalem by Nehemiah. Ezra xii. 27. We read in Nehemiah, vi. 15. that these walls were finished, Elul 25. But as there still remained many things to be done, to complete this work, the dedication might have been deferred to the 7th of Elul of the year following. Megil. Seld.

17. A fast for the death of the spies, who brought an ill report of the land of promise. Numb. xiv. 36.

A feast in remembrance of the expulsion of the Romans, (rather the Greeks), who would have prevented the Hebrews from marrying; and who dishonoured the daughters of Israel. When they intended to use violence towards Judith the only daughter of Mattathias; he, with the assistance of his sons, overcame them, and delivered his country from their yoke. In commemoration of which deliverance, this festival was appointed.

21. Xylophoria; a feast in which they brought to the temple the necessary provision of wood, for keeping in the fire of the altar of burnt-sacrifices. The Calendar of Scaliger places this feast on the 22d. See the 21st of the foregoing month.

22. A feast in memory of the punishment inflicted on the wicked Israelites, whose insolence could not be otherwise restrained, than by putting them to death; for then Judca was in the possession of the Gentiles. They allowed these wicked Israelites three days to reform; but as they shewed no signs of repentance, they were condemned to death. Megillath Taanith.

29. The first new-moon of the month Tizri.

2513 This same night the Israelites celebrate the first passover: and Pharaoh expels them from Egypt.

Israel departs from Rameses to Succoth; from Succoth to Etham: from Etham they turned south, and encamped at Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-zephon.

Pharaoh pursues Israel with his army, and overtakes them at Pi-hahiroth: God gives the Hebrews a pillar of cloud, to guide and protect them. The waters divided. Israel goes through on dry ground. The Egyptians are drowned; 21st of the first month.

Moses, having passed the sea, is now in the wilderness of Etham; after marching three days in the desert, Israel arrives at Marah, where Moses sweetens the water. From Marah they come to Elim. From Elim to the Red-Sea; then into the desert of Sin, where God sends Manna: from thence to Dophcah, Alush, and Rephidim, where Moses obtains water from a rock.

About this place the Amalekites slay those who could not keep up with the body of Israel. Moses sends Joshua against them; while he himself goes to a mountain, and lifts up his hands in prayer.

On the third day of the third month, after their departure from Egypt, Israel comes to the foot of mount Sinai; where they encamp above a year.

Moses goes up the mountain; God offers a covenant to Israel.

Moses comes down from the mountain, and reports to the people what the Lord had proposed. The people declare their readiness to enter into this covenant.

Moses again ascends the mountain, God orders him to bid the people prepare themselves to receive his law.

On the third day after that notice the glory of God appears on the mountain; accompanied by sound of trumpet and thunder. Moses stations the people at the foot of mount Sinai; he alone goes up the mountain. God directs him to forbid the people to ascend, lest they should suffer death. Moses goes down and declares these orders to the people. He then ascends again, and receives the Decalogue.

He returns, and proposes to the people what he had received from the Lord.

2513 The people consent, and covenant on the terms proposed.

Moses goes again up the mountain: God gives him several judiciary precepts of civil polity. At his return he erects twelve altars at the foot of the mountain, causes victims to be sacrificed to ratify the covenant, and sprinkles with the blood of the sacrifices the book that contained the conditions of the covenant. He also sprinkles the people, who promise obedience and fidelity to the Lord.

Moses, Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and seventy elders of Israel, go up the mountain, and see the glory of the Lord. They come down the same day; but Moses, and his servant Joshua, stay there six days longer. The seventh day the Lord calls Moses, and during forty days shews him all that concerned his tabernacle, the ceremonies of sacrifice, and other things.

After these forty days, God gives Moses the Decalogue, written on two tables of stone; and bids him hasten down, because Israel had made a golden calf, and was worshipping it.

Moses comes down, and finding the people dancing about their golden calf, he throws the tables of stone on the ground and breaks them. Coming into the camp, he destroys the calf; slays by the sword of the Levites, twenty-three thousand Israelites, who had worshipped this Idol.

The day following, Moses again goes up the mountain, and by his entreaties, obtains from God the pardon of his people. God orders him to prepare new tables for the law; and promises not to forsake Israel.

Moses comes down and prepares new tables; goes up again the day following: God shews him his glory. He continues again forty days and forty nights on the mountain, and God writes a second time his law on the tables of stone.

After forty days Moses comes down, not knowing that his face shines with glory. He puts a veil over his face, discourses to the people, and proposes to erect a tabernacle to the Lord; to accomplish this, he taxes each Israelite, at half a shekel. This occasions a numbering of the people, who amount to 603,550 men. He appoints Bezaleel and Aholiab to oversee the work of the tabernacle.

3164 Zechariah

Year of the World.	KINGS OF JUDAH.	Year before Christ.	Year of the World.	KINGS OF ISRAEL.	Year before Christ.
3164	Zechariah the high-priest, son of Jehoiada , killed in the temple by order of Joash . Hazael , king of Syria, wars against Joash . 2 Kings xii. 17.	836	3148	Jehu dies, Jehoahaz his son succeeds him. Reigns seventeen years.	852
3165	Hazael returns against Joash ; forces large sums from him. 2 Chron. xxiv. 23. Joash dies, Amaziah succeeds him; reigns twenty-nine years.	835	3165	Jehoahaz dies. Joash , or Jehoash , succeeds him. Elisha dies about this time.	835
3177	Amaziah wars against Idumea .	823	3168	Hazael king of Syria dies; Ben-hadad succeeds him. Joash wars against Ben-hadad .	832
3178	Amaziah wars against Joash , king of Israel; is defeated by him. Uzziah , or Azariah , born, son of Amaziah .	822	3178	Joash obtains a great victory over Amaziah , king of Judah.	822
3194	Amaziah dies; Uzziah , or Azariah , succeeds him; reigns fifty-two years. In Judah, the prophets Isaiah and Amos ; under this reign.	806	3181	Joash dies, Jeroboam II. succeeds him; reigns forty-one years. The prophets Jonah , Hosea , and Amos , in Israel; under this reign.	810
3221	Jotham born, son of Uzziah .	779	3222	Jeroboam II. dies, Zachariah his son succeeds him; reigns six months; or perhaps, ten years. The chronology of this reign is perplexed. 2 Kings, xv. 8, 12. places the death of Zachariah in the 38th year of Uzziah , allowing him a reign of but 6 months. Yet, reckoning what time remains to the end of the kingdom of Israel, we must either admit an interregnum of 9 or 11 years, between Jeroboam II. and Zachariah , as Usher does; or, we must suppose Jeroboam II. reigned 5 years; or, that his reign did not begin till 3191, and ended in 3232, which is the year of the death of Zachariah .	778
3246	Uzziah dies, Jotham his son succeeds; reigns sixteen years. Isaiah sees the glory of the Lord. chap. vi. Isaiah and Hosea continue to prophecy.	754	3232	Zachariah killed by Shallum , after reigning six months.	768
3252	Hezekiah born, son of Jotham .	748	3233	Shallum reigns one month; is killed by Menahem , who reigns ten years. Pul king of Assyria, invades Israel; Menahem becomes tributary to him.	767
			3243	Menahem dies, Pekaiash his son succeeds.	757
			3245	Pekaiash assassinated by Pekah , son of Remaliah ; who reigns twenty-eight years. The text allows 20 years only; but we must read 28 years. Syncellus says, p. 202, it was 28 years, in a copy quoted by St. Basil. And indeed, his reign began in the 52d of Azariah , 2 Kings xv. 27. and ended in the 12th of Ahaz , 2 Kings xvii. 1. which includes 28 years.	755
			3254	Arbaces , governor of Media, and Babylus , governor of Babylonia, besiege Sardanapalus , king of Assyria, in Nineveh.	746
			3257	After a siege of three years. Sardanapalus burns himself in his palace, with all his riches. Arbaces is acknowledged	743

			3283	after three years siege. Carries be- yond the Euphrates the tribes that Tiglath-pileser had not already carried into captivity; the ninth year of Hoshea; of Hezekiah the sixth year.	717
3290	Hezekiah revolts from the Assyrians: makes a league with Egypt and Cush, against Sennacherib.	710		Among the captives, carried away by Shalmanezar to Nineveh, is Tobit, of the tribe of Napthali.
3291	Sennacherib invades Hezekiah; takes several cities of Judah. Hezekiah's sickness. Isaiah foretells his cure; gives him as a sign, the shadow's return on the dial of Ahaz . Sennacherib besieges Lachish. Hezekiah gives money to Sennacherib, who yet continues his war against him, and sends Rabshakeh to Jerusalem; marches himself against Tirhakah , king of Cush, or Arabia. Returning into Judah, the angel of the Lord destroys many thousands of his army; he retires to Nineveh, where he is slain by his sons.	709

Demetrius Nicanor , eldest son of Demetrius Soter , comes into Cilicia to recover the kingdom of his father. Apollonius , to whom Alexander Balas had trusted his affairs, revolts to Demetrius Nicanor . Hemarches against Jonathan Maccabeus, who continues in the interest of Alexander Balas . Apollonius is put to flight.		firm all the privileges the Syrian kings had granted to the Jews.
3858	142	3865	135
Ptolemy Philometor , king of Egypt, comes into Syria, pretending to assist Alexander Balas , but he really designs to dethrone him.		Return of the ambassadors Simon had sent to Rome , to renew his alliance with the Romans.
3859	141	3866	134
Alexander Balas gives battle to Philometor and Demetrius Nicanor . He loses it, and flies to Zabdiel , king of Arabia, who cuts off his head. Ptolemy Philometor dies in Syria. Cleopatra , his queen, gives the command of her army to Onias , a Jew, son of Onias III . Onias restrains Ptolemy Physcon , son of Philometor . Jonathan besieges the fortress of the Syrians at Jerusalem. Demetrius comes into Palestine; Jonathan finds means to gain him by presents.		Antiochus Sidetes quarrels with Simon , and sends Cendebeus into Palestine, to ravage the country. Cendebeus is beat by John and Judas , Simon's sons.
3860	140	3869	131
Demetrius Nicanor attacked by the inhabitants of Antioch, who had revolted. Jonathan sends him soldiers, who deliver him. Tryphon brings young Antiochus , son of Alexander Balas , out of Arabia, and has him acknowledged king of Syria. Jonathan espouses his interests against Demetrius Nicanor . Jonathan renews the alliance with the Romans and Lacedemonians. He is treacherously taken by Tryphon in Ptolemais, who some time afterwards puts him to death.		Simon killed by treachery, with two of his sons, by Ptolemy his son-in-law, in the castle of Docus.
3861	139	3870	130
Simon Maccabeus succeeds Jonathan . Tryphon slays the young king Antiochus Theos , and usurps the kingdom of Syria. Simon acknowledges Demetrius Nicanor , who had been dispossessed of the kingdom of Syria, and obtains from him the entire freedom of the Jews.		Hircanus , or John Hircanus , succeeds his father Simon . Antiochus Sidetes besieges Hircanus in Jerusalem. Hircanus obtains a truce of eight days to celebrate the feast of Tabernacles. Makes peace with Antiochus . Hircanus finds money in David's tomb; or rather the hidden treasures of the kings of Judah.
3862	138	3873	127
The Syrian troops, that held the citadel of Jerusalem, capitulate. Demetrius Nicator , or Nicanor , goes into Persia with an army; is taken by the king of Persia. Simon acknowledged high-priest, and chief of the Jews, in a great assembly at Jerusalem.		Antiochus Sidetes goes to war against the Persians; Hircanus accompanies him. Antiochus is conquered and slain.
3864	136	3874	126
Antiochus Sidetes , brother of Demetrius Nicanor , becomes king of Syria; allows Simon to coin money, and con-		Hircanus shakes off the yoke of the kings of Syria, sets himself at perfect liberty, and takes several cities from Syria.
		3875	125
		He attacks the Idumeans, and obliges them to receive circumcision.
		3877	123
		He sends ambassadors to Rome, to renew his alliance with the Roman power. While the two kings of Syria, both of them called Antiochus , war against each other, Hircanus strengthens himself in his new monarchy.
		3894	106
		He besieges Samaria: takes it after a year's siege. Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 18 .
		3895	105
		Hircanus dies, after a reign of twenty-nine years.
		3898	102
		Under his government is placed the beginning of the three principal Jewish sects: the Pharisees , the Sadducees , and the Essenians ; but their exact epochas are not known. Judas , otherwise called Aristobulus , or Philellen , succeeds John Hircanus ; associates his brother Antigonus with him in the government; leaves his other brethren and his mother in bonds. Lets his mother starve in prison; takes the diadem and title of king. Reigns one year. He declares war against the Itureans. Antigonus his brother, beats them, and obliges them to be circumcised. At last, he is Herod's captive and sport, eight years. So that he survived his father, Alexander Jannæus , forty-eight years.
3899	101	3938	62
Aristobulus dies, after reigning one year. Alexander Jannæus , his brother, succeeds him; reigns twenty-six years. He attempts Ptolemais ; but hearing that Ptolemy Lathurus is coming to relieve this city, he raises the siege, and wastes the country.		Peace concluded between the brothers, on condition that Hyrcauus should live private, in the enjoyment of his estate: and Aristobulus be acknowledged high-priest and king. Thus Hyrcauus having reigned three years and three months , resigns the kingdom to Aristobulus II. who reigns three years and three months .
Ptolemy Lathurus obtains a great victory over Alexander king of the Jews.		Hyrcauus , at the instigation of Antipater , seeks protection from Aretas king of the Arabians.
3901	99	Aretas , king of the Arabians, undertakes to replace Hyrcauus on the throne. Aristobulus is worsted, and forced to shut himself up in the temple at Jerusalem. He sends deputations, first to Gabinus , and then to Scaurus , who were sent by Pompey into Syria; offers them great sums of money to engage on his side, and to oblige Aretas to raise the siege of the temple.
3902	98	Scaurus writes to Aretas , and threatens to declare him an enemy to the Roman people, if he does not retire.
3906	94	Aretas withdraws his forces; Aristobulus pursues him, gives him battle, and obtains a victory over him.
3907	93	3940	60
He wages several wars abroad with success. His subjects war against him during six years, and invite to their assistance Demetrius Eucerus , king of Syria. Alexander loses the battle; but the consideration of his misfortunes reconciles his subjects to him. Demetrius Eucerus obliged to retire into Syria. The years of these events are not well known.		Pompey comes to Damascus, and orders Aristobulus and Hyrcauus to appear before him. Hears the cause of the two brothers, and advises them to live in good understanding with each other.
3919	81	3941	59
Antiochus Dionysius , king of Syria, invades Judea; attacks the Arabians and beats them; but is beaten and slain. Aretas , king of the Arabians, attacks Alexander ; having overcome him, treats with him, and retires.		Aristobulus withdraws into Jerusalem, and maintains the city against Pompey , who besieges it. The city and temple taken. Aristobulus taken prisoner. Hyrcauus made high-priest and prince of the Jews; but not allowed to wear the diadem. Judea reduced to its ancient limits, and obliged to pay tribute to the Romans.
3920	80	Alexander , son of Aristobulus , having escaped from the custody of those who were carrying him to Rome, comes into Judea, and raises soldiers.
3926	74	END OF THE KINGDOM OF SYRIA.

4035 Mission

Year of the World.Y. of J. C.
A. D.

- 4035 Mission of the apostles into several parts of Judea. 35 32
John the Baptist slain, by order of Herod, at the instigation of Herodias, in the 17th year of Tiberius.
Jesus Christ feeds 5,000 men, with five loaves and two fishes.
Jesus Christ's third Passover, after his baptism.
 He passes through Judea and Galilee, teaching and doing miracles.
 Transfiguration of Jesus Christ.
 Mission of the seventy-two disciples.
Jesus goes to Jerusalem at the feast of Pentecost.
 His relations would have him go to the feast of Tabernacles: he tells them his hour is not yet come; however, he goes thither about the middle of the feast.
- 4036 At the beginning of the 36th year of Jesus Christ, Lazarus falls sick, and dies: Jesus comes from beyond Jordan, and restores him to life. 36 33
Jesus retires to Ephrem on Jordan, to avoid the snares and malice of the Jews of Jerusalem.
 He comes to Jerusalem, to be present at his last Passover.
 On Sunday, March 29, of Nisan 9, he arrives at Bethany; sups with Simon the leper.
 Monday, March 30, his triumphant entry into Jerusalem.
 Tuesday, March 31, he comes again to Jerusalem; on his way curses the barren fig-tree.
 Wednesday, April 1, the priests and scribes consult on means to apprehend him.
 Thursday, April 2, he passes this day on the mount of Olives, sends Peter and John into the city, to prepare for the Passover.
 Thursday-evening, he goes into the city, and eats his last supper with his apostles: institutes the Eucharist; after supper he retires with them into the garden of Gethsemane, where Judas, accompanied by the soldiers, seizes him.
 In the night time Jesus is conducted to Annas; father-in-law of the high-priest Caiaphas.
 Friday, April 3, Nisan 14, he is carried to Pilate, accused, condemned, and crucified on Calvary.

Year of
the World.Y. of J. C.

- 4036 Towards evening, before the repose of the sabbath begins, he is taken down from the cross, embalmed, and laid in a tomb.
 The priests set guards about it; and seal up the entry of the sepulchre. He continues in the tomb all Friday-night, all Saturday, (i. e. the sabbath,) and Saturday-night, till Sunday-morning.
 He rises on Sunday morning.
 Angels declare his resurrection to the holy women, who visit his tomb.
Jesus himself appears, 1. to Mary Magdalen, who mistakes him for the gardener; 2. to the holy women, returning from the sepulchre; 3. to Peter; 4. to the two disciples going to Emmaus; 5. to the apostles assembled in an apartment at Jerusalem, excepting Thomas, who was absent: all this on the day of his resurrection.
 Eight days after, in the same place, he again visits his disciples; and convinces Thomas, now present.
 The apostles return into Galilee. Jesus shews himself to them, on several occasions.
 The apostles having passed about twenty-eight days in Galilee, return to Jerusalem.
Jesus appears to them while at table, in Jerusalem, May 14. Having taken them out of the city, to the mount of Olives, he ascends into heaven before them all; on the fortieth day after his resurrection.
- Ten days after, being the feast of Pentecost, the Holy Ghost descends upon them in the form of tongues of fire.
- 4037 Seven deacons chosen. 37 34
St. Stephen martyred.
Saul persecutes the church: His conversion.
Pilate writes to Tiberius, respecting the death of Jesus Christ.
James the lesser made bishop of Jerusalem.
Philip, the deacon, baptizes the eunuch of queen Candace.
 Dispersion of the Apostles, and other believers, from Jerusalem.
- 4038 Agrippa the Younger, being much involved in debt in Judea, resolves on going to Rome. 38 35
- 4039 He arrives at Rome, and devotes himself 39 36

4060 Mark comes again to Alexandria; and there suffers martyrdom. Cestius , governor of Syria, comes to Jerusalem; enumerates the Jews at the Passover. Disturbances at Cesarea; and at Jerusalem. Florus puts several Jews to death. The Jews revolt, and kill the Roman garrison at Jerusalem. A massacre of the Jews of Cesarea in Palestine. All the Jews of Scythopolis slain in one night. Cestius , governor of Syria, comes into Judea. He besieges the temple at Jerusalem; retires; is defeated by the Jews. The Christians of Jerusalem, seeing a war about to break out, retire to Pella , in the kingdom of Agrippa, beyond Jordan. Vespasian appointed by Nero for the Jewish war. Josephus made governor of Galilee. Vespasian sends his son Titus to Alexandria: comes himself to Antioch, and forms a numerous army.	69	66	4072 Vespasian declared emperor by his army. Is acknowledged all over the East. Josephus set at liberty. John of Giscala heads the Zealots. Eleazer , son of Simon, forms a third party; makes himself master of the inner temple, or the court of the priests.	72	69
4070 Vespasian enters Judea; subdues Galilee. Josephus besieged in Jotapata. Jotapata taken; Josephus surrenders to Vespasian . Tiberias and Tarichea, which had revolted against Agrippa, reduced by Vespasian . Divisions in Jerusalem. The Zealots seize the temple, and commit violence in Jerusalem. They depose Theophilus from being high-priest, and put Phannias in his place. The Zealots send for the Idumeans to succour Jerusalem. They slay Ananus , Jesus , son of Gamala, and Zacharias , son of Baruch. The Idumeans retire from Jerusalem.	70	67	4073 Titus marches against Jerusalem, to besiege it. Comes down before Jerusalem, some days before the Passover. The factions unite at first against the Romans, but afterwards divide again. The Romans take the first enclosure of Jerusalem; then the second; they make a wall all round the city, which is reduced to distress by famine. July 17, the perpetual sacrifice ceases. The Romans become masters of the court of the people, in the temple; they set fire to the galleries. A Roman soldier sets the temple on fire; notwithstanding Titus commands the contrary. The Romans, being now masters of the city and temple, offer sacrifices to their gods. The last enclosure of the city taken. John of Giscala , and Simon , son of Gioras, conceal themselves in the common-sewers.	73	70
4071 Nero , the emperor, dies. Galba succeeds him. Vespasian takes all the places of strength in Judea, about Jerusalem. Simon , son of Gioras, ravages Judea, and the south of Idumea.	71	68	4074 Titus demolishes the temple to its foundations. He also demolishes the city; reserving the towers of Hippicos , Phazael , and Mariamne . Titus returns to Rome, to his father Vespasian ; they triumph over Judea. Bassus sent into Judea as lieutenant.	74	71
4072 Galba dies. Otho declared emperor. Otho dies. Vitellius proclaimed emperor.	72	69	4075 After the death of Bassus , Fulvius Sylva succeeds; takes some fortresses that still held out in Judea. The temple Onion, in Egypt, shut up by the Romans. An assassin of Judea seduces the Jews of Cyrene, and causes their destruction. Vespasian causes a strict search to be made for all who are of the race of David.	75	72

The lesser Sestertius was a Roman coin of silver; one quarter of the Denarius. The Sestertium equalled 1000 Sestertii.

The Jewish Cubit, according to our author, was equal to English measure, 1 foot 9 1/2 1/2 inches, or 1 1/2 1/2 foot, on supposition that the Paris foot is to the English foot in the proportion of 1068 to 1000, i.e. almost 22 of our inches, or 21, 894 inches, which is very little more than 21,888 inches, which Dr. Arbuthnot assigns in his tables, after the Bishops Cumberland and Hooper; which is the present cubit of Cairo, according to Mr. Greaves.

The Stadium, or furlong, was the eighth part of a mile, or mille passus; 125 geometrical paces; or 667 1/2 feet, English.

The mile was 8 Stadia, or furlongs, or 1000 geometrical paces; and 3 of these miles were a league, or an hour's journey. The mile will be 5340 English feet. We have reduced the feet to English miles, supposing the mile to be 8 furlongs, the furlong 132 paces, the pace 5 feet.

The Parasang consisted of 30 Stadia, or 3750 geometrical paces; 3 miles, 6 furlongs, 45 paces, English.

Measures

Measures of CAPACITY of the Hebrews, compared with English Measures.

The Bath, Epha, or Metretes, contained 60 English wine pints, and almost an half.

The Côr, or Chomer, contained 10 Baths, near 605 pints, English measure.

The Lethech was half the Chomer, 302 English pints, and almost one half.

The Seah, or Satum, was a third part of the Bath, a little more than 20 English pints.

The Gomor, Omer, or Assaron, was the tenth part of the Epha; or something more than 6 English pints.

The Cab was the sixth part of the Seah, or Satum, or the eighteenth part of the Ephah; something above $3\frac{2}{5}$ English pints.

The Log, or Rebah, was a fourth part of the Cab, or a little more than $\frac{2}{3}$ of an English pint.

The Nebel contained 3 Baths, or almost $181\frac{1}{2}$ English pints.

The Hin was the half Seah or half Satum of the Hebrews, and contained the sixth part of the Bath; a little more than ten English pints.

The half Hin was a little above 5 English pints.

The Betzah, or Egg, which the Rabbins sometimes use in their measures, was the sixth part of the Log, and therefore was very little above $\frac{7}{60}$ of the English pint.
